ask forgiveness
for our sins, for we have done wrong."

98. He said: "I shall ask my Lord to forgive you, for
He is indeed
Forgiving, Ever-Merciful."

99. So when they came before Joseph, he embraced his parents, saying:
"Enter into Egypt, in safety,
if it be the will of God."

100. And he raised his parents, both, on the throne, and all of them fell down, bowing before him.
"My dear father, here is the deeper meaning of my dream of long ago. My Lord has brought it into being. Truly, he was good to me when He brought me out of prison and brought you out of the desert, after Satan had sown discord between me and my brothers.

My Lord is Subtle
in what He wills.
He is the Knowing, the Wise.

101. "My Lord, you have given me dominion, and you have taught me the deeper meaning of events. Maker of the heavens and earth, you are my Protector, in this world and the hereafter. Receive me, as one who submits to Your will,
and unite me with the righteous."

102. This is from the chronicles of the Unseen,<sup>1</sup> which we reveal to you [Muhammad]. You were not with them when they concocted together their abominable plot.

103. And most of humankind, however ardently you strive,
will not believe.

104. And you, do not seek reward from them for this. This is no less than a reminder to all worlds.

XII

105. And how many signs in the heavens and earth do they pass by, turning away.

106. And most of them do not believe in God without ascribing partners to Him.

107. Do they feel secure, then, from the darkening calamity of God's punishment, or from the sudden descending of the Hour, while they are unaware?

1. "Unseen" (Arabic al-Ghaib), that is, That which is both Invisible and Unknowable.

108. Say: "This is my way;
I call to God, with clear vision,
I, and whoever follows me.
Glory be to God, that I am not of those who ascribe partners to Him."

109. And we sent before you only men whom we inspired,
from the people of the cities.
Did they not travel
the earth, and behold
the end of those before them?
Surely, the abode of the hereafter is finer for those who are mindful of God. Will you, then, not understand?

110. When the messengers despaired, thinking [the people] had denied, Our help came to them;
We saved whom We will.
But Our wrath will never be turned from wicked people.

111. In their stories, there is a lesson for people of understanding. This is not an invented tale, but confirmation of what came before, an exposition of all things, a Guide and a Mercy to a believing people.

Surah 19: Mary

In the Name of God, the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful

I

1. Kaf. Ha. Ya. 'Ain. Sad.<sup>1</sup>

2. A reminder of the mercy of your Lord toward His servant Zachariah:<sup>2</sup>

3. When he called to his Lord with a secret call:

1. See "Joseph" fn. 2, above.

2. Cf. Luke 1.5–64.

4. "My Lord, my bones are grown frail, and my hair is ablaze with grey,
yet never has my prayer
to You, my Lord, been vain."

5. "I fear [I shall have no] future kin, when I am gone, for my wife is barren.
So grant me—from Yourself—
an heir

6. to bear my legacy<sup>3</sup> and the legacy of Jacob's family;
and let him, my Lord,
be well-pleasing."

7. [God said]:
"Zachariah, We give you glad news of a son, whose name will be John,
a name we gave to none before him."

8. "My Lord, he said,
how can I have a son,
when my wife is barren and I have come to wither with age?"

9. He replied: "These are the words of Your Lord: 'It is easy for Me.
Indeed, I created you before, when you were nothing.'"

10. He said: "My Lord, give me a sign."

"Your sign is this:
you will not speak
to people
for three successive nights."

11. So he ventured out to his people
from his sanctuary, urging them [by gestures], to glorify God
morning and evening.

3. "Legacy" refers here not to wealth but prophethood.

12. "John," [We said]
Hold, steadfast, to the Book," and We endowed him
with sound judgment, while yet a child,

13. and with tenderness,
from Ourselves, and purity. He was mindful of God,

14. solicitous of his parents, and never imperious<sup>4</sup> or disobedient.

15. And peace be upon him
the day he was born,
the day he dies,
and the day he will be raised alive.

II

16. And mention in the Book
Mary, of when she withdrew from her people to a place in the East.

17. She veiled herself from them.<sup>5</sup> Then We sent Our spirit, appearing to her fully in the form of a man.

18. She said: "I seek refuge with the Most Merciful from you: [withdraw]<sup>6</sup> if you fear Him."

19. He said: "I am only a messenger from your Lord, granting you a pure son."

20. "How shall I have a son," she said, "for

4. "Imperious" (Arabic al-Jabbar) is also one of the 99 names of Allah, usually translated as "The Compeller." See also v. 32 below, where the same attribute is negatively imputed to Jesus.

5. Literally, "She placed a screen between herself and them." In this context, the screen (Arabic hijab)—which refers to anything which blocks the sight or view of something—is metaphorical, referring to Mary's seclusion from her people.

6. The word "withdraw" is implied but not stated in the Arabic text.

no man has touched me,
for I have not been unchaste?"

21. He replied: "This is what your Lord has said:
'Easy it is for Me; We will make him
a sign for humankind,
and a mercy from Us.
It is a thing ordained.'"

22. So she conceived him, and withdrew with him
to a place far away.

23. And the pains of labor drove her to the trunk of a date-palm. She cried:
"I wish I had died before this, and been wholly forgotten!"

24. But [a voice] called to her from beneath: "Do not grieve;
surely your Lord has set beneath you a stream."

25. "And shake the trunk of the date-palm toward you,
to let fresh, ripe dates fall upon you."

26. "So eat and drink and be comforted; and if you see anyone, say:
"I have vowed to the Most Merciful a fast, and today I shall speak with no-one."

27. Then she came with him to her people, carrying him.
They said: "Mary, you bring truly an unheard-of thing."

28. "Sister of Aaron, your father was not a wicked man, and your mother was not unchaste."

29. Then she pointed to [the child];
they said: "How can we talk with a child in the cradle?"

30. [The child] said: "I am a servant of God;
He has given me the Book and has made me
a prophet."

31. "And He made me blessed wherever I may be,
and enjoined upon me prayer and charity as long as I live."

32. "And He made me solicitous toward my mother, not imperious or sullen."

33. "And peace be upon me
the day I was born,
the day I die,
and the day
I will be raised alive."

34. This was Jesus, son of Mary: the Word of truth, about which they dispute.

35. It is not for God to bear a child. Glory be to Him: when He decrees something, He says to it only "Be"
and it is.

36. For truly God is my Lord and your Lord: therefore worship Him. This is the straight path.

37. But the sects differed among themselves; and woe will be to those who disbelieve —from the testimony of a momentous day.

38. How keenly will they see and how keenly will they hear on the Day they come to Us. But today the wrongdoers are manifestly astray.

39. And warn them of the Day of remorse, when the matter will be decided while they are heedless, while they do not believe.

40. It is We who will inherit the earth, and all those upon it, and to Us
they will be returned.

III

41. And mention in the Book Abraham: he was a man of truth,
a prophet.

42. He said to his father:
“Father, why do you worship what cannot hear and cannot see, and can profit you in nothing?”

43. “Father, knowledge has come to me which has not come to you. Therefore, follow me, I will guide you
to a level path.”

44. “Father, do not worship Satan, for truly Satan is a rebel against the Most Merciful.”

45. “Father, I fear punishment will befall you from the Most Merciful
and you will become an ally of Satan.”

46. [His father] replied:
“Do you refuse my gods,
Abraham? If you don’t desist in this, I shall stone you.

Now be gone from me.”

47. Abraham said: “Peace be upon you; I shall ask my Lord to forgive you, for He has been ever Gracious toward me.”

48. “But I will turn away from you and what you call upon besides God, and I will call upon my Lord. Perhaps, in my prayer, I will not be disappointed.”

49. So when he turned away from them and those they worshipped besides God,
We bestowed upon him Isaac and Jacob, and We made each of them a prophet.

50. And We bestowed
Our Mercy upon them, and We exalted them
in truthfulness.

IV

51. And mention in the Book
Moses: he was sincere,
and he was a messenger,
a prophet.<sup>7</sup>

52. And We called him from the right side of Mount [Sinai], and We drew him
near for private communion.

53. And We granted him from Our Mercy his brother Aaron as a prophet.

7. The distinction between “prophet” (nabi) and “messenger” (rasul) is still disputed: most agree that prophets were divinely inspired and taught what had already been revealed, while messengers brought forth a new scripture from God.

54. And mention in the Book Ismail:<sup>8</sup> he was true to his promise, and was a messenger, a prophet.

55. He would always enjoin upon his people prayer and charity, and he would always be pleasing to his Lord.

56. And mention in the Book Idris:<sup>9</sup> he was a man of truth, a prophet:

57. And We raised him to an exalted rank.

58. These were among the prophets whom God favored, from the descendants of Adam, and whom We carried with Noah, and from the descendants of Abraham and Israel, whom We guided and chose.
When the verses of the Most Merciful were recited to them, they would fall prostrate,
in tears.

59. But there followed them successors who neglected prayer and followed their desires. Soon, they will face a pit of Hell.

60. Except those who turn to repent, and believe and do good works.
These will enter the Garden and will not be wronged in any way.

61. Eternal Gardens, which the Most Merciful has promised to His servants, in the Unseen.
His promise inexorably will come to be.

8. The first son of Abraham, the older half-brother of Isaac.

9. Unlike the earlier prophets mentioned above in this surah, Idris appears in neither the Hebrew Bible nor the Gospels.

62. There, they will not hear vain discourse, only “Peace.” And there, will have sustenance
morning and evening.

63. This is the Garden
We shall bequeath to our servants who were mindful of Us.

64. [The angels say:]
“We descend only by command of your Lord.
To Him belongs what lies before us and what lies behind us, and what lies between. And your Lord is never forgetful.”

65. “Lord of the heavens and of the earth, and of all between them: so worship Him,
and be steadfast in His worship.
Do you know of any equal to Him?”

v

66. Man says: “Shall I, once dead, be brought to life?”

67. But does not Man recall that We created him before, when he was nothing?

68. So, by your Lord,
We shall surely gather them,
and the devils, around Hell,
on their knees.

69. Then We shall surely drag out from each sect those who were most obdurate against
the Most Merciful.

70. Then We surely know best those who are most worthy to be burned there.

71. And there is not one of you who will not come to it: a decree from your Lord, destined to be.

72. But We shall save those who were mindful of God, and We shall leave
the wrongdoers there,
on their knees.

73. When Our clear signs are recited to them, the unbelievers taunt those who believe: "Which of the two parties is better positioned, and superior in sway?"

74. But how many generations before them have We destroyed, who were superior in possessions and in appearance?

75. Say: "Whoever is astray, the Most Merciful prolongs their straying, until they see what was promised them, either in punishment [here] or in the [coming] Hour.
Then they will know who is in the worse position and weaker in force."

76. "And God increases in guidance those who would be guided; and enduring good deeds are the best rewards
in the eyes of your Lord, and best in their recompense."

77. Have you then seen the person who denies Our signs, yet says: "I shall surely be given wealth and children?"

78. Has he fathomed the Unseen, or secured with the Most Merciful
a compact?

79. No. We shall record what he says, and We shall prolong his punishment.

80. We shall inherit all that he talks of,
and he shall come before Us
alone.

81. Yet, they have taken gods other than God, to empower them.

82. However, [those gods] will reject their worship, and become their adversaries.

VI

83. Do you not see:
We have sent devils against the unbelievers, inciting them to sin?

84. So make no haste against them, for We are only counting for them their term.

85. On that day We shall gather the God-fearing to
the Most Merciful,
as an assembly.

86. And We shall drive
the sinners to hell, like thirsty cattle
to water.

87. None shall have power of intercession, except whoever secures with
the Most Merciful
a compact.

88. They say: "The Most Merciful has begotten a child."<sup>1</sup>

89. Assuredly, you bring forward a monstrous thing

90. at which the heavens might be rent apart, and the earth burst asunder, and the mountains collapse in utter ruin,

91. that they ascribe a child to the Most Merciful.

92. For it is not for the Most Merciful to bear a child.

93. There is none in the heavens and earth who will not come before the Most Merciful as a servant.

94. Most certainly, He has taken account of them, and counted them,
every one.

95. And every one of them will come before Him on the Day of Resurrection
alone.

96. Surely, on those who believed and did good works,
the Most Merciful will bestow Love.

97. So We have made [the Qur'an] easy for you, in your own tongue, so with it you might give glad news to the God-fearing, and with it you might warn a people who are obdurate.

1. A reference not to the Christian belief that Jesus is the Son of God—a view criticized elsewhere in the Qur'an—but to the belief in pre-Islamic Arabia that the angels were the daughters of God.

98. And, before them, how many generations have we destroyed:
can you trace even one of them or can you hear from them even a whisper?

Surah 24 (Excerpt): Light

35. God is the Light<sup>1</sup> of the Heavens and of the Earth;
His Light is a parable, of a lamp within a niche; the lamp within a glass, the glass haloed as a brilliant star, lit from an olive tree, blessed;
whose soil is neither East nor West;
its very oil would shine forth
though untouched by fire:
Light upon Light.
God guides to His Light whom He will;
He engenders parables for humankind, He Whose knowing encompasses all things.

36. His Light abides in houses, sanctified by God to be raised for the adoration of His Name.

37. There is He glorified, morning and evening by those whom neither trade nor profit can divert from remembrance of God or steadfastness in charity and prayer;
whose fear is for the Day when heart and vision will turn about,

38. that God might reward their finest deeds, giving ever more from His Grace, for God furnishes measurelessly those whom He will.

39. As for the unbelievers:
their deeds are like a mirage in the burning desert: the parched man's eyes see water in the distance; approaching, he finds nothing; before him, he finds God, Who will give him his due in full: God, whose reckoning is swift.

1. "Light" (an-Nur): that is, divine guidance, knowledge, or power. Some interpretations associate it with the believer's heart, while the lamp is viewed as the Qur'an.

40. Or, like darkness on a fathomless ocean, wave over wave, overcast by cloud:
 darkness upon darkness;
 if a man stretch out his hand,
 he can scarce see it.
 For those whom God deprives of Light
 there is no Light.

Surah 36: Ya Sin

In the Name of God, the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful

I

1. Ya Sin.<sup>1</sup>
2. By the wise Qur'an,
3. you [Muhammad] are truly one of the messengers
4. on a straight path.
5. It is a revelation sent down from the Mighty,
 the Ever-Merciful,
6. that you might warn a people whose forefathers had no warning, and so are heedless.
7. The sentence has been pronounced against most of them, for they will not believe—
8. indeed We placed around their necks yokes drawn up to their chins, forcing up their heads,
9. and before them a barrier,
 and behind them a barrier, and covered them up so they cannot see.
10. It is the same to them whether you warn them or not:
 they will not believe.

1. See "Joseph," fn. 2. Ya Sin has at least once been translated as "O Thou Human Being."

11. You can warn only him who follows the Message and fears the All-Merciful in the Unseen. So give glad news to him, of forgiveness and a noble reward.

12. Truly, We bring back to life the dead, and We transcribe all [the deeds] they send before them and all that they leave behind, and We have accounted all things in a clear record.

13. Adduce for them
a parable, of a people to whose town there came messengers.

II

14. When We sent to them two messengers,<sup>2</sup> they denied them both. So We reinforced them with a third,
and they declared: “Truly, we have been sent as messengers to you.”

15. [The people] said: “You are merely humans, like us, and the All-Merciful has not sent anything. You are only lying.”

16. They said: “Our Lord knows that truly we have been sent
as messengers to you.”

17. “And what is [laid] upon us is only the clear conveyance [of the message].”

18. [The people] said:
“We augur that you are an evil omen. If you don’t desist, we’ll surely stone you:
a painful punishment from us will surely reach you.”

2. Perhaps Moses and Jesus.

19. They replied: "Your evil omen is within yourselves. Is it because you have been reminded? Surely not: you are a transgressive people."

20. And there came from the outskirts of the city a man running, who said: "My people, follow the messengers."

21. "Follow those who ask no reward of you, and who are rightly guided."

22. "And why should I not worship Him who created me? For to Him you will be returned."

23. "Should I take other gods besides Him? If the All-Merciful intended harm for me, their intercession could not help in any way, nor could they save me."

24. "I would truly be in manifest error."

25. "Truly, I believe in your Lord; so hear me."

26. He was told: "Enter the Garden." He said: "If only my people knew

27. how my Lord has forgiven me and has set me among the honored."

28. And We did not send down against his people, after him, any hosts from heaven, nor would We deign to:

29. there was but one single blast, and they were vanished.

30. Alas, for [My] servants; whichever messenger comes to them,
they mock him.

31. Don't they see how many generations before them
We destroyed, so none would come back to them?

32. And every one,
all together, will be brought before Us.

III

33. A sign for them is the dead earth:
We bring her to life,
and bring from her grain which they eat.

34. And We placed upon her gardens, with palm-groves and grape-vines, and We caused springs to burst forth there,

35. so they might eat of its fruit, and what their hands made;
will they not, then, be thankful?

36. Glory be to Him Who created in pairs all that the earth yields, and their own selves, and also things of which they are unaware.

37. And a sign for them is the night: we strip away from it the light of day, so they are left in darkness.

38. And the sun courses through her sure path
by decree of the Almighty,
the All-Knowing,

39. and the moon,
for whom We ordained phases, till it returns, like a dried date-stalk of old.

40. The sun may not outrun the moon, nor may the night outstrip the day. Each glides in [its own] orbit.

41. And a sign for them is that We carried their offspring in the loaded Ark [through the Flood].

42. and We have created for them the like [ships] in which they sail.

43. And if We willed, We could drown them, and they would have no helper [to hear their cry], nor would they be saved,

44. except by Our mercy,
as a reprieve for a while.

45. When they are told,
“Have fear of what lies before you and what lies behind you, that you might receive mercy,”

46. they turn away from every sign that comes to them from their Lord;

47. and when they are told,
“Spend [in charity] from what God has provided you,” those who disbelieve say to those who believe, “Should we feed those whom,
if He willed, God Himself could have fed?
You are in manifest error.”

48. And they say: “When will this promise [of resurrection] come to pass, if you are being truthful?”

49. But [unwitting] they are waiting only for a single blast, which will overtake them while they are disputing.

50. They will be unable to disburse any bequest, or to return to their own people.

IV

51. The trumpet shall be sounded, and see, how then they will hasten from their graves to their Lord.

52. They will say: "Woe to us!
Who has raised us
from our place of sleep?"
[A voice will answer]<sup>3</sup>
"This is what the All-Merciful promised: the messengers spoke the truth."

53. It will be but a single blast, and then they shall be brought, all,
before Us.

54. Then, on that Day, no soul shall be wronged in any way, and you shall be requited only for what you have done.

55. Truly, on that Day, the people of the Garden shall find joy in all they do,

56. they and their spouses, in the shade, reclining on couches.

57. There, they shall have [every] fruit, and they shall have
all that they call for.

58. "Peace": the word [of welcome] from a Lord Ever-Merciful.

3. There is a mandatory pause here in the Arabic to indicate that the subsequent lines reply to the question just posed, shown here by the parenthetical remark.

59. [And it will be said]:
 “But you who are sinners, stand apart this Day.”

60. “Did I not enjoin you, children of Adam, not to worship Satan, for he is your manifest enemy,

61. and to worship Me?
 —this is a straight path.”

62. “But he indeed led astray a great multitude of you:
 did you not, then,
 use your reason?”

63. “This is Hell, of which you were warned.”

64. “Burn in it, this Day, for you went on disbelieving.”

65. This Day, We shall seal their mouths; but their hands shall speak to Us, and their feet shall bear witness to what they earned.

66. Had We willed, We could surely have extinguished their sight, then they would grope to find the path, but how should they see?

67. And had We willed, We could have transfixed them in their place, unable to move on or go back.

v

68. And to whomever We grant long life, We weaken his capacities: will they not,
 then, use their reason?

69. We have not taught [the Prophet] poetry,<sup>4</sup> nor is it fitting for him. This is

4. Although the Qur'an uses rhyme, it stops short of being “poetry,” at least in the sense of 7th-century Arabia, where poetry, and poets, were linked to public self-advancement and commercial gain.

nothing other than a reminder
and a manifest Qur'an,

70. so those who are living might be warned, and the sentence pronounced against the disbelieving.

71. Don't they see that We created for them
—among the things that Our hands have made—livestock, over which they have dominion,

72. and which We made tame for them,
some to ride and others to eat?

73. And they yield further uses, and give drink.
Will they not then be thankful?

74. Yet still they take other gods besides God, hoping they might be helped.

75. [Those gods] have no power to save them, even if they were brought before them as a host.

76. So do not be grieved [Muhammad] by what they say; surely, We know what they conceal, and what they reveal.

77. And does not man see that it is indeed We who created him from a drop of semen? Yet, see,
he is an open adversary”

78. and adduces allegories about Us, forgetting his own creation, asking: “who can bring life to bones that have decomposed?”

79. Say [in reply]: “He will bring life to them, who composed them at first, for He knows every creation.

80. It is He who made fire for you from the green tree, and see, you light from it your own fires.”

81. Is not He who created the heavens and earth able to create the like of them [human beings]? Indeed, for He is the Creator,
the All-Knowing.

82. When He intends something,
His only command is to say to it: “Be,” and it is.<sup>5</sup>

83. Then glory be to Him in whose hand is dominion over all things; and to Him
you will be returned.

Surah 55: The All-Merciful

In the Name of God, the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful

1. The All-Merciful:

2. He taught the Qur'an,
3. He created man,
4. He taught him speech.

5. Both sun and moon, exact in their span,
6. and stars and trees, bow down, both;

7. and the sky He raised high, and set down the Balance,
8. that you might not infract what is due in balance;
9. then set up [your] weights justly,
and do not fall short in balance.

10. And the earth He laid out for His creatures,
11. with her fruit and date-palms, with clustered sheaths;
12. and corn, with husks, and scented plants.

13. Which, then, of your Lord's favors would you both deny?

14. He created humankind from dry clay like earthen pots,

15. and Jinn He created from smokeless fire.

16. Which of your Lord's favors would you both then deny?<sup>1</sup>

5. The same phrase is used elsewhere in the Qur'an, especially regarding the birth of Jesus (e.g., Q2:116: Q3:47).

1. Although in the Arabic this refrain is repeated exactly, the wording of the modern English translation varies in order to reflect the varied modes of intonation in the Arabic recitation. “Jinn”: spiritual beings lower than angels and able to appear in human form (Arabic, source of English word genie).

17. Lord of the two Easts and Lord of the two Wests.<sup>2</sup>
18. And which of your Lord's favors would you both deny?
19. He let the two seas flow, so they might converge:
20.     between them a barrier, which they shall not transgress—
21. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
22.     —out of them both come pearls and coral.
23. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
24. And His are the ships sailing high on the seas, like mountains.
25. So which of the favors of your Lord will you both deny?
26. All things upon [earth] shall perish,
27.     while the Face of your Lord abides, forever
       in Majesty and Munificence.
28. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
29. Whatever is in the heavens and earth beseeches Him, seeking each day His purpose.
30. Which of your Lord's favors will you then both deny?
31. Soon We shall settle with you, O hosts [of Jinn and humankind].
32. Then which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
33. O company of Jinn and humankind: if you are able to pass beyond the realms of heaven and earth, then pass: yet you shall not pass without [Our] warrant.
34. And which of your Lord's favor will you both deny?
35. Against you both will be hurled a fiery flame, and smoke:
       you shall find no quarter.
36. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
37. When the sky is ripped asunder, turning crimson like red leather:
38. Which of your Lord's favors will you then both deny?
39. On that Day, none will be questioned about his sin, neither humans nor Jinn.
40. And which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
41. The sinners shall be known by their marks, and shall be seized by their forelocks and feet.
42. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
43. This is Hell, which the sinners deny:
44.     they will wander in circles between it and boiling water.
45. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?

2. The rising of the sun and the moon, or perhaps the farthest points of sunrise and sunset in summer and winter; an image of opposition and symmetry.

46. But for whoever fears [the Day] when he shall stand before his Lord:
are two gardens—
47. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
48. —with spreading branches.
49. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
50. In them both will be two fountains, flowing.
51. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
52. In them both will be fruits of every kind, in pairs.
53. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
54. Reclining on couches, lined in rich brocade, with fruit of both gardens within close reach.
55. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
56. In them will be females of modest glance, untouched before by human or Jinn—
57. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
58. —[In beauty] like rubies and coral.
59. So which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
60. What is the reward for goodness except goodness?
61. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
62. And besides these two, shall be two more Gardens—<sup>3</sup>
63. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
64. —both hued in deepest green.
65. And which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
66. In them both will be two fountains, overflowing.
67. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
68. In them both will be fruit, date-palm, and pomegranate.
69. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
70. In them will be maidens, virtuous and beautiful—
71. Which of your Lord's favors would you then both deny?
72. —Houris,<sup>4</sup> dark-eyed, secluded in pavilions—
73. And which of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
74. —untouched before by human or Jinn—
75. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
76. —reclining on cushions of green and beautiful carpets.
77. Which, then, of your Lord's favors will you both deny?
78. Blessed is the Name of your Lord, forever
in Majesty and Munificence.

3. The Islamic paradise has several ranks or levels, into which believers are to be placed after death according to their degree of merit; compare Dante's Paradiso for an adaptation of the structure of the Islamic paradise within a Christian framework.

4. Black-eyed maidens of Paradise (Arabic).

Surah 91: The Sun

In the Name of God, the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful

1. By the sun and her splendor;
2. by the moon
as he trails her;
3. by the day as he displays her;
4. by the night as she veils her;
5. by the heaven and He
Who framed her;
6. by the earth and He
Who extended her;
7. by the soul and He
Who perfected her;
8. for He inspired her to know her [own] evil
and the piety within her;
9. he surely succeeds who purifies her,
10. and he surely fails
who defiles her.
11. The nation of Thamud denied [her prophet Salih],<sup>1</sup> for she was a transgressor, 12. when she deputed her most wicked offender [to denounce him].
13. God's messenger advised them: "This is a she-camel of God, so provide drink for her.

1. This account appears in Q7:73–79, where it is compared with other histories, including that of Lot. "Thamud": ancient civilization of southern Arabia; Islamic legend holds that God sent the prophet Salih to warn the Thamudi to give up the decadence they had fallen into.

14. But they denied him and hamstrung her.
So for their sin, their Lord destroyed [their nation], and levelled her.

15. Nor does He fear
what will become of her.

Surah 112: Purity [of Faith]<sup>1</sup>

In the Name of God, the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful

1. Say: He is God, the One,
2. God, the Absolute:
3. neither did He beget,
nor was He begotten.
4. His like or equal there is none.

1. According to tradition, the Prophet Muhammad said that this chapter (surah) was equivalent to one-third of the Qur'an. The Persian poet Rumi also praises it: "Although these words are few in form, they are preferable to the lengthy chapter Baqara [Q2] by virtue of being to the point."

---

BEOWULF

ninth century

---

Surviving in a single tattered manuscript, its edges burned by fire, Beowulf provides a startlingly vivid glimpse into the early medieval past. Written in Old English, with a vocabulary that would have seemed old-fashioned even to its very first audience, the poem recalls a heroic age in which monsters stalked men by night, dragons guarded hoards of precious gems and heirloom swords, and heroes carried out great deeds of warfare that would later be commemorated by song and feasting. The bonds of family and clan give shape to the world of Beowulf and his companions, leading sometimes to the formation of new alliances, sometimes to the violent conflict of blood feud that lasted for generations. Like much Old English poetry, the poem is fundamentally elegiac, celebrating the beauty and mourning the disappearance of a culture that, by the year 1000, had already become part of the past.

The sole surviving copy of Beowulf

can be dated with some certainty to the years around 1000, a time of rich flowering of Anglo-Saxon literature and learning, expressed in both Old English and Anglo-Latin poetry. Yet this time was also the end of an era, just a few generations before English society would be completely transformed by the Norman Conquest of 1066. The poem thus sums up a particular form of English culture that would very soon vanish. Among the other works included in the manuscript containing Beowulf are saints' lives and exotic tales of the Orient: despite their varied genres, all are unified by a common theme of monsters and heroes. The three monsters of Beowulf—Grendel, Grendel's mother, and the dragon—and the superhuman hero who fights against them appear beside other examples of nonhuman nature, from the so-called monstrous races encountered by Alexander the Great in the extreme reaches of India to the dog-headed (or "cynocephalic") Saint Christopher. Read in this context, the poem sheds light on the nature of medieval English culture, especially on its ability to integrate pagan Germanic history within the framework of the Christian Middle Ages.

While we can date the manuscript of Beowulf to the years around 1000, the poem itself is almost certainly much older—a judgment based on the poem's old-fashioned vocabulary and certain genealogical allusions as well as the manuscript itself, whose copying errors suggest that a long history of transmission lies behind it. Yet the poem in its oral form is even older, drawing on a rich stock of myth and legend that was surely familiar among the northern Germanic peoples who inhabited the regions now known as Scandinavia, the Low Countries, and the British Isles. Those who read Beowulf or heard it recited in the eleventh century would have likely recognized allusions to ancient blood feuds and tribal clashes that are only dimly comprehensible to modern readers. The poem appears to be set in the sixth century (in particular, we can date the death of Beowulf's lord, Hygelac, to around 520), and so the story would already have seemed like ancient history to the poem's earliest hearers. To the eleventh-century reader, the events of the poem are thus doubly removed into the past. Like Homer's Iliad, whose written text codifies a much older oral form of the poem, Beowulf emerges as a written work of literature only at the end of generations of transmission as song.

Although we are accustomed to thinking of Beowulf as an "English" poem, its subject matter is not English people at all: Beowulf himself is a member of the tribe of the Geats, who live in the south of what is now Sweden, and he goes to serve in the court of Hrothgar, king of the Danes. In the period that the poem is set, England was only beginning to be settled by Germanic tribes, which had first invaded the island around 450. For the medieval English person reading the poem around 1000, therefore, the subject matter of the poem would have been at once strange and familiar—made up of persons and places that were remote in space and time from current-day England, but connected to the poem's audience by lines of heritage and descent. This simultaneous sense of strangeness and familiarity would have been heightened by Beowulf's treatment of religion. While the readers and hearers of the poem, beginning in the ninth century and almost certainly earlier, would have brought a Christian perspective to the poem, the characters clearly belong to a pre-Christian world where wyrd (fate) governs the events that unfold in the lives of man. Yet the text is careful to maintain ambiguity regarding the role of Christianity in the world of the poem: the monstrous Grendel is said to be one of “Cain’s clan,” and is thus identified as an outcast from humanity in specifically biblical terms.

Grendel is only the first of three monsters that the hero Beowulf must confront. The initial single combat against this man-beast is quickly succeeded by a similar battle—this time carried out in the watery deeps of a distant wasteland—against Grendel’s mother, an even more loathsome creature. After these successes, Beowulf’s heroism is acclaimed, he is richly rewarded, and he returns to his own Geatish homeland to eventually become ruler of his people. Only decades later, in that homeland, does the third episode of combat take place, which pits Beowulf against a fierce dragon guarding a buried hoard of gems and shining weapons. Once again he enters battle alone, but before the struggle ends he is aided by his kinsman and companion Wiglaf. These clashes are among the most gripping scenes of the poem. First the hero wrestles with a dreadful monster who bites through his victim’s bones, drinks his blood, and swallows his flesh in great chunks, consuming him “hand and foot.” The horror of the confrontation with Grendel’s vengeful mother is still greater: she is a “swamp-thing from hell.” In Beowulf’s final monstrous encounter, the dragon “billowed and spewed” venomous fire, at once burning and poisoning his victim.

Yet Beowulf’s horrific enemies are more complex than they might first appear: Grendel is both monster and man, one of the family of Cain. Like

Cain himself, he is said to be “God-cursed,” and his status as an outcast, cut off from the community of men, makes him seem curiously forlorn, “spurned and joyless.” Although he is undoubtedly a monster, Grendel shows human emotions; he is whipped into a blind and jealous fury against those able to enjoy the bonds of family and tribe, who sleep blissfully in the communal space of Heorot’s great hall. Similarly, Grendel’s mother is driven not just by her monstrous nature but also by a maternal desire to avenge the death of her son—and according to the codes of Germanic tribal society, revenge was an entirely appropriate motive. Even the fight with the dragon is not cast in simple terms: when Beowulf enters his cavernous lair, it is the hero—not the monster—who is identified as the invader, and the dragon is called the “hordweard,” or guardian of the hoard. Although one is a man and one is a beast, both are said to be clad in armor, the hero bearing his shield and helm, the dragon his “enameled scales.” As the line that separates human from nonhuman is blurred, every violent clash, whether man against man or man against monster, is couched in terms of equivalence and balance.

As vivid as these encounters are, the poem also has an important second level, concerned with the interpersonal ties of kinship and tribe, as well as the voluntary relationship of lord and warrior. We see Beowulf take on a series of roles within this social system. He begins among the Geats as a strong fighter of somewhat marginal status as a nephew of the king, Hygelac; he then is adopted with great honor into the household of Hrothgar, king of the Danes, after defeating Grendel and his mother; and finally Beowulf becomes ruler of the Geats, when Hygelac dies without a male heir. Beowulf appears first as a warrior in the service of his lord, and later as himself a lord—in the language of the poem, a “giver of rings” as well as one who receives them. The relationship of king and warrior is reciprocal, as the warrior provides service while his lord offers protection and distributes wealth, often in the form of armbands or neck torques (“rings”). Yet perhaps the most valuable gift that the lord grants is entrance into the community itself: in Beowulf, as in Old English poetry more generally, no burden is heavier than involuntary solitude. The warm bonds of fellowship nurture the warrior, and to be cut off from them is unimaginably bitter. Such isolation afflicts Grendel, as we have seen, and is memorably evoked in the poem’s description of how the dragon’s golden hoard came into being. It was the accumulated treasure of a long-ago people, the poet says, buried for safe-keeping by the last of their line: “Death had come / and taken them all,” leaving just one man “deserted and alone, lamenting his unhappiness / day and night.” For the despairing survivor, there is “No trembling harp, / no tuned timber, no tumbling hawk / swerving through the hall.” Bereft of the joys of the hall, the only man left alive can do little more than mourn as he waits for death.

The hall offers both the most secure and stable environment that a warrior can possibly inhabit and the culture’s greatest point of vulnerability. Beowulf is given the opportunity to display his heroic nature in combat with Grendel because of the need to defend Heorot, the great hall of Hrothgar: the accursed monster has been sneaking into the hall by night, seizing and devouring warriors one by one. The threat is not simply to the lives of Hrothgar’s men but to the very basis of the community, as the Danish warriors are reduced to fearful individuals, each concerned for his own life. The great hall of Heorot is a place of communal gathering and feasting, of goodwill and social bonds, where oaths of loyalty are sworn and golden rings are distributed, where heroic deeds are sung and the genealogies of kings recounted. Yet this idyllic space, representing the unity of the king and his people, is only temporary, for the danger posed to Heorot is not erased by the death of Grendel: other threats are darkly foreshadowed in the poem through allusions to the fate of the Danes after Hrothgar’s reign ended. For the poem’s medieval audiences, these passing references brought to mind the full story of the tragic downfall of Hrothgar’s house and the burning of Heorot.

Swords and other weaponry appear throughout the poem, not just as tools of the warfare that punctuates the narrative at regular intervals but as a kind of social glue that links the community of warriors both in the present and across time and space. As treasures are shared, kings disburse weapons along with golden rings, items that are as precious for their ability to create interpersonal connections as for their physical material. Hrothgar’s queen, Wealhtheow, rewards Beowulf with a golden collar that marks a new bond of affinity between the Geatish hero and the ruling house of the Danes, accompanying the sumptuous gift with the request that Beowulf do his best to support her young son in the future. The ring thus carries both material and social value, marking a bond of loyalty between persons and groups. Similarly, Hrothgar later rewards Beowulf with magnificent armor, which Beowulf goes on to deliver to his own Geatish lord, Hygelac, just as he also gives to Hygelac’s queen, Hygd, the neck ring bestowed on him by Wealhtheow.

Beowulf's gifts unite the Danes and the Geats and thereby redouble his own honor. And the connections formed by heirloom weapons can extend far into the past. As Beowulf prepares to battle Grendel's mother, the Danish warrior Unferth lends him "a rare and ancient sword," and he in turn leaves his own weapon, a "sharp-honed, wave-sheened wonder-blade," with the Dane, who may keep it if he fails to return. In the muddy pool where Beowulf defeats Grendel's mother, he finds another blade, whose gold hilt is inscribed with "rune-markings" telling the name of the one "for whom the sword had first been made." This sword, "from the days of the giants," passes through time, wielded by men and by monsters, until it finally comes into the hands of Beowulf, who in turn delivers its remnants to the Danish king Hrothgar. The chain of descent confers glory on the hero, and unites the community of warriors across the ages.

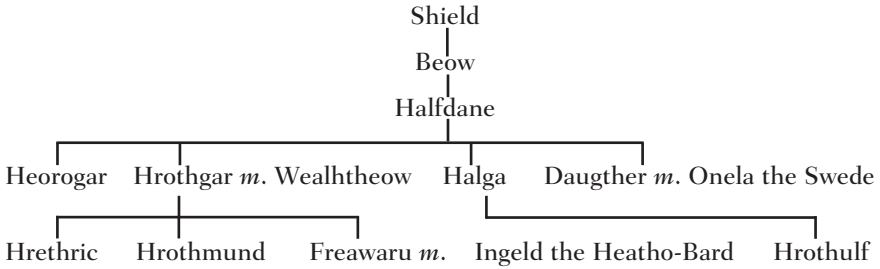

Each of these three ancient swords is described as an heirloom or "ealde lafe": literally, an "old thing that is left," a remainder of past glory. The weapon is thus an instrument of warfare and a symbol of continuity, linking past, present, and future as successive men bear it. Such work of commemoration suffuses the poem, perhaps nowhere more movingly than in the songs of heroes that punctuate the communal celebrations and feasting held in Heorot. Like the "ealde lafe," the heroic song recalls figures of the past and makes them live again as the warriors listen and join in the imagined community of the tribal nation and the symbolic space of the hall. After the defeat of Grendel, Hrothgar's minstrel sings a song of the Frisian king Finn and his Danish wife Hildeburh. The story is tragic, telling of the feud that destroyed their family, but the shared experience of the minstrel's music and tale brings Hrothgar's court together—a sense of community reawakened, perhaps, for the medieval audiences who heard Beowulf performed for them.

The translation here, by Seamus Heaney, seeks to reproduce the rhythmic quality of the Old English line—made up of two half-lines, each containing two beats. Coupled with the alliteration (repeated initial consonant sounds) that is prevalent in Old English poetry, the line produces a strong sense of rhythm, a recurrent thrumming sound that gives the poem its songlike quality, impossible to ignore even in written form. To give a clearer sense of the sound of the original work, reproduced at the top of page 124 are the closing lines (2262–69) of the lament of the last survivor, who long ago buried the hoard of treasure guarded by the dragon that is Beowulf's last and most dangerous enemy. Below these lines is a very literal, rhythmic translation that conveys the lines' aural quality more emphatically than does Heaney's version.

TRIBES AND GENEALOGIES

1. The Danes (Bright-, Half-, Ring-, Spear-, North-, East-, South-, West-Danes; Shieldings, Honor-, Victor-, War-Shieldings: Ing's friends).

2. The Geats (Sea-, War-, Weather-Geats).

3. The Swedes

*The daughter of Hygelac who was given to Eofor may have been born to him by a former wife, older than Hygd.

4. Miscellaneous.

A. The Half-Danes (also called Shieldings) involved in the fight at Finnsburg may represent a different tribe from the Danes described above. Their king Hoc had a son, Hnaef, who succeeded him, and a daughter Hildeburh, who married Finn, king of the Jutes.

B. The Jutes, or Frisians, are represented as enemies of the Danes in the fight at Finnsburg and as allies of the Franks at the time Hygelac the Geat made the attack in which he lost his life and from which Beowulf swam home. Also allied with the Franks at this time were the Hetware.

C. The Heatho-Bards (i.e., "Battle-Bards") are represented as inveterate enemies of the Danes. Their king Froda had been killed in an attack on the Danes, and Hrothgar's attempt to make peace with them by marrying his daughter Freawaru to Froda's son Ingeld failed when the latter attacked Heorot. The attack was repulsed, although Heorot was burned.

Beowulf, lines 2262–69<sup>1</sup>

gomen gleobeames,
geond sæl swingeð,
burhstede beateð.
fela feorhcynna Swa giomormod an æfter eallum, dæges ond nihtes,
hran æt heortan.

that joyful singing wood,
shoot through the hall,
beat his feet in the yard.
sent out of this world
So, sad in spirit,
one left after all were gone,
through both day and night, touched his heart.

“Næs hearpan wyn, ne god hafoc
ne se swifta mearh Bealocwealm hafað forð onsended.”
giohtho mænde, unbliðe hwearf
oððæt deaðes wylm

“There is no delight in the harp, nor does the fine hawk nor does the swift steed Baleful death has too many of our kind.”
he lamented his loss, unhappily went on until death’s wave

Beowulf<sup>1</sup>[Prologue: The Rise of the Danish Nation]

So. The Spear-Danes in days gone by and the kings who ruled them had courage and greatness.
We have heard of those princes’ heroic campaigns.

There was Shield Sheafson,<sup>2</sup> scourge of many tribes, a wrecker of mead-benches, rampaging among foes.
This terror of the hall-troops had come far.
A foundling to start with, he would flourish later on as his powers waxed and his worth was proved.
In the end each clan on the outlying coasts beyond the whale-road had to yield to him and begin to pay tribute. That was one good king.

Afterward a boy-child was born to Shield, a cub in the yard, a comfort sent by God to that nation. He knew what they had tholed,<sup>3</sup> the long times and troubles they’d come through without a leader; so the Lord of Life,
the glorious Almighty, made this man renowned.
Shield had fathered a famous son:
Beow’s name was known through the north.
And a young prince must be prudent like that,

1. Translated by Suzanne Akbari.

1. Translated by Seamus Heaney.

2. Translates Scyld Scefing, which probably means “son of Sheaf.” Scyld’s origins are mysterious.

3. An Anglo-Saxon word that means “suffered, endured” and that survives in the translator’s native land of Northern Ireland. In using this word, he also maintains an alliterative pattern similar to the original (“that . . . they . . . tholed”).

giving freely while his father lives
 so that afterward in age when fighting starts steadfast companions will stand by him and hold the line. Behavior that's admired is the path to power among people everywhere. 25

Shield was still thriving when his time came and he crossed over into the Lord's keeping.
 His warrior band did what he bade them
 when he laid down the law among the Danes:
 they shouldered him out to the sea's flood, 30
 the chief they revered who had long ruled them.

A ring-whorled prow rode in the harbor,
 ice-clad, outbound, a craft for a prince.
 They stretched their beloved lord in his boat, laid out by the mast, amidships, 35
 the great ring-giver. Far-fetched treasures were piled upon him, and precious gear.

I never heard before of a ship so well furbished with battle-tackle, bladed weapons and coats of mail. The massed treasure 40 was loaded on top of him: it would travel far on out into the ocean's sway.

They decked his body no less bountifully with offerings than those first ones did who cast him away when he was a child 45 and launched him alone out over the waves.<sup>4</sup>

And they set a gold standard up high above his head and let him drift to wind and tide, bewailing him and mourning their loss. No man can tell, 50 no wise man in hall or weathered veteran knows for certain who salvaged that load.

Then it fell to Beow to keep the forts.
 He was well regarded and ruled the Danes for a long time after his father took leave 55 of his life on earth. And then his heir, the great Halfdane, held sway for as long as he lived, their elder and warlord.

He was four times a father, this fighter prince:
 one by one they entered the world, 60
 Heorogar, Hrothgar, the good Halga, and a daughter,<sup>5</sup> I have heard, who was Onela's queen,
 a balm in bed to the battle-scarred Swede.

The fortunes of war favored Hrothgar.
 Friends and kinsmen flocked to his ranks, 65 young followers, a force that grew to be a mighty army. So his mind turned

4. Since Shield arrived with nothing, this sentence is a litotes or understatement, a characteristic of the laconic style of old Germanic poetry.

5. The text is faulty here, and the name of Halfdane's daughter has been lost. Halfdane: according to another source, Halfdane's mother was Swedish; hence his name.

to hall-building: he handed down orders for men to work on a great mead-hall meant to be a wonder of the world forever; 70 it would be his throne-room and there he would dispense his God-given goods to young and old—but not the common land or people's lives.<sup>6</sup> Far and wide through the world, I have heard, orders for work to adorn that wallstead 75 were sent to many peoples. And soon it stood there finished and ready, in full view, the hall of halls. Heorot<sup>7</sup> was the name
 he had settled on it, whose utterance was law.
 Nor did he renege, but doled out rings 80 and torques<sup>8</sup> at the table. The hall towered, its gables wide and high and awaiting a barbarous burning.<sup>9</sup> That doom abided, but in time it would come: the killer instinct unleashed among in-laws, the blood-lust rampant. 85

[Heorot Is Attacked]

Then a powerful demon, a prowler through the dark, nursed a hard grievance. It harrowed him to hear the din of the loud banquet every day in the hall, the harp being struck and the clear song of a skilled poet 90 telling with mastery of man's beginnings, how the Almighty had made the earth
 a gleaming plain girdled with waters;
 in His splendor He set the sun and the moon to be earth's lamplight, lanterns for men, 95 and filled the broad lap of the world with branches and leaves; and quickened life in every other thing that moved.

So times were pleasant for the people there until finally one, a fiend out of hell, 100 began to work his evil in the world.
 Grendel was the name of this grim demon haunting the marches, marauding round the heath and the desolate fens; he had dwelt for a time in misery among the banished monsters, 105 Cain's clan, whom the Creator had outlawed and condemned as outcasts.<sup>1</sup> For the killing of Abel

6. Apparently, slaves, along with pastureland used by all, were not in the king's power to give away.

7. That is, "hart," a symbol of royalty.

8. Golden bands worn around the neck.

9. The destruction by fire of Heorot—when the Heatho-Bard Ingeld attacked his father-in-law, Hrothgar—occurred at a later time than that of the poem's action. For a more detailed account of this feud and of Hrothgar's hope that it could be settled by the marriage of his daughter to Ingeld, see lines 2020–69.

1. Genesis 4.9–12.

the Eternal Lord had exacted a price:
 Cain got no good from committing that murder because the Almighty made him anathema 110 and out of the curse of his exile there sprang ogres and elves and evil phantoms and the giants too who strove with God time and again until He gave them their reward.<sup>2</sup>

So, after nightfall, Grendel set out 115 for the lofty house, to see how the Ring-Danes were settling into it after their drink, and there he came upon them, a company of the best asleep from their feasting, insensible to pain and human sorrow. Suddenly then 120
 the God-cursed brute was creating havoc:
 greedy and grim, he grabbed thirty men from their resting places and rushed to his lair, flushed up and inflamed from the raid, blundering back with the butchered corpses. 125

Then as dawn brightened and the day broke, Grendel's powers of destruction were plain:
 their wassail was over, they wept to heaven and mourned under morning. Their mighty prince, the storied leader, sat stricken and helpless, 130 humiliated by the loss of his guard, bewildered and stunned, staring aghast at the demon's trail, in deep distress.
 He was numb with grief, but got no respite for one night later merciless Grendel 135 struck again with more gruesome murders.
 Malignant by nature, he never showed remorse.
 It was easy then to meet with a man shifting himself to a safer distance to bed in the bothies,<sup>3</sup> for who could be blind 140 to the evidence of his eyes, the obviousness of the hall-watcher's hate? Whoever escaped kept a weather-eye open and moved away.

So Grendel ruled in defiance of right, 145 one against all, until the greatest house in the world stood empty, a deserted wallstead.
 For twelve winters, seasons of woe, the lord of the Shieldings<sup>4</sup> suffered under his load of sorrow; and so, before long,
 the news was known over the whole world. 150
 Sad lays were sung about the beset king,

2. The poet is thinking here of Genesis 6.2–8, where the Latin Bible in use at the time refers to giants mating with women who were understood to be the descendants of Cain and thereby creating the wicked race that God destroyed with the flood.

3. Outlying buildings; the word is current in Northern Ireland.

4. Hrothgar; as descendants of Shield, the Danes are called Shieldings.

the vicious raids and ravages of Grendel, his long and unrelenting feud, nothing but war; how he would never parley or make peace with any Dane 155 nor stop his death-dealing nor pay the death-price.<sup>5</sup>

No counselor could ever expect fair reparation from those rabid hands.
 All were endangered; young and old were hunted down by that dark death-shadow 160 who lurked and swooped in the long nights on the misty moors; nobody knows where these reavers from hell roam on their errands.

So Grendel waged his lonely war, inflicting constant cruelties on the people, 165 atrocious hurt. He took over Heorot, haunted the glittering hall after dark,
 but the throne itself, the treasure-seat,
 he was kept from approaching; he was the Lord's outcast.

These were hard times, heartbreaking 170 for the prince of the Shieldings; powerful counselors, the highest in the land, would lend advice, plotting how best the bold defenders might resist and beat off sudden attacks.

Sometimes at pagan shrines they vowed 175 offerings to idols, swore oaths that the killer of souls might come to their aid and save the people.<sup>6</sup> That was their way, their heathenish hope; deep in their hearts they remembered hell. The Almighty Judge 180 of good deeds and bad, the Lord God,
 Head of the Heavens and High King of the World, was unknown to them. Oh, cursed is he who in time of trouble has to thrust his soul in the fire's embrace, forfeiting help; 185 he has nowhere to turn. But blessed is he who after death can approach the Lord and find friendship in the Father's embrace.

[The Hero Comes to Heorot]

So that troubled time continued, woe 190 that never stopped, steady affliction for Halfdane's son, too hard an ordeal.

5. According to Germanic law, a slayer could achieve peace with his victim's kinsmen only by paying them wergild ("man-price") as compensation for the slain man.

6. The poet interprets the heathen gods to whom the Danes make offerings as different incarnations of Satan. Naturally, the pagan Danes do not think of their gods in these biblical terms, but as the poet makes clear in the following lines, they have no other recourse.

There was panic after dark, people endured raids in the night, riven by the terror.

When he heard about Grendel, Hygelac's thane was on home ground, over in Geatland.

195

There was no one else like him alive.

In his day, he was the mightiest man on earth, highborn and powerful. He ordered a boat that would ply the waves. He announced his plan:
to sail the swan's road<sup>7</sup> and seek out that king,
the famous prince who needed defenders.

200

Nobody tried to keep him from going,
no elder denied him, dear as he was to them.

Instead, they inspected omens and spurred his ambition to go, whilst he moved about like the leader he was, enlisting men, the best he could find; with fourteen others
the warrior boarded the boat as captain, a canny pilot along coast and currents.

205

Time went by, the boat was on water, in close under the cliffs.

210

Men climbed eagerly up the gangplank, sand churned in surf, warriors loaded
a cargo of weapons, shining war-gear in the vessel's hold, then heaved out, away with a will in their wood-wreathed ship.

215

Over the waves, with the wind behind her and foam at her neck, she flew like a bird until her curved prow had covered the distance, and on the following day, at the due hour,
those seafarers sighted land,

220

sunlit cliffs, sheer crags

and looming headlands, the landfall they sought.

It was the end of their voyage and the Geats vaulted over the side, out on to the sand, and moored their ship. There was a clash of mail and a thresh of gear. They thanked God for that easy crossing on a calm sea.

225

When the watchman on the wall, the Shieldings' lookout whose job it was to guard the sea-cliffs, saw shields glittering on the gangplank and battle-equipment being unloaded he had to find out who and what the arrivals were. So he rode to the shore, this horseman of Hrothgar's, and challenged them in formal terms, flourishing his spear:

230

235

7. That is, the sea. This is an example of a "kenning," a metaphoric phrase that is used to describe a common object. These kennings are very common throughout Anglo-Saxon poetry.

See, for another instance, line 258, where the poet describes a man's capacity for speech as his "word-hoard."

“What kind of men are you who arrive rigged out for combat in your coats of mail, sailing here over the sea-lanes in your steep-hulled boat? I have been stationed 240 as lookout on this coast for a long time.
 My job is to watch the waves for raiders,
 any danger to the Danish shore.

Never before has a force under arms disembarked so openly—not bothering to ask 245 if the sentries allowed them safe passage or the clan had consented. Nor have I seen a mightier man-at-arms on this earth than the one standing here: unless I am mistaken, he is truly noble. This is no mere 250 hanger-on in a hero’s armor.

So now, before you fare inland as interlopers, I have to be informed about who you are and where you hail from.
 Outsiders from across the water, 255
 I say it again: the sooner you tell where you come from and why, the better.”

The leader of the troop unlocked his word-hoard;
 the distinguished one delivered this answer:
 “We belong by birth to the Geat people 260 and owe allegiance to Lord Hygelac.
 In his day, my father was a famous man,
 a noble warrior-lord named Ecgtheow.

He outlasted many a long winter and went on his way. All over the world 265 men wise in counsel continue to remember him.
 We come in good faith to find your lord and nation’s shield, the son of Halfdane.

Give us the right advice and direction.
 We have arrived here on a great errand 270 to the lord of the Danes, and I believe therefore there should be nothing hidden or withheld between us.

So tell us if what we have heard is true about this threat, whatever it is, this danger abroad in the dark nights, 275
 this corpse-maker mongering death in the Shieldings’ country. I come to proffer my wholehearted help and counsel.

I can show the wise Hrothgar a way to defeat his enemy and find respite— 280 if any respite is to reach him, ever.
 I can calm the turmoil and terror in his mind.

Otherwise, he must endure woes and live with grief for as long as his hall stands at the horizon on its high ground.” 285

Undaunted, sitting astride his horse,

the coast-guard answered: “Anyone with gumption and a sharp mind will take the measure of two things: what’s said and what’s done.
I believe what you have told me, that you are a troop 290 loyal to our king. So come ahead with your arms and your gear, and I will guide you.
What’s more, I’ll order my own comrades on their word of honor to watch your boat down there on the strand—keep her safe 295 in her fresh tar, until the time comes for her curved prow to preen on the waves and bear this hero back to Geatland.
May one so valiant and venturesome come unharmed through the clash of battle.” 300

So they went on their way. The ship rode the water, broad-beamed, bound by its hawser and anchored fast. Boar-shapes<sup>8</sup> flashed above their cheek-guards, the brightly forged work of goldsmiths, watching over 305 those stern-faced men. They marched in step, hurrying on till the timbered hall
rose before them, radiant with gold.
Nobody on earth knew of another building like it. Majesty lodged there, 310 its light shone over many lands.
So their gallant escort guided them to that dazzling stronghold and indicated the shortest way to it; then the noble warrior wheeled on his horse and spoke these words: 315
“It is time for me to go. May the Almighty Father keep you and in His kindness watch over your exploits. I’m away to the sea, back on alert against enemy raiders.”

It was a paved track, a path that kept them 320 in marching order. Their mail-shirts glinted, hard and hand-linked; the high-gloss iron of their armor rang. So they duly arrived in their grim war-graith<sup>9</sup> and gear at the hall, and, weary from the sea, stacked wide shields 325 of the toughest hardwood against the wall, then collapsed on the benches; battle-dress and weapons clashed. They collected their spears in a seafarers’ stook,<sup>1</sup> a stand of grayish tapering ash. And the troops themselves 330 were as good as their weapons.

8. Images of boars—a cult animal among the Germanic tribes and sacred to the god Freyr—were fixed atop helmets in the belief that they would provide protection from enemy blows.

9. “Graith” is an archaic word for equipment or armor.

1. An archaic word for a pile or mass.

Then a proud warrior questioned the men concerning their origins: “Where do you come from, carrying these decorated shields and shirts of mail, these cheek-hinged helmets and javelins? 335
I am Hrothgar’s herald and officer.

I have never seen so impressive or large an assembly of strangers. Stoutness of heart, bravery not banishment, must have brought you to Hrothgar.”

The man whose name was known for courage, 340
the Geat leader, resolute in his helmet, answered in return: “We are retainers from Hygelac’s band. Beowulf is my name.
If your lord and master, the most renowned son of Halfdane, will hear me out 345 and graciously allow me to greet him in person,
I am ready and willing to report my errand.”

Wulfgar replied, a Wendel<sup>2</sup> chief renowned as a warrior, well known for his wisdom and the temper of his mind: “I will take this message, 350 in accordance with your wish, to our noble king, our dear lord, friend of the Danes, the giver of rings. I will go and ask him about your coming here, then hurry back with whatever reply it pleases him to give.” 355

With that he turned to where Hrothgar sat, an old man among retainers;
the valiant follower stood foursquare in front of his king: he knew the courtesies.
Wulfgar addressed his dear lord: 360 “People from Geatland have put ashore.
They have sailed far over the wide sea.
They call the chief in charge of their band by the name of Beowulf. They beg, my lord, an audience with you, exchange of words, 365 and formal greeting. Most gracious Hrothgar, do not refuse them, but grant them a reply.
From their arms and appointment, they appear well born and worthy of respect, especially the one who has led them this far: he is formidable indeed.” 370

Hrothgar, protector of Shieldings, replied:
“I used to know him when he was a young boy.
His father before him was called Ecgtheow.
Hrethel the Geat<sup>3</sup> gave Ecgtheow

2. The Wendels or Vandals are another Germanic nation; it is not unusual for people to be members of nations different from the ones in which they reside. Hence Beowulf himself is both a Geat and a Waegmunding.

3. The leader of the Geats prior to his son Hygelac, who is the current leader. Note that Ecgtheow’s marriage to Hrethel’s daughter makes Beowulf part of the royal line.

his daughter in marriage. This man is their son, here to follow up an old friendship. 375
 A crew of seamen who sailed for me once with a gift-cargo across to Geatland returned with marvelous tales about him:
 a thane,<sup>4</sup> they declared, with the strength of thirty 380 in the grip of each hand. Now Holy God has, in His goodness, guided him here to the West-Danes, to defend us from Grendel.
 This is my hope; and for his heroism
 I will recompense him with a rich treasure. 385 Go immediately, bid him and the Geats
 he has in attendance to assemble and enter.
 Say, moreover, when you speak to them,
 they are welcome to Denmark.”

At the door of the hall,

Wulfgar duly delivered the message: 390
 “My lord, the conquering king of the Danes, bids me announce that he knows your ancestry;
 also that he welcomes you here to Heorot and salutes your arrival from across the sea.
 You are free now to move forward 395 to meet Hrothgar in helmets and armor, but shields must stay here and spears be stacked until the outcome of the audience is clear.”

The hero arose, surrounded closely by his powerful thanes. A party remained 400 under orders to keep watch on the arms;
 the rest proceeded, led by their prince under Heorot’s roof. And standing on the hearth in webbed links that the smith had woven, the fine-forged mesh of his gleaming mail-shirt, 405 resolute in his helmet, Beowulf spoke:
 “Greetings to Hrothgar. I am Hygelac’s kinsman, one of his hall-troop. When I was younger,
 I had great triumphs. Then news of Grendel, hard to ignore, reached me at home: 410 sailors brought stories of the plight you suffer in this legendary hall, how it lies deserted, empty and useless once the evening light hides itself under heaven’s dome.
 So every elder and experienced councilman 415 among my people supported my resolve to come here to you, King Hrothgar, because all knew of my awesome strength.
 They had seen me boltered<sup>5</sup> in the blood of enemies
 when I battled and bound five beasts, 420

4. That is, a warrior in the service of a lord like Hrethel or Hrothgar himself.

5. Clotted, sticky—a Northern Irish term.

raided a troll-nest and in the night-sea slaughtered sea-brutes. I have suffered extremes and avenged the Geats (their enemies brought it upon themselves; I devastated them).
 Now I mean to be a match for Grendel, 425 settle the outcome in single combat.
 And so, my request, O king of Bright-Danes,
 dear prince of the Shieldings, friend of the people and their ring of defense, my one request is that you won't refuse me, who have come this far, 430
 the privilege of purifying Heorot, with my own men to help me, and nobody else.
 I have heard moreover that the monster scorns in his reckless way to use weapons;
 therefore, to heighten Hygelac's fame 435 and gladden his heart, I hereby renounce sword and the shelter of the broad shield, the heavy war-board: hand-to-hand is how it will be, a life-and-death fight with the fiend. Whichever one death fells 440 must deem it a just judgment by God.
 If Grendel wins, it will be a gruesome day;
 he will glut himself on the Geats in the war-hall, swoop without fear on that flower of manhood as on others before. Then my face won't be there 445 to be covered in death: he will carry me away as he goes to ground, gorged and bloodied;
 he will run gloating with my raw corpse and feed on it alone, in a cruel frenzy fouling his moor-nest. No need then 450 to lament for long or lay out my body:
 if the battle takes me, send back this breast-webbing that Weland<sup>6</sup> fashioned and Hrethel gave me, to Lord Hygelac.
 Fate goes ever as fate must." 455
 Hrothgar, the helmet of Shieldings, spoke:
 "Beowulf, my friend, you have traveled here to favor us with help and to fight for us.
 There was a feud one time, begun by your father.
 With his own hands he had killed Heatholaf 460 who was a Wulfing;<sup>7</sup> so war was looming and his people, in fear of it, forced him to leave.
 He came away then over rolling waves to the South-Danes here, the sons of honor.
 I was then in the first flush of kingship, 465 establishing my sway over the rich strongholds of this heroic land. Heorogar,

6. The blacksmith of the Norse gods.

7. The Wulfings are another Germanic nation.

my older brother and the better man,
 also a son of Halfdane's, had died.
 Finally I healed the feud by paying:
 I shipped a treasure-trove to the Wulfings, and Ecgtheow acknowledged me with oaths of allegiance.

470

"It bothers me to have to burden anyone with all the grief that Grendel has caused and the havoc he has wreaked upon us in Heorot, our humiliations. My household-guard are on the wane, fate sweeps them away into Grendel's clutches—but God can easily halt these raids and harrowing attacks!

475

"Time and again, when the goblets passed and seasoned fighters got flushed with beer they would pledge themselves to protect Heorot and wait for Grendel with their whetted swords.
 But when dawn broke and day crept in over each empty, blood-spattered bench, the floor of the mead-hall where they had feasted would be slick with slaughter. And so they died, faithful retainers, and my following dwindled.
 Now take your place at the table, relish
 the triumph of heroes to your heart's content."

480

485

490

[Feast at Heorot]

Then a bench was cleared in that banquet hall
 so the Geats could have room to be together and the party sat, proud in their bearing, strong and stalwart. An attendant stood by with a decorated pitcher, pouring bright helpings of mead. And the minstrel sang, filling Heorot with his head-clearing voice, gladdening that great rally of Geats and Danes.

495

From where he crouched at the king's feet, Unferth, a son of Ecglaf's, spoke contrary words.<sup>8</sup> Beowulf's coming,
 his sea-braving, made him sick with envy:
 he could not brook or abide the fact that anyone else alive under heaven might enjoy greater regard than he did:
 "Are you the Beowulf who took on Breca in a swimming match<sup>9</sup> on the open sea, risking the water just to prove that you could win?
 It was sheer vanity made you venture out

500

505

8. Unferth is Hrothgar's thyle, a kind of licensed spokesman who here engages Beowulf in a traditional "flytting" or verbal combat; see the note to line 1457. Ecglaf appears in the poem only as the father of Unferth.

9. The original Anglo-Saxon describing this contest can be interpreted in such a way that Breca and Beowulf are competing not in swimming but in rowing, which is more plausible.

on the main deep. And no matter who tried, 510 friend or foe, to deflect the pair of you, neither would back down: the sea-test obsessed you.
 You waded in, embracing water, taking its measure, mastering currents, 515 riding on the swell. The ocean swayed, winter went wild in the waves, but you vied for seven nights; and then he outswam you, came ashore the stronger contender.
 He was cast up safe and sound one morning among the Heatho-Reams,<sup>1</sup> then made his way 520 to where he belonged in Bronding<sup>2</sup> country, home again, sure of his ground in strongroom and bawn.<sup>3</sup> So Breca made good his boast upon you and was proved right.
 No matter, therefore, how you may have fared 525
 in every bout and battle until now, this time you'll be worsted; no one has ever outlasted an entire night against Grendel.”

Beowulf, Ecgtheow's son, replied:
 “Well, friend Unferth, you have had your say 530 about Breca and me. But it was mostly beer that was doing the talking. The truth is this:
 when the going was heavy in those high waves,
 I was the strongest swimmer of all.
 We'd been children together and we grew up 535 daring ourselves to outdo each other, boasting and urging each other to risk
 our lives on the sea. And so it turned out.
 Each of us swam holding a sword,
 a naked, hard-proofed blade for protection 540 against the whale-beasts. But Breca could never move out farther or faster from me than I could manage to move from him.
 Shoulder to shoulder, we struggled on for five nights, until the long flow 545 and pitch of the waves, the perishing cold, night falling and winds from the north drove us apart. The deep boiled up and its wallowing sent the sea-brutes wild.
 My armor helped me to hold out; 550 my hard-ringed chain-mail, hand-forged and linked,
 a fine, close-fitting filigree of gold, kept me safe when some ocean creature pulled me to the bottom. Pinioned fast and swathed in its grip, I was granted one 555

1. A people of southern Norway.

2. The Brondings are the nation to which Breca belonged, but nothing is known of their territory.

3. Fortified outwork of a court or castle. The word was used by English planters in Ulster to describe fortified dwellings they erected on lands confiscated from the Irish [translator's note].

final chance: my sword plunged and the ordeal was over. Through my own hands, the fury of battle had finished off the sea-beast.

“Time and again, foul things attacked me, lurking and stalking, but I lashed out, 560 gave as good as I got with my sword.

My flesh was not for feasting on,
there would be no monsters gnawing and gloating over their banquet at the bottom of the sea.

Instead, in the morning, mangled and sleeping 565
the sleep of the sword, they slopped and floated like the ocean’s leavings. From now on sailors would be safe, the deep-sea raids were over for good. Light came from the east, bright guarantee of God, and the waves 570 went quiet; I could see headlands and buffeted cliffs. Often, for undaunted courage, fate spares the man it has not already marked.

However it occurred, my sword had killed nine sea-monsters. Such night dangers 575 and hard ordeals I have never heard of nor of a man more desolate in surging waves.

But worn out as I was, I survived, came through with my life. The ocean lifted and laid me ashore, I landed safe 580 on the coast of Finland.

Now I cannot recall any fight you entered, Unferth, that bears comparison. I don’t boast when I say that neither you nor Breca were ever much celebrated for swordsmanship 585 or for facing danger on the field of battle.

You killed your own kith and kin,
so for all your cleverness and quick tongue,
you will suffer damnation in the depths of hell.<sup>4</sup>

The fact is, Unferth, if you were truly 590 as keen or courageous as you claim to be Grendel would never have got away with such unchecked atrocity, attacks on your king, havoc in Heorot and horrors everywhere.

But he knows he need never be in dread 595 of your blade making a mizzle<sup>5</sup> of his blood or of vengeance arriving ever from this quarter—from the Victory-Shieldings, the shoulderers of the spear.

He knows he can trample down you Danes to his heart’s content, humiliate and murder 600

4. The manuscript is damaged here, and the word “hell” may well be “hall”: “You will suffer condemnation in the hall” is an acceptable translation of the line.

5. That is, drizzle.

without fear of reprisal. But he will find me different.
 I will show him how Geats shape to kill in the heat of battle. Then whoever wants to may go bravely to mead,<sup>6</sup> when the morning light, scarfed in sun-dazzle, shines forth from the south and brings another daybreak to the world.”

605

Then the gray-haired treasure-giver was glad;
 far-famed in battle, the prince of Bright-Danes and keeper of his people counted on Beowulf, on the warrior's steadfastness and his word.
 So the laughter started, the din got louder and the crowd was happy. Wealhtheow came in,
 Hrothgar's queen, observing the courtesies.
 Adorned in her gold, she graciously saluted
 the men in the hall, then handed the cup first to Hrothgar, their homeland's guardian, urging him to drink deep and enjoy it because he was dear to them. And he drank it down like the warlord he was, with festive cheer.
 So the Helming woman went on her rounds, queenly and dignified, decked out in rings, offering the goblet to all ranks,
 treating the household and the assembled troop,
 until it was Beowulf's turn to take it from her hand.
 With measured words she welcomed the Geat and thanked God for granting her wish that a deliverer she could believe in would arrive to ease their afflictions. He accepted the cup, a daunting man, dangerous in action and eager for it always. He addressed Wealhtheow; Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, said:

610

615

620

625

630

“I had a fixed purpose when I put to sea.
 As I sat in the boat with my band of men,
 I meant to perform to the uttermost what your people wanted or perish in the attempt, in the fiend's clutches. And I shall fulfill that purpose, prove myself with a proud deed or meet my death here in the mead-hall.”

635

This formal boast by Beowulf the Geat pleased the lady well and she went to sit by Hrothgar, regal and arrayed with gold.

640

Then it was like old times in the echoing hall, proud talk and the people happy, loud and excited; until soon enough Halfdane's heir had to be away to his night's rest. He realized that the demon was going to descend on the hall, that he had plotted all day, from dawn-light

645

6. An alcoholic drink made by fermenting honey and adding water.

until darkness gathered again over the world and stealthy night-shapes came stealing forth 650 under the cloud-murk. The company stood as the two leaders took leave of each other:
 Hrothgar wished Beowulf health and good luck,
 named him hall-warden and announced as follows:
 “Never, since my hand could hold a shield 655 have I entrusted or given control of the Danes’ hall to anyone but you.
 Ward and guard it, for it is the greatest of houses.
 Be on your mettle now, keep in mind your fame, beware of the enemy. There’s nothing you wish for 660 that won’t be yours if you win through alive.”

[The Fight with Grendel]

Hrothgar departed then with his house-guard.
 The lord of the Shieldings, their shelter in war, left the mead-hall to lie with Wealhtheow, his queen and bedmate. The King of Glory 665 (as people learned) had posted a lookout who was a match for Grendel, a guard against monsters, special protection to the Danish prince.
 And the Geat placed complete trust in his strength of limb and the Lord’s favor. 670
 He began to remove his iron breast-mail, took off the helmet and handed his attendant
 the patterned sword, a smith’s masterpiece, ordering him to keep the equipment guarded.
 And before he bedded down, Beowulf, 675 that prince of goodness, proudly asserted:
 “When it comes to fighting, I count myself as dangerous any day as Grendel.
 So it won’t be a cutting edge I’ll wield to mow him down, easily as I might. 680
 He has no idea of the arts of war, of shield or sword-play, although he does possess a wild strength. No weapons, therefore, for either this night: unarmed he shall face me if face me he dares. And may the Divine Lord 685 in His wisdom grant the glory of victory to whichever side He sees fit.”
 Then down the brave man lay with his bolster under his head and his whole company of sea-rovers at rest beside him. 690
 None of them expected he would ever see his homeland again or get back to his native place and the people who reared him.
 They knew too well the way it was before,
 how often the Danes had fallen prey 695 to death in the mead-hall. But the Lord was weaving a victory on His war-loom for the Weather-Geats.

 Through the strength of one they all prevailed;
 they would crush their enemy and come through in triumph and gladness. The truth is clear: Almighty God rules over mankind and always has.

700

Then out of the night
 came the shadow-stalker, stealthy and swift.
 The hall-guards were slack, asleep at their posts,
 all except one; it was widely understood that as long as God disallowed it,
 the fiend could not bear them to his shadow-bourne.
 One man, however, was in fighting mood,
 awake and on edge, spoiling for action.

705

In off the moors, down through the mist-bands
 God-cursed Grendel came greedily loping.
 The bane of the race of men roamed forth, hunting for a prey in the high hall.

710

Under the cloud-murk he moved toward it until it shone above him, a sheer keep of fortified gold. Nor was that the first time he had scouted the grounds of Hrothgar's dwelling—although never in his life, before or since,
 did he find harder fortune or hall-defenders.

715

Spurned and joyless, he journeyed on ahead and arrived at the bawn. The iron-braced door turned on its hinge when his hands touched it.

720

Then his rage boiled over, he ripped open the mouth of the building, maddening for blood, pacing the length of the patterned floor with his loathsome tread, while a baleful light, flame more than light, flared from his eyes.

725

He saw many men in the mansion, sleeping, a ranked company of kinsmen and warriors quartered together. And his glee was demonic, picturing the mayhem: before morning
 he would rip life from limb and devour them, feed on their flesh; but his fate that night was due to change, his days of ravening had come to an end.

730

Mighty and canny, Hygelac's kinsman was keenly watching for the first move the monster would make.

735

Nor did the creature keep him waiting but struck suddenly and started in;
 he grabbed and mauled a man on his bench, bit into his bone-lappings,<sup>7</sup> bolted down his blood and gorged on him in lumps, leaving the body

740

7. That is, joints.

utterly lifeless, eaten up hand and foot. Venturing closer, his talon was raised to attack Beowulf 745 where he lay on the bed, he was bearing in with open claw when the alert hero's comeback and armlock forestalled him utterly.
 The captain of evil discovered himself in a handgrip harder than anything 750 he had ever encountered in any man on the face of the earth. Every bone in his body quailed and recoiled, but he could not escape.
 He was desperate to flee to his den and hide with the devil's litter, for in all his days 755 he had never been clamped or cornered like this.
 Then Hygelac's trusty retainer recalled his bedtime speech, sprang to his feet and got a firm hold. Fingers were bursting, the monster back-tracking, the man overpowering. 760
 The dread of the land was desperate to escape, to take a roundabout road and flee to his lair in the fens. The latching power in his fingers weakened; it was the worst trip
 the terror-monger had taken to Heorot. 765
 And now the timbers trembled and sang, a hall-session<sup>8</sup> that harrowed every Dane inside the stockade: stumbling in fury,
 the two contenders crashed through the building.
 The hall clattered and hammered, but somehow 770 survived the onslaught and kept standing:
 it was handsomely structured, a sturdy frame braced with the best of blacksmith's work inside and out. The story goes that as the pair struggled, mead-benches were smashed 775 and sprung off the floor, gold fittings and all.
 Before then, no Shielding elder would believe there was any power or person upon earth capable of wrecking their horn-rigged hall unless the burning embrace of a fire 780 engulf it in flame. Then an extraordinary wail arose, and bewildering fear came over the Danes. Everyone felt it who heard that cry as it echoed off the wall, a God-cursed scream and strain of catastrophe, 785
 the howl of the loser, the lament of the hell-serf keening his wound. He was overwhelmed, manacled tight by the man who of all men

8. In Hiberno-English the word "session" (seissíún in Irish) can mean a gathering where musicians and singers perform for their own enjoyment [translator's note]. In other words, the poet is making a laconic joke, since the main function of the hall is celebration and singing.

was foremost and strongest in the days of this life.

But the earl-troop's leader was not inclined to allow his caller to depart alive: 790

he did not consider that life of much account to anyone anywhere. Time and again, Beowulf's warriors worked to defend their lord's life, laying about them 795

as best they could, with their ancestral blades.
Stalwart in action, they kept striking out on every side, seeking to cut straight to the soul. When they joined the struggle there was something they could not have known at the time, that no blade on earth, no blacksmith's art 800

could ever damage their demon opponent.
He had conjured the harm from the cutting edge of every weapon.<sup>9</sup> But his going away out of this world and the days of his life 805 would be agony to him, and his alien spirit would travel far into fiends' keeping.

Then he who had harrowed the hearts of men with pain and affliction in former times and had given offense also to God found that his bodily powers failed him. 810

Hygelac's kinsman kept him helplessly locked in a handgrip. As long as either lived, he was hateful to the other. The monster's whole body was in pain; a tremendous wound 815 appeared on his shoulder. Sinews split and the bone-lappings burst. Beowulf was granted the glory of winning; Grendel was driven under the fen-banks, fatally hurt, to his desolate lair. His days were numbered,

the end of his life was coming over him, 820

he knew it for certain; and one bloody clash had fulfilled the dearest wishes of the Danes.

The man who had lately landed among them, proud and sure, had purged the hall, 825 kept it from harm; he was happy with his nightwork and the courage he had shown. The Geat captain had boldly fulfilled his boast to the Danes:

he had healed and relieved a huge distress, unremitting humiliations, 830

the hard fate they'd been forced to undergo, no small affliction. Clear proof of this could be seen in the hand the hero displayed high up near the roof: the whole of Grendel's 835

9. Grendel is magically protected from weapons.

[Celebration at Heorot]

Then morning came and many a warrior gathered, as I've heard, around the gift-hall, clan-chiefs flocking from far and near down wide-ranging roads, wondering greatly at the monster's footprints. His fatal departure 840 was regretted by no one who witnessed his trail, the ignominious marks of his flight where he'd skulked away, exhausted in spirit and beaten in battle, bloodying the path, hauling his doom to the demons' mere.<sup>1</sup> 845
The bloodshot water wallowed and surged, there were loathsome upthrows and overturnings of waves and gore and wound-slurry.
With his death upon him, he had dived deep into his marsh-den, drowned out his life 850 and his heathen soul: hell claimed him there.

Then away they rode, the old retainers with many a young man following after, a troop on horseback, in high spirits on their bay steeds. Beowulf's doings 855 were praised over and over again.
Nowhere, they said, north or south between the two seas or under the tall sky on the broad earth was there anyone better to raise a shield or to rule a kingdom. 860
Yet there was no laying of blame on their lord, the noble Hrothgar; he was a good king.

At times the war-band broke into a gallop, letting their chestnut horses race wherever they found the going good 865 on those well-known tracks. Meanwhile, a thane of the king's household, a carrier of tales, a traditional singer deeply schooled in the lore of the past, linked a new theme to a strict meter.<sup>2</sup> The man started 870 to recite with skill, rehearsing Beowulf's triumphs and feats in well-fashioned lines, entwining his words.

He told what he'd heard repeated in songs about Sigemund's exploits,<sup>3</sup> all of those many feats and marvels, 875
the struggles and wanderings of Waels's son, things unknown to anyone

1. A lake or pool.

2. The singer or scop composes extemporaneously in alliterative verse.

3. According to Norse legend, Sigemund, the son of Waels (or Volsung, as he is known in Norse), slept with his sister Sigurth, who bore a son named Fitela; Fitela was thus also Sigemund's nephew, as he is described here. The singer here contrasts Sigemund's bravery in killing a dragon with the defeat of the Danish king Heremod, who could not protect his people. For more on Heremod as a bad king, see lines 1709–22.

except to Fitela, feuds and foul doings confided by uncle to nephew when he felt the urge to speak of them: always they had been partners in the fight, friends in need. 880
 They killed giants, their conquering swords had brought them down.

After his death

Sigemund's glory grew and grew because of his courage when he killed the dragon, the guardian of the hoard. Under gray stone he had dared to enter all by himself to face the worst without Fitela. 885

*But it came to pass that his sword plunged right through those radiant scales and drove into the wall. The dragon died of it.
 His daring had given him total possession of the treasure-hoard, his to dispose of however he liked. He loaded a boat:* 890

Wael's son weighted her hold with dazzling spoils. The hot dragon melted. 895

*Sigemund's name was known everywhere.
 He was utterly valiant and venturesome, a fence round his fighters and flourished therefore after King Heremod's prowess declined and his campaigns slowed down. The king was betrayed, ambushed in Jutland, overpowered and done away with. The waves of his grief had beaten him down, made him a burden, a source of anxiety to his own nobles:* 905

*that expedition was often condemned in those earlier times by experienced men, men who relied on his lordship for redress, who presumed that the part of a prince was to thrive on his father's throne and defend the nation,
 the Shielding land where they lived and belonged, its holdings and strongholds. Such was Beowulf in the affection of his friends and of everyone alive.
 But evil entered into Heremod.* 910

Meanwhile, the Danes kept racing their mounts down sandy lanes. The light of day broke and kept brightening. Bands of retainers galloped in excitement to the gabled hall to see the marvel; and the king himself, guardian of the ring-hoard, goodness in person, walked in majesty from the women's quarters with a numerous train, attended by his queen and her crowd of maidens, across to the mead-hall. 915

When Hrothgar arrived at the hall, he spoke, standing on the steps, under the steep eaves, gazing toward the roofwork and Grendel's talon: 920
"First and foremost, let the Almighty Father 925 be thanked for this sight. I suffered a long harrowing by Grendel. But the Heavenly Shepherd can work His wonders always and everywhere. 930 Not long since, it seemed I would never be granted the slightest solace or relief from any of my burdens: the best of houses glittered and reeked and ran with blood.

 This one worry outweighed all others— 935 a constant distress to counselors entrusted with defending the people's forts from assault by monsters and demons. But now a man, with the Lord's assistance, has accomplished something none of us could manage before now 940 for all our efforts. Whoever she was who brought forth this flower of manhood, if she is still alive, that woman can say that in her labor the Lord of Ages bestowed a grace on her. So now, Beowulf, 945
 I adopt you in my heart as a dear son.
 Nourish and maintain this new connection, you noblest of men; there'll be nothing you'll want for,
 no worldly goods that won't be yours.
 I have often honored smaller achievements, 950 recognized warriors not nearly as worthy, lavished rewards on the less deserving.
 But you have made yourself immortal by your glorious action. May the God of Ages continue to keep and requite you well." 955
 Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
 "We have gone through with a glorious endeavor and been much favored in this fight we dared against the unknown. Nevertheless, if you could have seen the monster himself 960
 where he lay beaten, I would have been better pleased.
 My plan was to pounce, pin him down in a tight grip and grapple him to death—have him panting for life, powerless and clasped in my bare hands, his body in thrall. 965
 But I couldn't stop him from slipping my hold.
 The Lord allowed it, my lock on him wasn't strong enough; he struggled fiercely and broke and ran. Yet he bought his freedom at a high price, for he left his hand 970 and arm and shoulder to show he had been here, a cold comfort for having come among us.
 And now he won't be long for this world.
 He has done his worst but the wound will end him.
 He is hasped and hooped and hirpling<sup>4</sup> with pain, 975

4. That is, limping.

limping and looped in it. Like a man outlawed for wickedness, he must await the mighty judgment of God in majesty.”

There was less tampering and big talk then from Unferth the boaster, less of his blather 980 as the hall-thanes eyed the awful proof of the hero's prowess, the splayed hand up under the eaves. Every nail, claw-scale and spur, every spike and welt on the hand of that heathen brute 985 was like barbed steel. Everybody said there was no honed iron hard enough to pierce him through, no time-proofed blade that could cut his brutal, blood-caked claw.

Then the order was given for all hands 990 to help to refurbish Heorot immediately:
men and women thronging the wine-hall, getting it ready. Gold thread shone in the wall-hangings, woven scenes that attracted and held the eye's attention. 995
But iron-braced as the inside of it had been,
that bright room lay in ruins now.
The very doors had been dragged from their hinges.
Only the roof remained unscathed by the time the guilt-fouled fiend turned tail 1000 in despair of his life. But death is not easily escaped from by anyone:
all of us with souls, earth-dwellers and children of men, must make our way to a destination already ordained 1005 where the body, after the banqueting, sleeps on its deathbed.

Then the due time arrived for Halfdane's son to proceed to the hall.
The king himself would sit down to feast.
No group ever gathered in greater numbers 1010 or better order around their ring-giver.
The benches filled with famous men who fell to with relish; round upon round of mead was passed; those powerful kinsmen, Hrothgar and Hrothulf, were in high spirits 1015 in the raftered hall. Inside Heorot there was nothing but friendship. The Shielding nation was not yet familiar with feud and betrayal.<sup>5</sup>

Then Halfdane's son presented Beowulf

5. The poet here refers to the later history of the Danes, when after Hrothgar's death his nephew Hrothulf drove his son Hrethric from the throne. For Wealhtheow's fear that this betrayal will indeed come to pass, see lines 1168–90.

with a gold standard as a victory gift, 1020 an embroidered banner; also breast-mail and a helmet; and a sword carried high,
 that was both precious object and token of honor.
 So Beowulf drank his drink, at ease;
 it was hardly a shame to be showered with such gifts 1025 in front of the hall-troops. There haven't been many moments, I am sure, when men exchanged four such treasures at so friendly a sitting.
 An embossed ridge, a band lapped with wire arched over the helmet: head-protection 1030 to keep the keen-ground cutting edge from damaging it when danger threatened and the man was battling behind his shield.
 Next the king ordered eight horses with gold bridles to be brought through the yard 1035 into the hall. The harness of one included a saddle of sumptuous design, the battle-seat where the son of Halfdane rode when he wished to join the sword-play:
 wherever the killing and carnage were the worst, 1040
 he would be to the fore, fighting hard.
 Then the Danish prince, descendant of Ing,<sup>6</sup> handed over both the arms and the horses, urging Beowulf to use them well.
 And so their leader, the lord and guard 1045 of coffer and strongroom, with customary grace bestowed upon Beowulf both sets of gifts.
 A fair witness can see how well each one behaved.
 The chieftain went on to reward the others:
 each man on the bench who had sailed with Beowulf 1050 and risked the voyage received a bounty, some treasured possession. And compensation,
 a price in gold, was settled for the Geat Grendel had cruelly killed earlier—as he would have killed more, had not mindful God 1055 and one man's daring prevented that doom.
 Past and present, God's will prevails.
 Hence, understanding is always best and a prudent mind. Whoever remains for long here in this earthly life 1060 will enjoy and endure more than enough.
 They sang then and played to please the hero, words and music for their warrior prince,
 harp tunes and tales of adventure:
 there were high times on the hall benches, 1065 and the king's poet performed his part with the saga of Finn and his sons, unfolding

6. A Germanic deity and the protector of the Danes.

*should honor the Danes, bestow with an even hand to Hengest and Hengest's men
the wrought-gold rings, bounty to match
the measure he gave his own Frisians—to keep morale
in the beer-hall high.
Both sides then sealed their agreement.
With oaths to Hengest
Finn swore openly, solemnly, that the battle survivors would be guaranteed honor and status.
No infringement
by word or deed,
no provocation
would be permitted.
Their own ring-giver
after all
was dead and gone,
they were leaderless,
in forced allegiance to his murderer.
So if any Frisian stirred up bad blood with insinuations or taunts about this,
the blade of the sword would arbitrate it.
A funeral pyre
was then prepared, effulgent gold
brought out from the hoard.
The pride and prince of the Shieldings lay awaiting the flame.
Everywhere
there were blood-plastered coats of mail.
The pyre was heaped with boar-shaped helmets forged in gold,
with the gashed corpses of wellborn Danes—
many had fallen.
Then Hildeburh*

son's body                      ordered her own                      1115 be burnt with Hnaef's
 the flesh on his bones                      to sputter and blaze beside his uncle's.                      The woman wailed and sang keens,                      the warrior went up.<sup>8</sup> Carcass flame                      swirled and fumed,                      1120
 they stood round the burial                      mound and howled as heads melted,                      crusted gashes spattered and ran                      bloody matter.
 The glutton element                      flamed and consumed the dead of both sides.                      Their great days were gone.                      1125 Warriors scattered                      to homes and forts all over Friesland,                      fewer now, feeling loss of friends.                      Hengest stayed, lived out that whole                      resentful, blood-sullen winter with Finn,                      homesick and helpless.                      1130
 No ring-whorled prow                      could up then and away on the sea.                      Wind and water raged with storms,                      wave and shingle were shackled in ice                      until another year appeared in the yard                      as it does to this day,                      1135
 the seasons constant,                      the wonder of light coming over us.                      Then winter was gone, earth's lap grew lovely,                      longing woke in the cooped-up exile

8. The warrior (Hildeburh's son) either goes up on the pyre or goes up in smoke. Keens: an Irish word for funeral laments.

admired by all for his mind and courage 1165 although under a cloud for killing his brothers, reclined near the king.

The queen spoke:
 “Enjoy this drink, my most generous lord;
 raise up your goblet, entertain the Geats duly and gently, discourse with them, 1170 be open-handed, happy and fond.

Relish their company, but recollect as well
 all of the boons that have been bestowed on you.

The bright court of Heorot has been cleansed and now the word is that you want to adopt 1175 this warrior as a son. So, while you may, bask in your fortune, and then bequeath kingdom and nation to your kith and kin, before your decease. I am certain of Hrothulf.

He is noble and will use the young ones well. 1180

He will not let you down. Should you die before him, he will treat our children truly and fairly.

He will honor, I am sure, our two sons, repay them in kind, when he recollects
 all the good things we gave him once, 1185
 the favor and respect he found in his childhood.”

She turned then to the bench where her boys sat,
 Hrethric and Hrothmund, with other nobles’ sons,
 all the youth together; and that good man,
 Beowulf the Geat, sat between the brothers. 1190

The cup was carried to him, kind words spoken in welcome and a wealth of wrought gold graciously bestowed: two arm bangles, a mail-shirt and rings, and the most resplendent torque of gold I ever heard tell of 1195 anywhere on earth or under heaven.

There was no hoard like it since Hama snatched the Brosings’ neck-chain and bore it away with its gems and settings to his shining fort, away from Eormenric’s wiles and hatred, 1200 and thereby ensured his eternal reward.<sup>3</sup>

Hygelac the Geat, grandson of Swerting, wore this neck-ring on his last raid;<sup>4</sup> at bay under his banner, he defended the booty, treasure he had won. Fate swept him away 1205 because of his proud need to provoke a feud with the Frisians. He fell beneath his shield, in the same gem-crust, kingly gear

3. The legend alluded to here seems to be that Hama stole the golden necklace of the Brosings from Eormenric (a historical figure, the king of the Ostrogoths, who died ca. 375), and then gave it to the goddess Freya.

4. The poet here refers to the death of Hygelac while raiding the Frisian territory of the Franks. This raid and Hygelac’s death are recorded by the historian Gregory of Tours (d. 594) as having taken place about 520.

he had worn when he crossed the frothing wave-vat.
 So the dead king fell into Frankish hands. 1210
 They took his breast-mail, also his neck-torque, and punier warriors plundered the slain when the carnage ended; Geat corpses covered the field.

Applause filled the hall.
 Then Wealhtheow pronounced in the presence of the company: 1215
 "Take delight in this torque, dear Beowulf, wear it for luck and wear also this mail from our people's armory: may you prosper in them!
 Be acclaimed for strength, for kindly guidance to these two boys, and your bounty will be sure. 1220
 You have won renown: you are known to all men far and near, now and forever.
 Your sway is wide as the wind's home,
 as the sea around cliffs. And so, my prince,
 I wish you a lifetime's luck and blessings 1225 to enjoy this treasure. Treat my sons with tender care, be strong and kind.
 Here each comrade is true to the other,
 loyal to lord, loving in spirit.

The thanes have one purpose, the people are ready: 1230 having drunk and pledged, the ranks do as I bid."

She moved then to her place. Men were drinking wine at that rare feast; how could they know fate, the grim shape of things to come,
 the threat looming over many thanes 1235 as night approached and King Hrothgar prepared to retire to his quarters? Retainers in great numbers were posted on guard as so often in the past.
 Benches were pushed back, bedding gear and bolsters spread across the floor, and one man 1240 lay down to his rest, already marked for death.
 At their heads they placed their polished timber battle-shields; and on the bench above them, each man's kit was kept to hand:
 a towering war-helmet, webbed mail-shirt 1245 and great-shafted spear. It was their habit always and everywhere to be ready for action, at home or in the camp, in whatever case and at whatever time the need arose to rally round their lord. They were a right people. 1250

[Another Attack]

They went to sleep. And one paid dearly for his night's ease, as had happened to them often, ever since Grendel occupied the gold-hall, committing evil until the end came,
 death after his crimes. Then it became clear, 1255 obvious to everyone once the fight was over,

 that an avenger lurked and was still alive,
 grimly biding time. Grendel's mother, monstrous hell-bride, brooded on her wrongs.
 She had been forced down into fearful waters, 1260
 the cold depths, after Cain had killed his father's son, felled his own brother with a sword. Branded an outlaw, marked by having murdered, he moved into the wilds, shunned company and joy. And from Cain there sprang 1265 misbegotten spirits, among them Grendel, the banished and accursed, due to come to grips with that watcher in Heorot waiting to do battle.
 The monster wrenched and wrestled with him, but Beowulf was mindful of his mighty strength, 1270
 the wondrous gifts God had showered on him:
 he relied for help on the Lord of All,
 on His care and favor. So he overcame the foe, brought down the hell-brute. Broken and bowed, outcast from all sweetness, the enemy of mankind 1275 made for his death-den. But now his mother had sallied forth on a savage journey, grief-racked and ravenous, desperate for revenge.

She came to Heorot. There, inside the hall, Danes lay asleep, earls who would soon endure 1280
 a great reversal, once Grendel's mother attacked and entered. Her onslaught was less only by as much as an amazon warrior's strength is less than an armed man's when the hefted sword, its hammered edge 1285 and gleaming blade slathered in blood, razes the sturdy boar-ridge off a helmet.
 Then in the hall, hard-honed swords were grabbed from the bench, many a broad shield lifted and braced; there was little thought of helmets 1290 or woven mail when they woke in terror.

The hell-dam was in panic, desperate to get out,
 in mortal terror the moment she was found.
 She had pounced and taken one of the retainers in a tight hold, then headed for the fen. 1295
 To Hrothgar, this man was the most beloved of the friends he trusted between the two seas.
 She had done away with a great warrior, ambushed him at rest.

Beowulf was elsewhere.
 Earlier, after the award of the treasure, 1300
 the Geat had been given another lodging.

There was uproar in Heorot. She had snatched their trophy, Grendel's bloodied hand. It was a fresh blow to the afflicted bawn. The bargain was hard,

both parties having to pay 1305 with the lives of friends. And the old lord, the gray-haired warrior, was heartsore and weary when he heard the news: his highest-placed adviser, his dearest companion, was dead and gone.

Beowulf was quickly brought to the chamber: 1310
 the winner of fights, the arch-warrior, came first-footing in with his fellow troops to where the king in his wisdom waited, still wondering whether Almighty God would ever turn the tide of his misfortunes. 1315
 So Beowulf entered with his band in attendance and the wooden floorboards banged and rang as he advanced, hurrying to address the prince of the Ingwins,<sup>5</sup> asking if he'd rested since the urgent summons had come as a surprise. 1320

Then Hrothgar, the Shieldings' helmet, spoke:
 "Rest? What is rest? Sorrow has returned.
 Alas for the Danes! Aeschere is dead.
 He was Yrmenlaf's elder brother and a soul-mate to me, a true mentor, 1325 my right-hand man when the ranks clashed and our boar-crests had to take a battering in the line of action. Aeschere was everything the world admires in a wise man and a friend.
 Then this roaming killer came in a fury 1330 and slaughtered him in Heorot. Where she is hiding, glutting on the corpse and glorying in her escape,
 I cannot tell; she has taken up the feud
 because of last night, when you killed Grendel, wrestled and racked him in ruinous combat 1335
 since for too long he had terrorized us with his depredations. He died in battle, paid with his life; and now this powerful other one arrives, this force for evil driven to avenge her kinsman's death. 1340
 Or so it seems to thanes in their grief, in the anguish everythane endures at the loss of a ring-giver, now that the hand that bestowed so richly has been stilled in death.

"I have heard it said by my people in hall, 1345 counselors who live in the upland country, that they have seen two such creatures prowling the moors, huge marauders from some other world. One of these things, as far as anyone ever can discern, 1350 looks like a woman; the other, warped in the shape of a man, moves beyond the pale

5. The friends of the god Ing—that is, the Danes. See p. 865, n. 6.

bigger than any man, an unnatural birth called Grendel by the country people in former days. They are fatherless creatures, 1355 and their whole ancestry is hidden in a past of demons and ghosts.<sup>6</sup> They dwell apart among wolves on the hills, on windswept crags and treacherous keshes, where cold streams pour down the mountain and disappear 1360 under mist and moorland.

A few miles from here

a frost-stiffened wood waits and keeps watch above a mere; the overhanging bank is a maze of tree-roots mirrored in its surface.
 At night there, something uncanny happens: 1365 the water burns. And the mere bottom has never been sounded by the sons of men.
 On its bank, the heather-stepper halts:
 the hart in flight from pursuing hounds will turn to face them with firm-set horns 1370 and die in the wood rather than dive beneath its surface. That is no good place.
 When wind blows up and stormy weather makes clouds scud and the skies weep, out of its depths a dirty surge 1375 is pitched toward the heavens. Now help depends again on you and on you alone.
 The gap of danger where the demon waits is still unknown to you. Seek it if you dare.
 I will compensate you for settling the feud 1380
 as I did the last time with lavish wealth, coffers of coiled gold, if you come back.”

[Beowulf Fights Grendel's Mother]

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
 “Wise sir, do not grieve. It is always better to avenge dear ones than to indulge in mourning. 1385
 For every one of us, living in this world means waiting for our end. Let whoever can win glory before death. When a warrior is gone, that will be his best and only bulwark.
 So arise, my lord, and let us immediately 1390 set forth on the trail of this troll-dam.
 I guarantee you: she will not get away,
 not to dens under ground nor upland groves nor the ocean floor. She'll have nowhere to flee to.
 Endure your troubles today. Bear up 1395 and be the man I expect you to be.”

6. Note that Hrothgar doesn't know of the biblical genealogy of Grendel and his mother that the poet has given us in lines 102–14.

With that the old lord sprang to his feet and praised God for Beowulf's pledge.
 Then a bit and halter were brought for his horse with the plaited mane. The wise king mounted 1400 the royal saddle and rode out in style with a force of shield-bearers. The forest paths were marked all over with the monster's tracks, her trail on the ground wherever she had gone across the dark moors, dragging away 1405 the body of that thane, Hrothgar's best counselor and overseer of the country.
 So the noble prince proceeded undismayed up fells and screes, along narrow footpaths and ways where they were forced into single file, ledges on cliffs above lairs of water-monsters. 1410
 He went in front with a few men, good judges of the lie of the land,
 and suddenly discovered the dismal wood, mountain trees growing out at an angle 1415 above gray stones: the bloodshot water surged underneath. It was a sore blow to all of the Danes, friends of the Shieldings, a hurt to each and every one of that noble company when they came upon 1420
 Aeschere's head at the foot of the cliff.

Everybody gazed as the hot gore kept wallowing up and an urgent war-horn repeated its notes: the whole party sat down to watch. The water was infested 1425 with all kinds of reptiles. There were writhing sea-dragons and monsters slouching on slopes by the cliff, serpents and wild things such as those that often surface at dawn to roam the sail-road and doom the voyage. Down they plunged, 1430 lashing in anger at the loud call of the battle-bugle. An arrow from the bow of the Geat chief got one of them as he surged to the surface: the seasoned shaft stuck deep in his flank and his freedom in the water 1435 got less and less. It was his last swim.
 He was swiftly overwhelmed in the shallows, prodded by barbed boar-spears, cornered, beaten, pulled up on the bank,
 a strange lake-birth, a loathsome catch 1440 men gazed at in awe.

Beowulf got ready,
 donned his war-gear, indifferent to death;
 his mighty, hand-forged, fine-webbed mail would soon meet with the menace underwater.
 It would keep the bone-cage of his body safe: 1445

no enemy's clasp could crush him in it,
 no vicious armlock choke his life out.
 To guard his head he had a glittering helmet that was due to be muddied on the mere bottom and blurred in the upswirl. It was of beaten gold, 1450 princely headgear hooped and hasped
 by a weapon-smith who had worked wonders in days gone by and adorned it with boar-shapes;
 since then it had resisted every sword.
 And another item lent by Unferth 1455 at that moment of need was of no small importance:
 the brehon<sup>7</sup> handed him a hilted weapon,
 a rare and ancient sword named Hrunting.
 The iron blade with its ill-boding patterns had been tempered in blood. It had never failed 1460 the hand of anyone who hefted it in battle, anyone who had fought and faced the worst in the gap of danger. This was not the first time it had been called to perform heroic feats.
 When he lent that blade to the better swordsman, 1465
 Unferth, the strong-built son of Ecglaf, could hardly have remembered the ranting speech he had made in his cups. He was not man enough to face the turmoil of a fight under water and the risk to his life. So there he lost 1470 fame and repute. It was different for the other rigged out in his gear, ready to do battle.
 Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
 "Wisest of kings, now that I have come to the point of action, I ask you to recall 1475 what we said earlier: that you, son of Halfdane and gold-friend to retainers, that you, if I should fall and suffer death while serving your cause, would act like a father to me afterward.
 If this combat kills me, take care 1480 of my young company, my comrades in arms.
 And be sure also, my beloved Hrothgar,
 to send Hygelac the treasures I received.
 Let the lord of the Geats gaze on that gold,
 let Hrethel's son take note of it and see 1485 that I found a ring-giver of rare magnificence and enjoyed the good of his generosity.
 And Unferth is to have what I inherited:
 to that far-famed man I bequeath my own sharp-honed, wave-sheened wonder-blade. 1490
 With Hrunting I shall gain glory or die."
 After these words, the prince of the Weather-Geats was impatient to be away and plunged suddenly:

7. One of an ancient class of lawyers in Ireland [translator's note]. The word is used to translate the Anglo-Saxon thyle.

without more ado, he dived into the heaving depths of the lake. It was the best part of a day before he could see the solid bottom. 1495

Quickly the one who haunted those waters, who had scavenged and gone her gluttonous rounds for a hundred seasons, sensed a human observing her outlandish lair from above. 1500
So she lunged and clutched and managed to catch him in her brutal grip; but his body, for all that, remained unscathed: the mesh of the chain-mail saved him on the outside. Her savage talons failed to rip the web of his war-shirt. 1505

Then once she touched bottom, that wolfish swimmer carried the ring-mailed prince to her court so that for all his courage he could never use the weapons he carried; and a bewildering horde came at him from the depths, droves of sea-beasts 1510 who attacked with tusks and tore at his chain-mail in a ghastly onslaught. The gallant man could see he had entered some hellish turn-hole and yet the water there did not work against him because the hall-roofing held off 1515
the force of the current; then he saw firelight, a gleam and flare-up, a glimmer of brightness.

The hero observed that swamp-thing from hell, the tarn-hag<sup>8</sup> in all her terrible strength, then heaved his war-sword and swung his arm: 1520
the decorated blade came down ringing and singing on her head. But he soon found his battle-torch extinguished; the shining blade refused to bite. It spared her and failed the man in his need. It had gone through many 1525 a hand-to-hand fight, had hewed the armor and helmets of the doomed, but here at last the fabulous powers of that heirloom failed.

Hygelac's kinsman kept thinking about his name and fame: he never lost heart. 1530
Then, in a fury, he flung his sword away.
The keen, inlaid, worm-loop-patterned steel was hurled to the ground: he would have to rely on the might of his arm. So must a man do who intends to gain enduring glory 1535 in a combat. Life doesn't cost him a thought.
Then the prince of War-Geats, warming to this fight with Grendel's mother, gripped her shoulder and laid about him in a battle frenzy:
he pitched his killer opponent to the floor 1540
but she rose quickly and retaliated, grappled him tightly in her grim embrace.

8. A "tarn" is a small lake.

The sure-footed fighter felt daunted,
 the strongest of warriors stumbled and fell.
 So she pounced upon him and pulled out a broad, whetted knife: now she would avenge her only child. But the mesh of chain-mail on Beowulf's shoulder shielded his life, turned the edge and tip of the blade.

The son of Ecgtheow would have surely perished and the Geats lost their warrior under the wide earth had the strong links and locks of his war-gear not helped to save him: holy God decided the victory. It was easy for the Lord, the Ruler of Heaven, to redress the balance
 once Beowulf got back up on his feet.

Then he saw a blade that boded well,
 a sword in her armory, an ancient heirloom from the days of the giants, an ideal weapon, one that any warrior would envy,
 but so huge and heavy of itself
 only Beowulf could wield it in a battle.
 So the Shieldings' hero hard-pressed and enraged, took a firm hold of the hilt and swung the blade in an arc, a resolute blow that bit deep into her neck-bone and severed it entirely, toppling the doomed house of her flesh; she fell to the floor.
 The sword dripped blood, the swordsman was elated.

A light appeared and the place brightened the way the sky does when heaven's candle is shining clearly. He inspected the vault:
 with sword held high, its hilt raised to guard and threaten, Hygelac's thane scouted by the wall in Grendel's wake.
 Now the weapon was to prove its worth.
 The warrior determined to take revenge for every gross act Grendel had committed—and not only for that one occasion when he'd come to slaughter the sleeping troops, fifteen of Hrothgar's house-guards surprised on their benches and ruthlessly devoured, and as many again carried away,
 a brutal plunder. Beowulf in his fury now settled that score: he saw the monster in his resting place, war-weary and wrecked, a lifeless corpse, a casualty of the battle in Heorot. The body gaped at the stroke dealt to it after death:
 Beowulf cut the corpse's head off.

Immediately the counselors keeping a lookout with Hrothgar, watching the lake water, saw a heave-up and surge of waves and blood in the backwash. They bowed gray heads, spoke in their sage, experienced way 1595 about the good warrior, how they never again expected to see that prince returning in triumph to their king. It was clear to many that the wolf of the deep had destroyed him forever.

The ninth hour of the day arrived. 1600
The brave Shieldings abandoned the cliff-top and the king went home; but sick at heart, staring at the mere, the strangers held on.
They wished, without hope, to behold their lord,
Beowulf himself.

Meanwhile, the sword 1605 began to wilt into gory icicles to slather and thaw. It was a wonderful thing, the way it all melted as ice melts
when the Father eases the fetters off the frost and unravels the water-ropes, He who wields power 1610 over time and tide: He is the true Lord.

The Geat captain saw treasure in abundance but carried no spoils from those quarters except for the head and the inlaid hilt embossed with jewels; its blade had melted 1615 and the scrollwork on it burned, so scalding was the blood of the poisonous fiend who had perished there.
Then away he swam, the one who had survived the fall of his enemies, flailing to the surface.
The wide water, the waves and pools, 1620 were no longer infested once the wandering fiend let go of her life and this unreliable world.

The seafarers' leader made for land, resolutely swimming, delighted with his prize,
the mighty load he was lugging to the surface. 1625
His thanes advanced in a troop to meet him, thanking God and taking great delight in seeing their prince back safe and sound.
Quickly the hero's helmet and mail-shirt were loosed and unlaced. The lake settled, 1630 clouds darkened above the bloodshot depths.

With high hearts they headed away along footpaths and trails through the fields, roads that they knew, each of them wrestling with the head they were carrying from the lakeside cliff, 1635 men kingly in their courage and capable of difficult work. It was a task for four to hoist Grendel's head on a spear and bear it under strain to the bright hall.
But soon enough they neared the place, 1640 fourteen Geats in fine fettle, striding across the outlying ground in a delighted throng around their leader.

In he came then, the thanes' commander, the arch-warrior, to address Hrothgar: 1645 his courage was proven, his glory was secure.
 Grendel's head was hauled by the hair, dragged across the floor where the people were drinking,
 a horror for both queen and company to behold.
 They stared in awe. It was an astonishing sight. 1650

[Another Celebration at Heorot]

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
 "So, son of Halfdane, prince of the Shieldings,
 we are glad to bring this booty from the lake.
 It is a token of triumph and we tender it to you.
 I barely survived the battle under water. 1655
 It was hard-fought, a desperate affair that could have gone badly; if God had not helped me,
 the outcome would have been quick and fatal.
 Although Hrunting is hard-edged,
 I could never bring it to bear in battle. 1660
 But the Lord of Men allowed me to behold—for He often helps the unbefriended—an ancient sword shining on the wall, a weapon made for giants, there for the wielding.
 Then my moment came in the combat and I struck 1665 the dwellers in that den. Next thing the damascened<sup>9</sup> sword blade melted; it bloated and it burned in their rushing blood. I have wrested the hilt from the enemies' hand, avenged the evil done to the Danes; it is what was due. 1670
 And this I pledge, O prince of the Shieldings:
 you can sleep secure with your company of troops in Heorot Hall. Never need you fear for a singlethane of your sept<sup>1</sup> or nation, young warriors or old, that laying waste of life 1675 that you and your people endured of yore."

Then the gold hilt was handed over to the old lord, a relic from long ago for the venerable ruler. That rare smithwork was passed on to the prince of the Danes 1680 when those devils perished; once death removed that murdering, guilt-steeped, God-cursed fiend, eliminating his unholy life and his mother's as well, it was willed to that king who of all the lavish gift-lords of the north 1685 was the best regarded between the two seas.

Hrothgar spoke; he examined the hilt, that relic of old times. It was engraved all over

9. Ornamented with inlaid designs.

1. An Irish term meaning a clan or division of a tribe.

and showed how war first came into the world and the flood destroyed the tribe of giants. 1690
 They suffered a terrible severance from the Lord;
 the Almighty made the waters rise,
 drowned them in the deluge for retribution.
 In pure gold inlay on the sword-guards
 there were rune-markings correctly incised, 1695 stating and recording for whom the sword had been first made and ornamented with its scrollworked hilt. Then everyone hushed as the son of Halfdane spoke this wisdom:
 "A protector of his people, pledged to uphold 1700 truth and justice and to respect tradition, is entitled to affirm that this man was born to distinction. Beowulf, my friend, your fame has gone far and wide, you are known everywhere. In all things you are even-tempered, 1705 prudent and resolute. So I stand firm by the promise of friendship we exchanged before. Forever you will be your people's mainstay and your own warriors' helping hand.

Heremod was different,
 the way he behaved to Ecgwela's sons.<sup>2</sup> 1710
 His rise in the world brought little joy to the Danish people, only death and destruction.
 He vented his rage on men he caroused with, killed his own comrades, a pariah king who cut himself off from his own kind, 1715 even though Almighty God had made him eminent and powerful and marked him from the start for a happy life. But a change happened, he grew bloodthirsty, gave no more rings to honor the Danes. He suffered in the end 1720 for having plagued his people for so long:
 his life lost happiness.

So learn from this and understand true values. I who tell you have wintered into wisdom.

It is a great wonder how Almighty God in His magnificence 1725 favors our race with rank and scope and the gift of wisdom; His sway is wide.
 Sometimes He allows the mind of a man of distinguished birth to follow its bent, grants him fulfillment and felicity on earth 1730
 and forts to command in his own country.
 He permits him to lord it in many lands until the man in his unthinkingness

2. That is, the Danes. Ecgwela was evidently a former king of the Danes.

forgets that it will ever end for him.

He indulges his desires; illness and old age mean nothing to him; his mind is untroubled 1735

by envy or malice or the thought of enemies with their hate-honed swords. The whole world conforms to his will, he is kept from the worst until an element of overweening 1740 enters him and takes hold while the soul's guard, its sentry, drowzes, grown too distracted. A killer stalks him, an archer who draws a deadly bow.

And then the man is hit in the heart,
the arrow flies beneath his defenses, 1745
the devious promptings of the demon start.

His old possessions seem paltry to him now.
He covets and resents; dishonors custom and bestows no gold; and because of good things 1750 that the Heavenly Powers gave him in the past he ignores the shape of things to come.

Then finally the end arrives when the body he was lent collapses and falls prey to its death; ancestral possessions 1755 and the goods he hoarded are inherited by another who lets them go with a liberal hand.

"O flower of warriors, beware of that trap.
Choose, dear Beowulf, the better part, eternal rewards. Do not give way to pride. 1760

For a brief while your strength is in bloom but it fades quickly; and soon there will follow illness or the sword to lay you low, or a sudden fire or surge of water or jabbing blade or javelin from the air 1765 or repellent age. Your piercing eye will dim and darken; and death will arrive,

dear warrior, to sweep you away.

"Just so I ruled the Ring-Danes' country for fifty years, defended them in wartime 1770 with spear and sword against constant assaults by many tribes: I came to believe my enemies had faded from the face of the earth.

Still, what happened was a hard reversal from bliss to grief. Grendel struck 1775

after lying in wait. He laid waste to the land and from that moment my mind was in dread of his depredations. So I praise God in His heavenly glory that I lived to behold this head dripping blood and that after such harrowing 1780

I can look upon it in triumph at last.

Take your place, then, with pride and pleasure, and move to the feast. Tomorrow morning our treasure will be shared and showered upon you."

The Geat was elated and gladly obeyed
 the old man's bidding; he sat on the bench. 1785
 And soon all was restored, the same as before.
 Happiness came back, the hall was thronged, and a banquet set forth; black night fell and covered them in darkness.

Then the company rose 1790 for the old campaigner: the gray-haired prince was ready for bed. And a need for rest came over the brave shield-bearing Geat.
 He was a weary seafarer, far from home,
 so immediately a house-guard guided him out, 1795 one whose office entailed looking after whatever a thane on the road in those days might need or require. It was noble courtesy.

[Beowulf Returns Home]

That great heart rested. The hall towered, gold-shingled and gabled, and the guest slept in it 1800 until the black raven with raucous glee announced heaven's joy, and a hurry of brightness overran the shadows. Warriors rose quickly, impatient to be off: their own country was beckoning the nobles; and the bold voyager 1805 longed to be aboard his distant boat.
 Then that stalwart fighter ordered Hrunting to be brought to Unferth, and bade Unferth take the sword and thanked him for lending it.
 He said he had found it a friend in battle 1810 and a powerful help; he put no blame on the blade's cutting edge. He was a considerate man.

And there the warriors stood in their war-gear, eager to go, while their honored lord approached the platform where the other sat. 1815
 The undaunted hero addressed Hrothgar.
 Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
 "Now we who crossed the wide sea have to inform you that we feel a desire to return to Hygelac. Here we have been welcomed 1820 and thoroughly entertained. You have treated us well.
 If there is any favor on earth I can perform beyond deeds of arms I have done already, anything that would merit your affections more,
 I shall act, my lord, with alacrity. 1825
 If ever I hear from across the ocean that people on your borders are threatening battle as attackers have done from time to time,
 I shall land with a thousand thanes at my back to help your cause. Hygelac may be young 1830 to rule a nation, but this much I know about the king of the Geats: he will come to my aid and want to support me by word and action in your hour of need, when honor dictates that I raise a hedge of spears around you. 1835

 Then if Hrethric should think about traveling as a king's son to the court of the Geats, he will find many friends. Foreign places yield more to one who is himself worth meeting."

Hrothgar spoke and answered him: 1840
 "The Lord in his wisdom sent you those words and they came from the heart. I have never heard so young a man make truer observations.
 You are strong in body and mature in mind, impressive in speech. If it should come to pass 1845 that Hrethel's descendant dies beneath a spear, if deadly battle or the sword blade or disease fells the prince who guards your people and you are still alive, then I firmly believe the seafaring Geats won't find a man 1850 worthier of acclaim as their king and defender than you, if only you would undertake the lordship of your homeland. My liking for you deepens with time, dear Beowulf.

What you have done is to draw two peoples, 1855
 the Geat nation and us neighboring Danes, into shared peace and a pact of friendship
 in spite of hatreds we have harbored in the past.
 For as long as I rule this far-flung land treasures will change hands and each side will treat 1860
 the other with gifts; across the gannet's bath, over the broad sea, whorled prows will bring presents and tokens. I know your people are beyond reproach in every respect, steadfast in the old way with friend or foe." 1865

Then the earls' defender furnished the hero with twelve treasures and told him to set out, sail with those gifts safely home to the people he loved, but to return promptly.
 And so the good and gray-haired Dane, 1870 that highborn king, kissed Beowulf and embraced his neck, then broke down in sudden tears. Two forebodings disturbed him in his wisdom, but one was stronger:<sup>3</sup> nevermore would they meet each other 1875 face to face. And such was his affection that he could not help being overcome:
 his fondness for the man was so deep-founded,

3. We are not told what the other foreboding is, but it is probably the old man's awareness of the imminence of his own death.

it warmed his heart and wound the heartstrings tight in his breast.

The embrace ended and Beowulf, glorious in his gold regalia, stepped the green earth. Straining at anchor and ready for boarding, his boat awaited him.

So they went on their journey, and Hrothgar's generosity was praised repeatedly. He was a peerless king until old age sapped his strength and did him mortal harm, as it has done so many.

1880
1885

Down to the waves then, dressed in the web of their chain-mail and war-shirts the young men marched in high spirits. The coast-guard spied them, thanes setting forth, the same as before.
His salute this time from the top of the cliff was far from unmannerly; he galloped to meet them and as they took ship in their shining gear,
he said how welcome they would be in Geatland.
Then the broad hull was beached on the sand to be cargoed with treasure, horses and war-gear.
The curved prow motioned; the mast stood high above Hrothgar's riches in the loaded hold.

1890
1895

The guard who had watched the boat was given a sword with gold fittings, and in future days that present would make him a respected man at his place on the mead-bench.

1900

Then the keel plunged and shook in the sea; and they sailed from Denmark.

Right away the mast was rigged with its sea-shawl;
sail-ropes were tightened, timbers drummed and stiff winds kept the wave-crosser
skimming ahead; as she heaved forward, her foamy neck was fleet and buoyant,
a lapped prow loping over currents, until finally the Geats caught sight of coastline and familiar cliffs. The keel reared up, wind lifted it home, it hit on the land.

1905
1910

The harbor guard came hurrying out to the rolling water: he had watched the offing long and hard, on the lookout for those friends.
With the anchor cables, he moored their craft right where it had beached, in case a backwash might catch the hull and carry it away.
Then he ordered the prince's treasure-trove to be carried ashore. It was a short step from there to where Hrethel's son and heir, Hygelac the gold-giver, makes his home on a secure cliff, in the company of retainers.

1915
1920

The building was magnificent, the king majestic, ensconced in his hall; and although Hygd, his queen,
was young, a few short years at court,

1925

her mind was thoughtful and her manners sure.
 Haereth's daughter<sup>4</sup> behaved generously and stinted nothing when she distributed bounty to the Geats.

1930

Great Queen Modthryth perpetrated terrible wrongs.<sup>5</sup>

If any retainer ever made bold to look her in the face, if an eye not her lord's<sup>6</sup> stared at her directly during daylight, the outcome was sealed: he was kept bound,
 in hand-tightened shackles, racked, tortured until doom was pronounced—death by the sword, slash of blade, blood-gush, and death-qualms in an evil display. Even a queen outstanding in beauty must not overstep like that.

1935

 A queen should weave peace, not punish the innocent with loss of life for imagined insults.

But Hemming's kinsman put a halt to her ways and drinkers round the table had another tale:

1945

she was less of a bane to people's lives, less cruel-minded, after she was married to the brave Offa,<sup>7</sup> a bride arrayed in her gold finery, given away by a caring father, ferried to her young prince over dim seas. In days to come 1950

she would grace the throne and grow famous for her good deeds and conduct of life, her high devotion to the hero king who was the best king, it has been said, between the two seas or anywhere else

1955 on the face of the earth. Offa was honored far and wide for his generous ways, his fighting spirit and his farseeing defense of his homeland; from him there sprang Eomer, Garmund's grandson, kinsman of Hemming,<sup>8</sup> his warriors' mainstay and master of the field.

1960

Heroic Beowulf and his band of men crossed the wide strand, striding along the sandy foreshore; the sun shone, the world's candle warmed them from the south
 as they hastened to where, as they had heard, the young king, Ongentheow's killer<sup>9</sup>

1965

4. That is, Hygd.

5. A Danish queen whose wickedness is being used as a foil to Hygd.

6. Probably her father, although the Anglo-Saxon word can also refer to a husband.

7. A legendary king of the Angles, one of the Germanic peoples who invaded England and established a kingdom named Mercia in the north of the country prior to the composition of Beowulf. Hemming is evidently a forebear of the Angles.

8. Garmund is Offa's father, Eomer his son.

9. Hygelac, king of the Geats; he led the attack against the Swedes, although a Geat named Eofof actually killed Ongentheow. This is the first reference to the feud between the Geats and the Swedes (or Shylfings); see below, lines 2379–96, 2468–89, 2922–98.

and his people's protector, was dispensing rings inside his bawn. Beowulf's return 1970 was reported to Hygelac as soon as possible, news that the captain was now in the enclosure,
his battle-brother back from the fray alive and well, walking to the hall.

Room was quickly made, on the king's orders, 1975 and the troops filed across the cleared floor.

After Hygelac had offered greetings to his loyal thane in a lofty speech, he and his kinsman, that hale survivor, sat face to face. Haereth's daughter<sup>1</sup> 1980 moved about with the mead-jug in her hand, taking care of the company, filling the cups that warriors held out. Then Hygelac began to put courteous questions to his old comrade in the high hall. He hankered to know 1985 every tale the Sea-Geats had to tell:

"How did you fare on your foreign voyage,
dear Beowulf, when you abruptly decided to sail away across the salt water and fight at Heorot? Did you help Hrothgar 1990 much in the end? Could you ease the prince of his well-known troubles? Your undertaking cast my spirits down, I dreaded the outcome of your expedition and pleaded with you long and hard to leave the killer be, 1995 let the South-Danes settle their own blood-feud with Grendel. So God be thanked
I am granted this sight of you, safe and sound."

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
"What happened, Lord Hygelac, is hardly a secret 2000 any more among men in this world—myself and Grendel coming to grips on the very spot where he visited destruction on the Victory-Shieldings and violated life and limb, losses I avenged 2005 so no earthly offspring of Grendel's need ever boast of that bout before dawn, no matter how long the last of his evil family survives.

When I first landed
I hastened to the ring-hall and saluted Hrothgar. 2010
Once he discovered why I had come,
the son of Halfdane sent me immediately to sit with his own sons on the bench.
It was a happy gathering. In my whole life
I have never seen mead enjoyed more 2015 in any hall on earth. Sometimes the queen

1. That is, Hygd.

herself appeared, peace-pledge between nations,<sup>2</sup> to hearten the young ones and hand out a torque to a warrior, then take her place.
 Sometimes Hrothgar's daughter distributed ale to older ranks, in order on the benches: 2020
 I heard the company call her Freawaru as she made her rounds, presenting men with the gem-studded bowl, young bride-to-be to the gracious Ingeld,<sup>3</sup> in her gold-trimmed attire. 2025
 The friend of the Shieldings favors her betrothal:
 the guardian of the kingdom sees good in it and hopes this woman will heal old wounds and grievous feuds.

But generally the spear is prompt to retaliate when a prince is killed, no matter how admirable the bride may be. 2030

"Think how the Heatho-Bards are bound to feel, their lord, Ingeld, and his loyal thanes,
 when he walks in with that woman to the feast:
 Danes are at the table, being entertained, honored guests in glittering regalia, 2035 burnished ring-mail that was their hosts' birthright, looted when the Heatho-Bards could no longer wield their weapons in the shield-clash, when they went down with their beloved comrades and forfeited their lives. 2040

Then an old spearman will speak while they are drinking, having glimpsed some heirloom that brings alive memories of the massacre; his mood will darken and heart-stricken, in the stress of his emotion, he will begin to test a young man's temper 2045 and stir up trouble, starting like this:

'Now, my friend, don't you recognize your father's sword, his favorite weapon, the one he wore when he went out in his war-mask to face the Danes on that final day? 2050

After Withergeld<sup>4</sup> died and his men were doomed, the Shieldings quickly claimed the field;
 and now here's a son of one or other of those same killers coming through our hall overbearing us, mouthing boasts, 2055 and rigged in armor that by right is yours.'
 And so he keeps on, recalling and accusing, working things up with bitter words until one of the lady's retainers lies

2. Wealhtheow, Hrothgar's queen, is called a "peace-pledge between nations" because kings attempted to end feuds by marrying their daughters to the sons of the kings of enemy nations. But as we have already seen in the case of the marriage of the Dane Hildeburh to the Jute

Finn, and as we shall shortly learn again, such a strategy seems rarely to have worked.

3. King of the Heatho-Bards, whose father, Froda, was killed by the Danes.

4. A Heatho-Bard warrior.

spattered in blood, split open on his father's account.<sup>5</sup> The killer knows the lie of the land and escapes with his life.
 Then on both sides the oath-bound lords will break the peace, a passionate hate will build up in Ingeld, and love for his bride will falter in him as the feud rankles. 2065
 I therefore suspect the good faith of the Heatho-Bards, the truth of their friendship and the trustworthiness of their alliance with the Danes.
     But now, my lord,
 I shall carry on with my account of Grendel,
 the whole story of everything that happened in the hand-to-hand fight. 2070
     After heaven's gem
 had gone mildly to earth, that maddened spirit, the terror of those twilights, came to attack us
 where we stood guard, still safe inside the hall. 2075
 There deadly violence came down on Hondscio<sup>6</sup> and he fell as fate ordained, the first to perish, rigged out for the combat. A comrade from our ranks had come to grief in Grendel's maw:
 he ate up the entire body. 2080
 There was blood on his teeth, he was bloated and dangerous, all roused up, yet still unready to leave the hall empty-handed;
 renowned for his might, he matched himself against me, wildly reaching. He had this roomy pouch,<sup>7</sup> 2085 a strange accoutrement, intricately strung and hung at the ready, a rare patchwork of devilishly fitted dragon-skins.
 I had done him no wrong, yet the raging demon wanted to cram me and many another 2090 into this bag—but it was not to be once I got to my feet in a blind fury.
 It would take too long to tell how I repaid the terror of the land for every life he took and so won credit for you, my king, 2095
 and for all your people. And although he got away to enjoy life's sweetness for a while longer, his right hand stayed behind him in Heorot, evidence of his miserable overthrow as he dived into murk on the mere bottom. 2100
 "I got lavish rewards from the lord of the Danes for my part in the battle, beaten gold and much else, once morning came

5. A Danish attendant to Freawaru, whose father killed a Heatho-Bard in the original battle; this action is envisioned as taking place at Ingeld's court after the marriage.

6. A Geat who was accompanying Beowulf; his name means "glove."

7. The Anglo-Saxon word translated as "pouch" literally means "glove."

and we took our places at the banquet table.
 There was singing and excitement: an old reciter,
 a carrier of stories, recalled the early days. 2105
 At times some hero made the timbered harp tremble with sweetness, or related true and tragic happenings; at times the king gave the proper turn to some fantastic tale, 2110
 or a battle-scarred veteran, bowed with age, would begin to remember the martial deeds of his youth and prime and be overcome as the past welled up in his wintry heart.
 "We were happy there the whole day long and enjoyed our time until another night 2115 descended upon us. Then suddenly the vehement mother avenged her son and wreaked destruction. Death had robbed her, Geats had slain Grendel, so his ghastly dam 2120
 struck back and with bare-faced defiance laid a man low. Thus life departed from the sage Aeschere, an elder wise in counsel.
 But afterward, on the morning following,
 the Danes could not burn the dead body 2125 nor lay the remains of the man they loved on his funeral pyre. She had fled with the corpse and taken refuge beneath torrents on the mountain.
 It was a hard blow for Hrothgar to bear, harder than any he had undergone before. 2130
 And so the heartsore king beseeched me in your royal name to take my chances underwater, to win glory and prove my worth. He promised me rewards.
 Hence, as is well known, I went to my encounter 2135 with the terror-monger at the bottom of the tarn.
 For a while it was hand-to-hand between us,
 then blood went curling along the currents and I beheaded Grendel's mother in the hall with a mighty sword. I barely managed 2140 to escape with my life; my time had not yet come.
 But Halfdane's heir, the shelter of those earls,
 again endowed me with gifts in abundance.
 "Thus the king acted with due custom.
 I was paid and recompensed completely, 2145 given full measure and the freedom to choose from Hrothgar's treasures by Hrothgar himself.
 These, King Hygelac, I am happy to present to you as gifts. It is still upon your grace that all favor depends. I have few kinsmen 2150 who are close, my king, except for your kind self."
 Then he ordered the boar-framed standard to be brought,
 the battle-topping helmet, the mail-shirt gray as hoar-frost,
 and the precious war-sword; and proceeded with his speech:

“When Hrothgar presented this war-gear to me he instructed me, my lord, to give you some account of why it signifies his special favor. 2155

He said it had belonged to his older brother,
King Heorogar, who had long kept it,
but that Heorogar had never bequeathed it 2160
to his son Heoroward, that worthy scion, loyal as he was.

Enjoy it well.”

I heard four horses were handed over next.
Beowulf bestowed four bay steeds to go with the armor, swift gallopers, 2165 all alike. So ought a kinsman act, instead of plotting and planning in secret to bring people to grief, or conspiring to arrange the death of comrades. The warrior king was uncle to Beowulf and honored by his nephew: 2170 each was concerned for the other's good.

I heard he presented Hygd with a gorget,
the priceless torque that the prince's daughter, Wealhtheow, had given him; and three horses,
supple creatures brilliantly saddled. 2175
The bright necklace would be luminous on Hygd's breast.

Thus Beowulf bore himself with valor;
he was formidable in battle yet behaved with honor and took no advantage; never cut down a comrade who was drunk, kept his temper 2180 and, warrior that he was, watched and controlled his God-sent strength and his outstanding natural powers. He had been poorly regarded for a long time, was taken by the Geats for less than he was worth: and their lord too 2185
had never much esteemed him in the mead-hall.
They firmly believed that he lacked force, that the prince was a weakling; but presently every affront to his deserving was reversed.

The battle-famed king, bulwark of his earls, ordered a gold-chased heirloom of Hrethel's<sup>8</sup> 2190 to be brought in; it was the best example of a gem-studded sword in the Geat treasury.
This he laid on Beowulf's lap and then rewarded him with land as well, 2195
seven thousand hides;<sup>9</sup> and a hall and a throne.
Both owned land by birth in that country, ancestral grounds; but the greater right and sway were inherited by the higher born.

8. Hygelac's father and, through his daughter, Beowulf's grandfather.

9. A “hide” varied in size, but was considered to be sufficient land to support a peasant and his family.

[The Dragon Wakes]

A lot was to happen in later days in the fury of battle. Hygelac fell and the shelter of Heardred's shield proved useless against the fierce aggression of the Shylfings:<sup>1</sup> ruthless swordsmen, seasoned campaigners, they came against him and his conquering nation,
and with cruel force cut him down so that afterwards

the wide kingdom reverted to Beowulf. He ruled it well for fifty winters, grew old and wise as warden of the land

until one began 2210
to dominate the dark, a dragon on the prow from the steep vaults of a stone-roofed barrow<sup>2</sup> where he guarded a hoard; there was a hidden passage, unknown to men, but someone managed<sup>3</sup> to enter by it and interfere 2215 with the heathen trove. He had handled and removed a gem-studded goblet; it gained him nothing, though with a thief's wiles he had outwitted
the sleeping dragon. That drove him into rage, as the people of that country would soon discover. 2220

The intruder who broached the dragon's treasure and moved him to wrath had never meant to.

It was desperation on the part of a slave fleeing the heavy hand of some master, guilt-ridden and on the run, going to ground. But he soon began to shake with terror; . . . . . in shock the wretch . . . . .

..... panicked and ran away with the precious ..... 2230 metalwork. There were many other heirlooms heaped inside the earth-house, because long ago, with deliberate care,

somebody now forgotten
had buried the riches of a highborn race in this ancient cache. Death had come and taken them all in times gone by and the only one left to tell their tale, the last of their line, could look forward to nothing but the same fate for himself: he foresaw that his joy in the treasure would be brief.

1. Hygelac died in the raid against the Franks (see p. 870, n. 4); Heardred died in the long feud against the Swedes or Shylfings (see p. 886, n. 9).

3. In the single manuscript of Beowulf, the page containing lines 2215–31 is badly damaged, and the translation is therefore conjectural. The ellipses of lines 2227–30 indicate lines that cannot be reconstructed at all.

A newly constructed barrow stood waiting, on a wide headland close to the waves, its entryway secured.
 Into it the keeper of the hoard had carried all the goods and golden ware 2245 worth preserving. His words were few:
 "Now, earth, hold what earls once held and heroes can no more; it was mined from you first by honorable men. My own people have been ruined in war; one by one 2250 they went down to death, looked their last on sweet life in the hall. I am left with nobody to bear a sword or to burnish plated goblets, put a sheen on the cup. The companies have departed.
 The hard helmet, hasped with gold, 2255
 will be stripped of its hoops; and the helmet-shiner who should polish the metal of the war-mask sleeps;
 the coat of mail that came through all fights,
 through shield-collapse and cut of sword, decays with the warrior. Nor may webbed mail 2260 range far and wide on the warlord's back beside his mustered troops. No trembling harp, no tuned timber, no tumbling hawk swerving through the hall, no swift horse pawing the courtyard. Pillage and slaughter 2265 have emptied the earth of entire peoples."
 And so he mourned as he moved about the world, deserted and alone, lamenting his unhappiness day and night, until death's flood brimmed up in his heart.

Then an old harrower of the dark 2270 happened to find the hoard open,
 the burning one who hunts out barrows,
 the slick-skinned dragon, threatening the night sky with streamers of fire. People on the farms are in dread of him. He is driven to hunt out 2275 hoards under ground, to guard heathen gold through age-long vigils, though to little avail.
 For three centuries, this scourge of the people had stood guard on that stoutly protected underground treasury, until the intruder 2280 unleashed its fury; he hurried to his lord with the gold-plated cup and made his plea to be reinstated. Then the vault was rifled, the ring-hoard robbed, and the wretched man had his request granted. His master gazed 2285 on that find from the past for the first time.

When the dragon awoke, trouble flared again.
 He rippled down the rock, writhing with anger when he saw the footprints of the prowler who had stolen too close to his dreaming head. 2290

So may a man not marked by fate easily escape exile and woe
by the grace of God.

The hoard-guardian scorched the ground as he scoured and hunted for the trespasser who had troubled his sleep. 2295 Hot and savage, he kept circling and circling the outside of the mound. No man appeared in that desert waste, but he worked himself up by imagining battle; then back in he'd go in search of the cup, only to discover 2300 signs that someone had stumbled upon the golden treasures. So the guardian of the mound, the hoard-watcher, waited for the gloaming with fierce impatience; his pent-up fury at the loss of the vessel made him long to hit back 2305 and lash out in flames. Then, to his delight, the day waned and he could wait no longer behind the wall, but hurtled forth in a fiery blaze. The first to suffer were the people on the land, but before long 2310 it was their treasure-giver who would come to grief.

The dragon began to belch out flames and burn bright homesteads; there was a hot glow that scared everyone, for the vile sky-winger would leave nothing alive in his wake. 2315
Everywhere the havoc he wrought was in evidence.
Far and near, the Geat nation bore the brunt of his brutal assaults and virulent hate. Then back to the hoard he would dart before daybreak, to hide in his den. 2320
He had swung<sup>4</sup> the land, swathed it in flame, in fire and burning, and now he felt secure in the vaults of his barrow; but his trust was unavailing.

Then Beowulf was given bad news,
the hard truth: his own home, 2325
the best of buildings, had been burned to a cinder, the throne-room of the Geats. It threw the hero into deep anguish and darkened his mood:
the wise man thought he must have thwarted ancient ordinance of the eternal Lord, 2330 broken His commandment. His mind was in turmoil, unaccustomed anxiety and gloom confused his brain; the fire-dragon had razed the coastal region and reduced forts and earthworks to dust and ashes, 2335
so the war-king planned and plotted his revenge.
The warriors' protector, prince of the hall-troop, ordered a marvelous all-iron shield

4. That is, singed, scorched.

from his smithy works. He well knew that linden boards would let him down and timber burn. After many trials, he was destined to face the end of his days,
in this mortal world, as was the dragon,
for all his long leasehold on the treasure.

Yet the prince of the rings was too proud to line up with a large army against the sky-plague. He had scant regard for the dragon as a threat, no dread at all of its courage or strength, for he had kept going often in the past, through perils and ordeals of every sort, after he had purged Hrothgar's hall, triumphed in Heorot and beaten Grendel. He outgrappled the monster and his evil kin.

One of his cruelest hand-to-hand encounters had happened when Hygelac, king of the Geats, was killed in Friesland: the people's friend and lord, Hrethel's son, slaked a sword blade's thirst for blood. But Beowulf's prodigious gifts as a swimmer guaranteed his safety:
he arrived at the shore, shouldering thirty battle-dresses, the booty he had won.
There was little for the Hetware<sup>5</sup> to be happy about as they shielded their faces and fighting on the ground began in earnest. With Beowulf against them, few could hope to return home.

Across the wide sea, desolate and alone,
the son of Ecgtheow swam back to his people.
There Hygd offered him throne and authority
as lord of the ring-hoard: with Hygelac dead, she had no belief in her son's ability to defend their homeland against foreign invaders.
Yet there was no way the weakened nation could get Beowulf to give in and agree to be elevated over Heardred as his lord or to undertake the office of kingship.
But he did provide support for the prince, honored and minded him until he matured
as the ruler of Geatland.

Then over sea-roads exiles arrived, sons of Ohthere.<sup>6</sup>
They had rebelled against the best of all

5. A Frankish tribe.

6. King of the Swedes or Shylfings; after his death his sons, Eanmund and Eadgils, were driven out by their uncle Onela. They were taken in by Heardred, Hygelac's son, who was then king of the Geats, who was then in turn attacked and killed (along with Eanmund) by Onela. At this point Beowulf became king of the Geats and supported Eadgils in his successful attack on Onela.

the sea-kings in Sweden, the one who held sway in the Shylfing nation, their renowned prince, lord of the mead-hall. That marked the end for Hygelac's son: his hospitality 2385 was mortally rewarded with wounds from a sword.
 Heardred lay slaughtered and Onela returned to the land of Sweden, leaving Beowulf to ascend the throne, to sit in majesty and rule over the Geats. He was a good king. 2390

In days to come, he contrived to avenge the fall of his prince; he befriended Eadgils when Eadgils was friendless, aiding his cause with weapons and warriors over the wide sea, sending him men. The feud was settled 2395
 on a comfortless campaign when he killed Onela.

And so the son of Ecgtheow had survived every extreme, excelling himself in daring and in danger, until the day arrived when he had to come face to face with the dragon. 2400
 The lord of the Geats took eleven comrades and went in a rage to reconnoiter.

By then he had discovered the cause of the affliction being visited on the people. The precious cup had come to him from the hand of the finder, the one who had started all this strife 2405 and was now added as a thirteenth to their number.
 They press-ganged and compelled this poor creature to be their guide. Against his will he led them to the earth-vault he alone knew, 2410 an underground barrow near the sea-billows and heaving waves, heaped inside with exquisite metalwork. The one who stood guard was dangerous and watchful, warden of the trove buried under earth: no easy bargain 2415 would be made in that place by any man.

The veteran king sat down on the cliff-top.
 He wished good luck to the Geats who had shared his hearth and his gold. He was sad at heart, unsettled yet ready, sensing his death. 2420

His fate hovered near, unknowable but certain:
 it would soon claim his coffered soul, part life from limb. Before long the prince's spirit would spin free from his body.

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke: 2425

"Many a skirmish I survived when I was young and many times of war: I remember them well.

At seven, I was fostered out by my father, left in the charge of my people's lord.

King Hrethel kept me and took care of me, 2430 was openhanded, behaved like a kinsman.

While I was his ward, he treated me no worse

as a wean<sup>7</sup> about the place than one of his own boys, Herebeald and Haethcyn, or my own Hygelac.
 For the eldest, Herebeald, an unexpected deathbed was laid out, through a brother's doing, 2435 when Haethcyn bent his horn-tipped bow and loosed the arrow that destroyed his life.
 He shot wide and buried a shaft in the flesh and blood of his own brother. 2440
 That offense was beyond redress, a wrongfooting of the heart's affections; for who could avenge
 the prince's life or pay his death-price?
 It was like the misery felt by an old man who has lived to see his son's body 2445 swing on the gallows. He begins to keen and weep for his boy, watching the raven gloat where he hangs: he can be of no help.
 The wisdom of age is worthless to him.
 Morning after morning, he wakes to remember 2450 that his child is gone; he has no interest in living on until another heir is born in the hall, now that his first-born has entered death's dominion forever.
 He gazes sorrowfully at his son's dwelling, 2455
 the banquet hall bereft of all delight, the windswept hearthstone; the horsemen are sleeping,
 the warriors under ground; what was is no more.
 No tunes from the harp, no cheer raised in the yard.
 Alone with his longing, he lies down on his bed 2460 and sings a lament; everything seems too large,
 the steadings and the fields.

Such was the feeling of loss endured by the lord of the Geats after Herebeald's death. He was helplessly placed to set to rights the wrong committed, 2465 could not punish the killer in accordance with the law of the blood-feud, although he felt no love for him.
 Heartsore, wearied, he turned away from life's joys, chose God's light and departed, leaving buildings and lands 2470 to his sons, as a man of substance will.

“Then over the wide sea Swedes and Geats battled and feuded and fought without quarter.
 Hostilities broke out when Hrethel died.
 Ongentheow's sons<sup>8</sup> were unrelenting, 2475

7. A young child [translator's note]; a Northern Irish word.

8. Ohthere and Onela, who attacked the Geats and killed Haethcyn; Haethcyn was then avenged by his brother Hygelac, whose attack on the Swedes resulted in the death of Ongentheow at the hands of the Geat Eofor (described below in lines 2922–98). These events took place before those of lines 2379–96, which describe the Geats' role in the struggle between Onela and Ohthere's two sons after Ongentheow's death.

refusing to make peace, campaigning violently from coast to coast, constantly setting up terrible ambushes around Hreosnahill.<sup>9</sup>

My own kith and kin avenged these evil events, as everybody knows, 2480
but the price was high: one of them paid with his life. Haethcyn, lord of the Geats, met his fate there and fell in the battle.
Then, as I have heard, Hygelac's sword was raised in the morning against Ongentheow, 2485 his brother's killer. When Eofor cleft the old Swede's helmet, halved it open, he fell, death-pale: his feud-calloused hand could not stave off the fatal stroke.

"The treasures that Hygelac lavished on me 2490
I paid for when I fought, as fortune allowed me, with my glittering sword. He gave me land and the security land brings, so he had no call to go looking for some lesser champion, some mercenary from among the Gifthas<sup>1</sup> 2495
or the Spear-Danes or the men of Sweden.
I marched ahead of him, always there at the front of the line; and I shall fight like that for as long as I live, as long as this sword shall last, which has stood me in good stead 2500 late and soon, ever since I killed
Dayraven the Frank in front of the two armies.
He brought back no looted breastplate to the Frisian king but fell in battle, their standard-bearer, highborn and brave. 2505
No sword blade sent him to his death:
my bare hands stilled his heartbeats and wrecked the bone-house. Now blade and hand, sword and sword-stroke, will assay the hoard."

[Beowulf Attacks the Dragon]

Beowulf spoke, made a formal boast 2510 for the last time: "I risked my life often when I was young. Now I am old, but as king of the people I shall pursue this fight for the glory of winning, if the evil one will only abandon his earth-fort and face me in the open." 2515

Then he addressed each dear companion
one final time, those fighters in their helmets, resolute and highborn: "I would rather not use a weapon if I knew another way

9. The place of the battle can be translated as      1. A tribe related to the Goths.
Sorrow Hill.

to grapple with the dragon and make good my boast 2520
as I did against Grendel in days gone by.
But I shall be meeting molten venom in the fire he breathes, so I go forth in mail-shirt and shield. I won't shift a foot when I meet the cave-guard: what occurs on the wall 2525 between the two of us will turn out as fate, overseer of men, decides. I am resolved.
I scorn further words against this sky-borne foe.
"Men-at-arms, remain here on the barrow, safe in your armor, to see which one of us 2530
is better in the end at bearing wounds in a deadly fray. This fight is not yours, nor is it up to any man except me to measure his strength against the monster or to prove his worth. I shall win the gold 2535 by my courage, or else mortal combat, doom of battle, will bear your lord away."
Then he drew himself up beside his shield.
The fabled warrior in his war-shirt and helmet trusted in his own strength entirely 2540 and went under the crag. No coward path.
Hard by the rock-face that hale veteran,
a good man who had gone repeatedly into combat and danger and come through, saw a stone arch and a gushing stream 2545 that burst from the barrow, blazing and wafting a deadly heat. It would be hard to survive unscathed near the hoard, to hold firm against the dragon in those flaming depths.
Then he gave a shout. The lord of the Geats 2550 unburdened his breast and broke out in a storm of anger. Under gray stone his voice challenged and resounded clearly.
Hate was ignited. The hoard-guard recognized a human voice, the time was over 2555 for peace and parleying. Pouring forth in a hot battle-fume, the breath of the monster burst from the rock. There was a rumble under ground.
Down there in the barrow, Beowulf the warrior lifted his shield: the outlandish thing 2560 writhed and convulsed and viciously turned on the king, whose keen-edged sword, an heirloom inherited by ancient right,
was already in his hand. Roused to a fury, each antagonist struck terror in the other. 2565 Unyielding, the lord of his people loomed by his tall shield, sure of his ground, while the serpent looped and unleashed itself.
Swaddled in flames, it came gliding and flexing and racing toward its fate. Yet his shield defended 2570 the renowned leader's life and limb for a shorter time than he meant it to:

 that final day was the first time when Beowulf fought and fate denied him glory in battle. So the king of the Geats 2575 raised his hand and struck hard at the enameled scales, but scarcely cut through:
 the blade flashed and slashed yet the blow was far less powerful than the hard-pressed king had need of at that moment. The mound-keeper 2580 went into a spasm and spouted deadly flames:
 when he felt the stroke, battle-fire billowed and spewed. Beowulf was foiled of a glorious victory. The glittering sword, infallible before that day, 2585 failed when he unsheathed it, as it never should have.
 For the son of Ecgtheow, it was no easy thing to have to give ground like that and go unwillingly to inhabit another home in a place beyond; so every man must yield 2590
 the leasehold of his days.

Before long
 the fierce contenders clashed again.
 The hoard-guard took heart, inhaled and swelled up and got a new wind; he who had once ruled was furled in fire and had to face the worst. 2595
 No help or backing was to be had then from his highborn comrades; that hand-picked troop broke ranks and ran for their lives to the safety of the wood. But within one heart sorrow welled up: in a man of worth 2600
 the claims of kinship cannot be denied.

His name was Wiglaf, a son of Weohstan's, a well-regarded Shyfling warrior related to Aelfhere.<sup>2</sup> When he saw his lord tormented by the heat of his scalding helmet, 2605
 he remembered the bountiful gifts bestowed on him, how well he lived among the Waegmundings, the freehold he inherited from his father<sup>3</sup> before him.
 He could not hold back: one hand brandished
 the yellow-timbered shield, the other drew his sword— 2610 an ancient blade that was said to have belonged to Eanmund, the son of Ohthere, the one Weohstan had slain when he was an exile without friends.
 He carried the arms to the victim's kinfolk,

2. Wiglaf is, like Beowulf, a member of the clan of the Waegmundings (see lines 2813–14), although both consider themselves Geats as well. See p. 850, n. 2. Nothing is known of Aelfhere.

3. Wiglaf's father is Weohstan, who, as we learn shortly, was the man who killed Eanmund, Ohthere's son, when he had taken refuge among the Geats (lines 2379–84). How Wiglaf then became a Geat is not clear, although it may have been when Beowulf helped Eanmund's brother Eadgils avenge himself on Onela, who had usurped the throne of the Swedes; Eadgils then became king.

the burnished helmet, the webbed chain-mail 2615 and that relic of the giants. But Onela returned the weapons to him, rewarded Weohstan with Eanmund's war-gear. He ignored the blood-feud, the fact that Eanmund was his brother's son.<sup>4</sup> Weohstan kept that war-gear for a lifetime, 2620 the sword and the mail-shirt, until it was the son's turn to follow his father and perform his part.
 Then, in old age, at the end of his days
 among the Weather-Geats, he bequeathed to Wiglaf innumerable weapons.

And now the youth 2625
 was to enter the line of battle with his lord,
 his first time to be tested as a fighter.
 His spirit did not break and the ancestral blade would keep its edge, as the dragon discovered as soon as they came together in the combat. 2630

Sad at heart, addressing his companions,
 Wiglaf spoke wise and fluent words:
 "I remember that time when mead was flowing,
 how we pledged loyalty to our lord in the hall, promised our ring-giver we would be worth our price, 2635 make good the gift of the war-gear, those swords and helmets, as and when his need required it. He picked us out from the army deliberately, honored us and judged us fit for this action, made me these lavish gifts— 2640 and all because he considered us the best of his arms-bearing thanes. And now, although he wanted this challenge to be one he'd face by himself alone—the shepherd of our land, a man unequaled in the quest for glory 2645 and a name for daring—now the day has come when this lord we serve needs sound men to give him their support. Let us go to him, help our leader through the hot flame and dread of the fire. As God is my witness, 2650
 I would rather my body were robed in the same burning blaze as my gold-giver's body than go back home bearing arms.
 That is unthinkable, unless we have first slain the foe and defended the life 2655 of the prince of the Weather-Geats. I well know the things he has done for us deserve better.
 Should he alone be left exposed to fall in battle? We must bond together, shield and helmet, mail-shirt and sword." 2660
 Then he waded the dangerous reek and went under arms to his lord, saying only:

4. That is, Onela ignored the fact that Weohstan had killed his nephew Eanmund since he in fact wanted Eanmund dead.

“Go on, dear Beowulf, do everything you said you would when you were still young and vowed you would never let your name and fame be dimmed while you lived. Your deeds are famous, so stay resolute, my lord, defend your life now with the whole of your strength. I shall stand by you.” 2665

After those words, a wildness rose in the dragon again and drove it to attack, heaving up fire, hunting for enemies,
 the humans it loathed. Flames lapped the shield, charred it to the boss, and the body armor on the young warrior was useless to him.
 But Wiglaf did well under the wide rim Beowulf shared with him once his own had shattered in sparks and ashes. 2670

Inspired again
 by the thought of glory, the war-king threw his whole strength behind a sword stroke and connected with the skull. And Naegling snapped.
 Beowulf’s ancient iron-gray sword let him down in the fight. It was never his fortune to be helped in combat by the cutting edge of weapons made of iron. When he wielded a sword, no matter how blooded and hard-edged the blade,
 his hand was too strong, the stroke he dealt (I have heard) would ruin it. He could reap no advantage. 2680

Then the bane of that people, the fire-breathing dragon, was mad to attack for a third time.
 When a chance came, he caught the hero in a rush of flame and clamped sharp fangs into his neck. Beowulf’s body ran wet with his life-blood: it came welling out. 2690

Next thing, they say, the noble son of Weohstan saw the king in danger at his side and displayed his inborn bravery and strength.
 He left the head alone,<sup>5</sup> but his fighting hand was burned when he came to his kinsman’s aid.
 He lunged at the enemy lower down so that his decorated sword sank into its belly and the flames grew weaker. 2700

Once again the king gathered his strength and drew a stabbing knife
 he carried on his belt, sharpened for battle.
 He stuck it deep in the dragon’s flank.
 Beowulf dealt it a deadly wound.
 They had killed the enemy, courage quelled his life;
 that pair of kinsmen, partners in nobility, had destroyed the foe. So every man should act, be at hand when needed; but now, for the king, 2705

5. That is, the dragon’s flame-breathing head.

this would be the last of his many labors and triumphs in the world. 2710

Then the wound dealt by the ground-burner earlier began to scald and swell; Beowulf discovered deadly poison suppurating inside him, surges of nausea, and so, in his wisdom, 2715
the prince realized his state and struggled toward a seat on the rampart. He steadied his gaze on those gigantic stones, saw how the earthwork was braced with arches built over columns.
And now that thane unequaled for goodness 2720 with his own hands washed his lord's wounds, swabbed the weary prince with water,
bathed him clean, unbuckled his helmet.

Beowulf spoke: in spite of his wounds, mortal wounds, he still spoke 2725 for he well knew his days in the world had been lived out to the end—his allotted time was drawing to a close, death was very near.

“Now is the time when I would have wanted to bestow this armor on my own son, 2730 had it been my fortune to have fathered an heir and live on in his flesh. For fifty years
I ruled this nation. No king of any neighboring clan would dare face me with troops, none had the power 2735 to intimidate me. I took what came, cared for and stood by things in my keeping, never fomented quarrels, never swore to a lie. All this consoles me, doomed as I am and sickening for death; 2740 because of my right ways, the Ruler of mankind need never blame me when the breath leaves my body for murder of kinsmen. Go now quickly, dearest Wiglaf, under the gray stone where the dragon is laid out, lost to his treasure; 2745
hurry to feast your eyes on the hoard.

Away you go: I want to examine that ancient gold, gaze my fill on those garnered jewels; my going will be easier for having seen the treasure, a less troubled letting-go 2750
of the life and lordship I have long maintained.”

And so, I have heard, the son of Weohstan quickly obeyed the command of his languishing war-weary lord; he went in his chain-mail under the rock-piled roof of the barrow, 2755 exulting in his triumph, and saw beyond the seat
a treasure-trove of astonishing richness, wall-hangings that were a wonder to behold, glittering gold spread across the ground,

the old dawn-scorching serpent's den 2760 packed with goblets and vessels from the past, tarnished and corroding. Rusty helmets all eaten away. Armbands everywhere, artfully wrought. How easily treasure buried in the ground, gold hidden 2765
 however skillfully, can escape from any man!

And he saw too a standard, entirely of gold, hanging high over the hoard,
 a masterpiece of filigree; it glowed with light so he could make out the ground at his feet 2770 and inspect the valuables. Of the dragon there was no remaining sign: the sword had dispatched him.
 Then, the story goes, a certain man<sup>6</sup> plundered the hoard in that immemorial howe,<sup>7</sup> filled his arms with flagons and plates, 2775 anything he wanted; and took the standard also, most brilliant of banners.

Already the blade
 of the old king's sharp killing-sword had done its worst: the one who had for long minded the hoard, hovering over gold, 2780 unleashing fire, surging forth midnight after midnight, had been mown down.

Wiglaf went quickly, keen to get back, excited by the treasure. Anxiety weighed on his brave heart—he was hoping he would find 2785
 the leader of the Geats alive where he had left him helpless, earlier, on the open ground.

So he came to the place, carrying the treasure and found his lord bleeding profusely, his life at an end; again he began 2790 to swab his body. The beginnings of an utterance broke out from the king's breast-cage.
 The old lord gazed sadly at the gold.

"To the everlasting Lord of all,
 to the King of Glory, I give thanks 2795 that I behold this treasure here in front of me, that I have been allowed to leave my people
 so well endowed on the day I die.

Now that I have bartered my last breath to own this fortune, it is up to you 2800 to look after their needs. I can hold out no longer.

Order my troop to construct a barrow on a headland on the coast, after my pyre has cooled.
 It will loom on the horizon at Hronesness<sup>8</sup> and be a reminder among my people— 2805 so that in coming times crews under sail will call it Beowulf's Barrow, as they steer

6. That is, Wiglaf.

7. An Irish word for dwelling.

8. The name means "Whaleness."

ships across the wide and shrouded waters.”

Then the king in his great-heartedness unclasped the collar of gold from his neck and gave it 2810 to the young thane, telling him to use it and the war-shirt and gilded helmet well.
“You are the last of us, the only one left of the Waegmundings. Fate swept us away, sent my whole brave highborn clan 2815 to their final doom. Now I must follow them.”

That was the warrior’s last word.
He had no more to confide. The furious heat of the pyre would assail him. His soul fled from his breast to its destined place among the steadfast ones. 2820

[Beowulf’s Funeral]

It was hard then on the young hero, having to watch the one he held so dear there on the ground, going through his death agony. The dragon from underearth, his nightmarish destroyer, lay destroyed as well, 2825 utterly without life. No longer would his snakefolds ply themselves to safeguard hidden gold.
Hard-edged blades, hammered out and keenly filed, had finished him so that the sky-roamer lay there rigid, 2830 brought low beside the treasure-lodge.

Never again would he glitter and glide and show himself off in midnight air, exulting in his riches: he fell to earth
through the battle-strength in Beowulf’s arm. 2835
There were few, indeed, as far as I have heard, big and brave as they may have been, few who would have held out if they had had to face the outpourings of that poison-breather or gone foraging on the ring-hall floor 2840 and found the deep barrow-dweller on guard and awake.

The treasure had been won,
bought and paid for by Beowulf’s death.
Both had reached the end of the road through the life they had been lent.

Before long 2845
the battle-dodgers abandoned the wood,
the ones who had let down their lord earlier,
the tail-turners, ten of them together.
When he needed them most, they had made off.
Now they were ashamed and came behind shields, 2850
in their battle-outfits, to where the old man lay.
They watched Wiglaf, sitting worn out,
a comrade shoulder to shoulder with his lord, trying in vain to bring him round with water.

Much as he wanted to, there was no way
he could preserve his lord's life on earth or alter in the least the Almighty's will.

What God judged right would rule what happened to every man, as it does to this day.

Then a stern rebuke was bound to come from the young warrior to the ones who had been cowards.

Wiglaf, son of Weohstan, spoke disdainfully and in disappointment:

"Anyone ready to admit the truth will surely realize that the lord of men who showered you with gifts and gave you the armor you are standing in—when he would distribute helmets and mail-shirts to men on the mead-benches, a prince treating his thanes in hall to the best he could find, far or near—was throwing weapons uselessly away.

It would be a sad waste when the war broke out.

Beowulf had little cause to brag about his armed guard; yet God who ordains who wins or loses allowed him to strike with his own blade when bravery was needed.

There was little I could do to protect his life in the heat of the fray, but I found new strength welling up when I went to help him.

Then my sword connected and the deadly assaults of our foe grew weaker, the fire coursed less strongly from his head. But when the worst happened too few rallied around the prince.

"So it is good-bye now to all you know and love on your home ground, the open-handedness, the giving of war-swords. Every one of you with freeholds of land, our whole nation, will be dispossessed, once princes from beyond get tidings of how you turned and fled and disgraced yourselves. A warrior will sooner die than live a life of shame."

Then he ordered the outcome of the fight to be reported to those camped on the ridge, that crowd of retainers who had sat all morning, sad at heart, shield-bearers wondering about the man they loved: would this day be his last or would he return? He told the truth and did not balk, the rider who bore news to the cliff-top. He addressed them all:

"Now the people's pride and love,
the lord of the Geats, is laid on his deathbed, brought down by the dragon's attack.

Beside him lies the bane of his life,

dead from knife-wounds. There was no way Beowulf could manage to get the better of the monster with his sword. Wiglaf sits at Beowulf's side, the son of Weohstan, the living warrior watching by the dead, keeping weary vigil, holding a wake for the loved and the loathed.

Now war is looming over our nation, soon it will be known to Franks and Frisians, far and wide, that the king is gone. Hostility has been great among the Franks since Hygelac sailed forth at the head of a war-fleet into Friesland:
there the Hetware harried and attacked and overwhelmed him with great odds.
The leader in his war-gear was laid low, fell among followers: that lord did not favor his company with spoils. The Merovingian king has been an enemy to us ever since.

"Nor do I expect peace or pact-keeping of any sort from the Swedes. Remember:
at Ravenswood, Ongentheow slaughtered Haethcyn, Hrethel's son, when the Geat people in their arrogance first attacked the fierce Shylfings.
The return blow was quickly struck by Ohthere's father.<sup>9</sup> Old and terrible, he felled the sea-king and saved his own aged wife, the mother of Onela and of Ohthere, bereft of her gold rings.
Then he kept hard on the heels of the foe and drove them, leaderless, lucky to get away in a desperate rout into Ravenswood.
His army surrounded the weary remnant where they nursed their wounds; all through the night he howled threats at those huddled survivors, promised to axe their bodies open when dawn broke, dangle them from gallows to feed the birds. But at first light when their spirits were lowest, relief arrived.
They heard the sound of Hygelac's horn,
his trumpet calling as he came to find them,
the hero in pursuit, at hand with troops.

"The bloody swathe that Swedes and Geats cut through each other was everywhere.
No one could miss their murderous feuding.
Then the old man made his move, pulled back, barred his people in:
Ongentheow withdrew to higher ground.
Hygelac's pride and prowess as a fighter were known to the earl; he had no confidence that he could hold out against that horde of seamen,

9. Ongentheow.

defend his wife and the ones he loved 2955
 from the shock of the attack. He retreated for shelter behind the earthwall. Then Hygelac swooped on the Swedes at bay, his banners swarmed into their refuge, his Geat forces drove forward to destroy the camp. 2960
 There in his gray hairs, Ongentheow was cornered, ringed around with swords.
 And it came to pass that the king's fate was in Eofor's hands,<sup>1</sup> and in his alone.
 Wulf, son of Wonred, went for him in anger, 2965 split him open so that blood came spurting from under his hair. The old hero still did not flinch, but parried fast, hit back with a harder stroke:
 the king turned and took him on. 2970
 Then Wonred's son, the brave Wulf, could land no blow against the aged lord.
 Ongentheow divided his helmet
 so that he buckled and bowed his bloodied head and dropped to the ground. But his doom held off. 2975
 Though he was cut deep, he recovered again.
 "With his brother down, the undaunted Eofor, Hygelac's thane, hefted his sword and smashed murderously at the massive helmet past the lifted shield. And the king collapsed, 2980
 the shepherd of people was sheared of life.
 Many then hurried to help Wulf, bandaged and lifted him, now that they were left masters of the blood-soaked battle-ground.
 One warrior stripped the other, 2985 looted Ongentheow's iron mail-coat, his hard sword-hilt, his helmet too,
 and carried the graith<sup>2</sup> to King Hygelac, he accepted the prize, promised fairly that reward would come, and kept his word. 2990
 For their bravery in action, when they arrived home, Eofor and Wulf were overloaded by Hrethel's son, Hygelac the Geat, with gifts of land and linked rings that were worth a fortune. They had won glory, 2995 so there was no gainsaying his generosity.
 And he gave Eofor his only daughter to bide at home with him, an honor and a bond.
 "So this bad blood between us and the Swedes, this vicious feud, I am convinced, 3000 is bound to revive; they will cross our borders and attack in force when they find out that Beowulf is dead. In days gone by

1. The killing of Ongentheow by Eofor is described in lines 2486–89.

2. Armor.

when our warriors fell and we were undefended,
 he kept our coffers and our kingdom safe. 3005
 He worked for the people, but as well as that he behaved like a hero.

We must hurry now

to take a last look at the king and launch him, lord and lavisher of rings, on the funeral road. His royal pyre 3010 will melt no small amount of gold:
 heaped there in a hoard, it was bought at heavy cost, and that pile of rings he paid for at the end with his own life will go up with the flame, be furled in fire: treasure no follower 3015 will wear in his memory, nor lovely woman link and attach as a torque around her neck—but often, repeatedly, in the path of exile they shall walk bereft, bowed under woe, now that their leader's laugh is silenced, 3020 high spirits quenched. Many a spear dawn-cold to the touch will be taken down and waved on high; the swept harp won't waken warriors, but the raven winging darkly over the doomed will have news, tidings for the eagle of how he hoked<sup>3</sup> and ate, 3025
 how the wolf and he made short work of the dead."

Such was the drift of the dire report that gallant man delivered. He got little wrong in what he told and predicted.

The whole troop 3030

rose in tears, then took their way to the uncanny scene under Earnaness.<sup>4</sup>
 There, on the sand, where his soul had left him, they found him at rest, their ring-giver from days gone by. The great man 3035 had breathed his last. Beowulf the king had indeed met with a marvelous death.

But what they saw first was far stranger:
 the serpent on the ground, gruesome and vile, lying facing him. The fire-dragon 3040 was scaresomely burned, scorched all colors.
 From head to tail, his entire length was fifty feet. He had shimmered forth on the night air once, then winged back down to his den; but death owned him now, 3045
 he would never enter his earth-gallery again.
 Beside him stood pitchers and piled-up dishes, silent flagons, precious swords eaten through with rust, ranged as they had been while they waited their thousand winters under ground. 3050

3. Rooted about, a Northern Irish word [adapted from translator's note].

4. The place where Beowulf fought the dragon; it means "Eagleness."

That huge cache, gold inherited from an ancient race, was under a spell—which meant no one was ever permitted to enter the ring-hall unless God Himself, mankind's Keeper, True King of Triumphs, 3055 allowed some person pleasing to Him—and in His eyes worthy—to open the hoard.

What came about brought to nothing the hopes of the one who had wrongly hidden riches under the rock-face. First the dragon slew 3060 that man among men, who in turn made fierce amends and settled the feud. Famous for his deeds a warrior may be, but it remains a mystery where his life will end, when he may no longer dwell in the mead-hall among his own. 3065

So it was with Beowulf, when he faced the cruelty and cunning of the mound-guard. He himself was ignorant of how his departure from the world would happen.
 The highborn chiefs who had buried the treasure declared it until doomsday so accursed 3070 that whoever robbed it would be guilty of wrong and grimly punished for their transgression, hasped in hell-bonds in heathen shrines.
 Yet Beowulf's gaze at the gold treasure
 when he first saw it had not been selfish. 3075

Wiglaf, son of Weohstan, spoke:
 "Often when one man follows his own will many are hurt. This happened to us.
 Nothing we advised could ever convince the prince we loved, our land's guardian, 3080
 not to vex the custodian of the gold, let him lie where he was long accustomed,
 lurk there under earth until the end of the world.
 He held to his high destiny. The hoard is laid bare, but at a grave cost; it was too cruel a fate 3085 that forced the king to that encounter.

I have been inside and seen everything amassed in the vault. I managed to enter although no great welcome awaited me under the earthwall. I quickly gathered up 3090 a huge pile of the priceless treasures handpicked from the hoard and carried them here where the king could see them. He was still himself, alive, aware, and in spite of his weakness
 he had many requests. He wanted me to greet you 3095 and order the building of a barrow that would crown the site of his pyre, serve as his memorial, in a commanding position, since of all men to have lived and thrived and lorded it on earth his worth and due as a warrior were the greatest. 3100
 Now let us again go quickly and feast our eyes on that amazing fortune heaped under the wall. I will show the way and take you close to those coffers packed with rings and bars of gold. Let a bier be made and got ready quickly when we come out and then let us bring the body of our lord, the man we loved, to where he will lodge for a long time in the care of the Almighty.”

3105

Then Weohstan's son, stalwart to the end, had orders given to owners of dwellings,
 many people of importance in the land, to fetch wood from far and wide
 for the good man's pyre:

3110

“Now shall flame consume
 our leader in battle, the blaze darken round him who stood his ground in the steel-hail, when the arrow-storm shot from bowstrings pelted the shield-wall. The shaft hit home.
 Feather-fledged, it finned the barb in flight.”

3115

Next the wise son of Weohstan called from among the king's thanes a group of seven: he selected the best and entered with them, the eighth of their number, under the God-cursed roof; one raised a lighted torch and led the way.

3120

No lots were cast for who should loot the hoard for it was obvious to them that every bit of it lay unprotected within the vault, there for the taking. It was no trouble to hurry to work and haul out the priceless store. They pitched the dragon over the cliff-top, let tide's flow and backwash take the treasure-minder.

3125

Then coiled gold was loaded on a cart in great abundance, and the gray-haired leader, the prince on his bier, borne to Hronesness.

3135

The Geat people built a pyre for Beowulf, stacked and decked it until it stood foursquare, hung with helmets, heavy war-shields and shining armor, just as he had ordered.
 Then his warriors laid him in the middle of it,
 mourning a lord far-famed and beloved.

3140

On a height they kindled the hugest of all funeral fires; fumes of woodsmoke billowed darkly up, the blaze roared and drowned out their weeping, wind died down and flames wrought havoc in the hot bone-house, burning it to the core. They were disconsolate and wailed aloud for their lord's decease.

3145

A Geat woman too sang out in grief;
 with hair bound up, she unburdened herself

3150 of her worst fears, a wild litany of nightmare and lament: her nation invaded, enemies on the rampage, bodies in piles, slavery and abasement. Heaven swallowed the smoke. 3155

Then the Geat people began to construct a mound on a headland, high and imposing,
 a marker that sailors could see from far away,
 and in ten days they had done the work.

It was their hero's memorial; what remained from the fire they housed inside it, behind a wall 3160

as worthy of him as their workmanship could make it.
 And they buried torques in the barrow, and jewels and a trove of such things as trespassing men had once dared to drag from the hoard. 3165

They let the ground keep that ancestral treasure, gold under gravel, gone to earth,
 as useless to men now as it ever was.

Then twelve warriors rode around the tomb, chieftains' sons, champions in battle, 3170
 all of them distraught, chanting in dirges, mourning his loss as a man and a king.

They extolled his heroic nature and exploits and gave thanks for his greatness; which was the proper thing, for a man should praise a prince whom he holds dear 3175
 and cherish his memory when that moment comes when he has to be convoyed from his bodily home.

So the Geat people, his hearth-companions, sorrowed for the lord who had been laid low.

They said that of all the kings upon earth 3180
 he was the man most gracious and fair-minded, kindest to his people and keenest to win fame.

MARIE DE FRANCE

1150?–1200?

“Marie ai num, si sui de France” (Marie is my name, and I am from France). With these words, the author of the Lais tells us her name and her homeland. Yet Marie was an English writer, composing in the Anglo-Norman dialect of French that had become the mother tongue of the English ruling classes following the Norman Conquest a century before. Her short, intense stories of love and loss reflect the complex cultural encounter of Celtic folktale, Anglo-French court setting, and English landscape, and they set the stage for the flowering of the romance genre in the last decades of the twelfth century.

We know little about Marie beyond what she herself tells us in the Prologue to her Lais, which is reprinted here, and in the closing lines of her collection of animal fables. She is likely to have been a nun—possibly an abbess in a position of authority within her community; in offering her collection of twelve Lais as a gift to Henry II, King of England and Duke of Normandy, she uses terms that presume some degree of familiarity, perhaps even a family relationship. It was not uncommon in twelfth-century Europe for the illegitimate female offspring of noble or royal figures to enter convents, less because these women were pious than because it was expedient to prevent them from marrying political rivals and bearing children who might complicate the smooth order of future succession. Marie's place in the world, attached at once to the cloister and to the court, may reflect some such family history.

In addition to her Fables, which she claims to have translated from a now-lost text by the Anglo-Saxon king Alfred, Marie's other surviving works include the mysterious journey to the afterlife recounted in Saint Patrick's Purgatory (adapted from a Latin original) and an account of the life and works of the English saint Audrey. Her poems stand at the intersection of oral and written forms of literature, as well as at the crossroads of cultures—not just English and French, but Welsh or Breton as well. Celtic cultures had survived the warfare of English and French barons, both in the mountains of Wales and in Cornwall, to the north of the English Channel, and in the upper regions of Normandy and Brittany, to the south. In her Prologue, Marie describes her desire to preserve these Breton songs: having heard them sung, she writes, "I don't want to neglect or forget them." She expresses a similar sentiment in the epilogue to her Fables, in which she tells the reader her own name "pur remembrance," "for remembrance." Through the Lais, Marie has ensured that both she and the ancient songs she has written down will live on in memory.

The two lais included here, "Bisclavret" and "Laüstic," represent two very different types: the first, more elaborate, offers a very fully developed psychology of the main characters, while the second, shorter and jewel-like, crystallizes an essential truth about the nature of love in poetic form. In "Bisclavret," we find the tale of a man who has a secret: he spends part of each week wandering the forest in the form of a wolf, a bisclavret. His wife learns the truth and tricks him, condemning him to exile as an animal in the wild. Ovid's Metamorphoses (especially the story of Actaeon who, changed into a stag, is chased by hunting dogs) looms in the background of this tale of animal-human nature. The royal court where Bisclavret finds justice is echoed elsewhere in Marie's lais, in the court of King Arthur. Marie was the first to bring these oral Breton materials into the mainstream of European literature, setting a precedent for her French successor, Chrétien de Troyes (in his various Arthurian romances) and, later, for the anonymous English poet who wrote Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and Thomas Malory in his Morte d'Arthur.

The theme of vengeance that emerges in "Bisclavret" also haunts "Laüstic," though the final note of this short tale is the transcendence and ultimate triumph of love. The affair between a woman and her husband's friend comes to a brutal end when the beautiful nightingale, whose nighttime song fuels the dreams of lovers, is killed by the jealous husband. The body of the bird becomes a token of their forbidden passion, first wrapped by the lady in an embroidered shroud, and then preserved by her lover in a bejeweled reliquary. The miniature lai, like the miniature sarcophagus, remains as a potent reminder of the power of love.

From the Lais<sup>1</sup>Prologue

WHOM God has given intelligence and the great gift of eloquence must not conceal these, or keep still,
 but share and show them with good will. 4
 When much is heard of some good thing, then comes its first fine flowering;
 when many more have praise to give,
 these blossoms flourish, spread, and thrive. 8
 Among the ancients, custom was—Priscian<sup>2</sup> can testify to this—that in their books they made obscure much that they wrote; this would ensure 12 that wise folk of another day, needing to know what these texts say, could gloss these works, and with their sense give all the more intelligence. 16 Savants and scholars were aware that in their strivings, more and more they sensed the works' great subtlety increasingly, as time went by. 20
 And thus, too, they knew how to guard from error in time afterward.
 He who would keep from vice and sin must some great arduous work begin; 24 struggle and study, strive to know, and doing so avoid much woe,
 free from great suffering and regret.
 Thus I began to give some thought 28 to telling some good story, that taken from Latin, I would put into French; but then I would win no glory there; so much is done! 32
 I thought of lais<sup>3</sup> that I had heard and did not doubt; I felt assured that these first writers who began these lais, who told them, made them known, 36 wished, for remembrance, to record adventures, stories, they had heard.
 I too have heard them; I do not wish them abandoned, lost, forgot. 40
 Thus I made rhymes and poetry late into night-time, wakefully!

1. Translated by Dorothy Gilbert. Lines of Marie's poetry are numbered every four lines instead of the usual five to emphasize her use of couplets.

2. Latin grammarian (early 6th century C.E.), widely read in the Middle Ages.

3. Narrative poems of adventure and romance, written in octosyllabic couplets (French).

To honor you, most noble King,<sup>4</sup> courtly and skilled in everything, 44 to whom all joy makes obeisance, in whose heart roots all excellence,
 to gather lais I undertook,
 to rhyme, make, tell; this was my work. 48
 I in my heart thought this I'd do, fair Sire: present this work to you.
 If it should please you to receive my gift, for all the days I live 52
 I shall be joyful; you shall give great happiness. Do not believe me proud, presumptuous; but hear as I begin my tales; give ear. 56

Bisclavret

In crafting lays, I won't forget
 —I mustn't—that of Bisclavret;
Bisclavret: so named in Breton;
 But Garwaf in the Norman tongue. 4

One used to hear, in times gone by —it often happened, actually—men became werewolves, many men, and in the forest made their den. 8
 A werewolf is a savage beast;
 in his blood-rage, he makes a feast of men, devours them, does great harms, and in vast forests lives and roams. 12
 Well, for now, let us leave all that;
 I want to speak of Bisclavret.

In Brittany<sup>5</sup> there lived a lord —wondrous, the praise of him I've heard— 16 a good knight, handsome, known to be all that makes for nobility.
 Prized, he was, much, by his liege lord;
 by all his neighbors was adored. 20
 He'd wed a wife, a worthy soul,
 most elegant and beautiful;
 he loved her, and she loved him, too.
 One thing she found most vexing, though. 24
 During the week he'd disappear for three whole days, she knew not where;
 what happened to him, where he went
 His household, too, was ignorant. 28
 He returned home again one day;
 high-spirited and happy. She

4. Henry II, king of England, who also held substantial territories in France.

5. A Celtic region of present-day northwestern France.

straightway proceeded to inquire:

"My fair sweet friend," she said, "fair sire,
if I just dared, I'd ask of you a thing I dearly wish to know, except that I'm so full of fear of your great anger, husband dear." 32 36

When he had heard this, he embraced her,
drew her to him, clasped and kissed her.

"Lady," he said, "come, ask away!
Nothing you wish, dear, certainly
I will not tell you, that I know." 40

"Faith!" she said, "you have cured me so!
But I have such anxiety,
sire, on those days you part from me, my heart is full of pain. I fear so much that I will lose you, dear.
Oh, reassure me, hastily! 44

If you do not, I soon will die.
Tell me, dear husband; tell me, pray,
What do you do? Where do you stay?
It seems to me you've found another!
You wrong me, if you have a lover!" 48 52

"Lady," he said, "have mercy, do!
I'll have much harm in telling you.
I'd lose your love, if I should tell and be lost to myself, as well." 56

Now when the wife was thus addressed,
it seemed to her to be no jest.
Oftimes she begged, with all her skill, coaxing and flattering, until at last he told her all he did,
the tale entire; kept nothing hid. 60

"Dame, I become a bisclavret.
in the great forest I'm afoot,
in deepest woods, near thickest trees,
and live on prey I track and seize." 64

When he had told the whole affair, she persevered; she asked him where his clothes were; was he naked there? 68

"Lady," he said, "I go all bare."

"Tell me, for God's sake, where you put your clothes!"

"Oh, I'll not tell you that:
I would be lost, you must believe,
if it were seen just how I live.
Bisclavret would I be, forever;
never could I be helped then, never,
till I got back my clothes, my own;
that's why their cache<sup>6</sup> must not be known." 72 76

"Sire," said his lady in reply,
"more than all earth I love you. Why 80 hide, why have secrets in your life?

 Why, why mistrust your own dear wife?
 That does not seem a loving thought.
 What have I done? What sin, what fault has caused your fear, in any way?
 You must be fair! You have to say!" 84

So she harassed and harried him
 So much, he finally gave in. 88

"Lady," he said, "just by the wood,
 just where I enter, by the road, there's an old chapel. Now, this place has often brought me help and grace.
 There is a stone there, in the brush, hollow and wide, beneath a bush.
 In brush and under bush, I store
 my clothes, till I head home once more." 92 96

The lady was amazed to hear:
 She blushed deep red, from her pure fear.
 Terror, she felt, at this strange tale.
 She thought what means she could avail herself of how to leave this man. 100
 She could not lie with him again.

In these parts lived a chevalier<sup>7</sup> who had long been in love with her. 104 Much did he pray and sue, and give largesse in service to his love;
 she had not loved him, nor had she granted him any surety 108 that she, too, loved; but now she sent this knight the news of her intent.

"Friend," she wrote him, "rejoice, and know that for which you have suffered so,
 I grant you now without delay;
 I'll not hold back in any way.
 My body and my love I grant;
 make me your mistress, if you want!" 112 116

Kindly he thanked her, and her troth accepted; she received his oath.
 She told her lover how her lord went to the wood, and what he did, what he became, once he was there. 120
 She told in detail how and where to find the road and clothing cache;
 and then she sent him for the stash. 124

Thus was Bisclavret trapped for life;
 ruined, betrayed, by his own wife.
 Because his absences were known, people assumed he'd really gone, 128
 this time, for good. They searched around, enough, but he could not be found, for all their inquiries. At last everyone let the matter rest. 132

 The lady wed the chevalier who'd been so long in love with her.

A whole year, after this event,
 thus passed. The king went out to hunt, 136 went to the forest straightaway, there where the bisclavret now lay.
 The hunting dogs were now unleashed and soon they found the changeling beast. 140
 All day they flung themselves at him,
 all day pursued, both dogs and men;
 they almost had him. Now they'd rend and tear him; now he'd meet his end. 144
 His eye, distinguishing, could see the king; to beg his clemency he seized the royal stirrup, put a kiss upon the leg and foot. 148
 The king, observing, felt great fear.
 Calling his men, he cried, "Come here!"
 "Lords!" he said, "Come and look at this!
 See what a marvel is this kiss, 152
 this humble, gracious gesturing!
 That's a man's mind; it begs the king for mercy. Now, drive back the hounds!
 See that none strike or give it wounds. 156
 This beast has mind; it has intent.
 Come, hurry up! It's time we went.
 I'll give protection for this beast.
 And for today, the hunt has ceased." 160

The king had turned around, at that;
 following him, the bisclavret close by; he would not lose the king, abandon him, for anything. 164
 The king then led the beast, to bring it to the castle, marvelling, rejoicing at it, for he'd never,
 seen such a wondrous creature, ever. 168
 He loved the wolf and held it dear and he charged every follower that, for his love, they guard it well and not mistreat the animal. 172
 No one must strike it; and, he'd said,
 it must be watered and well fed.
 Gladly his men now guarded it.
 Among the knights, the bisclavret 176
 now lived, and slept close by the king;
 everyone loved it, cherishing its noble bearing and its charm.
 It never wanted to do harm, 180 and where the king might walk or ride, there it must be, just at his side,

 wherever he might go or move;
 so well it showed its loyal love. 184

What happened after that? Now, hear.
 The king held court; he had appear all barons, vassals; gave commands to all who held from him their lands, 188 to help a festival take place, serving with elegance and grace.
 Among those chevaliers was he —so richly dressed, so splendidly!— 192
 who'd wed the wife of Bisclavret.
 Little he knew or thought just yet that he would find his foe so near!
 Soon as he came, this chevalier, 196 to court, and Bisclavret could see the man, he ran up furiously, sank in his teeth, and dragged him close.
 Many the injuries and woes 200
 he would have suffered, but the king called out commands, while brandishing his staff. The beast rushed, twice, that day, to bite the man; all felt dismay, 204 for none had seen the beast display toward anyone, in any way, such viciousness. There must be reason, the household said, for him to seize on 208
 the knight, who must have done him wrong;
 the wish for vengeance seemed so strong.

And so they let the matter rest till the conclusion of the feast. 212
 The barons took their leave, each one,
 each to his castle and his home.
 All my good judgment counsels me he who was first to leave was he 216 set upon by the bisclavret.
 Small wonder the beast had such hate!

Not too long after this occurred
 —such is my thought, so I have heard— 220 into the forest went the king
 —so noble and so wise a being—where he'd first found the bisclavret.
 The animal was with him yet. 224
 The night of this return, the king took, in this countryside, lodging.
 And this the wife of Bisclavret well knew. Dressed fetchingly, she set 228 out to have speech with him next day;
 rich gifts were part of her display.

Bisclavret saw her come. No man had strength to hold him as he ran 232 up to his wife in rage and fury.
 Hear of his vengeance! Hear the story!
 He tore her nose off, then and there.
 What worse could he have done to her? 236
 From all sides now, and full of threat men ran and would have killed him, but a wise man expeditiously spoke to the king. "Listen to me! 240
 He's been with you, this animal;
 there is not one man of us all who has not, long since, had to see and travel with him, frequently, 244 and he has harmed no one, not once shown viciousness nor violence save just now, as you saw him do.
 And by the faith I owe to you, 248 he has some bitter quarrel with her and with her husband, her seigneur.
 She was wife to that chevalier whom you so prized, and held so dear, 252 who disappeared some time ago.
 What happened, no one seems to know.
 Put her to torture. She may state something, this dame, to indicate 256
 why the beast feels for her such hate.
 Force her to speak! She'll tell it straight.
 We've all known marvels, chanced to see strange events, here in Brittany." 260
 The King thought this advice was fair;
 and he detained the chevalier.
 The lady, too, he held; and she he put to pain and agony. 264 Part out of pain, part out of fear,
 she made her former lord's case clear:
 how she had managed to betray her lord, and take his clothes away; 268
 the story he had told to her,
 what he became, and how, and where;
 and how, when once his clothes were gone
 —stolen—he was not seen again. 272
 She gave her theory and her thought:
 Surely this beast was Bisclavret.
 These spoils, these clothes, the king demanded;
 whether she would or no, commanded 276 that she go back and find them, get and give them to the bisclavret.

When they were put in front of him
 he didn't seem to notice them. 280
 The king's wise man spoke up once more

—the one who'd counselled him before—“Fair sire, this will not do at all!

We can't expect this animal, 284

in front of you, sire, to get dressed and change his semblance of a beast.

You don't grasp what this means, my king!

—or see his shame and suffering. 288

Into your room have led this beast;

with him, his clothes. Let him get dressed;

For quite some time, leave him alone.

If he's a man, that is soon known!” 292

The king himself led the bisclavret;

and on him all the doors were shut.

They waited. And then finally two barons, with the king, all three, 296 entered. What a discovery!

There on the king's bed, they could see asleep, the knight. How the king ran up to the bed, to embrace his man, 300

kiss him, a hundred times and more!

Quickly he acted to restore his lands, as soon as possible;

more he bestowed than I can tell. 304

His wife was banished. She was chased out of the country, and disgraced, and chased out, travelling with her,

her mate and co-conspirator. 308

Quite a few children had this dame, who in their way achieved some fame

for looks, for a distinctive face; numbers of women of her race 312

—it's true—were born without a nose.

Noseless they lived, the story goes.

And this same story you have heard truly occurred; don't doubt my word. 316

I made this lai of Bisclavret

so no one, ever, will forget.

Laüstic

There's an adventure, I will say, of which the Bretons made a lai.

Laüstic is the name it's called in its own country, so I'm told. 4

In French it's “Rossignol,” this tale;

in proper English, “Nightingale.”

Near St. Malo<sup>1</sup> there was a town that in that region had renown. 8

1. A seaport in northwest France, in Brittany.

There lived two knights, and side by side their mansions, strong and fortified.
 For knightly valor each had fame,
 and gave their city a good name. 12
 One had a wife, an excellent lady, wise, courtly, elegant;
 a marvel was she, so soignée,<sup>2</sup> and groomed with great propriety. 16
 The other of these chevaliers, a bachelor, was by his peers
 well known for prowess, and great valor.
 With pleasure he did deeds of honor. 20
 Much he tourneyed; with much largesse gave of what he himself possessed.
 He loved his neighbor's wife, and he begged and sued so persistently 24 and had such qualities, that she above all, loved him ardently;
 partly, for all the good she heard;
 partly, he lived close by, this lord. 28
 Well these two loved, and prudently, and with great care and secrecy, making sure they were not detected, hindered, or noticed, or suspected; 32 and this they could do easily because their dwellings lay nearby.
 Nearby, their mansions and their halls, their keeps, their dungeons. But no walls, 36
 no barrier, except for one,
 a great high wall of dark-hued stone.
 Still, in her bedroom, when she stood right at the window, then she could 40 talk to her love, her chevalier, she speak to him and he to her;
 they could toss tokens to each other,
 throw little gifts, lover to lover. 44
 Nothing displeased them in that place,
 they were at ease there, face to face, except that they could only see—not join in pleasure utterly, 48 for when he was at home, her lord had his wife under close, strict guard.
 Still they made opportunity;
 and thus by night and thus by day 52
 they met; they spoke; they found a way and none who watched could say them nay when to their windows they would each come, and there speak their loving speech. 56
 For a long time they loved each other, until one summer, when the weather

2. Well groomed and elegantly dressed (French).

had made the fields and forests green and gardens, orchards, bloom again; 60 above the flowers, with great joy small birds sang sweetest melody.
 He whose desire for love is strong
 —no wonder that he heeds their song! 64
 The truth about this knight, I'll tell;
 he heard the song; he heard it well;
 the lady, too, heard in her place;
 thus they could love; court; speak, and gaze. 68
 When the moon shone, the lady would rise often from her husband's bed, rise from beside him, while he slept and softly, in her mantle wrapped, 72 cautiously to the window go to see her lover, whom she knew lived as she did, lived for her sight.
 She'd stay awake most of the night. 76
     In gazing thus was their delight, since nothing more could be their fate.
 Such was the case. So often she arose, her husband angrily 80 demanded of her, frequently, where did she go, what for, and why?
 The lady answered with this word:
     “My sire: he who has never heard 84
 the nightingale, has not known joy ever, in all this world. That's why, that's where. So sweetly I have heard it sing at night, enchanting bird, 88
 so great my longing, my delight,
 I cannot close my eyes at night.”
     When he had heard her answer thus,
 he laughed, enraged and furious, 92 and he resolved that without fail
 he would entrap the nightingale.
 Now every squire within that house put net or snare or trap to use 96 throughout the garden. Everywhere, on hazel, chestnut, lay a snare or gluey bird-lime. So they got the nightingale; so it was caught. 100
     When they had tricked and trapped the bird alive, they brought it to the lord.
 Oh, he was happy when they came!
 Right to the chamber of his dame 104
 he hurried. “Lady, where are you?
 Come talk to us, my lady, do!
 I've trapped your nightingale, the one that's kept you sleepless for so long. 108
 Now, finally, you'll sleep in peace—

these night excursions now can cease.”

She understood, as he spoke thus,
and full of grief, and furious 112 asked for the bird. But her demands were vain; in rage, with his two hands he broke its neck. So this seigneur, spiteful and vicious, like a boor 116 killed it. He threw the corpse at her.
It fell on her chemise and there bloodied her breast a little bit.
He left the room; at once went out. 120

She gathered up the little body, weeping vehemently. The lady cursed those who caught the bird and laid snares, nets, devices, all they made. 124
What joy was taken, wrenched away!
“Alas,” she said, “Oh, wretched me!
No more shall I arise at night,
go to the window for a sight 128
of my dear love and find him there.
And one thing I do know for sure:
he’ll think me weak and faint of heart.
I must act now. Let me take thought. 132
I’ll send my love the nightingale, make known to him this vicious tale.”

She found a piece of samite,<sup>3</sup> wrought with gold, and writing worked throughout; 136 in it she wrapped the little bird.
One of her servants she gave word, gave him her message, and he went to her ami,<sup>4</sup> where it was sent, 140
So to the chevalier he came and gave him greetings from his dame, gave the full message, told the tale, delivered up the nightingale. 144
When the full story was made known
—he gave it good attention!—
he felt much sorrow. This knight, though, was not a boor, nor was he slow 148 of sense. A tiny reliquary he soon had forged, for him to carry:
not iron; not steel; pure gold, with stones most rare and precious, lovely ones; 152
a lid that was a perfect fit.
The little bird was placed in it, the vessel sealed. The chevalier carried it with him everywhere. 156

This story, more and more, got known;
it was not secret very long.
Of it the Bretons made their lay;
It’s called Laüstic to this day. 160

3. Luxurious, heavy silk.

4. Lover (French).

---

DANTE ALIGHIERI

1265–1321

---

Midway in our life's journey, I went astray / from the straight road and woke to find myself / alone in a dark wood." With these opening words, Dante compels his reader to inhabit the point of view of a narrator who, halfway through not "my" but "our" lifetime, suddenly realizes that he is lost. His life is thus our life, and the ethical or righteous "straight road" that the narrator hopes to rediscover also comes to be the reader's own goal. Yet this identification of reader and narrator is countered, again and again in The Divine Comedy, by an insistence on the specific circumstances of Dante's own life: traveling into the underworld and into the other realms of the afterlife, we meet his old teacher, Brunetto Latini; the father of his close friend Guido Cavalcanti; his great-great-grandfather, Cacciaguida; and, most important, the beautiful Beatrice Portinari, whom Dante has loved (he tells us) since they were both children. In spite of the particularity of the details of this afterlife—or, perhaps, because of them—the reader constantly identifies with the narrator, experiencing the painful turns of the journey as well as the joyful expectation of heavenly bliss at the road's end.

LIFE AND TIMES

Dante Alighieri was born and raised in Florence, a northern Italian city that was at once central to his sense of identity and—as depicted in The Divine Comedy—a place that he loathed and despised, a degenerate community rife with corruption and discord. During the years around 1300, Florence, like other cities in northern Italy, was caught up in a large-scale confrontation between forces favoring the power of the church and those favoring the independence of city-states. Dante quickly became deeply involved with these issues, both as a member of the political governing body within the city of Florence and in his role as envoy from the city to the seat of the papal government in Rome. Dante's own view—expressed most explicitly in his De Monarchia (1318), a political treatise that in some ways anticipates Machiavelli's The Prince—was that secular rule and ecclesiastical rule should be clearly divided. Dante argued that a strong ruler in the person of an idealized emperor was necessary for the church to appropriately exercise its moral and religious authority. Because it sought to place limitations on the exercise of political power by the church, De Monarchia was immediately condemned; it remained on the list (or "Index") of books that Catholics are forbidden to read until 1881.

Florence had taken a leading role in the disputes concerning secular and ecclesiastical power, split first into the factions of the Guelphs (who supported the pope) and the Ghibelines (who supported the Holy Roman Emperor). By the time Dante became involved in Florentine politics, the Guelphs had become dominant within the city, but an internal fracture soon developed between the Black Guelphs, who continued to support Pope Boniface VIII, and the White Guelphs, who had come to oppose his despotism. Dante was allied with the latter, and when he was in Rome on a diplomatic mission, the Black Guelphs seized control of the city. Dante was consequently forbidden from ever reentering the city of his birth, under penalty of death by burning at the stake. Even worse, the split into the White and Black parties divided Dante's family, as the Black Guelphs were led by the Donatis—relatives of his wife, Gemma Donati—and his wife and their four children remained in Florence.

Deeply embittered by the experience of exile, Dante spent the next twenty years wandering from city to city, all the while continuing with his political writing as well as his poetic efforts. The scandal arising from De Monarchia undoubtedly hampered Dante's efforts to return to Florence. In his Divine Comedy, he movingly recalls "how bitter as salt and stone / is the bread of others," and laments "how hard the way that goes / up and down / stairs that are never your own." Dante never saw his sentence of exile lifted; indeed, Florence's city council finally revoked it only in 2008. That the vote was not unanimous—the motion passed 19 to 5—suggests that the city's political divisions may have lingered for seven hundred years.

WORK

Dante himself called his monumental poem simply the Commedia, or "comedy"; the adjective "divine" was added later by Giovanni Boccaccio, author of The Decameron, the other great work of medieval Italian literature. Boccaccio thereby signaled not just the subject matter of the work—that is, the realm of the afterlife, including the domains of hell, purgatory, and heaven—but also the elevated style in which it was written. The claim of direct inspiration by God, which Dante makes explicitly throughout the work, was taken at face value by the first generations of commentators, who accepted the work as the faithful poetic record of a real visionary experience. The theological content of the Comedy is both dense and elaborate: perhaps the most ambitious aspect of the poem's theology centers on purgatory, a place where souls are able to do penance for their sins even after death, to which Dante devotes the second of the three parts of his work. Purgatory would not become official Christian doctrine until well after the Comedy was completed, but Dante was responding to contemporary popular beliefs in the ability of the prayers of the living to affect the condition of the souls of the dead. He also reflects contemporary theological views of the persistence of the union of body and soul even after death, especially in the way that the shades that populate the afterworld of The Divine Comedy retain their individual bodily features though their flesh has been replaced by empty form. For modern readers, the term "comedy" might seem peculiar, conditioned as we are to associate comedy with laughter, just as we associate tragedy with tears. For medieval readers, however, following classical notions of genre, a comedy was simply a story that ended on a high note, with joy and—in the case of The Divine Comedy—with the narrator literally being lifted up into the heavens.

The Divine Comedy is divided into three books; each charts a different realm of the afterlife, from the depths of Hell in the Inferno, up the mountain of Purgatory in the Purgatorio, and finally through the ever-higher spheres of Heaven in the Paradiso (only the Inferno is included in this Anthology). The three parts form a single path, as the narrator traverses a rugged landscape marked by hills, ravines, treacherous pathways, and difficult stairways, relying throughout on the help of a guide. For the journey through Hell and Purgatory, he follows in the footsteps of Virgil. The Roman poet is more than the literal guide of the wanderer within the fiction of the poem, for his Aeneid, the epic account of the fall of Troy and the foundation of Rome by Aeneas, is the constant poetic underpinning of Dante's own epic enterprise. But Virgil, as a pagan, cannot accompany him in Paradise: there Dante is led by Beatrice Portinari, his idealized love since childhood, who died in 1290. Both of these guides, as well as others who aid Dante along his way (such as Saint Lucy, who appears in the form of a golden eagle), are sent by a benefactor whom Dante only gradually comes to know: the donna gentil or "gracious lady" of Heaven, the Virgin Mary.

However important the theological message of The Divine Comedy, it never overshadows the essential realism and tangibility of the world Dante describes. From the horrible landscape of the ruined City of Dis seen in Hell to the brilliant light of the planets in Paradise, the reader's senses are continually stimulated. This stimulation is especially acute in the Inferno, where the vividness of the landscape is mirrored in the emotional affect of the narrator: he is moved to tears of pity by the sight of Paolo and Francesca, whose crime was to have given themselves over to the experience of love, but he shows contempt for the traitor Bocca degli Abati, kicking him and pulling out tufts of his hair. In keeping with Christian doctrine, the souls in this underworld have no material bodies, yet their shades retain the appearance of the bodies they had in life, and the punishments they suffer in Hell leave marks on their flesh. In the circle of schismatics, whose sin is that they have divided the community of the faithful, Dante finds Muhammad, the Prophet of Islam, his body "split . . . from his chin" down through his entrails. In this wound, the wrongful division of society, whether the body politic or the religious community, is made manifest on the canvas of the human body.

The structure of Hell, like that of Purgatory and Heaven, is highly symmetrical and full of numerical significance. The Divine Comedy is made up of one hundred chapters that Dante calls cantos (literally, "songs"), divided into three groups of thirty-three; the extra is added to the Inferno, which opens with an introductory canto. The numerological structure of the poem is also revealed in the landscape of each part. Hell is divided into nine circles, each containing a different category of sinners receiving their own proper form of punishment. The mountain of Purgatory is divided into nine parts as well, its seven main terraces (corresponding to the Seven Deadly Sins) surrounded by the entranceway of Ante-Purgatory and capped, at its summit, by the Earthly Paradise of Eden. Finally, the seven spheres of Heaven that lie above the mountain are brought to nine by the addition of those of the Fixed Stars and of the Primum Mobile—the first mover that imparts motion to all the other heavenly spheres. Beyond these nine are found only God and his angels. The constant play on the number three and its cube, three times three, highlights the Trinitarian theology that underlies the spiritual world of The Divine Comedy. Christian revelation places the earth at the center of the universe, surrounded by the spheres of the planets and of the stars and itself wounded by the cavernous pit of hell. At the base of the infernal pit, at the very center of the earth, Satan appears not wrapped in flames but rather frozen in a lake of ice. In Dante's memorable phrase, Satan is "the Great Worm of Evil / which bores through the world" as if it were a rotten apple.

Climbing over the hairy body of Satan and twisting through a narrow passage-way, Dante and his guide emerge from the bowels of the earth to the base of the mountain of Purgatory. A new mood infuses the work from this point on, as the hopefulness of the narrator reflects the very different circumstances of those who suffer pain in Purgatory. Here, unlike in Hell, suffering has a purpose, gradually redeeming the inhabitants from their former state of sin and enabling their souls to rise upward. At the summit of the mountain, Dante enters the Earthly Paradise of Eden, now hidden away in Purgatory to keep it from fallen humans. Here his wonder at a magnificent procession climaxes in a moment of staggering recognition: as he puts it, “I recognize / the tokens of the ancient flame.” Here Dante is met by Beatrice, his first love and the soul who will lead him the rest of the way on his upward journey.

Moving through the spheres of Paradise entails progressive dematerialization: instead of the rugged landscape of Hell, we find instead a sequence of spheres—each of which eclipses the last, each adorned with a symbolic form. In the sphere of the Crusaders, we see a mighty eagle; in the exalted spheres of the Empyrean, a celestial rose, studded with saintly souls. One of the very last of these symbolic forms is the great book “bound by love,” whose “scattered leaves” make up the universe. In this vivid image, the unity of divine revelation and of the written text of The Divine Comedy is complete. The love that binds the book reappears in the poem’s last lines, as the narrator describes the endless motion of the heavens, turned by “the Love that moves the sun and the other stars.” This earth-centered image of the cosmos would, two centuries after Dante, give way to a new worldview, with the sun at its center and with humanity placed in a very different relationship to its Creator.

FROM THE DIVINE COMEDY<sup>1</sup>

Inferno

Canto I

THE DARK WOOD OF ERROR

Midway in his allotted threescore years and ten, Dante comes to himself with a start and realizes that he has strayed from the True Way into the Dark Wood of Error (Worldliness). As soon as he has realized his loss, Dante lifts his eyes and sees the first light of the sunrise (the Sun is the Symbol of Divine Illumination) lighting the shoulders of a little hill (The Mount of Joy). It is the Easter Season, the time of resurrection, and the sun is in its equinoctial rebirth. This juxtaposition of joyous symbols fills Dante with hope and he sets out at once to climb directly up the Mount of Joy, but almost immediately his way is blocked by the Three Beasts of Worldliness: The Leopard of Malice and Fraud, The Lion of Violence and Ambition, and The She-Wolf of Incontinence. These beasts, and especially the She Wolf, drive him back despairing into the darkness of error. But just as all seems lost, a figure appears to him. It is the shade of Virgil, Dante’s symbol of Human Reason.

Virgil explains that he has been sent to lead Dante from error. There can, however, be no direct ascent past the beasts: the man who would escape them must go a longer and harder way. First he must descend through Hell (The Recognition of

1. Translated from the Italian by John Ciardi.

Sin), then he must ascend through Purgatory (The Renunciation of Sin), and only then may he reach the pinnacle of joy and come to the Light of God. Virgil offers to guide Dante, but only as far as Human Reason can go. Another guide (Beatrice, symbol of Divine Love) must take over for the final ascent, for Human Reason is self-limited. Dante submits himself joyously to Virgil's guidance and they move off.

Midway in our life's journey,<sup>2</sup> I went astray from the straight road<sup>3</sup> and woke to find myself alone in a dark wood. How shall I say 3 what wood that was! I never saw so drear, so rank, so arduous a wilderness!

Its very memory gives a shape to fear. 6

Death could scarce be more bitter than that place!
But since it came to good, I will recount all that I found revealed there by God's grace. 9

How I came to it I cannot rightly say, so drugged and loose with sleep had I become<sup>4</sup>
when I first wandered there from the True Way.<sup>5</sup> 12

But at the far end of that valley of evil whose maze had sapped my very heart with fear
I found myself before a little hill 15 and lifted up my eyes. Its shoulders glowed already with the sweet rays of that planet whose virtue leads men straight on every road,<sup>6</sup> 18 and the shining strengthened me against the fright whose agony had wracked the lake of my heart<sup>7</sup> through all the terrors of that piteous night. 21

Just as a swimmer, who with his last breath flounders ashore from perilous seas, might turn to memorize the wide water of his death— 24

2. Born in 1265, Dante was 35 in 1300, the fictional date of the poem. The biblical span of human life is 70 (see Psalms 90.10 and Isaiah 23.15).

3. See Proverbs 2.13–14 and 4.18–19, and also 2 Peter 2.15.

4. See Romans 13.11–12.

5. See Psalms 23.3.

6. The sun, which in the astronomical system of Dante's time was thought to be a planet that revolves around the earth.

7. This phrase refers to the inner chamber of the heart, a cavity that in the physiology of Dante's time was thought to be the location of fear. Not coincidentally, Dante's last stop in the Inferno ends at the lake of Cocytus (see 31.123).

so did I turn, my soul still fugitive from death's surviving image, to stare down that pass that none had ever left alive.<sup>8</sup> 27

And there I lay to rest from my heart's race till calm and breath returned to me. Then rose and pushed up that dead slope at such a pace 30 each footfall rose above the last.<sup>9</sup> And lo!

 almost at the beginning of the rise
 I faced a spotted Leopard, all tremor and flow 33 and gaudy pelt. And it would not pass, but stood so blocking my every turn that time and again

 I was on the verge of turning back to the wood. 36

This fell at the first widening of the dawn as the sun was climbing Aries with those stars that rode with him to light the new creation.<sup>1</sup> 39

Thus the holy hour and the sweet season of commemoration did much to arm my fear of that bright murderous beast with their good omen. 42

Yet not so much but what I shook with dread at sight of a great Lion that broke upon me raging with hunger, its enormous head 45 held high as if to strike a mortal terror into the very air. And down his track, a She-Wolf drove upon me, a starved horror 48

ravening and wasted beyond all belief.
 She seemed a rack for avarice, gaunt and craving.
 Oh many the souls she has brought to endless grief! 51

She brought such heaviness upon my spirit at sight of her savagery and desperation,
 I died from every hope of that high summit.<sup>2</sup> 54

8. This simile of Dante as the survivor of a passage through the sea invokes the story of the escape of the Israelites from Egypt through the Red Sea, a central metaphor throughout the Comedy (see Exodus 14). There is also probably an allusion to the opening of the Aeneid, where Aeneas and his men survive a storm.

9. The pilgrim is limping because he suffers from the injury of original sin.

1. In the Middle Ages it was thought that the world was created in spring, when the sun is in the constellation Aries.

2. The meaning of the leopard, lion, and "she-wolf" is open to a number of interpretations, the most plausible being that they represent the three major forms of sin found in Hell, respectively fraud, violence, and incontinence or immoderation (see Canto 11ff.). The structure of Hell indicates that the last is the least serious morally, but its role in this canto shows that it is the most difficult to overcome psychologically. Dante probably took the identities of these three beasts from a passage in Jeremiah 5.6.

And like a miser—eager in acquisition but desperate in self-reproach when Fortune's wheel turns to the hour of his loss—all tears and attrition 57

I wavered back; and still the beast pursued, forcing herself against me bit by bit till I slid back into the sunless wood. 60

And as I fell to my soul's ruin, a presence gathered before me on the discolored air, the figure of one who seemed hoarse from long silence.<sup>3</sup> 63

At sight of him in that friendless waste I cried:
 "Have pity on me, whatever thing you are,
 whether shade or living man." And it replied: 66

"Not man, though man I once was, and my blood was Lombard, both my parents Mantuan.<sup>4</sup>
 I was born, though late, sub Julio,<sup>5</sup> and bred 69

in Rome under Augustus in the noon of the false and lying gods. I was a poet and sang of old Anchises' noble son<sup>6</sup> 72

who came to Rome after the burning of Troy.
 But you—why do you return to these distresses instead of climbing that shining Mount of Joy 75 which is the seat and first cause of man's bliss?"

 "And are you then that Virgil and that fountain of purest speech?" My voice grew tremulous: 78

"Glory and light of poets! now may that zeal and love's apprenticeship that I poured out on your heroic verses serve me well! 81

For you are my true master and first author, the sole maker from whom I drew the breath of that sweet style whose measures have brought me honor. 84

See there, immortal sage, the beast I flee.
 For my soul's salvation, I beg you, guard me from her,
 for she has struck a mortal tremor through me." 87

3. The Roman poet Virgil's voice has not been heard since he died in 19 B.C.E.

4. Lombardy is the most northern area of Italy; Mantua is located to the east of Milan.

5. Virgil (70–19 B.C.E.) was born sub Julio (Latin), i.e., during the reign of Julius Caesar (assassinated in 44 B.C.E.), who was regarded by Dante as the founder of the Roman Empire.

6. Aeneas, the hero of Virgil's Aeneid. "Augustus": Julius Caesar's nephew and successor, who reigned as emperor from 27 B.C.E. to 14 C.E.

- And he replied, seeing my soul in tears:
 “He must go by another way who would escape this wilderness, for that mad beast that fleers 90
- before you there, suffers no man to pass.
 She tracks down all, kills all, and knows no glut,
 but, feeding, she grows hungrier than she was. 93
- She mates with any beast, and will mate with more before the Greyhound comes to hunt her down.<sup>7</sup>
 He will not feed on lands nor loot, but honor 96
- and love and wisdom will make straight his way.
 He will rise between Feltro and Feltro,<sup>8</sup> and in him shall be the resurrection and new day 99
- of that sad Italy for which Nisus died, and Turnus, and Euryalus, and the maid Camilla.<sup>9</sup>
 He shall hunt her through every nation of sick pride 102
- till she is driven back forever to Hell whence Envy first released her on the world.
 Therefore, for your own good, I think it well 105
- you follow me and I will be your guide and lead you forth through an eternal place.
 There you shall see the ancient spirits tried 108
- in endless pain, and hear their lamentation as each bemoans the second death of souls.<sup>1</sup>
 Next you shall see upon a burning mountain 111
- souls in fire and yet content in fire, knowing that whensoever it may be they yet will mount into the blessed choir.<sup>2</sup> 114
- To which, if it is still your wish to climb, a worthier spirit shall be sent to guide you.<sup>3</sup>
 With her shall I leave you, for the King of Time, 117

7. Dante's prediction of a modern political redeemer is so enigmatic that there can be no certainty of his identity. Most commentators think it is Cangrande (i.e., “Great Dog”) della Scala of Verona, Dante's benefactor after his exile from Florence.

8. Feltre and Montefeltro are towns that roughly marked the limits of Cangrande's domains. But other interpretations are possible.

 9. Characters in the Aeneid who die during Aeneas's conquest of Italy.

1. The second death is damnation; see Revelation 21.8.

2. The souls in Purgatory; the blessed are the saved in Paradise.

3. Beatrice.

who reigns on high, forbids me to come there since, living, I rebelled against his law.<sup>4</sup>
 He rules the waters and the land and air 120

and there holds court, his city and his throne.
 Oh blessed are they he chooses!" And I to him:
 "Poet, by that God to you unknown, 123 lead me this way. Beyond this present ill and worse to dread, lead me to Peter's gate and be my guide through the sad halls of Hell." 126

And he then: "Follow." And he moved ahead in silence, and I followed where he led.

Canto II

THE DESCENT

It is evening of the first day (Friday). Dante is following Virgil and finds himself tired and despairing. How can he be worthy of such a vision as Virgil has described? He hesitates and seems about to abandon his first purpose.

To comfort him Virgil explains how Beatrice descended to him in Limbo and told him of her concern for Dante. It is she, the symbol of Divine Love, who sends Virgil to lead Dante from error. She has come into Hell itself on this errand, for Dante cannot come to Divine Love unaided: Reason must lead him. Moreover, Beatrice has been sent with the prayers of the Virgin Mary (Compassion), and of Saint Lucia (Divine Light). Rachel (The Contemplative Life) also figures in the heavenly scene which Virgil recounts.

Virgil explains all this and reproaches Dante: how can he hesitate longer when such heavenly powers are concerned for him, and Virgil himself has promised to lead him safely?

Dante understands at once that such forces cannot fail him, and his spirits rise in joyous anticipation.

The light was departing. The brown air drew down all the earth's creatures, calling them to rest from their day-roving, as I, one man alone, 3 prepared myself to face the double war of the journey and the pity, which memory shall here set down, nor hesitate, nor err. 6

O Muses! O High Genius! Be my aid!
 O Memory, recorder of the vision, here shall your true nobility be displayed! 9

4. Virgil "rebelled" against God because he was not a Christian.

Thus I began: "Poet, you who must guide me, before you trust me to that arduous passage, look to me and look through me—can I be worthy?" 12

You sang how the father of Sylvius,<sup>5</sup> while still in corruptible flesh won to that other world, crossing with mortal sense the immortal sill. 15

But if the Adversary of all Evil weighing his consequence and who and what should issue from him, treated him so well— 18 that cannot seem unfitting to thinking men, since he was chosen father of Mother Rome and of her Empire by God's will and token. 21

Both, to speak strictly, were founded and foreknown as the established Seat of Holiness for the successors of Great Peter's throne.<sup>6</sup> 24

In that quest, which your verses celebrate,
 he learned those mysteries from which arose
 his victory and Rome's apostolate. 27

There later came the chosen vessel, Paul, bearing the confirmation of that Faith which is the one true door to life eternal.<sup>7</sup> 30

But I—how should I dare? By whose permission?
I am not Aeneas. I am not Paul.
 Who could believe me worthy of the vision? 33

How, then, may I presume to this high quest and not fear my own brashness? You are wise and will grasp what my poor words can but suggest." 36

As one who unwills what he wills, will stay strong purposes with feeble second thoughts until he spells all his first zeal away— 39

so I hung back and balked on that dim coast till thinking had worn out my enterprise, so stout at starting and so early lost. 42

5. I.e., Aeneas, the father (or grandfather) of Sylvius, who visited the underworld in Aeneid 6.
 6. The Apostle Peter is considered by the Roman Catholic Church to be the first pope.

 7. St. Paul; see 2 Corinthians 212. Both Peter and Paul were martyred in Rome.

“I understand from your words and the look in your eyes,” that shadow of magnificence answered me, “your soul is sunken in that cowardice 45 that bears down many men, turning their course and resolution by imagined perils, as his own shadow turns the frightened horse. 48

To free you of this dread I will tell you all of why I came to you and what I heard when first I pitied you. I was a soul 51

among the souls of Limbo, when a Lady so blessed and so beautiful, I prayed her to order and command my will, called to me.<sup>8</sup> 54

Her eyes were kindled from the lamps of Heaven.
 Her voice reached through me, tender, sweet, and low.
 An angel's voice, a music of its own: 57

‘O gracious Mantuan whose melodies live in earth's memory and shall live on till the last motion ceases in the skies, 60

my dearest friend, and fortune's foe, has strayed onto a friendless shore and stands beset by such distresses that he turns afraid 63

from the True Way, and news of him in Heaven rumors my dread he is already lost.
 I come, afraid that I am too late risen. 66

Fly to him and with your high counsel, pity, and with whatever need be for his good and soul's salvation, help him, and solace me. 69

It is I, Beatrice, who send you to him.
 I come from the blessed height for which I yearn.
 Love called me here. When amid Seraphim<sup>9</sup> 72

I stand again before my Lord, your praises shall sound in Heaven.’ She paused, and I began:
 ‘O Lady of that only grace that raises 75 feeble mankind within its mortal cycle above all other works God's will has placed within the heaven of the smallest circle;<sup>1</sup> 78

8. As we soon learn, the lady is Beatrice.

Paradise.

9. Angels who dwell in “the blessed height,”

1. The sphere of the moon.

so welcome is your command that to my sense,
 were it already fulfilled, it would yet seem tardy.
 I understand, and am all obedience. 81

But tell me how you dare to venture thus so far from the wide heaven of your joy to which your thoughts yearn back from this abyss.' 84

'Since what you ask,' she answered me, 'probes near the root of all, I will say briefly only how I have come through Hell's pit without fear. 87

Know then, O waiting and compassionate soul, that is to fear which has the power to harm,
 and nothing else is fearful even in Hell. 90

I am so made by God's all-seeing mercy your anguish does not touch me, and the flame of this great burning has no power upon me. 93

There is a Lady in Heaven<sup>2</sup> so concerned for him I send you to, that for her sake the strict decree is broken. She has turned 96 and called Lucia<sup>3</sup> to her wish and mercy saying: 'Thy faithful one is sorely pressed;

 in his distresses I commend him to thee.' 99

Lucia, that soul of light and foe of all cruelty, rose and came to me at once where I was sitting with the ancient Rachel,<sup>4</sup> 102 saying to me: 'Beatrice, true praise of God, why dost thou not help him who loved thee so that for thy sake he left the vulgar crowd? 105

Dost thou not hear his cries? Canst thou not see the death he wrestles with beside that river
 no ocean can surpass for rage and fury?<sup>5</sup> 108

No soul of earth was ever as rapt to seek its good or flee its injury as I was—when I had heard my sweet Lucia speak— 111

2. The Virgin Mary.

3. St. Lucy, a third-century martyr and the patron saint of those afflicted with poor or damaged sight.

4. Rachel signifies the contemplative life; see Genesis 29.16–17.

5. These are the metaphoric waters of 1.22–24.

to descend from Heaven and my blessed seat to you, laying my trust in that high speech that honors you and all who honor it.' 114

She spoke and turned away to hide a tear that, shining, urged me faster. So I came and freed you from the beast that drove you there, 117

blocking the near way to the Heavenly Height.
 And now what ails you? Why do you lag? Why this heartsick hesitation and pale fright 120

when three such blessed Ladies lean from Heaven in their concern for you and my own pledge of the great good that waits you has been given?" 123

As flowerlets drooped and puckered in the night turn up to the returning sun and spread their petals wide on his new warmth and light— 126

just so my wilted spirits rose again and such a heat of zeal surged through my veins that I was born anew. Thus I began: 129

"Blessèd be that Lady of infinite pity, and blessèd be thy taxed and courteous spirit that came so promptly on the word she gave thee. 132

Thy words have moved my heart to its first purpose.
 My Guide! My Lord! My Master! Now lead on:
 one will shall serve the two of us in this." 135

He turned when I had spoken, and at his back
 I entered on that hard and perilous track.

Canto III

THE VESTIBULE OF HELL

The Opportunists

The Poets pass the Gate of Hell and are immediately assailed by cries of anguish. Dante sees the first of the souls in torment. They are The Opportunists, those souls who in life were neither for good nor evil but only for themselves. Mixed with them are those outcasts who took no sides in the Rebellion of the Angels. They are neither in Hell nor out of it. Eternally unclassified, they race round and round pursuing a wavering banner that runs forever before them through the dirty air; and as they run they are pursued by swarms of wasps and hornets, who sting them and produce a constant flow of blood and putrid matter which trickles down the bodies of the sinners and is feasted upon by loathsome worms and maggots who coat the ground.

The law of Dante's Hell is the law of symbolic retribution. As they sinned so are they punished. They took no sides, therefore they are given no place. As they pursued the ever-shifting illusion of their own advantage, changing their courses with every changing wind, so they pursue eternally an elusive, ever-shifting banner. As their sin was a darkness, so they move in darkness. As their own guilty conscience pursued them, so they are pursued by swarms of wasps and hornets. And as their actions were a moral filth, so they run eternally through the filth of worms and maggots which they themselves feed.

Dante recognizes several, among them Pope Celestine V, but without delaying to speak to any of these souls, the Poets move on to Acheron, the first of the rivers of Hell. Here the newly-arrived souls of the damned gather and wait for monstrous Charon to ferry them over to punishment. Charon recognizes Dante as a living man and angrily refuses him passage. Virgil forces Charon to serve them, but Dante swoons with terror, and does not reawaken until he is on the other side.

I AM THE WAY INTO THE CITY OF WOE.
I AM THE WAY TO A FORSAKEN PEOPLE.
I AM THE WAY INTO ETERNAL SORROW. 3

SACRED JUSTICE MOVED MY ARCHITECT.
I WAS RAISED HERE BY DIVINE OMNIPOTENCE,
PRIMORDIAL LOVE AND ULTIMATE INTELLECT.<sup>6</sup> 6

ONLY THOSE ELEMENTS TIME CANNOT WEAR WERE MADE BEFORE ME, AND BEYOND TIME I STAND.
ABANDON ALL HOPE YE WHO ENTER HERE. 9

These mysteries I read cut into stone above a gate. And turning I said: "Master, what is the meaning of his harsh inscription?" 12

And he then as initiate to novice:
"Here must you put by all division of spirit and gather your soul against all cowardice. 15

This is the place I told you to expect.
Here you shall pass among the fallen people, souls who have lost the good of intellect."<sup>7</sup> 18

So saying, he put forth his hand to me, and with a gentle and encouraging smile
he led me through the gate of mystery. 21

Here sighs and cries and wails coiled and recoiled on the starless air, spilling my soul to tears.
A confusion of tongues and monstrous accents toiled 24

6. I.e., God as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

7. "The good of intellect": i.e., God.

in pain and anger. Voices hoarse and shrill and sounds of blows, all intermingled, raised tumult and pandemonium that still 27

whirls on the air forever dirty with it as if a whirlwind sucked at sand. And I, holding my head in horror, cried: "Sweet Spirit, 30

what souls are these who run through this black haze?"
 And he to me: "These are the nearly soulless whose lives concluded neither blame nor praise. 33

They are mixed here with that despicable corps of angels who were neither for God nor Satan, but only for themselves.<sup>8</sup> The High Creator 36

scourged them from Heaven for its perfect beauty, and Hell will not receive them since the wicked might feel some glory over them." And I: 39

"Master, what gnaws at them so hideously their lamentation stuns the very air?"
 "They have no hope of death," he answered me, 42

"and in their blind and unattaining state their miserable lives have sunk so low that they must envy every other fate. 45

No word of them survives their living season.
 Mercy and Justice deny them even a name.
 Let us not speak of them: look, and pass on." 48

I saw a banner there upon the mist.
 Circling and circling, it seemed to scorn all pause.
 So it ran on, and still behind it pressed 51

a never-ending rout of souls in pain.
 I had not thought death had undone so many as passed before me in that mournful train. 54

And some I knew among them; last of all I recognized the shadow of that soul who, in his cowardice, made the Great Denial.<sup>9</sup> 57

8. These "angels," not mentioned in the Bible but discussed by theologians throughout the Middle Ages, were those who declined to choose either side when Satan rebelled against God.

9. This is Pope Celestine V, who was elected in July 1294 but abdicated five months later; Dante believed that this abdication ("the Great Denial") ushered in the corrupt papacy of Celestine's successor, Boniface VIII (see 19.49–57).

At once I understood for certain: these were of that retrograde and faithless crew hateful to God and to His enemies. 60

These wretches never born and never dead ran naked in a swarm of wasps and hornets that goaded them the more the more they fled, 63

and made their faces stream with bloody gouts of pus and tears that dribbled to their feet to be swallowed there by loathsome worms and maggots. 66

Then looking onward I made out a throng assembled on the beach of a wide river, whereupon I turned to him: "Master, I long 69 to know what souls these are, and what strange usage makes them as eager to cross as they seem to be in this infected light." At which the Sage: 72

"All this shall be made known to you when we stand on the joyless beach of Acheron."<sup>1</sup> And I cast down my eyes, sensing a reprimand 75

in what he said, and so walked at his side in silence and ashamed until we came through the dead cavern to that sunless tide. 78

There, steering toward us in an ancient ferry came an old man with a white bush of hair,<sup>2</sup> bellowing: "Woe to you depraved souls! Bury 81

here and forever all hope of Paradise:
 I come to lead you to the other shore,
 into eternal dark, into fire and ice. 84

And you who are living yet, I say begone from these who are dead." But when he saw me stand against his violence he began again: 87

"By other windings and by other steerage shall you cross to that other shore. Not here! Not here!
 A lighter craft than mine must give you passage."<sup>3</sup> 90

1. The first of the four rivers of Hell.

2. Charon; see Aeneid 6.

3. Charon knows that after death Dante will be taken not to Hell but to Purgatory in a "lighter craft" piloted by an angel; the arrival of the souls in Purgatory is described in Purgatorio 2.22–48. This is the first of several places in the Commedia where Dante predicts his own salvation.

And my Guide to him: "Charon, bite back your spleen:
 this has been willed where what is willed must be,
 and is not yours to ask what it may mean." 93

The steersman of that marsh of ruined souls, who wore a wheel of flame around each eye,
 stifled the rage that shook his woolly jowls. 96

But those unmanned and naked spirits there turned pale with fear and their teeth began to chatter at sound of his crude bellow. In despair 99

they blasphemed God, their parents, their time on earth, the race of Adam, and the day and the hour and the place and the seed and the womb that gave them birth. 102

But all together they drew to that grim shore where all must come who lose the fear of God.
 Weeping and cursing they come for evermore, 105 and demon Charon with eyes like burning coals herds them in, and with a whistling oar flails on the stragglers to his wake of souls. 108

As leaves in autumn loosen and stream down until the branch stands bare above its tatters spread on the rustling ground, so one by one 111

the evil seed of Adam in its Fall cast themselves, at his signal, from the shore and streamed away like birds who hear their call.<sup>4</sup> 114

So they are gone over that shadowy water, and always before they reach the other shore
 a new noise stirs on this, and new throngs gather. 117

"My son," the courteous Master said to me,
 "all who die in the shadow of God's wrath converge to this from every clime and country. 120

And all pass over eagerly, for here
 Divine Justice transforms and spurs them so their dread turns wish: they yearn for what they fear. 123

No soul in Grace comes ever to this crossing;
 therefore if Charon rages at your presence
 you will understand the reason for his cursing." 126

4. These similes are drawn from Aeneid 6.56–60 (all line references are to the edition in this anthology).

When he had spoken, all the twilight country shook so violently, the terror of it bathes me with sweat even in memory: 129

the tear-soaked ground gave out a sigh of wind that spewed itself in flame on a red sky, and all my shattered senses left me. Blind, 132 like one whom sleep comes over in a swoon,

 I stumbled into darkness and went down.<sup>5</sup>

Canto IV

CIRCLE ONE: LIMBO

The Virtuous Pagans

Dante wakes to find himself across Acheron. The Poets are now on the brink of Hell itself, which Dante conceives as a great funnel-shaped cave lying below the northern hemisphere with its bottom point at the earth's center. Around this great circular depression runs a series of ledges, each of which Dante calls a Circle. Each circle is assigned to the punishment of one category of sin.

As soon as Dante's strength returns, the Poets begin to cross the First Circle. Here they find the Virtuous Pagans. They were born without the light of Christ's revelation, and, therefore, they cannot come into the light of God, but they are not tormented. Their only pain is that they have no hope.

Ahead of them Dante sights a great dome of light, and a voice trumpets through the darkness welcoming Virgil back, for this is his eternal place in Hell. Immediately the great Poets of all time appear—Homer, Horace, Ovid, and Lucan. They greet Virgil, and they make Dante a sixth in their company.

With them Dante enters the Citadel of Human Reason and sees before his eyes the Master Souls of Pagan Antiquity gathered on a green, and illuminated by the radiance of Human Reason. This is the highest state man can achieve without God, and the glory of it dazzles Dante, but he knows also that it is nothing compared to the glory of God.

A monstrous clap of thunder broke apart the swoon that stuffed my head; like one awakened by violent hands, I leaped up with a start. 3

And having risen; rested and renewed,
 I studied out the landmarks of the gloom to find my bearings there as best I could. 6

And I found I stood on the very brink of the valley called the Dolorous Abyss, the desolate chasm where rolls the thunder of Hell's eternal cry, 9

5. Dante is describing an earthquake, which medieval science understood as the escape of vapors from within the earth; it is while he is unconscious that he crosses Acheron into Hell proper.

so depthless-deep and nebulous and dim that stare as I might into its frightful pit it gave me back no feature and no bottom. 12

Death-pale, the Poet spoke: "Now let us go into the blind world waiting here below us.
 I will lead the way and you will follow." 15

And I, sick with alarm at his new pallor, cried out, "How can I go this way when you who are my strength in doubt turn pale with terror?" 18

And he: "The pain of these below us here, drains the color from my face for pity, and leaves this pallor you mistake for fear. 21

Now let us go, for a long road awaits us."
 So he entered and so he led me in to the first circle and ledge of the abyss. 24

No tortured wailing rose to greet us here but sounds of sighing rose from every side, sending a tremor through the timeless air, 27

a grief breathed out of untormented sadness,
 the passive state of those who dwelled apart,
 men, women, children—a dim and endless congress. 30

And the Master said to me: "You do not question what souls these are that suffer here before you?
 I wish you to know before you travel on 33 that these were sinless. And still their merits fail, for they lacked Baptism's grace, which is the door of the true faith you were born to. Their birth fell 36

before the age of the Christian mysteries, and so they did not worship God's Trinity in fullest duty. I am one of these. 39

For such defects are we lost, though spared the fire and suffering Hell in one affliction only:
 that without hope we live on in desire." 42

I thought how many worthy souls there were suspended in that Limbo, and a weight closed on my heart for what the noblest suffer. 45

"Instruct me, Master and most noble Sir,"
 I prayed him then, "better to understand the perfect creed that conquers every error: 48 has any, by his own or another's merit, gone ever from this place to blessedness?"

He sensed my inner question and answered it:<sup>6</sup> 51

"I was still new to this estate of tears
when a Mighty One descended here among us, crowned with the sign of His victorious years. 54

He took from us the shade of our first parent,<sup>7</sup> of Abel, his pure son, of ancient Noah, of Moses, the bringer of law, the obedient. 57

Father Abraham, David the King,
Israel with his father and his children,
Rachel, the holy vessel of His blessing, 60 and many more He chose for elevation among the elect. And before these, you must know, no human soul had ever won salvation." 63

We had not paused as he spoke, but held our road and passed meanwhile beyond a press of souls crowded about like trees in a thick wood. 66

And we had not traveled far from where I woke when I made out a radiance before us that struck away a hemisphere of dark. 69

We were still some distance back in the long night, yet near enough that I half-saw, half-sensed,
what quality of souls lived in that light. 72

"O ornament of wisdom and of art, what souls are these whose merit lights their way
even in Hell. What joy sets them apart?" 75

And he to me: "The signature of honor they left on earth is recognized in Heaven and wins them ease in Hell out of God's favor."<sup>8</sup> 78

And as he spoke a voice rang on the air:
"Honor the Prince of Poets; the soul and glory that went from us returns. He is here! He is here!" 81

The cry ceased and the echo passed from hearing;
I saw four mighty presences come toward us with neither joy nor sorrow in their bearing. 84

6. Dante's question is about the Harrowing of Hell, when, according to Christian doctrine, Christ descended into Hell after the crucifixion and rescued the souls of the righteous of Israel; see also 12.43–45.

7. Adam.

8. The "signature of honor" is "poet."

“Note well,” my Master said as they came on,
 “that soul that leads the rest with sword in hand
 as if he were their captain and champion. 87

It is Homer, singing master of the earth.
 Next after him is Horace, the satirist,
 Ovid is third, and Lucan<sup>9</sup> is the fourth. 90

Since all of these have part in the high name
 the voice proclaimed, calling me Prince of Poets, the honor that they do me honors them.” 93

So I saw gathered at the edge of light the masters of that highest school whose song outsoars all others like an eagle’s flight. 96

And after they had talked together a while,
 they turned and welcomed me most graciously,
 at which I saw my approving Master smile. 99

And they honored me far beyond courtesy, for they included me in their own number,
 making me sixth in that high company. 102

So we moved toward the light, and as we passed we spoke of things as well omitted here as it was sweet to touch on there. At last 105

we reached the base of a great Citadel circled by seven towering battlements and by a sweet brook flowing round them all.<sup>1</sup> 108

This we passed over as if it were firm ground.
 Through seven gates I entered with those sages and came to a green meadow blooming round.<sup>2</sup> 111

There with a solemn and majestic poise stood many people gathered in the light, speaking infrequently and with muted voice. 114

Past that enameled green we six withdrew into a luminous and open height from which each soul among them stood in view. 117

9. Homer is the legendary epic poet of ancient Greece; Horace, Ovid, and Lucan are famous Roman poets.

1. Commentators have suggested that this is a Castle of Fame, its seven walls symbolizing the seven liberal arts, a system of knowledge developed in the classical period.

2. A locale reminiscent of the classical Elysian fields as described in Aeneid 6.468–73.

And there directly before me on the green
 the master souls of time were shown to me.
 I glory in the glory I have seen! 120

Electra stood in a great company among whom I saw Hector and Aeneas and Caesar in armor with his falcon's eye.<sup>3</sup> 123

I saw Camilla, and the Queen Amazon across the field. I saw the Latian King seated there with his daughter by his throne.<sup>4</sup> 126

And the good Brutus who overthrew the Tarquin: Lucrezia, Julia, Marcia, and Cornelia;
 and, by himself apart, the Saladin.<sup>5</sup> 129

And raising my eyes a little I saw on high Aristotle, the master of those who know,<sup>6</sup> ringed by the great souls of philosophy. 132

All wait upon him for their honor and his.
 I saw Socrates and Plato at his side before all others there. Democritus 135 who ascribes the world to chance, Diogenes, and with him there Thales, Anaxagoras,

 Zeno, Heraclitus, Empedocles. 138

And I saw the wise collector and analyst—Dioscorides I mean. I saw Orpheus there,
 Tully, Linus, Seneca the moralist,<sup>7</sup> 141

Euclid the geometer, and Ptolemy, Hippocrates, Galen, Avicenna, and Averrhoës of the Great Commentary.<sup>8</sup> 144

3. Julius Caesar. "Electra": the mother of Dardanus, the founder of Troy. "Hector": the leading warrior of the Trojans in the Iliad. "Aeneas": the hero of Virgil's Roman epic, the Aeneid.

4. Lavinia, heiress to King Latinus who ruled the area of Italy where Rome was later located and who married Aeneas. "Camilla": a female warrior in the Aeneid, where she is compared to Penthesilea, who fought for the Trojans against the Greeks.

5. Admired for his chivalry in fighting against the Crusaders, Saladin was sultan of Egypt and Syria and died in 1193. "Brutus": not the Brutus who killed Julius Caesar, but an earlier Roman who drove out the tyrant Tarquin. All four of the women mentioned were virtuous Roman matrons.

6. Aristotle (384–322 B.C.E.), Greek philosopher. The men mentioned in lines 134–38 are Greek philosophers of the 7th through the 4th centuries B.C.E.

7. Roman philosopher and dramatist, killed by Nero in 65 C.E. "Dioscorides": Greek physician (1st century C.E.). "Orpheus": mythical Greek poet. "Tully": Cicero (d. 43 B.C.E.), Roman orator.

8. Avicenna (d. 1037) and Averrhoës (d. 1198) were Islamic philosophers who wrote commentaries on Aristotle's works that were highly influential in Christian Europe. "Euclid": Greek mathematician (4th century B.C.E.). "Ptolemy": Greek astronomer and geographer (1st century C.E.) credited with devising the cosmological system that was accepted until the time of Copernicus in the 16th century (hence the term Ptolemaic universe). "Hippocrates and Galen": Greek physicians (4th and 2nd centuries B.C.E., respectively).

I cannot count so much nobility;
 my longer theme pursues me so that often the word falls short of the reality.

147

The company of six is reduced by four.
 My Master leads me by another road away from that serenity to the roar

150 and trembling air of Hell. I pass from light into the kingdom of eternal night.

Canto V

CIRCLE TWO

The Carnal

The Poets leave Limbo and enter the Second Circle. Here begin the torments of Hell proper, and here, blocking the way, sits Minos, the dread and semi-bestial judge of the damned who assigns to each soul its eternal torment. He orders the Poets back; but Virgil silences him as he earlier silenced Charon, and the Poets move on.

They find themselves on a dark ledge swept by a great whirlwind, which spins within it the souls of the Carnal, those who betrayed reason to their appetites. Their sin was to abandon themselves to the tempest of their passions: so they are swept forever in the tempest of Hell, forever denied the light of reason and of God. Virgil identifies many among them. Semiramis is there, and Dido, Cleopatra, Helen, Achilles, Paris, and Tristan. Dante sees Paolo and Francesca swept together, and in the name of love he calls to them to tell their sad story. They pause from their eternal flight to come to him, and Francesca tells their history while Paolo weeps at her side. Dante is so stricken by compassion at their tragic tale that he swoons once again.

So we went down to the second ledge alone;
 a smaller circle of so much greater pain
 the voice of the damned rose in a bestial moan.

3

There Minos sits, grinning, grotesque, and hale.
 He examines each lost soul as it arrives and delivers his verdict with his coiling tail.<sup>9</sup>

6

That is to say, when the ill-fated soul appears before him it confesses all,
 and that grim sorter of the dark and foul 9 decides which place in Hell shall be its end, then wraps his twitching tail about himself

 one coil for each degree it must descend.

12

The soul descends and others take its place:
 each crowds in its turn to judgment, each confesses,
 each hears its doom and falls away through space.

15

9. Minos is described as judge of the underworld in Aeneid 6.207–11.

“O you who come into this camp of woe,” cried Minos when he saw me turn away without awaiting his judgment, “watch where you go 18

once you have entered here, and to whom you turn!
Do not be misled by that wide and easy passage!”
And my Guide to him: “That is not your concern; 21

it is his fate to enter every door.
This has been willed where what is willed must be,<sup>1</sup> and is not yours to question. Say no more.” 24

Now the choir of anguish, like a wound, strikes through the tortured air. Now I have come to Hell’s full lamentation, sound beyond sound. 27

I came to a place stripped bare of every light and roaring on the naked dark like seas wracked by a war of winds. Their hellish flight 30 of storm and counterstorm through time foregone, sweeps the souls of the damned before its charge.

Whirling and battering it drives them on, 33 and when they pass the ruined gap of Hell through which we had come, their shrieks begin anew,

There they blaspheme the power of God eternal. 36

And this, I learned, was the never-ending flight of those who sinned in the flesh, the carnal and lusty who betrayed reason to their appetite. 39

As the wings of wintering starlings bear them on in their great wheeling flights, just so the blast wherries these evil souls through time foregone. 42

Here, there, up, down, they whirl and, whirling, strain with never a hope of hope to comfort them, not of release, but even of less pain. 45

As cranes go over sounding their harsh cry, leaving the long streak of their flight in air,
so come these spirits, wailing as they fly. 48

And watching their shadows lashed by wind, I cried:
“Master, what souls are these the very air lashes with its black whips from side to side?” 51

1. I.e., is willed in Heaven by God, who has the power to accomplish whatever he wills.

“The first of these whose history you would know,”
 he answered me, “was Empress of many tongues.
 Mad sensuality corrupted her so 54 that to hide the guilt of her debauchery she licensed all depravity alike, and lust and law were one in her decree. 57

She is Semiramis<sup>2</sup> of whom the tale is told how she married Ninus and succeeded him to the throne of that wide land the Sultans hold. 60

The other is Dido; faithless to the ashes of Sichaeus, she killed herself for love.
 The next whom the eternal tempest lashes 63 is sense-drugged Cleopatra.<sup>3</sup> See Helen there, from whom such ill arose. And great Achilles, who fought at last with love in the house of prayer.<sup>4</sup> 66

And Paris. And Tristan.”<sup>5</sup> As they whirled above he pointed out more than a thousand shades of those torn from the mortal life by love. 69

I stood there while my Teacher one by one named the great knights and ladies of dim time;
 and I was swept by pity and confusion. 72

At last I spoke: “Poet, I should be glad to speak a word with those two swept together so lightly on the wind and still so sad.”<sup>6</sup> 75

And he to me: “Watch them. When next they pass, call to them in the name of love that drives and damns them here. In that name they will pause.” 78

Thus, as soon as the wind in its wild course brought them around, I called: “O wearied souls!
 if none forbid it, pause and speak to us.” 81

2. Renowned for licentiousness, a mythical queen of Assyria and wife of Ninus, the legendary founder of Ninevah. Because both the capital of Assyria and Old Cairo were known as Babylon, her land is here confused with that ruled by the sultan of Egypt.

3. Dido, whose suicide for love of Aeneas is described in Aeneid 4.542–942, was the widow of Sichaeus. Cleopatra killed herself after the death of her lover, Mark Antony, in 30 B.C.E.

4. The medieval version of the Troy story described Achilles as enamored of a Trojan princess, Polyxena, and killed in an ambush set by Paris when he went to meet her. Helen’s seduction by Paris (see line 67) was the cause of the Trojan War.

5. The lover of Iseult, wife of his lord King Mark.

6. Francesca da Rimini and her brother-in-law Paolo Malatesta.

As mating doves that love calls to their nest glide through the air with motionless raised wings, borne by the sweet desire that fills each breast— 84

Just so those spirits turned on the torn sky from the band where Dido whirls across the air;
 such was the power of pity in my cry. 87

“O living creature, gracious, kind, and good, going this pilgrimage through the sick night, visiting us who stained the earth with blood, 90 were the King of Time our friend, we would pray His peace on you who have pitied us. As long as the wind will let us pause, ask of us what you please. 93

The town where I was born lies by the shore where the Po descends into its ocean rest with its attendant streams in one long murmur.<sup>7</sup> 96

Love, which in gentlest hearts will soonest bloom seized my lover with passion for that sweet body from which I was torn unshriven to my doom. 99

Love, which permits no loved one not to love, took me so strongly with delight in him that we are one in Hell, as we were above. 102

Love led us to one death. In the depths of Hell
 Caïna waits for him who took our lives.”<sup>8</sup>
 This was the piteous tale they stopped to tell. 105

And when I had heard those world-offended lovers
 I bowed my head. At last the Poet spoke:
 “What painful thoughts are these your lowered brow covers?” 108

When at length I answered, I began: “Alas!
 What sweetest thoughts, what green and young desire led these two lovers to this sorry pass.” 111

Then turning to those spirits once again,
 I said: “Francesca, what you suffer here melts me to tears of pity and of pain. 114

7. The river Po, in northern Italy, empties into the Adriatic Sea at Ravenna.

8. Caïna is the circle of Cain (described in canto 32), where those who killed their kin are punished; the lovers were killed by Gianciotto Malatesta, Francesca's husband and Paolo's brother.

But tell me: in the time of your sweet sighs by what appearances found love the way to lure you to his perilous paradise?" 117

And she: "The double grief of a lost bliss is to recall its happy hour in pain.
 Your Guide and Teacher knows the truth of this. 120

But if there is indeed a soul in Hell to ask of the beginning of our love out of his pity, I will weep and tell: 123

On a day for dalliance we read the rhyme of Lancelot,<sup>9</sup> how love had mastered him.
 We were alone with innocence and dim time. 126

Pause after pause that high old story drew our eyes together while we blushed and paled;
 but it was one soft passage overthrew 129

our caution and our hearts. For when we read how her fond smile was kissed by such a lover, he who is one with me alive and dead 132

breathed on my lips the tremor of his kiss.
 That book, and he who wrote it, was a pander.
 That day we read no further."<sup>1</sup> As she said this, 135

the other spirit, who stood by her, wept so piteously, I felt my senses reel and faint away with anguish. I was swept 138

by such a swoon as death is, and I fell, as a corpse might fall, to the dead floor of Hell.

Canto VI

CIRCLE THREE

The Gluttons

Dante recovers from his swoon and finds himself in the Third Circle. A great storm of putrefaction falls incessantly, a mixture of stinking snow and freezing rain, which forms into a vile slush underfoot. Everything about this Circle suggests a gigantic garbage dump. The souls of the damned lie in the icy paste, swollen and obscene, and Cerberus, the ravenous three-headed dog of Hell, stands guard over them, ripping and tearing them with his claws and teeth.

These are the Gluttons. In life they made no higher use of the gifts of God than to wallow in food and drink, producers of nothing but garbage and offal. Here

9. In Arthurian legend, the lover of Arthur's wife, Guinevere.

1. Compare this line to Augustine's account in Confessions of his conversion by reading a passage in Paul's Epistle to the Romans.

they lie through all eternity, themselves like garbage, half-buried in fetid slush, while Cerberus slavers over them as they in life slavered over their food.

As the Poets pass, one of the speakers sits up and addresses Dante. He is Ciacco, The Hog, a citizen of Dante's own Florence. He recognizes Dante and asks eagerly for news of what is happening there. With the foreknowledge of the damned, Ciacco then utters the first of the political prophecies that are to become a recurring theme of the Inferno. The Poets then move on toward the next Circle, at the edge of which they encounter the monster Plutus.

My senses had reeled from me out of pity for the sorrow of those kinsmen and lost lovers.
Now they return, and waking gradually, 3

I see new torments and new souls in pain about me everywhere. Wherever I turn away from grief I turn to grief again. 6

I am in the Third Circle of the torments.
Here to all time with neither pause nor change
the frozen rain of Hell descends in torrents. 9

Huge hailstones, dirty water, and black snow pour from the dismal air to putrefy
the putrid slush that waits for them below. 12

Here monstrous Cerberus,<sup>2</sup> the ravening beast, howls through his triple throats like a mad dog over the spirits sunk in that foul paste. 15

His eyes are red, his beard is greased with phlegm, his belly is swollen, and his hands are claws to rip the wretches and flay and mangle them. 18

And they, too, howl like dogs in the freezing storm, turning and turning from it as if they thought one naked side could keep the other warm. 21

When Cerberus discovered us in that swill his dragon-jaws yawed wide, his lips drew back in a grin of fangs. No limb of him was still. 24

My Guide bent down and seized in either fist a clod of the stinking dirt that festered there and flung them down the gullet of the beast. 27

As a hungry cur will set the echoes raving and then fall still when he is thrown a bone, all of his clamor being in his craving, 30

2. For this creature as one of the guardians of Hell, see Aeneid 6.190–97.

so the three ugly heads of Cerberus, whose yowling at those wretches deafened them,
 choked on their putrid sops and stopped their fuss. 33

We made our way across the sodden mess of souls the rain beat down, and when our steps fell on a body, they sank through emptiness. 36

All those illusions of being seemed to lie drowned in the slush; until one wraith among them sat up abruptly and called as I passed by:<sup>3</sup> 39

“O you who are led this journey through the shade of Hell’s abyss, do you recall this face?
 You had been made before I was unmade.”<sup>4</sup> 42

And I: “Perhaps the pain you suffer here distorts your image from my recollection.
 I do not know you as you now appear.” 45

And he to me: “Your own city, so rife with hatred that the bitter cup flows over was mine too in that other, clearer life. 48

Your citizens nicknamed me Ciacco, The Hog:
 gluttony was my offense, and for it
 I lie here rotting like a swollen log. 51

Nor am I lost in this alone; all these you see about you in this painful death have wallowed in the same indecencies.” 54

I answered him: “Ciacco, your agony weighs on my heart and calls my soul to tears;
 but tell me, if you can, what is to be 57

for the citizens of that divided state, and whether there are honest men among them,
 and for what reasons we are torn by hate.” 60

And he then:<sup>5</sup> “After many words given and taken it shall come to blood; White shall rise over Black and rout the dark lord’s force, battered and shaken. 63

3. A Florentine named Ciacco, known only through his appearance here.

4. I.e., “You were born before I died.”

5. The enigmatic “prophecy” that follows refers first to the triumph of the Whites, or

“the rustic party” (to which Dante was allied), in 1300, and then their defeat by the Blacks, aided by Pope Boniface (“one now gripped by many hesitations”), in 1302, at which time Dante was exiled.

Then it shall come to pass within three suns that the fallen shall arise, and by the power of one now gripped by many hesitations 66

Black shall ride on White for many years, loading it down with burdens and oppressions and humbling of proud names and helpless tears. 69

Two are honest,<sup>6</sup> but none will heed them. There, pride, avarice, and envy are the tongues men know and heed, a Babel of despair.” 72

Here he broke off his mournful prophecy.
 And I to him: “Still let me urge you on to speak a little further and instruct me: 75

Farinata and Tegghiaio, men of good blood, Jacopo Rusticucci, Arrigo, Mosca, and the others who set their hearts on doing good—<sup>7</sup> 78

where are they now whose high deeds might be-gem the crown of kings? I long to know their fate.
 Does Heaven soothe or Hell envenom them?” 81

And he: “They lie below in a blacker lair.
 A heavier guilt draws them to greater pain.
 If you descend so far you may see them there. 84

But when you move again among the living,
 oh speak my name to the memory of men!
 Having answered all, I say no more.” And giving 87 his head a shake, he looked up at my face cross-eyed, then bowed his head and fell away among the other blind souls of that place. 90

And my Guide to me: “He will not wake again until the angel trumpet sounds the day on which the host shall come to judge all men.”<sup>8</sup> 93

Then shall each soul before the seat of Mercy return to its sad grave and flesh and form to hear the edict of Eternity.” 96

6. The identity of these two is unknown.

7. Dante asks about famous Florentines; he will find Farinata in canto 10, Tegghiaio and Rusticucci in canto 16, and Mosca in canto

28. Arrigo does not appear.

8. Virgil refers to the Last Judgment, when the dead will regain their bodies.

So we picked our slow way among the shades and the filthy rain, speaking of life to come.
 “Master,” I said, “when the great clarion fades 99 into the voice of thundering Omniscience, what of these agonies? Will they be the same,

 or more, or less, after the final sentence?” 102

And he to me: “Look to your science again where it is written: the more a thing is perfect the more it feels of pleasure and of pain. 105

As for these souls, though they can never soar to true perfection, still in the new time they will be nearer it than they were before.”<sup>9</sup> 108

And so we walked the rim of the great ledge speaking of pain and joy, and of much more that I will not repeat, and reached the edge 111 where the descent begins. There, suddenly, we came on Plutus, the great enemy.<sup>1</sup>

Canto VII

CIRCLE FOUR

The Hoarders and the Wasters

CIRCLE FIVE

The Wrathful and the Sullen

Plutus menaces the Poets, but once more Virgil shows himself more powerful than the rages of Hell’s monsters. The Poets enter the Fourth Circle and find what seems to be a war in progress.

The sinners are divided into two raging mobs, each soul among them straining madly at a great boulder-like weight. The two mobs meet, clashing their weights against one another, after which they separate, pushing the great weights apart, and begin over again.

One mob is made up of the Hoarders, the other of the Wasters. In life, they lacked all moderation in regulating their expenses; they destroyed the light of God within themselves by thinking of nothing but money. Thus in death, their souls are encumbered by dead weights (mundanity) and one excess serves to punish the other. Their souls, moreover, have become so dimmed and awry in their fruitless rages that there is no hope of recognizing any among them.

The Poets pass on while Virgil explains the function of Dame Fortune in the Divine Scheme. As he finishes (it is past midnight now of Good Friday) they reach the inner edge of the ledge and come to a Black Spring which bubbles murkily over the rocks to form the Marsh of Styx, which is the Fifth Circle, the last station of the Upper Hell.

9. They will be more perfect because body and soul will be reunited (a principle derived from Aristotelian science), which will only increase their pain.

1. Dante combines Pluto, the classical god of the underworld, with Plutus, the classical god of wealth.

Across the marsh they see countless souls attacking one another in the foul slime. These are the Wrathful and the symbolism of their punishment is obvious. Virgil also points out to Dante certain bubbles rising from the slime and informs him that below that mud lie entombed the souls of the Sullen. In life they refused to welcome the sweet light of the Sun (Divine Illumination) and in death they are buried forever below the stinking waters of the Styx, gargling the words of an endless chant in a grotesque parody of singing a hymn.

“Papa Satán, Papa Satán, aleppy,”<sup>2</sup>

Plutus clucked and stuttered in his rage;
and my all-knowing Guide, to comfort me: 3

“Do not be startled, for no power of his,
however he may lord it over the damned,
may hinder your descent through this abyss.” 6

And turning to that carnival of bloat cried: “Peace, you wolf of Hell. Choke back your bile and let its venom blister your own throat. 9

Our passage through this pit is willed on high by that same Throne that loosed the angel wrath of Michael on ambition and mutiny.”<sup>3</sup> 12

As puffed out sails fall when the mast gives way and flutter to a self-convulsing heap—
so collapsed Plutus into that dead clay. 15

Thus we descended the dark scarp of Hell to which all the evil of the Universe comes home at last, into the Fourth Great Circle 18 and ledge of the abyss. O Holy Justice, who could relate the agonies I saw!

What guilt is man that he can come to this? 21

Just as the surge Charybdis<sup>4</sup> hurls to sea crashes and breaks upon its countersurge, so these shades dance and crash eternally. 24

Here, too, I saw a nation of lost souls, far more than were above: they strained their chests against enormous weights, and with mad howls 27 rolled them at one another. Then in haste they rolled them back, one party shouting out:

“Why do you hoard?” and the other: “Why do you waste?” 30

2. Virgil apparently understands this mysterious outburst regarding Satan, but commentators have remained baffled.
3. A reference to the battle in heaven between the Archangel Michael and Satan in the form of a dragon: see Revelation 12.7–9.

4. A famous whirlpool in the Strait of Messina, between Sicily and Italy, described in Aeneid 3.

So back around that ring they puff and blow, each faction to its course, until they reach opposite sides, and screaming as they go 33

the madmen turn and start their weights again to crash against the maniacs. And I, watching, felt my heart contract with pain. 36

“Master,” I said, “what people can these be?
 And all those tonsured<sup>5</sup> ones there on our left—is it possible they all were of the clergy?” 39

And he: “In the first life beneath the sun they were so skewed and squint-eyed in their minds their misering or extravagance mocked all reason. 42

The voice of each clamors its own excess when lust meets lust at the two points of the circle where opposite guilts meet in their wretchedness. 45

These tonsured wraiths of greed were priests indeed, and popes and cardinals, for it is in these the weed of avarice sows its rankest seed.” 48

And I to him: “Master, among this crew surely I should be able to make out the fallen image of some soul I knew.” 51

And he to me: “This is a lost ambition.
 In their sordid lives they labored to be blind,
 and now their souls have dimmed past recognition. 54

All their eternity is to butt and bray:
 one crew will stand tight-fisted, the other stripped of its very hair at the bar of Judgment Day. 57

Hoarding and squandering wasted all their light and brought them screaming to this brawl of wraiths.
 You need no words of mine to grasp their plight. 60

Now may you see the fleeting vanity of the goods of Fortune for which men tear down all that they are, to build a mockery. 63

Not all the gold that is or ever was under the sky could buy for one of these exhausted souls the fraction of a pause.” 66

5. The tonsure—a shaving of part of the head—was a mark of clerical status.

“Master,” I said, “tell me—now that you touch on this Dame Fortune—what is she, that she holds the good things of the world within her clutch?” 69

And he to me: “O credulous mankind, is there one error that has wooed and lost you?
Now listen, and strike error from your mind:”<sup>6</sup> 72

That king whose perfect wisdom transcends all, made the heavens and posted angels on them to guide the eternal light that it might fall 75

from every sphere to every sphere the same.
He made earth’s splendors by a like decree and posted as their minister this high Dame, 78

the Lady of Permutations. All earth’s gear she changes from nation to nation, from house to house, in changeless change through every turning year. 81

No mortal power may stay her spinning wheel.
The nations rise and fall by her decree.
None may foresee where she will set her heel: 84

she passes, and things pass. Man’s mortal reason cannot encompass her. She rules her sphere as the other gods rule theirs. Season by season 87 her changes change her changes endlessly, and those whose turn has come press on her so,

she must be swift by hard necessity. 90

And this is she so railed at and reviled that even her debtors in the joys of time blaspheme her name. Their oaths are bitter and wild, 93

but she in her beatitude does not hear.
Among the Primal Beings of God’s joy
she breathes her blessedness and wheels her sphere. 96

But the stars that marked our starting fall away.
We must go deeper into greater pain, for it is not permitted that we stay.”<sup>7</sup> 99

6. Virgil now explains that each area of life is presided over by a “guide,” a kind of angel, under the ultimate authority of God. The classical goddess Fortune—the “minister” of line 78—who was thought to distribute the world’s goods capriciously is here described as acting under God’s supervision.

7. The stars that were rising at the start of the journey (1.37–39) are now setting: Good Friday has passed, and the time is now the early hours of Holy Saturday.

And crossing over to the chasm's edge
 we came to a spring that boiled and overflowed through a great crevice worn into the ledge. 102

By that foul water, black from its very source, we found a nightmare path among the rocks and followed the dark stream along its course. 105

Beyond its rocky race and wild descent the river floods and forms a marsh called Styx,<sup>8</sup>
 a dreary swampland, vaporous and malignant. 108

And I, intent on all our passage touched, made out a swarm of spirits in that bog savage with anger, naked, slime-besmudged. 111

They thumped at one another in that slime with hands and feet, and they butted, and they bit as if each would tear the other limb from limb. 114

And my kind Sage: "My son, behold the souls of those who lived in wrath. And do you see the broken surfaces of those water-holes 117

on every hand, boiling as if in pain?
 There are souls beneath that water. Fixed in slime they speak their piece, end it, and start again: 120

'Sullen were we in the air made sweet by the Sun;
 in the glory of his shining our hearts poured a bitter smoke. Sullen were we begun; 123 sullen we lie forever in this ditch.'

 This litany they gargle in their throats as if they sang, but lacked the words and pitch." 126

Then circling on along that filthy wallow,
 we picked our way between the bank and fen, keeping our eyes on those foul souls that swallow 129

the slime of Hell. And so at last we came to the foot of a Great Tower that has no name.<sup>9</sup>

8. The second river of Hell.

9. This watchtower guards the entrance to lower Hell or the city of Dis—another name for Pluto, the classical god of the underworld, that is throughout the Inferno applied to Satan (see 11.65 and 34.20).

Canto VIII

CIRCLE FIVE: STYX

The Wrathful, Phlegyas

CIRCLE SIX: DIS

The Fallen Angels

The Poets stand at the edge of the swamp, and a mysterious signal flames from the great tower. It is answered from the darkness of the other side, and almost immediately the Poets see Phlegyas, the Boatman of Styx, racing toward them across the water, fast as a flying arrow. He comes avidly, thinking to find new souls for torment, and he howls with rage when he discovers the Poets. Once again, however, Virgil conquers wrath with a word and Phlegyas reluctantly gives them passage.

As they are crossing, a muddy soul rises before them. It is Filippo Argenti, one of the Wrathful. Dante recognizes him despite the filth with which he is covered, and he berates him soundly, even wishing to see him tormented further. Virgil approves Dante's disdain and, as if in answer to Dante's wrath, Argenti is suddenly set upon by all the other sinners present, who fall upon him and rip him to pieces.

The boat meanwhile has sped on, and before Argenti's screams have died away, Dante sees the flaming red towers of Dis, the Capital of Hell. The great walls of the iron city block the way to the Lower Hell. Properly speaking, all the rest of Hell lies within the city walls, which separate the Upper and the Lower Hell.

Phlegyas deposits them at a great Iron Gate which they find to be guarded by the Rebellious Angels. These creatures of Ultimate Evil, rebels against God Himself, refuse to let the Poets pass. Even Virgil is powerless against them, for Human Reason by itself cannot cope with the essence of Evil. Only Divine Aid can bring hope. Virgil accordingly sends up a prayer for assistance and waits anxiously for a Heavenly Messenger to appear.

Returning to my theme, I say we came to the foot of a Great Tower; but long before we reached it through the marsh, two horns of flame 3 flared from the summit, one from either side, and then, far off, so far we scarce could see it across the mist, another flame replied. 6

I turned to that sea of all intelligence saying: "What is this signal and counter-signal?
Who is it speaks with fire across this distance?" 9

And he then: "Look across the filthy slew:
you may already see the one they summon,
if the swamp vapors do not hide him from you." 12

No twanging bowstring ever shot an arrow that bored the air it rode dead to the mark more swiftly than the flying skiff whose prow 15 shot toward us over the polluted channel with a single steersman at the helm who called:

"So, do I have you at last, you whelp of Hell?" 18

“Phlegyas, Phlegyas,”<sup>1</sup> said my Lord and Guide, “this time you waste your breath: you have us only for the time it takes to cross to the other side.” 21

Phlegyas, the madman, blew his rage among those muddy marshes like a cheat deceived, or like a fool at some imagined wrong. 24

My Guide, whom all the fiend’s noise could not nettle, boarded the skiff, motioning me to follow:
 and not till I stepped aboard did it seem to settle 27 into the water. At once we left the shore, that ancient hull riding more heavily than it had ridden in all of time before.<sup>2</sup> 30

And as we ran on that dead swamp, the slime rose before me, and from it a voice cried:
 “Who are you that come here before your time?” 33

And I replied: “If I come, I do not remain.
 But you, who are you, so fallen and so foul?”
 And he: “I am one who weeps.” And I then: 36

“May you weep and wail to all eternity, for I know you, hell-dog, filthy as you are.”
 Then he stretched both hands to the boat, but warily 39

the Master shoved him back, crying, “Down! Down!
 with the other dogs!” Then he embraced me saying:
 “Indignant spirit, I kiss you as you frown. 42

Blessed be she who bore you.<sup>3</sup> In world and time this one was haughtier yet. Not one unbending graces his memory. Here is his shadow in slime. 45

How many living now, chancellors of wrath, shall come to lie here yet in this pigmire, leaving a curse to be their aftermath!” 48

And I: “Master, it would suit my whim to see the wretch scrubbed down into the swill before we leave this stinking sink and him.” 51

And he to me: “Before the other side shows through the mist, you shall have all you ask.
 This is a wish that should be gratified.” 54

1. A mythological figure condemned to Hell for setting fire to the temple of Apollo in revenge for the god’s seduction of his daughter; Dante found him in Aeneid 6.714–17.

2. Because of the unaccustomed weight of the living Dante.

3. See Luke 11.27, where these words are applied to Jesus.

And shortly after, I saw the loathsome spirit so mangled by a swarm of muddy wraiths that to this day I praise and thank God for it. 57

“After Filippo Argentil”<sup>4</sup> all cried together.
 The maddog Florentine wheeled at their cry and bit himself for rage. I saw them gather. 60

And there we left him. And I say no more,
 But such a wailing beat upon my ears,
 I strained my eyes ahead to the far shore. 63

“My son,” the Master said, “the City called Dis lies just ahead, the heavy citizens, the swarming crowds of Hell’s metropolis.” 66

And I then: “Master, I already see the glow of its red mosques, as if they came hot from the forge to smolder in this valley.” 69

And my all-knowing Guide: “They are eternal flues to eternal fire that rages in them and makes them glow across this lower Hell.” 72

And as he spoke we entered the vast moat of the sepulchre. Its wall seemed made of iron and towered above us in our little boat. 75

We circled through what seemed an endless distance before the boatman ran his prow ashore crying: “Out! Out! Get out! This is the entrance.” 78

Above the gates more than a thousand shades of spirits purged from Heaven for its glory<sup>5</sup> cried angrily: “Who is it that invades 81

Death’s Kingdom in his life?” My Lord and Guide advanced a step before me with a sign that he wished to speak to some of them aside. 84

They quieted somewhat, and one called, “Come, but come alone. And tell that other one, who thought to walk so blithely through death’s kingdom, 87

he may go back along the same fool’s way he came by. Let him try his living luck.
 You who are dead can come only to stay.” 90

4. A Florentine contemporary of Dante; Dante’s acquaintances recounted great enmity between them, mainly as a result of Dante’s exile from Florence.

5. The rebel angels, cast out of Heaven; see Luke 10.18 and Revelation 12.9.

Reader, judge for yourself, how each black word fell on my ears to sink into my heart:
 I lost hope of returning to the world. 93

“O my beloved Master, my Guide in peril, who time and time again have seen me safely along this way, and turned the power of evil, 96

stand by me now,” I cried, “in my heart’s fright.
 And if the dead forbid our journey to them.
 let us go back together toward the light.” 99

My Guide then, in the greatness of his spirit: “Take heart. Nothing can take our passage from us when such a power has given warrant for it. 102

Wait here and feed your soul while I am gone on comfort and good hope; I will not leave you to wander in this underworld alone.” 105

So the sweet Guide and Father leaves me here, and I stay on in doubt with yes and no dividing all my heart to hope and fear. 108

I could not hear my Lord’s words, but the pack that gathered round him suddenly broke away howling and jostling and went pouring back, 111

slamming the towering gate hard in his face.
 That great Soul stood alone outside the wall.
 Then he came back; his pain showed in his pace. 114

His eyes were fixed upon the ground, his brow had sagged from its assurance. He sighed aloud:
 “Who has forbidden me the halls of sorrow?” 117

And to me he said: “You need not be cast down by my vexation, for whatever plot these fiends may lay against us, we will go on. 120

This insolence of theirs is nothing new:
 they showed it once at a less secret gate<sup>6</sup> that still stands open for all that they could do— 123

the same gate where you read the dead inscription;
 and through it at this moment a Great One comes.
 Already he has passed it and moves down 126

ledge by dark ledge. He is one who needs no guide, and at his touch all gates must spring aside.”

6. A reference to Christ’s descent into Hell, after the crucifixion, for the “harrowing”; see above, 4.53.

Canto IX

CIRCLE SIX

The Heretics

At the Gate of Dis the Poets wait in dread. Virgil tries to hide his anxiety from Dante, but both realize that without Divine Aid they will surely be lost. To add to their terrors Three Infernal Furies, symbols of Eternal Remorse, appear on a nearby tower, from which they threaten the Poets and call for Medusa to come and change them to stone. Virgil at once commands Dante to turn and shut his eyes. To make doubly sure, Virgil himself places his hands over Dante's eyes, for there is an Evil upon which man must not look if he is to be saved.

But at the moment of greatest anxiety a storm shakes the dirty air of Hell and the sinners in the marsh begin to scatter like frightened Frogs. The Heavenly Messenger is approaching. He appears walking majestically through Hell, looking neither to right nor to left. With a touch he throws open the Gate of Dis while his words scatter the Rebellious Angels. Then he returns as he came.

The Poets now enter the gate unopposed and find themselves in the Sixth Circle. Here they find a countryside like a vast cemetery. Tombs of every size stretch out before them, each with its lid lying beside it, and each wrapped in flames. Cries of anguish sound endlessly from the entombed dead.

This is the torment of the Heretics of every cult. By Heretic, Dante means specifically those who did violence to God by denying immortality. Since they taught that the soul dies with the body, so their punishment is an eternal grave in the fiery morgue of God's wrath.

My face had paled to a mask of cowardice when I saw my Guide turn back. The sight of it the sooner brought the color back to his. 3

He stood apart like one who strains to hear what he cannot see, for the eye could not reach far across the vapors of that midnight air. 6

"Yet surely we were meant to pass these tombs," he said aloud. "If not . . . so much was promised . . .
Oh how time hangs and drags till our aid comes!" 9

I saw too well how the words with which he ended covered his start, and even perhaps I drew a worse conclusion from that than he intended. 12

"Tell me, Master, does anyone ever come from the first ledge, whose only punishment is hope cut off, into this dreary bottom?"<sup>7</sup> 15

I put this question to him, still in fear of what his broken speech might mean; and he:
"Rarely do any of us enter here. 18

7. I.e., "Has anyone from Limbo ever descended into lower Hell before?"

Once before, it is true, I crossed through Hell conjured by cruel Erichtho<sup>8</sup> who recalled the spirits to their bodies. Her dark spell 21 forced me, newly stripped of my mortal part,

 to enter through this gate and summon out a spirit from Judaea. Take heart, 24 that is the last depth and the darkest lair and the farthest from Heaven which encircles all,<sup>9</sup> and at that time I came back even from there. 27

The marsh from which the stinking gasses bubble lies all about this capital of sorrow whose gates we may not pass now without trouble.” 30

All this and more he expounded; but the rest was lost on me, for suddenly my attention was drawn to the turret with the fiery crest 33

where all at once three hellish and inhuman Furies<sup>1</sup> sprang to view, bloodstained and wild.
 Their limbs and gestures hinted they were women. 36

Belts of greenest hydras wound and wound about their waists, and snakes and horned serpents grew from their heads like matted hair and bound 39 their horrid brows. My Master, who well knew the handmaids of the Queen of Woe,<sup>2</sup> cried: “Look:

 the terrible Erinyes of Hecate’s crew. 42

That is Megaera to the left of the tower.
 Alecto is the one who raves on the right.
 Tisiphone stands between.” And he said no more. 45

With their palms they beat their brows, with their nails they clawed their bleeding breasts. And such mad wails broke from them that I drew close to the Poet, overawed. 48

And all together screamed, looking down at me:
 “Call Medusa<sup>3</sup> that we may change him to stone!
 Too lightly we let Theseus<sup>4</sup> go free.” 51

8. A legendary sorceress. The story of Virgil’s prior descent into Hell is apparently Dante’s own invention, although in the Middle Ages Virgil had the reputation of being a magician.

9. Judecca, the last subdivision of the last circle of Hell, where Judas is punished.

1. Three mythological monsters who represent the spirit of vengeance, known in Greek as the Erinyes (see below, line 42, and lines 43–45 for their individual names); they figure promi-nently in the Aeneid and other Latin poetry.

2. In classical mythology the queen of Hell is Hecate, or Proserpina, the wife of Pluto.

3. A mythological figure known as a Gorgon (line 56), so frightful in appearance that she turned those who gazed on her into stone.

4. Theseus, a legendary Athenian hero, descended into the underworld in order to try to rescue Proserpina, whom Pluto had abducted, and was rescued by Hercules.

“Turn your back and keep your eyes shut tight;
for should the Gorgon come and you look at her,
never again would you return to the light.” 54

This was my Guide’s command. And he turned me about himself, and would not trust my hands alone, but, with his placed on mine, held my eyes shut. 57

Men of sound intellect and probity, weigh with good understanding what lies hidden behind the veil of my strange allegory!<sup>5</sup> 60

Suddenly there broke on the dirty swell of the dark marsh a squall of terrible sound that sent a tremor through both shores of Hell; 63

a sound as if two continents of air, one frigid and one scorching, clashed head on in a war of winds that stripped the forests bare, 66 ripped off whole boughs and blew them helter skelter along the range of dust it raised before it making the beasts and shepherds run for shelter. 69

The Master freed my eyes. “Now turn,” he said,
“and fix your nerve of vision on the foam there where the smoke is thickest and most acrid.” 72

As frogs before the snake that hunts them down churn up their pond in flight, until the last squats on the bottom as if turned to stone— 75

so I saw more than a thousand ruined souls scatter away from one who crossed dry-shod
the Stygian marsh into Hell’s burning bowels.<sup>6</sup> 78

With his left hand he fanned away the dreary vapors of that sink as he approached;
and only of that annoyance did he seem weary. 81

Clearly he was a Messenger from God’s Throne, and I turned to my Guide; but he made me a sign that I should keep my silence and bow down. 84

Ah, what scorn breathed from that Angel-presence!
He reached the gate of Dis and with a wand
he waved it open, for there was no resistance. 87

5. Dante here reminds us of the need to interpret his poetry, although the lesson of this particular episode is far from self-evident.
6. This is an angel, although described in a way reminiscent of Mercury, the classical messenger of the gods. “Stygian”: from the river Styx.

“Outcasts of Heaven, you twice-loathsome crew,”
 he cried upon that terrible sill of Hell,
 “how does this insolence still live in you?” 90

Why do you set yourselves against that Throne whose Will none can deny, and which, times past, has added to your pain for each rebellion? 93

Why do you butt against Fate’s ordinance?
 Your Cerberus, if you recall, still wears his throat and chin peeled for such arrogance.”<sup>7</sup> 96

Then he turned back through the same filthy tide by which he had come. He did not speak to us, but went his way like one preoccupied 99

by other presences than those before him.
 And we moved toward the city, fearing nothing after his holy words. Straight through the dim 102 and open gate we entered unopposed.

 And I, eager to learn what new estate of Hell those burning fortress walls enclosed, 105

began to look about the very moment we were inside, and I saw on every hand a countryside of sorrow and new torment. 108

As at Arles where the Rhone sinks into stagnant marshes, as at Pola by the Quarnaro Gulf, whose waters close Italy and wash her farthest reaches, 111

the uneven tombs cover the even plain—such fields I saw here, spread in all directions, except that here the tombs were chests of pain:<sup>8</sup> 114 for, in a ring around each tomb, great fires raised every wall to a red heat. No smith works hotter iron in his forge. The biers 117 stood with their lids upraised, and from their pits an anguished moaning rose on the dead air from the desolation of tormented spirits. 120

And I: “Master, what shades are these who lie buried in these chests and fill the air with such a painful and unending cry?” 123

7. According to classical mythology, Hercules dragged Cerberus into the daylight.

8. Arles, located on the river Rhone in southern France, and Pola, located on the bay of Quarnero in what is now Yugoslavia, were sites of Roman cemeteries.

“These are the arch-heretics of all cults, with all their followers,” he replied, “Far more than you would think lie stuffed into these vaults. 126

Like lies with like in every heresy, and the monuments are fired, some more, some less;
to each depravity its own degree.” 129

He turned then, and I followed through that night between the wall and the torments, bearing right.

Canto X

CIRCLE SIX

The Heretics

As the Poets pass on, one of the damned hears Dante speaking, recognizes him as a Tuscan, and calls to him from one of the fiery tombs. A moment later he appears. He is Farinata degli Uberti, a great war-chief of the Tuscan Ghibellines. The majesty and power of his bearing seem to diminish Hell itself. He asks Dante’s lineage and recognizes him as an enemy. They begin to talk politics, but are interrupted by another shade, who rises from the same tomb.

This one is Cavalcante dei Cavalcanti, father of Guido Cavalcanti, a contemporary poet. If it is genius that leads Dante on his great journey, the shade asks, why is Guido not with him? Can Dante presume to a greater genius than Guido’s? Dante replies that he comes this way only with the aid of powers Guido has not sought. His reply is a classic example of many-leveled symbolism as well as an overt criticism of a rival poet. The senior Cavalcanti mistakenly infers from Dante’s reply that Guido is dead, and swoons back into the flames.

Farinata, who has not deigned to notice his fellow-sinner, continues from the exact point at which he had been interrupted. It is as if he refuses to recognize the flames in which he is shrouded. He proceeds to prophesy Dante’s banishment from Florence, he defends his part in Florentine politics, and then, in answer to Dante’s question, he explains how it is that the damned can foresee the future but have no knowledge of the present. He then names others who share his tomb, and Dante takes his leave with considerable respect for his great enemy, pausing only long enough to leave word for Cavalcanti that Guido is still alive.

We go by a secret path along the rim of the dark city, between the wall and the torments.
My Master leads me and I follow him. 3

“Supreme Virtue, who through this impious land wheel me at will down these dark gyres,”<sup>9</sup> I said, “speak to me, for I wish to understand. 6

Tell me, Master, is it permitted to see the souls within these tombs? The lids are raised, and no one stands on guard.” And he to me: 9

9. Circular turns.

“All shall be sealed forever on the day these souls return here from Jehosaphat with the bodies they have given once to clay.”<sup>1</sup> 12

In this dark corner of the morgue of wrath lie Epicurus<sup>2</sup> and his followers, who make the soul share in the body’s death. 15

And here you shall be granted presently not only your spoken wish, but that other as well, which you had thought perhaps to hide from me.”<sup>3</sup> 18

And I: “Except to speak my thoughts in few and modest words, as I learned from your example, dear Guide, I do not hide my heart from you.” 21

“O Tuscan, who go living through this place speaking so decorously, may it please you pause a moment on your way, for by the grace 24

of that high speech in which I hear your birth, I know you for a son of that noble city which perhaps I vexed too much in my time on earth.” 27

These words broke without warning from inside
one of the burning arks. Caught by surprise,
I turned in fear and drew close to my Guide. 30

And he: “Turn around. What are you doing? Look there:
it is Farinata<sup>4</sup> rising from the flames.
From the waist up his shade will be made clear.” 33

My eyes were fixed on him already. Erect,
he rose above the flame, great chest, great brow;
he seemed to hold all Hell in disrespect. 36

My Guide’s prompt hands urged me among the dim and smoking sepulchres to that great figure, and he said to me: “Mind how you speak to him.” 39

And when I stood alone at the foot of the tomb,
the great soul stared almost contemptuously,
before he asked: “Of what line do you come?” 42

1. According to the Bible, the Last Judgment when the dead will again receive their bodies will take place in the Valley of Jehosaphat; see Joel 3.2 and 3.12, and Matthew 25.31–32.

2. Greek philosopher (d. 270 B.C.E.) who rejected the idea of the immortality of the soul.

3. Presumably Dante’s desire to see the Florentines who inhabit this circle.

4. Farinata degli Uberti (d. 1264), a leader of the Ghibelline faction in Florence.

Because I wished to obey, I did not hide anything from him: whereupon, as he listened, he raised his brows a little, then replied: 45

“Bitter enemies were they to me, to my fathers, and to my party, so that twice
 I sent them scattering from high Italy.” 48

“If they were scattered, still from every part they formed again and returned both times,” I answered,<sup>5</sup> “but yours have not yet wholly learned that art.”<sup>6</sup> 51

At this another shade rose gradually, visible to the chin. It had raised itself,
 I think, upon its knees, and it looked around me<sup>7</sup> 54

as if it expected to find through that black air that blew about me, another traveler.
 And weeping when it found no other there, 57 turned back. “And if,” it cried, “you travel through this dungeon of the blind by power of genius, where is my son? why is he not with you?” 60

And I to him: “Not by myself am I borne this terrible way. I am led by him who waits there, and whom perhaps your Guido held in scorn.”<sup>8</sup> 63

For by his words and the manner of his torment
 I knew his name already, and could, therefore, answer both what he asked and what he meant. 66

Instantly he rose to his full height:
 “He held? What is it you say? Is he dead, then?
 Do his eyes no longer fill with that sweet light?”<sup>9</sup> 69

And when he saw that I delayed a bit in answering his question, he fell backwards into the flame, and rose no more from it. 72

5. Dante's family were Guelphs, who were driven out of Florence twice, in 1248 and 1260.

6. The Ghibellines were exiled in 1280, never to return.

7. This is Cavalcante de Cavalcanti, father of Dante's friend and fellow poet Guido; a Guelph, Guido married the daughter of Farinata in an unsuccessful attempt to heal the feud. In June 1300—after the fictional date of this conversation—Guido was exiled to a part of Italy where he caught the malaria from which he died in August. Dante was at that time a member of the governing body that made the decision to exile Guido.

8. The passage is ambiguous in the original Italian: as translated here, “him” refers to Virgil; but the Italian word can also be translated to refer to Beatrice, so that these two lines would then read: “that one waiting over there guides me through here, / to her whom your Guido perhaps held in scorn.”

9. In line 63 Dante used a verbal form known in Italian as the remote past, which leads Cavalcante to believe, wrongly, that now, in April 1300, Guido is dead—although, ironically, in about four months he will indeed die, as Dante knew when he was writing this canto.

But that majestic spirit at whose call
 I had first paused there, did not change expression, nor so much as turn his face to watch him fall. 75

“And if,” going on from his last words, he said, “men of my line have yet to learn that art,
 that burns me deeper than this flaming bed. 78

But the face of her who reigns in Hell<sup>1</sup> shall not be fifty times rekindled in its course before you learn what griefs attend that art.<sup>2</sup> 81

And as you hope to find the world again, tell me: why is that populace so savage in the edicts they pronounce against my strain?” 84

And I to him: “The havoc and the carnage that dyed the Arbia<sup>3</sup> red at Montaperti have caused these angry cries in our assemblage.” 87

He sighed and shook his head. “I was not alone in that affair,” he said, “nor certainly would I have joined the rest without good reason. 90

But I was alone at that time when every other consented to the death of Florence; I alone with open face defended her.” 93

“Ah, so may your soul sometime have rest,”
 I begged him, “solve the riddle that pursues me through this dark place and leaves my mind perplexed: 96

you seem to see in advance all time’s intent,
 if I have heard and understood correctly;
 but you seem to lack all knowledge of the present.” 99

“We see asquint, like those whose twisted sight can make out only the far-off,” he said, “for the King of All still grants us that much light. 102

When things draw near, or happen, we perceive nothing of them. Except what others bring us we have no news of those who are alive. 105

So may you understand that all we know will be dead forever from that day and hour when the portal of the Future is swung to.”<sup>4</sup> 108

1. Proserpina, who is also the goddess of the moon.

2. Farinata here predicts Dante’s own exile.

3. A stream near the hill of Montaperti, where the Ghibellines defeated the Guelphs in 1260.

4. The damned can see the future but not the present; after the Last Judgment, when human time is abolished, they will know nothing.

Then, as if stricken by regret, I said:<sup>5</sup> “Now, therefore, will you tell that fallen one who asked about his son, that he is not dead, 111

and that, if I did not reply more quickly, it was because my mind was occupied with this confusion you have solved for me.” 114

And now my Guide was calling me. In haste, therefore, I begged that mighty shade to name
 the others who lay with him in that chest. 117

And he: “More than a thousand cram this tomb.
 The second Frederick<sup>6</sup> is here, and the Cardinal of the Ubaldini.<sup>7</sup> Of the rest let us be dumb.” 120

And he disappeared without more said, and I turned back and made my way to the ancient Poet, pondering the words of the dark prophecy.<sup>8</sup> 123

He moved along, and then, when we had started,
 he turned and said to me, “What troubles you?
 Why do you look so vacant and downhearted?” 126

And I told him. And he replied: “Well may you bear those words in mind.” Then, pausing, raised a finger:
 “Now pay attention to what I tell you here: 129 when finally you stand before the ray of that Sweet Lady<sup>9</sup> whose bright eye sees all, from her you will learn the turnings of your way.” 132

So saying, he bore left, turning his back on the flaming walls, and we passed deeper yet into the city of pain, along a track 135 that plunged down like a scar into a sink which sickened us already with its stink.

5. See note 1 to line 69 above.

6. Frederick II, Holy Roman Emperor from 1215 until his death in 1250; he reputedly denied that there was life after death.

7. Ottaviano degli Ubaldini (d. 1273), who is reputed to have said, “If I have a soul, I have lost it for the Ghibellines.”

8. That is, Farinata’s prediction of his exile.

9. Beatrice.

Canto XI

CIRCLE SIX

The Heretics

The Poets reach the inner edge of the Sixth Circle and find a great jumble of rocks that had once been a cliff, but which has fallen into rubble as the result of the great earthquake that shook Hell when Christ died. Below them lies the Seventh Circle, and so fetid is the air that arises from it that the Poets cower for shelter behind a great tomb until their breaths can grow accustomed to the stench.

Dante finds an inscription on the lid of the tomb labeling it as the place in Hell of Pope Anastasius.

Virgil takes advantage of the delay to outline in detail The Division of the Lower Hell, a theological discourse based on The Ethics and The Physics of Aristotle with subsequent medieval interpretations. Virgil explains also why it is that the Incontinent are not punished within the walls of Dis, and rather ingeniously sets forth the reasons why Usury is an act of violence against Art, which is the child of Nature and hence the Grandchild of God. (By “Art,” Dante means the arts and crafts by which man draws from nature, i.e., Industry.)

As he concludes he rises and urges Dante on. By means known only to Virgil, he is aware of the motion of the stars and from them he sees that it is about two hours before Sunrise of Holy Saturday.

We came to the edge of an enormous sink rimmed by a circle of great broken boulders.
Here we found ghastlier gangs. And here the stink 3 thrown up by the abyss so overpowered us that we drew back, cowering behind the wall of one of the great tombs; and standing thus, 6

I saw an inscription in the stone, and read:
“I guard Anastasius, once Pope,
he whom Photinus led from the straight road.”<sup>1</sup> 9

“Before we travel on to that blind pit we must delay until our sense grows used to its foul breath, and then we will not mind it,” 12 my Master said. And I then: “Let us find some compensation for the time of waiting.”

And he: “You shall see I have just that in mind. 15

My son,”<sup>2</sup> he began, “there are below this wall three smaller circles, each in its degree like those you are about to leave, and all 18

1. Pope Anastasius (d. 498) was thought, wrongly, to have accepted a heresy promoted by the 5th-century theologian Photinus that Christ was not divine but only human.
2. Virgil now describes the three remaining circles of Hell: the seventh, eighth, and ninth. The seventh is for the violent and is divided into three parts; the eighth and ninth are for the fraudulent—the eighth for those who deceive generally, the ninth for those who betray those who love them. For the scheme of Hell as a whole, see the diagram on p. 928.

are crammed with God's accurst. Accordingly, that you may understand their sins at sight,
 I will explain how each is prisoned, and why. 21

Malice is the sin most hated by God.
 And the aim of malice is to injure others whether by fraud or violence. But since fraud 24 is the vice of which man alone is capable, God loathes it most. Therefore, the fraudulent are placed below, and their torment is more painful. 27

The first below are the violent. But as violence sins in three persons, so is that circle formed of three descending rounds of crueler torments. 30

Against God, self, and neighbor is violence shown.
 Against their persons and their goods, I say,
 as you shall hear set forth with open reason. 33

Murder and mayhem are the violation of the person of one's neighbor: and of his goods;
 harassment, plunder, arson, and extortion. 36

Therefore, homicides, and those who strike in malice—destroyers and plunderers—all lie in that first round, and like suffers with like. 39

A man may lay violent hands upon his own person and substance; so in that second round eternally in vain repentance moan 42

the suicides and all who gamble away and waste the good and substance of their lives and weep in that sweet time when they should be gay. 45

Violence may be offered the deity in the heart that blasphemes and refuses Him and scorns the gifts of Nature, her beauty and bounty. 48

Therefore, the smallest round brands with its mark both Sodom and Cahors,<sup>3</sup> and all who rail at God and His commands in their hearts' dark. 51

Fraud, which is a canker to every conscience, may be practiced by a man on those who trust him,
 and on those who have reposed no confidence. 54

3. In the Middle Ages, the names of Sodom (see Genesis 18.20–19.29) and Cahors, a city in southern France, became synonymous with sodomites and usurers, respectively. Usury, forbidden by the medieval church, is charging interest on loans; the logic of this prohibition—based on the argument that usury, like sodomy, is unnatural—is explained in lines 97–111 below.

The latter mode seems only to deny the bond of love which all men have from Nature;
 therefore within the second circle lie 57

simoniacs,<sup>4</sup> sycophants, and hypocrites, falsifiers, thieves, and sorcerers,
 grafters, pimps, and all such filthy cheats. 60

The former mode of fraud not only denies the bond of Nature, but the special trust added by bonds of friendship or blood-ties. 63

Hence, at the center point of all creation, in the smallest circle, on which Dis<sup>5</sup> is founded,
 the traitors lie in endless expiation. 66

“Master,” I said, “the clarity of your mind impresses all you touch; I see quite clearly the orders of this dark pit of the blind. 69

But tell me: those who lie in the swamp’s bowels, those the wind blows about, those the rain beats, and those who meet and clash with such mad howls— 72

why are they not punished in the rust-red city if God’s wrath be upon them? and if it is not,
 why must they grieve through all eternity?” 75

And he: “Why does your understanding stray so far from its own habit? or can it be your thoughts are turned along some other way? 78

Have you forgotten that your Ethics<sup>6</sup> states
 the three main dispositions of the soul that lead to those offenses Heaven hates— 81 incontinence, malice, and bestiality?

 and how incontinence offends God least and earns least blame from Justice and Charity? 84

Now if you weigh this doctrine and recall exactly who they are whose punishment lies in that upper Hell outside the wall, 87

you will understand at once why they are confined apart from these fierce wraiths, and why less anger beats down on them from the Eternal Mind.” 90

4. Simony is the sin of selling a spiritual good, such as a church office or a sacrament like confession, for material gain. It is named after Simon Magus, a magician who sought to buy from the Apostles the power of baptism; Acts

8.9–24.

5. Dis is Satan, who is found at the bottom of Hell (see canto 34).

6. Aristotle’s Nicomachean Ethics.

“O sun which clears all mists from troubled sight, such joy attends your rising that I feel as grateful to the dark as to the light. 93

Go back a little further,” I said, “to where you spoke of usury as an offense against God’s goodness. How is that made clear?” 96

“Philosophy makes plain by many reasons,” he answered me, “to those who heed her teachings, how all of Nature,—her laws, her fruits, her seasons,— 99 springs from the Ultimate Intellect and Its art:<sup>7</sup> and if you read your Physics<sup>8</sup> with due care, you will note, not many pages from the start, 102

that Art strives after her by imitation, as the disciple imitates the master;
Art, as it were, is the Grandchild of Creation. 105

By this, recalling the Old Testament near the beginning of Genesis,<sup>9</sup> you will see that in the will of Providence, man was meant 108 to labor and to prosper. But usurers, by seeking their increase in other ways, scorn Nature in herself and her followers.<sup>1</sup> 111

But come, for it is my wish now to go on:
the wheel turns and the Wain lies over Caurus, the Fish are quivering low on the horizon,<sup>2</sup> 114 and there beyond us runs the road we go down the dark scarp into the depths below.”

Canto XII

CIRCLE SEVEN: ROUND ONE

The Violent against Neighbors

The Poets begin the descent of the fallen rock wall, having first to evade the Minotaur, who menaces them. Virgil tricks him and the Poets hurry by.

Below them they see the River of Blood, which marks the First Round of the Seventh Circle as detailed in the previous Canto. Here are punished the Violent against Their Neighbors, great war-makers, cruel tyrants, high-waymen—all who shed the blood of their fellow men. As they wallowed in blood during their lives,

7. The laws of nature are determined by God.
8. Aristotle’s Physics, which argues that human art should follow natural laws.

9. In Genesis 3.17–19, God decrees that because of the Fall people must toil, supporting themselves by the sweat of their brows.

1. The usurer makes money not from labor but from money itself, which is an unnatural and therefore illicit art.

2. The position of stars shows that it is now about 4:00 a.m. on Holy Saturday.

so they are immersed in the boiling blood forever, each according to the degree of his guilt, while fierce Centaurs patrol the banks, ready to shoot with their arrows any sinner who raises himself out of the boiling blood beyond the limits permitted him. Alexander the Great is here, up to his lashes in the blood, and with him Attila, the Scourge of God. They are immersed in the deepest part of the river, which grows shallower as it circles to the other side of the ledge, then deepens again.

The Poets are challenged by the Centaurs, but Virgil wins a safe conduct from Chiron, their chief, who assigns Nessus to guide them and to bear them across the shallows of the boiling blood. Nessus carries them across at the point where it is only ankle deep and immediately leaves them and returns to his patrol.

The scene that opened from the edge of the pit was mountainous, and such a desolation that every eye would shun the sight of it: 3 a ruin like the Slides of Mark<sup>3</sup> near Trent on the bank of the Adige, the result of an earthquake or of some massive fault in the escarpment— 6 for, from the point on the peak where the mountain split to the plain below, the rock is so badly shattered

a man at the top might make a rough stair of it. 9

Such was the passage down the steep and there at the very top, at the edge of the broken cleft, lay spread the Infamy of Crete,<sup>4</sup> the heir 12 of bestiality and the lecherous queen who hid in a wooden cow. And when he saw us, he gnawed his own flesh in a fit of spleen. 15

And my Master mocked: “How you do pump your breath!
Do you think, perhaps, it is the Duke of Athens, who in the world above served up your death?”<sup>5</sup> 18

Off with you, monster; this one does not come instructed by your sister,<sup>6</sup> but of himself to observe your punishment in the lost kingdom.” 21

As a bull that breaks its chains just when the knife has struck its death-blow, cannot stand nor run but leaps from side to side with its last life— 24

3. A famous landslide on a mountain on the river Adige near Trent, a city in northern Italy.

4. The Minotaur, half man and half bull, was conceived when Pasiphaë, the wife of King Minos of Crete, had a wooden cow built within which she placed herself so as to have intercourse with a bull. The story of the Minotaur is told by Ovid, Metamorphoses 8.

5. Virgil is referring to Theseus, who killed the Minotaur in the labyrinth in which it was imprisoned.

6. Ariadne, daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë, who taught Theseus how to escape from the labyrinth within which the Minotaur was imprisoned.

so danced the Minotaur, and my shrewd Guide cried out: "Run now! While he is blind with rage!
Into the pass, quick, and get over the side!" 27

So we went down across the shale and slate of that ruined rock, which often slid and shifted under me at the touch of living weight. 30

I moved on, deep in thought; and my Guide to me:
"You are wondering perhaps about this ruin which is guarded by that beast upon whose fury 33

I played just now. I should tell you that when last
I came this dark way to the depths of Hell, this rock had not yet felt the ruinous blast. 36

But certainly, if I am not mistaken, it was just before the coming of Him who took the souls from Limbo, that all Hell was shaken<sup>7</sup> 39

so that I thought the universe felt love and all its elements moved toward harmony, whereby the world of matter, as some believe, 42 has often plunged to chaos.<sup>8</sup> It was then, that here and elsewhere in the pits of Hell,

the ancient rock was stricken and broke open. 45

But turn your eyes to the valley; there we shall find the river of boiling blood in which are steeped all who struck down their fellow men." Oh blind! 48

Oh ignorant, self-seeking cupidity<sup>9</sup> which spurs us so in the short mortal life and steeps us so through all eternity! 51

I saw an arching fosse<sup>1</sup> that was the bed of a winding river circling through the plain exactly as my Guide and Lord had said. 54

A file of Centaurs<sup>2</sup> galloped in the space between the bank and the cliff, well armed with arrows, riding as once on earth they rode to the chase. 57

7. Because of the earthquake that accompanied Christ's death, which occurred just before his descent to Hell and the "harrowing," Christ's rescue of the virtuous Israelites from the First Circle (see above, canto 4.52–63).

8. A reference to a theory of the Greek philosopher Empedocles that the universe is held together by alternating forces of love and hate, and that if either one predominates the result is chaos. This classical theory is not consistent with the Christian belief that the universe is created and organized by God's love.

9. Desire for wealth.

1. Ditch.

2. Mythological creatures that are half man and half horse.

And seeing us descend, that straggling band halted, and three of them moved out toward us, their long bows and their shafts already in hand. 60

And one of them cried out while still below:
“To what pain are you sent down that dark coast?
Answer from where you stand, or I draw the bow!” 63

“Chiron<sup>3</sup> is standing there hard by your side;
our answer will be to him. This wrath of yours was always your own worst fate,” my Guide replied. 66

And to me he said: “That is Nessus,<sup>4</sup> who died in the wood for insulting Dejanira. At his death he plotted his revenge in his own blood. 69

The one in the middle staring at his chest is the mighty Chiron, he who nursed Achilles:
the other is Pholus,<sup>5</sup> fiercer than all the rest. 72

They run by that stream in thousands, snapping their bows at any wraith who dares to raise himself out of the blood more than his guilt allows.” 75

We drew near those swift beasts. In a thoughtful pause Chiron drew an arrow, and with its notch
he pushed his great beard back along his jaws. 78

And when he had thus uncovered the huge pouches of his lips, he said to his fellows: “Have you noticed how the one who walks behind moves what he touches?” 81

That is not how the dead go.” My good Guide, already standing by the monstrous breast in which the two mixed natures joined,<sup>6</sup> replied: 84

“It is true he lives; in his necessity
I alone must lead him through this valley.
Fate brings him here, not curiosity. 87

From singing Alleluia the sublime spirit who sends me came.<sup>7</sup> He is no bandit.
Nor am I one who ever stooped to crime.<sup>8</sup> 90

3. A centaur renowned for wisdom who educated many legendary Greek heroes, including Achilles.

4. Nessus fell in love with Deianira, wife of Hercules, who killed him; while dying, Nessus poisoned with his own blood a robe that killed Hercules when he put it on.

5. Another centaur, killed by Hercules, whose rage is typical of these creatures.

6. When standing, Virgil reaches to the centaur's chest, where his human and animal natures join.

7. Beatrice.

8. Virgil is answering the question of lines 62–63, which assumes that they are condemned spirits.

But in the name of the Power by which I go this sunken way across the floor of Hell, assign us one of your troop whom we may follow, 93

that he may guide us to the ford, and there carry across on his back the one I lead, for he is not a spirit to move through air.” 96

Chiron turned his head on his right breast and said to Nessus: “Go with them, and guide them, and turn back any others that would contest 99 their passage.” So we moved beside our guide along the bank of the scalding purple river<sup>9</sup> in which the shrieking wraiths were boiled and dyed. 102

Some stood up to their lashes in that torrent, and as we passed them the huge Centaur said:
 “These were the kings of bloodshed and despoilment. 105

Here they pay for their ferocity.
 Here is Alexander. And Dionysius, who brought long years of grief to Sicily.<sup>1</sup> 108

That brow you see with the hair as black as night is Azzolino:<sup>2</sup> and that beside him, the blonde, is Opizzo da Esti, who had his mortal light 111 blown out by his own stepson.”<sup>3</sup> I turned then to speak to the Poet but he raised a hand:

 “Let him be the teacher now, and I will listen.” 114

Further on, the Centaur stopped beside a group of spirits steeped as far as the throat in the race of boiling blood, and there our guide 117 pointed out a sinner who stood alone:

 “That one before God’s altar pierced a heart still honored on the Thames.”<sup>4</sup> And he passed on. 120

We came in sight of some who were allowed to raise the head and all the chest from the river, and I recognized many there. Thus, as we followed 123

9. A river of blood, which we later learn is named Phlegethon (see 14.110).

1. Alexander the Great (d. 323 B.C.E.) and Dionysius of Syracuse in Sicily (d. 367 B.C.E.).

2. Azzolino III (d. 1259), a brutal ruler in northern Italy.

3. Opizzo II d’Este (d. 1293), another cruel northern Italian tyrant, reputedly murdered by his son, here called “stepson” either because of the unnaturalness of the crime or because Opizzo suspected his wife of adultery.

4. Guy de Montfort (d. 1298), who killed his cousin Prince Henry of Cornwall during a church service (“before God’s altar”) in the Italian city of Viterbo. Nessus’s image of the blood dripping from the victim’s heart indicates his focus on the fact that the murder is still unavenged. “Race”: flow; stream.

along the stream of blood, its level fell until it cooked no more than the feet of the damned.
 And here we crossed the ford to deeper Hell. 126

“Just as you see the boiling stream grow shallow along this side,” the Centaur said to us when we stood on the other bank, “I would have you know 129 that on the other, the bottom sinks anew more and more, until it comes again full circle to the place where the tyrants stew. 132

It is there that Holy Justice spends its wrath on Sextus and Pyrrhus<sup>5</sup> through eternity, and on Attila,<sup>6</sup> who was a scourge on earth: 135 and everlastingly milks out the tears of Rinier da Corneto and Rinier Pazzo,<sup>7</sup> those two assassins who for many years 138

stalked the highways, bloody and abhorred.”
 And with that he started back across the ford.

Canto XIII

CIRCLE SEVEN: ROUND TWO

The Violent against Themselves

Nessus carries the Poets across the river of boiling blood and leaves them in the Second Round of the Seventh Circle, The Wood of the Suicides. Here are punished those who destroyed their own lives and those who destroyed their substance.

The souls of the Suicides are encased in thorny trees whose leaves are eaten by the odious Harpies, the overseers of these damned. When the Harpies feed upon them, damaging their leaves and limbs, the wound bleeds. Only as long as the blood flows are the souls of the trees able to speak. Thus, they who destroyed their own bodies are denied a human form; and just as the supreme expression of their lives was self-destruction, so they are permitted to speak only through that which tears and destroys them. Only through their own blood do they find voice. And to add one more dimension to the symbolism, it is the Harpies—defilers of all they touch—who give them their eternally recurring wounds.

The Poets pause before one tree and speak with the soul of Pier delle Vigna. In the same wood they see Jacomo da Sant' Andrea, and Lano da Siena, two famous Squanderers and Destroyers of Goods pursued by a pack of savage hounds. The hounds overtake Sant' Andrea, tear him to pieces and go off carrying his limbs in

5. Sextus, the son of the Roman consul Pompey, became a pirate (1st century B.C.E.); Pyrrhus, Achilles' son, killed the aged Priam at the fall of Troy, as described in Aeneid 2.595–704.

6. Attila the Hun (d. 453), who led repeated attacks against the Eastern and Western Roman Empires.

7. Both Riniers were bandits of Dante's day; they are now weeping from pain, whereas in life they never wept for their sins.

their teeth, a self-evident symbolic retribution for the violence with which these sinners destroyed their substance in the world. After this scene of horror, Dante speaks to an Unknown Florentine Suicide whose soul is inside the bush which was torn by the hound pack when it leaped upon Sant' Andrea.

Nessus had not yet reached the other shore when we moved on into a pathless wood that twisted upward from Hell's broken floor. 3

Its foliage was not verdant, but nearly black.
The unhealthy branches, gnarled and warped and tangled, bore poison thorns instead of fruit. The track 6 of those wild beasts that shun the open spaces men till between Cecina and Corneto<sup>8</sup> runs through no rougher nor more tangled places. 9

Here nest the odious Harpies<sup>9</sup> of whom my Master wrote how they drove Aeneas and his companions from the Strophades with prophecies of disaster. 12

Their wings are wide, their feet clawed, their huge bellies covered with feathers, their necks and faces human.
They croak eternally in the unnatural trees. 15

"Before going on, I would have you understand," my Guide began, "we are in the second round and shall be till we reach the burning sand."<sup>1</sup> 18

Therefore look carefully and you will see things in this wood, which, if I told them to you would shake the confidence you have placed in me." 21

I heard cries of lamentation rise and spill on every hand, but saw no souls in pain in all that waste; and, puzzled, I stood still. 24

I think perhaps he thought that I was thinking those cries rose from among the twisted roots through which the spirits of the damned were slinking 27 to hide from us. Therefore my Master said:

"If you break off a twig, what you will learn will drive what you are thinking from your head."<sup>2</sup> 30

8. Two towns that mark the limits of the Maremma, a desolate area in Tuscany.

9. Birds with the faces of women and clawed hands; in Aeneid 3 they drive the wandering Trojans from their refuge in the Strophades Islands and predict their future suffering.

1. The "burning sand" is in the third ring or "round" of the seventh circle, described in the next canto.

2. I.e., "Your thoughts that the moans come from people concealed among the trees will cease or 'break off.'"

Puzzled, I raised my hand a bit and slowly broke off a branchlet from an enormous thorn:
 and the great trunk of it cried: "Why do you break me?"<sup>3</sup> 33

And after blood had darkened all the bowl of the wound, it cried again: "Why do you tear me?
 Is there no pity left in any soul?" 36

Men we were, and now we are changed to sticks;
 well might your hand have been more merciful were we no more than souls of lice and ticks." 39

As a green branch with one end all aflame will hiss and sputter sap out of the other as the air escapes—so from that trunk there came 42

words and blood together, gout by gout.
 Startled, I dropped the branch that I was holding and stood transfixed by fear, half turned about 45

to my Master, who replied: "O wounded soul, could he have believed before what he has seen in my verses only, you would yet be whole,"<sup>4</sup> 48 for his hand would never have been raised against you.

 But knowing this truth could never be believed till it was seen, I urged him on to do 51

what grieves me now; and I beg to know your name, that to make you some amends in the sweet world
 when he returns, he may refresh your fame." 54

And the trunk: "So sweet those words to me that I cannot be still, and may it not annoy you if I seem somewhat lengthy in reply."<sup>5</sup> 57

I am he who held both keys to Frederick's heart, locking, unlocking with so deft a touch that scarce another soul had any part 60

3. This episode derives from Aeneid 3, where Aeneas and his Trojan companions, stopping in their search for a new home, discover Polydorus transformed into a bush. Sent out by Priam during the war to solicit aid from the Thracians, Polydorus had been murdered by his hosts, and the javelins with which his body had been pierced had grown into the bush from which Aeneas breaks off a branch that bleeds. See also Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.

4. I.e., had Dante been able to believe the story of Polydorus recounted in the Aeneid.

5. This is the soul of Pier della Vigna (ca. 1190–1249), who had risen to become minister to the Emperor Frederick II (on whom see n. 6 on 10.119); Frederick is referred to here as "Caesar" and "Augustus" because he sought to imitate the imperial court of Rome. Pier's name means "Peter of the Vine," probably because his father had been a simple worker in a vineyard.

in his most secret thoughts. Through every strife
 I was so faithful to my glorious office that for it I gave up both sleep and life. 63

That harlot, Envy, who on Caesar's face keeps fixed forever her adulterous stare, the common plague and vice of court and palace, 66 inflamed all minds against me. These inflamed so inflamed him that all my happy honors were changed to mourning. Then, unjustly blamed, 69

my soul, in scorn, and thinking to be free of scorn in death, made me at last, though just, unjust to myself.<sup>6</sup> By the new roots of this tree 72

I swear to you that never in word or spirit did I break faith to my lord and emperor who was so worthy of honor in his merit. 75

If either of you return to the world, speak for me, to vindicate in the memory of men
 one who lies prostrate from the blows of Envy." 78

The Poet stood. Then turned. "Since he is silent," he said to me, "do not you waste this hour, if you wish to ask about his life or torment." 81

And I replied: "Question him for my part,
 on whatever you think I would do well to hear;
 I could not, such compassion chokes my heart." 84

The Poet began again: "That this man may with all his heart do for you what your words entreat him to, imprisoned spirit, I pray, 87

tell us how the soul is bound and bent into these knots, and whether any ever frees itself from such imprisonment." 90

At that the trunk blew powerfully, and then the wind became a voice that spoke these words:
 "Briefly is the answer given: when 93 out of the flesh from which it tore itself,

 the violent spirit comes to punishment,
 Minos assigns it to the seventh shelf. 96

6. I.e., "I unjustly committed suicide even though I was innocent of the accusations brought against me."

It falls into the wood, and landing there, wherever fortune flings it, it strikes root, and there it sprouts, lusty as any tare, 99

shoots up a sapling, and becomes a tree.
 The Harpies, feeding on its leaves then, give it pain and pain's outlet simultaneously. 102

Like the rest, we shall go for our husks on Judgment Day, but not that we may wear them, for it is not just that a man be given what he throws away. 105

Here shall we drag them and in this mournful glade
 our bodies will dangle to the end of time, each on the thorns of its tormented shade." 108

We waited by the trunk, but it said no more;
 and waiting, we were startled by a noise that grew through all the wood. Just such a roar 111 and trembling as one feels when the boar and chase approach his stand, the beasts and branches crashing and clashing in the heat of the fierce race. 114

And there on the left, running so violently they broke off every twig in the dark wood, two torn and naked wraiths went plunging by me.<sup>7</sup> 117

The leader cried, "Come now, O Death! Come now!"
 And the other, seeing that he was outrun, cried out: "Your legs were not so ready, Lano, 120 in the jousts at the Toppo."<sup>8</sup> And suddenly in his rush, perhaps because his breath was failing him,

 he hid himself inside a thorny bush 123 and cowered among its leaves. Then at his back, the wood leaped with black bitches, swift as greyhounds escaping from their leash, and all the pack 126

sprang on him; with their fangs they opened him and tore him savagely, and then withdrew, carrying his body with them, limb by limb. 129

Then, taking me by the hand across the wood, my Master led me toward the bush. Lamenting, all its fractures blew out words and blood:<sup>9</sup> 132

7. Lano of Siena and Giacomo da Sant' Andrea of Padua, two Italians of a generation earlier than Dante's; both were reputed to be spend-thrifts.

8. Lano was killed at a battle on the river Toppo in 1287.

9. Nothing is known about this suicide, who hanged himself from his own house.

“O Jacomo da Sant’ Andrea!” it said,
 “what have you gained in making me your screen?
 What part had I in the foul life you led?” 135

And when my Master had drawn up to it he said: “Who were you, who through all your wounds blow out your blood with your lament, sad spirit?” 138

And he to us: “You who have come to see how the outrageous mangling of these hounds has torn my boughs and stripped my leaves from me, 141

O heap them round my ruin! I was born in the city that tore down Mars and raised the Baptist.<sup>1</sup>
 On that account the God of War has sworn 144 her sorrow shall not end. And were it not that something of his image still survives on the bridge across the Arno,<sup>2</sup> some have thought 147

those citizens who of their love and pain afterwards rebuilt it from the ashes left by Attila, would have worked in vain.<sup>3</sup> 150

I am one who has no tale to tell:
 I made myself a gibbet of my own lintel.”

Canto XIV

CIRCLE SEVEN: ROUND THREE

The Violent against God, Nature, and Art

Dante, in pity, restores the torn leaves to the soul of his countryman and the Poets move on to the next round, a great Plain of Burning Sand upon which there descends an eternal slow Rain of Fire. Here, scorched by fire from above and below, are three classes of sinners suffering differing degrees of exposure to the fire. The Blasphemers (The Violent against God) are stretched supine upon the sand, the Sodomites (The Violent against Nature) run in endless circles, and the Usurers (The Violent against Art, which is the Grandchild of God) huddle on the sands.

The Poets find Capaneus stretched out on the sands, the chief sinner of that place. He is still blaspheming God. They continue along the edge of the Wood of the Suicides and come to a blood-red rill which flows boiling from the Wood and crosses the burning plain. Virgil explains the miraculous power of its waters and discourses on the Old Man of Crete and the origin of all the rivers of Hell.

The symbolism of the burning plain is obviously centered in sterility (the desert image) and wrath (the fire image). Blasphemy, sodomy, and usury are all unnatural

1. Florence; when the Florentines converted to Christianity, John the Baptist replaced Mars as patron of the city, and therefore Mars would forever persecute the city with civil war.

2. The river that runs through Florence.

3. According to legend, Attila the Hun destroyed Florence when he invaded Italy in the 5th century.

and sterile actions: thus the unbearing desert is the eternity of these sinners; and thus the rain, which in nature should be fertile and cool, descends as fire. Capaneus, moreover, is subjected not only to the wrath of nature (the sands below) and the wrath of God (the fire from above), but is tortured most by his own inner violence, which is the root of blasphemy.

Love of that land that was our common source moved me to tears; I gathered up the leaves and gave them back. He was already hoarse. 3

We came to the edge of the forest where one goes from the second round to the third,<sup>4</sup> and there we saw what fearful arts the hand of Justice knows. 6

To make these new things wholly clear, I say we came to a plain whose soil repels all roots.
 The wood of misery rings it the same way 9

the wood itself is ringed by the red fosse.
 We paused at its edge: the ground was burning sand, just such a waste as Cato<sup>5</sup> marched across. 12

O endless wrath of God: how utterly thou shouldst become a terror to all men who read the frightful truths revealed to me! 15

Enormous herds of naked souls I saw, lamenting till their eyes were burned of tears;
 they seemed condemned by an unequal law, 18

for some were stretched supine upon the ground, some squatted with their arms about themselves,
 and others without pause roamed round and round. 21

Most numerous were those that roamed the plain.
 Far fewer were the souls stretched on the sand,
 but moved to louder cries by greater pain. 24

And over all that sand on which they lay or crouched or roamed, great flakes of flame fell slowly as snow falls in the Alps on a windless day. 27

Like those Alexander met in the hot regions of India, flames raining from the sky to fall still unextinguished on his legions: 30

4. The third ring of the seventh circle is surrounded by the second ring of the woods through which Dante has just passed and the first ring of the river of blood described in canto 12.

5. Roman general (1st century B.C.E.) who campaigned in Libya.

whereat he formed his ranks, and at their head set the example, trampling the hot ground for fear the tongues of fire might join and spread—<sup>6</sup> 33

just so in Hell descended the long rain upon the damned, kindling the sand like tinder under a flint and steel, doubling the pain. 36

In a never-ending fit upon those sands,
 the arms of the damned twitched all about their bodies,
 now here, now there, brushing away the brands. 39

“Poet,” I said, “master of every dread we have encountered, other than those fiends who sallied from the last gate of the dead— 42

who is that wraith who lies along the rim and sets his face against the fire in scorn, so that the rain seems not to mellow him?”<sup>7</sup> 45

And he himself, hearing what I had said to my Guide and Lord concerning him, replied:
 “What I was living, the same am I now, dead. 48

Though Jupiter wear out his sooty smith<sup>8</sup> from whom on my last day he snatched in anger the jagged thunderbolt he pierced me with; 51

though he wear out the others one by one who labor at the forge at Mongibello<sup>9</sup> crying again ‘Help! Help! Help me, good Vulcan!’ 54

as he did at Phlegra;<sup>1</sup> and hurl down endlessly with all the power of Heaven in his arm, small satisfaction would he win from me.” 57

At this my Guide spoke with such vehemence as I had not heard from him in all of Hell: “O Capaneus, by your insolence 60

you are made to suffer as much fire inside as falls upon you. Only your own rage could be fit torment for your sullen pride.” 63

6. Dante is here following an account by the philosopher Albertus Magnus (d. 1280) of a legendary adventure that befell Alexander the Great in his conquest of India.

7. Capaneus, one of the seven legendary kings who besieged Thebes as described in the Thebaid by Statius (d. 95 C.E.). He was struck with a thunderbolt when he boasted that not even Jupiter could stop him.

8. Vulcan, Roman god of fire, volcanoes, and the forge; equivalent of Greek Hephaestus.

9. The Sicilian name for Mt. Etna, thought to be Vulcan’s furnace; “the others” are the Cyclopes, Vulcan’s helpers.

1. Jove defeated the rebellious Titans at the battle of Phlegra (see 31.42).

Then he turned to me more gently. "That," he said,
 "was one of the Seven who laid siege to Thebes.
 Living, he scorned God, and among the dead 66

he scorns Him yet. He thinks he may detest God's power too easily, but as I told him, his slobber is a fit badge for his breast. 69

Now follow me; and mind for your own good you do not step upon the burning sand, but keep well back along the edge of the wood." 72

We walked in silence then till we reached a rill that gushes from the wood; it ran so red the memory sends a shudder through me still. 75

As from the Bulicame<sup>2</sup> springs the stream
 the sinful women keep to their own use;
 so down the sand the rill flowed out in steam. 78

The bed and both its banks were petrified, as were its margins; thus I knew at once our passage through the sand lay by its side. 81

"Among all other wonders I have shown you since we came through the gate denied to none, nothing your eyes have seen is equal to 84

the marvel of the rill by which we stand, for it stifles all the flames above its course as it flows out across the burning sand." 87

So spoke my Guide across the flickering light, and I begged him to bestow on me the food for which he had given me the appetite. 90

"In the middle of the sea, and gone to waste,
 there lies a country known as Crete," he said,
 "under whose king the ancient world was chaste."<sup>3</sup> 93

Once Rhea chose it as the secret crypt and cradle of her son; and better to hide him, her Corybantes raised a din when he wept."<sup>4</sup> 96

2. A hot sulphurous spring that supplied water to brothels in an area of northern Italy.

3. Saturn, mythical king of Crete during the Golden Age.

4. Jupiter was hidden by his mother, Rhea, from his father, Saturn, who tried to devour all his children to thwart a prophecy that he would be dethroned by one of them. So that Saturn would not hear the infant's cries, Rhea had her servants, the Corybantes (or Bacchantes), cry out and beat their shields with their swords.

- An ancient giant stands in the mountain's core.
 He keeps his shoulder turned toward Damietta,<sup>5</sup> and looks toward Rome as if it were his mirror. 99
- His head is made of gold; of silverwork his breast and both his arms, of polished brass the rest of his great torso to the fork. 102
- He is of chosen iron from there down, except that his right foot is terra cotta;
 it is this foot he rests more weight upon.<sup>6</sup> 105
- Every part except the gold is split by a great fissure from which endless tears drip down and hollow out the mountain's pit. 108
- Their course sinks to this pit from stone to stone, becoming Acheron, Phlegethon, and Styx.
 Then by this narrow sluice they hurtle down 111
- to the end of all descent, and disappear into Cocytus.<sup>7</sup> You shall see what sink that is with your own eyes. I pass it in silence here." 114
- And I to him: "But if these waters flow from the world above, why is this rill met only along this shelf?" And he to me: "You know 117
- the place is round, and though you have come deep into the valley through the many circles, always bearing left along the steep, 120
- you have not traveled any circle through its total round; hence when new things appear from time to time, that hardly should surprise you." 123
- And I: "Where shall we find Phlegethon's course?
 And Lethe's?<sup>8</sup> One you omit, and of the other you only say the tear-flood is its source." 126
- "In all you ask of me you please me truly," he answered, "but the red and boiling water should answer the first question you put to me,"<sup>9</sup> 129

5. A city in Egypt. The Old Man has been interpreted as an emblem of the decline of human history.

6. The four metals and the clay represent the degeneration of history; Dante took this image from Daniel 2.31–35.

7. The frozen lake at the bottom of Hell: see 32.22–30 and 34.52.

8. Lethe, the river of forgetting, is crossed when Dante passes into the Earthly Paradise on the top of Mount Purgatory.

9. See note 9 to 12.101.

and you shall stand by Lethe, but far hence:
 there, where the spirits go to wash themselves
 when their guilt has been removed by penitence." 132

And then he said: "Now it is time to quit this edge of shade: follow close after me along the rill, and do not stray from it; 135 for the unburning margins form a lane, and by them we may cross the burning plain."

Canto XV

CIRCLE SEVEN: ROUND THREE

The Violent against Nature

Protected by the marvelous powers of the boiling rill, the Poets walk along its banks across the burning plain. The Wood of the Suicides is behind them; the Great Cliff at whose foot lies the Eighth Circle is before them.

They pass one of the roving bands of Sodomites. One of the sinners stops Dante, and with great difficulty the Poet recognizes him under his baked features as Ser Brunetto Latino. This is a reunion with a dearly loved man and writer, one who had considerably influenced Dante's own development, and Dante addresses him with great and sorrowful affection, paying him the highest tribute offered to any sinner in the Inferno. Brunetto prophesies Dante's sufferings at the hands of the Florentines, gives an account of the souls that move with him through the fire, and finally, under Divine Compulsion, races off across the plain.

We go by one of the stone margins now and the steam of the rivulet makes a shade above it, guarding the stream and banks from the flaming snow. 3

As the Flemings in the lowland between Bruges and Wissant,<sup>1</sup> under constant threat of the sea, erect their great dikes to hold back the deluge; 6

as the Paduans along the shores of the Brent<sup>2</sup> build levees to protect their towns and castles Jest Chiarentana drown in the spring torrent— 9 to the same plan, though not so wide nor high, did the engineer, whoever he may have been,

 design the margin we were crossing by. 12

Already we were so far from the wood that even had I turned to look at it,
 I could not have made it out from where I stood, 15

1. Cities that, for Dante, mark the two ends of the dike that protects Flanders from the sea.

2. A river that flows through Padua, fed by the melting snows in the mountains of the province of Chiarentana (modern Carinthia in Austria).

when a company of shades came into sight walking beside the bank. They stared at us as men at evening by the new moon's light 18 stare at one another when they pass by on a dark road, pointing their eyebrows toward us as an old tailor squints at his needle's eye. 21

Stared at so closely by that ghostly crew,
 I was recognized by one who seized the hem of my skirt and said: "Wonder of wonders! You?" 24

And I, when he stretched out his arm to me, searched his baked features closely, till at last I traced his image from my memory 27 in spite of the burnt crust, and bending near to put my face closer to his, at last I answered: "Ser Brunetto,<sup>3</sup> are you here?" 30

"O my son! may it not displease you," he cried,
 "if Brunetto Latino leave his company and turn and walk a little by your side." 33

And I to him: "With all my soul I ask it.
 Or let us sit together, if it please him who is my Guide and leads me through this pit." 36

"My son!" he said, "whoever of this train pauses a moment, must lie a hundred years forbidden to brush off the burning rain. 39

Therefore, go on; I will walk at your hem, and then rejoin my company, which goes mourning eternal loss in eternal flame." 42

I did not dare descend to his own level but kept my head inclined, as one who walks in reverence meditating good and evil. 45

"What brings you here before your own last day?
 What fortune or what destiny?" he began.
 "And who is he that leads you this dark way?" 48

"Up there in the happy life I went astray in a valley," I replied, "before I had reached the fullness of my years. Only yesterday 51

3. Brunetto Latini (ca. 1220–1294), active in Florentine politics and the author of—among other works—two books: a prose encyclopedia in French called the Trésor, which emphasizes the qualities needed for civic duty, and a shorter allegorical poem in Italian called the Tesoretto, which combines autobiography with philosophy.

at dawn I turned from it. This spirit showed himself to me as I was turning back, and guides me home again along this road.” 54

And he: “Follow your star, for if in all of the sweet life I saw one truth shine clearly, you cannot miss your glorious arrival. 57

And had I lived to do what I meant to do,
 I would have cheered and seconded your work,
 observing Heaven so well disposed toward you. 60

But that ungrateful and malignant stock that came down from Fiesole<sup>4</sup> of old and still smacks of the mountain and the rock, 63

for your good works will be your enemy.
 And there is cause: the sweet fig is not meant to bear its fruit beside the bitter sorb-tree.<sup>5</sup> 66

Even the old adage calls them blind, an envious, proud, and avaricious people:
 see that you root their customs from your mind. 69

It is written in your stars, and will come to pass, that your honours shall make both sides hunger for you:
 but the goat shall never reach to crop that grass.<sup>6</sup> 72

Let the beasts of Fiesole devour their get like sows, but never let them touch the plant, if among their rankness any springs up yet, 75

in which is born again the holy seed of the Romans who remained among their rabble
 when Florence made a new nest for their greed.” 78

“Ah, had I all my wish,” I answered then,
 “you would not yet be banished from the world in which you were a radiance among men, 81

for that sweet image, gentle and paternal, you were to me in the world when hour by hour
 you taught me how man makes himself eternal,<sup>7</sup> 84

4. A hill town north of Florence whose rustic inhabitants were supposed to have joined with noble Romans in the founding of Florence, creating an unstable mixture.

5. The “bitter sorb-tree” are the Florentines descended from Fiesole; the “sweet fig” is Brunetto’s term for the aristocratic Dante.

6. “I.e., Either both parties will ask you to join them or both parties will want to devour you—but keep yourself apart.”

7. In the Trésor, Brunetto says that earthly glory gives man a second life through an enduring reputation.

lives in my mind, and now strikes to my heart;
and while I live, the gratitude I owe it will speak to men out of my life and art. 87

What you have told me of my course, I write by another text I save to show a Lady<sup>8</sup> who will judge these matters, if I reach her height. 90

This much I would have you know: so long, I say,
as nothing in my conscience troubles me
I am prepared for Fortune, come what may. 93

Twice already in the eternal shade
I have heard this prophecy; but let Fortune turn her wheel as she please, and the countryman his spade."<sup>9</sup> 96

My guiding spirit paused at my last word and, turning right about, stood eye to eye to say to me: "Well heeded is well heard." 99

But I did not reply to him, going on with Ser Brunetto to ask him who was with him in the hot sands, the best born and best known. 102

And he to me: "Of some who share this walk it is good to know; of the rest let us say nothing, for the time would be too short for so much talk. 105

In brief, we all were clerks and men of worth, great men of letters, scholars of renown;
all by the one same crime defiled on earth."<sup>1</sup> 108

Priscian moves there along the wearisome sad way, and Francesco d'Accorso,<sup>2</sup> and also there, if you had any longing for such scum, 111

you might have seen that one the Servant of Servants sent from the Arno to the Bacchiglione where he left his unnatural organ wrapped in cerements."<sup>3</sup> 114

I would say more, but there across the sand
a new smoke rises and new people come, and I must run to be with my own band. 117

8. Beatrice.

9. The traditional image of Fortune and her wheel is here compared to the rustic image of the peasant turning the soil with his hoe.

1. Sodomy, condemned in the Middle Ages as unnatural.

2. Priscian was a Greek grammarian (6th century C.E.); Francesco d'Accorso a Florentine law professor (d. 1293).

3. Andrea de' Mozzi, bishop of Florence (1287–95), transferred by Pope Boniface (designated here by an official title for the pope, "the Servant of [Christ's] Servants") from Florence to Vicenza; the Arno runs through Florence, the Bacchiglione through Vicenza.

Remember my Treasure<sup>4</sup>, in which I still live on:

I ask no more." He turned then, and he seemed, across that plain, like one of those who run for the green cloth<sup>5</sup> at Verona; and of those, more like the one who wins, than those who lose.

120

Canto XVI

CIRCLE SEVEN: ROUND THREE

The Violent against Nature and Art

The Poets arrive within hearing of the waterfall that plunges over the Great Cliff into the Eighth Circle. The sound is still a distant throbbing when three wraiths, recognizing Dante's Florentine dress, detach themselves from their band and come running toward him. They are Jacopo Rusticucci, Guido Cuerra, and Tegghiaio Aldobrandi, all of them Florentines whose policies and personalities Dante admired. Rusticucci and Tegghiaio have already been mentioned in a highly complimentary way in Dante's talk with Ciacco (canto VI).

The sinners ask for news of Florence, and Dante replies with a passionate lament for her present degradation. The three wraiths return to their band and the Poets continue to the top of the falls. Here, at Virgil's command, Dante removes a Cord from about his waist and Virgil drops it over the edge of the abyss. As if in answer to a signal, a great distorted shape comes swimming up through the dirty air of the pit.

We could already hear the rumbling drive of the waterfall in its plunge to the next circle, a murmur like the throbbing of a hive,

3

when three shades turned together on the plain, breaking toward us from a company that went its way to torture in that rain.

6

They cried with one voice as they ran toward me:

"Wait, oh wait, for by your dress you seem a voyager from our own tainted country."<sup>6</sup>

9

Ah! what wounds I saw, some new, some old, branded upon their bodies! Even now the pain of it in memory turns me cold.

12

My Teacher heard their cries, and turning to,
stood face to face. "Do as they ask," he said,
"for these are souls to whom respect is due;

15 and were it not for the darting flames that hem our narrow passage in, I should have said it were more fitting you ran after them."<sup>7</sup>

18

4. "Treasure": i.e., Latini's encyclopedia, the Trésor (French).

5. A footrace run at Verona on the first Sunday in Lent, the prize being a piece of green cloth. For the race to be run by the Christian, see 1 Corinthians 9.24–25.

6. Florence.

7. To hurry was considered undignified.

We paused, and they began their ancient wail over again, and when they stood below us they formed themselves into a moving wheel. 21

As naked and anointed champions do in feeling out their grasp and their advantage before they close in for the thrust or blow—<sup>8</sup> 24

so circling, each one stared up at my height, and as their feet moved left around the circle,
 their necks kept turning backward to the right. 27

“If the misery of this place, and our unkempt and scorched appearance,” one of them began, “bring us and what we pray into contempt, 30 still may our earthly fame move you to tell who and what you are, who so securely set your live feet to the dead dusts of Hell. 33

This peeled and naked soul who runs before me around this wheel, was higher than you think there in the world, in honor and degree. 36

Guido Guerra<sup>9</sup> was the name he bore, the good Gualdrada’s grandson. In his life he won great fame in counsel and in war. 39

The other who behind me treads this sand was Tegghiaio Aldobrandi,<sup>1</sup> whose good counsels
 the world would have done well to understand. 42

And I who share their torment, in my life was Jacopo Rusticucci;<sup>2</sup> above all I owe my sorrows to a savage wife.” 45

I would have thrown myself to the plain below had I been sheltered from the falling fire;
 and I think my Teacher would have let me go. 48

But seeing I should be burned and cooked, my fear overcame the first impulse of my heart to leap down and embrace them then and there. 51

“Not contempt,” I said, “but the compassion that seizes on my soul and memory at the thought of you tormented in this fashion— 54

8. The three naked Florentines form a circle and are compared to oiled wrestlers (a sport practiced in Dante’s time).
 9. A leading participant in the civil strife in Florence (d. 1272).

1. An ally of Guido (see 6.76).

2. An ally of Tegghiaio who blames his wife for his sodomy (see 6.77).

it was grief that choked my speech when through the scorching air of this pit my Lord announced to me that such men as you are might be approaching. 57

I am of your own land, and I have always heard with affection and rehearsed with honor your name and the good deeds of your happier days. 60

Led by my Guide and his truth, I leave the gall and go for the sweet apples of delight.<sup>3</sup>
 But first I must descend to the center of all.” 63

“So may your soul and body long continue together on the way you go,” he answered, “and the honor of your days shine after you— 66 tell me if courtesy and valor raise their banners in our city as of old, or has the glory faded from its days? 69

For Borsiere,<sup>4</sup> who is newly come among us and yonder goes with our companions in pain, taunts us with such reports, and his words have stung us.”<sup>5</sup> 72

“O Florence! your sudden wealth and your upstart rabble, dissolute and overweening, already set you weeping in your heart!” 75

I cried with face upraised, and on the sand those three sad spirits looked at one another like men who hear the truth and understand. 78

“If this be your manner of speaking, and if you can satisfy others with such ease and grace,” they said as one, “we hail a happy man. 81

Therefore, if you win through this gloomy pass and climb again to see the heaven of stars;
 when it rejoices you to say ‘I was,’ 84 speak of us to the living.” They parted then, breaking their turning wheel, and as they vanished over the plain, their legs seemed wings. “Amen” 87 could not have been pronounced between their start and their disappearance over the rim of sand.

 And then it pleased my Master to depart. 90

3. I.e., leave Hell and head for Paradise.

4. An elegant member of Florentine society.

5. An account of the recent dissension within the city, to which Dante himself was soon to fall victim.

A little way beyond we felt the quiver and roar of the cascade, so close that speech would have been drowned in thunder. As that river— 93

the first one on the left of the Apennines<sup>6</sup> to have a path of its own from Monte Veso to the Adriatic Sea—which, as it twines 96 is called the Acquacheta from its source until it nears Forlì, and then is known as the Montone in its further course— 99 resounds from the mountain in a single leap there above San Benedetto dell'Alpe where a thousand falls might fit into the steep; 102

so down from a sheer bank, in one enormous plunge, the tainted water roared so loud
a little longer there would have deafened us. 105

I had a cord bound round me like a belt<sup>7</sup> which I had once thought I might put to use to snare the leopard with the gaudy pelt.<sup>8</sup> 108

When at my Guide's command I had unbound its loops from about my habit, I gathered it and held it out to him all coiled and wound. 111

He bent far back to his right, and throwing it out from the edge, sent it in a long arc into the bottomless darkness of the pit. 114

"Now surely some unusual event,"
I said to myself, "must follow this new signal upon which my good Guide is so intent." 117

Ah, how cautiously a man should breathe near those who see not only what we do, but have the sense which reads the mind beneath!<sup>9</sup> 120

He said to me: "You will soon see arise what I await, and what you wonder at;
soon you will see the thing before your eyes." 123

6. Dante compares the roar of Phlegethon to the river Montone in the Apennine Mountains of northern Italy, whose course he traces in the next nine lines.

7. While commentators disagree, it seems likely that this cord is a reference both to Job 41.1, where God says he can draw Leviathan up with a hook and bind his tongue with a cord, and to Francis of Assisi, who wore a cord as a sign of humility and obedience. As a layman, Dante may have had a connection with the Franciscan friars, a common circumstance at the time.

8. The leopard of canto 1, representing fraud.

9. Dante now realizes that Virgil can read his thoughts.

To the truth which will seem falsehood every man who would not be called a liar while speaking fact should learn to seal his lips as best he can. 126

But here I cannot be still: Reader, I swear by the lines of my Comedy—so may it live—that I saw swimming up through that foul air 129

a shape to astonish the most doughty soul,
 a shape like one returning through the sea from working loose an anchor run afoul 132 of something on the bottom—so it rose, its arms spread upward and its feet drawn close.

Canto XVII

CIRCLE SEVEN: ROUND THREE

The Violent against Art. Geryon

The monstrous shape lands on the brink and Virgil salutes it ironically. It is Geryon, the Monster of Fraud. Virgil announces that they must fly down from the cliff on the back of this monster. While Virgil negotiates for their passage, Dante is sent to examine the Usurers (The Violent against Art).

These sinners sit in a crouch along the edge of the burning plain that approaches the cliff. Each of them has a leather purse around his neck, and each purse is blazoned with a coat of arms. Their eyes, gushing with tears, are forever fixed on these purses. Dante recognizes none of these sinners, but their coats of arms are unmistakably those of well-known Florentine families.

Having understood who they are and the reason for their present condition, Dante cuts short his excursion and returns to find Virgil mounted on the back of Geryon. Dante joins his Master and they fly down from the great cliff.

Their flight carries them from the Hell of the Violent and the Bestial (The Sins of the Lion) into the Hell of the Fraudulent and Malicious (The Sins of the Leopard).

“Now see the sharp-tailed beast that mounts the brink.
 He passes mountains, breaks through walls and weapons.
 Behold the beast that makes the whole world stink.”<sup>1</sup> 3

These were the words my Master spoke to me;
 then signaled the weird beast to come to ground
 close to the sheer end of our rocky levee. 6

The filthy prototype of Fraud drew near and settled his head and breast upon the edge of the dark cliff, but let his tail hang clear. 9

1. Geryon, the embodiment of fraud. For this figure Dante drew upon classical literature, where Geryon had not three natures—human, reptilian, and bestial—combined into one, as here, but three bodies and three heads.

His face was innocent of every guile, benign and just in feature and expression;
and under it his body was half reptile. 12

His two great paws were hairy to the armpits;
all his back and breast and both his flanks were figured with bright knots and subtle circlets: 15 never was such a tapestry of bloom woven on earth by Tartar or by Turk, nor by Arachne<sup>2</sup> at her flowering loom. 18

As a ferry sometimes lies along the strand, part beached and part afloat; and as the beaver,<sup>3</sup> up yonder in the guzzling Germans'<sup>4</sup> land, 21 squats halfway up the bank when a fight is on—just so lay that most ravenous of beasts on the rim which bounds the burning sand with stone. 24

His tail twitched in the void beyond that lip, thrashing, and twisting up the envenomed fork which, like a scorpion's stinger, armed the tip. 27

My Guide said: "It is time now we drew near that monster." And descending on the right we moved ten paces outward to be clear 30 of sand and flames. And when we were beside him, I saw upon the sand a bit beyond us some people crouching close beside the brim. 33

The Master paused. "That you may take with you the full experience of this round," he said,
"go now and see the last state of that crew. 36

But let your talk be brief, and I will stay and reason with this beast till you return, that his strong back may serve us on our way." 39

So further yet along the outer edge of the seventh circle I moved on alone.
And came to the sad people of the ledge. 42

Their eyes burst with their grief; their smoking hands jerked about their bodies, warding off now the flames and now the burning sands. 45

2. A woman in classical literature famous for weaving, who was turned into a spider: see Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.

3. Which was thought to catch fish by putting its tail into the water.

4. Accusing Germans of drunkenness was a tradition going back to the Romans.

Dogs in summer bit by fleas and gadflies, jerking their snouts about, twitching their paws
now here, now there, behave no otherwise. 48

I examined several faces there among that sooty throng, and I saw none I knew;
but I observed that from each neck there hung 51

an enormous purse, each marked with its own beast and its own colors like a coat of arms.
On these their streaming eyes appeared to feast.<sup>5</sup> 54

Looking about, I saw one purse display
azure on or, a kind of lion; another, on a blood-red field, a goose whiter than whey. 57

And one that bore a huge and swollen sow azure on field argent said to me:
“What are you doing in this pit of sorrow? 60

Leave us alone! And since you have not yet died, I’ll have you know my neighbor Vitaliano has a place reserved for him here at my side.<sup>6</sup> 63

A Paduan among Florentines, I sit here while hour by hour they nearly deafen me shouting: ‘Send us the sovereign cavalier<sup>7</sup> 66 with the purse of the three goats!’” He half arose, twisted his mouth, and darted out his tongue for all the world like an ox licking its nose. 69

And I, afraid that any longer stay would anger him who had warned me to be brief, left those exhausted souls without delay. 72

Returned, I found my Guide already mounted upon the rump of that monstrosity.
He said to me: “Now must you be undaunted: 75

this beast must be our stairway to the pit:
mount it in front, and I will ride between you and the tail, lest you be poisoned by it.”<sup>8</sup> 78

5. These are usurers, men who lent money for interest, which was forbidden by the Catholic Church in the Middle Ages (although often practiced). Each has a coat of arms on his purse by which he can be identified; all are Italians.

6. The speaker is from Padua and here maliciously identifies another Paduan who will soon be joining him.

7. A prominent Florentine banker.

8. Virgil protects Dante from Geryon’s scorpion’s tail.

Like one so close to the quartanary chill that his nails are already pale and his flesh trembles at the very sight of shade or a cool rill— 81

so did I tremble at each frightful word.
 But his scolding filled me with that shame that makes the servant brave in the presence of his lord. 84

I mounted the great shoulders of that freak and tried to say “Now help me to hold on!”
 But my voice clicked in my throat and I could not speak. 87

But no sooner had I settled where he placed me than he, my stay, my comfort, and my courage in other perils, gathered and embraced me. 90

Then he called out: “Now, Geryon, we are ready:
 bear well in mind that his is living weight and make your circles wide and your flight steady.” 93

As a small ship slides from a beaching or its pier, backward, backward—so that monster slipped back from the rim. And when he had drawn clear 96

he swung about, and stretching out his tail
 he worked it like an eel, and with his paws he gathered in the air, while I turned pale. 99

I think there was no greater fear the day
 Phaeton<sup>9</sup> let loose the reins and burned the sky along the great scar of the Milky Way, 102

nor when Icarus,<sup>1</sup> too close to the sun’s track felt the wax melt, unfeathering his loins, and heard his father cry “Turn back! Turn back!”— 105 than I felt when I found myself in air, afloat in space with nothing visible

 but the enormous beast that bore me there. 108

Slowly, slowly, he swims on through space, wheels and descends, but I can sense it only by the way the wind blows upward past my face. 111

Already on the right I heard the swell and thunder of the whirlpool. Looking down
 I leaned my head out and stared into Hell. 114

9. Son of Apollo, Phaeton tried to drive the chariot of the sun, but when it got out of control it scorched both Earth and the heavens, creating the Milky Way (Ovid, Metamorphoses 2).

1. Flying with wings made of wax and feathers, Icarus, the son of Daedalus, went too near the sun and fell (Ovid, Metamorphoses 8).

I trembled again at the prospect of dismounting and cowered in on myself, for I saw fires on every hand, and I heard a long lamenting. 117

And then I saw—till then I had but felt it—the course of our down-spiral to the horrors that rose to us from all sides of the pit. 120

As a flight-worn falcon sinks down wearily though neither bird nor lure has signalled it, the falconer crying out: “What! spent already!”— 123

then turns and in a hundred spinning gyres sulks from her master’s call, sullen and proud—<sup>2</sup> so to that bottom lit by endless fires 126

the monster Geryon circled and fell, setting us down at the foot of the precipice of ragged rock on the eighth shelf of Hell. 129

And once freed of our weight, he shot from there into the dark like an arrow into air.

Canto XVIII

CIRCLE EIGHT (MALEBOLGE)

The Fraudulent and Malicious

BOLGIA ONE

The Panderers and Seducers

BOLGIA TWO

The Flatterers

Dismounted from Geryon, the Poets find themselves in the Eighth Circle, called Malebolge (The Evil Ditches). This is the upper half of the Hell of the Fraudulent and Malicious. Malebolge is a great circle of stone that slopes like an amphitheater. The slopes are divided into ten concentric ditches; and within these ditches, each with his own kind, are punished those guilty of Simple Fraud.

A series of stone dikes runs like spokes from the edge of the great cliff face to the center of the place, and these serve as bridges.

The Poets bear left toward the first ditch, and Dante observes below him and to his right the sinners of the first bolgia, the Panderers and Seducers. These make two files, one along either bank of the ditch, and are driven at an endless fast walk by horned demons who hurry them along with great lashes. In life these sinners goaded others on to serve their own foul purposes; so in Hell are they driven in their turn. The horned demons who drive them symbolize the sinners’ own vicious natures, embodiments of their own guilty consciences. Dante may or may not have intended the horns of the demons to symbolize cuckoldry and adultery.

The Poets see Venedico Caccianemico and Jason in the first pit, and pass on to the second, where they find the souls of the Flatterers sunk in excrement, the true

2. Unless it sights prey or is called back with a lure by its master, a trained falcon will continue flying until exhaustion compels it to descend.

equivalent of their false flatteries on earth. They observe Alessio Interminelli and Thaïs, and pass on.

There is in Hell a vast and sloping ground called Malebolge, a lost place of stone as black as the great cliff that seals it round. 3

Precisely in the center of that space there yawns a well extremely wide and deep.
 I shall discuss it in its proper place.<sup>3</sup> 6

The border that remains between the well-pit and the great cliff forms an enormous circle, and ten descending troughs are cut in it, 9 offering a general prospect like the ground that lies around one of those ancient castles whose walls are girded many times around 12

by concentric moats. And just as, from the portal, the castle's bridges run from moat to moat to the last bank; so from the great rock wall 15 across the embankments and the ditches, high and narrow cliffs run to the central well, which cuts and gathers them like radii. 18

Here, shaken from the back of Geryon, we found ourselves. My Guide kept to the left and I walked after him. So we moved on. 21

Below, on my right, and filling the first ditch along both banks, new souls in pain appeared, new torments, and new devils black as pitch. 24

All of these sinners were naked; on our side of the middle they walked toward us; on the other,
 in our direction, but with swifter stride. 27

Just so the Romans, because of the great throng in the year of the Jubilee,<sup>4</sup> divide the bridge in order that the crowds may pass along, 30

so that all face the Castle as they go on one side toward St. Peter's, while on the other, all move along facing toward Mount Giordano. 33

3. The last, or ninth, circle of Hell, described in cantos 31–34.

4. The year 1300 was declared the first-ever Jubilee Year by Pope Boniface, and Dante here describes the crowd control on the bridge that ran between the Castle of St. Angelo and St. Peter's Basilica in Rome.

And everywhere along that hideous track
 I saw horned demons with enormous lashes move through those souls, scourging them on the back. 36

Ah, how the stragglers of that long rout stirred their legs quick-march at the first crack of the lash!
 Certainly no one waited a second, or third! 39

As we went on, one face in that procession caught my eye and I said: "That sinner there:
 It is certainly not the first time I've seen that one."<sup>5</sup> 42

I stopped, therefore, to study him, and my Guide out of his kindness waited, and even allowed me to walk back a few steps at the sinner's side. 45

And that flayed spirit, seeing me turn around, thought to hide his face, but I called to him:
 "You there, that walk along with your eyes on the ground— 48

if those are not false features, then I know you as Venedico Caccianemico of Bologna:
 what brings you here among this pretty crew?" 51

And he replied: "I speak unwillingly, but something in your living voice, in which I hear the world again, stirs and compels me. 54

It was I who brought the fair Ghisola 'round to serve the will and lust of the Marquis, however sordid that old tale may sound. 57

There are many more from Bologna who weep away eternity in this ditch; we fill it so there are not as many tongues that are taught to say 60

'sipa'<sup>6</sup> in all the land that lies between the Reno and the Saveno, as you must know from the many tales of our avarice and spleen." 63

And as he spoke, one of those lashes fell across his back, and a demon cried, "Move on,
 you pimp, there are no women here to sell." 66

Turning away then, I rejoined my Guide.
 We came in a few steps to a raised ridge that made a passage to the other side. 69

5. This is Venedico Caccianemico, a man from Bologna who was reputed to have turned his sister Ghisolabella over to the Marquis of Este.

6. Sipa is a word for "yes" in the dialect spoken in the territory between the rivers Savena and Reno, which comprise the boundaries of Bologna.

This we climbed easily, and turning right along the jagged crest, we left behind the eternal circling of those souls in flight. 72

And when we reached the part at which the stone was tunneled for the passage of the scourged, my Guide said, "Stop a minute and look down 75

on these other misbegotten wraiths of sin.
 You have not seen their faces, for they moved in the same direction we were headed in." 78

So from that bridge we looked down on the throng that hurried toward us on the other side.
 Here, too, the whiplash hurried them along. 81

And the good Master, studying that train, said: "Look there, at that great soul that approaches and seems to shed no tears for all his pain— 84

what kingliness moves with him even in Hell!
 It is Jason,<sup>7</sup> who by courage and good advice made off with the Colchian Ram. Later it fell 87 that he passed Lemnos, where the women of wrath, enraged by Venus' curse that drove their lovers out of their arms, put all their males to death. 90

There with his honeyed tongue and his dishonest lover's wiles, he gulled Hypsipyle, who, in the slaughter, had gulled all the rest. 93

And there he left her, pregnant and forsaken.
 Such guilt condemns him to such punishment;
 and also for Medea is vengeance taken. 96

All seducers march here to the whip.
 And let us say no more about this valley and those it closes in its stony grip." 99

We had already come to where the walk crosses the second bank, from which it lifts another arch, spanning from rock to rock. 102

Here we heard people whine in the next chasm, and knock and thump themselves with open palms, and blubber through their snouts as if in a spasm. 105

7. Jason led the Argonauts on the voyage to the island of Colchis, where they stole the Golden Fleece. He seduced and abandoned Hypsipyle, who had hidden her father when the other women of Lemnos were killing all the males. He also married and later abandoned Medea, the daughter of the king of Colchis. For his story, see Ovid, Metamorphoses 7.

Steaming from that pit, a vapour rose over the banks, crusting them with a slime that sickened my eyes and hammered at my nose. 108

That chasm sinks so deep we could not sight its bottom anywhere until we climbed along the rock arch to its greatest height. 111

Once there, I peered down; and I saw long lines of people in a river of excrement that seemed the overflow of the world's latrines. 114

I saw among the felons of that pit one wraith who might or might not have been tonsured—one could not tell, he was so smeared with shit. 117

He bellowed: "You there, why do you stare at me more than at all the others in this stew?"
 And I to him: "Because if memory 120 serves me, I knew you when your hair was dry.

 You are Alessio Interminelli da Lucca.<sup>8</sup>
 That's why I pick you from this filthy fry." 123

And he then, beating himself on his clown's head:
 "Down to this have the flatteries I sold the living sunk me here among the dead." 126

And my Guide prompted then: "Lean forward a bit and look beyond them, there—do you see that one scratching herself with dungy nails, the strumpet 129 who fidgets to her feet, then to a crouch?

 It is the whore Thaïs<sup>9</sup> who told her lover
 when he sent to ask her, 'Do you thank me much?' 132 'Much? Nay, past all believing!' And with this let us turn away from the sight of this abyss."

Canto XIX

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA THREE

The Simoniacs

Dante comes upon the Simoniacs (sellers of ecclesiastic favors and offices) and his heart overflows with the wrath he feels against those who corrupt the things of God. This bolgia is lined with round tube-like holes and the sinners are placed in them upside down with the soles of their feet ablaze. The heat of the blaze is proportioned to their guilt.

8. A prominent citizen of Lucca, in northern Italy.

9. A character in a play by the Roman writer Terence (ca. 186–ca. 159 B.C.E.).

The holes in which these sinners are placed are debased equivalents of the baptismal fonts common in the cities of Northern Italy and the sinners' confinement in them is temporary: as new sinners arrive, the souls drop through the bottoms of their holes and disappear eternally into the crevices of the rock.

As always, the punishment is a symbolic retribution. Just as the Simoniacs made a mock of holy office, so are they turned upside down in a mockery of the baptismal font. Just as they made a mockery of the holy water of baptism, so is their hellish baptism by fire, after which they are wholly immersed in the crevices below. The oily fire that licks at their soles may also suggest a travesty on the oil used in Extreme Unction (last rites for the dying).

Virgil carries Dante down an almost sheer ledge and lets him speak to one who is the chief sinner of that place, Pope Nicholas III. Dante delivers himself of another stirring denunciation of those who have corrupted church office, and Virgil carries him back up the steep ledge toward the Fourth Bolgia.

O Simon Magus!<sup>1</sup> O you wretched crew who follow him, pandering for silver and gold the things of God which should be wedded to 3

love and righteousness! O thieves for hire, now must the trump of judgment sound your doom<sup>2</sup> here in the third fosse of the rim of fire! 6

We had already made our way across to the next grave, and to that part of the bridge which hangs above the mid-point of the fosse. 9

O Sovereign Wisdom, how Thine art doth shine in Heaven, on Earth, and in the Evil World!
How justly doth Thy power judge and assign! 12

I saw along the walls and on the ground long rows of holes cut in the livid stone;
all were cut to a size, and all were round. 15

They seemed to be exactly the same size as those in the font of my beautiful San Giovanni,<sup>3</sup> built to protect the priests who come to baptize; 18

(one of which, not so long since, I broke open to rescue a boy who was wedged and drowning in it.
Be this enough to undeceive all men.) 21

1. Because in the Bible Simon Magus tried to buy spiritual power from the apostles (Acts 8.9–24), the selling of any spiritual good for material gain was known in the Middle Ages as simony. The most common form of simony was the selling of church offices.

2. Dante is here applauding the artfulness of divine justice because the simoniacs, who cared most for their purses, are here stuffed into fiery “purses” hewn into the rock; see line 69 below.

3. The baptistery in Florence where Dante himself was baptized. The subsequent personal reference has never been satisfactorily explained.

From every mouth a sinner's legs stuck out as far as the calf. The soles were all ablaze and the joints of the legs quivered and writhed about. 24

Withes and tethers would have snapped in their throes.
 As oiled things blaze upon the surface only, so did they burn from the heels to the points of their toes. 27

"Master," I said, "who is that one in the fire who writhes and quivers more than all the others?
 From him the ruddy flames seem to leap higher."<sup>4</sup> 30

And he to me: "If you wish me to carry you down along that lower bank, you may learn from him who he is, and the evil he has done." 33

And I: "What you will, I will. You are my lord and I know I depart in nothing from your wish;
 and you know my mind beyond my spoken word." 36

We moved to the fourth ridge, and turning left my Guide descended by a jagged path into the strait and perforated cleft. 39

Thus the good Master bore me down the dim and rocky slope, and did not put me down till we reached the one whose legs did penance for him. 42

"Whoever you are, sad spirit," I began,
 "who lie here with your head below your heels and planted like a stake—speak if you can." 45

I stood like a friar who gives the sacrament to a hired assassin, who, fixed in the hole, recalls him, and delays his death a moment.<sup>5</sup> 48

"Are you there already, Boniface? Are you there already?" he cried. "By several years the writ has lied. And all that gold, and all that care— 51 are you already sated with the treasure for which you dared to turn on the Sweet Lady<sup>6</sup> and trick and pluck and bleed her at your pleasure?" 54

4. Pope Nicholas III (r. 1277–80). He mistakenly believes that one of his successors, Boniface VIII, has come to be squeezed into the hole (line 49). Like all damned souls, Nicholas has foreknowledge, and because Boniface did not die until 1303 Nicholas is surprised at what he thinks is his appearance in 1300.

5. Hired murderers were occasionally executed by being placed head-down in a ditch and then buried alive.

6. The Church.

I stood like one caught in some raillery,
 not understanding what is said to him,
 lost for an answer to such mockery. 57

Then Virgil said, "Say to him: 'I am not he,
 I am not whom you think.'" And I replied as my good Master had instructed me. 60

The sinner's feet jerked madly; then again his voice rose, this time choked with sighs and tears, and said at last: "What do you want of me then? 63

If to know who I am drives you so fearfully that you descend the bank to ask it, know that the Great Mantle was once hung upon me. 66

And in truth I was a son of the She-Bear,<sup>7</sup> so sly and eager to push my whelps ahead, that I pursed wealth above, and myself here. 69

Beneath my head are dragged all who have gone before me in buying and selling holy office;
 there they cower in fissures of the stone. 72

I too shall be plunged down when that great cheat for whom I took you comes here in his turn.
 Longer already have I baked my feet 75 and been planted upside-down, than he shall be before the west sends down a lawless Shepherd<sup>8</sup> of uglier deeds to cover him and me. 78

He will be a new Jason<sup>9</sup> of the Maccabees; and just as that king bent to his high priests' will,
 so shall the French king do as this one please." 81

Maybe—I cannot say—I grew too brash at this point, for when he had finished speaking I said: "Indeed! Now tell me how much cash 84

our Lord required of Peter in guarantee before he put the keys into his keeping?
 Surely he asked nothing but 'Follow me!'<sup>1</sup> 87

7. The arms of Nicholas's family (the Orsini) included a "she-bear."

8. Clement V (ca. 1264–1314), who became pope in 1305 after agreeing with the French king to remove the papacy to Avignon in France. He is "from the West" because he was born in western France.

9. Jason became high priest of the Jews by bribing the king; see 2 Maccabees 4.7–9.

1. See Matthew 16.18–19; the keys are the Church's power to bind (condemn) and to loose (absolve). For "follow me," see Matthew 4.18–19.

Nor did Peter, nor the others, ask silver or gold of Matthew when they chose him for the place
 the despicable and damned apostle sold.<sup>2</sup> 90

Therefore stay as you are; this hole well fits you—and keep a good guard on the ill-won wealth that once made you so bold toward Charles of Anjou.<sup>3</sup> 93

And were it not that I am still constrained by the reverence I owe to the Great Keys you held in life, I should not have refrained 96 from using other words and sharper still;

 for this avarice of yours grieves all the world,
 tramples the virtuous, and exalts the evil. 99

Of such as you was the Evangelist's<sup>4</sup> vision when he saw Her who Sits upon the Waters locked with the Kings of earth in fornication. 102

She was born with seven heads, and ten enormous and shining horns strengthened and made her glad as long as love and virtue pleased her spouse. 105

Gold and silver are the gods you adore!
 In what are you different from the idolater, save that he worships one, and you a score? 108

Ah Constantine,<sup>5</sup> what evil marked the hour—not of your conversion, but of the fee
 the first rich Father took from you in dower!" 111

And as I sang him this tune, he began to twitch and kick both feet out wildly, as if in rage or gnawed by conscience—little matter which. 114

And I think, indeed, it pleased my Guide: his look was all approval as he stood beside me intent upon each word of truth I spoke. 117

2. Matthias was chosen by lot to fill the place of Judas (Acts 1.23–26).

3. Nicholas was believed to be involved in a plot against Charles of Anjou (1226–1285), ruler of Naples and Sicily.

4. John, author of Revelation, who in the Middle Ages was identified with the author of the Gospel according to John; for this passage, which was originally interpreted as referring to pagan Rome but which Dante applies to the corrupt Church, see Revelation 17.1–18. The “seven heads” are the seven Sacraments; the “ten . . . horns,” the Ten Commandments; the “spouse,” God.

5. Roman emperor (r. 306–37) who was the supposed author of a document—known as the Donation of Constantine—in which he granted temporal power and the right to acquire wealth to Pope Sylvester I, “the first rich Father” of this passage. The document was proved to be a forgery in the 15th century.

He approached, and with both arms he lifted me,
 and when he had gathered me against his breast, remounted the rocky path out of the valley, 120

nor did he tire of holding me clasped to him, until we reached the topmost point of the arch which crosses from the fourth to the fifth rim 123 of the pits of woe. Arrived upon the bridge, he tenderly set down the heavy burden

 he had been pleased to carry up that ledge 126 which would have been hard climbing for a goat.

 Here I looked down on still another moat.

Canto XX

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGA FOUR

The Fortune Tellers and Diviners

Dante stands in the middle of the bridge over the Fourth Bolgia and looks down at the souls of the Fortune Tellers and Diviners. Here are the souls of all those who attempted by forbidden arts to look into the future. Among these damned are: Amphiaraus, Tiresias, Aruns, Manto, Eurypylos, Michael Scott, Guido Bonatti, and Asdente.

Characteristically, the sin of these wretches is reversed upon them: their punishment is to have their heads turned backwards on their bodies and to be compelled to walk backwards through all eternity, their eyes blinded with tears. Thus, those who sought to penetrate the future cannot even see in front of themselves; they attempted to move themselves forward in time, so must they go backwards through all eternity; and as the arts of sorcery are a distortion of God's law, so are their bodies distorted in Hell.

No more need be said of them: Dante names them, and passes on to fill the canto with a lengthy account of the founding of Virgil's native city of Mantua.

Now must I sing new griefs, and my verses strain to form the matter of the Twentieth Canto of Canticle One, the Canticle of Pain. 3

My vantage point permitted a clear view of the depths of the pit below: a desolation bathed with the tears of its tormented crew, 6 who moved about the circle of the pit at about the pace of a litany procession.<sup>6</sup> Silent and weeping, they wound round and round it. 9

And when I looked down from their faces, I saw that each of them was hideously distorted between the top of the chest and the lines of the jaw; 12

6. A "litany" is a form of public prayer, often recited during stately "processions" in the church.

for the face was reversed on the neck, and they came on backwards, staring backwards at their lions, for to look before them was forbidden. Someone, 15 sometime, in the grip of a palsy may have been distorted so, but never to my knowledge;

 nor do I believe the like was ever seen. 18

Reader, so may God grant you to understand my poem and profit from it, ask yourself how I could check my tears, when near at hand 21

I saw the image of our humanity distorted so that the tears that burst from their eyes ran down the cleft of their buttocks. Certainly 24

I wept. I leaned against the jagged face of a rock and wept so that my Guide said: "Still?
 Still like the other fools? There is no place 27 for pity here. Who is more arrogant within his soul, who is more impious than one who dares to sorrow at God's judgment?<sup>7</sup> 30

Lift up your eyes, lift up your eyes and see him the earth swallowed before all the Thebans, at which they cried out: 'Whither do you flee, 33

Amphiaraus?<sup>8</sup> Why do you leave the field?'
 And he fell headlong through the gaping earth to the feet of Minos, where all sin must yield. 36

Observe how he has made a breast of his back.
 In life he wished to see too far before him,
 and now he must crab backwards round this track. 39

And see Tiresias,<sup>9</sup> who by his arts succeeded in changing himself from man to woman, transforming all his limbs and all his parts; 42

later he had to strike the two twined serpents once again with his conjurer's wand before he could resume his manly lineaments. 45

7. This is a rebuke to Dante, who errs by showing sympathy for the damned.

8. A priest swallowed up by the Earth in a battle against the Thebans as described in Statius's Thebaid (see note 7 to 14.45). For Minos, see 5.4.

9. A soothsayer of Thebes, he struck two coupling serpents with his rod and was transformed into a woman. Seven years later he repeated the action and was changed back into a man. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.

And there is Aruns,<sup>1</sup> his back to that one's belly, the same who in the mountains of the Luni tilled by the people of Carrara's valley, 48

made a white marble cave his den, and there with unobstructed view observed the sea and the turning constellations year by year. 51

And she whose unbound hair flows back to hide her breasts—which you cannot see—and who also wears all of her hairy parts on that other side, 54 was Manto,<sup>2</sup> who searched countries far and near, then settled where I was born. In that connection there is a story I would have you hear. 57

Tiresias was her sire. After his death, Thebes, the city of Bacchus,<sup>3</sup> became enslaved, and for many years she roamed about the earth. 60

High in sweet Italy, under the Alps that shut the Tyrolean gate of Germany, there lies a lake known as Benacus<sup>4</sup> roundabout. 63

Through endless falls, more than a thousand and one,
 Mount Apennine from Garda to Val Camonica,<sup>5</sup> is freshened by the waters that flow down 66 into that lake. At its center is a place where the Bishops of Brescia, Trentine, and Verona might all give benediction with equal grace. 69

Peschiera,<sup>6</sup> the beautiful fortress, strong in war against the Brescians and the Bergamese, sits at the lowest point along that shore. 72

There, the waters Benacus cannot hold within its bosom, spill and form a river that winds away through pastures green and gold. 75

1. An Etruscan soothsayer from the city of Luni, in the area of Carrara where marble is quarried, is described by the Roman poet Lucan (39–65 C.E.) in his Pharsalia.

2. Another Theban soothsayer described by Roman poets.

3. Bacchus (Dionysus) was the son of Jupiter and a mortal woman, Semele, daughter of the king of Thebes.

4. The present-day Lake Garda in northern Italy, located in terms of an island where the boundaries of the three dioceses of Trent, Brescia, and Verona meet.

5. Garda is a town by the lake and Val Camonica a valley below it.

6. Peschiera is a town on the south shore of the lake; the Brescians and the Bergamese are inhabitants of two towns to the northwest of Peschiera.

But once the water gathers its full flow,
 it is called Mincius rather than Benacus from there to Governo,<sup>7</sup> where it joins the Po. 78

Still near its source, it strikes a plain, and there it slows and spreads, forming an ancient marsh which in the summer heat pollutes the air. 81

The terrible virgin, passing there by chance, saw dry land at the center of the mire,
 untilled, devoid of all inhabitants. 84

There, shunning all communion with mankind,
 she settled with the ministers of her arts,
 and there she lived, and there she left behind 87 her vacant corpse. Later the scattered men who lived nearby assembled on that spot since it was well defended by the fen. 90

Over those whited bones they raised the city, and for her who had chosen the place before all others
 they named it—with no further augury— 93

Mantua.<sup>8</sup> Far more people lived there once—before sheer madness prompted Casalodi to let Pinamonte play him for a dunce.<sup>9</sup> 96

Therefore, I charge you, should you ever hear other accounts of this, to let no falsehood confuse the truth which I have just made clear.”<sup>1</sup> 99

And I to him: “Master, within my soul your word is certainty, and any other would seem like the dead lumps of burned out coal. 102

But tell me of those people moving down to join the rest. Are any worth my noting?
 For my mind keeps coming back to that alone.” 105

And he: “That one whose beard spreads like a fleece over his swarthy shoulders, was an augur in the days when so few males remained in Greece 108

7. A town some 30 miles south of Peschiera. Presumably Virgil provides this detailed geography to illustrate that he is a native of this region.

8. Virgil's native city.

9. A reference to the internal intrigues of the rulers of Mantua in the 13th century.

1. Dante's Virgil contradicts the account of Mantua's founding in Aeneid 10.198–200. It is not clear why Dante has Virgil contradict his own poem unless he is trying to clear Virgil of any taint of himself being a magician (see note 9 to 9.20).

that even the cradles were all but empty of sons.
 He chose the time for cutting the cable at Aulis, and Calchas<sup>2</sup> joined him in those divinations. 111

He is Eurypylus. I sing him somewhere in my High Tragedy; you will know the place who know the whole of it. The other there, 114

the one beside him with the skinny shanks was Michael Scott,<sup>3</sup> who mastered every trick of magic fraud, a prince of mountebanks. 117

See Guido Bonatti there; and see Asdente,<sup>4</sup> who now would be wishing he had stuck to his last, but repents too late, though he repents aplenty. 120

And see on every hand the wretched hags<sup>5</sup> who left their spinning and sewing for soothsaying and casting of spells with herbs, and dolls, and rags. 123

But come: Cain<sup>6</sup> with his bush of thorns appears already on the wave below Seville, above the boundary of the hemispheres; 126

and the moon was full already yesternight, as you must well remember from the wood,
 for it certainly did not harm you when its light 129 shone down upon your way before the dawn.”

 And as he spoke to me, we traveled on.

Canto XXI

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA FIVE

The Grafters

The Poets move on, talking as they go, and arrive at the Fifth Bolgia. Here the Grafters are sunk in boiling pitch and guarded by Demons, who tear them to pieces with claws and grappling hooks if they catch them above the surface of the pitch.

The sticky pitch is symbolic of the sticky fingers of the Grafters. It serves also to hide them from sight, as their sinful dealings on earth were hidden from

2. Calchas and Eurypylus were prophets (or augurs) involved in the Trojan War; here Virgil says that they determined when the Greeks were to set out for the war from the island of Aulis, although Aeneid 2 gives a different account.

3. A famous scientist, philosopher, and astrologer from Scotland, Scott spent many years at the court of Frederick II (10.119) in Palermo and died in 1235.

4. A shoemaker famous as a soothsayer in 13th-century Italy. “Guido Bonatti”: an astrologer at the court of Guido da Montefeltro (see canto 27).

5. Common soothsayers and potion makers.

6. Popular belief held that God placed Cain in the moon after the murder of Abel; “Cain with his bush of thorns” means the moon with its spots, which is now setting at the western edge of the Northern Hemisphere. Overhead, in Jerusalem, it is the dawn of Holy Saturday.

men's eyes. The demons, too, suggest symbolic possibilities, for they are armed with grappling hooks and are forever ready to rend and tear all they can get their hands on.

The Poets watch a demon arrive with a grafting Senator of Lucca and fling him into the pitch where the demons set upon him.

To protect Dante from their wrath, Virgil hides him behind some jagged rocks and goes ahead alone to negotiate with the demons. They set upon him like a pack of mastiffs, but Virgil secures safe conduct from their leader, Malacoda. Thereupon Virgil calls Dante from hiding, and they are about to set off when they discover that the Bridge across the Sixth Bolgia lies shattered. Malacoda tells them there is another further on and sends a squad of demons to escort them. Their adventures with the demons continue through the next canto.

These two cantos may conveniently be remembered as the Gargoyle Cantos. If the total Commedia is built like a cathedral (as so many critics have suggested), it is here certainly that Dante attaches his grotesqueries. At no other point in the Commedia does Dante give such free rein to his coarsest style.

Thus talking of things which my Comedy does not care to sing, we passed from one arch to the next until we stood upon its summit. There 3

we checked our steps to study the next fosse and the next vain lamentations of Malebolge;
awesomely dark and desolate it was. 6

As in the Venetian arsenal,<sup>7</sup> the winter through there boils the sticky pitch to caulk the seams of the sea-battered bottoms when no crew 9 can put to sea—instead of which, one starts to build its ship anew, one plugs the planks which have been sprung in many foreign parts; 12

some hammer at a mast, some at a rib;
some make new oars, some braid and coil new lines;
one patches up the mainsail, one the jib— 15

so, but by Art Divine and not by fire, a viscid pitch boiled in the fosse below and coated all the bank with gluey mire. 18

I saw the pitch; but I saw nothing in it except the enormous bubbles of its boiling, which swelled and sank, like breathing, through all the pit. 21

And as I stood and stared into that sink, my Master cried, "Take care!" and drew me back from my exposed position on the brink. 24

7. The huge shipyard at Venice was called the Arsenal.

I turned like one who cannot wait to see the thing he dreads, and who, in sudden fright, runs while he looks, his curiosity 27

competing with his terror—and at my back I saw a figure that came running toward us across the ridge, a Demon huge and black. 30

Ah what a face he had, all hate and wildness!
 Galloping so, with his great wings outspread
 he seemed the embodiment of all bitterness. 33

Across each high-hunched shoulder he had thrown one haunch of a sinner, whom he held in place with a great talon round each ankle bone. 36

“Blacktalons of our bridge,” he began to roar,
 “I bring you one of Santa Zita’s Elders!<sup>8</sup>
 Scrub him down while I go back for more: 39

I planted a harvest of them in that city:
 everyone there is a grafter except Bonturo.<sup>9</sup>
 There ‘Yes’ is ‘No’ and ‘No’ is ‘Yes’ for a fee.” 42

Down the sinner plunged, and at once the Demon spun from the cliff; no mastiff ever sprang more cager from the leash to chase a felon. 45

Down plunged the sinner and sank to reappear with his backside arched and his face and both his feet glued to the pitch, almost as if in prayer. 48

But the Demons under the bridge, who guard that place and the sinners who are thrown to them, bawled out:
 “You’re out of bounds here for the Sacred Face: 51 this is no dip in the Serchio!<sup>1</sup> take your look and then get down in the pitch. And stay below unless you want a taste of a grappling hook.” 54

Then they raked him with more than a hundred hooks bellowing: “Here you dance below the covers.
 Graft all you can there: no one checks your books.” 57

8. “Blacktalons” (Malebranche: in Italian—“evil claws”) is the generic name for the devils in this ditch; each has a proper name as well (lines 79, 107, 118–22). The elders of Santa Zita in Lucca (a town near Florence) were ten citizens who ran the government.

9. A current official in Lucca, Bonturo Dati was in fact known as the most corrupt of all; the devil is being ironic.

1. A river near Lucca. The Sacred Face of Lucca was a venerated icon.

They dipped him down into that pitch exactly as a chef makes scullery boys dip meat in a boiler, holding it with their hooks from floating free. 60

And the Master said: “You had best not be seen by these Fiends till I am ready. Crouch down here.
 One of these rocks will serve you as a screen. 63

And whatever violence you see done to me, you have no cause to fear. I know these matters:
 I have been though this once and come back safely.”<sup>2</sup> 66

With that, he walked on past the end of the bridge;
 and it wanted all his courage to look calm from the moment he arrived on the sixth ridge. 69

With that same storm and fury that arouses all the house when the hounds leap at a tramp who suddenly falls to pleading where he pauses— 72

so rushed those Fiends from below, and all the pack pointed their gleaming pitchforks at my Guide.
 But he stood fast and cried to them: “Stand back! 75

Before those hooks and grapples make too free, send up one of your crew to hear me out, then ask yourselves if you still care to rip me.” 78

All cried as one: “Let Malacoda<sup>3</sup> go.”
 So the pack stood and one of them came forward, saying: “What good does he think this will do?” 81

“Do you think, Malacoda,” my good Master said, “you would see me here, having arrived this far already, safe from you and every dread, 84 without Divine Will and propitious Fate?

 Let me pass on, for it is willed in Heaven that I must show another this dread state.” 87

The Demon stood there on the flinty brim, so taken aback he let his pitchfork drop;
 then said to the others: “Take care not to harm him!” 90

“O you crouched like a cat,” my Guide called to me, “among the jagged rock piles of the bridge,
 come down to me, for now you may come safely.” 93

2. Virgil may be referring to his difficulties with the devils in 8.82–128, when he and Dante tried to enter the city of Dis.
 3. “Evil-Tail.”

Hearing him, I hurried down the ledge;
 and the Demons all pressed forward when I appeared,
 so that I feared they might not keep their pledge. 96

So once I saw the Pisan infantry march out under truce from the fortress at Caprona, staring in fright at the ranks of the enemy.<sup>4</sup> 99

I pressed the whole of my body against my Guide, and not for an instant did I take my eyes from those black fiends who scowled on every side. 102

They swung their forks saying to one another:
 “Shall I give him a touch in the rump?” and answering:
 “Sure, give him a taste to pay him for his bother.” 105

But the Demon who was talking to my Guide turned round and cried to him: “At ease there, Snatcher!”
 And then to us: “There’s no road on this side: 108

the arch lies all in pieces in the pit.<sup>5</sup>
 If you must go on, follow along this ridge;
 there’s another cliff to cross by just beyond it.<sup>6</sup> 111

In just five hours it will be, since the bridge fell,
 a thousand two hundred sixty-six years and a day;
 that was the time the big quake shook all Hell.<sup>7</sup> 114

I’ll send a squad of my boys along that way to see if anyone’s airing himself below:
 you can go with them: there will be no foul play. 117

Front and center here, Grizzly and Hellken,” he began to order them. “You too, Deaddog.
 Curlybeard, take charge of a squad of ten. 120

Take Grafter and Dragontooth along with you.
 Pigtusk, Catclaw, Cramper, and Crazyred.
 Keep a sharp lookout on the boiling glue 123

as you move along, and see that these gentlemen are not molested until they reach the crag where they can find a way across the den.” 126

4. A battle outside Florence in 1289, in which Dante may have taken part.

5. The bridge across the fifth ditch was smashed, as Malacoda explains, by the earthquake that occurred at the time of the crucifixion.

6. As the travelers discover, this is a lie.

7. According to medieval tradition, Christ’s death on the cross occurred on Good Friday at noon, in his thirty-third year, which would be 34 C.E.; the time at which Dante and Virgil are in this fifth ditch of Malebolge is 7:00 a.m. of Holy Saturday, 1300, which is 1266 years plus one day, less five hours later.

“In the name of heaven, Master,” I cried, “what sort of guides are these? Let us go on alone
if you know the way. Who can trust such an escort!” 129

If you are as wary as you used to be you surely see them grind their teeth at us, and knot their beetle brows so threateningly.” 132

And he: “I do not like this fear in you.
Let them gnash and knot as they please; they menace only the sticky wretches simmering in that stew.” 135

They turned along the left bank in a line;
but not before they had formed a single rank and stuck their pointed tongues out as a sign 138

to their Captain that they wished permission to pass;
and he had made a trumpet of his ass.

Canto XXII

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA FIVE

The Grafters

The poets set off with their escorts of demons. Dante sees the Grafters lying in the pitch like frogs in water with only their muzzles out. They disappear as soon as they sight the demons and only a ripple on the surface betrays their presence.

One of the Grafters, An Unidentified Navarrese, ducks too late and is seized by the demons who are about to claw him, but Curlybeard holds them back while Virgil questions him. The wretch speaks of his fellow sinners, Friar Gomita and Michel Zanche, while the uncontrollable demons rake him from time to time with their hooks.

The Navarrese offers to lure some of his fellow sufferers into the hands of the demons, and when his plan is accepted he plunges into the pitch and escapes. Hellken and Grizzly fly after him, but too late. They start a brawl in mid-air and fall into the pitch themselves. Curlybeard immediately organizes a rescue party and the Poets, fearing the bad temper of the frustrated demons, take advantage of the confusion to slip away.

I have seen horsemen breaking camp. I have seen the beginning of the assault, the march and muster, and at times the retreat and riot. I have been 3 where chargers trampled your land, O Aretines!<sup>8</sup>

I have seen columns of foragers, shocks of tourney, and running of tilts. I have seen the endless lines 6 march to bells, drums, trumpets, from far and near.

I have seen them march on signals from a castle.
I have seen them march with native and foreign gear. 9

8. The people of Arezzo, a city south of Florence.

But never yet have I seen horse or foot,
 nor ship in range of land nor sight of star,
 take its direction from so low a toot. 12

We went with the ten Fiends—ah, savage crew!—
 but “In church with saints; with stewpots in the tavern,”<sup>9</sup> as the old proverb wisely bids us do. 15

All my attention was fixed upon the pitch:
 to observe the people who were boiling in it,
 and the customs and the punishments of that ditch. 18

As dolphins surface and begin to flip their arched backs from the sea, warning the sailors to fall to and begin to secure ship—<sup>1</sup> 21

So now and then, some soul, to ease his pain, showed us a glimpse of his back above the pitch and quick as lightning disappeared again. 24

And as, at the edge of a ditch, frogs squat about hiding their feet and bodies in the water, leaving only their muzzles sticking out— 27

so stood the sinners in that dismal ditch;
 but as Curlybeard approached, only a ripple showed where they had ducked back into the pitch. 30

I saw—the dread of it haunts me to this day—one linger a bit too long, as it sometimes happens one frog remains when another spurts away; 33 and Catclaw, who was nearest, ran a hook through the sinner's pitchy hair and hauled him in.

 He looked like an otter dripping from the brook. 36

I knew the names of all the Fiends by then;
 I had made a note of them at the first muster, and, marching, had listened and checked them over again. 39

“Hey, Crazyred,” the crew of Demons cried all together, “give him a taste of your claws.
 Dig him open a little. Off with his hide.” 42

And I then: “Master, can you find out, please, the name and history of that luckless one who has fallen into the hands of his enemies?” 45

9. A popular proverb.

1. It was a common medieval belief that dolphins warned sailors of approaching storms.

My Guide approached that wraith from the hot tar and asked him whence he came. The wretch replied:
 “I was born and raised in the Kingdom of Navarre.”<sup>2</sup> 48

My mother placed me in service to a knight;
 for she had borne me to a squanderer who killed himself when he ran through his birthright. 51

Then I became a domestic in the service of good King Thibault. There I began to graft, and I account for it in this hot crevice.” 54

And Pigtusk, who at the ends of his lower lip shot forth two teeth more terrible than a boar’s, made the wretch feel how one of them could rip. 57

The mouse had come among bad cats, but here
 Curlybeard locked arms around him crying:
 “While I’ve got hold of him the rest stand clear!” 60

And turning his face to my Guide: “If you want to ask him anything else,” he added, “ask away before the others tear him limb from limb.” 63

And my Guide to the sinner: “I should like to know if among the other souls beneath the pitch are any Italians?” And the wretch: “Just now 66

I left a shade who came from parts nearby.
 Would I were still in the pitch with him, for then these hooks would not be giving me cause to cry.” 69

And suddenly Grafter bellowed in great heat:
 “We’ve stood enough!” And he hooked the sinner’s arm and, raking it, ripped off a chunk of meat. 72

Then Dragontooth wanted to play, too, reaching down for a catch at the sinner’s legs; but Curlybeard wheeled round and round with a terrifying frown, 75 and when the Fiends had somewhat given ground and calmed a little, my Guide, without delay, asked the wretch, who was staring at his wound: 78

“Who was the sinner from whom you say you made your evil-starred departure to come ashore among these Fiends?” And the wretch: “It was the shade 81

2. The identity of this sinner is not known, but he was employed in the household of Thibault II of Champagne, a man renowned for his honesty who was also king of Navarre, the area of Spain that is now Basque country.

of Friar Gomita of Gallura,<sup>3</sup> the crooked stem of every Fraud: when his master's enemies were in his hands, he won high praise from them. 84

He took their money without case or docket, and let them go. He was in all his dealings no petty bursar, but a kingly pocket. 87

With him, his endless crony in the fosse, is Don Michel Zanche of Logodoro;<sup>4</sup>
 they babble about Sardinia without pause. 90

But look! See that fiend grinning at your side!
 There is much more that I should like to tell you,
 but oh, I think he means to grate my hide!" 93

But their grim sergeant wheeled, sensing foul play, and turning on Cramper, who seemed set to strike, ordered: "Clear off, you buzzard. Clear off, I say!" 96

"If either of you would like to see and hear Tuscans or Lombards," the pale sinner said,
 "I can lure them out of hiding if you'll stand clear 99 and let me sit here at the edge of the ditch, and get all these Blacktalons out of sight;

 for while they're here, no one will leave the pitch. 102

In exchange for myself, I can fish you up as pretty a mess of souls as you like. I have only to whistle the way we do when one of us gets free." 105

Deaddog raised his snout as he listened to him;
 then, shaking his head, said, "Listen to the grafter spinning his tricks so he can jump from the brim!" 111

And the sticky wretch, who was all treachery:
 "Oh I am more than tricky when there's a chance to see my friends in greater misery." 114

Hellken, against the will of all the crew, could hold no longer. "If you jump," he said to the scheming wretch, "I won't come after you 117

at a gallop, but like a hawk after a mouse.
 We'll clear the edge and hide behind the bank:
 let's see if you're trickster enough for all of us." 120

3. A friar who was chancellor of the Gallura district on the island of Sardinia. He was hanged by his master, a lord of Pisa, when it was discovered that he had sold prisoners their freedom.

4. Little is known of this sinner, except that he too was a Sardinian.

Reader, here is new game! The Fiends withdrew from the bank's edge, and Deaddog, who at first was most against it, led the savage crew. 123

The Navarrese chose his moment carefully:
 and planting both his feet against the ground,
 he leaped, and in an instant he was free. 126

The Fiends were stung with shame, and of the lot Hellken most, who had been the cause of it.
 He leaped out madly bellowing: "You're caught!" 129

but little good it did him; terror pressed harder than wings; the sinner dove from sight and the fiend in full flight had to raise his breast. 132

A duck, when the falcon dives, will disappear exactly so, all in a flash, while he returns defeated and weary up the air. 135

Grizzly, in a rage at the sinner's flight, flew after Hellken, hoping the wraith would escape,
 so he might find an excuse to start a fight. 138

And as soon as the grafter sank below the pitch, Grizzly turned his talons against Hellken, locked with him claw to claw above the ditch. 141

But Hellken was sparrowhawk enough for two and clawed him well; and ripping one another, they plunged together into the hot stew. 144

The heat broke up the brawl immediately, but their wings were smeared with pitch and they could not rise.
 Curlybeard, upset as his company, 147 commanded four to fly to the other coast at once with all their grapples. At top speed the Fiends divided, each one to his post. 150

Some on the near edge, some along the far,
 they stretched their hooks out to the clotted pair who were already cooked deep through the scar 153 of their first burn. And turning to one side we slipped off, leaving them thus occupied.

Canto XXIII

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA SIX

The Hypocrites

The Poets are pursued by the Fiends and escape them by sliding down the sloping bank of the next pit. They are now in the Sixth Bolgia. Here the Hypocrites, weighted down by great leaden robes, walk eternally round and round a narrow track. The robes are brilliantly gilded on the outside and are shaped like a monk's habit, for the hypocrite's outward appearance shines brightly and passes for holiness, but under that show lies the terrible weight of his deceit which the soul must bear through all eternity.

The Poets talk to Two Jovial Friars and come upon Caiaphas, the chief sinner of that place. Caiaphas was the High Priest of the Jews who counseled the Pharisees to crucify Jesus in the name of public expedience. He is punished by being himself crucified to the floor of Hell by three great stakes, and in such a position that every passing sinner must walk upon him. Thus he must suffer upon his own body the weight of all the world's hypocrisy, as Christ suffered upon his body the pain of all the world's sins.

The Jovial Friars tell Virgil how he may climb from the pit, and Virgil discovers that Malacoda lied to him about the bridges over the Sixth Bolgia.

Silent, apart, and unattended we went as Minor Friars<sup>5</sup> go when they walk abroad, one following the other. The incident 3 recalled the fable of the Mouse and the Frog that Aesop tells.<sup>6</sup> For compared attentively point by point, "pig" is no closer to "hog" 6 than the one case to the other. And as one thought springs from another, so the comparison gave birth to a new concern, at which I caught 9

my breath in fear. This thought ran through my mind:
"These Fiends, through us, have been made ridiculous, and have suffered insult and injury of a kind 12 to make them smart. Unless we take good care—now rage is added to their natural spleen—they will hunt us down as greyhounds hunt the hare." 15

Already I felt my scalp grow tight with fear.
I was staring back in terror as I said:
"Master, unless we find concealment here 18

5. Franciscan friars, who were known as "minor" or "lesser" friars because Francis of Assisi, the founder of the order, insisted upon humility.
6. The fable that Dante seems to be referring to tells how a frog offers to ferry a mouse across a river, then halfway over tries to drown him, only to be seized by a kite (a hawklike bird of prey) while the mouse escapes.

and soon, I dread the rage of the Fiends: already they are yelping on our trail: I imagine them so vividly I can hear them now.” And he: 21

“Were I a pane of leaded glass, I could not summon your outward look more instantly into myself, than I do your inner thought. 24

Your fears were mixed already with my own with the same suggestion and the same dark look;
 so that of both I form one resolution: 27

the right bank may be sloping: in that case we may find some way down to the next pit and so escape from the imagined chase.” 30

He had not finished answering me thus when, not far off, their giant wings outspread,
 I saw the Fiends come charging after us. 33

Seizing me instantly in his arms, my Guide—like a mother wakened by a midnight noise to find a wall of flame at her bedside 36

(who takes her child and runs, and more concerned for him than for herself, does not pause even to throw a wrap about her) raised me, turned, 39 and down the rugged bank from the high summit flung himself down supine onto the slope which walls the upper side of the next pit. 42

Water that turns the great wheel of a land-mill never ran faster through the end of a sluice at the point nearest the paddles—as down that hill 45

my Guide and Master bore me on his breast,
 as if I were not a companion, but a son.
 And the soles of his feet had hardly come to rest 48

on the bed of the depth below, when on the height
 we had just left, the Fiends beat their great wings.
 But now they gave my Guide no cause for fright; 51

for the Providence that gave them the fifth pit to govern as the ministers of Its will, takes from their souls the power of leaving it. 54

About us now in the depth of the pit we found a painted people, weary and defeated.
 Slowly, in pain, they paced it round and round. 57

All wore great cloaks cut to as ample a size as those worn by the Benedictines of Cluny.<sup>7</sup>
The enormous hoods were drawn over their eyes. 60

The outside is all dazzle, golden and fair;
the inside, lead, so heavy that Frederick's capes, compared to these, would seem as light as air.<sup>8</sup> 63

O weary mantle for eternity!
We turned to the left again along their course, listening to their moans of misery, 66

but they moved so slowly down that barren strip, tired by their burden, that our company was changed at every movement of the hip. 69

And walking thus, I said: "As we go on, may it please you to look about among these people for any whose name or history may be known." 72

And one who understood Tuscan cried to us there as we hurried past: "I pray you check your speed, you who run so fast through the sick air: 75

it may be I am one who will fit your case."
And at his words my Master turned and said:
"Wait now, then go with him at his own pace." 78

I waited there, and saw along that track
two souls who seemed in haste to be with me;
but the narrow way and their burden held them back. 81

When they had reached me down that narrow way they stared at me in silence and amazement, then turned to one another, I heard one say: 84

"This one seems, by the motion of his throat, to be alive; and if they are dead, how is it they are allowed to shed the leaden coat?" 87

And then to me "O Tuscan, come so far to the college of the sorry hypocrites, do not disdain to tell us who you are." 90

And I: "I was born and raised a Florentine on the green and lovely banks of Arno's waters,
I go with the body that was always mine. 93

7. One of the largest monasteries in Europe, located in Burgundy in France; the Benedictines are monks who follow the Rule of St. Benedict (d. 587), one of the founders of monasticism.

8. Frederick II (see note 7 to 10.119) was reported to have punished traitors by encasing them in lead and throwing them into heated cauldrons.

But who are you, who sighing as you go distill in floods of tears that drown your cheeks?
 What punishment is this that glitters so?" 96

"These burnished robes are of thick lead," said one,
 "and are hung on us like counterweights, so heavy that we, their weary fulcrums, creak and groan. 99

Jovial Friars and Bolognese were we.
 We were chosen jointly by your Florentines to keep the peace, an office usually 102 held by a single man; near the Gardingo<sup>9</sup>

 one still may see the sort of peace we kept.
 I was called Catalano, he, Loderingo." 105

I began: "O Friars, your evil . . ."—and then I saw a figure crucified upon the ground by three great stakes, and I fell still in awe.<sup>1</sup> 108

When he saw me there, he began to puff great sighs into his beard, convulsing all his body;
 and Friar Catalano, following my eyes, 111 said to me: "That one nailed across the road counselled the Pharisees that it was fitting one man be tortured for the public good. 114

Naked he lies fixed there, as you see, in the path of all who pass; there he must feel the weight of all through all eternity. 117

His father-in-law<sup>2</sup> and the others of the Council which was a seed of wrath to all the Jews, are similarly staked for the same evil." 120

Then I saw Virgil marvel for a while over that soul so ignominiously stretched on the cross in Hell's eternal exile. 123

Then, turning, he asked the Friar: "If your law permit, can you tell us if somewhere along the right
 there is some gap in the stone wall of the pit 126

9. A district in Florence that was destroyed by a civil war incited by their meddling in Florentine affairs. "Jovial Friars": a military and religious order in Bologna called the Knights of the Blessed Virgin Mary, or popularly the "Jovial Friars" because of the laxity of the order's rules. The members were meant to fight only in order to protect the weak and enforce peace. Catalano and Loderingo were two citizens of Bologna who were involved in founding the Jovial Friars in 1261.

1. This is Caiaphas, the Jewish high priest under Pontius Pilate who advised that Christ be crucified (John 11.47–52).

2. Annas: see John 18.13.

through which we two may climb to the next brink without the need of summoning the Black Angels and forcing them to raise us from this sink?" 129

He: "Nearer than you hope, there is a bridge that runs from the great circle of the scarp and crosses every ditch from ridge to ridge, 132 except that in this it is broken; but with care you can mount the ruins which lie along the slope and make a heap on the bottom." My Guide stood there 135 motionless for a while with a dark look.

 At last he said: "He lied about this business, who spears the sinners yonder with his hook."<sup>3</sup> 138

And the Friar: "Once at Bologna I heard the wise discussing the Devil's sins; among them I heard that he is a liar and the father of lies."<sup>4</sup> 141

When the sinner had finished speaking, I saw the face of my sweet Master darken a bit with anger:
 he set off at a great stride from that place, 144

and I turned from that weighted hypocrite to follow in the prints of his dear feet.

Canto XXIV

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA SEVEN

The Thieves

The Poets climb the right bank laboriously, cross the bridge of the Seventh Bolgia and descend the far bank to observe the Thieves. They find the pit full of monstrous reptiles who curl themselves about the sinners like living coils of rope, binding each sinner's hands behind his back, and knotting themselves through the loins. Other reptiles dart about the place, and the Poets see one of them fly through the air and pierce the jugular vein of one sinner who immediately bursts into flames until only ashes remain. From the ashes the sinner reforms painfully.

These are Dante's first observations of the Thieves and will be carried further in the next canto, but the first allegorical retribution is immediately apparent. Thievery is reptilian in its secrecy; therefore it is punished by reptiles. The hands of the thieves are the agents of their crimes; therefore they are bound forever. And as the thief destroys his fellowmen by making their substance disappear, so is he painfully destroyed and made to disappear, not once but over and over again.

The sinner who has risen from his own ashes reluctantly identifies himself as Vanni Fucci. He tells his story, and to revenge himself for having been forced to reveal his identity he utters a dark prophecy against Dante.

3. See 21.111.

4. For this description of the devil, see John 8.44.

In the turning season of the youthful year, when the sun is warming his rays beneath Aquarius<sup>5</sup> and the days and nights already begin to near 3 their perfect balance; the hoar-frost copies then the image of his white sister on the ground,<sup>6</sup> but the first sun wipes away the work of his pen. 6

The peasants who lack fodder then arise and look about and see the fields all white, and hear their lambs bleat; then they smite their thighs, 9 go back into the house, walk here and there, pacing, fretting, wondering what to do,

 then come out doors again, and there, despair 12 falls from them when they see how the earth's face has changed in so little time, and they take their staffs and drive their lambs to feed—so in that place 15

when I saw my Guide and Master's eyebrows lower,
 my spirits fell and I was sorely vexed;
 and as quickly came the plaster to the sore: 18

for when he had reached the ruined bridge, he stood and turned on me that sweet and open look with which he had greeted me in the dark wood. 21

When he had paused and studied carefully the heap of stones, he seemed to reach some plan, for he turned and opened his arms and lifted me. 24

Like one who works and calculates ahead, and is always ready for what happens next—so, raising me above that dismal bed 27 to the top of one great slab of the fallen slate, he chose another saying: "Climb here, but first test it to see if it will hold your weight." 30

It was no climb for a lead-hung hypocrite:
 for scarcely we—he light and I assisted—could crawl handhold by handhold from the pit; 33 and were it not that the bank along this side was lower than the one down which we had slid,<sup>7</sup>

 I at least—I will not speak for my Guide— 36

5. January 21–February 21.

6. I.e., snow.

7. Because the whole of the eighth circle is tilted downward, the downside wall of each ditch is lower than that on the upside.

would have turned back. But as all of the vast rim of Malebolge leans toward the lowest well, so each succeeding valley and each brim 39 is lower than the last. We climbed the face and arrived by great exertion to the point where the last rock had fallen from its place. 42

My lungs were pumping as if they could not stop;
 I thought I could not go on, and I sat exhausted
 the instant I had clambered to the top. 45

“Up on your feet! This is no time to tire!”
 my Master cried. “The man who lies asleep will never waken fame, and his desire 48 and all his life drift past him like a dream, and the traces of his memory fade from time like smoke in air, or ripples on a stream. 51

Now, therefore, rise. Control your breath, and call upon the strength of soul that wins all battles unless it sink in the gross body's fall. 54

There is a longer ladder yet to climb:<sup>8</sup> this much is not enough. If you understand me, show that you mean to profit from your time.” 57

I rose and made my breath appear more steady than it really was, and I replied: “Lead on as it pleases you to go: I am strong and ready.” 60

We picked our way up the cliff, a painful climb, for it was narrower, steeper, and more jagged than any we had crossed up to that time. 63

I moved along, talking to hide my faintness, when a voice that seemed unable to form words rose from the depths of the next chasm's darkness. 66

I do not know what it said, though by then the Sage had led me to the top of the next arch;
 but the speaker seemed in a tremendous rage. 69

I was bending over the brim, but living eyes could not plumb to the bottom of that dark;
 therefore I said, “Master, let me advise 72

8. Both the climb from the pit of Hell back to Earth and then the climb up Mount Purgatory.

that we cross over and climb down the wall:<sup>9</sup> for just as I hear the voice without understanding, so I look down and make out nothing at all.” 75

“I make no other answer than the act,”
 the Master said: “the only fit reply to a fit request is silence and the fact.” 78

So we moved down the bridge to the stone pier that shores the end of the arch on the eighth bank, and there I saw the chasm’s depths made clear;<sup>1</sup> 81 and there great coils of serpents met my sight, so hideous a mass that even now the memory makes my blood run cold with fright.<sup>2</sup> 84

Let Libya boast no longer, for though its sands breed chelidrids, jaculi, and phareans, cenchriads, and two-headed amphisbands, 87

it never bred such a variety of vipers, no, not with all Ethiopia and all the lands that lie by the Red Sea. 90

Amid that swarm, naked and without hope, people ran terrified, not even dreaming of a hole to hide in, or of heliotrope.<sup>3</sup> 93

Their hands were bound behind by coils of serpents which thrust their heads and tails between the loins and bunched in front, a mass of knotted torments. 96

One of the damned came racing round a boulder, and as he passed us, a great snake shot up and bit him where the neck joins with the shoulder. 99

No mortal pen—however fast it flash over the page—could write down o or i as quickly as he flamed and fell in ash; 102 and when he was dissolved into a heap upon the ground, the dust rose of itself and immediately resumed its former shape. 105

9. Into the seventh ditch.

1. They cross the bridge over the seventh ditch and then climb down the wall between the seventh and eighth ditches.

2. The following list of exotic serpents derives from a description by the Roman poet Lucan (39–65 C.E.) of the plagues of Libya.

3. I.e., bloodstone, a mineral that was believed to make the bearer invisible.

Precisely so, philosophers declare,
 the Phoenix dies and then is born again when it approaches its five hundredth year.<sup>4</sup> 108

It lives on tears of balsam and of incense;
 in all its life it eats no herb or grain,
 and nard and precious myrrh sweeten its cerements. 111

And as a person fallen in a fit, possessed by a Demon or some other seizure that fetters him without his knowing it, 114 struggles up to his feet and blinks his eyes (still stupefied by the great agony he has just passed), and, looking round him, sighs— 117

such was the sinner when at last he rose.
 O Power of God! How dreadful is Thy will which in its vengeance rains such fearful blows. 120

Then my Guide asked him who he was. And he answered reluctantly: “Not long ago
 I rained into this gullet from Tuscany. 123

I am Vanni Fucci, the beast.<sup>5</sup> A mule among men,
 I chose the bestial life above the human.
 Savage Pistoia was my fitting den.” 126

And I to my Guide: “Detain him a bit longer and ask what crime it was that sent him here;
 I knew him as a man of blood and anger.” 129

The sinner, hearing me, seemed discomfited,
 but he turned and fixed his eyes upon my face with a look of dismal shame; at length he said: 132

“That you have found me out among the strife and misery of this place, grieves my heart more than did the day that cut me from my life. 135

But I am forced to answer truthfully:
 I am put down so low because it was I who stole the treasure from the Sacristy, 138

4. The “phoenix” is a mythical bird that is supposed to burn to death in its own nest every five hundred years, after which either itself or its son is reborn from the ashes; for these details, including its diet of exotic herbs and its funeral preparations (lines 109–111), see Ovid, Metamorphoses 15. In medieval mythology the phoenix was often taken as a symbol of Christ.

5. The illegitimate son of a noble father of Pistoia, a town just north of Florence; he was known as “the beast” because of the extravagance of his misbehavior. He reputedly robbed a church in Pistoia, a crime for which a similarly named man was wrongly hanged.

for which others once were blamed. But that you may find less to gloat about if you escape here, prick up your ears and listen to what I say:<sup>6</sup> 141

First Pistoia is emptied of the Black, then Florence changes her party and her laws.
 From Valdimagra the God of War brings back 144

a fiery vapor wrapped in turbid air:
 then in a storm of battle at Piceno
 the vapor breaks apart the mist, and there 147

every White shall feel his wounds anew.
 And I have told you this that it may grieve you."

Canto XXV

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA SEVEN

The Thieves

Vanni's rage mounts to the point where he hurls an ultimate obscenity at God, and the serpents immediately swarm over him, driving him off in great pain. The Centaur, Cacus, his back covered with serpents and a fire-eating dragon, also gives chase to punish the wretch.

Dante then meets Five Noble Thieves of Florence and sees the further retribution visited upon the sinners. Some of the thieves appear first in human form, others as reptiles. All but one of them suffer a painful transformation before Dante's eyes. Agnello appears in human form and is merged with Cianfa, who appears as a six-legged lizard. Buoso appears as a man and changes form with Francesco, who first appears as a tiny reptile. Only Puccio Sciancato remains unchanged, though we are made to understand that his turn will come.

For endless and painful transformation is the final state of the thieves. In life they took the substance of others, transforming it into their own. So in Hell their very bodies are constantly being taken from them, and they are left to steal back a human form from some other sinner. Thus they waver constantly between man and reptile, and no sinner knows what to call his own.

When he had finished, the thief—to his disgrace—raised his hands with both fists making figs,<sup>7</sup> and cried: "Here, God! I throw them in your face!" 3

Thereat the snakes became my friends, for one coiled itself about the wretch's neck
 as if it were saying: "You shall not go on!" 6

6. Vanni Fucci now prophesies, in the enigmatic terms appropriate to the genre, that the party of the Blacks (of which he was a member) will first be expelled from Pistoia by the Whites, but that then the Whites of Florence (Dante's party) will be defeated. The prophecy refers to events that occurred in either 1302 or 1306.

7. An obscene gesture made by thrusting a protruding thumb between the first and second fingers of a closed fist.

and another tied his arms behind him again, knotting its head and tail between his loins
 so tight he could not move a finger in pain. 9

Pistoia! Pistoia! why have you not decreed to turn yourself to ashes and end your days, rather than spread the evil of your seed!<sup>8</sup> 12

In all of Hell's corrupt and sunken halls
 I found no shade so arrogant toward God, not even him who fell from the Theban walls!<sup>9</sup> 15

Without another word, he fled; and there
 I saw a furious Centaur race up, roaring:
 "Where is the insolent blasphemer? Where?" 18

I do not think as many serpents swarm in all the Maremma<sup>1</sup> as he bore on his back from the haunch to the first sign of our human form. 21

Upon his shoulders, just behind his head a snorting dragon whose hot breath set fire to all it touched, lay with its wings outspread. 24

My Guide said: "That is Cacus.<sup>2</sup> Time and again in the shadow of Mount Aventine he made a lake of blood upon the Roman plain. 27

He does not go with his kin by the blood-red fosse because of the cunning fraud with which he stole the cattle of Hercules. And thus it was 30 his thieving stopped, for Hercules found his den and gave him perhaps a hundred blows with his club, and of them he did not feel the first ten." 33

Meanwhile, the Centaur passed along his way, and three wraiths came. Neither my Guide nor I knew they were there until we heard them say: 36

"You there—who are you?" There our talk fell still and we turned to stare at them. I did not know them, but by chance it happened, as it often will, 39

8. The most important founder of Pistoia was Catiline, who was a traitor against the Roman Republic in the 1st century B.C.E.

9. Capaneus (see 14.43–69).

1. A region infested with snakes; see 13.8.

2. A monster who lived in a cave on Mount Aventine in Rome and was killed by Hercules, from whom he had stolen cattle; see Aeneid 8.

one named another. "Where is Cianfa?"<sup>3</sup> he cried;
 "Why has he fallen back?" I placed a finger across my lips as a signal to my Guide. 42

Reader, should you doubt what next I tell, it will be no wonder, for though I saw it happen,
 I can scarce believe it possible, even in Hell. 45

For suddenly, as I watched, I saw a lizard come darting forward on six great taloned feet and fasten itself to a sinner from crotch to gizzard. 48

Its middle feet sank in the sweat and grime of the wretch's paunch, its forefeet clamped his arms, its teeth bit through both cheeks. At the same time 51 its hind feet fastened on the sinner's thighs:

 its tail thrust through his legs and closed its coil over his loins. I saw it with my own eyes! 54

No ivy ever grew about a tree
 as tightly as that monster wove itself limb by limb about the sinner's body; 57

they fused like hot wax, and their colors ran together until neither wretch nor monster appeared what he had been when he began: 60

just so, before the running edge of the heat on a burning page, a brown discoloration changes to black as the white dies from the sheet. 63

The other two cried out as they looked on:
 "Alas! Alas! Agnello,<sup>4</sup> how you change!
 Already you are neither two nor one!" 66

The two heads had already blurred and blended;
 now two new semblances appeared and faded,
 one face where neither face began nor ended. 69

From the four upper limbs of man and beast two arms were made, then members never seen grew from the thighs and legs, belly and breast. 72

Their former likenesses mottled and sank to something that was both of them and neither;
 and so transformed, it slowly left our bank. 75

3. A noble Florentine, reputedly a thief.

4. Another noble Florentine thief.

As lizards at high noon of a hot day dart out from hedge to hedge, from shade to shade, and flash like lightning when they cross the way, 78 so toward the bowels of the other two,

 shot a small monster; livid, furious, and black as a peppercorn. Its lunge bit through 81 that part of one of them from which man receives his earliest nourishment; then it fell back and lay sprawled out in front of the two thieves. 84

Its victim stared at it but did not speak:
 indeed, he stood there like a post, and yawned
 as if lack of sleep, or a fever, had left him weak. 87

The reptile stared at him, he at the reptile;
 from the wound of one and from the other's mouth
 two smokes poured out and mingled, dark and vile. 90

Now let Lucan be still with his history of poor Sabellus and Nassidius,<sup>5</sup> and wait to hear what next appeared to me. 93

Of Cadmus and Arethusa<sup>6</sup> be Ovid silent.
 I have no need to envy him those verses where he makes one a fountain, and one a serpent: 96

for he never transformed two beings face to face in such a way that both their natures yielded their elements each to each, as in this case. 99

Responding sympathetically to each other,
 the reptile cleft his tail into a fork,
 and the wounded sinner drew his feet together. 102

The sinner's legs and thighs began to join:
 they grew together so, that soon no trace of juncture could be seen from toe to loin. 105

Point by point the reptile's cloven tail grew to the form of what the sinner lost;
 one skin began to soften, one to scale. 108

The armpits swallowed the arms, and the short shank of the reptile's forefeet simultaneously lengthened by as much as the man's arms shrank. 111

5. Two soldiers bitten by serpents in Lucan's Pharsalia.

6. See Metamorphoses 4.

Its hind feet twisted round themselves and grew the member man conceals; meanwhile the wretch from his one member generated two. 114

The smoke swelled up about them all the while:
 it tanned one skin and bleached the other; it stripped the hair from the man and grew it on the reptile. 117

While one fell to his belly, the other rose without once shifting the locked evil eyes below which they changed snouts as they changed pose 120

The face of the standing one drew up and in toward the temples, and from the excess matter that gathered there, ears grew from the smooth skin; 123

while of the matter left below the eyes the excess became a nose, at the same time forming the lips to an appropriate size. 126

Here the face of the prostrate felon slips, sharpens into a snout, and withdraws its ears as a snail pulls in its horns. Between its lips 129

the tongue, once formed for speech, thrusts out a fork;
 the forked tongue of the other heals and draws into his mouth. The smoke has done its work. 132

The soul that had become a beast went flitting and hissing over the stones, and after it the other walked along talking and spitting 135

Then turning his new shoulders, said to the one that still remained: "It is Buoso's<sup>7</sup> turn to go crawling along this road as I have done." 138

Thus did the ballast of the seventh hold shift and reshift; and may the strangeness of it excuse my pen if the tale is strangely told. 141

And though all this confused me, they did not flee so cunningly but what I was aware that it was Puccio Sciancato<sup>8</sup> alone of the three 144 that first appeared, who kept his old form still.

 The other was he for whom you weep, Gaville.<sup>9</sup>

7. The identity of this Buoso is uncertain.

8. This third thief is also a noble Florentine.

9. The "small monster" of line 80 above is now identified as Francesco de Cavalcanti, a Florentine nobleman who lived in Gaville, a town south of Florence. When he was murdered by his townsmen, his kinsmen took brutal revenge.

Canto XXVI

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA EIGHT

The Evil Counselors

Dante turns from the Thieves toward the Evil Counselors of the next Bolgia, and between the two he addresses a passionate lament to Florence prophesying the griefs that will befall her from these two sins. At the purported time of the Vision, it will be recalled, Dante was a Chief Magistrate of Florence and was forced into exile by men he had reason to consider both thieves and evil counselors. He seems prompted, in fact, to say much more on this score, but he restrains himself when he comes in sight of the sinners of the next Bolgia, for they are a moral symbolism, all men of gift who abused their genius, perverting it to wiles and stratagems. Seeing them in Hell he knows his must be another road: his way shall not be by deception.

So the Poets move on and Dante observes the Eighth Bolgia in detail. Here the Evil Counselors move about endlessly, hidden from view inside great flames. Their sin was to abuse the gifts of the Almighty, to steal his virtues for low purposes. And as they stole from God in their lives and worked by hidden ways, so are they stolen from sight and hidden in the great flames which are their own guilty consciences. And as, in most instances at least, they sinned by glibness of tongue, so are the flames made into a fiery travesty of tongues.

Among the others, the Poets see a great doubleheaded flame, and discover that Ulysses and Diomedes are punished together within it. Virgil addresses the flame, and through its wavering tongue Ulysses narrates an unforgettable tale of his last voyage and death.

Joy to you, Florence, that your banners swell, beating their proud wings over land and sea,
 and that your name expands through all of Hell! 3

Among the thieves I found five who had been your citizens,<sup>1</sup> to my shame; nor yet shall you mount to great honor peopling such a den! 6

But if the truth is dreamed of toward the morning, you soon shall feel what Prato<sup>2</sup> and the others wish for you. And were that day of mourning 9 already come it would not be too soon.

 So may it come, since it must! for it will weigh more heavily on me as I pass my noon. 12

We left that place. My Guide climbed stone by stone the natural stair by which we had descended and drew me after him. So we passed on, 15

1. Cianfa (25.40), Agnello (25.65), Buoso (25.137), Puccio (25.144), and Francesco (25.149) are all Florentines.

2. A town just north of Florence, on the way to Pistoia. The reason for this threat is unclear.

and going our lonely way through that dead land
among the crags and crevices of the cliff, the foot could make no way without the hand. 18

I mourned among those rocks, and I mourn again when memory returns to what I saw:
and more than usually I curb the strain 21

of my genius, lest it stray from Virtue's course;
so if some star, or a better thing, grant me merit,
may I not find the gift cause for remorse. 24

As many fireflies as the peasant sees when he rests on a hill and looks into the valley (where he tills or gathers grapes or prunes his trees) 27 in that sweet season when the face of him who lights the world rides north, and at the hour when the fly yields to the gnat and the air grows dim.— 30 such myriads of flames I saw shine through the gloom of the eighth abyss when I arrived at the rim from which its bed comes into view. 33

As he<sup>3</sup> the bears avenged so fearfully beheld Elijah's chariot depart—the horses rise toward heaven—but could not see 36

more than the flame, a cloudlet in the sky, once it had risen—so within the fosse only those flames, forever passing by 39 were visible, ahead, to right, to left;

for though each steals a sinner's soul from view not one among them leaves a trace of the theft. 42

I stood on the bridge, and leaned out from the edge;
so far, that but for a jut of rock I held to I should have been sent hurtling from the ledge 45 without being pushed. And seeing me so intent, my Guide said: "There are souls within those flames;

each sinner swathes himself in his own torment." 48

"Master," I said, "your words make me more sure, but I had seen already that it was so and meant to ask what spirit must endure 51

3. Elisha, an Old Testament prophet, was mocked by children, who were then attacked by bears. He saw the ascent to heaven of the prophet Elijah in his chariot and continued Elijah's mission: 2 Kings 2.1–25.

the pains of that great flame which splits away in two great horns, as if it rose from the pyre where Eteocles and Polynices lay?”<sup>4</sup> 54

He answered me: “Forever round this path Ulysses and Diomedes<sup>5</sup> move in such dress, united in pain as once they were in wrath; 57

there they lament the ambush of the Horse which was the door through which the noble seed of the Romans<sup>6</sup> issued from its holy source; 60

there they mourn that for Achilles slain sweet Deidamia<sup>7</sup> weeps even in death;
there they recall the Palladium in their pain.” 63

“Master,” I cried, “I pray you and repray till my prayer becomes a thousand—if these souls can still speak from the fire, oh let me stay 66 until the flame draws near! Do not deny me:

You see how fervently I long for it!”
And he to me: “Since what you ask is worthy, 69

it shall be. But be still and let me speak; for I know your mind already, and they perhaps might scorn your manner of speaking, since they were Greek.”<sup>8</sup> 72

And when the flame had come where time and place seemed fitting to my Guide, I heard him say these words to it: “O you two souls who pace 75 together in one flame!—if my days above won favor in your eyes, if I have earned however much or little of your love 78

in writing my High Verses, do not pass by, but let one of you be pleased to tell where he,
having disappeared from the known world, went to die.” 81

4. Eteocles and his brother, Polynices, were the sons of Oedipus; cursed by their father for their imprisonment of him, they engaged in a civil war over Thebes, killed each other, and were cremated on the same pyre, the flame of which divided into two as a sign of their enmity.

5. Two of the Greek leaders in the Trojan War. They devised the trick of the Trojan horse and stole the Palladium, a statue of Pallas Athena that protected the city. Their villainy is described by Aeneas in Aeneid 2.

6. The Trojan survivors, who founded Rome.

7. Achilles’ lover, who tried to prevent him from going to the Trojan War but was thwarted by Ulysses.

8. Virgil may assume that Greeks would disdain anyone who, like Dante, did not know Greek (and was therefore a “barbarian”); or that because he derives from the classical world he is the more appropriate interlocutor.

As if it fought the wind, the greater prong of the ancient flame began to quiver and hum;
 then moving its tip as if it were the tongue 84

that spoke, gave out a voice above the roar.
 “When I left Circe,”<sup>9</sup> it said, “who more than a year detained me near Gaeta long before 87

Aeneas came and gave the place that name,<sup>1</sup> not fondness for my son, nor reverence for my aged father, nor Penelope’s<sup>2</sup> claim 90 to the joys of love, could drive out of my mind the lust to experience the far-flung world and the failings and felicities of mankind. 93

I put out on the high and open sea with a single ship and only those few souls who stayed true when the rest deserted me. 96

As far as Morocco and as far as Spain
 I saw both shores; and I saw Sardinia and the other islands of the open main. 99

I and my men were stiff and slow with age when we sailed at last into the narrow pass where, warning all men back from further voyage,<sup>3</sup> 102

Hercules’ Pillars rose upon our sight.
 Already I had left Ceuta on the left;
 Seville now sank behind me on the right. 105

‘Shipmates,’ I said, ‘who through a hundred thousand perils have reached the West, do not deny to the brief remaining watch our senses stand 108 experience of the world beyond the sun.

 Greeks! You were not born to live like brutes, but to press on toward manhood and recognition! 111

With this brief exhortation I made my crew so eager for the voyage I could hardly have held them back from it when I was through; 114

9. Ulysses speaks here of the sorceress Circe, who turned his shipmates into swine and took Ulysses as her lover. Dante places Circe’s home near Gaeta, on the coast of Italy north of Naples.

1. Aeneas named it after his nurse Caieta, who died there; see Aeneid 7.

2. Ulysses’ faithful wife.

3. The Strait of Gibraltar, with the Spanish region that includes Seville on the European side and the Spanish city of Ceuta on the African. According to myth, Hercules separated a single mountain into two to mark the point beyond which human beings should not venture.

and turning our stern toward morning, our bow toward night, we bore southwest out of the world of man;<sup>4</sup>
 we made wings of our oars for our fool's flight. 117

That night we raised the other pole ahead with all its stars, and ours had so declined it did not rise out of its ocean bed.<sup>5</sup> 120

Five times since we had dipped our bending oars beyond the world, the light beneath the moon had waxed and waned, when dead upon our course 123

we sighted, dark in space, a peak so tall
 I doubted any man had seen the like.<sup>6</sup>
 Our cheers were hardly sounded, when a squall 126 broke hard upon our bow from the new land:

 three times it sucked the ship and the sea about as it pleased Another to order and command. 129

At the fourth, the poop rose and the bow went down till the sea closed over us and the light was gone."

Canto XXVII

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA EIGHT

The Evil Counselors

The double flame departs at a word from Virgil and behind it appears another which contains the soul of Count Guido da Montefeltro, a Lord of Romagna. He had overheard Virgil speaking Italian, and the entire flame in which his soul is wrapped quivers with his eagerness to hear recent news of his wartorn country. (As Farinata has already explained, the spirits of the damned have prophetic powers, but lose all track of events as they approach.)

Dante replies with a stately and tragic summary of how things stand in the cities of Romagna. When he has finished, he asks Guido for his story, and Guido recounts his life, and how Boniface VIII persuaded him to sin.

When it had finished speaking, the great flame stood tall and shook no more. Now, as it left us with the sweet Poet's license, another came 3 along that track and our attention turned to the new flame: a strange and muffled roar rose from the single tip to which it burned. 6

4. According to the geography of Dante's day, the Southern Hemisphere was made up entirely of water, with the only land being Mount Purgatory. "Our bow toward night" means to follow a westward course.

5. They had crossed the equator and could see only the stars of the Southern Hemisphere.

6. This is Mount Purgatory.

As the Sicilian bull—that brazen spit which bellowed first (and properly enough) with the lament of him whose file had tuned it—<sup>7</sup> 9 was made to bellow by its victim's cries in such a way, that though it was of brass, it seemed itself to howl and agonize: 12

so lacking any way through or around the fire that sealed them in, the mournful words were changed into its language. When they found 15 their way up to the tip, imparting to it the same vibration given them in their passage over the tongue of the concealed sad spirit, 18

we heard it say:<sup>8</sup> “O you at whom I aim my voice, and who were speaking Lombard,<sup>9</sup> saying:
 ‘Go now, I ask no more,’ just as I came— 21

though I may come a bit late to my turn, may it not annoy you to pause and speak a while:
 you see it does not annoy me—and I burn. 24

If you have fallen only recently to this blind world from that sweet Italy where I acquired my guilt, I pray you, tell me: 27

is there peace or war in Romagna? for on earth
 I too was of those hills between Urbino and the fold from which the Tiber springs to birth.” 30

I was still staring at it from the dim edge of the pit when my Guide nudged me, saying:
 “This one is Italian: you speak to him.” 33

My answer was framed already; without pause
 I spoke these words to it: “O hidden soul, your sad Romagna is not and never was 36 without war in her tyrants' raging blood;

 but none flared openly when I left just now.
 Ravenna's<sup>1</sup> fortunes stand as they have stood 39

7. According to classical legend, Phalaris, the tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily, had an artisan build a brazen bull in which he roasted his victims alive, their shrieks emerging as the sounds of a bull's bellowing. His first victim was the artisan himself, Perillus.

8. The speaker is Guido da Montefeltro (d. 1298), a nobleman deeply involved in the constant warfare of 13th-century Italy but who became a friar two years before his death (see lines 64–65).

9. The dialect of northern Italy. Dante believed that since Virgil came from Mantua, his spoken language would be not Latin but this dialect.

1. The major city of Romagna, ruled at the time by the Polenta family, who also controlled the small city of Cervia.

these many years: Polenta's eagles brood over her walls, and their pinions cover Cervia.
 The city<sup>2</sup> that so valiantly withstood 42

the French, and raised a mountain of their dead, feels the Green Claws again. Still in Verrucchio the Aged Mastiff and his Pup,<sup>3</sup> who shed 45

Montagna's blood, raven in their old ranges.
 The cities of Lamone and Santerno<sup>4</sup> are led by the white den's Lion, he who changes 48 his politics with the compass. And as the city<sup>5</sup> the Savio washes lies between plain and mountain, so it lives between freedom and tyranny. 51

Now, I beg you, let us know your name;
 do not be harder than one has been to you;
 so, too, you will preserve your earthly fame." 54

And when the flame had roared a while beneath the ledge on which we stood, it swayed its tip to and fro, and then gave forth this breath: 57

"If I believed that my reply were made to one who could ever climb to the world again, this flame would shake no more. But since no shade 60 ever returned—if what I am told is true—from this blind world into the living light, without fear of dishonor I answer you. 63

I was a man of arms: then took the rope of the Franciscans, hoping to make amends:
 and surely I should have won to all my hope 66

but for the Great Priest<sup>6</sup>—may he rot in Hell!—
 who brought me back to all my earlier sins;
 and how and why it happened I wish to tell 69

in my own words: while I was still encased in the pulp and bone my mother bore, my deeds were not of the lion but of the fox: I raced 72

2. Forlì, which defeated French invaders but then fell under the control of the tyrannical Ordelaffi family, which had green paws on its coat of arms.

3. Malatesta de Verrucchio and his son Malatestino were tyrants of Rimini who killed their enemy Montagna.

4. The cities of Faenza and Imola, on the Lamone and Santerno Rivers respectively, governed by an unreliable ruler who had a lion on a white ground on his coat of arms.

5. Cesena, located on the Savio River, was a free municipality although its politics were dominated by a single family.

6. Pope Boniface VIII.

through tangled ways; all wiles were mine from birth, and I won to such advantage with my arts that rumor of me reached the ends of the earth. 75

But when I saw before me all the signs of the time of life that cautions every man to lower his sail and gather in his lines, 78

that which had pleased me once, troubled my spirit, and penitent and confessed, I became a monk.
 Alas! What joy I might have had of it! 81

It was then the Prince of the New Pharisees drew his sword and marched upon the Lateran—and not against the Saracen or the Jew,<sup>7</sup> 84

for every man that stood against his hand was a Christian soul: not one had warred on Acre,<sup>8</sup> nor been a trader in the Sultan's land. 87

It was he abused his sacred vows and mine:
 his Office and the Cord I wore, which once made those it girded leaner.<sup>9</sup> As Constantine 90 sent for Silvestro to cure his leprosy,<sup>1</sup> seeking him out among Soracte's cells;

 so this one from his great throne sent for me 93 to cure the fever of pride that burned his blood.

 He demanded my advice, and I kept silent for his words seemed drunken to me. So it stood 96

until he said: 'Your soul need fear no wound;
 I absolve your guilt beforehand; and now teach me how to smash Penestrino<sup>2</sup> to the ground. 99

The Gates of Heaven, as you know, are mine to open and shut, for I hold the two Great Keys
 so easily let go by Celestine.<sup>3</sup> 102

7. Boniface was struggling to retain the papacy against the challenge of another Roman family, the Colonnas.

8. City (now known as Akko) in the Holy Land, captured by the Crusaders and then recaptured by the Saracens.

9. Guido refers to the rough cord worn as a belt by Franciscan friars, a symbol of both obedience and poverty (hence it would make the wearer "leaner"); for another reference to this cord, see 16.106.

1. According to legend, the Emperor Constantine (r. 306–37) was cured of his leprosy by Pope Sylvester, who was hiding on Mount Soracte, some 20 miles north of Rome; see 19.109.

2. The fortress of the Colonnas.

3. The keys are those of damnation and absolution, given by Christ to Peter; see 19.85–86. Celestine V, Boniface's predecessor, resigned after five months as pope; see 3.56–57.

His weighty arguments led me to fear silence was worse than sin. Therefore, I said:
 'Holy Father, since you clean me here 105 of the guilt into which I fall, let it be done:

 long promise and short observance is the road that leads to the sure triumph of your throne.' 108

Later, when I was dead, St. Francis<sup>4</sup> came to claim my soul, but one of the Black Angels said: 'Leave him. Do not wrong me. This one's name 111 went into my book the moment he resolved to give false counsel. Since then he has been mine, for who does not repent cannot be absolved; 114

nor can we admit the possibility of repenting a thing at the same time it is willed, for the two acts are contradictory.'<sup>5</sup> 117

Miserable me! with what contrition
 I shuddered when he lifted me, saying: 'Perhaps you hadn't heard that I was a logician.'<sup>6</sup> 120

He carried me to Minos:<sup>7</sup> eight times round his scabby back the monster coiled his tail, then biting it in rage he pawed the ground 123 and cried: 'This one is for the thievish fire!'

 And, as you see, I am lost accordingly, grieving in heart as I go in this attire.'" 126

His story told, the flame began to toss and writhe its horn. And so it left, and we crossed over to the arch of the next fosse 129

where from the iron treasury of the Lord
 the fee of wrath is paid the Sowers of Discord.

Canto XXVIII

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA NINE

The Sowers of Discord

The Poets come to the edge of the Ninth Bolgia and look down at a parade of hideously mutilated souls. These are the Sowers of Discord, and just as their sin was to rend asunder what God had meant to be united, so are they hacked and torn through all eternity by a great demon with a bloody sword. After each mutila-

4. Francis of Assisi (ca. 1181–1226), founder of the order of friars joined by Guido. As patron saint of Italy, Francis is venerated for his compassion and humility.

5. Guido wanted forgiveness for his sin of guile at the same time as he was committing it; in willing the sin he showed that he was not truly repentant, the precondition for forgiveness.

6. The devil is referring to the logical law of noncontradiction.

7. For Minos, see 5.4–12.

tion the souls are compelled to drag their broken bodies around the pit and to return to the demon, for in the course of the circuit their wounds knit in time to be inflicted anew. Thus is the law of retribution observed, each sinner suffering according to his degree.

Among them Dante distinguishes three classes with varying degrees of guilt within each class. First come the Sowers of Religious Discord. Mahomet (Muhammad) is chief among them, and appears first, cleft from crotch to chin, with his internal organs dangling between his legs. His son-in-law, Ali, drags on ahead of him, cleft from topknot to chin. These reciprocal wounds symbolize Dante's judgment that, between them, these two sum up the total schism between Christianity and Mohammedanism. The revolting details of Mahomet's condition clearly imply Dante's opinion of that doctrine. Mahomet issues an ironic warning to another schismatic, Fra Dolcino.

Next come the Sowers of Political Discord, among them Pier da Medicina, the Tribune Curio, and Mosca dei Lamberti, each mutilated according to the nature of his sin.

Last of all is Bertrand de Born, Sower of Discord Between Kinsmen. He separated father from son, and for that offense carries his head separated from his body, holding it with one hand by the hair, and swinging it as if it were a lantern to light his dark and endless way. The image of Bertrand raising his head at arm's length in order that it might speak more clearly to the Poets on the ridge is one of the most memorable in the Inferno. For some reason that cannot be ascertained, Dante makes these sinners quite eager to be remembered in the world, despite the fact that many who lie above them in Hell were unwilling to be recognized.

Who could describe, even in words set free of metric and rhyme and a thousand times retold, the blood and wounds that now were shown to me! 3

At grief so deep the tongue must wag in vain;
the language of our sense and memory lacks the vocabulary of such pain. 6

If one could gather all those who have stood through all of time on Puglia's fateful soil and wept for the red running of their blood 9 in the war of the Trojans;<sup>8</sup> and in that long war which left so vast a spoil of golden rings, as we find written in Livy,<sup>9</sup> who does not err; 12

along with those whose bodies felt the wet and gaping wounds of Robert Guiscard's<sup>1</sup> lances; with all the rest whose bones are gathered yet 15

8. Puglia is in southern Italy; Dante refers here to those killed when the Trojans conquered it in the Aeneid 7–12.

9. Roman historian (d. 17 C.E.; he chronicled the Second Punic War (218–201 B.C.E.) between Rome and Carthage under Hannibal.

After the battle of Cannae (216) the victorious Carthaginians displayed rings taken from fallen Romans.

1. A Norman conqueror (1015–1085) who fought the Greeks and Saracens for control of Sicily and southern Italy in the 11th century.

at Ceperano<sup>2</sup> where every last Pugliese turned traitor; and with those from Tagliacozzo<sup>3</sup> where Alardo won without weapons—if all these 18 were gathered, and one showed his limbs run through, another his lopped off, that could not equal the mutilations of the ninth pit's crew. 21

A wine tun when a stave or cant-bar starts does not split open as wide as one I saw split from his chin to the mouth with which man farts. 24

Between his legs all of his red guts hung with the heart, the lungs, the liver, the gall bladder, and the shriveled sac that passes shit to the bung. 27

I stood and stared at him from the stone shelf;
he noticed me and opening his own breast with both hands cried: "See how I rip myself!" 30

See how Mahomet's<sup>4</sup> mangled and split open!
Ahead of me walks Ali in his tears,
his head cleft from the top-knot to the chin. 33

And all the other souls that bleed and mourn along this ditch were sowers of scandal and schism:
as they tore others apart, so are they torn. 36

Behind us, warden of our mangled horde, the devil who butchers us and sends us marching waits to renew our wounds with his long sword 39

when we have made the circuit of the pit;
for by the time we stand again before him
all the wounds he gave us last have knit. 42

But who are you that gawk down from that sill—probably to put off your own descent to the pit you are sentenced to for your own evil?" 45

"Death has not come for him, guilt does not drive his soul to torment," my sweet Guide replied.
"That he may experience all while yet alive 48

2. A town that the barons of Puglia were pledged to defend for Manfred, the natural son of Frederick II (10.119), but whom they betrayed; he was then killed at the battle of Benevento in 1266.

3. A town where in 1268 Manfred's nephew Conradin was defeated by the strategy rather than the brute force of Alardo de Valery.

4. Muhammad, founder of Islam (570–632), regarded by some medieval Christians as a renegade Christian and a creator of religious disunity. Ali was his nephew and son-in-law, and his disputed claim to the rulership (or caliphate) divided Islam into Sunni and Shi'a sects.

I, who am dead, must lead him through the drear and darkened halls of Hell, from round to round:
and this is true as my own standing here.” 51

More than a hundred wraiths who were marching under the sill on which we stood, paused at his words and stared at me, forgetting pain in wonder. 54

“And if you do indeed return to see the sun again, and soon, fell Fra Dolcino<sup>5</sup> unless he longs to come and march with me 57

he would do well to cheek his groceries before the winter drives him from the hills and gives the victory to the Novarese.” 60

Mahomet, one foot raised, had paused to say these words to me. When he had finished speaking he stretched it out and down, and moved away. 63

Another—he had his throat slit, and his nose slashed off as far as the eyebrows, and a wound where one of his ears had been—standing with those 66

who stared at me in wonder from the pit, opened the grinning wound of his red gullet
as if it were a mouth, and said through it: 69

“O soul unforfeited to misery and whom—unless I take you for another—
I have seen above in our sweet Italy; 72

if ever again you see the gentle plain that slopes down from Vercelli to Marcabò, remember Pier da Medicina<sup>6</sup> in pain, 75 and announce this warning to the noblest two of Fano,<sup>7</sup> Messers Guido and Angiolello:

that unless our foresight sees what is not true 78

they shall be thrown from their ships into the sea and drown in the raging tides near La Cattolica to satisfy a tyrant’s treachery. 81

5. In 1300 Fra Dolcino was head of a reformist order known as the Apostolic Brothers that was condemned as heretical by the pope. He and his followers escaped to the hills near the town of Novara, but starvation forced them out and many were executed.

6. The town of Medicina lies in the Po Valley between Vercelli and Marcabò. Nothing certain is known of Pier da Medicina.

7. A town on the Adriatic coast of Italy; its two leaders—named in the same line—were drowned in 1312 by the one-eyed tyrant Malatestino of Rimini (see note 3 to 27.45) near the promontory of Focara (see line 90) after he had invited them to the town of La Cattolica for a parley.

Neptune never saw so gross a crime in all the seas from Cyprus to Majorca, not even in pirate raids, nor the Argive<sup>8</sup> time. 84

The one-eyed traitor,<sup>9</sup> lord of the demesne whose hill and streams one who walks here beside me will wish eternally he had never seen, 87 will call them to a parley, but behind sweet invitations he will work it so they need not pray against Focara's wind." 90

And I to him: "If you would have me bear your name to time, show me the one who found the sight of that land so harsh, and let me hear 93 his story and his name." He touched the cheek of one nearby,<sup>1</sup> forcing the jaws apart, and said: "This is the one; he cannot speak. 96

This outcast settled Caesar's doubts that day beside the Rubicon by telling him:
 'A man prepared is a man hurt by delay.'" 99

Ah, how wretched Curio seemed to me with a bloody stump in his throat in place of the tongue which once had dared to speak so recklessly! 102

And one among them with both arms hacked through cried out, raising his stumps on the foul air while the blood bedaubed his face: "Remember, too, 105

Mosca dei Lamberti,<sup>2</sup> alas, who said
 'A thing done has an end!' and with those words planted the fields of war with Tuscan dead." 108

"And brought about the death of all your clan!"
 I said, and he, stung by new pain on pain, ran off; and in his grief he seemed a madman. 111

I stayed to watch those broken instruments, and I saw a thing so strange I should not dare to mention it without more evidence 114

8. Cyprus and Majorca are islands at the eastern and western ends of the Mediterranean. Neptune is the classical god of the sea; Argive is another name for Greek.

9. Caius Curio, whose story is told in lines 94–102.

1. Caius Curio, a Roman of the 1st century B.C.E., was bribed by Julius Caesar to betray his friends; he urged Caesar to cross the Rubicon and invade the Roman Republic, starting a civil war.

2. A Florentine noble, who in 1215 started the civil strife that tore the city apart by advising a father to avenge the slight to his daughter by killing the man who had broken his engagement to her. Mosca's own family was a victim of the strife some 60 years later.

but that my own clear conscience strengthens me, that good companion that upholds a man
 within the armor of his purity. 117

I saw it there; I seem to see it still—a body without a head, that moved along like all the others in that spew and spill. 120

It held the severed head by its own hair, swinging it like a lantern in its hand;
 and the head looked at us and wept in its despair. 123

It made itself a lamp of its own head, and they were two in one and one in two;
 how this can be, He knows who so commanded. 126

And when it stood directly under us it raised the head at arm's length toward our bridge the better to be heard, and swaying thus 129

it cried:<sup>3</sup> "O living soul in this abyss, see what a sentence has been passed upon me,
 and search all Hell for one to equal this! 132

When you return to the world, remember me:
 I am Bernard de Born, and it was I who set the young king on to mutiny, 135 son against father, father against son as Achitophel set Absalom and David; and since I parted those who should be one 138

in duty and in love, I bear my brain divided from its source within this trunk;
 and walk here where my evil turns to pain, 142

an eye for an eye to all eternity:
 thus is the law of Hell observed in me."<sup>4</sup>

Canto XXIX

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA TEN

The Falsifiers
 (Class I, Alchemists)

Dante lingers on the edge of the Ninth Bolgia expecting to see one of his kinsmen, Geri del Bello, among the Sowers of Discord. Virgil, however, hurries him on, since time is short, and as they cross the bridge over the Tenth Bolgia, Virgil

3. This is Bertran de Born, a Provençal nobleman and poet, who reputedly advised the son of Henry II of England to rebel against his father. For Achitophel's similar scheming between David and his son Absalom, see 2 Samuel 15–17.

4. In Dante's hell, the sinner is punished by having to commit his sin for all of eternity.

explains that he had a glimpse of Geri among the crowd near the bridge and that he had been making threatening gestures at Dante.

The Poets now look into the last Bolgia of the Eighth Circle and see The Falsifiers. They are punished by afflictions of every sense by darkness, stench, thirst, fifth, loathsome diseases, and a shrieking din. Some of them, moreover, run ravening through the pit, tearing others to pieces. Just as in life they corrupted society by their falsifications, so in death these sinners are subjected to a sum of corruptions. In one sense they figure forth what society would be if all falsifiers succeeded—a place where the senses are an affliction (since falsification deceives the senses) rather than a guide, where even the body has no honesty, and where some lie prostrate while others run ravening to prey upon them.

Not all of these details are made clear until the next canto, for Dante distinguishes four classes of Falsifiers, and in the present canto we meet only the first class, The Alchemists, the Falsifiers of Things. Of this class are Griffolino D'Arezzo and Capocchio, with both of whom Dante speaks.

The sight of that parade of broken dead had left my eyes so sotted with their tears
 I longed to stay and weep, but Virgil said: 3

“What are you waiting for? Why do you stare as if you could not tear your eyes away from the mutilated shadows passing there? 6

You did not act so in the other pits.
 Consider—if you mean perhaps to count them—this valley and its train of dismal spirits 9 winds twenty-two miles round.<sup>5</sup> The moon already is under our feet; the time we have is short,<sup>6</sup> and there is much that you have yet to see.” 12

“Had you known what I was seeking,” I replied, “you might perhaps have given me permission to stay on longer.” (As I spoke, my Guide 15 had started off already, and I in turn had moved along behind him; thus, I answered as we moved along the cliff.) “Within that cavern 18

upon whose brim I stood so long to stare,
 I think a spirit of my own blood mourns
 the guilt that sinners find so costly there.” 21

And the Master then: “Hereafter let your mind turn its attention to more worthy matters and leave him to his fate among the blind; 24

5. The reason for this exact measurement is not known. At 30.86 we are told that the circumference of the ninth circle is 11 miles, showing that Hell is shaped like a funnel.

6. This means that the sun (which they cannot see) is over their heads, and the time is about 2:00 p.m. The journey to the center of Hell lasts 24 hours, so only 4 hours are left.

for by the bridge and among that shapeless crew
 I saw him point to you with threatening gestures, and I heard him called Geri del Bello.<sup>7</sup> You 27 were occupied at the time with that headless one who in his life was master of Altaforte,<sup>8</sup> and did not look that way; so he moved on.” 30

“O my sweet Guide,” I answered, “his death came by violence and is not yet avenged by those who share his blood, and, thus, his shame. 33

For this he surely hates his kin, and, therefore,
 as I suppose, he would not speak to me;
 and in that he makes me pity him the more.” 36

We spoke of this until we reached the edge from which, had there been light, we could have seen the floor of the next pit. Out from that ledge 39

Malebolge’s final cloister lay outspread, and all of its lay brethren might have been in sight but for the murk; and from those dead 42

such shrieks and strangled agonies shrilled through me like shafts, but barbed with pity, that my hands flew to my ears. If all the misery 45 that crams the hospitals of pestilence in Maremma, Valdichiano, and Sardinia in the summer months when death sits like a presence<sup>9</sup> 48

on the marsh air, were dumped into one trench—that might suggest their pain. And through the screams, putrid flesh spread up its sickening stench. 51

Still bearing left we passed from the long sill to the last bridge of Malebolge. There the reeking bottom was more visible. 54

There, High Justice, sacred ministress of the First Father, reigns eternally over the falsifiers in their distress. 57

I doubt it could have been such pain to bear the sight of the Aeginian<sup>1</sup> people dying that time when such malignance rode the air 60

7. First cousin to Dante’s father; his death at the hands of a member of another Florentine family initiated a feud between the two families that lasted some 50 years.

8. Bertran de Born (see 28.134).

9. The region of Maremma, the river valley of Val di Chiana, and the island of Sardinia were all plagued by malaria.

1. A mythical island that was infected by Juno with a pestilence that killed all its inhabitants and was then repopulated when Jupiter turned ants into men; see Ovid, Metamorphoses 7.

that every beast down to the smallest worm shriveled and died (it was after that great plague that the Ancient People, as the poets affirm, 63 were reborn from the ants)—as it was to see the spirits lying heaped on one another in the dank bottom of that fetid valley. 66

One lay gasping on another's shoulder, one on another's belly; and some were crawling on hands and knees among the broken boulders. 69

Silent, slow step by step, we moved ahead looking at and listening to those souls too weak to raise themselves from their stone bed. 72

I saw two there like two pans that are put one against the other to hold their warmth.<sup>2</sup>
 They were covered with great scabs from head to foot. 75

No stable boy in a hurry to go home, or for whom his master waits impatiently, ever scrubbed harder with his currycomb<sup>3</sup> 78 than those two spirits of the stinking ditch scrubbed at themselves with their own bloody claws to ease the furious burning of the itch. 81

And as they scrubbed and clawed themselves, their nails drew down the scabs the way a knife scrapes bream<sup>4</sup> or some other fish with even larger scales. 84

"O you," my Guide called out to one, "you there who rip your scabby mail as if your fingers were claws and pincers; tell us if this lair 87 counts any Italians among those who lurk in its dark depths; so may your busy nails eternally suffice you for your work." 90

"We both are Italian whose unending loss you see before you," he replied in tears
 "But who are you who come to question us?" 93

"I am a shade," my Guide and Master said,
 "who leads this living man from pit to pit to show him Hell as I have been commanded." 96

2. The image is of pans leaned against one another before a kitchen fireplace.

3. A brush used to groom horses.

4. A large fish like a carp.

The sinners broke apart as he replied and turned convulsively to look at me, as others did who overheard my Guide. 99

My Master, then, ever concerned for me, turned and said: "Ask them whatever you wish."
 And I said to those two wraiths of misery: 102

"So may the memory of your names and actions not die forever from the minds of men in that first world, but live for many suns, 105

tell me who you are and of what city;
 do not be shamed by your nauseous punishment into concealing your identity." 108

"I was a man of Arezzo," one replied,
 "and Albert of Siena had me burned;
 but I am not here for the deed for which I died."<sup>5</sup> 111

It is true that jokingly I said to him once:
 'I know how to raise myself and fly through air';
 and he—with all the eagerness of a dunce— 114 wanted to learn. Because I could not make a Daedalus of him—for no other reason—he had his father burn me at the stake. 117

But Minos, the infallible, had me hurled here to the final bolgia of the ten for the alchemy<sup>6</sup> I practiced in the world." 120

And I to the Poet: "Was there ever a race more vain than the Sienese? Even the French, compared to them, seem full of modest grace." 123

And the other leper answered mockingly:<sup>7</sup>
 "Excepting Stricca, who by careful planning managed to live and spend so moderately; 126 and Niccolò, who in his time above was first of all the shoots in that rank garden to discover the costly uses of the clove; 129

5. Griffolino of Arezzo cheated Albero (Albert) of Siena by promising to teach him the art of Daedalus—flying. The bishop of Siena, father of the illegitimate Albero, had Griffolino burned as a heretic.

6. A practice that sought to turn base metals like lead into gold. Alchemy was not condemned outright by the Catholic Church (and in fact alchemy was practiced by many prominent clerics), but its association with the occult and with sheer greed made alchemy morally suspect.

7. The speaker is Capocchio, a Florentine burned in 1293 for alchemy, which he here admits was mere counterfeiting. The people he names were rich young noblemen of Siena who joined a "Spendthrifts' Club" and sought to outdo each other in profligacy. For another member of this club, Lano of Siena, see 13.120.

and excepting the brilliant company of talents in which Caccia squandered his vineyards and his woods, and Abbagliato displayed his intelligence. 132

But if you wish to know who joins your cry against the Sienese, study my face with care and let it make its own reply. 135

So you will see I am the suffering shadow of Capocchio, who, by practicing alchemy, falsified the metals, and you must know, 138

unless my mortal recollection strays how good an ape I was of Nature's ways."<sup>8</sup>

Canto XXX

CIRCLE EIGHT: BOLGIA TEN      The Falsifiers (The Remaining Three Classes: Evil Impersonators, Counterfeiters, False Witnesses)

Just as Capocchio finishes speaking, two ravenous spirits come racing through the pit; and one of them, sinking his tusks into Capocchio's neck, drags him away like prey. Capocchio's companion, Griffolino, identifies the two as Gianni Schicchi and Myrrhe, who run ravening through the pit through all eternity, snatching at other souls and rending them. These are the Evil Impersonators, Falsifiers of Persons. In life they seized upon the appearance of others, and in death they must run with never a pause, seizing upon the infernal apparition of these souls, while they in turn are preyed upon by their own furies.

Next the Poets encounter Master Adam, a sinner of the third class, a Falsifier of Money, i.e., a Counterfeiter. Like the alchemists, he is punished by a loathsome disease and he cannot move from where he lies, but his disease is compounded by other afflictions, including an eternity of unbearable thirst. Master Adam identifies two spirits lying beside him as Potiphar's Wife and Sinon the Greek, sinners of the fourth class, The False Witnesses, i.e., Falsifiers of Words.

Sinon, angered by Master Adam's identification of him, strikes him across the belly with the one arm he is able to move. Master Adam replies in kind; and Dante, fascinated by their continuing exchange of abuse, stands staring at them until Virgil turns on him in great anger, for "The wish to hear such baseness is degrading." Dante burns with shame, and Virgil immediately forgives him because of his great and genuine repentance.

At the time when Juno took her furious revenge for Semele,<sup>9</sup> striking in rage again and again at the Theban royal house,

8. By calling himself "an ape . . . of Nature's ways," Capocchio means that he merely imitated change in his alchemical displays rather than actually accomplishing it.

9. Daughter of the king of Thebes, Semele was loved by Jupiter (their union produced Bacchus, the god of wine) and therefore incited the wrath of Juno, who drove her brother-in-law Athamas insane. While mad, Athamas thought his wife, Ino, and his two sons, Learchus and Melicertes, were a lioness and two cubs: he killed Learchus, and Ino drowned herself and Melicertes. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.

King Athamas, by her contrivance, grew 3 so mad, that seeing his wife out for an airing with his two sons, he cried to his retinue: 6

“Out with the nets there! Nets across the pass!
 for I will take this lioness and her cubs!”
 And spread his talons, mad and merciless, 9 and seizing his son Learchus, whirled him round and brained him on a rock; at which the mother leaped into the sea with her other son and drowned. 12

And when the Wheel of Fortune spun about to humble the all-daring Trojan’s pride<sup>1</sup>
 so that both king and kingdom were wiped out; 15

Hecuba—mourning, wretched, and a slave—having seen Polyxena sacrificed, and Polydorus dead without a grave; 18

lost and alone, beside an alien sea, began to bark and growl like a dog in the mad seizure of her misery. 21

But never in Thebes nor Troy were Furies seen to strike at man or beast in such mad rage as two I saw, pale, naked, and unclean, 24 who suddenly came running toward us then, snapping their teeth as they ran, like hungry swine

 let out to feed after a night in the pen. 27

One of them sank his tusks so savagely into Capocchio’s neck, that when he dragged him, the ditch’s rocky bottom tore his belly. 30

And the Aretine,<sup>2</sup> left trembling by me, said:
 “That incubus, in life, was Gianni Schicchi;<sup>3</sup> here he runs rabid, mangling the other dead.” 33

“So!” I answered, “and so may the other one not sink its teeth in you, be pleased to tell us what shade it is before it races on.” 36

1. Parallel to the fate of Thebes is that of Troy, which is here represented by the madness into which Queen Hecuba fell when she saw her daughter Polyxena sacrificed on Achilles’ tomb and the unburied body of her betrayed son Polydorus. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.

2. Griffolino (see 29.111).

3. A Florentine who impersonated Buoso Donati (line 44), who had just died, and dictated a new will that gave him Buoso’s best beast (“the fabulous lead-mare” of line 43).

And he: "That ancient shade in time above was Myrrha,<sup>4</sup> vicious daughter of Cinyras who loved her father with more than rightful love. 39

She falsified another's form and came disguised to sin with him just as that other who runs with her, in order that he might claim 42

the fabulous lead-mare, lay under disguise on Buoso Donati's deathbed and dictated a spurious testament to the notaries." 45

And when the rabid pair had passed from sight,
 I turned to observe the other misbegotten spirits that lay about to left and right. 48

And there I saw another husk of sin, who, had his legs been trimmed away at the groin, would have looked for all the world like a mandolin. 51

The dropsy's<sup>5</sup> heavy humors, which so bunch and spread the limbs, had disproportioned him till his face seemed much too small for his swollen paunch. 54

He strained his lips apart and thrust them forward the way a sick man, feverish with thirst, curls one lip toward the chin and the other upward. 57

"O you exempt from every punishment of this grim world (I know not why)," he cried,
 "look well upon the misery and debasement 60 of him who was Master Adam.<sup>6</sup> In my first life's time, I had enough to please me; here,

 I lack a drop of water for my thirst. 63

The rivulets that run from the green flanks of Casentino to the Arno's flood, spreading their cool sweet moisture through their banks, 66 run constantly before me, and their splash and ripple in imagination dries me more than the disease that eats my flesh. 69

4. Myrrha impersonated another woman in order to sleep with her father; see Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.

5. A disease in which fluid ("humors") gathers in the cells and the affected part becomes grotesquely swollen.

6. A counterfeiter, burned in 1281, who made coins stamped with the image of John the Baptist, the patron saint of Florence, that contained 21 rather than 24 carats of gold (see line 90); he worked for a noble family of Romena (individual members are mentioned in lines 76–77), a town in the Florentine district of Casentino.

Inflexible Justice that has forked and spread my soul like hay, to search it the more closely, finds in the country where my guilt was bred 72

this increase of my grief; for there I learned, there in Romena, to stamp the Baptist's image on alloyed gold—till I was bound and burned. 75

But could I see the soul of Guido here, or of Alessandro, or of their filthy brother,
 I would not trade that sight for all the clear 78 cool flow of Branda's fountain.<sup>7</sup> One of the three—if those wild wraiths who run here are not lying—is here already. But small good it does me 81

when my legs are useless! Were I light enough to move as much as an inch in a hundred years, long before this I would have started off 84

to cull him from the freaks that fill this fosse, although it winds on for eleven miles and is no less than half a mile across. 87

Because of them I lie here in this pig-pen;
 it was they persuaded me to stamp the florins with three carats of alloy." And I then: 90

"Who are those wretched two sprawled alongside your right-hand borders, and who seem to smoke as a washed hand smokes in winter?" He replied: 93

"They were here when I first rained into this gully, and have not changed position since, nor may they,
 as I believe, to all eternity. 96

One is the liar who charged young Joseph wrongly:
 the other, Sinon, the false Greek from Troy.<sup>8</sup>
 A burning fever makes them reek so strongly." 99

And one of the false pair, perhaps offended by the manner of Master Adam's presentation, punched him in the rigid and distended 102 belly—it thundered like a drum—and he retorted with an arm blow to the face that seemed delivered no whit less politely, 105

7. A fountain near Romena.

8. The "liar" is Potiphar's wife, who falsely accused Joseph of trying to lie with her (Genesis 39.7–20); Sinon is the Greek priest who persuaded the Trojans to accept the wooden horse (Aeneid 2).

saying to him: "Although I cannot stir my swollen legs, I still have a free arm to use at times when nothing else will answer." 108

And the other wretch said: "It was not so free on your last walk to the stake, free as it was when you were coining." And he of the dropsy: 111

"That's true enough, but there was less truth in you when they questioned you at Troy." And Sinon then:
"For every word I uttered that was not true 114

you uttered enough false coins to fill a bushel:
I am put down here for a single crime,
but you for more than any Fiend in Hell." 117

"Think of the Horse," replied the swollen shade,
"and may it torture you, perjurer, to recall that all the world knows the foul part you played." 120

"And to you the torture of the thirst that fries and cracks your tongue," said the Greek, "and of the water that swells your gut like a hedge before your eyes." 123

And the coiner: "So is your own mouth clogged with the filth that stuffs and sickens it as always;
if I am parched while my paunch is waterlogged, 126

you have the fever and your cankered brain;
and were you asked to lap Narcissus' mirror<sup>9</sup>
you would not wait to be invited again." 129

I was still standing, fixed upon those two when the Master said to me: "Now keep on looking a little longer and I quarrel with you." 132

When I heard my Master raise his voice to me,
I wheeled about with such a start of shame that I grow pale yet at the memory. 135

As one trapped in a nightmare that has caught his sleeping mind, wishes within the dream that it were all a dream, as if it were not— 138 such I became: my voice could not win through my shame to ask his pardon; while my shame already won more pardon than I knew. 141

9. Narcissus saw his reflection in a pool of water, referred to here as a "mirror" (Ovid, Metamorphoses 3).

"Less shame," my Guide said, ever just and kind,
 "would wash away a greater fault than yours.
 Therefore, put back all sorrow from your mind;

144

And never forget that I am always by you should it occur again, as we walk on,
 that we find ourselves where others of this crew

147 fall to such petty wrangling and upbraiding.

 The wish to hear such baseness is degrading."

Canto XXXI

THE CENTRAL PIT OF MALEBOLGE

The Giants

Dante's spirits rise again as the Poets approach the Central Pit, a great well, at the bottom of which lies Cocytus, the Ninth and final circle of Hell. Through the darkness Dante sees what appears to be a city of great towers, but as he draws near he discovers that the great shapes he has seen are the Giants and Titans who stand perpetual guard inside the well-pit with the upper halves of their bodies rising above the rim.

Among the Giants, Virgil identifies Nimrod, builder of the Tower of Babel; Ephialtes and Briareus, who warred against the Gods; and Tityos and Typhon, who insulted Jupiter. Also here, but for no specific offense, is Antaeus, and his presence makes it clear that the Giants are placed here less for their particular sins than for their general natures.

These are the sons of earth, embodiments of elemental forces unbalanced by love, desire without restraint and without acknowledgment of moral and theological law. They are symbols of the earth-trace that every devout man must clear from his soul, the unchecked passions of the beast. Raised from the earth, they make the very gods tremble. Now they are returned to the darkness of their origins, guardians of earth's last depth.

At Virgil's persuasion, Antaeus takes the Poets in his huge palm and lowers them gently to the final floor of Hell.

One and the same tongue had first wounded me so that the blood came rushing to my cheeks, and then supplied the soothing remedy.

3

Just so, as I have heard, the magic steel of the lance that was Achilles' and his father's could wound at a touch, and, at another, heal.<sup>1</sup>

6

We turned our backs on the valley and climbed from it to the top of the stony bank that walls it round, crossing in silence to the central pit.

9

1. Achilles' father, Peleus, gave him a lance that would heal any wound it inflicted.

Here it was less than night and less than day;
 my eyes could make out little through the gloom, but I heard the shrill note of a trumpet bray 12 louder than any thunder. As if by force, it drew my eyes; I stared into the gloom along the path of the sound back to its source. 15

After the bloody rout when Charlemagne<sup>2</sup> had lost the band of Holy Knights, Roland blew no more terribly for all his pain. 18

And as I stared through that obscurity,
 I saw what seemed a cluster of great towers,
 whereat I cried: "Master, what is this city?" 21

And he: "You are still too far back in the dark to make out clearly what you think you see;
 it is natural that you should miss the mark: 24

you will see clearly when you reach that place
 how much your eyes mislead you at a distance;
 I urge you, therefore, to increase your pace." 27

Then taking my hand in his, my Master said:
 "The better to prepare you for strange truth,
 let me explain those shapes you see ahead: 30

they are not towers but giants. They stand in the well from the navel down; and stationed round its bank they mount guard on the final pit of Hell." 33

Just as a man in a fog that starts to clear begins little by little to piece together the shapes the vapor crowded from the air— 36

so, when those shapes grew clearer as I drew across the darkness to the central brink, error fled from me; and my terror grew. 39

For just as at Montereccione<sup>3</sup> the great towers crown the encircling wall; so the grim giants<sup>4</sup> whom Jove still threatens when the thunder roars 42

2. In The Song of Roland (laisse 133), Roland blows his horn to alert Charlemagne to the fact that the rear guard Roland commands has been slaughtered.

3. A castle surrounded by towers, built to protect Siena from attack by Florence.

4. These "giants" are the mythological Titans, monsters born of the Earth who assaulted Olympus and were defeated and imprisoned by Jupiter (Jove).

raised from the rim of stone about that well
 the upper halves of their bodies, which loomed up like turrets through the murky air of Hell. 45

I had drawn close enough to one already to make out the great arms along his sides, the face, the shoulders, the breast, and most of the belly.<sup>5</sup> 48

Nature, when she destroyed the last exemplars on which she formed those beasts, surely did well to take such executioners from Mars. 51

And if she has not repented the creation of whales and elephants, the thinking man will see in that her justice and discretion: 54

for where the instrument of intelligence is added to brute power and evil will, mankind is powerless in its own defense. 57

His face, it seemed to me, was quite as high and wide as the bronze pine cone in St. Peter's<sup>6</sup> with the rest of him proportioned accordingly: 60

so that the bank, which made an apron for him from the waist down, still left so much exposed that three Frieslanders<sup>7</sup> standing on the rim, 63

one on another, could not have reached his hair;
 for to that point at which men's capes are buckled, thirty good hand-spans<sup>8</sup> of brute bulk rose clear. 66

"Rafel mahee amek zabi almit,"<sup>9</sup> began a bellowed chant from the brute mouth for which no sweeter psalmody was fit. 69

And my Guide in his direction: "Babbling fool, stick to your horn<sup>1</sup> and vent yourself with it when rage or passion stir your stupid soul. 72

Feel there around your neck, you muddle-head, and find the cord; and there's the horn itself,
 there on your overgrown chest." To me he said: 75

5. This is Nimrod, described as "a mighty hunter before the Lord" (Genesis 10.9) and understood by medieval commentators to be a giant. He ruled over Babylon, where the tower of Babel was built (Genesis 11.1–9).

6. This bronze pine cone, over 12 feet high, stood outside St. Peter's Cathedral in Dante's time; today it can be seen in the papal gardens in the Vatican.

7. Inhabitants of the northernmost province of what is now the Netherlands, considered the tallest men of the time.

8. About 15 feet.

9. Appropriately for the builder of Babel, he speaks an incomprehensible language.

1. Nimrod has a "horn" because in the Bible he is described as a hunter (Genesis 10.9).

“His very babbling testifies the wrong he did on earth: he is Nimrod, through whose evil mankind no longer speaks a common tongue. 78

Waste no words on him: it would be foolish.
 To him all speech is meaningless; as his own,
 which no one understands, is simply gibberish.” 81

We moved on, bearing left along the pit, and a crossbow-shot away we found the next one,<sup>2</sup> an even huger and more savage spirit. 84

What master could have bound so gross a beast
 I cannot say, but he had his right arm pinned behind his back, and the left across his breast 87

by an enormous chain that wound about him from the neck down, completing five great turns before it spiraled down below the rim. 90

“This piece of arrogance,” said my Guide to me, “dared try his strength against the power of Jove;
 for which he is rewarded as you see. 93

He is Ephialtes, who made the great endeavour with the other giants who alarmed the Gods;
 the arms he raised then, now are bound forever.” 96

“Were it possible, I should like to take with me,”
 I said to him, “the memory of seeing the immeasurable Briareus.”<sup>3</sup> And he: 99

“Nearer to hand, you may observe Antaeus<sup>4</sup> who is able to speak to us, and is not bound.
 It is he will set us down in Cocytus, 102

the bottom of all guilt. The other hulk stands far beyond our road. He too, is bound and looks like this one, but with a fiercer sulk.” 105

No earthquake in the fury of its shock has ever seized a tower more violently, than Ephialtes, hearing, began to rock. 108

Then I dreaded death as never before;
 and I think I could have died for very fear had I not seen what manacles he wore. 111

2. This is Ephialtes, a Titan who with his twin brother Otus tried to attack Olympus by piling Mount Ossa on Mount Pelion; see Aeneid 6.

3. Another Titan.

4. A Titan born too late to participate in the rebellion against Jupiter and therefore not chained; he was known for eating lions (line 118) and was defeated by Hercules in a wrestling match (line 132).

We left the monster, and not far from him
 we reached Antaeus, who to his shoulders alone soared up a good five ells<sup>5</sup> above the rim. 114

“O soul who once in Zama’s fateful vale—<sup>6</sup> where Scipio became the heir of glory when Hannibal and all his troops turned tail— 117 took more than a thousand lions for your prey; and in whose memory many still believe the sons of earth would yet have won the day 120 had you joined with them against High Olympus—do not disdain to do us a small service, but set us down where the cold grips Cocytus.<sup>7</sup> 123

Would you have us go to Tityos or Typhon?—<sup>8</sup> this man can give you what is longed for here:
 therefore do not refuse him, but bend down. 126

For he can still make new your memory:
 he lives, and awaits long life, unless Grace call him before his time to his felicity.” 129

Thus my Master to that Tower of Pride; and the giant without delay reached out the hands which Hercules had felt, and raised my Guide. 132

Virgil, when he felt himself so grasped, called to me: “Come, and I will hold you safe.”
 And he took me in his arms and held me clasped. 135

The way the Carisenda<sup>9</sup> seems to one who looks up from the leaning side when clouds are going over it from that direction, 138 making the whole tower seem to topple—so Antaeus seemed to me in the fraught moment when I stood clinging, watching from below 141

as he bent down; while I with heart and soul wished we had gone some other way, but gently he set us down inside the final hole 144 whose ice holds Judas and Lucifer<sup>1</sup> in its grip.

 Then straightened like a mast above a ship.

5. About 19 feet.

6. The “vale” of the Bagradas River in Tunisia, where the Roman Scipio defeated the Carthaginian Hannibal in the battle of Zama in 202 B.C.E.

7. The frozen lake of Cocytus is in the ninth and last circle of Hell.

8. Two more Titans.

9. A leaning tower of Bologna: when a cloud passes over it, moving opposite to the tower’s slant, it appears to be falling away from the sky.

1. Two of the inhabitants of Cocytus.

Canto XXXII

CIRCLE NINE: COCYTUS

Compound Fraud

ROUND ONE: CAÏNA

The Treacherous to Kin

ROUND TWO: ANTENORA

The Treacherous to Country

At the bottom of the well Dante finds himself on a huge frozen lake. This is Cocytus, the Ninth Circle, the fourth and last great water of Hell, and here, fixed in the ice, each according to his guilt, are punished sinners guilty of Treachery against Those to Whom They Were Bound by Special Ties. The ice is divided into four concentric rings marked only by the different positions of the damned within the ice.

This is Dante's symbolic equivalent of the final guilt. The treacheries of these souls were denials of love (which is God) and of all human warmth. Only the remorseless dead center of the ice will serve to express their natures. As they denied God's love, so are they furthest removed from the light and warmth of His Sun. As they denied all human ties, so are they bound only by the unyielding ice.

The first round is Caïna, named for Cain. Here lie those who were treacherous against blood ties. They have their necks and heads out of the ice and are permitted to bow their heads—a double boon since it allows them some protection from the freezing gale and, further, allows their tears to fall without freezing their eyes shut. Here Dante sees Alessandro and Napoleone degli Alberti, and he speaks to Camicion, who identifies other sinners of this round.

The second round is Antenora, named for Antenor, the Trojan who was believed to have betrayed his city to the Greeks. Here lie those guilty of Treachery to Country. They, too, have their heads above the ice, but they cannot bend their necks, which are gripped by the ice. Here Dante accidentally kicks the head of Bocca degli Abbatì and then proceeds to treat him with a savagery he has shown to no other soul in Hell. Bocca names some of his fellow traitors, and the Poets pass on to discover two heads frozen together in one hole. One of them is gnawing the nape of the other's neck.

If I had rhymes as harsh and horrible as the hard fact of that final dismal hole which bears the weight of all the steepes of Hell, 3

I might more fully press the sap and substance from my conception; but since I must do without them, I begin with some reluctance. 6

For it is no easy undertaking, I say, to describe the bottom of the Universe;
nor is it for tongues that only babble child's play. 9

But may those Ladies of the Heavenly Spring<sup>2</sup> who helped Amphion wall Thebes, assist my verse, that the word may be the mirror of the thing. 12

2. The Muses who helped the legendary musician Amphion raise the walls of Thebes with the music of his lyre.

O most miscreant rabble, you who keep the stations of that place whose name is pain, better had you been born as goats or sheep! 15

We stood now in the dark pit of the well, far down the slope below the Giant's feet,
 and while I still stared up at the great wall, 18

I heard a voice cry: "Watch which way you turn:
 take care you do not trample on the heads of the forworn and miserable brethren." 21

Whereat I turned and saw beneath my feet and stretching out ahead, a lake so frozen it seemed to be made of glass.<sup>3</sup> So thick a sheet 24

never yet hid the Danube's winter course, nor, far away beneath the frigid sky, locked the Don up in its frozen source: 27

for were Tanbernick<sup>4</sup> and the enormous peak of Pietrapana to crash down on it, not even the edges would so much as creak. 30

The way frogs sit to croak, their muzzles leaning out of the water, at the time and season when the peasant woman dreams of her day's gleaning— 33

just so the livid dead are sealed in place up to the part at which they blushed for shame, and they beat their teeth like storks.<sup>5</sup> Each holds his face 36 bowed toward the ice, each of them testifies to the cold with his chattering mouth, to his heart's grief with tears that flood forever from his eyes. 39

When I had stared about me, I looked down and at my feet I saw two clamped together so tightly that the hair of their heads had grown 42

together. "Who are you," I said, "who lie so tightly breast to breast?"<sup>6</sup> They strained their necks, and when they had raised their heads as if to reply, 45

3. The water for this lake derives from the crack in the Old Man of Crete (14.106–8).

4. Probably Mount Tambura, close to Mount Pietrapana in the Italian Alps. The Danube, in Central Europe, and the Don, in Russia, represent rivers of the north.

5. A harsh, clacking sound. The "part at which they blushed" is the face.

6. These are the two sons of Count Alberto degli Alberti of Florence; when he died (ca. 1280), they killed each other over politics and their inheritance.

the tears their eyes had managed to contain up to that time gushed out, and the cold froze them between the lids, sealing them shut again 48

tighter than any clamp grips wood to wood, and mad with pain, they fell to butting heads like billy goats in a sudden savage mood. 51

And a wraith who lay to one side and below, and who had lost both ears to frostbite, said,
his head still bowed: "Why do you watch us so? 54

If you wish to know who they are who share one doom, they owned the Bisenzio's<sup>7</sup> valley with their father, whose name was Albert. They sprang from one womb, 57 and you may search through all Caïna's<sup>8</sup> crew without discovering in all this waste a squab more fit for the aspic than these two; 60

not him whose breast and shadow a single blow of the great lance of King Arthur pierced with light;<sup>9</sup> nor yet Focaccia; nor this one fastened so 63

into the ice that his head is all I see,
and whom, if you are Tuscan, you know well—his name on the earth was Sassol Mascheroni.<sup>1</sup> 66

And I—to tell you all and so be through—was Camicion de' Pazzi.<sup>2</sup> I wait for Carlin<sup>3</sup> beside whose guilt my sins will shine like virtue." 69

And leaving him, I saw a thousand faces discolored so by cold, I shudder yet and always will when I think of those frozen places. 72

As we approached the center of all weight,<sup>4</sup> where I went shivering in eternal shade, whether it was my will, or chance, or fate, 75

7. A river north of Florence.

8. Named after Cain; this first of the four subdivisions of Cocytus is where those who betrayed their kin are imprisoned.

9. "Not him . . . light": This is Mordred, Arthur's nephew and son; when Arthur pierced him with a sword, he created a wound so large that the sun shone through, thus creating a hole in Mordred's shadow. Focaccia in the next line is a nobleman of Pistoia who killed his cousin.

1. A Florentine nobleman who murdered a relative.

2. A Florentine who killed his kinsman.

3. A Florentine who has betrayed a castle belonging to his party. When he dies (sometime after 1300) he will therefore be sent to the next subdivision, Antenora, for those who committed treachery against their country, city, or party—a harsher punishment, beside whose guilt Camicion says "my sins will shine like virtue."

4. The "center of all weight" is where gravity is strongest and toward which all material things are drawn.

I cannot say, but as I trailed my Guide among those heads, my foot struck violently against the face of one.<sup>5</sup> Weeping, it cried: 78

“Why do you kick me? If you were not sent to wreak a further vengeance for Montaperti, why do you add this to my other torment?” 81

“Master,” I said, “grant me a moment’s pause to rid myself of a doubt concerning this one,
then you may hurry me at your own pace.” 84

The Master stopped at once, and through the volley of foul abuse the wretch poured out, I said:
“Who are you who curse others so?” And he: 87

“And who are you who go through the dead larder of Antenora<sup>6</sup> kicking the cheeks of others so hard, that were you alive, you could not kick harder?” 90

“I am alive,” I said, “and if you seek fame, it may be precious to you above all else that my notes on this descent include your name.” 93

“Exactly the opposite is my wish and hope,” he answered. “Let me be; for it’s little you know of how to flatter on this icy slope.” 96

I grabbed the hair of his dog’s-ruff<sup>7</sup> and I said:
“Either you tell me truly who you are,
or you won’t have a hair left on your head.” 99

And he: “Not though you snatch me bald. I swear
I will not tell my name nor show my face.
Not though you rip until my brain lies bare.” 102

I had a good grip on his hair; already
I had yanked out more than one fistful of it, while the wretch yelped, but kept his face turned from me; 105

when another<sup>8</sup> said: “Bocca, what is it ails you?
What the Hell’s wrong? Isn’t it bad enough to hear you bang your jaws? Must you bark too?” 108

5. Bocca degli Abati (his name is betrayed by one of the fellows damned in line 106); Bocca betrayed his party at the battle of Montaperti in 1260.

6. Dante and Virgil have moved into the second subdivision of Caïna, which is named after Antenor, a Trojan who betrayed the city to the Greeks; it is the location of those who betrayed their country.

7. The hair at the nape of the neck.

8. This is Buoso da Duera, who betrayed Manfred, the ruler of Naples, to his enemy Charles of Anjou in 1265.

“Now filthy traitor, say no more!” I cried,
 “for to your shame, be sure I shall bear back a true report of you.” The wretch replied: 111

“Say anything you please but go away.
 And if you do get back, don’t overlook that pretty one who had so much to say 114

just now. Here he laments the Frenchman’s price.
 ‘I saw Buoso da Duera,’ you can report,
 ‘where the bad salad is kept crisp on ice.’ 117

And if you’re asked who else was wintering here, Beccheria,<sup>9</sup> whose throat was slit by Florence, is there beside you. Gianni de’ Soldanier<sup>1</sup> 120 is further down, I think, with Ganelon, and Tebaldello, who opened the gates of Faenza and let Bologna steal in with the dawn.” 123

Leaving him then, I saw two souls together in a single hole, and so pinched in by the ice that one head made a helmet for the other. 126

As a famished man chews crusts—so the one sinner sank his teeth into the other’s nape at the base of the skull, gnawing his loathsome dinner. 129

Tydeus<sup>2</sup> in his final raging hour gnawed Menalippus’ head with no more fury than this one gnawed at skull and dripping gore. 132

“You there,” I said, “who show so odiously your hatred for that other, tell me why on this condition: that if in what you tell me 135

you seem to have a reasonable complaint against him you devour with such foul relish,
 I, knowing who you are, and his soul’s taint, 138

may speak your cause to living memory,
 God willing the power of speech be left to me.”

9. Tesauo de’ Beccheria, a churchman executed for treason in Florence in 1258.

1. Gianni Soldanier was a Florentine nobleman who switched political parties; Ganelon (line 121) is the betrayer of Roland in the Song of Roland; Tebaldello (line 122) was the citizen of Faenza (a town east of Florence) who betrayed it to its enemies.

2. In the war against Thebes, Tydeus was mortally wounded by Menalippus, whom he killed and whose skull he gnawed in fury while dying.

Canto XXXIII

CIRCLE NINE: COCYTUS

Compound Fraud

ROUND TWO: ANTENORA

The Treacherous to Country

ROUND THREE: PTOLOMEA

The Treacherous to Guests and Hosts

In reply to Dante's exhortation, the sinner who is gnawing his companion's head looks up, wipes his bloody mouth on his victim's hair, and tells his harrowing story. He is Count Ugolino and the wretch he gnaws is Archbishop Ruggieri. Both are in Antenora for treason. In life they had once plotted together. Then Ruggieri betrayed his fellow plotter and caused his death, by starvation, along with his four "sons." In the most pathetic and dramatic passage of the Inferno, Ugolino details how their prison was sealed and how his "sons" dropped dead before him one by one, weeping for food. His terrible tale serves only to renew his grief and hatred, and he has hardly finished it before he begins to gnaw Ruggieri again with renewed fury. In the immutable Law of Hell, the killer-by-starvation becomes the food of his victim.

The Poets leave Ugolino and enter Ptolomea, so named for the Ptolomaeus of Maccabees, who murdered his father-in-law at a banquet. Here are punished those who were Treacherous against the Ties of Hospitality. They lie with only half their faces above the ice and their tears freeze in their eye sockets, sealing them with little crystal visors. Thus even the comfort of tears is denied them. Here Dante finds Friar Alberigo and Branca d'Oria, and discovers the terrible power of Ptolomea: so great is its sin that the souls of the guilty fall to its torments even before they die, leaving their bodies still on earth, inhabited by Demons.

The sinner raised his mouth from his grim repast and wiped it on the hair of the bloody head whose nape he had all but eaten away. At last 3

he began to speak: "You ask me to renew a grief so desperate that the very thought of speaking of it tears my heart in two.

6

But if my words may be a seed that bears
the fruit of infamy for him I gnaw,
I shall weep, but tell my story through my tears.

9

Who you may be, and by what powers you reach into this underworld, I cannot guess, but you seem to me a Florentine by your speech.

12

I was Count Ugolino,<sup>3</sup> I must explain;
this reverend grace is the Archbishop Ruggieri:
now I will tell you why I gnaw his brain.

15

That I, who trusted him, had to undergo imprisonment and death through his treachery, you will know already. What you cannot know—18

3. Ugolino, a governor of Pisa who was betrayed by his enemy Archbishop Ruggieri in 1288.

His own crime is obliquely explained by his narrative.

that is, the lingering inhumanity of the death I suffered—you shall hear in full:
 then judge for yourself if he has injured me. 21

A narrow window in that coop of<sup>4</sup> stone
 now called the Tower of Hunger for my sake (within which others yet must pace alone) 24 had shown me several waning moons already between its bars, when I slept the evil sleep in which the veil of the future parted for me. 27

This beast appeared as master of a hunt chasing the wolf and his whelps across the mountain<sup>5</sup> that hides Lucca from Pisa. Out in front 30 of the starved and shrewd and avid pack he had placed Gualandi and Sismondi and Lanfranchi<sup>6</sup> to point his prey. The father and sons had raced 33

a brief course only when they failed of breath and seemed to weaken; then I thought I saw their flanks ripped open by the hounds' fierce teeth. 36

Before the dawn, the dream still in my head,
 I woke and heard my sons, who were there with me,
 cry from their troubled sleep, asking for bread. 39

You are cruelty itself if you can keep your tears back at the thought of what foreboding stirred in my heart; and if you do not weep, 42

at what are you used to weeping?—The hour when food used to be brought, drew near. They were now awake, and each was anxious from his dream's dark mood. 45

And from the base of that horrible tower I heard the sound of hammers nailing up the gates:
 I stared at my sons' faces without a word. 48

I did not weep: I had turned stone inside.
 They wept. 'What ails you, Father, you look so strange,' my little Anselm, youngest of them, cried. 51

4. A cage for birds; the prison in Pisa where Ugolino and his relatives were confined became known as the Torre de Fame or Tower of Hunger.

5. Mount San Giuliano lies between Pisa and Lucca. "The wolf and his whelps": Ugolino and his four sons. Ugolino was imprisoned with two sons (who were grown men) and two adolescent grandsons.

6. Pisan families of the political party opposed to that of Ugolino.

But I did not speak a word nor shed a tear:
 not all that day nor all that endless night,
 until I saw another sun appear. 54

When a tiny ray leaked into that dark prison and I saw staring back from their four faces the terror and the wasting of my own, 57

I bit my hands in helpless grief. And they, thinking I chewed myself for hunger, rose suddenly together. I heard them say: 60

‘Father, it would give us much less pain
 if you ate us: it was you who put upon us this sorry flesh; now strip it off again.’<sup>7</sup> 63

I calmed myself to spare them. Ah! hard earth, why did you not yawn open? All that day and the next we sat in silence. On the fourth, 66

Gaddo, the eldest, fell before me and cried, stretched at my feet upon that prison floor:
 ‘Father, why don’t you help me?’<sup>8</sup> There he died. 69

And just as you see me, I saw them fall
 one by one on the fifth day and the sixth.
 Then, already blind, I began to crawl 72

from body to body shaking them frantically.
 Two days I called their names, and they were dead.
 Then fasting overcame my grief and me.” 75

His eyes narrowed to slits when he was done, and he seized the skull again between his teeth grinding it as a mastiff grinds a bone. 78

Ah, Pisa! foulest blemish on the land where “si” sounds sweet and clear,<sup>9</sup> since those nearby you are slow to blast the ground on which you stand, 81 may Caprara and Gorgona<sup>1</sup> drift from place and dam the flooding Arno at its mouth until it drowns the last of your foul race! 84

For if to Ugolino falls the censure for having betrayed your castles,<sup>2</sup> you for your part should not have put his sons to such a torture: 87

7. See Job 1.21.

8. See Matthew 27.46.

9. I.e., Italy, where si means “yes.”

1. Islands belonging to Pisa that lie close to the mouth of the Arno, which flows through Pisa.

2. In 1285 Ugolino conveyed three Pisan castles to Lucca and Florence.

you modern Thebes!<sup>3</sup> those tender lives you spilt—
 Brigata, Ugucione, and the others
 I mentioned earlier—were too young for guilt! 90

We passed on further, where the frozen mine entombs another crew in greater pain;
 these wraiths are not bent over, but lie supine.<sup>4</sup> 93

Their very weeping closes up their eyes;
 and the grief that finds no outlet for its tears turns inward to increase their agonies: 96

for the first tears that they shed knot instantly in their eye-sockets, and as they freeze they form a crystal visor above the cavity. 99

And despite the fact that standing in that place
 I had become as numb as any callus, and all sensation had faded from my face, 102

somehow I felt a wind begin to blow, whereat I said: “Master, what stirs this wind?
 Is not all heat extinguished here below?”<sup>5</sup> 105

And the Master said to me: “Soon you will be where your own eyes will see the source and cause and give you their own answer to the mystery.” 108

And one of those locked in that icy mall cried out to us as we passed: “O souls so cruel that you are sent to the last post of all, 111 relieve me for a little from the pain of this hard veil; let my heart weep a while before the weeping freeze my eyes again.” 114

And I to him: “If you would have my service, tell me your name; then if I do not help you may I descend to the last rim of the ice.” 117

“I am Friar Alberigo,”<sup>6</sup> he answered therefore,
 “the same who called for the fruits from the bad garden.
 Here I am given dates for figs full store.” 120

3. In classical mythology, Thebes was notorious for its internecine violence, such as the story of Oedipus, his father, Laius, and his sons, Eteocles and Polynices (see 26.54).

4. Virgil and Dante pass into the third subdivision of Cocytus, called Ptolomea (line 124) after Ptolemy, governor of Jericho, who killed his father-in-law, Simon, and two of his sons while they were dining with him (1 Maccabees 16.11–17). In Ptolomea those who have betrayed their guests are punished.

5. Since the sun’s heat was thought to cause wind, Dante wonders why he feels wind in this cold place. The answer will be given in 34.46–52.

6. A member of the Jovial Friars (see 23.100), he killed two of his relatives during a banquet at his house, signaling the assassins with an

“What! Are you dead already?” I said to him.
 And he then: “How my body stands in the world
 I do not know. So privileged is this rim 123 of Ptolomea, that often souls fall to it before dark Atropos<sup>7</sup> has cut their thread.

 And that you may more willingly free my spirit 126

of this glaze of frozen tears that shrouds my face,
 I will tell you this: when a soul betrays as I did,
 it falls from flesh, and a demon takes its place, 129 ruling the body till its time is spent.

 The ruined soul rains down into this cistern.
 So, I believe, there is still evident 132

in the world above, all that is fair and mortal of this black shade who winters here behind me.
 If you have only recently crossed the portal 135 from that sweet world, you surely must have known his body: Branca D’Oria<sup>8</sup> is its name, and many years have passed since he rained down.” 138

“I think you are trying to take me in,” I said, “Ser Branca D’Oria is a living man;
 he eats, he drinks, he fills his clothes and his bed.” 141

“Michel Zanche had not yet reached the ditch of the Black Talons,” the frozen wraith replied, “there where the sinners thicken in hot pitch, 144

when this one left his body to a devil, as did his nephew and second in treachery, and plumbed like lead through space to this dead level. 147

But now reach out your hand, and let me cry.”
 And I did not keep the promise I had made,
 for to be rude to him was courtesy. 150

Ah, men of Genoa! souls of little worth, corrupted from all custom of righteousness,
 why have you not been driven from the earth? 153

---

order to bring the fruit. In saying that he is now being served dates instead of figs, he is ironically complimenting God for his generosity, since a date would be more valuable than a fig.
 7. One of the mythological figures known as the Fates, she is the one who cuts the thread of life.

8. A nobleman of Genoa, who with a “nephew” (line 146) killed his father-in-law, Michel Zanche (line 142), at a banquet in 1275.

For there beside the blackest soul of all Romagna's evil plain, lies one of yours bathing his filthy soul<sup>9</sup> in the eternal 156 glacier of Cocytus for his foul crime, while he seems yet alive in world and time!

Canto XXXIV

NINTH CIRCLE: COCYTUS

Compound Fraud

ROUND FOUR: JUDECCA

The Treacherous to Their Masters

THE CENTER

Satan

"On march the banners of the King," Virgil begins as the Poets face the last depth. He is quoting a medieval hymn, and to it he adds the distortion and perversion of all that lies about him. "On march the banners of the King—of Hell." And there before them, in an infernal parody of Godhead, they see Satan in the distance, his great wings beating like a windmill. It is their beating that is the source of the icy wind of Cocytus, the exhalation of all evil.

All about him in the ice are strewn the sinners of the last round, Judecca, named for Judas Iscariot. These are the Treacherous to Their Masters. They lie completely sealed in the ice, twisted and distorted into every conceivable posture. It is impossible to speak to them, and the Poets move on to observe Satan.

He is fixed into the ice at the center to which flow all the rivers of guilt; and as he beats his great wings as if to escape, their icy wind only freezes him more surely into the polluted ice. In a grotesque parody of the Trinity, he has three faces, each a different color, and in each mouth he clamps a sinner whom he rips eternally with his teeth. Judas Iscariot is in the central mouth: Brutus and Cassius in the mouths on either side.

Having seen all, the Poets now climb through the center, grappling hand over hand down the hairy flank of Satan himself—a last supremely symbolic action—and at last, when they have passed the center of all gravity, they emerge from Hell. A long climb from the earth's center to the Mount of Purgatory awaits them, and they push on without rest, ascending along the sides of the river Lethe, till they emerge once more to see the stars of Heaven, just before dawn on Easter Sunday.

"On march the banners of the King of Hell,"<sup>1</sup> my Master said. "Toward us. Look straight ahead:
 can you make him out at the core of the frozen shell?"

3

Like a whirling windmill seen afar at twilight, or when a mist has risen from the ground—
 just such an engine rose upon my sight

6

9. That is, Friar Alberigo (line 118); Romagna is the part of Italy from which he and Branca come.

1. The first few words—"On march the banners of the King"—are opening lines of a 6th-century Latin hymn traditionally sung during Holy Week to celebrate Christ's Passion. Dante has added the last word, Inferni—"On march the banners of the King of Hell"—in order to apply the words to Satan.

stirring up such a wild and bitter wind
 I cowered for shelter at my Master's back, there being no other windbreak I could find. 9

I stood now<sup>2</sup> where the souls of the last class (with fear my verses tell it) were covered wholly;
 they shone below the ice like straws in glass. 12

Some lie stretched out; others are fixed in place upright, some on their heads, some on their soles;
 another, like a bow, bends foot to face. 15

When we had gone so far across the ice that it pleased my Guide to show me the foul creature that once had worn the grace of Paradise,<sup>3</sup> 18

he made me stop, and, stepping aside, he said:
 "Now see the face of Dis!<sup>4</sup> This is the place where you must arm your soul against all dread." 21

Do not ask, Reader, how my blood ran cold and my voice choked up with fear. I cannot write it:
 this is a terror that cannot be told. 24

I did not die, and yet I lost life's breath:
 imagine for yourself what I became,
 deprived at once of both my life and death. 27

The Emperor of the Universe of Pain jutted his upper chest above the ice; and I am closer in size to the great mountain 30

the Titans make around the central pit, than they to his arms. Now, starting from this part, imagine the whole that corresponds to it! 33

If he was once as beautiful as now he is hideous, and still turned on his Maker, well may he be the source of every woe! 36

With what a sense of awe I saw his head towering above me! for it had three faces:<sup>5</sup>
 one was in front, and it was fiery red; 39

2. This is the last and lowest subdivision of Caïna, known as Judecca after Judas; the sinners here are those who betrayed their benefactors.

3. Lucifer, the "light-bearer," was the most beautiful of angels before he rebelled and was renamed Satan.

4. A classical name for Pluto, here applied to Satan (see also 11.65).

5. Satan's three faces (and much else) make him an infernal parody of the Trinity.

the other two, as weirdly wonderful, merged with it from the middle of each shoulder to the point where all converged at the top of the skull; 42

the right was something between white and bile;
the left was about the color one observes on those who live along the banks of the Nile.<sup>6</sup> 45

Under each head two wings rose terribly, their span proportioned to so gross a bird:
I never saw such sails upon the sea. 48

They were not feathers—their texture and their form were like a bat's wings—and he beat them so that three winds blew from him in one great storm: 51

it is these winds that freeze all Cocytus.
He wept from his six eyes, and down three chins
the tears ran mixed with bloody froth and pus. 54

In every mouth he worked a broken sinner between his rake-like teeth. Thus he kept three in eternal pain at his eternal dinner. 57

For the one in front the biting seemed to play no part at all compared to the ripping; at times the whole skin of his back was flayed away. 60

"That soul that suffers most," explained my Guide,
"is Judas Iscariot, he who kicks his legs
on the fiery chin and has his head inside. 63

Of the other two, who have their heads thrust forward, the one who dangles down from the black face is Brutus:<sup>7</sup> note how he writhes without a word. 66

And there, with the huge and sinewy arms, is the soul of Cassius,<sup>8</sup>—But the night is coming on and we must go, for we have seen the whole." 69

Then, as he bade, I clasped his neck, and he, watching for a moment when the wings were opened wide, reached over dexterously 72

6. I.e., Ethiopians (Dante refers to those who live near the Nile's source). The significance of these three colors is not certain; it has been suggested that they represent hatred, impotence, and ignorance as the opposites of the divine attributes of love, omnipotence, and wisdom (see 3.5–6).

7. One of murderers of Julius Caesar in 44 B.C.E. and thus for Dante a betrayer of the empire.

8. The other murderer of Caesar.

and seized the shaggy coat of the king demon;
 then grappling matted hair and frozen crusts from one tuft to another, clambered down. 75

When we had reached the joint where the great thigh merges into the swelling of the haunch, my Guide and Master, straining terribly, 78 turned his head to where his feet had been and began to grip the hair as if he were climbing;

 so that I thought we moved toward Hell again.<sup>9</sup> 81

“Hold fast!” my Guide said, and his breath came shrill with labor and exhaustion. “There is no way but by such stairs to rise above such evil.” 84

At last he climbed out through an opening in the central rock, and he seated me on the rim;
 then joined me with a nimble backward spring. 87

I looked up, thinking to see Lucifer as I had left him, and I saw instead his legs projecting high into the air. 90

Now let all those whose dull minds are still vexed by failure to understand what point it was
 I had passed through, judge if I was perplexed. 93

“Get up. Up on your feet,” my Master said.
 “The sun already mounts to middle tierce,<sup>1</sup> and a long road and hard climbing lie ahead.” 96

It was no hall of state we had found there, but a natural animal pit hollowed from rock with a broken floor and a close and sunless air. 99

“Before I tear myself from the Abyss,”
 I said when I had risen, “O my Master, explain to me my error in all this: 102 where is the ice? and Lucifer—how has he been turned from top to bottom: and how can the sun have gone from night to day so suddenly?” 105

9. Virgil's reversal marks the point at which the two travelers pass from the Northern to the Southern Hemisphere. They began by climbing down Satan's body, but now reverse directions and climb up from the Earth's center (hence when they have passed through the center Dante sees Satan's legs sticking up [line 90]). Note that the travelers pass through the glassy ice, a passage that probably echoes 1 Corinthians 13.12: “For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face.”

1. About 7:30 a.m. on Holy Saturday. Dante has added 12 hours to his scheme so that the travelers will emerge from the Earth and arrive at the shore of Mount Purgatory just before the sunrise on the next day, Easter Sunday.

And he to me: "You imagine you are still on the other side of the center where I grasped the shaggy flank of the Great Worm of Evil 108 which bores through the world—you were while I climbed down, but when I turned myself about, you passed the point to which all gravities are drawn.<sup>2</sup> 111

You are under the other hemisphere where you stand;<sup>3</sup>
the sky above us is the half opposed to that which canopies the great dry land. 114

Under the midpoint of that other sky
the Man who was born sinless and who lived beyond all blemish, came to suffer and die. 117

You have your feet upon a little sphere which forms the other face of the Judecca.
There it is evening when it is morning here.<sup>4</sup> 120

And this gross Fiend and Image of all Evil who made a stairway for us with his hide is pinched and prisoned in the ice-pack still. 123

On this side he plunged down from heaven's height,<sup>5</sup> and the land that spread here once hid in the sea and fled North to our hemisphere for fright; 126

and it may be that moved by that same fear, the one peak that still rises on this side fled upward leaving this great cavern here."<sup>6</sup> 129

Down there, beginning at the further bound of Beelzebub's<sup>6</sup> dim tomb, there is a space not known by sight, but only by the sound 132

2. The center of the Earth, which is for Dante the center of the universe, and therefore the place where gravity is the strongest. Being furthest from Heaven, it is also the place which is most material and least spiritual.

3. I.e., under the Southern Hemisphere, exactly opposite Jerusalem where Christ ("the Man whose birth and life were free of sin") was crucified. Jerusalem is the center of the Northern Hemisphere (see Ezekiel 5.5) and is located directly over the cavity of Hell.

4. The "little sphere" upon which they stand is the other side of Judecca, which is a hollow. The sun is now over the Southern Hemisphere, and therefore it is night in the Northern, where Hell is located.

5. The land that was in the Southern Hemisphere before Satan fell fled to the Northern to avoid him; hence the Southern Hemisphere is composed of water. The exception is that when Satan plunged into the center of the world, the earth close to his body in the Northern Hemisphere moved "with that same fear" (line 127) to the Southern Hemisphere and became Mount Purgatory. The "cavern" (line 129) refers to Hell; Mount Purgatory is thus comprised of the land displaced by Satan in his fall. This elaborate explanation for medieval geography is Dante's own poetic scheme.

6. Another name for Satan.

of a little stream<sup>7</sup> descending through the hollow
 it has eroded from the massive stone in its endlessly entwining lazy flow. 135

My Guide and I crossed over and began to mount that little known and lightless road to ascend into the shining world again. 138

He first, I second, without thought of rest
 we climbed the dark until we reached the point where a round opening brought in sight the blest 141 and beauteous shining of the Heavenly cars.

 And we walked out once more beneath the Stars.<sup>8</sup>

7. This stream must flow down from Purgatory, perhaps from Lethe. It finds its source in “a space” (line 131) on Mount Purgatory; thus it is “at the further bound of Beelzebub’s dim tomb”—that is, it is located on the surface of the Southern Hemisphere, which since Satan is at the center of the earth is the same distance from him as Hell (his “tomb”) is deep.

When Dante has Virgil say that it is “down there” (line 130), he must be writing from the perspective of the Northern Hemisphere, since Mount Purgatory is at this moment above the travelers.

8. Each of the three parts of the Divine Comedy end with the word “stars” as an affirmation of God’s benevolent order.

---

THE THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS

(ALF LAYLA WA-LAYLA)

fourteenth century

---

A text built from many texts, The Thousand and One Nights is an extraordinarily flexible and capacious storytelling machine, one that has absorbed stories from a range of cultures across Asia and North Africa and then cast them back out again into the world in many new forms, including theater, opera, film, cartoons, video games, fashion, children’s toys, and, of course, other texts. Considered in light of the work’s many manifestations, the “nights” are not “one thousand and one”—they are innumerable.

THE TEXT IN CONTEXT

The Thousand and One Nights was written by many unknown authors, scattered over many centuries and countries of the Middle East. The first document bearing any physical evidence of The Thousand and One Nights was a single piece of very rare old Syrian paper that dates from 879 C.E. Discovered in 1948 by a scholar studying in a Cairo archive, the page contained, among various other scrawls and jottings, a signature, a date, and a few words from the opening lines of the Nights. The next trace of the Nights appears in the tenth century, when Ibn al-Nadim, a book dealer in Baghdad, mentions in his catalogue a number of story collections; among them is a book of tales concerning “Shahrazad,” which, he notes, is adapted from a Persian original called Hazar Afsan, or Thousand Tales. Another tenth-century writer, al-Mas’udi, also mentions Shahrazad and the now-lost Persian Hazar Afsan, and adds the title of the Arabic version of the work: Alf Layla, or Thousand Nights. The title that comes down to us in the earliest complete manuscript, a Syrian text dating from the fourteenth century, is the familiar Alf Layla wa-Layla, or Thousand and One Nights. The number—one thousand and one—seems precise, and in fact the first generation of Western readers took it literally, assuming that the manuscript, which contained far fewer than one thousand stories, must be incomplete. But its sense is instead symbolic: adding one more to a thousand implies an unending abundance. There is always one more tale to be told.

The Thousand and One Nights is an Arabic text, but one derived from a Persian source (reflected in the Persian names of the characters of the frame story—Shahrazad and her sister Dunyazad, King Shahrayar and his brother Shahzaman). Behind both the Arabic and the Persian texts may lie a Sanskrit original, just as the Indian Pañcatantra lies behind the other widely disseminated Arabic story collection, Kalila and Dimna; but this original, if it exists, has never been discovered. Whatever its early sources, the Nights quickly swelled with new stories from Arab traditions as its influence spread. One cluster of stories centers on Baghdad and its early ninth-century ruler, Harun al-Rashid, and his vizier, Ja’far al-Barmaki. Other groups of stories, which entered the collection at a later date, reflect the culture of medieval Cairo; still others allude to the itinerant heritage of the Bedouin of the Arabian Peninsula. The text of the Nights—if we can call such a flexible and changeable organism a “text”—was above all an inspiration for sharing stories, and was thus subject to change with each new telling.

Though the content of the Nights is unique, its literary form—the frame tale—is common in Eastern and Western traditions. The frame tale is an open-ended genre, in which an outer story or “frame” provides a structure within which other, shorter stories can be told. Frame tales are among the most popular of literary forms, surviving in the major works of Boccaccio, Chaucer, Marie de France, and many others. The genre most likely has its origins in India, in textual traditions such as Somadeva’s Kathāsaritsāgara. The Pañcatantra, a Sanskrit collection of animal stories, is among the world’s best-known and oldest frame tales, and it was the inspiration for the Arabic Kalila and Dimna, which was quickly disseminated throughout medieval Europe. While Kalila and Dimna was popular in the West because of the didactic and edifying quality of the tales (they each conclude, as do Aesop’s Fables, with a moral), The Thousand and One Nights were avidly read by Europeans for less noble reasons: they believed the Nights could offer insights into the duplicitous and irrational character of “the Oriental,” and they found pleasure in the tales’ sensuous details and often unrestrained sexuality. The long history of “Orientalist” approaches to The Thousand and One Nights in the West takes nothing away from our own enjoyment of the tales, but it is certainly a reminder of the dangers of interpreting any text as somehow embodying the culture in which it originated.

WORK

The overall frame of The Thousand and One Nights centers on a good king who has become a tyrant. After discovering the secret promiscuity of his wife, King Shahrayar decides that he will avoid the deception of women forever by taking a new bride every night and putting her to death in the morning. The deaths rapidly mount, the kingdom is filled with mourning parents—and to the horror and despair of the faithful royal vizier, his daughter, Shahrazad, volunteers to marry the king. He tries to dissuade her, but Shahrazad has a plan. By telling a story to the king every night, each one more marvelous and entrancing than the last, Shahrazad will continually defer the doom that awaits his bride. Yet she also has another goal, beyond self-preservation or even the salvation of her countrywomen. By telling stories that repeatedly address the problems of rule—both the rule of oneself and the rule of others—she will teach the king how to restore order in his own realm, as well as in his own soul.

Even among frame tales, The Thousand and One Nights is unique for its enchantingly intricate nested structure. Very often, a character in a tale will pause to tell yet another tale, with one story inside the next inside the next, like Russian nested dolls. In “The Story of the Merchant and the Demon,” for example, three old men tell stories, each more fantastic than the last, to the dangerous jinn in their successful effort to purchase the merchant’s freedom. This structure makes The Thousand and One Nights an unusually playful text, seemingly spontaneous and improvisational even on the page, and wonderfully suited to public entertainment and oral performance.

Perhaps the Nights is most extraordinary for the persistence of its fertile, regenerative quality even after being taken up by Western readers and rendered in a host of European and, later, American translations and adaptations. This process began in 1704, with the publication in French (by Antoine Galland) of a selection of tales from the earliest surviving complete manuscript. Readers were immediately captivated by the work: an unauthorized English translation of the French version appeared in 1706, and Galland himself quickly produced additional volumes for publication. When he ran out of tales to translate from the Syrian manuscript (which, like all the early collections, contains only about 280), Galland turned to other sets of Arabic tales, including the famous stories of Aladdin and Ali Baba. As he sought to reach the target number of one thousand and one, Galland even added some tales for which there were no written Arabic sources but only oral versions picked up from Arab visitors to Paris. The tremendous European appetite for The Thousand and One Nights led to the production of composite Arabic story collections in Cairo during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and subsequently these versions were published in Arabic editions and translated. We can thus think of two separate lineages for the modern reception of the Nights: one can be traced back to the earliest complete text, the fourteenth-century Syrian manuscript translated by Galland, and the other to the later composite texts assembled in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Cairo. The selections reproduced here come from the Syrian manuscript, but it would be wrong to think of these as the “authentic” tales and to dismiss those in the Cairo versions as unimportant innovations. Instead, the Syrian manuscript can best be thought of as a snapshot, an image captured of the Nights at a certain moment in time, in a certain cultural location. The Cairo manuscripts also represent a specific time and place in the life of the Nights—one intimately connected with the history of French and, later, British rule in Egypt.

Western reception of The Thousand and One Nights has been uniformly enthusiastic, and yet wildly heterogeneous—a good example of the changing fortunes in the relations between Europe and the Middle East. This heterogeneity can be seen, for example, in the nineteenth-century English translations of the Nights, all of which were based on the enlarged Cairo compilations. The earliest of these was by Edward Lane, an Englishman living in Cairo; it tries to conjure up an entire way of life through the medium of the Nights. For Lane, the stories are not so much an end in themselves as a way for him to re-create the daily experiences of a nineteenth-century Egyptian who might have listened to such stories as they were performed in the coffeehouse. The translation of the philologist John Payne, published for a very limited audience of specialists, sought to use the Nights to construct an ethnographic portrait of Egyptian society, while the sexually explicit, extensively footnoted, and deliberately archaic translation by the extraordinary explorer Sir Richard Burton is in a category by itself. The variety of these encounters with the Nights, all so different yet all produced in the same language over the span of a few decades, was wittily summed up by a nineteenth-century commentator in the Edinburgh Review who states that each version has “its proper destination: Galland for the nursery, Lane for the library, Payne for the study, and Burton for the sewers.”

The influence of The Thousand and

One Nights continued to spread out across the globe. Thus late nineteenth-century portrait photography in Japan shows a fascination with the “Arabian Nights” theme, which had become fashionable in stage costume and dress styles, theater and opera, music and ballet. Today, reflections of the Nights are visible in films and graphic novels for adults as well as cartoons and even coloring books for children. In the modern Middle East, however, attitudes toward The Thousand and One Nights are more ambivalent; they have even at times led to censorship, whether because of the text’s graphic language or, more likely, because of the complicated history of the Nights in shaping European fantasies about the Orient.

While Eastern studies of the Nights have tended to consider the work in the context of folklore and oral storytelling, Western scholars are often preoccupied with the effort to nail down the work’s point of origin. They want to know: Which is the original version? When was it composed? Is The Thousand and One Nights an Arab text? a Persian text? Indian? These questions ultimately slip away, because what the text is turns out to be much less interesting than what it does. The Thousand and One Nights has its life in transit—always becoming something new, leaving its reader in a perpetual state of anticipation. It is less a collection of stories than a machine that makes stories possible.

From The Thousand and One Nights<sup>1</sup>

Prologue

[The Story of King Shahrayar and Shahrazad, His Vizier's<sup>2</sup> Daughter]

It is related—but God knows and sees best what lies hidden in the old accounts of bygone peoples and times—that long ago, during the time of the Sasanid dynasty,<sup>3</sup> in the peninsulas of India and Indochina, there lived two kings who were brothers. The older brother was named Shahrayar, the younger Shahzaman. The older, Shahrayar, was a towering knight and a daring champion, invincible, energetic, and implacable. His power reached the remotest corners of the land and its people, so that the country was loyal to him, and his subjects obeyed him. Shahrayar himself lived and ruled in India and Indochina, while to his brother he gave the land of Samarkand<sup>4</sup> to rule as king.

Ten years went by, when one day Shahrayar felt a longing for his brother the king, summoned his vizier (who had two daughters, one called Shahrazad, the other Dinarzad) and bade him go to his brother. Having made preparations, the vizier journeyed day and night until he reached Samarkand. When Shahzaman heard of the vizier's arrival, he went out with his retainers to meet him. He dismounted, embraced him, and asked him for news from his older brother, Shahrayar. The vizier replied that he was well, and that he had sent him to request his brother to visit him. Shahzaman complied with his brother's request and proceeded to make preparations for the journey. In the meantime, he had the vizier camp on the outskirts of the city, and took care of his needs. He sent him what he required of food and fodder, slaughtered many sheep in his honor, and provided him with money and supplies, as well as many horses and camels.

For ten full days he prepared himself for the journey; then he appointed a chamberlain in his place, and left the city to spend the night in his tent, near the vizier. At midnight he returned to his palace in the city, to bid his wife good-bye. But when he entered the palace, he found his wife lying in the arms of one of the kitchen boys. When he saw them, the world turned dark before his eyes and, shaking his head, he said to himself, "I am still here, and this is what she has done when I was barely outside the city. How will it be and what will happen behind my back when I go to visit my brother in India? No. Women are not to be trusted." He got exceedingly angry, adding, "By God, I am king and sovereign in Samarkand, yet my wife has betrayed me and has inflicted this on me." As his anger boiled, he drew his sword and struck both his wife and the cook. Then he dragged them by the heels and threw them from the top of the palace to the trench below. He then left the city and going to the vizier ordered that they depart that very hour. The drum was struck, and they set out on their journey, while Shahzaman's heart was on fire because of what his wife had done to him and how she had betrayed him with some cook, some kitchen boy. They journeyed hurriedly, day and night, through deserts and wilds, until they reached the land of King Shahrayar, who had gone out to receive them.

1. All selections translated from the Arabic by Husain Haddawy except for "The Third Old Man's Tale," translated from the Arabic by Jerome W. Clinton.

2. Literally, "one who bears burdens" (Arabic):

the highest state official or administrator under a caliph or shah.

3. The last pre-Islamic dynasty (226–652).

4. A city and province in central Asia, now in Uzbekistan.

When Shahrayar met them, he embraced his brother, showed him favors, and treated him generously. He offered him quarters in a palace adjoining his own, for King Shahrayar had built two beautiful towering palaces in his garden, one for the guests, the other for the women and members of his household. He gave the guest house to his brother, Shahzaman, after the attendants had gone to scrub it, dry it, furnish it, and open its windows, which overlooked the garden. Thereafter, Shahzaman would spend the whole day at his brother's, return at night to sleep at the palace, then go back to his brother the next morning. But whenever he found himself alone and thought of his ordeal with his wife, he would sigh deeply, then stifle his grief, and say, "Alas, that this great misfortune should have happened to one in my position!" Then he would fret with anxiety, his spirit would sag, and he would say, "None has seen what I have seen." In his depression, he ate less and less, grew pale, and his health deteriorated. He neglected everything, wasted away, and looked ill.

When King Shahrayar looked at his brother and saw how day after day he lost weight and grew thin, pale, ashen, and sickly, he thought that this was because of his expatriation and homesickness for his country and his family, and he said to himself, "My brother is not happy here. I should prepare a goodly gift for him and send him home." For a month he gathered gifts for his brother; then he invited him to see him and said, "Brother, I would like you to know that I intend to go hunting and pursue the roaming deer, for ten days. Then I shall return to prepare you for your journey home. Would you like to go hunting with me?" Shahzaman replied, "Brother, I feel distracted and depressed. Leave me here and go with God's blessing and help." When Shahrayar heard his brother, he thought that his dejection was because of his homesickness for his country. Not wishing to coerce him, he left him behind, and set out with his retainers and men. When they entered the wilderness, he deployed his men in a circle to begin trapping and hunting.

After his brother's departure, Shahzaman stayed in the palace and, from the window overlooking the garden, watched the birds and trees as he thought of his wife and what she had done to him, and sighed in sorrow. While he agonized over his misfortune, gazing at the heavens and turning a distracted eye on the garden, the private gate of his brother's palace opened, and there emerged, strutting like a dark-eyed deer, the lady, his brother's wife, with twenty slave-girls, ten white and ten black. While Shahzaman looked at them, without being seen, they continued to walk until they stopped below his window, without looking in his direction, thinking that he had gone to the hunt with his brother. Then they sat down, took off their clothes, and suddenly there were ten slave-girls and ten black slaves dressed in the same clothes as the girls. Then the ten black slaves mounted the ten girls, while the lady called, "Mas'ud, Mas'ud!" and a black slave jumped from the tree to the ground, rushed to her, and, raising her legs, went between her thighs and made love to her. Mas'ud topped the lady, while the ten slaves topped the ten girls, and they carried on till noon. When they were done with their business, they got up and washed themselves. Then the ten slaves put on the same clothes again, mingled with the girls, and once more there appeared to be twenty slave-girls. Mas'ud himself jumped over the garden wall and disappeared, while the slave-girls and the lady sauntered to the private gate, went in and, locking the gate behind them, went their way.

All of this happened under King Shahzaman's eyes. When he saw this spectacle of the wife and the women of his brother the great king—how ten slaves put on women's clothes and slept with his brother's paramours and concubines and what Mas'ud did with his brother's wife, in his very palace—and pondered over this calamity and great misfortune, his care and sorrow left him and he said to himself, “This is our common lot. Even though my brother is king and master of the whole world, he cannot protect what is his, his wife and his concubines, and suffers misfortune in his very home. What happened to me is little by comparison. I used to think that I was the only one who has suffered, but from what I have seen, everyone suffers. By God, my misfortune is lighter than that of my brother.” He kept marveling and blaming life, whose trials none can escape, and he began to find consolation in his own affliction and forget his grief. When supper came, he ate and drank with relish and zest and, feeling better, kept eating and drinking, enjoying himself and feeling happy. He thought to himself, “I am no longer alone in my misery; I am well.”

For ten days, he continued to enjoy his food and drink, and when his brother, King Shahrayar, came back from the hunt, he met him happily, treated him attentively, and greeted him cheerfully. His brother, King Shahrayar, who had missed him, said, “By God, brother, I missed you on this trip and wished you were with me.” Shahzaman thanked him and sat down to carouse with him, and when night fell, and food was brought before them, the two ate and drank, and again Shahzaman ate and drank with zest. As time went by, he continued to eat and drink with appetite, and became lighthearted and carefree. His face regained color and became ruddy, and his body gained weight, as his blood circulated and he regained his energy; he was himself again, or even better. King Shahrayar noticed his brother's condition, how he used to be and how he had improved, but kept it to himself until he took him aside one day and said, “My brother Shahzaman, I would like you to do something for me, to satisfy a wish, to answer a question truthfully.” Shahzaman asked, “What is it, brother?” He replied, “When you first came to stay with me, I noticed that you kept losing weight, day after day, until your looks changed, your health deteriorated, and your energy sagged. As you continued like this, I thought that what ailed you was your homesickness for your family and your country, but even though I kept noticing that you were wasting away and looking ill, I refrained from questioning you and hid my feelings from you. Then I went hunting, and when I came back, I found that you had recovered and had regained your health. Now I want you to tell me everything and to explain the cause of your deterioration and the cause of your subsequent recovery, without hiding anything from me.” When Shahzaman heard what King Shahrayar said, he bowed his head, then said, “As for the cause of my recovery, that I cannot tell you, and I wish that you would excuse me from telling you.” The king was greatly astonished at his brother's reply and, burning with curiosity, said, “You must tell me. For now, at least, explain the first cause.”

Then Shahzaman related to his brother what happened to him with his own wife, on the night of his departure, from beginning to end, and concluded, “Thus all the while I was with you, great King, whenever I thought of the event and the misfortune that had befallen me, I felt troubled, careworn, and unhappy, and my health deteriorated. This then is the cause.” Then he grew silent. When King Shahrayar heard his brother's explanation, he shook his head, greatly amazed at the deceit of women, and prayed to God to protect him from their wickedness, saying, “Brother, you were fortunate in killing your wife and her lover, who gave you good reason to feel troubled, careworn, and ill. In my opinion, what happened to you has never happened to anyone else. By God, had I been in your place, I would have killed at least a hundred or even a thousand women. I would have been furious; I would have gone mad. Now praise be to God who has delivered you from sorrow and distress. But tell me what has caused you to forget your sorrow and regain your health?" Shahzaman replied, "King, I wish that for God's sake you would excuse me from telling you." Shahrayar said, "You must." Shahzaman replied, "I fear that you will feel even more troubled and careworn than I." Shahrayar asked, "How could that be, brother? I insist on hearing your explanation."

Shahzaman then told him about what he had seen from the palace window and the calamity in his very home—how ten slaves, dressed like women, were sleeping with his women and concubines, day and night. He told him everything from beginning to end (but there is no point in repeating that). Then he concluded, "When I saw your own misfortune, I felt better—and said to myself, 'My brother is king of the world, yet such a misfortune has happened to him, and in his very home.' As a result I forgot my care and sorrow, relaxed, and began to eat and drink. This is the cause of my cheer and good spirits."

When King Shahrayar heard what his brother said and found out what had happened to him, he was furious and his blood boiled. He said, "Brother, I can't believe what you say unless I see it with my own eyes." When Shahzaman saw that his brother was in a rage, he said to him, "If you do not believe me, unless you see your misfortune with your own eyes, announce that you plan to go hunting. Then you and I shall set out with your troops, and when we get outside the city, we shall leave our tents and camp with the men behind, enter the city secretly, and go together to your palace. Then the next morning you can see with your own eyes."

King Shahrayar realized that his brother had a good plan and ordered his army to prepare for the trip. He spent the night with his brother, and when God's morning broke, the two rode out of the city with their army, preceded by the camp attendants, who had gone to drive the poles and pitch the tents where the king and his army were to camp. At nightfall King Shahrayar summoned his chief chamberlain and bade him take his place. He entrusted him with the army and ordered that for three days no one was to enter the city. Then he and his brother disguised themselves and entered the city in the dark. They went directly to the palace where Shahzaman resided and slept there till the morning. When they awoke, they sat at the palace window, watching the garden and chatting, until the light broke, the day dawned, and the sun rose. As they watched, the private gate opened, and there emerged as usual the wife of King Shahrayar, walking among twenty slave-girls. They made their way under the trees until they stood below the palace window where the two kings sat. Then they took off their women's clothes, and suddenly there were ten slaves, who mounted the ten girls and made love to them. As for the lady, she called, "Mas'ud, Mas'ud," and a black slave jumped from the tree to the ground, came to her, and said, "What do you want, you slut? Here is Sa'ad al-Din Mas'ud." She laughed and fell on her back, while the slave mounted her and like the others did his business with her. Then the black slaves got up, washed themselves, and, putting on the same clothes, mingled with the girls. Then they walked away, entered the palace, and locked the gate behind them. As for Mas'ud, he jumped over the fence to the road and went on his way.

When King Shahrayar saw the spectacle of his wife and the slave-girls, he went out of his mind, and when he and his brother came down from upstairs, he said, "No one is safe in this world. Such doings are going on in my kingdom, and in my very palace. Perish the world and perish life! This is a great calamity, indeed." Then he turned to his brother and asked, "Would you like to follow me in what I shall do?" Shahzaman answered, "Yes. I will." Shahrayar said, "Let us leave our royal state and roam the world for the love of the Supreme Lord. If we should find one whose misfortune is greater than ours, we shall return. Otherwise, we shall continue to journey through the land, without need for the trappings of royalty." Shahzaman replied, "This is an excellent idea. I shall follow you."

Then they left by the private gate, took a side road, and departed, journeying till nightfall. They slept over their sorrows, and in the morning resumed their day journey until they came to a meadow by the seashore. While they sat in the meadow amid the thick plants and trees, discussing their misfortunes and the recent events, they suddenly heard a shout and a great cry coming from the middle of the sea. They trembled with fear, thinking that the sky had fallen on the earth. Then the sea parted, and there emerged a black pillar that, as it swayed forward, got taller and taller, until it touched the clouds. Shahrayar and Shahzaman were petrified; then they ran in terror and, climbing a very tall tree, sat hiding in its foliage. When they looked again, they saw that the black pillar was cleaving the sea, wading in the water toward the green meadow, until it touched the shore. When they looked again, they saw that it was a black demon, carrying on his head a large glass chest with four steel locks. He came out, walked into the meadow, and where should he stop but under the very tree where the two kings were hiding. The demon sat down and placed the glass chest on the ground. He took out four keys and, opening the locks of the chest, pulled out a full-grown woman. She had a beautiful figure, and a face like the full moon, and a lovely smile. He took her out, laid her under the tree, and looked at her, saying, "Mistress of all noble women, you whom I carried away on your wedding night, I would like to sleep a little." Then he placed his head on the young woman's lap, stretched his legs to the sea, sank into sleep, and began to snore.

Meanwhile, the woman looked up at the tree and, turning her head by chance, saw King Shahrayar and King Shahzaman. She lifted the demon's head from her lap and placed it on the ground. Then she came and stood under the tree and motioned to them with her hand, as if to say, "Come down slowly to me." When they realized that she had seen them, they were frightened, and they begged her and implored her, in the name of the Creator of the heavens, to excuse them from climbing down. She replied, "You must come down to me." They motioned to her, saying, "This sleeping demon is the enemy of mankind. For God's sake, leave us alone." She replied, "You must come down, and if you don't, I shall wake the demon and have him kill you." She kept gesturing and pressing, until they climbed down very slowly and stood before her. Then she lay on her back, raised her legs, and said, "Make love to me and satisfy my need, or else I shall wake the demon, and he will kill you." They replied, "For God's sake, mistress, don't do this to us, for at this moment we feel nothing but dismay and fear of this demon. Please, excuse us." She replied, "You must," and insisted, swearing, "By God who created the heavens, if you don't do it, I shall wake my husband the demon and ask him to kill you and throw you into the sea." As she persisted, they could no longer resist and they made love to her, first the older brother, then the younger. When they were done and withdrew from her, she said to them, "Give me your rings," and, pulling out from the folds of her dress a small purse, opened it, and shook out ninety-eight rings of different fashions and colors. Then she asked them, "Do you know what these rings are?" They answered, "No." She said, "All the owners of these rings slept with me, for whenever one of them made love to me, I took a ring from him. Since you two have slept with me, give me your rings, so that I may add them to the rest, and make a full hundred. A hundred men have known me under the very horns of this filthy, monstrous cuckold, who has imprisoned me in this chest, locked it with four locks, and kept me in the middle of this raging, roaring sea. He has guarded me and tried to keep me pure and chaste, not realizing that nothing can prevent or alter what is predestined and that when a woman desires something, no one can stop her." When Shahrayar and Shahzaman heard what the young woman said, they were greatly amazed, danced with joy, and said, "O God, O God! There is no power and no strength, save in God the Almighty, the Magnificent. Great is women's cunning." Then each of them took off his ring and handed it to her. She took them and put them with the rest in the purse. Then sitting again by the demon, she lifted his head, placed it back on her lap, and motioned to them, "Go on your way, or else I shall wake him."

They turned their backs and took to the road. Then Shahrayar turned to his brother and said, "My brother Shahzaman, look at this sorry plight. By God, it is worse than ours. This is no less than a demon who has carried a young woman away on her wedding night, imprisoned her in a glass chest, locked her up with four locks, and kept her in the middle of the sea, thinking that he could guard her from what God had foreordained, and you saw how she has managed to sleep with ninety-eight men, and added the two of us to make a hundred. Brother, let us go back to our kingdoms and our cities, never to marry a woman again. As for myself, I shall show you what I will do."

Then the two brothers headed home and journeyed till nightfall. On the morning of the third day, they reached their camp and men, entered their tent, and sat on their thrones. The chamberlains, deputies, princes, and viziers came to attend King Shahrayar, while he gave orders and bestowed robes of honor, as well as other gifts. Then at his command everyone returned to the city, and he went to his own palace and ordered his chief vizier, the father of the two girls Shahrazad and Dinarzad, who will be mentioned below, and said to him, "Take that wife of mine and put her to death." Then Shahrayar went to her himself, bound her, and handed her over to the vizier, who took her out and put her to death. Then King Shahrayar grabbed his sword, brandished it, and, entering the palace chambers, killed every one of his slave-girls and replaced them with others. He then swore to marry for one night only and kill the woman the next morning, in order to save himself from the wickedness and cunning of women, saying, "There is not a single chaste woman anywhere on the entire face of the earth." Shortly thereafter he provided his brother Shahzaman with supplies for his journey and sent him back to his own country with gifts, rarities, and money. The brother bade him good-bye and set out for home.

Shahrayar sat on his throne and ordered his vizier, the father of the two girls, to find him a wife from among the princes' daughters. The vizier found him one, and he slept with her and was done with her, and the next morning he ordered the vizier to put her to death. That very night he took one of his army officers' daughters, slept with her, and the next morning ordered the vizier to put her to death. The vizier, who could not disobey him, put her to death. The third night he took one of the merchants' daughters, slept with her till the morning, then ordered his vizier to put her to death, and the vizier did so. It became King Shahrayar's custom to take every night the daughter of a merchant or a commoner, spend the night with her, then have her put to death the next morning. He continued to do this until all the girls perished, their mothers mourned, and there arose a clamor among the fathers and mothers, who called the plague upon his head, complained to the Creator of the heavens, and called for help on Him who hears and answers prayers.

Now, as mentioned earlier, the vizier, who put the girls to death, had an older daughter called Shahrazad and a younger one called Dinarzad. The older daughter, Shahrazad, had read the books of literature, philosophy, and medicine. She knew poetry by heart, had studied historical reports, and was acquainted with the sayings of men and the maxims of sages and kings. She was intelligent, knowledgeable, wise, and refined. She had read and learned. One day she said to her father, "Father, I will tell you what is in my mind." He asked, "What is it?" She answered, "I would like you to marry me to King Shahrayar, so that I may either succeed in saving the people or perish and die like the rest." When the vizier heard what his daughter Shahrazad said, he got angry and said to her, "Foolish one, don't you know that King Shahrayar has sworn to spend but one night with a girl and have her put to death the next morning? If I give you to him, he will sleep with you for one night and will ask me to put you to death the next morning, and I shall have to do it, since I cannot disobey him." She said, "Father, you must give me to him, even if he kills me." He asked, "What has possessed you that you wish to imperil yourself?" She replied, "Father, you must give me to him. This is absolute and final." Her father the vizier became furious and said to her, "Daughter, 'He who misbehaves, ends up in trouble,' and 'He who considers not the end, the world is not his friend.' As the popular saying goes, 'I would be sitting pretty, but for my curiosity.' I am afraid that what happened to the donkey and the ox with the merchant will happen to you." She asked, "Father, what happened to the donkey, the ox, and the merchant?" He said:

[The Tale of the Ox and the Donkey]

There was a prosperous and wealthy merchant who lived in the countryside and labored on a farm. He owned many camels and herds of cattle and employed many men, and he had a wife and many grown-up as well as little children. This merchant was taught the language of the beasts, on condition that if he revealed his secret to anyone, he would die; therefore, even though he knew the language of every kind of animal, he did not let anyone know, for fear of death. One day, as he sat, with his wife beside him and his children playing before him, he glanced at an ox and a donkey he kept at the farmhouse, tied to adjacent troughs, and heard the ox say to the donkey, "Watchful one, I hope that you are enjoying the comfort and the service you are getting. Your ground is swept and watered, and they serve you, feed you sifted barley, and offer you clear, cool water to drink. I, on the contrary, am taken out to plow in the middle of the night. They clamp on my neck something they call yoke and plow, push me all day under the whip to plow the field, and drive me beyond my endurance until my sides are lacerated, and my neck is flayed. They work me from nighttime to nighttime, take me back in the dark, offer me beans soiled with mud and hay mixed with chaff, and let me spend the night lying in urine and dung. Meanwhile you rest on well-swept, watered, and smoothed ground, with a clean trough full of hay. You stand in comfort, save for the rare occasion when our master the merchant rides you to do a brief errand and returns. You are comfortable, while I am weary; you sleep, while I keep awake.”

When the ox finished, the donkey turned to him and said, “Greenhorn, they were right in calling you ox, for you ox harbor no deceit, malice, or meanness. Being sincere, you exert and exhaust yourself to comfort others. Have you not heard the saying ‘Out of bad luck, they hastened on the road’? You go into the field from early morning to endure your torture at the plow to the point of exhaustion. When the plowman takes you back and ties you to the trough, you go on butting and beating with your horns, kicking with your hoofs, and bellowing for the beans, until they toss them to you; then you begin to eat. Next time, when they bring them to you, don’t eat or even touch them, but smell them, then draw back and lie down on the hay and straw. If you do this, life will be better and kinder to you, and you will find relief.”

As the ox listened, he was sure that the donkey had given him good advice. He thanked him, commended him to God, and invoked His blessing on him, and said, “May you stay safe from harm, watchful one.” All of this conversation took place, daughter, while the merchant listened and understood. On the following day, the plowman came to the merchant’s house and, taking the ox, placed the yoke upon his neck and worked him at the plow, but the ox lagged behind. The plowman hit him, but following the donkey’s advice, the ox, dissembling, fell on his belly, and the plowman hit him again. Thus the ox kept getting up and falling until nightfall, when the plowman took him home and tied him to the trough. But this time the ox did not bellow or kick the ground with his hoofs. Instead, he withdrew, away from the trough. Astonished, the plowman brought him his beans and fodder, but the ox only smelled the fodder and pulled back and lay down at a distance with the hay and straw, complaining till the morning. When the plowman arrived, he found the trough as he had left it, full of beans and fodder, and saw the ox lying on his back, hardly breathing, his belly puffed, and his legs raised in the air. The plowman felt sorry for him and said to himself, “By God, he did seem weak and unable to work.” Then he went to the merchant and said, “Master, last night, the ox refused to eat or touch his fodder.”

The merchant, who knew what was going on, said to the plowman, “Go to the wily donkey, put him to the plow, and work him hard until he finishes the ox’s task.” The plowman left, took the donkey, and placed the yoke upon his neck. Then he took him out to the field and drove him with blows until he finished the ox’s work, all the while driving him with blows and beating him until his sides were lacerated and his neck was flayed. At nightfall he took him home, barely able to drag his legs under his tired body and his drooping ears. Meanwhile the ox spent his day resting. He ate all his food, drank his water, and lay quietly, chewing his cud in comfort. All day long he kept praising the donkey’s advice and invoking God’s blessing on him. When the donkey came back at night, the ox stood up to greet him saying, “Good evening, watchful one! You have done me a favor beyond description, for I have been sitting in comfort. God bless you for my sake.” Seething with anger, the donkey did not reply, but said to himself, “All this happened to me because of my miscalculation. ‘I would be sitting pretty, but for my curiosity.' If I don't find a way to return this ox to his former situation, I will perish." Then he went to his trough and lay down, while the ox continued to chew his cud and invoke God's blessing on him.

"You, my daughter, will likewise perish because of your miscalculation. Desist, sit quietly, and don't expose yourself to peril. I advise you out of compassion for you." She replied, "Father, I must go to the king, and you must give me to him." He said, "Don't do it." She insisted, "I must." He replied, "If you don't desist, I will do to you what the merchant did to his wife." She asked, "Father, what did the merchant do to his wife?" He said:

[The Tale of the Merchant and His Wife]

After what had happened to the donkey and the ox, the merchant and his wife went out in the moonlight to the stable, and he heard the donkey ask the ox in his own language, "Listen, ox, what are you going to do tomorrow morning, and what will you do when the plowman brings you your fodder?" The ox replied, "What shall I do but follow your advice and stick to it? If he brings me my fodder, I will pretend to be ill, lie down, and puff my belly." The donkey shook his head, and said, "Don't do it. Do you know what I heard our master the merchant say to the plowman?" The ox asked, "What?" The donkey replied, "He said that if the ox failed to get up and eat his fodder, he would call the butcher to slaughter him and skin him and would distribute the meat for alms and use the skin for a mat. I am afraid for you, but good advice is a matter of faith; therefore, if he brings you your fodder, eat it and look alert lest they cut your throat and skin you." The ox farted and bellowed.

The merchant got up and laughed loudly at the conversation between the donkey and the ox, and his wife asked him, "What are you laughing at? Are you making fun of me?" He said, "No." She said, "Tell me what made you laugh." He replied, "I cannot tell you. I am afraid to disclose the secret conversation of the animals." She asked, "And what prevents you from telling me?" He answered, "The fear of death." His wife said, "By God, you are lying. This is nothing but an excuse. I swear by God, the Lord of heaven, that if you don't tell me and explain the cause of your laughter, I will leave you. You must tell me." Then she went back to the house crying, and she continued to cry till the morning. The merchant said, "Damn it! Tell me why you are crying. Ask for God's forgiveness, and stop questioning and leave me in peace." She said, "I insist and will not desist." Amazed at her, he replied, "You insist! If I tell you what the donkey said to the ox, which made me laugh, I shall die." She said, "Yes, I insist, even if you have to die." He replied, "Then call your family," and she called their two daughters, her parents and relatives, and some neighbors. The merchant told them that he was about to die, and everyone, young and old, his children, the farmhands, and the servants began to cry until the house became a place of mourning. Then he summoned legal witnesses, wrote a will, leaving his wife and children their due portions, freed his slave-girls, and bid his family good-bye, while everybody, even the witnesses, wept. Then the wife's parents approached her and said, "Desist, for if your husband had not known for certain that he would die if he revealed his secret, he wouldn't have gone through all this." She replied, "I will not change my mind," and everybody cried and prepared to mourn his death.

Well, my daughter Shahrazad, it happened that the merchant kept fifty hens and a rooster at home, and while he felt sad to depart this world and leave his children and relatives behind, pondering and about to reveal and utter his secret, he overheard a dog of his say something in dog language to the rooster, who, beating and clapping his wings, had jumped on a hen and, finishing with her, jumped down and jumped on another. The merchant heard and understood what the dog said in his own language to the rooster, "Shameless, no-good rooster. Aren't you ashamed to do such a thing on a day like this?" The rooster asked, "What is special about this day?" The dog replied, "Don't you know that our master and friend is in mourning today? His wife is demanding that he disclose his secret, and when he discloses it, he will surely die. He is in this predicament, about to interpret to her the language of the animals, and all of us are mourning for him, while you clap your wings and get off one hen and jump on another. Aren't you ashamed?" The merchant heard the rooster reply, "You fool, you lunatic! Our master and friend claims to be wise, but he is foolish, for he has only one wife, yet he does not know how to manage her." The dog asked, "What should he do with her?"

The rooster replied, "He should take an oak branch, push her into a room, lock the door, and fall on her with the stick, beating her mercilessly until he breaks her arms and legs and she cries out, 'I no longer want you to tell me or explain anything.' He should go on beating her until he cures her for life, and she will never oppose him in anything. If he does this, he will live, and live in peace, and there will be no more grief, but he does not know how to manage." Well, my daughter Shahrazad, when the merchant heard the conversation between the dog and the rooster, he jumped up and, taking an oak branch, pushed his wife into a room, got in with her, and locked the door. Then he began to beat her mercilessly on her chest and shoulders and kept beating her until she cried for mercy, screaming, "No, no, I don't want to know anything. Leave me alone, leave me alone. I don't want to know anything," until he got tired of hitting her and opened the door. The wife emerged penitent, the husband learned good management, and everybody was happy, and the mourning turned into a celebration.

"If you don't relent, I shall do to you what the merchant did to his wife." She said, "Such tales don't deter me from my request. If you wish, I can tell you many such tales. In the end, if you don't take me to King Shahrayar, I shall go to him by myself behind your back and tell him that you have refused to give me to one like him and that you have begrudged your master one like me." The vizier asked, "Must you really do this?" She replied, "Yes, I must."

Tired and exhausted, the vizier went to King Shahrayar and, kissing the ground before him, told him about his daughter, adding that he would give her to him that very night. The king was astonished and said to him, "Vizier, how is it that you have found it possible to give me your daughter, knowing that I will, by God, the Creator of heaven, ask you to put her to death the next morning and that if you refuse, I will have you put to death, too?" He replied, "My King and Lord, I have told her everything and explained all this to her, but she refuses and insists on being with you tonight." The king was delighted and said, "Go to her, prepare her, and bring her to me early in the evening."

The vizier went down, repeated the king's message to his daughter, and said, "May God not deprive me of you." She was very happy and, after preparing herself and packing what she needed, went to her younger sister, Dinarzad, and said, "Sister, listen well to what I am telling you. When I go to the king, I will send for you, and when you come and see that the king has finished with me, say, 'Sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us a story.' Then I will begin to tell a story, and it will cause the king to stop his practice, save myself, and deliver the people." Dinarzad replied, "Very well."

At nightfall the vizier took Shahrazad and went with her to the great King Shahrayar. But when Shahrayar took her to bed and began to fondle her, she wept, and when he asked her, "Why are you crying?" she replied, "I have a sister, and I wish to bid her good-bye before daybreak." Then the king sent for the sister, who came and went to sleep under the bed. When the night wore on, she woke up and waited until the king had satisfied himself with her sister Shahrazad and they were by now all fully awake. Then Dinarzad cleared her throat and said, "Sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us one of your lovely little tales to while away the night, before I bid you good-bye at daybreak, for I don't know what will happen to you tomorrow." Shahrazad turned to King Shahrayar and said, "May I have your permission to tell a story?" He replied, "Yes," and Shahrazad was very happy and said, "Listen":

[The Story of the Merchant and the Demon]

THE FIRST NIGHT

It is said, O wise and happy King, that once there was a prosperous merchant who had abundant wealth and investments and commitments in every country. He had many women and children and kept many servants and slaves. One day, having resolved to visit another country, he took provisions, filling his saddlebag with loaves of bread and with dates, mounted his horse, and set out on his journey. For many days and nights, he journeyed under God's care until he reached his destination. When he finished his business, he turned back to his home and family. He journeyed for three days, and on the fourth day, chancing to come to an orchard, went in to avoid the heat and shade himself from the sun of the open country. He came to a spring under a walnut tree and, tying his horse, sat by the spring, pulled out from the saddlebag some loaves of bread and a handful of dates, and began to eat, throwing the date pits right and left until he had had enough. Then he got up, performed his ablutions, and performed his prayers.

But hardly had he finished when he saw an old demon, with sword in hand, standing with his feet on the ground and his head in the clouds. The demon approached until he stood before him and screamed, saying, "Get up, so that I may kill you with this sword, just as you have killed my son." When the merchant saw and heard the demon, he was terrified and awestricken. He asked, "Master, for what crime do you wish to kill me?" The demon replied, "I wish to kill you because you have killed my son." The merchant asked, "Who has killed your son?" The demon replied, "You have killed my son." The merchant said, "By God, I did not kill your son. When and how could that have been?" The demon said, "Didn't you sit down, take out some dates from your saddlebag, and eat, throwing the pits right and left?" The merchant replied, "Yes, I did." The demon said, "You killed my son, for as you were throwing the stones right and left, my son happened to be walking by and was struck and killed by one of them, and I must now kill you." The merchant said, "O my lord, please don't kill me." The demon replied, "I must kill you as you killed him—blood for blood." The merchant said, "To God we belong and to God we turn. There is no power or strength, save in God the Almighty, the Magnificent. If I killed him, I did it by mistake. Please forgive me." The demon replied, "By God, I must kill you, as you killed my son." Then he seized him, and throwing him to the ground, raised the sword to strike him. The merchant began to weep and mourn his family and his wife and children. Again, the demon raised his sword to strike, while the merchant cried until he was drenched with tears, saying, "There is no power or strength, save in God the Almighty, the Magnificent." Then he began to recite the following verses:

Life has two days: one peace, one wariness,
 And has two sides: worry and happiness.
 Ask him who taunts us with adversity,
 "Does fate, save those worthy of note, oppress?
 Don't you see that the blowing, raging storms 5
 Only the tallest of the trees beset,
 And of earth's many green and barren lots,
 Only the ones with fruits with stones are hit,
 And of the countless stars in heaven's vault
 None is eclipsed except the moon and sun? 10
 You thought well of the days, when they were good,
 Oblivious to the ills destined for one.
 You were deluded by the peaceful nights,
 Yet in the peace of night does sorrow stun."

When the merchant finished and stopped weeping, the demon said, "By God, I must kill you, as you killed my son, even if you weep blood." The merchant asked, "Must you?" The demon replied, "I must," and raised his sword to strike.

But morning overtook Shahrazad, and she lapsed into silence, leaving King Shahrayar burning with curiosity to hear the rest of the story. Then Dinarzad said to her sister Shahrazad, "What a strange and lovely story!" Shahrazad replied, "What is this compared with what I shall tell you tomorrow night if the king spares me and lets me live? It will be even better and more entertaining." The king thought to himself, "I will spare her until I hear the rest of the story; then I will have her put to death the next day." When morning broke, the day dawned, and the sun rose; the king left to attend to the affairs of the kingdom, and the vizier, Shahrazad's father, was amazed and delighted. King Shahrayar governed all day and returned home at night to his quarters and got into bed with Shahrazad. Then Dinarzad said to her sister Shahrazad, "Please, sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us one of your lovely little tales to while away the night." The king added, "Let it be the conclusion of the story of the demon and the merchant, for I would like to hear it." Shahrazad replied, "With the greatest pleasure, dear, happy King":

THE SECOND NIGHT

It is related, O wise and happy King, that when the demon raised his sword, the merchant asked the demon again, "Must you kill me?" and the demon replied, "Yes." Then the merchant said, "Please give me time to say good-bye to my family and my wife and children, divide my property among them, and appoint guardians. Then I shall come back, so that you may kill me." The demon replied, "I am afraid that if I release you and grant you time, you will go and do what you wish, but will not come back." The merchant said, "I swear to keep my pledge to come back, as the God of Heaven and earth is my witness." The demon asked, "How much time do you need?" The merchant replied, "One year, so that I may see enough of my children, bid my wife good-bye, discharge my obligations to people, and come back on New Year's Day." The demon asked, "Do you swear to God that if I let you go, you will come back on New Year's Day?" The merchant replied, "Yes, I swear to God."

After the merchant swore, the demon released him, and he mounted his horse sadly and went on his way. He journeyed until he reached his home and came to his wife and children. When he saw them, he wept bitterly, and when his family saw his sorrow and grief, they began to reproach him for his behavior, and his wife said, "Husband, what is the matter with you? Why do you mourn, when we are happy, celebrating your return?" He replied, "Why not mourn when I have only one year to live?" Then he told her of his encounter with the demon and informed her that he had sworn to return on New Year's Day, so that the demon might kill him.

When they heard what he said, everyone began to cry. His wife struck her face in lamentation and cut her hair, his daughters wailed, and his little children cried. It was a day of mourning, as all the children gathered around their father to weep and exchange good-byes. The next day he wrote his will, dividing his property, discharged his obligations to people, left bequests and gifts, distributed alms, and engaged reciters to read portions of the Qur'an in his house. Then he summoned legal witnesses and in their presence freed his slaves and slave-girls, divided among his elder children their shares of the property, appointed guardians for his little ones, and gave his wife her share, according to her marriage contract. He spent the rest of the time with his family, and when the year came to an end, save for the time needed for the journey, he performed his ablutions, performed his prayers, and, carrying his burial shroud, began to bid his family good-bye. His sons hung around his neck, his daughters wept, and his wife wailed. Their mourning scared him, and he began to weep, as he embraced and kissed his children good-bye. He said to them, "Children, this is God's will and decree, for man was created to die." Then he turned away and, mounting his horse, journeyed day and night until he reached the orchard on New Year's Day.

He sat at the place where he had eaten the dates, waiting for the demon, with a heavy heart and tearful eyes. As he waited, an old man, leading a deer on a leash, approached and greeted him, and he returned the greeting. The old man inquired, "Friend, why do you sit here in this place of demons and devils? For in this haunted orchard none come to good." The merchant replied by telling him what had happened to him and the demon, from beginning to end. The old man was amazed at the merchant's fidelity and said, "Yours is a magnificent pledge," adding, "By God, I shall not leave until I see what will happen to you with the demon." Then he sat down beside him and chatted with him. As they talked . . .

But morning overtook Shahrazad, and she lapsed into silence. As the day dawned, and it was light, her sister Dinarzad said, "What a strange and wonderful story!" Shahrazad replied, "Tomorrow night I shall tell something even stranger and more wonderful than this."

THE THIRD NIGHT

When it was night and Shahrazad was in bed with the king, Dinarzad said to her sister Shahrazad, "Please, if you are not sleepy, tell us one of your lovely little tales to while away the night." The king added, "Let it be the conclusion of the merchant's story." Shahrazad replied, "As you wish":

I heard, O happy King, that as the merchant and the man with the deer sat talking, another old man approached, with two black hounds, and when he reached them, he greeted them, and they returned his greeting. Then he asked them about themselves, and the man with the deer told him the story of the merchant and the demon, how the merchant had sworn to return on New Year's Day, and how the demon was waiting to kill him. He added that when he himself heard the story, he swore never to leave until he saw what would happen between the merchant and the demon. When the man with the two dogs heard the story, he was amazed, and he too swore never to leave them until he saw what would happen between them. Then he questioned the merchant, and the merchant repeated to him what had happened to him with the demon.

While they were engaged in conversation, a third old man approached and greeted them, and they returned his greeting. He asked, "Why do I see the two of you sitting here, with this merchant between you, looking abject, sad, and dejected?" They told him the merchant's story and explained that they were sitting and waiting to see what would happen to him with the demon. When he heard the story, he sat down with them, saying, "By God, I too like you will not leave, until I see what happens to this man with the demon." As they sat, conversing with one another, they suddenly saw the dust rising from the open country, and when it cleared, they saw the demon approaching, with a drawn steel sword in his hand. He stood before them without greeting them, yanked the merchant with his left hand, and, holding him fast before him, said, "Get ready to die." The merchant and the three old men began to weep and wail.

But dawn broke and morning overtook Shahrazad, and she lapsed into silence. Then Dinarzad said, "Sister, what a lovely story!" Shahrazad replied, "What is this compared with what I shall tell you tomorrow night? It will be even better; it will be more wonderful, delightful, entertaining, and delectable if the king spares me and lets me live." The king was all curiosity to hear the rest of the story and said to himself, "By God, I will not have her put to death until I hear the rest of the story and find out what happened to the merchant with the demon. Then I will have her put to death the next morning, as I did with the others." Then he went out to attend to the affairs of his kingdom, and when he saw Shahrazad's father, he treated him kindly and showed him favors, and the vizier was amazed. When night came, the king went home, and when he was in bed with Shahrazad, Dinarzad said, "Sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us one of your lovely little tales to while away the night." Shahrazad replied, "With the greatest pleasure":

THE FOURTH NIGHT

It is related, O happy King, that the first old man with the deer approached the demon and, kissing his hands and feet, said, "Fiend and King of the demon kings, if I tell you what happened to me and that deer, and you find it strange and amazing, indeed stranger and more amazing than what happened to you and the merchant, will you grant me a third of your claim on him for his crime and guilt?" The demon replied, "I will." The old man said:

[The First Old Man's Tale]

Demon, this deer is my cousin, my flesh and blood. I married her when I was very young, and she a girl of twelve, who reached womanhood only afterward. For thirty years we lived together, but I was not blessed with children, for she bore neither boy nor girl. Yet I continued to be kind to her, to care for her, and to treat her generously. Then I took a mistress, and she bore me a son, who grew up to look like a slice of the moon.<sup>5</sup> Meanwhile, my wife grew jealous of my mistress and my son. One day, when he was ten, I had to go on a journey. I entrusted my wife, this one here, with my mistress and son, bade her take good care of them, and was gone for a whole year. In my absence my wife, this cousin of mine, learned soothsaying and magic and cast a spell on my son and turned him into a young bull. Then she summoned my shepherd, gave my son to him, and said, "Tend this bull with the rest of the cattle." The shepherd took him and tended him for a while. Then she cast a spell on the mother, turning her into a cow, and gave her also to the shepherd.

When I came back, after all this was done, and inquired about my mistress and my son, she answered, "Your mistress died, and your son ran away two months ago, and I have had no news from him ever since." When I heard her, I grieved for my mistress, and with an anguished heart I mourned for my son for nearly a year. When the Great Feast of the Immolation<sup>6</sup> drew near, I summoned the shepherd and ordered him to bring me a fat cow for the sacrifice. The cow he brought me was in reality my enchanted mistress. When I bound her and pressed against her to cut her throat, she wept and cried, as if saying, "My son, my son," and her tears coursed down her cheeks. Astonished and seized with pity, I turned away and asked the shepherd to bring me a different cow. But my wife shouted, "Go on. Butcher her, for he has none better or fatter. Let us enjoy her meat at feast time." I approached the cow to cut her throat, and again she cried, as if saying, "My son, my son." Then I turned away from her and said to the shepherd, "Butcher her for me." The shepherd butchered her, and when he skinned her, he found neither meat nor fat but only skin and bone. I regretted having her butchered and said to the shepherd, "Take her all for yourself, or give her as alms to whomever you wish, and find me a fat young bull from among the flock." The shepherd took her away and disappeared, and I never knew what he did with her.

Then he brought me my son, my heartblood, in the guise of a fat young bull. Then my son saw me, he shook his head loose from the rope, ran toward me, and, throwing himself at my feet, kept rubbing his head against me. I was astonished and touched with sympathy, pity, and mercy, for the blood hearkened to the blood and the divine bond, and my heart throbbed within me when I saw the tears coursing over the cheeks of my son the young bull, as he dug

5. The moon is a symbol of beauty for men and women.

6. The Feast of Sacrifice, celebrated throughout the Muslim world at the end of the pilgrimage to Mecca; to commemorate Abraham, who was willing to sacrifice his son Isaac when commanded by God but was allowed to offer a ram instead, Muslims sacrifice animals to God.

the earth with his hoofs. I turned away and said to the shepherd, "Let him go with the rest of the flock, and be kind to him, for I have decided to spare him. Bring me another one instead of him." My wife, this very deer, shouted, "You shall sacrifice none but this bull." I got angry and replied, "I listened to you and butchered the cow uselessly. I will not listen to you and kill this bull, for I have decided to spare him." But she pressed me, saying, "You must butcher this bull," and I bound him and took the knife . . .

But dawn broke, and morning overtook Shahrazad, and she lapsed into silence, leaving the king all curiosity for the rest of the story. Then her sister Dinarzad said, "What an entertaining story!" Shahrazad replied, "Tomorrow night I shall tell you something even stranger, more wonderful, and more entertaining if the king spares me and lets me live."

THE FIFTH NIGHT

The following night, Dinarzad said to her sister Shahrazad, "Please, sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us one of your little tales." Shahrazad replied, "With the greatest pleasure":

I heard, dear King, that the old man with the deer said to the demon and to his companions:

I took the knife and as I turned to slaughter my son, he wept, bellowed, rolled at my feet, and motioned toward me with his tongue. I suspected something, began to waver with trepidation and pity, and finally released him, saying to my wife, "I have decided to spare him, and I commit him to your care." Then I tried to appease and please my wife, this very deer, by slaughtering another bull, promising her to slaughter this one next season. We slept that night, and when God's dawn broke, the shepherd came to me without letting my wife know, and said, "Give me credit for bringing you good news." I replied, "Tell me, and the credit is yours." He said, "Master, I have a daughter who is fond of soothsaying and magic and who is adept at the art of oaths and spells. Yesterday I took home with me the bull you had spared, to let him graze with the cattle, and when my daughter saw him, she laughed and cried at the same time. When I asked her why she laughed and cried, she answered that she laughed because the bull was in reality the son of our master the cattle owner, put under a spell by his step-mother, and that she cried because his father had slaughtered the son's mother. I could hardly wait till daybreak to bring you the good news about your son."

Demon, when I heard that, I uttered a cry and fainted, and when I came to myself, I accompanied the shepherd to his home, went to my son, and threw myself at him, kissing him and crying. He turned his head toward me, his tears coursing over his cheeks, and dangled his tongue, as if to say, "Look at my plight." Then I turned to the shepherd's daughter and asked, "Can you release him from the spell? If you do, I will give you all my cattle and all my possessions." She smiled and replied, "Master, I have no desire for your wealth, cattle, or possessions. I will deliver him, but on two conditions: first, that you let me marry him; second, that you let me cast a spell on her who had cast a spell on him, in order to control her and guard against her evil power." I replied, "Do whatever you wish and more. My possessions are for you and my son. As for my wife, who has done this to my son and made me slaughter his mother, her life is forfeit to you." She said, "No, but I will let her taste what she has inflicted on others." Then the shepherd's daughter filled a bowl of water, uttered an incantation and an oath, and said to my son, "Bull, if you have been created in this image by the All-Conquering, Almighty Lord, stay as you are, but if you have been treacherously put under a spell, change back to your human form, by the will of God, Creator of the wide world." Then she sprinkled him with the water, and he shook himself and changed from a bull back to his human form.

As I rushed to him, I fainted, and when I came to myself, he told me what my wife, this very deer, had done to him and to his mother. I said to him, "Son, God has sent us someone who will pay her back for what you and your mother and I have suffered at her hands." Then, O demon, I gave my son in marriage to the shepherd's daughter, who turned my wife into this very deer, saying to me, "To me this is a pretty form, for she will be with us day and night, and it is better to turn her into a pretty deer than to suffer her sinister looks." Thus she stayed with us, while the days and nights followed one another, and the months and years went by. Then one day the shepherd's daughter died, and my son went to the country of this very man with whom you have had your encounter. Some time later I took my wife, this very deer, with me, set out to find out what had happened to my son, and chanced to stop here. This is my story, my strange and amazing story.

The demon assented, saying, "I grant you one-third of this man's life."

Then, O King Shahrayar, the second old man with the two black dogs approached the demon and said, "I too shall tell you what happened to me and to these two dogs, and if I tell it to you and you find it stranger and more amazing than this man's story will you grant me one-third of this man's life?" The demon replied, "I will." Then the old man began to tell his story, saying . . .

But dawn broke, and morning overtook Shahrzad, and she lapsed into silence. Then Dinarzad said, "This is an amazing story," and Shahrzad replied, "What is this compared with what I shall tell you tomorrow night if the king spares me and lets me live!" The king said to himself, "By God, I will not have her put to death until I find out what happened to the man with the two black dogs. Then I will have her put to death, God the Almighty willing."

THE SIXTH NIGHT

When the following night arrived and Shahrzad was in bed with King Shahrayar, her sister Dinarzad said, "Sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us a little tale. Finish the one you started." Shahrzad replied, "With the greatest pleasure":

I heard, O happy King, that the second old man with the two dogs said:

[The Second Old Man's Tale]

Demon, as for my story, these are the details. These two dogs are my brothers. When our father died, he left behind three sons, and left us three thousand dinars,<sup>7</sup> with which each of us opened a shop and became a shopkeeper. Soon my older brother, one of these very dogs, went and sold the contents of his shop for a thousand dinars, bought trading goods, and, having prepared himself for his trading trip, left us. A full year went by, when one day, as I sat in my shop, a beggar stopped by to beg. When I refused him, he tearfully asked, "Don't you recognize me?" and when I looked at him closely, I recognized my brother. I embraced him and took him into the shop, and when I asked him about his plight, he replied, "The money is gone, and the situation is bad." Then I took him to the public bath, clothed him in one of my robes, and took him home with me. Then I examined my books and checked my balance, and found out that I had made a thousand dinars and that my net worth was two thousand dinars. I divided the amount between my brother and myself, and said to him, "Think as if you have never been away." He gladly took the money and opened another shop.

Soon afterward my second brother, this other dog, went and sold his merchandise and collected his money, intending to go on a trading trip. We tried to dissuade him, but he did not listen. Instead, he bought merchandise and trading goods, joined a group of travelers, and was gone for a full year. Then he came back, just like his older brother. I said to him, "Brother, didn't I advise you not to go?" He replied tearfully, "Brother, it was foreordained. Now I am poor and penniless, without even a shirt on my back." Demon, I took him to the public bath, clothed him in one of my new robes, and took him back to the shop. After we had something to eat, I said to him, "Brother, I shall do my business accounts, calculate my net worth for the year, and after subtracting the capital, whatever the profit happens to be, I shall divide it equally between you and myself." When I examined my books and subtracted the capital, I found out that my profit was two thousand dinars, and I thanked God and felt very happy. Then I divided the money, giving him a thousand dinars and keeping a thousand for myself. With that money he opened another shop, and the three of us stayed together for a while. Then my two brothers asked me to go on a trading journey with them, but I refused, saying, "What did you gain from your ventures that I can gain?"

They dropped the matter, and for six years we worked in our stores, buying and selling. Yet every year they asked me to go on a trading journey with them, but I refused, until I finally gave in. I said, "Brothers, I am ready to go with you. How much money do you have?" I found out that they had eaten and drunk and squandered everything they had, but I said nothing to them and did not reproach them. Then I took inventory, gathered all I had together, and sold everything. I was pleased to discover that the sale netted six thousand dinars. Then I divided the money into two parts, and said to my brothers, "The sum of three thousand dinars is for you and myself to use on our trading journey. The other three thousand I shall bury in the ground, in case what happened to you happens to me, so that when we return, we will find three thousand dinars to reopen our shops." They replied, "This is an excellent idea." Then, demon, I divided my money and buried three thousand dinars. Of the remaining three I gave each of my brothers a thousand and kept a thousand for myself. After I closed my shop, we bought merchandise and trading goods, rented a large seafaring boat, and after loading it with our goods and provisions, sailed day and night, for a month.

7. Gold coins; the basic Muslim money units [translator's note].

But morning overtook Shahrazad, and she lapsed into silence. Then her sister Dinarzad said, "Sister, what a lovely story!" Shahrazad replied, "Tomorrow night I shall tell you something even lovelier, stranger, and more wonderful if I live, the Almighty God willing."

THE SEVENTH NIGHT

The following night Dinarzad said to her sister Shahrazad, "For God's sake, sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us a little tale." The king added, "Let it be the completion of the story of the merchant and the demon." Shahrazad replied, "With the greatest pleasure":

I heard, O happy King, that the second old man said to the demon:

For a month my brothers, these very dogs, and I sailed the salty sea, until we came to a port city. We entered the city and sold our goods, earning ten dinars for every dinar. Then we bought other goods, and when we got to the seashore to embark, I met a girl who was dressed in tatters. She kissed my hands and said, "O my lord, be charitable and do me a favor, and I believe that I shall be able to reward you for it." I replied, "I am willing to do you a favor regardless of any reward." She said, "O my lord, marry me, clothe me, and take me home with you on this boat, as your wife, for I wish to give myself to you. I, in turn, will reward you for your kindness and charity, the Almighty God willing. Don't be misled by my poverty and present condition." When I heard her words, I felt pity for her, and guided by what God the Most High had intended for me, I consented. I clothed her with an expensive dress and married her. Then I took her to the boat, spread the bed for her, and consummated our marriage. We sailed many days and nights, and I, feeling love for her, stayed with her day and night, neglecting my brothers. In the meantime they, these very dogs, grew jealous of me, envied me for my increasing merchandise and wealth, and coveted all our possessions. At last they decided to betray me and, tempted by the Devil, plotted to kill me. One night they waited until I was asleep beside my wife; then they carried the two of us and threw us into the sea.

When we awoke, my wife turned into a she-demon and carried me out of the sea to an island. When it was morning, she said, "Husband, I have rewarded you by saving you from drowning, for I am one of the demons who believe in God.<sup>8</sup> When I saw you by the seashore, I felt love for you and came to you in the guise in which you saw me, and when I expressed my love for you, you accepted me. Now I must kill your brothers." When I heard what she said, I was amazed and I thanked her and said, "As for destroying my brothers, this I do not wish, for I will not behave like them." Then I related to her what had happened to me and them, from beginning to end. When she heard my story, she got very angry at them, and said, "I shall fly to them now, drown their boat, and let them all perish." I entreated her, saying, "For God's sake, don't. The proverb advises 'Be kind to those who hurt you.' No matter what, they are my brothers after all." In this manner, I entreated her and pacified her. Afterward, she took me and flew away with me until she brought me home and put me down on the roof of my house. I climbed down, threw the doors open, and dug up the money I had buried. Then I went out and, greeting the people in the market, reopened my shop. When I came home in the evening, I found these two dogs tied up, and when they saw me, they came to me, wept, and rubbed themselves against me. I started, when I suddenly heard my wife say, "O my lord, these are your brothers." I asked, "Who has done this to them?" She replied, "I sent to my sister and asked her to do it. They will stay in this condition for ten years, after which they may be delivered." Then she told me where to find her and departed. The ten years have passed, and I was with my brothers on my way to her to have the spell lifted, when I met this man, together with this old man with the deer. When I asked him about himself, he told me about his encounter with you, and I resolved not to leave until I found out what would happen between you and him. This is my story. Isn't it amazing?

8. According to the Qur'an, God created both humans and demons (jinns), some of whom accepted Islam.

The demon replied, "By God, it is strange and amazing. I grant you one-third of my claim on him for his crime."

Then the third old man said, "Demon, don't disappoint me. If I told you a story that is stranger and more amazing than the first two would you grant me one-third of your claim on him for his crime?" The demon replied, "I will." Then the old man said, "Demon, listen":

But morning overtook Shahrazad, and she lapsed into silence. Then her sister said, "What an amazing story!" Shahrazad replied, "The rest is even more amazing." The king said to himself, "I will not have her put to death until I hear what happened to the old man and the demon; then I will have her put to death, as is my custom with the others."

THE EIGHTH NIGHT

The following night Dinarzad said to her sister Shahrazad, "For God's sake, sister, if you are not sleepy, tell us one of your lovely little tales to while away the night." Shahrazad replied, "With the greatest pleasure":

[The Third Old Man's Tale]<sup>9</sup>

The demon said, "This is a wonderful story, and I grant you a third of my claim on the merchant's life."

The third sheikh approached and said to the demon, "I will tell you a story more wonderful than these two if you will grant me a third of your claim on his life, O demon!"

To which the demon agreed.

So the sheikh began:

O sultan and chief of the demons, this mule was my wife. I had gone off on a journey and was absent from her for a whole year. At last I came to the end of my journey and returned home late one night. When I entered the house I saw a black slave lying in bed with her. They were chatting and dallying and laugh-

9. Translated by Jerome W. Clinton. Because the earliest manuscript does not include a story for the third sheikh, later narrators supplied one. This brief anecdote comes from a manuscript found in the library of the Royal Academy in Madrid.

ing and kissing and quarreling together. When she saw me my wife leaped out of bed, ran to the water jug, recited a spell over it, then splashed me with some of the water and said, "Leave this form for the form of a dog."

Immediately I became a dog and she chased me out of the house. I ran out of the gate and didn't stop running until I reached a butcher's shop. I entered it and fell to eating the bones lying about. When the owner of the shop saw me, he grabbed me and carried me into his house. When his daughter saw me, she hid her face and said, "Why are you bringing this strange man in with you?"

"What man?" her father asked.

"This dog is a man whose wife has put a spell on him," she said, "but I can set him free again." She took a jug of water, recited a spell over it, then splashed a little water from it on me, and said, "Leave this shape for your original one."

And I became myself again. I kissed her hand and said, "I want to cast a spell on my wife as she did on me. Please give me a little of that water."

"Gladly," she said, "if you find her asleep, sprinkle a few drops on her and she will become whatever you wish."

Well, I did find her asleep, and I sprinkled some water on her and said, "Leave this shape for the shape of a she-mule." She at once became the very mule you see here, oh sultan and chief of the demons."

The demon then turned to him and asked, "Is this really true?"

"Yes," he answered, nodding his head vigorously, "it's all true."

When the sheikh had finished his story, the demon shook with laughter and granted him a third of his claim on the merchant's blood.

Then the demon released the merchant and departed. The merchant turned to the three old men and thanked them, and they congratulated him on his deliverance and bade him good-bye. Then they separated, and each of them went on his way. The merchant himself went back home to his family, his wife, and his children, and he lived with them until the day he died. But this story is not as strange or as amazing as the story of the fisherman.

Dinarzad asked, "Please, sister, what is the story of the fisherman?" Shahrazad said: . . .

---

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

1340?–1400

---

While there was plenty of literature in English before Chaucer, later generations of writers would identify his Canterbury Tales as the foundation of the English poetic tradition. Chaucer was the first to conceive of poetry in English not as the product of an isolated, provincial nation located in an obscure corner of Europe but as a vital agent in the fourteenth-century emergence of the vernacular as a literary language. For this reason, Chaucer's models and rivals were not so much the English authors of Beowulf and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight as the Europeans Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. Queen Elizabeth's tutor, Roger Ascham, recognized Chaucer's foundational role by calling him "our English Homer." The sentiment was reiterated by Dryden, who translated several of the tales alongside selections from Ovid's Metamorphoses, declaring "I hold him in the same degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer or the Romans Virgil." In his Faerie Queene, Spenser calls Chaucer the "well of English undefiled," a stream of poetic influence still visible in the opening lines of T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land. For these writers, Chaucer's vivid, naturalistic English was the firm ground on which they could anchor a national literature.

LIFE

Chaucer's family origins were solidly middle class. His father and grandfather had been wine merchants, and by placing the youthful Chaucer as a servant at the royal court they set in motion a social transition that would ultimately lead to the family's participation in the upper classes of English society. Chaucer's granddaughter, Alice de la Pole, married a duke, and her grandson was named as the heir to his uncle, Richard III (though he never reached the throne). Chaucer's own family history is an example of the increasing social fluidity of late medieval English culture, in which status could change dramatically over just a few generations. Unlike many premodern poets who were supported by wealthy patrons, Chaucer was obliged to hold a mundane day job for most of his career. He had the time-consuming and tedious position of record keeper at the customs authority in London, and later supervised a number of building projects in his role as clerk of public works. In his House of Fame, Chaucer describes poring over his financial ledgers all day, and his books of poetry and fiction all night.

Chaucer's entry into the bureaucracy of English government followed from his early placement in a series of households within the royal family, beginning as a page in the retinue of the Countess of Ulster, daughter-in-law of King Edward III. In fact, the very first documentation of the poet's existence appears in a record of clothes purchased for the then-teenage Chaucer when he was attached to the countess's household. Later in his career, Chaucer was directly rewarded for his work for the court by Edward's grandson, King Richard II, and had the support of Edward's son John of Gaunt, the Duke of Lancaster (who, through a late third marriage, also became Chaucer's brother-in-law). Chaucer had a genius for keeping on the right side of power in a difficult and competitive era, a time characterized by civil unrest, international war, and, ultimately, seizure of the throne in 1399 by John of Gaunt's son and Richard II's cousin, Henry IV. Chaucer appears to have seamlessly transferred his loyalty from Richard to the new king, addressing one of his final lyrics, "A Complaint to His Purse," to the "conqueror of Brutus's Albion, who by lineage and free election is the true king." His subtle and politically astute poetry is as much the product of social and economic turmoil as is Dante's *Divine Comedy: unlike Dante, however, who ended his days in exile, Chaucer knew how to play all sides against each other in order to protect himself.

As a soldier in the Hundred Years' War and, later, a diplomatic envoy for the English government, Chaucer traveled repeatedly to France, Spain, and—most importantly—Italy; there he encountered the work of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, which became central to his own writing. French literature had already had a strong impact on English writers of the period, but Italian literature was something new and exciting: through Chaucer, the humanist tradition championed by Petrarch began to be felt in England, along with the high allegorical mode of Dante and the story collections of Boccaccio. While the exact chronology of Chaucer's works is uncertain, they are often divided roughly into three periods: the so-called French phase, which includes the Book of the Duchess, an elegiac dream vision that owes much to the Romance of the Rose and the poetry of Machaut and Froissart; the Italian phase, which features the Parliament of Fowls and the House of Fame, both of which refer explicitly to Dante's Divine Comedy; and the English phase, during which Chaucer composed his Canterbury Tales. This sequence has many faults—most seriously, it tends to privilege the final, culminating period of the poet's career as specifically "English." Yet despite simplifying, it provides a useful way to contextualize a series of major works, each of which represents a significant innovation beyond what had come before.

In addition to the literature of his French and Italian contemporaries, Chaucer was deeply indebted to the major classical authors, especially Ovid and Virgil. A more particular influence, however, was the late antique philosophical poem of Boethius, the Consolation of Philosophy. Chaucer was a penetrating reader of the Consolation, which he translated into English, and he repeatedly turned to Boethian themes such as the competing roles of Fortune and Providence, the place of free will in the human soul, and the role of love as source of both chaos and order. In his dream visions and Troilus and Criseyde, Chaucer ostentatiously displays his classical learning and makes continual reference to the poems of his French and Italian contemporaries. But in the Canterbury Tales, Chaucer suddenly begins to wear his learning much more lightly: allusions become indirect and often parodic, and the focus of the poetry shifts instead to the landscape of society and, especially, to the relationship between the nature of a storyteller and the story he or she tells.

TIMES

Chaucer's England was the crucible of Reformation: the last years of the fourteenth century witnessed the emergence of religiously unorthodox communities loosely grouped under the term "Lollardy," an originally derogatory term used to identify such would-be reformers as dangerous heretics who sowed discord in the church. Lollard preachers argued that the Bible should be available in the vernacular language so that each person could know scripture at first hand, that images were really idols leading away from rather than toward God, and that pilgrimages were nothing more than social gatherings thinly disguised as devotional practice. In Chaucer's day, such unorthodox views were regarded with suspicion but were not yet as energetically suppressed as they would be just a few years after his death, when those suspected of Lollardy might be burned in the public square along with their unauthorized translations. Chaucer's Parson, who recounts a penitential treatise as the concluding story of the Canterbury Tales, is mocked by the Host, who exclaims, "I smell a Lollard in the wind." This kind of mockery, still just barely playful in the last decade of the fourteenth century, would soon evolve into denunciation and persecution. After this violent suppression, the aims of the Lollards would reemerge more successfully in the sixteenth century.

The same impulse that led medieval English men and women to want to read the Bible in English also led to other expressions of religious piety, including the tremendously popular stories of the lives of saints (two of which appear in the Canterbury Tales, in the Prioress's Tale and the Second Nun's Tale) and autobiographies of devout women such as Julian of Norwich and Margery Kempe. Chaucer's Wife of Bath is far less focused on heavenly goals than were these women: for her, pilgrimage is less about retracing the pathway to God than about "wandering by the way." Like Margery Kempe, however, the Wife of Bath is a strong female representative of the emerging bourgeois class whose wealth was built on local industries such as brewing (Margery Kempe) and weaving (the Wife of Bath), and whose independence was expressed physically through the act of travel both within England and abroad. Chaucer's pilgrims exemplify the late medieval English eagerness to find the right path to God, whether through the unmediated experience of scripture, as advocated by the Lollards, or through the highly overdetermined mediation of pardons (certificates from Rome that guaranteed the devout buyer a shorter stay in purgatory).

The same instability that had come to threaten the church's control of the Christian flock in England, through the rise of Lollardy, also affected the smooth working of government. The reign of Richard II, who had ascended the throne as a child in 1377 following the death of his grandfather Edward III, was marked by capricious rule, discord between the king's advisers and the major lords of the realm, and repeated heavy taxation necessitated by the ongoing war between England and France. Discord within the capital city of London itself was particularly intense, as the burghers of the city became increasingly involved in the disputes between Parliament and the king. The greatest disruption took place in 1381, as a popular uprising broke out in the countryside in response to the imposition of yet another heavy tax. The Peasants' Revolt, as it was later called, moved rapidly through the towns and fields outside London, entering the city with violence. When the archbishop of Canterbury confronted the mob, urging the peasants to return to their homes, he was decapitated and his head impaled on a pike on London Bridge. The peasants rampaged through the streets, sacking and burning the palace of the king's uncle and chief adviser, John of Gaunt. Gaunt was connected to Chaucer both as his main patron and through family ties, but the revolt struck still closer to home for Chaucer: the mob slaughtered a group of Flemish immigrant workers in a London street where Chaucer had lived as a boy, and it entered the city through a major gate—Aldgate—above which Chaucer had his lodgings. Although Chaucer must have witnessed this violence at first hand, his allusions to social unrest are always oblique and, above all, cautious.

WORK

The Canterbury Tales is a frame-tale poem; like The Thousand and One Nights and Boccaccio's Decameron, it has a beginning and ending within which a series of tales are related. Unlike The Thousand and One Nights, which has (for the most part) a single storyteller, and the Decameron, which has a relatively homogenous company of noble young narrators, The Canterbury Tales revels in the extraordinary range of possible tales and possible tale-tellers. From the humble Miller to the chivalric Knight, from the bossy Wife of Bath to the effete Pardoner, Chaucer's diverse pilgrims span the range of medieval English life. The pilgrims are, in a way, types or ideals of each manner of life available to the individual: the company includes a nun, a lawyer, a squire, a sailor, and so on. But each teller is also an individual, characterized as such not only in the prefatory prologues that introduce each tale but also in the manner in which the tale itself is told. Petty rivalries, as between the Miller and the Reeve or between the Friar and the Summoner, are played out during the interludes between tales; tale-tellers pay back or "quite" one another by telling stories that indirectly comment on their fellows, causing sometimes argument and discord, sometimes laughter, or sometimes—as at the end of the Pardoner's Tale—both.

Chaucer's Wife of Bath is endowed with a vivid personality and a complex inner life that she herself tells us all about. In her Prologue, she sets her female experience against the misogynist stereotypes of women as lawless, sexually voracious, and manipulative creatures, a view promoted by certain traditions of medieval religious thought. Yet the reader is forced to ask if the Wife's frank celebration of her own sexuality, and her account of the torment she has inflicted on her three old husbands, does not in fact confirm those stereotypes. An answer is suggested by the Wife's claim that she is only playing: indeed, at one point she speaks as if she were showing her almost exclusively male audience how she would conduct a kind of school for wives. She seems, in other words, to be putting on a performance, pretending to reveal to her fascinated audience the secrets that women share among themselves and thereby letting men witness the intimate life of a woman. Yet as the Prologue proceeds we feel that her playful dramatics give way to a more serious, more authentic self-revelation. We learn that not only have her husbands suffered in marriage but that she has too, that she is unavoidably (if cheerfully) aware of her advancing years, and that what she seems to value most is neither money nor the sex she so aggressively celebrates but the companionship and love she comes finally to share with her fifth husband. In the same way, her tale gradually reveals itself to be more than simply a nostalgic wish fulfillment for the return of youth and beauty. When the criminal knight tries to learn what women most desire, he is offered a series of misogynist answers; but when forced to marry he discovers, through the moral lecture his old wife delivers, that she possesses a wisdom that he himself lacks. This is why he leaves the final decision about what form she will assume up to her, and in granting her mastery he is rewarded not merely with youth and beauty but with a marriage of mutual affection. It is through this experience, then, rather than by relying on the authority of time-honored opinions, that the knight comes to learn about the true nature of women.

CHAUCER'S LANGUAGE

Chaucer's Middle English strikes the present-day reader as both familiar and strange, separated from Modern English by peculiarities of pronunciation and word order, but recognizable as its ancestor through names and terms that have remained essentially unchanged. Unlike the Old English of Beowulf, which must be learned as though it were a foreign language, Middle English is usually approached as if it were a dialect or an idiom—close to home, but still uncannily strange. We reproduce below the first eighteen lines of the General Prologue to the Tales, not only to illustrate the gap between English of the fourteenth century and the twenty-first, and to provide a frame of reference for the modern English translation that follows, but also to give a taste of the unfamiliar familiar tongue of the father of English poetry.

Whan that Aprill with his shoures soote
 The droghte of March hath perced to the roote,
 And bathed every veyne in swich licour
 Of which vertu engendred is the flour;
 Whan Zephirus eek with his sweete breeth
 Inspired hath in every holt and heeth
 The tender croppes, and the yonge sonne
 Hath in the Ram his halve cours yronne,
 And smale foweles maken melodye,
 That slepen al the nyght with open ye
 (So priketh hem nature in hir corages);
 Thanne longen folk to goon on pilgrimages,
 And palmeres for to seken straunge strondes,
 To ferne halwes, kowthe in sondry londes;
 And specially from every shires ende
 Of Engelond to Caunterbury they wende,
 The hooly blissful martir for to seke,
 That hem hath holpen whan that they were seeke.

FROM THE CANTERBURY TALES<sup>1</sup>

The General Prologue

Here begins the Book of the Tales of Canterbury.

When April comes and with its showers sweet
 Has, to the root, pierced March's drought complete,
 And then bathed every vein in such elixir
 That, by its strength, engendered is the flower;
 When Zephirus<sup>2</sup> with his sweet breath
 Inspires life anew, through grove and heath,
 In tender shoots, and when the spring's young sun
 Has, in the Ram,<sup>3</sup> full half its course now run,

5

1. Translated from Middle English by Sheila Fisher.

2. Zephyr, the west wind.

3. Aries, the first sign of the zodiac in the solar year (March 21–April 20).

And when small birds begin to harmonize
 That sleep throughout the night with open eyes 10
 (So nature, stirring them, pricks up their courage),
 Then folks, too, long to go on pilgrimage,
 And palmers hope to seek there, on strange strands,<sup>4</sup>
 Those far-off shrines well known in many lands;
 And especially, from every shire's end 15
 Of England, to Canterbury they wend;
 The holy, blessed martyr<sup>5</sup> they all seek,
 Who has helped them when they were sick and weak.
 It happened, in that season, on a day
 In Southwark,<sup>6</sup> at the Tabard as I lay 20
 Ready to start out on my pilgrimage
 To Canterbury, with true, devoted courage,
 At night, there came into that hostelry,<sup>7</sup>
 Fully nine-and-twenty in a company
 Of sundry folks, as chance would have them fall 25
 In fellowship, and pilgrims were they all,
 Who, toward Canterbury, wished to ride.
 The chambers and the stables were all wide,
 And we were put at ease with all the best.
 And, shortly, when the sun went to its rest, 30
 I had so spoken with them, every one,
 That I was in their fellowship anon,
 And to rise early I gave them my vow,
 To make our way, as I will tell you now.
 But, nonetheless, while I have time and space, 35
 Before much further in this tale I pace,
 It seems quite right and proper to relate
 To you the full condition and the state
 Of each of them, just as they seemed to me,
 And what they were, and of what degree, 40
 And also of the clothes they were dressed in,
 And with a knight, then, I will first begin.
 A KNIGHT there was, and that, a worthy man,
 Who, from the time when he first began
 To ride to war, he loved most chivalry, 45
 Truth and honor, largesse and courtesy.
 Full worthy he, to fight in his lord's war,
 No other man had ridden half so far,
 As much in Christian as in heathen lands,
 And all honor his worthiness commands; 50

4. Shores, beaches. "Palmer": pilgrims who had returned from the Holy Land (they carried palm fronds in imitation of Jesus and his apostles during their entry into Jerusalem).

5. St. Thomas Becket (ca. 1118–1170), killed by assailants loyal to King Henry II of England as he stood before the altar of his church at Canterbury; until the Reformation, the site was something of a national center of religious devotion.

6. A suburb of London, south of the Thames, where theaters, brothels, and other businesses of dubious repute set up shop beyond the reach of the city's laws.

7. I.e., the Tabard.

At Alexandria<sup>8</sup> he was, when it was won.
 At banquets, he was many times the one
 Seated with honor above all knights in Prussia;
 In Lithuania, he'd raided, and in Russia,
 Unrivalled among knightly Christian men. 55
 In Granada, at the siege, he'd also been
 Of Algeciras; he rode at Belmarin.
 At Ayas and at Adalia he had been
 When they fell; and then in the Great Sea<sup>9</sup>
 At fine armed conquests, he fought worthily. 60
 In fifteen mortal battles had he been,
 And thrice he fought for God at Tlemcen
 Alone in lists, and always slew his foe.
 And this same worthy knight had been also
 At one time fighting alongside Balat's lord 65
 Against another Turkish heathen horde;
 And always was his fame a sovereign prize.
 Not only was he was worthy, he was wise,
 And in his bearing, meek as is a maid.
 In all his life, no rude word had he said 70
 To any man, however much his might.
 He was a true and perfect gentle knight.
 But now to tell you about his array,
 His horse was good, but his dress was not gay.
 His tunic was of fustian, coarse and plain, 75
 Which by his rusty mailcoat was all stained,
 For just lately he'd come from his voyage,
 And now he went to make his pilgrimage.
 With him there was his son, a young SQUIRE,
 A lover and in arms, a bachelor, 80
 His locks waved like they'd seen a curling press.
 About twenty years of age he was, I guess.
 In his stature, he was of average length,
 And wonderfully deft, and of great strength.
 He'd ridden sometimes with the cavalry 85
 In Flanders, in Artois, and Picardy,<sup>1</sup>
 And fared quite well, within small time and space,
 In hope of standing in his lady's grace.
 Embroidered was he, as if he were a bed
 All full of fresh spring flowers, white and red. 90
 Singing he was, or fluting, all the day;
 He was as fresh as is the month of May.
 Short was his gown, its sleeves hung long and wide.
 Well could he sit his horse, and nicely ride.
 And also he wrote songs, both verse and note, 95

8. A city in northern Egypt, sacked by Peter I of Cyprus in 1365. The following places named, ranging from eastern Europe to the Muslim-held regions in southern Spain and North Africa, demonstrate both the large number and the wide variety of the Knight's campaigns.

9. The Mediterranean.

1. Regions in modern Belgium and northern France.

He jousted and he danced, he drew and wrote.
 So hotly loved he that when nighttime came,
 The nightingale and he slept both the same.<sup>2</sup>
 Courteous and meek, to serve, quite able,
 He carved before his father at the table.<sup>3</sup>

100

A YEOMAN<sup>4</sup> had he—no servants beside,
 For at this time, that's how he chose to ride,
 And he was clad in coat and hood of green.
 A sheaf of peacock arrows, bright and keen,
 Under his belt, he bore quite properly (For he could tend his gear quite yeomanly;
 His arrows did not droop with feathers low),
 And in his hand he bore a mighty bow.
 A close-cropped head had he, a face well browned.
 No man more skilled in woodcraft might be found.
 Upon his arm he wore a gay wrist guard,
 And by his side a small shield and a sword,
 By his other side, a bright, gay dagger fell,
 As sharp as a spear's point, and sheathed up well;
 On his breast, a silver Christopher<sup>5</sup> was seen.
 He bore a horn, its baldric was of green;
 A forester, he was, truly, as I guess.

105

110

115

There was also a Nun, a PRIORESS,
 Who in her smiling was simple and gracious;
 Her greatest oath was "by Saint Eligius";<sup>6</sup>
 And she was known as Madame Eglentine.<sup>7</sup>
 Quite well she sang the liturgy divine,
 Intoning it in her nose quite properly;
 And French she spoke quite well and elegantly,
 After the school of Stratford-at-the-Bow,<sup>8</sup>
 Because Parisian French she did not know.
 In dining, she was well taught overall;
 She let no morsel down from her lips fall,
 Nor wet her fingers in her sauce so deep;
 Deftly she could lift up a bite, and keep
 A single drop from falling on her breast.
 In courtesy, she found what pleased her best.
 Her upper lip she wiped so nice and clean
 That in her cup no single speck was seen
 Of grease, because she drank her drink so neat.
 Quite daintily, she reached out for her meat.
 And truthfully, she was so very pleasant,
 And amiable, her manners excellent;
 She pained herself to imitate the ways

125

130

135

2. That is, not at all. In Persian, Arabic, Occitan, and French poetry, the nightingale was a symbol of erotic love.

3. One of the duties of a squire, and also a sign of obedience and loyalty.

4. A superior grade of servant in a noble household.

5. A medal bearing the image of the patron saint of travelers.

6. The patron saint of goldsmiths, said to have been a remarkably attractive man.

7. The name of a kind of wild rose (more appropriate to a romance heroine than a nun).

8. A village 2 miles from London.

Of court, and to be stately all her days, 140
 And to be held worthy of reverence.
 But, now, to speak about her conscience,
 She was so full of pity and charity,
 That she'd cry for a mouse that she might see
 Caught in a trap, if it bled or was dead. 145
 With her, she had her small hounds, which she fed
 With roasted flesh, or milk and pure white bread.<sup>9</sup>
 Sorely she wept if one of them were dead,
 Or if men smote it so hard it would smart;
 With her, all was conscience and tender heart. 150
 Quite properly, her pleated wimple draped,
 Her eyes blue gray as glass, her nose well-shaped,
 Her mouth quite small, and also soft and red.
 But, certainly, she had a fair forehead;
 It was almost a span<sup>1</sup> in breadth, I own; 155
 For, truth to tell, she was not undergrown.
 Quite elegant, her cloak, I was aware.
 Made of small corals on her arm she'd bear,
 A rosary, set off with beads of green,
 And thereon hung a brooch of golden sheen, 160
 On which the letter "A," inscribed and crowned With "Amor vincit omnia"<sup>2</sup> was found.
 Another NUN riding with her had she,
 Who was her secretary, and priests three.
 A MONK there was, the handsomest to see, 165
 An outrider, who most loved venery,<sup>3</sup>
 A manly man, to be an abbot able.
 Many a striking horse had he in stable,
 And when he rode, men might his bridle hear
 Jingling in a whistling wind as clear 170
 And just as loud as tolls the chapel bell
 Of the house where he was keeper of the cell.
 The rule of Saints Maurus and Benedict,<sup>4</sup>
 Because it was so old and somewhat strict—
 This same Monk let the old things pass away 175
 And chose the new ways of the present day.
 For that text he'd not give you one plucked hen
 That said that hunters are not holy men,
 Or that a monk who disobeys his order
 Is likened to a fish out of the water— 180
 That is to say, a monk out of the cloister.
 But that text, he held not worth an oyster.
 And I said his opinion was good.

9. A diet enjoyed only by the wealthy; in this period, most ate black or brown bread, with little meat.

1. A handspan (a wide forehead was a sign of beauty).

2. "Love conquers all" (Latin).

3. Hunting; also, sexual pleasure (Latin, ven- eria). "Outrider": here, the monk whose duty was to look after the lands belonging to the monastery.

4. The founder (d. 547) of the Benedictine order; Maurus (d. 584) was his disciple and founded an abbey in France.

What! Should he study, and make himself mad should
 He, always poring over books in cloister, 185
 Or should he work with his hands and labor
 As Augustine bids?<sup>5</sup> How shall the world be served?
 For Augustine, let this work be reserved!
 A fine hard-pricking spursman he, all right;
 He had greyhounds as swift as birds in flight; 190
 In pricking and in hunting for the hare,
 Lay all his lust; for no cost would he spare.
 I saw his sleeves were fur lined at the hand
 With rich, gray squirrel, the finest in the land;
 And to fasten his hood beneath his chin, 195
 He had, all wrought from gold, a fancy pin;
 A love knot on the larger end was cast.
 His head was bald, and it shone just like glass,
 His face shone, too, as though he'd been anointed.
 He was a lord full fat and well appointed; 200
 His eyes rolled in his head and shone as bright
 As fires under furnace pots, cast light;
 His boots were supple, his horses strong and fit;
 Now, certainly, he was a fair prelate;
 He was not pale like a tormented ghost. 205
 A fat swan<sup>6</sup> loved he best of any roast.
 His palfrey was as brown as is a berry.
 A FRIAR there was, a wanton one, and merry,
 A limitor,<sup>7</sup> quite an important man.
 In all four orders<sup>8</sup> is no one who can 210
 Talk quite so smoothly, with such winning speech.
 Many marriages made he in the breach
 For young women and at his own expense.
 In him, his order found a fine defense.
 Quite well beloved and on close terms was he 215
 With the franklins<sup>9</sup> all throughout his country,
 And with all the town's most worthy women,
 For he had the right to hear confession,
 As he said, more than a curate surely,
 For, by his order, he was licensed fully. 220
 So, quite sweetly, would he hear confession,
 And quite pleasant was his absolution:
 He was an easy man in giving penance,
 Where he knew he'd get more than a pittance.
 If to a poor order one has given, 225
 It's a sure sign that one's been well shriven;
 If a man gave, he knew well what it meant:
 He dared to boast that this man would repent.

5. The rule of St. Augustine of Hippo (354–430), author of the Confessions, requires that monks engage in manual labor.

6. An expensive and rare delicacy; ordinarily, monks abstained from eating meat.

7. A friar licensed to beg in a specific territory.

8. In the 14th century, Franciscans, Augustinians, Carmelites, and Dominicans. Friars, unlike monks, circulated among the people.

9. Upper-middle-class landowners, ranked below the gentry.

For many a man is just so hard of heart,
 He may not weep, though he may sorely smart. 230
 Therefore, instead of giving tears and prayers,
 Men must yield up their silver to poor friars.
 His hood's tip always was stuffed full of knives
 And pins, for him to give out to fair wives.
 Certainly his merry voice was pleasing: 235
 And he could play the fiddle well and sing;
 For ballads, he took first prize utterly.
 His neck was white as is the fleur-de-lis.<sup>1</sup>
 A strong champion was he in a brawl.
 The taverns in each town, he knew them all; 240
 Each in keeper and every barmaid, too,
 More than lepers<sup>2</sup> or beggar girls, he knew,
 Because, for such a worthy man as he,
 It would not do, with his ability,
 With sick lepers to have an acquaintance. 245
 It is not right; it hardly can advance
 Him if he has to spend time with the poor,
 Just with the rich and victualers, for sure.
 And over all, where profit should arise,
 Polite was he, and served in humble guise. 250
 No man was so effective anywhere:
 He was, in his house, the best beggar there.
 For private begging turf, he laid out rent;
 None of his brothers came there where he went;
 And although one were a shoeless widow, 255
 So charming was his "In principio,"<sup>3</sup>
 A farthing he would get before he went.
 His income was much higher than his rent.
 And he could rage just like a little whelp.
 On love-days,<sup>4</sup> like a judge, well could he help, 260
 For there, he was not like a cloisterer
 In a threadbare cloak, like a poor scholar,
 But like a master or the pope as well.
 Of double worsted, rounded as a bell
 Fresh from the casting, was his short, rich cloak. 265
 With affectation, he lisped when he spoke,
 To make his English sweet upon his tongue;
 In his harping, whenever he had sung,
 His eyes would twinkle in his head as bright
 As do the stars upon a frosty night. 270
 This worthy limitor was named Huberd.
 A MERCHANT was there, too, with a forked beard,
 In mixed-hued clothes; high on his horse he sat;
 Upon his head, a Flemish beaver hat,

1. A lily (in heraldry, the royal arms of France).

2. Shunned through antiquity and the Middle Ages, but healed by Jesus (see Mark 1.40–45; Luke 17.11–19).

3. "In the beginning" (Latin), the opening words of the Vulgate translation of the Gospel of John, whose first fourteen verses were used by friars in devotions and in greetings.

4. Days when disputes were judged out of court.

And his fair boots were fastened stylishly. 275
 He uttered his ideas quite solemnly,
 Sounding always increase in his winning.
 He wished the sea safe, more than anything,
 Between the ports of Middleburgh and Orwell.<sup>5</sup>
 Well could he in exchange his florins sell.<sup>6</sup> 280
 This worthy man quite deftly used his wit:
 Were he in debt, no one would know of it,
 So stately was he in his management
 Of borrowing, buying, selling where he went.
 Surely, he was a worthy man, in all, 285
 But, truth to say, I don't know what he's called.
 A CLERK from Oxford<sup>7</sup> was with us also,
 Whose work in logic started long ago.
 As skinny was his horse as is a rake,
 And he was not so fat, I undertake; 290
 He looked hollow, and thus, grave and remote.
 Quite threadbare was his outermost short coat;
 He had as yet no clerical appointment,
 And wasn't made for secular employment.
 For he would rather have, at his bed's head, 295
 Twenty books, all well bound in black or red,
 Of Aristotle<sup>8</sup> and his philosophy
 Than rich robes, or fiddle, or gay psaltery.
 But, for all that he was a philosopher,
 He had little gold piled in his coffer;<sup>9</sup> 300
 For, anything that his friends to him lent,
 On books and on his learning, it got spent.
 Busily, for the souls of them he prayed
 Who, so that he could go to school, had paid.
 Of his studies, he took most care and heed. 305
 Not one word spoke he more than he had need,
 And that was said with dignity and respect,
 And short, and quick, and full of intellect;
 Resounding in moral virtue was his speech,
 And gladly would he learn, and gladly teach. 310
 A SERGEANT OF THE LAW,<sup>1</sup> wary and wise,
 Who often in Saint Paul's court<sup>2</sup> did advise,
 There was also, quite rich in excellence.
 Dignified and judicious in each sense—
 Or he seemed such, his words were all so wise. 315
 He was often a judge at the assize,<sup>3</sup>

5. Cities in the Netherlands and England, respectively.

6. I.e., he also profited in currency exchange. Florins were gold coins minted in Florence, Italy.

7. A student.

8. The rediscovered works of Aristotle (384–322 B.C.E.) were widely read and commented on in medieval universities, especially his works on logic and science.

9. A joke that relies on understanding “philosopher” as also meaning “alchemist” (one who sought to create gold out of base metals).

1. A judge.

2. By St. Paul's Cathedral, a meeting place for lawyers and their clients.

3. Circuit court, presided over by itinerant judges.

With full commission—and through royal consent.
 For all his learning and his fame's extent,
 Fees and robes, he did have, many a one.
 So great a land buyer elsewhere was none: 320
 He would directly buy up the estate;
 His purchase, no one could invalidate.
 Nowhere was such a busy man as he;
 He seemed busier than he was, actually.
 He knew the precedents for everything 325
 The law had done since William was the king.<sup>4</sup>
 Fine legal texts, thus could he draft and draw
 In which no one could find a single flaw;
 Every statute, he could recite by rote.
 He rode there in a simple mixed-hued coat. 330
 A striped silk belt around his waist he wore;
 About his dress, I won't tell any more.
 A FRANKLIN rode there in his company,
 And his beard was white as is the daisy;
 His mood was sanguine,<sup>5</sup> his face rosy red. 335
 Well loved he, in the morning, wine-soaked bread;
 To live in sheer delight was his one care,
 For he was Epicurus's<sup>6</sup> own heir,
 Who thought that to lead life in all its pleasure
 Was true perfect bliss beyond all measure. 340
 A householder, and a full great one, was he;
 A Saint Julian<sup>7</sup> he was, in his country.
 His bread, his ale, were always very fine;
 No other man had better stocks of wine.
 His house was never lacking in baked meat, 345
 Or fish or flesh, in plenty so complete
 That it snowed, in his house, with food and drink,
 With any dainties of which men could think.
 According to the seasons of the year,
 New dishes on his table would appear. 350
 Fat partridges in coops, when he did like;
 He kept his fish pond stocked with bream and pike.
 And woe unto his cook if he'd not got
 His gear set and the sauce, spicy and hot.
 Covered and ready did his table stay 355
 Set up for meals within the hall all day.
 At county courts, he was the lord and sire;
 And went to Parliament to serve his shire.
 A two-edged dagger and a purse of silk
 Hung from his girdle, white as morning's milk. 360
 A sheriff had he been, an auditor,<sup>8</sup>

4. I.e., since modern law was established by William I, the Norman who conquered England in 1066.

5. In medieval physiology, the dominance of blood (one of the four bodily humors), indicated by his red face, was believed to explain a cheerful disposition.

6. Greek philosopher (340–270 B.C.E.), viewed in the Middle Ages as a proponent of hedonism.

7. The legendary patron saint of innkeepers.

8. An official responsible for verifying accounts.

And nowhere such a worthy landholder.

A HABERDASHER and a CARPENTER,
A WEAVER, DYER, and a TAPESTRY MAKER—

They were all clothed in the same livery 365

Of one great parish guild fraternity.<sup>9</sup>

All fresh and newly furbished was their gear;

On their knives no brass mountings were found here,

But only silver; fashioned just as fit,

Their girdles and their purses, every bit. 370

Each of them seemed such a worthy burgess<sup>1</sup>

He might sit in the guildhall on the dais.

And each, with all the wisdom that he can,

Was suited to be made an alderman.

Income had they enough, and property, 375

To this their wives would certainly agree;

Or else, quite surely, they would all be blamed.

It is quite nice “My Lady” to be named,

At feasts and vigils, to march first in line,

And have, borne royally, a mantle<sup>2</sup> fine. 380

For this trip, a COOK rode with them then

To boil the marrowbones up with the hens,

Along with spices tart and galingale.<sup>3</sup>

Well did he know a draught of London ale.

He could both roast and simmer, boil and fry, 385

Make stews and hash and also bake a pie.

But it was a real shame, it seemed to me,

That on his shin, a pus-filled sore had he.

A milky pudding made he with the best.

A SHIPMAN was there, who lived in the west; 390

He came from Dartmouth,<sup>4</sup> for all that I guessed.

To ride a packhorse he did try his best,

In a gown of coarse wool cloth cut to the knee.

A dagger hanging on a strap had he

Around his neck, under his arm coming down. 395

The hot summer had turned his skin all brown.

And certainly, he was a good fellow.

So many draughts of fine wine from Bordeaux<sup>5</sup>

Had he drawn, while the merchants were asleep.

In a good conscience, small stock did he keep. 400

If, when he fought, he had the upper hand,

He sent them all, by water, back to land.

But in the art of reckoning the tides,

The currents and all perils near, besides,

The moon and piloting and anchorage, 405

9. A trade group whose purposes were social, religious, and economic.

1. Propertied citizen.

2. I.e., a mantle (Chaucer's spelling, now obsolete).

3. Aromatic root, also used as a powder.

4. Port on the southwest coast of England.

5. A center of the wine trade, in southwest France.

No one was so skilled from Hull to Carthage.<sup>6</sup>
 Hardy and wise in what was undertaken,
 With many tempests had his beard been shaken.
 He knew well all the harbors that there were,
 Stretching from Gotland to Cape Finisterre,<sup>7</sup> 410
 And each inlet from Brittany to Spain;
 His sailing ship was called the "Magdalene."<sup>8</sup>
 With us was a DOCTOR OF MEDICINE;
 No one was like him, all the world within,
 To speak of medicine and surgery, 415
 For he was schooled well in astrology.
 Through natural magic,<sup>9</sup> he gave patients hope
 By keeping close watch on their horoscope.
 He could divine when planets were ascendant
 To aid the star signs governing his patient. 420
 Of every malady, he knew the source
 In humors hot, cold, moist, or dry, of course,
 And where they were engendered, from which humor.<sup>1</sup>
 He was a perfect, true practitioner.
 The cause and root known of the malady, 425
 At once he gave the sick their remedy.
 Quite ready had he his apothecaries
 To send him their drugs and electuaries,<sup>2</sup>
 For each made profit for the other one—
 Their friendship had not recently begun. 430
 Well knew he his old Aesculapius,<sup>3</sup>
 Dioscorides, and also Rufus,
 Old Hippocrates, Hali, and Galen, Rhazes, Avicenna, Serapion,
 Averroes, Damascien, Constantinus, 435
 Bernard, Gaddesden, Gilbertus Anglicus.
 Of his own diet, moderate was he,
 For it contained no superfluity,
 But was nourishing and digestible.
 His study was but little on the Bible. 440
 In blood red and in blue he was all clad,
 A lining of two kinds of silk he had.
 Yet he was quite cautious with expenses;
 He saved what he earned in pestilences.
 In medicine, gold<sup>4</sup> works well for the heart, 445

6. I.e., from northern England to North Africa (Carthage) or Spain (Cartagena; Chaucer has "Cartage"); the Shipman is widely traveled.

7. From an island off the coast of Sweden to the west coast of Spain.

8. Named after Mary Magdalen, Jesus's disciple; according to a French tradition, she, her brother Lazarus, and some companions came to the port city of Marseille in the south of France and converted all of Provence.

9. As opposed to black magic.

1. According to humoral physiology, illness was caused by imbalance in the four humors—the different combinations of the four qualities (hot, cold, moist, dry).

2. Medicinal pastes.

3. Greek god of healing. The list that follows names medical authors from ancient Greece, the Arabic world (including Avicenna), and medieval England (John of Gaddesden [d. 1348/49] and Gilbert the Englishman [d. ca. 1250]).

4. Used as a medicine in the Middle Ages.

Therefore, he'd loved gold from the very start.

A good WIFE was there from nearby to BATH;
It was a pity she was deaf by half.

In cloth-making she had such a talent

She far passed those from Ypres and from Ghent.<sup>5</sup> 450

And throughout all her parish, there was no

Wife who might first to the offering go

Before her; if one did, so mad was she

That she lost any sense of charity.

Her coverchiefs of fine linen were found; 455

I dare swear that they weighed a full ten pounds,

The ones that, Sundays, sat upon her head.

Her stockings were all fine and scarlet red,

Quite tightly laced, her shoes quite soft and new.<sup>6</sup>

Bold was her face, and fair, and red of hue. 460

All her life, she was a worthy woman,

Husbands at the church door, she'd had five then,

Not counting other company in youth—

No need to speak of that now, to tell the truth.

And thrice she had been to Jerusalem;<sup>7</sup> 465

Many a foreign sea, she'd covered them;

At Rome she'd been, and also at Boulogne,

At Saint James in Galicia and Cologne.

She knew much of wandering by the way.

Gap toothed<sup>8</sup> she was, it is the truth to say. 470

Quite easily on her ambling horse, she sat,

Wearing a wimpled headdress and a hat

Like a buckler or a shield as broad and round;

A foot-mantle about her large hips wound,

And on her feet a pair of sharp spurs poked. 475

In fellowship, quite well she laughed and joked.

The remedies of love she knew by heart,

For of that old dance, she knew all the art.

A good man was there of religion,

Of a town, he served as the poor PARSON. 480

But he was rich in holy thought and work.

He was also a learned man, a clerk,

And Christ's gospel truthfully he would preach;

His parishioners devoutly he would teach.

Gracious he was, a wonder of diligence, 485

And in adversity, he had such patience,

And in this, he had often tested been.

For tithes, he found it loathsome to curse men,

But he would rather give, there is no doubt,

To his poor parishioners, round about, 490

5. Two cities in Flanders (modern Belgium) renowned for cloth production.

6. I.e., of good quality, supple leather.

7. The major pilgrimage site for medieval Christians; lesser popular pilgrimage sites—in Italy,

France, Spain, and Germany, respectively—follow.

8. According to medieval lore, a sign of a tendency to wander, associated especially with sexual excess.

From Mass offerings and his own pay, too.
 With little, he could easily make do.
 Wide was his parish, the houses far asunder,
 But he would not leave them, for rain or thunder,
 If sickness or if trouble should befall 495
 The farthest in his parish, great or small,
 He'd go on foot; his staff in hand he'd keep.
 This noble example he gave to his sheep:
 That first he wrought, and afterward, he taught.
 Out of the Gospels, those words he had caught, 500
 And his own metaphor he added, too:
 If gold should rust, then what will iron do?
 For if a priest is foul, in whom we trust,
 No wonder that a foolish man should rust;
 And it's a shame, if care he does not keep— 505
 A shepherd to be shitty with clean sheep.
 Well should a priest a good example give,
 By his own cleanness, how his sheep should live.
 His parish, he would not put out for hire
 And leave his sheep encumbered in the mire 510
 To run to London to Saint Paul's<sup>9</sup> to switch
 And be a chantry priest<sup>1</sup> just for the rich,
 Nor by guild brothers would he be detained;<sup>2</sup>
 But he stayed home and with his flock remained,
 So that the wolf would not make it miscarry; 515
 He was a shepherd, not a mercenary.
 And though he holy was, and virtuous,
 To sinners, he was not contemptuous,
 Not haughty nor aloof was he in speech,
 With courtesy and kindness would he teach. 520
 To draw folks up to heaven with his fairness,
 By good example: this was all his business.
 But if there were a person who was stubborn,
 Whoever he was, high or low rank born,
 Then he would scold him sharply, at the least. 525
 There is nowhere, I know, a better priest.
 He waited for no pomp or reverence;
 For him, no finicky, affected conscience,
 But the words of Christ and his apostles twelve
 He taught: but first, he followed them himself. 530
 With him, his brother who was a PLOWMAN rode;
 Of dung, this man had hauled out many a load;
 A true laborer, and a good one was he,
 Living in peace and perfect charity.
 God loved he best with all of his whole heart 535
 At all times, though it caused him joy or smart,

9. The largest cathedral in medieval England.

1. A priest supported by an endowment to say daily mass for the souls of particular individuals (usually wealthy men or their family members).

2. I.e., he would not take the lucrative position of priest for a guild.

And next, his neighbor, just as he loved himself.
 He would thresh, dig ditches, and also delve,
 For Christ's sake and the sake of each poor man,
 And without pay, he'd do all that he can. 540
 His tithes, with all due fairness, he'd not shirk,
 But paid from what he owned and with his work.
 In a workman's smock, he rode on a mare.

A REEVE and a MILLER were also there,
 A SUMMONER and then a PARDONER, 545
 A MAN and myself—that's all there were.

The MILLER was a stout churl, it is true;
 Quite big he was in brawn, and in bones, too.
 That stood him in good stead; for where he came,
 He'd win the ram<sup>3</sup> in every wrestling game. 550
 He was short necked and broad, a thick-thewed thug;
 There was no door around he couldn't lug
 Right off its hinges, or break with his head.
 His beard, just like a sow or fox, was red,<sup>4</sup>
 And also broad, as though it was a spade. 555
 Right up atop his nose's ridge was laid
 A wart; on it, a tuft of hairs grew now,
 Red as the bristles in ears of a sow;
 His nostrils were quite black, and also wide.
 A sword and buckler bore he by his side. 560
 His mouth was as great as a great cauldron.
 A jangling goliard, he was quite the one—
 Of sin and harlotries, he most would tell.
 He made three times his pay and stole corn well;
 And yet, he had a thumb of gold, all right.<sup>5</sup> 565
 A blue hood wore he, and a coat of white.
 A bagpipe he knew how to blow and play.
 And sounding it, he led us on our way.

A good MANCIPLE<sup>6</sup> did business for a law school;
 All food buyers could follow well his rule 570
 For prudent buying; it would earn them merit;
 For, whether he paid straight or took on credit,
 In buying, he watched carefully and waited,
 So he was in good shape and well ahead.
 Now, is it not from God a sign of grace 575
 That this unlearned man's wit can outpace
 The wisdom of a heap of learned men?
 Of his masters, he had more than thrice ten,
 Who were quite skilled and expert in the law,

3. I.e., the prize for the winner of a village wrestling contest.

4. His coloration, together with the description of his nostrils and mouth, would suggest to medieval readers a temperament given to strong displays of temper or rage.

5. "An honest miller has a golden thumb" was a proverb expressing the general belief that all millers were dishonest (either because no such miller existed or because millers cheated their customers with a heavy thumb on the scale).

6. Agent responsible for buying supplies and paying bills, especially for a college or monastery.

And in that house, a full dozen one saw 580
 Worthy to be stewards of rents and land
 For any lord who dwells now in England,
 To make him live within the means he had
 In debtless honor (unless he were mad),
 Or as frugally as he could desire, 585
 And able thus to help out all the shire
 In any circumstance that may befall:
 And yet this Manciple hoodwinked them all.
 The REEVE was a slender, choleric<sup>7</sup> man.
 He shaved his beard as closely as one can; 590
 His hair, short and up by his ears, he'd crop,
 And, like a priest's, he'd dock it on the top.
 Quite long his legs were; they were also lean,
 And just like sticks; no calf was to be seen.
 He could well guard the granary and bin; 595
 No auditor around could with him win.
 He knew well, by the drought and by the rain,
 The yieldings of his seed and of his grain.
 His lord's sheep, his cattle, and his dairy,
 His swine and horses, his livestock and poultry 600
 Were wholly under this Reeve's governing,
 And by his contract, he gave reckoning,
 Because his lord, in age, was twenty years.
 No man alive could bring him in arrears.<sup>8</sup>
 No bailiff, herdsman, worker there might be 605
 But he knew all their tricks and treachery;
 As they feared death, of him they were all scared.
 His dwelling place upon a heath was fair;
 All shaded with green trees on every hand.
 He could, much better than his lord, buy land. 610
 Quite richly had he stocked up, privately.
 And he could please his lord so cleverly
 That he'd lend to him from his lord's own goods,
 And have his thanks, then, plus a coat and hood.
 When he was young, he had learned a fine trade, 615
 A good wright, a skilled carpenter he made.
 The Reeve on his stout farm horse sat that day,
 Which was called Scot and was a dapple gray.
 His overcoat was long, of darkish blue,
 And by his side, a rusty blade hung, too. 620
 From Norfolk<sup>9</sup> was this Reeve, of whom I tell,
 From near a town that men call Baldeswell.
 Like a friar's, he tucked his coat up fast.
 In our company, he always rode the last.
 A SUMMONER<sup>1</sup> was with us in that place, 625

7. Dominated by choler, the humor associated with irascibility. "Reeve": farm or estate manager.

8. I.e., convict him of having unpaid debts.

9. County northeast of London.

1. An officer of the ecclesiastical courts who served summonses to individuals charged with offenses against canon law.

Who had a fiery-red cherubic face,
 Pimpily was he, with eyes swollen and narrow.
 Hot he was and lecherous as a sparrow,<sup>2</sup>
 With scabbed black brows; his beard had lost some hair.
 And of his visage, children were quite scared. 630
 Not lead monoxide, mercury, or sulphur,
 Not borax, white lead, or cream of tartar—
 No single ointment that would cleanse or bite—
 Could help him to remove those pustules white,
 Nor cure the pimples sitting on his cheeks. 635
 Well loved he garlic, onions, also leeks,<sup>3</sup>
 And drinking blood red wine, strongly fermented;
 Then he would speak and cry as though demented.
 And when of this good wine he'd drunk his fill,
 No words but Latin from his mouth would spill. 640
 A few such terms he knew, like two or three,
 That he had learned by hearing some decree—
 It's no wonder, for he heard it all day;
 And thus you know full well how any jay<sup>4</sup>
 Can call out "Walter" as well as the pope. 645
 But whoever might on other matters grope,
 Then his philosophy was spent thereby;
 Always, "Questio quid iuris,"<sup>5</sup> cry he would.
 He was a noble rascal in his kind;
 A better fellow men would never find. 650
 And he would suffer, for a quart of wine,
 A good fellow to have his concubine
 A full year, and excuse him thus completely;
 For he himself could pluck a finch<sup>6</sup> discreetly.
 If he found a good fellow anywhere, 655
 Then he would quickly teach to him that there
 Was no need to fear archdeacons' curses,<sup>7</sup>
 Unless men's souls were found in their purses;
 For in their purses, they will punished be.
 "The purse is the archdeacon's hell," said he. 660
 He downright lied, I know, in what he said;
 Excommunication guilty men should dread.
 Absolving saves, but cursing slays indeed;
 Of Significavit,<sup>8</sup> men should well take heed.
 Under his thumb, he had, as it did please 665
 Him, the young girls there of the diocese;
 He counseled all who told him things in secret.

2. A proverbially lecherous bird; this behavior is a manifestation of the Summoner's "hot" temperament.

3. These foods, according to medieval medicine, would increase the heat of the body and thus also cause lust, outbursts of fury, and outbreaks of the skin.

4. A popinjay, or parrot.

5. "The question [is], what [point] of law

[applies]" (Latin); a phrase familiar to the Summoner from the ecclesiastical courts.

6. To trick or blackmail; to have sexual relations.

7. I.e., excommunication.

8. Literally, "he has signified" (Latin): the writ issued for the arrest of an excommunicated person.

A garland he had fashioned and then set,
 Big as an ale-house sign, upon his head.
 He'd made a buckler from a loaf of bread. 670

With him, there rode a gentle PARDONER
 Of Roncevalles,<sup>9</sup> and good, close friends they were.
 He'd come straight from the papal court at Rome,
 And loudly sang, "Come hither, love, to me!"
 With a stiff bass, the Summoner sang along; 675
 No trumpet's sound was ever half so strong.

This Pardoner had hair yellow as wax,
 But smooth it hung as does a hank of flax;
 In skinny strands, the locks hung from his head,
 And with them, he his shoulders overspread; 680
 But thin it lay; its strands hung one by one.
 For stylishness, a hood he would wear none,
 Since it was trussed up within his wallet.
 He thought he wore the latest fashions yet;
 With loose hair, his head save for his cap was bare. 685
 Such staring eyes he had, just like a hare.

A veronica<sup>1</sup> he'd sewn on his cap.
 His wallet lay before him in his lap,
 With pardons hot from Rome stuffed to the brim.
 A voice high as a goat's came out of him. 690
 No beard had he, nor should he wait for one;
 His face smooth like his shaving'd just been done.
 I think he was a gelding or a mare.

But, in his craft, from Berwick down to Ware,<sup>2</sup>
 No pardoner like him in all the land. 695

In his bag was a pillowcase on hand,
 And he declared it was Our Lady's<sup>3</sup> veil;
 He said he had a big piece of the sail
 Saint Peter used upon his boat when he,
 Before Christ took him, had gone out to sea. 700
 He had a fake gold cross bedecked with stones,
 A glass he had that carried some pig bones.<sup>4</sup>

But with these relics, whenever he spied
 A poor parson out in the countryside,
 On that day, much more money would he make 705
 Than, in two months, the poor parson might take;
 And thus, with his feigned flattery and japes,
 He made the parson and people his apes.
 But to tell the whole truth, now, finally,

9. A church-affiliated hospital in London, supported in part by the sale of pardons—papal indulgences purchased to shorten the time spent by souls in purgatory.

1. A reproduction of Jesus's features, as were said to have been miraculously impressed on the cloth offered to him by St. Veronica on his way to his crucifixion. The veronica was also a key point of reference for medieval artists who wished to claim a divine origin for their craft.

2. I.e., from northernmost England to the south.

3. The Virgin Mary.

4. The Pardoner has a variety of false saints' relics; such relics were believed to possess the saints' spiritual power and thus found eager buyers.

In church, a noble ecclesiastic was he. 710
 Well could he read a lesson or a story,
 But best of all, he sang the offertory;
 For well he knew, when that song had been sung,
 Then he must preach and smoothly file his tongue
 To win his silver, as quite well could he; 715
 Therefore, he sang quite loud and merrily.
 Now, I have told you truly, in a clause,
 The rank, the dress, the number, and the cause
 That brought together all this company
 In Southwark, at this noble hostelry 720
 That's called the Tabard, next door to the Bell.
 But now it's time that to you I should tell
 How that we all behaved on that same night
 When we should in that hostelry alight;
 Afterward, I will tell of our voyage 725
 And all the rest about our pilgrimage.
 But first I pray you, by your courtesy,
 That you not blame my own vulgarity,
 Although I might speak plainly in this matter,
 When I tell you their words and their demeanor, 730
 Or if I speak their words, exact and true.
 For this you all know just as well as I do:
 Whoever tells a tale after a man,
 He must repeat, as closely as he can,
 Every last word, if that is his duty, 735
 Even if he has to speak quite rudely,
 Or otherwise, he makes his tale untrue,
 Or makes things up, or finds words that are new.
 He may not spare, though that man were his brother;
 He might as well say one word as another. 740
 Christ himself plainly spoke in Holy Writ;
 You know no vulgarity is in it.
 And Plato says, whoever can him read,
 That words must be the cousin to the deed.<sup>5</sup>
 Also, I pray you that you will forgive me 745
 Although I've not ranked folks by their degree
 Here in this tale, the way that they should stand.
 My wit is short, you may well understand.
 Our Host put us at ease with his great cheer;
 At once, he set up supper for us here. 750
 He served us all with victuals that were fine;
 It pleased us well to drink his good, strong wine.
 An impressive man our Host was, all in all;
 He could have been a marshal in a hall.
 A large man he, with eyes both bright and wide— 755
 No fairer burghess anywhere in Cheapside<sup>6</sup>—

5. Apparently an allusion to Plato's Timaeus 29B, borrowed by Chaucer from Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy (ca. 525 C.E.) or from the Roman de la Rose (ca. 1275).

 6. A major business district in London.

Bold in his speech, and wise, and quite well taught.
 And in his manhood, he did lack for naught.
 Moreover, he was quite a merry man;
 After supper, to amuse us, he began, 760
 And spoke of pleasure, among other things,
 When we had settled up our reckonings.
 He then said thus: "Now, my good lords, truly,
 To me, you are quite welcome, heartily;
 For, by my word, if that I shall not lie, 765
 So merry a company, this whole year, I Have not seen in this inn, as I see now.
 I'd gladly make you happy, knew I how.
 I've just thought what would be entertaining;
 It'd please you, and it wouldn't cost a thing. 770
     You go to Canterbury—bless the Lord,
 May the blissful martyr pay you your reward!
 I know well, as you travel by the way,
 You all intend to tell tales and to play;
 For truly, comfort and mirth both have flown 775
 If you ride on the way dumb as a stone;
 Now, I know a way I can divert you,
 As I have said, and give you comfort, too.
 And if it pleases you to give assent
 So you all agree to trust my judgment, 780
 And to do according to what I say,
 Tomorrow, when you all ride by the way,
 Now, by the soul of my father who is dead,
 Unless you're merry, I'll give you my head!
 Hold up your hands, now, without further speech." 785
     All our assent took not long to beseech.
 It did not seem worthwhile to make a fuss,
 For we did not need more time to discuss,
 And we told him to give his verdict then.
 "My lords," said he, "this plan is best. Now, listen. 790
 But take it not, I pray you, with disdain.
 This is the point, to speak now, short and plain:
 Each one of you, to help shorten our way,
 Along this journey, two tales you will say,
 Toward Canterbury, as I mean you to, 795
 And homeward, you'll tell us another two,
 Of adventures that in old times did befall.
 The one who bears himself the best of all—
 That is to say, the one of you who might Tell tales that have most meaning and delight— 800
 Shall have a supper paid for by us all,
 Sitting right near this post here in this hall,
 When we all come again from Canterbury.
 And to make you all even more merry,
 I will myself quite gladly with you ride, 805
 Right at my own expense, and be your guide.
 Whoever will my judgment now gainsay

Shall pay for all we spend along the way.
 If it be so, and all of you agree,
 Without more words, at once, now you tell me, 810
 And I'll make myself ready long before."

This thing was granted, and our oaths we swore
 With quite glad hearts, and we prayed him also
 That he fully would agree to do so,
 And that he would become our governor, 815
 And of our tales, the judge and record keeper,
 And set the supper at a certain price,
 And we would all be ruled by his advice
 In all respects; and thus, with one assent
 We were all accorded with his judgment. 820
 And thereupon, the wine was fetched in fast;
 We drank, and to our rest we went at last,
 Without us any longer tarrying.

In the morning, as day began to spring,
 Up rose our Host, and was, for us, the cock, 825
 And gathered us together in a flock;
 With slow gait, we started on our riding,
 Till we came to Saint Thomas's Watering;<sup>7</sup>
 And there, our Host began to stop his horse
 And said, "Lords, listen—if you please, of course. 830
 Let me remind you that you gave your word.
 If evening-song and morning-song accord,<sup>8</sup>
 Let see now who shall tell us the first tale.
 As ever may I drink of wine or ale,
 Whoso now rebels against my judgment 835
 Shall pay for all that by the way is spent.
 Now let's draw straws, and then we shall depart;
 Whoever has the shortest straw will start.
 Sir Knight, my master and my lord," he said,
 "Now you draw first, for thus I have decided. 840
 Come near," said he, "my lady Prioress.
 And you, sir Clerk, leave off your bashfulness.
 Don't study now. Lay hands to, every man!"
 At once, to draw straws, everyone began;
 To quickly tell the way it did advance, 845
 Were it by fortune or by luck or chance,
 The truth is this: the draw fell to the Knight,
 For which we were quite glad, as it was right;
 By agreement and arrangement, now he must Tell us his tale, as it was only just, 850
 As you have heard; what more words need be spent?
 And when this good man saw the way it went,
 Because he wise was, and obedient
 To keep the word he gave by free assent,
 He said, "Now, since I shall begin the game, 855
 What, welcome is this straw, in the Lord's name!

7. A spring dedicated to St. Thomas (not far from the inn).

8. I.e., if your intention at night matches what you promised in the morning.

Now, let us ride, and hearken what I say."
 And with that word, we rode forth on our way,
 And he began with then a merry cheer
 His tale at once, and said as you may hear.

860

The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale

The Wife of Bath's Prologue

"Experience, though no authority
 Were in this world, is right enough for me
 To speak of the woe that is in marriage;
 For, my lords, since I was twelve years of age,<sup>1</sup>
 Thanks be to God, eternally alive, 5
 Husbands at the church door, I have had five—
 If quite so often I might wedded be—
 And all were worthy men in their degree.
 But it was told me not so long ago,<sup>2</sup>
 That since just once our Christ did ever go 10
 To a wedding, in Cana in Galilee,<sup>3</sup>
 That by that same example, he taught me
 That only one time I should wedded be.
 Lo, listen, what a sharp word then spoke he,
 Beside a well when Jesus, God and man, 15
 Spoke in reproof of the Samaritan:<sup>4</sup>
 "Thou hast had five husbands,' then said he,
 'And that same man here who now hath thee
 Is not thy husband,' said he by the well.
 But what he meant thereby, I cannot tell; 20
 Except I ask, why is it the fifth man
 Was not husband to the Samaritan?
 How many might she have in marriage?
 Yet I've never heard tell, in all my age,
 About this, any number definite. 25
 Up and down, men gloss<sup>5</sup> and guess about it,
 But well I know, expressly, it's no lie,
 That God bade us to wax and multiply;<sup>6</sup>
 This gentle text, I can well understand.
 Also, well I know, he said my husband 30
 Should leave mother and father and cleave to me.<sup>7</sup>
 But of no number a mention made he,
 Of bigamy, or of octogamy;<sup>8</sup>
 Why then should men speak of it villainy?

1. The minimum age of marriage, in canon law.

2. Many of the biblical sources cited by the Wife of Bath in the argument that follows can be found in St. Jerome's Adversus Jovinianum (392 C.E.), a polemical diatribe that is highly critical of both women and marriage.

3. See John 2.2.

4. A woman from Samaria (see John 4.7–18).

5. Interpret.

6. Genesis 1.28.

7. Genesis 2.24.

8. Marriage to two or to eight. Usually, bigamy involves concurrent marriages (as below, in references to biblical figures), but the Wife of Bath often instead means consecutive marriages.

Lo, here is the wise king, Don<sup>9</sup> Solomon; 35
 I think he had some wives, well more than one.
 Now would to God it lawful were for me
 To be refreshed here half so much as he!
 A gift from God had he with all his wives!
 No man has such a gift who's now alive. 40
 This noble king, God knows, as I would judge it,
 That first night had many a merry fit
 With each of them, so well was he alive.
 Blessèd be God that I have wedded five!
 Of whom I have picked out the very best, 45
 For both their nether purse<sup>1</sup> and money chest.
 Different schools can turn out perfect clerks,
 And different practices in sundry works
 Make the workman perfect, it's no lie;
 From my five husbands, studying am I. 50
 Welcome the sixth, when he shall come along.
 In truth, I won't keep chaste for very long.
 And when my husband from this world has passed,
 Another Christian man will wed me fast;
 Then the apostle<sup>2</sup> says that I am free 55
 To wed, by God, where it most pleases me.
 He says to be wedded is not sinning;
 Better to be wedded than be burning.
 What do I care if folks speak villainy
 About accursed Lamech's bigamy?<sup>3</sup> 60
 Abraham was a holy man, I know;
 And as I understand it, Jacob also;
 And each of them had wives now, more than one,
 As many other holy men have done.
 Where, can you say, in any kind of age, 65
 That our high God has forbidden marriage
 Expressly, in a word? I pray, tell me.
 Or where did he command virginity?
 I know as well as you, or else you should,
 The apostle, when he speaks of maidenhood, 70
 Said that a precept for it he had none.<sup>4</sup>
 Men may counsel a woman to be one,
 But counseling does not make a commandment.
 All of it he left to our own judgment;
 For if our God commanded maidenhood, 75
 Then wedding with the deed, he'd damn for good.
 And surely, if no seed were ever sown,
 From what, then, would virginity be grown?
 And at the least, Paul never dared demand

9. Master. The biblical king Solomon was proverbially renowned for his great wisdom and for his hundreds of wives and concubines (see 1 Kings 11.3).

1. I.e., scrotum.

2. St. Paul; see 1. Corinthians 7.39, 9.

3. See Genesis 4.19. Lamech (cursed as a murderer) is the first man in the Bible said to have had more than one wife (or a wife and a concubine) at the same time, but he was hardly the last, as the Wife of Bath points out.

4. 1 Corinthians 7.25.

A thing that his own Master won't command. 80
 The prize is set up for virginity;
 Catch it who may; who runs the best, let's see.
 To everyone, this word does not apply,
 But only where God's might wants it to lie.
 I know the apostle was a virgin; 85
 Nonetheless, although he wrote and said then
 He wished that everyone was such as he,
 This is but counsel to virginity.<sup>5</sup>
 He gave me leave to be a wife, all the same,
 With his permission, so it is no shame, 90
 If my mate dies, to go then and wed me,
 Without objections about bigamy.
 Though it may be good not to touch women<sup>6</sup>—
 In his bed or on his couch, he meant then—
 Fire and flax together make peril so— 95
 What this example resembles, you all know.
 The sum is this: he held virginity
 More perfect than to wed from frailty.
 Frailty I call it, unless he and she Wished to lead all their lives in chastity. 100
 I grant it well that I have no envy,
 Though maidenhood's preferred to bigamy.
 To be clean pleases them, body and spirit;
 Of my state, I make no boast about it,
 For you well know, a lord in his household, 105
 He has not every vessel made of gold;<sup>7</sup>
 Some come from wood, and serve their lord withal.
 In sundry ways, folks to him God does call,
 Each has God's special gift while he must live,
 Some this, some that, it pleases God to give.<sup>8</sup> 110
 Virginity thus is great perfection,
 And also continence spurred by devotion,
 But Christ, who of perfection is the well,
 Bade not that every person should go sell
 All that he has and give it to the poor, 115
 And follow in his footsteps thus, for sure.
 He spoke to those who would live perfectly,<sup>9</sup>
 And my lords, by your leave, that is not me.
 I will bestow the flower of my life
 In married acts and fruits, and be a wife. 120
 Tell me, for what purpose and conclusion
 Were the members<sup>1</sup> made for generation,
 And by so perfectly wise a maker wrought?
 Trust it well now: they were not made for nought.
 Say what you will, or hedge it by glossing, 125
 That they were made simply for the purging

5. 1 Corinthians 7.8.

6. 1 Corinthians 7.1.

7. See 2 Timothy 2.20.

8. See 1 Corinthians 7.7.

9. See Matthew 19.21.

1. I.e., sexual organs.

Of urine; and both our small things also
 Were made so male from female we could know,
 And for no other cause—do you say no?
 Experience well knows it is not so. 130
 So the clerks will not be angry at me,
 They were made for both: I say this truly.
 That is, to do our business and for ease
 In engendering, where God we don't displease.
 Why should men otherwise in their books set 135
 It down that man should yield his wife her debt?<sup>2</sup>
 Now how to her should he make his payment,
 Unless he'd used his silly<sup>3</sup> instrument?
 Thus, they were bestowed upon a creature
 To purge urine, and so we could engender. 140
 But I don't say that each one's obligated,
 Who has the harness that I've just related,
 To go and use it for engendering.
 Then for chastity, men wouldn't care a thing.
 Christ was a maiden and shaped like a man, 145
 And many saints, since first the world began;
 They lived forever in perfect chastity.
 I won't envy any virginity.
 Let them be bread of wheat that's been refined,
 As barley bread, let us wives be defined; 150
 And yet, with barley bread, as Mark can tell,
 Our Lord has refreshed many men quite well.<sup>4</sup>
 In whatever rank God's called to us,
 I'll persevere; I'm not fastidious.
 In wifehood, I will use my instrument 155
 As freely as my Maker has it sent.
 If I'm aloof, then God send me dismay!
 My husband can well have it, night and day,
 When it pleases him to come and pay his debt.
 A husband I will have—I won't stop yet— 160
 Who shall be both my debtor and my slave,
 With tribulation, unless he behaves,
 Upon his flesh while I may be his wife.
 I have the power, during all my life
 Over his own body, and not he. 165
 Thus the Apostle has told this to me,
 And bade our husbands they should love us well.<sup>5</sup>
 This meaning, I like more than I can tell"—
 Up the Pardoner starts, immediately;
 "Now, Madame, by God and Saint John," said he, 170
 "You are a noble preacher on this strife.
 Alas! I was about to wed a wife.
 Why on my flesh now pay a price so dear?

2. The marital debt, mutually owed; see 1 Corinthians 7.3–4.

3. Innocent.

4. See not Mark but John 6.9–13.

5. Ephesians 5.25.

I'd rather not wed any wife this year!"

"Just wait! My tale is not begun," said she.

175

"No, you'll drink from another cask, you'll see,

Before I go, that will taste worse than ale.

And when I will have told you all my tale

Of the tribulation that's in marriage—

About which I'm an expert in my age—

180

That is to say that I have been the whip—

Then you can choose if you might want to sip

Out of the cask that I will open here.

Beware of it, before you come too near;

For I shall give examples, more than ten.

185

'Whoever won't be warned by other men,

By him will other men corrected be.'

Those same words were written by Ptolemy;<sup>6</sup>

Read his Almageste, and there you'll find it still."

"Madame, I pray you, if it be your will," 190

Said this Pardoner, "now as you began,

Tell forth your tale, and don't spare any man;

Teach us young men all about your practice."

"Gladly," said she, "since you might well like this;

But yet I pray to all this company,

195

If I speak after my own fantasy,

Do not be aggrieved by what I say,

For my intent is only now to play.

And now, sir, now I'll tell on with my tale.

As ever I might drink of wine or ale,

200

I'll tell the truth; those husbands that I had,

Some three of them were good, and two were bad.

The three who were good men were rich and old;

And so they barely could the statute hold

Through which they all had bound themselves to me.

205

By God, you know what I mean, certainly!

So help me God, I laugh to remember

How pitifully at night I made them labor!

In faith, I set no store by their pleasure.

To me, they had given land and treasure;

210

No longer need I use my diligence

To win their love or do them reverence.

They loved me so well that, by God above,

I set no value then upon their love!

A wise woman will be the busy one 215

To get herself love, yes, where she has none.

But since I had them wholly in my hand,

And since to me they'd given all their land,

Why should I take care that I should them please

Unless it were for my profit and my ease?

220

6. Greek astronomer and mathematician (2nd century C.E.); his textbook, the Almagest, dominated astronomy for more than a thousand years; a preface containing proverbial wisdom attributed to Ptolemy was later added to the text.

I set them so to hard work, by my lights,
 That they sung “Wey-la-way!” on many nights.
 I don’t think the bacon was meant for them now
 That some men win in Essex at Dunmowe.<sup>7</sup>
 I governed them so well, after my law, 225
 That each of them was eager, as I saw,
 To bring me home some gay things from the fair.
 They were glad when my speech to them was fair;
 I scolded them, as God knows, spitefully.
 Now, listen how I acted properly, 230
 You wise wives, who can so well understand.
 Thus should you accuse falsely, out of hand.
 For half so boldly knows no living man
 How to swear and lie just as a woman can.
 This statement about wise wives, I don’t make— 235
 Unless it be when they’ve made some mistake.
 A wise wife, who knows what’s good for her,
 Will swear the tattling crow is mad for sure,<sup>8</sup>
 And make sure that her maid has assented
 As her witness. But hear now what I said: 240 ‘Sir old dotard, is this your array?
 Why is it that my neighbor’s wife’s so gay?
 She is honored everywhere she goes;
 I sit at home; I have no decent clothes.
 What do you do at my neighbor’s house there? 245
 Are you so amorous? Is she so fair?
 What do you whisper to our maid? Bless me!
 Sir old lecher, now let your jokes be!
 If, without guilt, I have a chum or friend,
 Just like a fiend, you scold me without end 250
 If I should play or walk down to his house!
 But you come home as drunken as a mouse,
 And then preach from your bench, no proof from you!
 And it’s great mischief, as you tell me too,
 A poor woman to wed, for the expense; 255
 If she’s rich and born to lofty parents,
 Then you say that a torment it will be
 To bear her pride and sullen melancholy.
 And if she should be fair, you horrid cur,
 You say every lecher soon will have her; 260
 For she can’t long in chastity abide,
 Who is always assailed on every side.
 You say some folk want us for our richness,
 Some for our figure, and some for our fairness,
 Some because she can either dance or sing, 265
 Some for gentility and socializing;

7. A village ca. 35 miles northeast of London. In the 13th century, the custom began of awarding a side of bacon to the couple who swore not to have quarreled or regretted their marriage during the first year after their wedding.

8. The talking bird who reveals a wife’s infidelity by repeating words it has heard is a common motif in folktales.

And some because their hands and arms are small;
 By your lights, to the devil thus goes all.
 You say men cannot defend a castle wall
 When it's so long assailed by large and small. 270

And if she should be ugly, you say she Will covet every man that she may see,
 For like a spaniel, she will on him leap
 Until she finds a man to buy her cheap.
 No goose goes out there on the lake so gray 275
 That she will be without a mate, you say.
 You say it's hard for men to have controlled
 A thing that no man willingly would hold.
 Thus you say, scoundrel, when you go to bed,
 That no wise man has any need to wed, 280
 Nor one who toward heaven would aspire.
 With wild thunder claps and lightning's fire
 May your old withered neck break right in two!

You say that leaky houses, and smoke too,
 And scolding wives all cause a man to flee 285
 Out of his own house; ah now, God bless me!
 What can ail such an old man, who must chide?
 You say that we wives will our vices hide
 Till we're hitched, and then we show them to you—
 Well may that be the proverb of a shrew! 290

You say horses, hounds, asses, and oxen
 At different times can be tried out by men;
 Wash bowls and basins, spoons and stools, you say,
 All household things men try before they pay;
 The same thing goes for clothes and gear and pots; 295
 But to try out a wife, a man may not Till they are wedded—you old dotard shrew!—
 And then we show our vices, so say you.

You say also that it displeases me
 Unless you will always praise my beauty, 300
 Or else always pore over my face,
 And call me "Fair Madame" in every place.
 Unless you make a feast upon the day
 That I was born, and dress me fresh and gay;
 Unless to my nurse, you do all honor, 305
 And to the chambermaid within my bower,<sup>9</sup>
 And to my father's folk and kin all day—
 Old barrellful of lies, all this you say!

Yet of Jenkin, who is our apprentice,
 Whose curly hair shines just like gold—for this, 310
 And because he will squire me around,
 A cause for false suspicions, you have found.
 I don't want him, though you should die tomorrow!

Tell me: why do you hide, to my sorrow,
 The keys now of your chest<sup>1</sup> away from me? 315

9. Bedroom.

1. Strongbox.

They are my goods as well as yours, bless me!
 Will you make an idiot of your dame?
 Now, by that good lord who is called Saint James,
 You will not, though it might make you crazy,
 Be master of both my goods and body; 320
 One of them you'll forgo, to spite your eyes.
 What good is it to ask around and spy?
 I think you want to lock me in your chest!
 You should say, "Wife, go where you think is best;
 Enjoy yourself; I'll believe no tales of this. 325
 I know you for my own true wife, Dame Alice."
 We love no man who will take heed or charge
 Of where we go; we want to be at large.

And of all men, quite blessèd must he be,
 That wise astrologer, Don Ptolemy, 330
 Who says this proverb in his Almageste,
 "Of all men, his wisdom is the highest Who never cares who holds the world in hand."
 By this proverb, you should well understand,
 If you have enough, why then should you care 335
 How merrily some other folks might fare?
 For certainly, old dotard, by your leave,
 You'll have some quaint things sure enough come eve.
 He is too great a niggard who would spurn
 A man to light a candle at his lantern; 340
 By God, from that, he doesn't have less light.
 If you've enough, complaining isn't right.

You also say if we make ourselves gay
 With our clothing and with precious array,
 That it is peril to our chastity; 345
 Woe to you—you then enforce it for me,
 And say these words in the Apostle's name:
 "In clothing made from chastity and shame
 You women all should dress yourselves," said he,
 "Not with well-coifed hair and with gay jewelry, 350
 Not with rich clothes, with pearls, or else with gold."<sup>2</sup>
 With your text and your rubric,<sup>3</sup> I don't hold,
 Or follow them as much as would a gnat.

You said this: that I was just like a cat;
 Whoever wanted to singe a cat's skin 355
 He could be sure the cat would then stay in;
 And if the cat's skin were so sleek and gay,
 She'd not stay in the house for half a day;
 Forth she'd go, before the day was dawning,
 To show her skin and to go caterwauling. 360
 That is to say, if I am gay, sir shrew,
 I'll run to put my poor old clothes on view.

Sir old fool, what help is it if you spy?

2. See I Timothy 2.9–10.

3. Direction written in red.

Though you prayed Argus<sup>4</sup> with his hundred eyes
 To be my bodyguard, as he'd know best, 365
 He'd not guard me till I let him, I'll be blessed.
 I'd hoodwink him, as I am prospering!

Yet you also say that there are three things,
 And that these same things trouble all this earth,
 And that no man might yet endure the fourth.<sup>5</sup> 370
 Oh, dear sir shrew, Jesus shorten your life!
 Yet you will preach and say a hateful wife
 Is one of these misfortunes that you reckon.
 Aren't there other kinds of comparison
 That, for all your parables, you could use, 375
 Unless a poor wife were the one you'd choose?

You liken, too, a woman's love to hell,
 To barren land where water may not dwell.
 You liken it also to a wild fire;
 The more it burns, the more it has desire 380
 To consume everything that burned will be.
 You say that just as worms destroy a tree,
 A wife destroys her husband, you have found;
 This, they well know who to wives have been bound.'

My lords, right thus, as you can understand, 385
 I stiffly<sup>6</sup> kept my old husbands in hand
 And swore they said thus in their drunkenness;
 And all was false; except I took witness
 On Jenkin there, and on my niece, also.
 Oh Lord! The pain I did them and the woe. 390
 And, by God's sweet pain, they were not guilty!
 For, like a horse, I could bite and whinny.
 I knew how to complain well even when I had the guilt, or I'd been ruined then.
 Whoever comes first to the mill, first grinds; 395
 Complaining first, our war stopped, I did find.
 They were glad to excuse themselves quite quickly
 For things of which they never had been guilty.
 Of wenches, I'd accuse them out of hand
 When, in their sickness, they could hardly stand. 400

Yet it tickled his heart, because then he Thought that I had for him such great fancy!
 I swore that all my walking out at night
 Was to spy on wenches he was holding tight;
 Using that cover, I enjoyed much mirth. 405
 For all such wit is given us at birth;
 Deceit, weeping, and spinning God did give
 To women by nature, all the time they live.
 And thus of one thing, I can surely boast:
 In the end, I'm the one who won the most 410

4. In classical myth, a monster used by Hera/Juno, queen of the gods, to watch over one of her husband's paramours.

5. See Proverbs 30.21–23.

6. Firmly.

By tricks or force or by some other thing
 As much as constant grumbling and grousing.
 Namely, then, they would have bad luck in bed:
 I did them no pleasure, and I chided;
 I would no longer in the bed abide, 415
 If I felt his arm come over my side,
 Till he had paid his ransom down to me;
 Then I'd suffer him to do his foolery.
 Therefore, to every man this tale I tell:
 Win whoso may, for all is there to sell; 420
 With empty hands men may no hawks then lure.
 For profit, I would all their lust endure,
 And I would fake it with feigned appetite;
 And yet in bacon,<sup>7</sup> I had no delight.
 That was the reason I would always chide them, 425
 For though the pope were sitting right beside them,
 At their own table, I would never spare.
 In truth, I repaid them word for word there.
 So help me, oh true God omnipotent,
 If now I made my will and testament, 430
 There was not one unpaid word I did owe.
 By my own wit, I brought it all about so
 That they must give it up, and for the best,
 Or otherwise, we never would have rest;
 Though he looked as crazy as a lion, 435
 He would fail at gaining his conclusion.
 Then I would say to him, 'Sweetheart, take heed—
 See how meek our sheep Willie looks, indeed!
 Come near, my spouse, and let me kiss your cheek!
 Truly you should be all patient and meek, 440
 And have, too, a carefully spiced conscience,
 Since you always preach about Job's patience.<sup>8</sup>
 Suffer always, since you can so well preach;
 Unless you do, for sure we shall you teach
 That it's nice to have a wife in peace now. 445
 Doubtless, one of the two of us must bow,
 And so, since man is more reasonable
 Than woman, to suffer you are able.
 What ails you now that thus you grouse and groan?
 Do you just want my quaint thing<sup>9</sup> for your own? 450
 Why, take it all! Lo, have it through and through!
 You love it well, by Peter,<sup>1</sup> curse on you;
 For if I wanted to sell my belle chose,<sup>2</sup>
 Then I could walk as fresh as is a rose;
 But I will keep it just for your own tooth. 455
 You are to blame, by God! I tell the truth.'
 These are the kinds of words I had on hand.

7. I.e., preserved (old) meat; or perhaps a reference to the prize at Dunmow.

8. Proverbial; see the book of Job.

9. Genitals.

1. St. Peter.

2. Pretty thing (French).

And now I will speak of my fourth husband.

My fourth husband was a reveler—

That is to say, he had a paramour—

460

And young and full of wantonness was I,

Stubborn, strong and jolly as a magpie.

How I'd dance when the small harp was playing;

Like a nightingale's was all my singing,

When I had drunk my draught of fine sweet wine!

465

Metellius, the foul churl, the swine,

Who, with a staff, bereft his wife of life,

Because she drank wine,<sup>3</sup> if I were his wife,

He wouldn't frighten me away from drink!

And after wine, on Venus<sup>4</sup> I must think,

470

For just as sure as cold engenders hail,

A lecherous mouth must have lecherous tail.

In wine-drunk women, there is no defence—

This, lechers know from their experience.

But—Lord Christ!—when memories come back to me,

475

About my youth and all my jollity,

It tickles me right down to my heart's root.

To this day, it does my heart good, to boot,

That I have had my world right in my time.

But age, alas, that poisons what is prime,

480

Has bereft me of my beauty and my pith.<sup>5</sup>

Let it go. Farewell! The devil go therewith!

The flower's gone; there is no more to tell;

The bran, as I best can, now must I sell;

But yet to be right merry I have planned.

485

And now I will tell of my fourth husband.

I say, I had in my heart a great spite

That he in any other took delight.

By God and Saint Judocus,<sup>6</sup> he's repaid!

Of the same wood, a cross for him I made;

490

Not in a foul manner with my body,

But I made folks such cheer that certainly

I made him fry enough in his own grease

Because his jealous anger would not cease.

By God, on earth I was his purgatory,

495

For which, I hope his soul will be in glory.

God knows, he often sat and sang "Alack"

When his shoe so bitterly pinched him back.

There was no man who knew, save God and he,

In what ways I twisted him so sorely.

500

When I came from Jerusalem, he died;

Buried beneath the cross's beam,<sup>7</sup> he lies.

3. One of the historical anecdotes compiled in the rhetorical handbook by Valerius Maximus (1st century C.E.), which presents Metellius's act as justified.

4. Roman goddess of love.

5. Energy.

6. St. Judoc or Josse, a 7th-century Breton saint (never canonized) whose emblem was the pilgrim's staff.

7. I.e., in a place of honor within the church itself.

His tomb is not fancy or curious
 As was the sepulcher of Darius,
 Which Appelles had formed so skillfully;<sup>8</sup> 505
 A waste to bury him expensively.
 Let him fare well. God rest his soul, I ask it!
 He is now in his grave and in his casket.
 Now of my fifth husband I will tell.
 May God let his soul never go to hell! 510
 Yet to me he was the biggest scoundrel;
 On my whole row of ribs, I feel it still,
 And ever shall until my dying day.
 But in our bed, he was so fresh and gay,
 And he knew so well just how to gloss me 515
 When he wanted my belle chose, as you'll see;
 Although he'd beaten me on every bone,
 Quickly he'd win back my love for his own.
 I believe that I loved him best since he Could be standoffish with his love for me. 520
 We women have, and no lie this will be,
 In this matter, our own quaint<sup>9</sup> fantasy:
 Whatever thing won't lightly come our way,
 Then after it we'll cry and crave all day.
 Forbid us something, and that desire we; 525
 Press on us fast, and then we're sure to flee.
 With standoffishness, we spread out all our wares;
 Great crowds at market make the goods dear there,
 Too great a bargain isn't thought a prize;
 And this knows every woman who is wise. 530
 My fifth husband—now God his soul should bless—
 Whom I took for love and not for richness,
 Formerly, he was a clerk at Oxford,
 And had left school, and went back home to board
 With my close friend who in our town did dwell. 535
 God save her! Her name's Alison, as well.
 She knew both my heart and my privacy
 More than our parish priest did, so help me!
 With her, I shared my secrets one and all.
 For had my husband pissed upon a wall, 540
 Or done a thing that should have cost his life,
 To her and to another worthy wife,
 And to my niece, whom I did love so well,
 All of his secrets I'd be sure to tell.
 God knows too that I did this quite often 545
 So I made his face both red and hot then From shame itself. He blamed himself that he Had ever shared with me his privacy.

8. According to the (fictional) account in Walter of Châtillon's 12th-century Latin epic Alexandreis, the famous painter Apelles (4th c. B.C.E.) decorated the tomb of the Persian king Darius (d. 486 B.C.E.).

9. "Queynt," meaning "quaint" in the modern English sense and also a pun on the slang word for the female sex organ; the pun is especially likely coming a few lines after the last reference to Wife's "belle chose" (510).

And so it happened that one time in Lent—
 For often times to my close friend I went, 550
 Because I always did love being gay,
 And to walk out in March, April, and May,
 From house to house, and sundry tales to hear—
 Jenkin the clerk, Alison, my friend dear,
 And I myself, into the fields all went. 555
 My husband was at London all that Lent;
 More leisure for my playing, I then had,
 To see and to be seen (and I was glad)
 By lusty folks. Did I know where good grace
 Was destined to find me, or in what place? 560
 Therefore, I made all my visitations
 To vigils and also to processions,
 To preachings and to these pilgrimages,
 To miracle plays<sup>1</sup> and to marriages,
 And always wore my gowns of scarlet bright. 565
 Neither the worms nor moths nor any mites,
 On my soul's peril, had my gowns abused.
 Do you know why? Because they were well used.
 Now I'll tell you what happened then to me.
 I say that out into the fields walked we, 570
 Till truly, we had such a flirtation,
 This clerk and I, that I made due provision
 And spoke to him, and said to him how he,
 Were I a widow, should be wed to me.
 For certainly—and I'm not boasting here— 575
 I have not ever lacked provisions clear
 For marriage, or for such things, so to speak.
 I hold a mouse's heart not worth a leek
 Who's only got one hole where it can run,
 And if that fails, then everything is done. 580
 I made him think he had enchanted me—
 My mother taught me all that subtlety—
 And said I had dreamed this of him all night:
 As I lay on my back he'd slain me quite,
 And I dreamed full of blood then was my bed; 585
 'But yet I hope you'll do me good,' I said,
 'For blood betokens gold, as was taught me.'
 And all was false; I had no dream, you see,
 But I always followed my mother's lore,
 In this as well as other things before. 590
 But now, sirs, let's see what I shall say then.
 Aha! By God, I've got my tale again.
 When my fourth husband lay up on his bier,
 I wept quite long and made a sorry cheer,
 As wives must, for it is common usage. 595
 With my coverchief, I hid my visage,

1. Medieval dramas focused on the lives and acts of the saints or on events from the Bible (also called "mystery plays"); performed in the vernacular, they were extremely popular.

But since I was provided with my next mate,
I didn't weep much—this to you I'll state.

To church was my husband borne next morning
With the neighbors, who for him were mourning; 600
And there Jenkin, our clerk, was one of those.
So help me God, when I saw how he goes
Behind the bier, I thought he had a pair
Of legs and feet that were so clean and fair,
I gave him all my heart for him to hold. 605
He was, I think, just twenty winters old,
And I was forty, if I tell the truth;
But yet I always had a coltish tooth<sup>2</sup>
Gap toothed was I, and that became me well;
With Venus's seal<sup>3</sup> I'm printed, I can tell. 610
So help me God, I was a lusty one,
And fair and rich and young and well begun,
And truly, as my husbands all told me,
I had the best quoniam<sup>4</sup> there might be.
For certainly, I'm all Venerian 615
In feeling, and my heart is Martian.<sup>5</sup>
Venus gave me my love and lecherousness,
And Mars gave me my sturdy hardiness;
My ascendant sign's Taurus,<sup>6</sup> with Mars therein.
Alas! Alas! That ever love was sin! 620
I always followed my inclination
By virtue of my stars' constellation;
Thus I could not withdraw—I was made so—
My chamber of Venus from a good fellow.
Yet I have Mars's mark<sup>7</sup> upon my face, 625
And also in another private place.
For as God so wise is my salvation,
I have never loved in moderation,
But I always followed my appetite,
Should he be long or short or black or white; 630
I took no heed, so long as he liked me,
Of how poor he was, or of what degree.

What should I say, but at the month's end, he,
This pretty clerk, this Jenkin, so handy,<sup>8</sup>
Has wedded me with great solemnity, 635
And I gave him all the land and property
That ever had been given me before.
But after, I was made to rue that sore;
My desires he would not suffer to hear.
By God, he hit me once upon the ear, 640
Because, out of his book, a leaf I rent,

2. I.e., youthful appetites.

3. An alluring birthmark.

4. Literally, "whereas" (Latin): another slang form for female genitals.

5. Belonging to Mars, the Roman god of war.

6. Sign of the zodiac (April 21–May 20) in which Venus is dominant.

7. Probably a red birthmark.

8. Clever; courteous.

And from that stroke, my ear all deaf then went.
 But, like a lionness, I was stubborn,
 And with my tongue, I was a jangler<sup>9</sup> born,
 And I would walk around, as I once did, 645
 From house to house, although he did forbid;
 Because of this, quite often he would preach,
 And from old Roman stories, he would teach;
 How one Simplicius Gallus<sup>1</sup> left his wife,
 And her forsook for the rest of his life, 650
 Because one day, and for no reason more,
 Bareheaded she was looking out the door.
 Another Roman he told me by name,
 Who, since his wife was at a summer's game
 Without his knowledge, he then her forsook. 655
 And then he would into his Bible look
 For the proverb of Ecclesiasticus<sup>2</sup>
 Where he commands, and he does forbid thus:
 That man shall not suffer wife to roam about.
 Then would he say right thus, without a doubt: 660
 'Whoever builds his house up all from willow
 And pricks his blind horse over fields so fallow,
 And lets his wife go seeking shrines so hallowed,
 Is worthy to be hanging on the gallows!'
 But all for nought: I didn't give a straw 665
 For all his old proverbs or for his saws,
 Nor by him would I then corrected be.
 I hate him who my vices tells to me,
 And so do more of us, God knows, than me.
 This drove him mad about me, utterly; 670
 For I wouldn't bear with any of this.
 I'll tell you the truth now, by Saint Thomas,<sup>3</sup>
 Why once out of his book a leaf I rent,
 For which he hit me so that deaf I went.
 He had a book that, gladly, night and day, 675
 For his pleasure, he would be reading always;<sup>4</sup>
 It's called Valerius and Theophrastus;
 He always laughed as he read it to us.
 And also there was once a clerk at Rome,
 A cardinal, who was called Saint Jerome, 680
 Who made a book against Jovinian;

9. Chatterer.

1. This story and the next (lines 647–49) are found in Valerius Maximus.

2. See Ecclesiasticus 25.25–26.

3. Thomas Becket, to whose shrine the pilgrims are traveling.

4. This single anthology contains a number of works, all hostile or cast as hostile to women: Letter of Valerius Concerning Not Marrying, by Walter Map (12th century); Against Jovinian (a 4th-century monk), by the Church Father

Jerome (d. 420), which mentions a lost Golden Book of Marriage by the Greek philosopher Theophrastus (d. 285 B.C.E.) and writings by the Church Father Tertullian (d. ca. 220) and Crisippus (otherwise unknown); Trotula, a legendary 11th-century Italian female doctor; Heloise (d. 1164), a participant in a scandalous love affair who wrote that philosophers should never marry; the biblical book of Proverbs; and the Art of Love by Ovid (43 B.C.E.–17 C.E.), a how-to book on seduction.

In which book was also Tertullian,
 Crisippus, Trotula, and Heloise,
 An abbess near to Paris, if you please,
 And too the Parables of Solomon, 685
 Ovid's Ars, and more books, many a one,
 And all of these in one volume were bound,
 And every night and day, some time he found
 When he had some leisure and vacation
 From his other worldly occupation, 690
 To read then in this book of wicked wives.
 He knew of them more legends and more lives
 Then there are of good wives in the Bible.
 For trust it well, it is impossible
 For any clerk to speak some good of wives, 695
 Unless he speaks about holy saints' lives:
 This for no other women will he do.
 Now who painted the lion, tell me who?<sup>5</sup>
 By God, if women had written stories,
 Like clerks do within their oratories, 700
 They would have written of men more wickedness
 Than all the mark of Adam could redress.
 The children of Venus and Mercury<sup>6</sup>
 In their actions are always contrary;
 Mercury loves both wisdom and science; 705
 Venus, revelry and extravagance.
 Because of their different dispositions,
 Each falls in the other sign's exaltation.
 And thus, God knows, Mercury's despondent
 In Pisces,<sup>7</sup> when Venus is ascendant, 710
 And Venus falls where Mercury is raised.
 Therefore, no woman by a clerk is praised.
 The clerk, when he is old and may not do
 Of Venus's work what's worth his old shoe,
 Then he sits down and writes in his dotage 715
 That women cannot keep up their marriage!
 But now to my purpose, why I told you
 That I was beaten for a book, it's true!
 One night Jenkin, who was our lord and sire,
 Read in this book, as he sat by the fire, 720
 Of Eve first: because of her wickedness,
 All mankind was brought into wretchedness,
 And thus Jesus Christ himself was slain then,
 Who bought us with his own heart's blood again.
 Lo, here, expressly, of woman you find 725
 That woman was the loss of all mankind.
 He read to me how Samson lost his hair:

5. In one of Aesop's fables, a lion argues that the representation of a man killing a lion did not prove the man's superiority: if a lion could create an artwork, it would depict the opposite.

6. Winged messenger of the Roman gods, the god of commerce and trickery.

7. Sign of the zodiac (February 20–March 20).

His lover cut it while he did sleep there;
 And through this treason, he lost both his eyes.<sup>8</sup>
 And then he read to me, if I don't lie, 730
 About Dianyra and Hercules;<sup>9</sup>
 She made him set himself on fire, if you please.
 Nor forgot he the woe throughout his life
 That Socrates<sup>1</sup> endured from his two wives,
 How Xantippa cast piss upon his head. 735
 This foolish man sat still like he were dead;
 He wiped his head and no more dared say plain,
 But 'Before thunder stops, there comes the rain!'
 Of Pasiphaë, who was the queen of Crete,
 From evilness, the tale seemed to him sweet; 740
 Fie! Speak no more—it is a grisly thing—
 Of her lust and horrible desiring.<sup>2</sup>
 Of Clytemnestra, who, from lechery,
 Falsely made her husband die,<sup>3</sup> you see,
 He read out that tale with great devotion. 745
 He told me also on what occasion
 Amphiaras at Thebes had lost his life.<sup>4</sup>
 My husband had a legend of his wife,
 Eriphyle, who, for a brooch of gold
 Has privately unto the Greeks then told 750
 Where her husband had kept his hiding place,
 And thus at Thebes he suffered sorry grace.
 Of Livia and Lucia,<sup>5</sup> then heard I:
 How both of them had made their husbands die,
 The one for love, the other one for hate. 755
 This Livia, for sure, one evening late,
 Poisoned her husband for she was his foe;
 Lecherous Lucia loved her husband so
 That, to make sure he'd always on her think,
 She gave to him such a kind of love-drink 760
 He was dead before it was tomorrow;
 And thus, always, husbands have had sorrow.
 Then he told me how one Latumius Complained once to his fellow Arrius
 That in his garden there grew such a tree 765
 On which, he said, that all of his wives three

8. See Judges 13–16 for the story of Delilah and Samson, whose superhuman strength lay in his hair.

9. The greatest hero of classical mythology, who died because his wife unwittingly gave him a poisoned cloak. (Many of the following exempla are drawn from myth.)

1. The Greek philosopher (469–399 B.C.E.) immortalized in the dialogues of his pupil Plato; Xantippa is portrayed as a shrew in ancient biographies.

2. The union of Pasiphaë with a bull produced the Minotaur.

3. Conspiring with her lover, the queen of Mycenae murdered her husband, Agamemnon, when he returned from leading the Greeks in the Trojan War.

4. He was forced to join the war against Thebes, whose disastrous outcome he foresaw, by his wife, who had been bribed.

5. According to Jerome, Livia, who had a lover, deliberately poisoned her husband, Drusus (d. 23 C.E.), whose father later became the Roman emperor Tiberius, and Lucia (Lucilla) accidentally poisoned her husband, the poet Lucretius (d. 55 B.C.E.), with a love potion.

Hung themselves with spite, one then another.
 Said this Arrius, 'Beloved brother,
 Give me a shoot from off that blessèd tree,
 And in my garden, planted it will be.'<sup>6</sup> 770

And later on, about wives he has read,
 And some had slain their husbands in their bed,
 And let their lechers hump them all the night,
 While on the floor the corpses lay upright. 775

And some have driven nails into the brain,
 While they did sleep, and thus they had them slain.
 And some did give them poison in their drink.

He spoke more slander than the heart can think,
 And on top of it, he knew more proverbs
 Than in this world there can grow grass and herbs. 780

'Better,' he said, 'that your habitation
 Be either with a lion or foul dragon,
 Than with a woman who is used to chide.

Better,' said he, 'high on the roof abide,
 Than down in the house with an angry wife;<sup>7</sup> 785
 They're so wicked and contrary all their lives,
 That they hate what their husbands love always.'

He said, 'A woman casts her shame away,
 When she casts off her shift.' He spoke more so:
 'A fair woman, unless she's chaste also, 790
 Is just like a gold ring in a sow's nose.'<sup>8</sup>

Who would imagine, or who would suppose
 The woe that in my heart was, and the pain?

And when I saw he never would refrain
 From reading on this cursèd book all night, 795
 Then suddenly, three leaves I have ripped right Out of his book, as he read, and also

With my fist, I took him on the cheek so That backward in our fire, right down fell he.

He starts up like a lion who's gone crazy, 800
 And with his fist, he hit me on the head
 So on the floor I lay like I were dead.

And when he saw how still it was I lay,
 He was aghast, and would have fled away,
 Till, at last, out of my swoon I awoke. 805

'Oh! Hast thou slain me, false thief?' then I spoke,
 'And for my land, hast thou now murdered me?
 Before I'm dead, yet will I still kiss thee.'

And fairly he knelt down when he came near,
 And he said, 'Alison, my sister dear, 810
 Never more will I hit you, in God's name!
 If I've done so, you are yourself to blame.

I pray you, your forgiveness now I seek.'
 And right away, I hit him on the cheek,

6. A story told in the Letter of Valerius.

8. Proverbs 11.22.

7. Proverbs 21.9.

And said, "Thief, now this much avenged am I;
 I may no longer speak, now I will die."
 But then, at last, after much woe and care,
 We two fell into an agreement there,
 He gave me all the bridle in my hand
 To have the governing of house and land, 820
 And of his tongue, and of his hands, then, too;
 I made him burn his book without ado.
 And when I had then gotten back for me,
 By mastery, all the sovereignty,
 And when he said to me, "My own true wife,
 Do as you like the rest of all your life; 825
 Keep your honor, and keep my rank and state"—
 After that day, we never had debate.
 God help me so, there's no wife you would find
 From Denmark to India who was so kind, 830
 And also true, and so was he to me.
 I pray to God, who sits in majesty,
 To bless his soul with all his mercy dear.
 Now will I tell my tale, if you will hear."

Behold the words between the Summoner and the Friar.

The Friar laughed, when he had heard all this; 835
 "Madame," said he, "so have I joy or bliss,
 This is a long preamble to a tale!"
 The Summoner had heard his windy gale,
 "By God's two arms," the Summoner said, "lo!
 Always will a friar interfere so. 840
 Lo, good men, a fly and then a friar
 Will both fall in every dish and matter.
 Of preambulation, what's to say of it?
 What! Amble, trot, keep still, or just go sit!
 You're hindering our sport in this manner." 845
 "You say so, sir Summoner?" said the Friar;
 "Now, by my faith, I shall, before I go,
 Tell a tale of a summoner, you know,
 That all the folks will laugh at in this place."
 "Now, elsewise, Friar, I do curse your face," 850
 Said this Summoner. "And I curse myself, too, Unless I tell some tales, at least a few,
 Of friars before I come to Sittingbourne<sup>9</sup>
 So that, be sure, I will make your heart mourn.
 I know full well that you're out of patience." 855
 Our Host cried out, "Peace now! And that at once!"
 And he said, "Let the woman tell her tale.
 You act like folks who are all drunk on ale.
 Do, madame, tell your tale, and all the rest."
 "All ready, sir," said she, "as you think best, 860

9. A town on the road to Canterbury, 40 miles from London.

If I have license of this worthy Friar.”

“Yes, madame,” said he, “tell on. I will hear.”

Here the Wife of Bath ends her Prologue.

The Wife of Bath's Tale

Here begins the Tale of the Wife of Bath.

In the olden days of good King Arthur,
 Of whom Britons still speak with great honor,
 This whole land was all filled up with fairies. 865
 The elf queen, with her pretty company,
 Went dancing then through many a green mead.
 I think this was the old belief, indeed;
 I speak of many hundred years ago.
 But now no one sees elves and fairies go, 870
 For now all the charity and prayers
 Of limitors<sup>1</sup> and other holy friars,
 Who haunt through every land and every stream
 As thick as motes floating in a sun beam,
 Blessing halls and chambers, kitchens, bowers, 875
 Cities, boroughs, castles, and high towers,
 Barns and villages, cowsheds and dairies—
 This is the reason why there are no fairies.
 For there where once was wont to walk an elf,
 Now there the begging friar walks himself 880
 In the afternoons and in the mornings,
 He says his matins<sup>2</sup> and his holy things
 As he walks all throughout his begging grounds.
 Now women may go safely all around.
 In every bush and under every tree, 885
 There is no other incubus<sup>3</sup> but he,
 And he'll do them no harm but dishonor.
 So it happened that this good King Arthur
 Once had a lusty knight, a bachelor,
 Who, one day, came riding from the river, 890
 And it chanced that, as he was born, alone,
 He saw a maiden walking on her own,
 From which maid, then, no matter what she said,
 By very force, he took her maidenhead;
 This oppressive violence caused such clamor, 895
 And such a suit for justice to King Arthur
 That soon this knight was sentenced to be dead,
 By the course of law, and should have lost his head—
 By chance that was the law back long ago—

1. Friars licensed to beg in a specific territory.

2. I.e., morning prayers.

3. An evil spirit believed to have sex with women as they sleep.

Except the queen and other ladies also 900
 So long had then prayed to the king for grace
 Till he had granted his life in that place,
 And gave him to the queen, to do her will,
 To choose whether she would him save or kill.

The queen then thanked the king with all her might, 905
 And after this, thus spoke she to the knight,
 When, on a day, she saw that it was time.
 "You stand," she said, "in this state for your crime:
 That of your life, you've no security.
 I grant you life, if you can tell to me 910
 What thing it is that women most desire.
 Keep your neck-bone from the ax now, sire!
 And if, at once, the answer you don't know,
 Still, I will give you leave so you can go
 A twelvemonth and a day, to search and learn 915
 Sufficient answer before you return;
 Before you leave, I'll have security
 That here you'll surrender up your body."

Woe was this knight, and he sighs sorrowfully;
 But what! He can't do all he likes completely. 920
 And at last, he decided that he'd wend
 His way and come back home at the year's end,
 With such an answer as God would convey;
 He takes his leave and goes forth on his way.

He seeks in every house and every place 925
 Where he has hopes that he'll find some good grace
 To learn the thing that women love the most,
 But he could not arrive on any coast
 Where he might find out about this matter,
 Two creatures who agreed on it together. 930

Some said that all women best loved richness,
 Some said honor, and some said jolliness,
 Some, rich array, and some said lust in bed,
 And often times to be widowed and wed.

Some said that our hearts were most often eased 935
 When we could be both flattered and well pleased.
 He got quite near the truth, it seems to me.
 A man shall win us best with flattery,
 Solicitude, and eager busyness.
 Thus we are captured, both the more and less. 940

And some said that the best of all love we
 To do what pleases us, and to be free,
 And that no man reproves us for our folly,
 But says that we are wise and never silly. 945
 For truly, there is not one of us all,
 If any one will claw us where it galls,
 That we won't kick when what he says is true.
 Try, and he'll find it so who will so do;
 For, be we ever so vicious within,
 We want to be held wise and clean of sin. 950

And some say that we find it very sweet
 To be thought dependable and discreet,
 And in one purpose steadfastly to dwell,
 And not betray a thing that men us tell.
 A rake handle isn't worth that story. 955
 We women can't keep secrets, by God's glory;
 See Midas—will you hear the tale withal?<sup>4</sup>

Once Ovid, among some other things small,
 Said Midas covered up with his long hair,
 On his head two ass's ears that grew there, 960
 And this flaw he did hide as best he might Quite cleverly from every mortal's sight,
 So that, save for his wife, no one did know.
 He loved her most, and trusted her also;
 He prayed her that to no other creature 965
 She would tell how he was so disfigured.

She swore to him, "No"; all this world to win,
 She would not do that villainy or sin,
 To make her husband have so foul a name.
 She wouldn't tell because of her own shame. 970
 But, nonetheless, it seemed to her she died
 Because so long she must that secret hide;
 She thought it swelled so sorely near her heart
 That some word from her must, by needs, depart;
 Since she dared not tell it to any man, 975
 Down to the marsh that was nearby, she ran—
 Until she got there, her heart was on fire—
 And as a bittern<sup>5</sup> bellows in the mire, Down by the water, she did her mouth lay:
 "Thou water, with your sound do not betray: 980
 To thee I tell, and no one else," she said;
 "My husband has long ass ears on his head!
 Now is my heart all whole; now is it out.
 I could no longer keep it, without doubt."
 Here you see, if a time we might abide, 985
 Yet it must out; we can no secret hide.
 If of this tale you want to hear the rest,
 Read Ovid, and there you will learn it best.

This knight, about whom my tale is concerned,
 Seeing that the answer he'd not learned— 990
 That is to say, what women love the best—
 Sorrowful was the spirit in his breast.
 But home he goes; no more might he sojourn;
 The day had come when homeward he must turn.
 And on his way, it happened he did ride, 995
 With all his cares, near to a forest's side,
 Where he saw come together for a dance,
 Some four and twenty ladies there by chance;

4. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 11.172–93 (where Midas's secret is discovered by a servant, not by his wife).

5. A wading bird with a deep, booming call.

Toward which dance he eagerly did turn,
 In hopes some wisdom from them he might learn. 1000
 But truly, before he had arrived there,
 The dancing ladies vanished—who knew where.
 No creature saw he left there who bore life,
 Save on the green, he saw sitting a wife<sup>6</sup>—
 A fouler creature, none imagine might. 1005
 This old wife then arose to meet the knight.
 “Sir knight, there’s no road out of here,” said she.
 “What you are seeking, by your faith, tell me.
 Perhaps, then, you’ll be better prospering.”
 She said, “These old folks can know many things.” 1010 “Beloved mother,” said this knight, “it’s fate
 That I am dead unless I can relate
 What thing it is that women most desire.
 Could you tell me, I’d well repay your hire.”
     “Pledge me your troth,” said she, “here in my hand, 1015
 And swear to me the next thing I demand,
 You shall do it if it lies in your might,
 And I’ll tell you the answer before night.”
     “I grant,” he said, “you have this pledge from me.”
     “Then, sire, I dare well boast to you,” said she, 1020
 “Your life is safe, and I will stand thereby;
 Upon my life, the queen will say as I.
 Let see who is the proudest of them yet
 Who wears either a coverchief or hairnet
 Who dares say ‘Nay’ to what I will you teach. 1025
 Let us go forth without a longer speech.”
 Then she whispered a message in his ear,
 And bade him to be glad, and have no fear.
     When they came to the court, this knight did say
 That, as he’d pledged, he had held to his day, 1030
 And he said his answer was ready then.
 Many noble wives and many maidens
 And many widows, because wise are they,
 With the queen sitting as the judge that day,
 Were all assembled, his answer to hear; 1035
 And then this knight was told he should appear.
     It was commanded that there should be silence
 And that the knight should tell in audience
 The thing that worldly women love the best.
 The knight did not stand like a beast at rest; 1040
 At once to his question then he answered
 With manly voice, so all the court it heard:
     “My liege lady, generally,” said he,
 “Women desire to have sovereignty
 As well over their husbands as their loves, 1045
 And to be in mastery them above.
 This is your greatest desire, though me you kill.

6. A woman.

Do as you like; I am here at your will."

In all the court, there was no wife or maiden
Nor widow who denied what he had said then,
But they said he was worthy of his life.

1050

And with that word, then, up jumps the old wife,
Whom the knight had seen sitting on the green:
"Mercy," said she, "my sovereign lady queen!
Before your court departs, by me do right.

1055

I taught this very answer to this knight;
For which he pledged to me his troth and hire,
So that the first thing I'd of him require,
This he would do, if it lay in his might.

Before the court, then I pray you, sir knight,"
Said she, "that you now take me for your wife,
For well you know that I have saved your life.
Upon my faith, if I say false, say 'nay.' "

1060

This knight answered, "Alas, and well away!
I know that was my promise, I'll be blessed.
But for God's love now, choose a new request!
Take all my goods, and let my body go."

1065

"Oh no," said she, "I curse us both then so!
For though I may be foul and poor and old,
I'd not want all the metal, ore, or gold
That's buried in the earth or lies above,
Unless I were your lady and your love."

1070

"My love?" said he, "oh, no, my damnation!
Alas, that one of my birth and station Ever should so foully disparaged be!"

1075

But all for naught; the end is this, that he Constrained was here; by needs, he must her wed,
And take his old wife, and go off to bed.

Now here some men would want to say perhaps
That I take no care—so it is a lapse—

1080

To tell you all the joy and the array
That at the wedding feast was on that day:
To which, my answer here is short and small:
I say there was no joy or feast at all.

Only sorrow and heaviness, I say.

1085

For privately he wedded her next day,
And all day after, he hid like an owl,
For woe was he that his wife looked so foul.

Great was the woe the knight had in his thoughts,
When he was with his wife to their bed brought;
He wallows and he writhes there, to and fro.

1090

His old wife just lay smiling, even so,
And said, "Oh husband dear, God save my life!
Like you, does every knight fare with his wife?
Is this the law here in the house of Arthur?"

1095

Is each knight to his wife aloof with her?
I am your own love, and I am your wife;
And I am she who has just saved your life.
Surely, toward you I have done only right;

Why fare you thus with me on this first night? 1100
 You're faring like a man who's lost his wits,
 What's my guilt? For love of God, now tell it,
 And it will be amended if I may."

"Amended?" said this knight, "Alas! No way!
 It will not be amended, this I know. 1105

You are so loathly, and so old also,
 And come from such low lineage, no doubt,
 Small wonder that I wallow and writhe about.
 I would to God my heart burst in my breast!"

"Is this," said she, "the cause of your unrest?" 1110

"Yes," said he, "no wonder is, that's certain."

"Sir," said she, "I could mend this again,
 If I liked, before there'd passed days three,
 If you might now behave well toward me.

But since you speak now of such gentleness<sup>7</sup> 1115

As descends to you down from old richness,
 So that, because of it, you're gentle men,
 Such arrogance is just not worth a hen.

See who is most virtuous all their lives,
 In private and in public, and most strives 1120
 To always do what gentle deeds he can:

Now take him for the greatest gentle man.
 Christ wills we claim from him our gentleness,
 Not from our elders and from their old richness.

Though they leave us their worldly heritage, 1125

And we claim that we're from high lineage,
 Yet they may not bequeath a single thing
 To us here of their virtuous living,

Which is what made them be called gentle men;
 This is the path they bade us follow then. 1130

Well can he, the wise poet of Florence,
 Who's named Dante,<sup>8</sup> speak forth with this sentence.

Lo, Dante's tale is in this kind of rhyme:

'Seldom up his family tree's branches climbs
 A man's prowess, for God, in his goodness, 1135
 Wills that from him we claim our gentleness';

For, from our elders, we may no thing claim
 But temporal things that may hurt us and maim.

And every man knows this as well as me,
 If gentleness were planted naturally 1140

In a certain lineage down the line, yet
 They'd not cease in public or in private,
 From gentleness, to do their fair duty;
 They might not then do vice or villainy.

Take fire and bring it in the darkest house, 1145
 From here to mountains of the Caucasus,<sup>9</sup>

7. Gentility; nobility.

8. Dante Alighieri (1265–1321), Florentine poet whose Divine Comedy had a significant influence on Chaucer; the following lines echo Purgatorio 7.121–23.

9. The mountain range on the southwest border of Russia, between the Black and Caspian Seas.

And let men shut the doors and go return;
 Yet still the fire will lie as fair and burn
 Like twenty thousand men might it behold;
 Its natural duty it will always hold, 1150
 On my life, till extinguished it may be.

Here, may you well see how gentility
 Is not connected to one's possessions,
 Since folks don't follow its operation
 Always, as does the fire, lo, in its kind. 1155
 For, God knows it, men may well often find
 That a lord's son does shame and villainy;
 And he who wants praise for his gentility,
 Since a gentle house he was born into,
 And had elders full of noble virtue, 1160
 And who will not himself do gentle deeds,
 And dead gentle ancestors hardly heeds,
 He is not gentle, be he duke or earl;
 A villain's sinful deeds do make a churl.
 For such gentleness is only fame 1165
 From your elders' high goodness and their name,
 Which is a thing your person does not own.
 Your gentleness must come from God alone.
 Thus our true gentleness must come from grace;
 It's not a thing bequeathed us with our place. 1170

Think how noble, as says Valerius,
 Was this one Tullius Hostilius,<sup>1</sup> Nobility did poverty succeed.
 Read Seneca, and Boethius<sup>2</sup> read;
 There you shall see expressly that, indeed, 1175
 The man is gentle who does gentle deeds.
 And therefore, my dear husband, I conclude:
 Though my ancestors were humble and rude,
 Yet may the high God, and for this I pray,
 Grant me grace to live virtuously each day. 1180
 I am gentle, whenever I begin,
 To live virtuously and to waive sin.

You reproach me for poverty, indeed,
 High God above, on whom we base our creed,
 In willing poverty did live his life. 1185
 And certainly each man, maiden, or wife
 May understand that Jesus, heaven's king,
 Would not choose a vicious way of living.
 Glad poverty's an honest thing, it's true;
 Thus Seneca and other clerks say, too. 1190
 He who sees he's well paid by poverty,

1. Third king of Rome (7th century B.C.E.); according to legend, he began life as a herdsman.

2. Christian Roman philosopher (d. 474), whose Consolation of Philosophy, written in prison before his execution, was translated from Latin by Chaucer. Seneca the Younger (d. 65 C.E.), Roman Stoic moralist and dramatist who committed suicide by order of the emperor Nero.

Though he had no shirt, he seems rich to me.
 He is a poor man who can only covet,
 For he wants what he lacks power to get;
 He who has naught, and does not covet, too, 1195
 Is rich, though he a peasant seems to you.
 True poverty, it sings out properly;
 Now Juvenal<sup>3</sup> says of it merrily:
 "The poor man, when he should go by the way,
 Before the thieves, this man can sing and play." 1200
 Poverty is a hateful good, I guess,
 A great encouragement to busyness;
 Great improver of wisdom and good sense
 For him who can suffer it with patience.
 Poverty, though miserable seems its name, 1205
 Is a possession no one else will claim.
 Poverty often, when a man is low,
 Can make him both his God and himself know.
 Poverty's an eyeglass, it seems to me,
 Through which he might his good and true friends see. 1210
 And sire, now, if I don't grieve you, therefore For poverty don't blame me anymore.
     Now, sire, with old age you have reproached me;
 And truly, sire, though no authority
 Were in books, you gentlemen of honor 1215
 Say folks to an old man should show favor
 And call him father, in your gentleness;
 And I shall find authorities, I guess.
     Now, since you say that I am foul and old,
 You don't have to fear to be a cuckold; 1220
 For filth and age, so far as I can see,
 Are great wardens upon one's chastity.
 But, nonetheless, since I know your delight,
 I shall fulfill your worldly appetite.
     Choose now," said she, "of these things, one of two: 1225
 Till I die, to have me foul and old, too,
 And be to you a true and humble wife,
 And never displease you in all my life,
 Or else you can have now a fair, young thing,
 And take your chances with the visiting 1230
 That happens at your house because of me,
 Or in some other place, as well may be.
 Choose yourself whichever one will please you."
     This knight now ponders and sighs sorely, too,
 But finally, he said in this way here: 1235
 "My lady and my love and wife so dear,
 I put myself in your wise governing;
 Choose yourself which one may be most pleasing
 And most honor to both you and me too.
 I do not care now which one of the two; 1240

3. Roman poet (d. ca. 120 C.E.); the quotation is from Satire 10.22.

What pleases you suffices now for me.”

“Then have I got mastery from you,” said she,
“Since I may choose and govern all the rest?”

“Yes, truly, wife,” said he, “I think it best.”

“Kiss me,” said she, “we are no longer angry,

1245

For, by my troth,<sup>4</sup> to you I will both be—

Yes, now both fair and good, as will be plain.

I pray to God that I might die insane,

Unless to you I’m also good and true

As any wife’s been, since the world was new.

1250

Unless tomorrow I’m as fair to see

As any queen or empress or lady,

Who is between the east and then the west,

Do with my life and death as you think best.

Cast up the curtain; how it is, now see.”

1255

And when the knight saw all this verily,

That she now was so fair and so young, too,

For joy he seized her within his arms two,

His heart was all bathed in a bath of bliss.

A thousand times in a row, he did her kiss,

1260

And she obeyed him then in everything

That was to his pleasure or his liking.

And thus they both lived until their lives’ end

In perfect joy; and Jesus Christ us send,

Husbands meek and young and fresh in bed,

1265

And the grace to outlive those whom we wed;

I pray that Jesus may shorten the lives

Of those who won’t be governed by their wives;

And old and stingy niggards who won’t spend,

To them may God a pestilence soon send!

1270

4. I.e., “I swear.”

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Christine de Pizan, From The Book of the City of Ladies is not displayed because of permissions issues.

V

Medieval China

The “Middle” in the European “Middle Ages” signifies the time between the Roman Empire and the Renaissance, a transitional period that has often been seen as a time of relative intellectual and cultural stagnation. In the case of China the situation is quite the reverse. If we use Western period terms, the middle of a Chinese “Middle Age” would mean “central.” It is a period when Chinese thought and literature reached what many regard as their highest forms. During the medieval Period of Disunion (third through sixth centuries), a notoriously tumultuous age of political division, Buddhism, which had spread from India to China, took deep root in Chinese society, stimulating renewed interest in Daoist philosophy and the rise of religious Daoism. During the following two great medieval Chinese dynasties, the Tang and the Song (seventh through thirteenth centuries), classical Chinese poetry and prose reached an unprecedented height to which later ages would look back with awe and a sense that the achievements of its greatest writers could never be matched.

THE TANG DYNASTY

The long Tang Dynasty (618–907) was an age of cultural confidence and, initially, of expansion, as Tang armies pushed outward at every frontier. Particularly important was the expansion to the northwest and control of the trade routes to the west. Chang'an, an old capital now clothed in new splendor, mirrored the cosmopolitan empire it controlled. It was laid out on a grid pattern, with a mighty walled palace city at its north and two bustling markets to the south. The city teemed with foreigners, who came to the Chinese capital by the Central Asian land routes or the South Asian maritime trade routes as merchants, diplomatic envoys, pilgrims, monks, or adventurers. Nestorian Christians, Zoroastrians, Jews, and Arab merchants mingled with Japanese monks and Persian doctors. The people of Chang'an quickly adopted new hairstyles, new games such as polo, and new musical instruments, importing exotic melodies and dances from China's Central Asian "west."

---

A Southern Song Dynasty hand scroll, “Streams and Mountains Under Fresh Snow,” attributed to Liu Songnian, twelfth century.

The Tang was an age of innovation. Tea became a major commercial crop, and its consumption spread from China to East Asia via monks who used it to stay awake during long hours of meditation and sutra recitation. New Buddhist schools appeared, such as Chan (better known in its Japanese form, "Zen"), an iconoclastic form of Buddhism that espoused mind-to-mind transmission of truth, claiming that the study of scriptures was of no use.

The most influential invention during the Tang Dynasty was printing. A printed copy of the Buddhist Diamond Sutra, dated 868, is considered the world's oldest printed book. Sealed in a cave in remote Dunhuang, a Silk Road oasis in northwest China some 1100 miles from Chang'an, it was discovered by archaeologists in the early twentieth century.

The Tang period is most famous for its poetry. The civil service examination used by the Tang in recruiting its elites for government service came to require the composition of poetry, and it also became an integral part of social life—a medium of social exchange. In few other places in the world has lyric poetry ever enjoyed such centrality, and a number of major poets emerged whose works have made them renowned in China to this day. A great poem might deal with large philosophical issues, but it was just as likely to describe a meeting with an old friend. Poetry was seen as a way to record both an individual's personality and a country's historic moments. The writings of Wang Wei, Li Bo, and Du Fu came to exemplify poetic perfection, in different styles.

In the 750s, the confidence of the Tang Dynasty was broken during the reign of one its most splendid emperors, Xuanzong. Xuanzong gave military governors in frontier regions great powers, hoping thereby to strengthen the defense of the empire. An able administrator, patron of the arts, and even scholar in his own right—he wrote a commentary on Laozi and set up a school for examinations in Daoist scriptures—Xuanzong was greatly devoted to a concubine of lower status, Yang Guifei (or "Prized Consort Yang"), whose family increasingly began to occupy strategic official positions. An Lushan, an associate of Yang's kinsmen, rebelled in 755, took Chang'an, and put the emperor to flight. Threatened by his own armies, Xuanzong was forced to witness the execution of his beloved concubine. Although the rebellion was soon put down, the dynasty never quite regained its former authority.

TANG POETRY

The poetry of the Tang Dynasty is generally considered the high point of China's three-millennia-old history of poetry. Much compelling verse was written after the period, not least Women under the Tang Dynasty were riding horses and even playing polo. This painting, inspired by a painting by Zhang Xuan, a court painter flourishing during the reign of Emperor Xuanzong, presumably depicts an outing of court women led by Lady Guo Guo. She was a sister of the emperor's beloved Prized Consort Yang.

because the poetic giants of the Tang inspired later poets to write with self-conscious sophistication and skill. But later poets generally agreed that Du Fu, Li Bo, and their contemporaries had set a standard that could not be surpassed. For many centuries the elegant urgency and technical virtuosity with which these poets captured the world, as well as the scope of their poetic visions and themes, formed the basis for later poetic training and inspiration. The primacy of Tang poetry in the Chinese poetic canon continued until the early twentieth century, when Chinese intellectuals launched a revolutionary movement to replace the classical written idiom with vernacular spoken language. Today traditional poetry is popular once again, and the accomplishments of the Tang poets remain the high-water mark of what poetry can do.

Every educated Chinese during the Tang Dynasty was expected to be able to spontaneously dash off a poem with grace, or at least technical competence. Poetry was a form of social communication, not an arcane and highbrow art. The sheer mass of Tang poems still extant—close to 50,000, by some 2,200 authors—clearly indicates how common poetry was in everyday life. Many of those whose poems survived spent their lives in some official government position, after taking the civil service examination that qualified them for office. Whenever these scholar-officials were sent to a new post in the vast territory of the Tang Empire they would take leave from their colleagues and friends with a “farewell” poem and expect a poetic gift in return. In their new province, they would make friends by going on pleasure excursions or visiting temples and invariably writing poems about their journeys. They could also write poems to praise the imperial court or to criticize its policies. Poetry thus was a cultural custom, a craft that taught people how to pay attention to and share the significant moments in their lives—to find something lovely in a scene; to convey feelings about separation and friendship, painful and pleasurable events; to thank a host for a splendid evening party; or simply to express what would otherwise be awkward or impossible to say. Though the practice of writing poetry was general, only some thirty or forty truly talented poets achieved renown as artists of the highest caliber. Yet some otherwise undistinguished writers produced a remarkable number of fine poems that would be read and memorized for the next thousand years.

THE ORIGIN OF TANG POETRY

Chinese literature began with the folk songs and ritual ballads about historical events preserved in the Classic of Poetry (ca. 1000–600 B.C.E.). Most of the poems in that collection have stanzas of four to six lines containing four to six characters each, with end rhymes for every couplet. During the Han Dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.), about half a millennium after the compilation of the Classic of Poetry, a new genre of poetry emerged. Written in lines of five or seven characters and displaying a much more melodious and flexible rhythm, it became the basis for Tang poetry. During the century preceding the Tang Dynasty, poets began to experiment with introducing tonal patterns into their poems. Although variations in tone are common in many languages, including English, they are usually associated with sentence patterns. Chinese differs in attaching tones to individual syllables. Poets started to arrange the tones of each syllable of the poem—in modern Mandarin Chinese, a syllable can be pronounced in one of four different tones—in symmetrical patterns. This innovation led to the birth of so-called regulated poetry, a verse form that requires syllables to alternate “level” and “deflected” tones and demands training to master. The spread of Buddhism in the first half of the first millennium may have helped spark the development of regulated poetry. Chinese monks translating Sanskrit texts into Chinese must have been struck by the absence of tones in Sanskrit, and this new awareness of a defining feature of their own language perhaps inspired the introduction of rules mandating the alternation of tones in poetry. Whatever the reason, the emergence of regulated poetry (also called “recent-style” poetry, as earlier poetic forms such as those used by Tao Qian came to be called “old-style” poetry) radically changed the reading and writing of poetry. By imposing more rules on the game of poetry, it enabled readers to judge poetic craftsmanship more objectively.

Both the prominent place of poetry in social communication and everyday life and these new technical demands gave poetry an unprecedented status in Tang society. Poetry was introduced into the prestigious civil service examination; successful aspirants were awarded the “presented scholar” degree (jinshi), a prerequisite for a career as a government official. Although there were debates about whether the inclusion of poetry composition was appropriate for such exams, and was later abolished, the tight formal requirements of the regulated poem made it easier to judge and compare the candidates’ relative worth. Also, the candidates were forced to learn how to compose succinctly and eloquently. This skill would be useful in their later careers in government service, as they drafted many complex official documents.

REGULATED POETRY OF THE TANG

The two basic forms of regulated poetry are in four lines (jueju) and eight lines (lishi), although longer poems composed of several stanzas were also common. Regulated poetry placed a new emphasis on the couplet, a unit of two lines. For the ambitious Tang poet, couplets provided an opportunity to display virtuosity, as they provided a showcase for the parallelism required of the regulated poem. Consider Du Fu’s “Spring Prospect,” which describes the fall of the Tang capital to rebels in 755 and the destruction of the great Tang Empire against the backdrop of innocent spring:

The nation shattered, mountains and rivers remain;
city in spring, grass and trees burgeoning.
Feeling the times, blossoms draw tears;
hating separation, birds alarm the heart.
Beacon fires three months in succession,
a letter from home worth ten thousand in gold.
White hairs, fewer for the scratching,
soon too few to hold a hairpin up.

Let us examine how this five-syllable regulated poem reads in classical Chinese. Some of the rhymes and tones are hardly recognizable in the modern Mandarin pronunciation of the characters given here, but they did rhyme and tonally harmonize during the Tang Dynasty. “Level tones” are marked with a hyphen (–); “deflected tones,” with a straight line (|):

					FIRST COUPLET
國 破 山 河 在					(Chinese characters)
guó	pò	shān	hé	zài	(modern Mandarin pronunciation)
		–	–		(tonal pattern)
nation	shattered	mountain	river	remain	(word-for-word translation) 城 春 草 木 深
chéng	chūn	cǎo	mù	shēn <sup>(rhyme word)</sup>
–	–			–
city	spring	grass	tree	grow thick
感 時 花 濺 淚					SECOND COUPLET
gǎn	shí	huā	jiàn	lèi
	–	–
feel	time	blossom	shed	tear 恨 別 鳥 驚 心

hèn	bié	niǎo	jīng	xīn <sup>(rhyme word)</sup>
—			—	—
hate	separation	bird	alarm	heart
烽	火	連	三	月	THIRD COUPLET
fēng	huǒ	lián	sān	yuè
		—	—
beacon	fire	in succession	3	months
家	書	抵	萬	金
jiā	shū	dǐ	wàn	jīn <sup>(rhyme word)</sup>
—	—			—
home	letter	worth	10,000	gold
白	頭	搔	更	短	FOURTH COUPLET
bái	tóu	sāo	gèng	duǎn
—	—	—
white	head	scratch	even	shorter
渾	欲	不	勝	簪
hún	yù	bù	shēng	zān <sup>(rhyme word)</sup>
			—	—
simply	want	not	hold	hairpin

The poem consistently relies on parallelism as it poignantly contrasts the stability of the natural cycle with the abrupt changes brought about by the rebellion. In the first couplet the capital Chang'an is taken by rebel forces, the emperor has fled to Sichuan Province and abdicated, and the "nation is shattered," yet, perversely, we see the "city in spring," untouched by the disaster of historic proportion. In the second couplet, even blossoms and birds appear startled by the human tragedy. The third couplet shows the economic costs of the rebellion: the rebels have cordoned off the capital so tightly that letters have become almost priceless, smuggled in and out only at risk of one's life. The last couplet lacks precise parallelisms but ends with thematic resonances and shows the poet in despair: the hairpin no longer secures his official cap to his head, because he has become too old and the dynasty he wanted to serve has fallen on hard times.

Parallelism in Tang poetry functioned on many levels beyond the grammatical, including thematic parallelism and contrast between lines or in the poem as a whole. Thus Tang writings on poetry distinguish many types. The parallel couplet was the central device of regulated poetry, and during the Tang people would write out their favorite couplets in lavish calligraphy on little hanging scrolls, which they could carry when traveling. Indeed, Tang poets compiled entire anthologies containing only beautiful couplets excerpted from famous poems. The emphasis on fashioning beautiful couplets created a huge market for practical manuals that explained how to avoid violating the tonal rules and how to come up with an impressive parallel. This approach later drew criticism from poets who saw artistic ambition and inspiration, rather than craft and training, as the keys to good poetry. But the attraction of Tang poetry lies precisely in the felicitous match of craft with inspiration. It was solid training in the rules of regulated poetry that enabled Tang poets to capture their experience of the world in memorable words. The ultimate art of Tang poetry is that it often hides its artfulness under the serene surface of natural imagery.

---

LI BO

701–762

---

Although Li Bo (also known as Li Po and Li Bai) was raised in Sichuan in western China, speculations about his Turkic family background have enhanced his image as an exotic eccentric. Li Bo never attempted to take the civil service examination, which was the primary but not sole venue for advancement. Thanks to his connection with an influential Daoist at court, Li Bo gained a post at the eminent Hanlin Academy, an institution founded by Emperor Xuanzong to support unconventional intellectuals and literary talents. But Li Bo's drinking habits and unusual personality led to his dismissal only two years later. During the An Lushan Rebellion he joined the cause of a prince who attempted to establish an independent regime in southeast China, and after the rebellion was suppressed he was arrested for treason. Sentenced to exile, he was pardoned before he reached his remote destination; he died a few years later.

There are many legends about Li Bo's life, encouraged by the nonchalant poses projected in his poetry: according to one such legend, he drowned while trying to embrace the moon's reflection on the water. For someone who claimed in his poetry to converse and drink with the moon such an end was not implausible, though overindulgence in alcohol and Daoist longevity elixirs, which often contained mercury, might have played a role.

Much Tang poetry tends to treat the world at hand; Li Bo supplies an additional dimension by describing Daoist worlds beyond the world, evoking moments of history and legend, and even transforming everyday occasions into something miraculous. Because of his flair and capacity to see the world with fresh eyes, his contemporaries called him "the banished immortal"—an ethereal heaven-dwelling being exiled for a lifetime in the world of mortals as punishment for some extravagant misdemeanor.

Li Bo cultivated this reputation by writing poems that tell of encounters with immortals and of cloud-climbing excursions through the heavens.

Of the thousand-some poems by Li Bo that survive, many are written in the old verse form popular before the rise of regulated poetry during the Tang. Li Bo particularly liked to imitate folk songs and infuse his poetry with colloquial and bold language. In this way he could sometimes give voice to the common people's hardships: in "South of the Walls We Fought," for example, he echoes an older anonymous lament of soldiers fallen in battle, turning it into bitter criticism of the constant warfare of his time on the northern and northwestern frontier of Tang China against peoples such as the Tibetans.

Li Bo and Du Fu are considered the most important Tang poets, and readers and critics over the past millennium have devoted considerable effort to debating their relative merits and shortcomings. Quite apart from the greatness of their poetry, they made a particularly fitting couple, because they embody the two poles of poetic creativity that have been of greatest concern in the Chinese literary tradition: while Du Fu became the poet who captured, chronicled, and criticized reality within its limits, Li Bo came to stand for the poet who dedicated himself to breaking free from social convention and from the limits imposed by reality.

The Sun Rises and Sets<sup>1</sup>

The sun comes up from its nook in the east,
 Seems to rise from beneath the earth,
 Passes on through Heaven,
     sets once again in the western sea,
 And where, oh, where, can its team of six dragons ever find any rest? 5
 Its daily beginnings and endings, since ancient times never resting.
 And man is not made of its Primal Stuff—
     how can he linger beside it long? 10
 Plants feel no thanks for their flowering in spring's wind, Nor do trees hate losing their leaves
     under autumn skies:
 Who wields the whip that drives along four seasons of changes— 15
 The rise and the ending of all things is just the way things are.

Xihe! Xihe!<sup>2</sup>
 Why must you always drown yourself in those wild and reckless waves? 20
 What power had Luyang<sup>3</sup>

1. Translated by Stephen Owen.

2. Goddess who drove the sun's carriage.

3. According to legend, the lord of Luyang stopped the sun so that he could continue to fight in combat.

That he halted your course by shaking his spear?
 This perverts the Path of things, errs from Heaven's will—
 So many lies and deceits! 25
 I'll wrap this Mighty Mudball of a world
     all up in a bag
 And be wild and free like Chaos itself!

South of the Walls We Fought<sup>4</sup>

We fought last year at the Sanggan's source,
 this year we fight on the Cong River road.
 We washed weapons in the surf of Tiaozhi, grazed horses on grass in Sky Mountain's snow.<sup>5</sup> Thousands of miles ever marching and fighting: 5 until all the Grand Army grows frail and old.

The Xiongnu<sup>6</sup> treat slaughter as farmers treat plowing;
 since bygone days only white bones are seen in their fields of yellow sand.
 The House of Qin built the wall 10 to guard against the Turk;
 for the House of Han the beacon fires were blazing still.

Beacon fires blaze without ceasing,
 the marching and battle never end. 15
 They died in fighting on the steppes, their vanquished horses neigh,
     mourning to the sky.
 Kites and ravens peck men's guts, fly with them dangling from their beaks 20 and hang them high on boughs of barren trees.
 The troops lie mud-smeared in grasses,
 and the general acted all in vain.
 Now I truly see that weapons 25
     are evil's tools:
 the Sage will use them only when he cannot do otherwise.

4. Translated by Stephen Owen.

5. Four locations of Tang campaigns in the north and northwest.

6. Formidable enemies of the Han Empire (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.).

Bring in the Wine<sup>7</sup>

Look there!
 The waters of the Yellow River,
 coming down from Heaven,
 rush in their flow to the sea,
 never turn back again 5
 Look there!
 Bright in the mirrors of mighty halls
 a grieving for white hair,
 this morning blue-black strands of silk,
 now turned to snow with evening. 10
 For satisfaction in this life taste pleasure to the limit,
 And never let a goblet of gold face the bright moon empty.
 Heaven bred in me talents, 15 and they must be put to use.
 I toss away a thousand in gold,
 it comes right back to me.
 So boil a sheep,
 butcher an ox, 20
 make merry for a while,
 And when you sit yourself to drink, always down three hundred cups.
 Hey, Master Cen,
 Ho, Danqiu,<sup>8</sup> 25
 Bring in the wine!
 Keep the cups coming!
 And I, I'll sing you a song,
 You bend me your ears and listen—
 The bells and the drums, the tastiest morsels, 30
 it's not these that I love—
 All I want is to stay dead drunk and never sober up.
 The sages and worthies of ancient days
 now lie silent forever, 35
 And only the greatest drinkers have a fame that lingers on!
 Once long ago
 the prince of Chen held a party at Pingle Lodge.<sup>9</sup> 40
 A gallon of wine cost ten thousand cash,
 all the joy and laughter they pleased.
 So you, my host,
 How can you tell me you're short on cash?
 Go right out! 45

7. Translated by Stephen Owen.

8. Two friends of Li Bo.

9. The scene of merry parties described by the poet Cao Zhi (192–232), the brother of Cao Pi, the author of “A Discourse on Literature.”

Buy us some wine!
 And I'll do the pouring for you!
 Then take my dappled horse,
 Take my furs worth a fortune,
 Just call the boy to get them,
 and trade them for lovely wine,
 And here together we'll melt the sorrows of all eternity!

50

Question and Answer in the Mountains<sup>1</sup>

They ask me why I live in the green mountains.
 I smile and don't reply; my heart's at ease.
 Peach blossoms flow downstream, leaving no trace—
 And there are other earths and skies than these.

Summer Day in the Mountains<sup>2</sup>

Lazily waving a fan of white feathers,
 Stripped naked here in the green woods,
 I take off my headband, hang it on a cliff,
 My bare head splattered by wind through pines.

Drinking Alone with the Moon<sup>3</sup>

A pot of wine among the flowers.
 I drink alone, no friend with me.
 I raise my cup to invite the moon.
 He and my shadow and I make three.

The moon does not know how to drink;
 My shadow mimes my capering;
 But I'll make merry with them both—
 And soon enough it will be Spring.

5

I sing—the moon moves to and fro.
 I dance—my shadow leaps and sways.
 Still sober, we exchange our joys.
 Drunk—and we'll go our separate ways.

10

Let's pledge—beyond human ties—to be friends,
 And meet where the Silver River ends.

1. Translated by Vikram Seth.

2. Translated by Stephen Owen.

3. Translated by Vikram Seth.

The Hardships of Traveling the Road I<sup>4</sup>

Clear wine in golden goblets, at ten thousand a peck:
 Prized delicacies on jade plates, worth a myriad cash.
 But I stopped the cup, threw down the chopsticks, was unable to eat:
 I took out my sword, stared all around, my heart was blindly lost.
 I wanted to cross the Yellow River, but ice blocked the waterway: 5
 Was about to climb the Taihang range, but snow darkened the sky.
 At my ease I let fall a line, sitting by the side of a stream;
 Longed to be aboard ship again and dreamt of the realm of the sun.

The hardships of traveling the road—hardships of traveling the road:
 So many branching roads!—and where now am I? 10
 The long wind will smite the waves, and surely will come a time,
 To hang straight the cloudy sail and cross the gray-blue sea!

Seeing Off Meng Haoran at Yellow Crane Tower, on His Way to Guangling<sup>5</sup>

My old friend bids farewell in the west at Yellow Crane Tower.<sup>6</sup>
 Amid misty blossoms of the third month goes down to Yangzhou.
 His lone sail's far shadow vanishes in the deep-blue void.
 Now I see only the Long River flowing to the edge of the sky.

In the Quiet Night<sup>7</sup>

The floor before my bed is bright:
 Moonlight—like hoarfrost—in my room.
 I lift my head and watch the moon.
 I drop my head and think of home.

Sitting Alone by Jingting Mountain<sup>8</sup>

The flocks of birds have flown high and away,
 A solitary cloud goes off calmly alone.
 We look at each other and never get bored—
 Just me and Jingting Mountain.

4. Translated by Paul W. Kroll.

5. Translated by Paul W. Kroll.

6. A famous scenic spot in the southeastern city of Hangzhou.

7. Translated by Vikram Seth.

8. Translated by Stephen Owen.

A Song on Visiting Heaven's Crone Mountain in a Dream: On Parting<sup>9</sup>

Seafarers speak of that isle of Ying<sup>1</sup>— but in blurred expanses of breakers and mist it is hard indeed to find.

Yue men tell of Heaven's Crone,<sup>2</sup> appearing, then gone, it may be seen in the clouds and colored wisps.

5

Heaven's Crone reaches to sky and sideways runs to the sky, its force stands over the Five Great Peaks,
it casts Redwall in the shade.
Mount Tiantai<sup>3</sup> is forty and eight thousand yards high,
yet facing this it seems to tip,
sagging southeastwardly.

10

And I, wishing to reach that place,
once dreamed of Wu and Yue,
I spent a whole night flying across the moon in Mirror Lake.

15

The lake moon caught my reflection, and went with me on to Shan Creek.
The place where Lord Xie spent the night is still to be found there now, where green waters are ruffled in ripples,
and the gibbon's wail is clear.

20

I put on the clogs of Lord Xie,<sup>4</sup>
and scaled that ladder into blue clouds.
Halfway up cliffside I saw sun in sea,
and heard in the air the Heaven-Cock crow.

25

A thousand peaks and ten thousand turns,
my path was uncertain;
I was lost among flowers and rested on rock,
when suddenly all grew black.

30

Bears roared and dragons groaned, making the cliff-streams quake,
the deep forests were shivering,—tiered ridges shook,

35

9. Translated by Stephen Owen.

1. One of the islands of immortals.

2. A mountain near the ancient southern state of Yue.

3. A sacred Buddhist mountain in southeastern China (modern Zhejiang Province).

4. A 5th-century poet renowned for his landscape poetry, he was also famous for supposedly inventing special mountain-climbing shoes.

clouds hung blue,—portending rain, troubled waters rolled,—giving off mists.

Thunder-rumbling in Lightning Cracks, hill ridges split and fell;
then the stone doors of Caves to Heaven 40
swung open with a crash.

A billowing vast blue blackness whose bottom could not be seen, where sun and moon were gleaming on terraces silver and gold. 45

Their coats were of rainbow,—winds were their steeds, the lords of the clouds—came down in their hosts.
Tigers struck harps,—phoenixes drew coaches in circles,
those who are the Undying—stood in ranks like hemp.
All at once my soul was struck,—and my spirit shuddered, 50
I leapt up in dazed alarm,—and gave a long sigh.
I was aware only—of this moment's pillow and mat,
I had lost those mists and bright wisps—that had been here just before.

All pleasures in our mortal world 55 are also just like this, whatever has happened since ancient times is the water flowing east.

When I leave you now, you go,—when will you ever return?
just set a white deer out to graze 60
upon green mountainsides, and when I must go, I'll ride it to visit mountains of fame.

How can I pucker my brows and break my waist serving power and prestige?— 65
it makes me incapable of relaxing heart or face.

---

DU FU

712–770

---

Du Fu failed in his political ambitions, and his poetry was not widely read during his lifetime. But during the Song Dynasty he rose to the top of the poetic canon because of his versatility and ability to capture the dramatic historical events and spirit of his age. Ever since that time, Du Fu, together with Li Bo, has maintained the reputation as the greatest of Chinese poets.

Du Fu was the grandson of a prominent court poet. Although he dreamed of an official career, that dream was dashed after he twice failed the civil service examination. When An Lushan rebelled in 755, the imperial court escaped but Du Fu was left behind in the capital. Eventually he slipped through the enemy lines and made his way to the court of the new emperor in exile. There he briefly held one of the court positions he had so much desired; but following the recapture of the capital, he was exiled to a minor provincial post. He soon quit in disgust and embarked on a lifetime of travels. He first went to seek the help of relatives in northwest China, and then took up residence in Chengdu in Sichuan Province. In his later years Du Fu moved to Kuizhou, where he produced his most admired poetry sequence, the “Autumn Meditations.”

Du Fu is considered the “poet-historian” of Chinese literature, carrying out the Confucian duty to chronicle and criticize the events of his time. Prophetically, he grasped that the An Lushan Rebellion was an event of major historical proportions. But it was his ability to capture the rebellion’s impact on his life and on the lives of the people around him that gave depth to his voice. In “Moonlight Night” Du Fu imagines his wife, whom he had managed to send to safety while he remained trapped in the occupied capital, watching the moon and worrying about him; “Qiang Village” conveys the riveting scene of reunion, after Du Fu has finally escaped from the capital and is reunited with his family. But the effects of the rebellion linger on even after it is quashed: a decade later, he devotes “Ballad of the Firewood Vendors” to the local working women in his new home in Kuizhou who despair that the loss of life has destroyed the marriage prospects of an entire generation.

The greatness of Du Fu’s poetry lies in its extraordinary range of themes, styles, and observations. His poetic mastery is particularly visible in his preferred verse form, the regulated poem, in which he can be not just witty but also prophetic and visionary. Even when he is sober and humble, his everyday observations can reach cosmic proportions and take the unsuspecting reader by surprise.

Painted Hawk<sup>1</sup>

Wind-blown frost rises from plain white silk,
a gray falcon—paintwork’s wonder.

Body strains, its thoughts on the cunning hare, its eyes turn sidelong like a Turk in despair.

1. Translated by Stephen Owen.

You could pinch the rays glinting on tie-ring,
its stance, to be called to the column's rail. 5

When will it strike the common birds?—
bloody feathers strewing the weed-covered plain.

Moonlight Night<sup>2</sup>

From her room in Fuzhou tonight,
all alone she watches the moon.

Far away, I grieve that her children can't understand why she thinks of Chang'an.

Fragrant mist in her cloud hair damp, clear lucence on her jade arms cold— 5

when will we lean by chamber curtains and let it light the two of us, our tear stains dried?

Spring Prospect<sup>3</sup>

The nation shattered, mountains and rivers remain;
city in spring, grass and trees burgeoning.

Feeling the times, blossoms draw tears;
hating separation, birds alarm the heart.

Beacon fires three months in succession,
a letter from home worth ten thousand in gold. 5

White hairs, fewer for the scratching, soon too few to hold a hairpin up.<sup>4</sup>

Qiang Village I<sup>5</sup>

Lofted and lifted, west of the clouds of red,
The trek of the sun descends to the level earth.
By the brushwood gate songbirds and sparrows chaffer,
And the homebound stranger from a thousand li<sup>6</sup> arrives.
Wife and children marvel that I am here: 5
When the shock wears off, still they wipe away tears.

2. Translated by Burton Watson. This poem was written in 756, when Du Fu was held captive in the fallen capital of Chang'an during the An Lushan Rebellion and his wife and family had fled to safety in Fuzhou in the north.

3. Translated by Burton Watson. This poem was written when Du Fu was still a captive in Chang'an.

4. Officials used hairpins to keep their caps in place.

5. Translated by Paul W. Kroll. This poem was written in 757, when Du Fu finally rejoined his family after their separation during the turmoil of the An Lushan Rebellion.

6. About 250 miles.

In the disorders of the age was I tossed and flung;
 That I return alive is a happening of chance.
 Neighbors swarm up to the tops of the walls,
 Touched and sighing, even they sob and weep. 10
 The night wastes on, and still we hold the candle,
 Across from another, as if asleep and in a dream.

My Thatched Roof Is Ruined by the Autumn Wind<sup>7</sup>

In the high autumn skies of September
 the wind cried out in rage, Tearing off in whirls from my rooftop three plies of thatch.
 The thatch flew across the river, 5
 was strewn on the floodplain,
 The high stalks tangled in tips
 of tall forest trees,
 The low ones swirled in gusts across ground and sank into mud puddles. 10
 The children from the village to the south
 made a fool of me, impotent with age, Without compunction plundered what was mine
 before my very eyes, Brazenly took armfuls of thatch, 15
 ran off into the bamboo,
 And I screamed lips dry and throat raw,
 but no use.
 Then I made my way home, leaning on staff,
 sighing to myself. 20
 A moment later the wind calmed down,
 clouds turned dark as ink,
 The autumn sky rolling and overcast,
 blacker towards sunset,
 And our cotton quilts were years old 25
 and cold as iron,
 My little boy slept poorly, kicked rips in them.
 Above the bed the roof leaked,
 no place was dry, 30
 And the raindrops ran down like strings, without a break.
 I have lived through upheavals and ruin
 and have seldom slept very well,
 But have no idea how I shall pass 35
 this night of soaking.
 Oh, to own a mighty mansion of a hundred thousand rooms,
 A great roof for the poorest gentlemen of all this world, 40

7. Translated by Stephen Owen.

a place to make them smile,
 A building unshaken by wind or rain,
 as solid as a mountain,
 Oh, when shall I see before my eyes
 a towering roof such as this?
 Then I'd accept the ruin of my own little hut and death by freezing.

45

I Stand Alone<sup>8</sup>

A single bird of prey beyond the sky,
 a pair of white gulls between riverbanks.

Hovering wind-tossed, ready to strike;
 the pair, at their ease, roaming to and fro.

And the dew is also full on the grasses, spiders' filaments still not drawn in.

5

Instigations in nature approach men's affairs—
 I stand alone in thousands of sources of worry.

Spending the Night in a Tower by the River<sup>9</sup>

A visible darkness grows up mountain paths,
 I lodge by river gate high in a study,

Frail cloud on cliff edge passing the night,
 The lonely moon topples amid the waves.

Steady, one after another, a line of cranes in flight;
 Howling over the kill, wild dogs and wolves.

5

No sleep for me. I worry over battles.
 I have no strength to right the universe.

Thoughts while Travelling at Night<sup>1</sup>

Light breeze on the fine grass.
 I stand alone at the mast.

Stars lean on the vast wild plain.
 Moon bobs in the Great River's spate.

Letters have brought no fame.
 Office? Too old to obtain.

5

Drifting, what am I like?
 A gull between earth and sky.

8. Translated by Stephen Owen.

9. Translated by Stephen Owen.

1. Translated by Vikram Seth.

Ballad of the Firewood Vendors<sup>2</sup>

Kuizhou women, hair half gray,
 forty, fifty, and still no husbands;
 since the ravages of rebellion, harder than ever to marry—
 a whole life steeped in bitterness and long sighs. 5
 Local custom decrees that men sit, women stand;
 men mind the house door, women go out and work,
 at eighteen, nineteen, off peddling firewood, with money they get from firewood, making ends meet. 10
 Till they're old, hair in two buns dangling to the neck, stuck with wild flowers, a mountain leaf, a silver pin,
 they struggle up the steep paths, flock to the market gate, risk their lives for extra gain by dipping from salt wells.
 Faces powdered, heads adorned, sometimes a trace 15
     of tears,
 cramped fields, thin clothing, the weariness of stony slopes—
 But if you say all are ugly as the women of Witch's Mountain, 20 how to account for Zhaojun,<sup>3</sup> born in a village to the north?

Autumn Meditations IV<sup>4</sup>

I've heard them say, Chang'an's like a chessboard;
 sad beyond bearing, the happenings of these hundred years!
 Mansions of peers and princes, all with new owners now; 5
 in civil or martial cap and garb, not the same as before.
 Over mountain passes, due north, gongs and drums resound;
 wagons and horses pressing west speed the feather-decked dispatches.<sup>5</sup> 10
 Fish and dragons sunk in sleep, autumn rivers cold;
 old homeland, those peaceful times, forever in my thoughts!

2. Translated by Burton Watson. This poem, written in 766, describes local customs in Kuizhou, set on steep hillsides along the Yangzi River, where Du Fu had settled.

3. Wang Zhaojun, a stunningly beautiful court lady of the Han Dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.) who embodied the suffering of exile, because she was married off to a tribal chief of the fierce Xiongnu tribes as part of Han diplomacy on the unruly northern frontier. "Witch's Mountain": Wushan, near Kuizhou.

4. Translated by Burton Watson. This poem comes from Du Fu's most famous poetic cycle, "Autumn Meditations."

5. Feathers attached to military dispatches marked the message as urgent; Uighurs were threatening from the north and Tibetans from the west.

VI

Japan's Classical Age

Although Japan consists of the four main islands of Hokkaidō, Honshū, Shikoku, and Kyūshū and about a thousand smaller islets, its contacts with the continent have always been close. In fact, much of what makes Japanese culture distinctive stems from the creative ways in which the Japanese adapted Chinese and Korean culture to their own circumstances. For example, the Japanese imported the Chinese writing system, but used it to produce their own distinct literature. They produced literature in two literary languages, one vernacular and the other Chinese-style, which differed strikingly in themes, rhetoric, and the gender of their authors. Some of the greatest works of Japanese literature were written by women in the vernacular language.

Much like the Romans confronting the older and more established civilization of the Greeks, early Japanese writers faced the challenging task of building their own literature on the sophisticated precedents of their mother culture while asserting their own originality. In addition to literature, Japan adopted crucial institutions and cultural practices from

---

Illustrated Biography of Prince Shōtoku, painted in 1069 by Hata no Chitei. This is part of a series of ten panels that depict the life of Prince Shōtoku (574–622), founder of Buddhism in Japan.

China, such as the concept of a state headed by a divine monarch, a government system based on administrative statutes and laws, Buddhism used as a state religion protecting the people's welfare, city planning, temple architecture, sacred sculpture, religious rituals, court music and elegant dances, imperial excursions, medicine, the culture of painting, calligraphy, and tea. But whereas Rome had conquered Greece and had its young elite educated by Greek slaves, early Japanese had relatively little actual contact with China and knew it mostly from books, thus feeling less self-conscious about their cultural identity. They believed in the numinous power of their language and their gods and were proud of the pristine simplicity of their earliest literature. Unlike parts of Korea and Vietnam, which at certain points in their history were conquered by China, Japan was never directly colonized by China; its inhabitants could admire their old neighbor at a safe distance.

CONTINENTAL CULTURE AND BI-LITERACY

The cultural dialogue with China resulted in one of the world's most complex literary traditions. Writing was invented in China some eighteen centuries before the Japanese learned how to read and write. Unlike Koreans and Vietnamese, who exclusively used Chinese-style writing for centuries, the Japanese used the Chinese writing system to produce texts in two literary languages: vernacular Japanese and Chinese-style writing (also called "Sino-Japanese," kanbun, or simply "Literary Chinese"). Chinese-style writing was transnational, enabling the Japanese court to participate in the diplomatic and cultural exchange with China and other states in the Chinese sphere of influence such as Korea and Vietnam; playing a role similar to that of Latin in medieval Europe, it became the official language of the imperial administration and the Buddhist clergy, and was thus associated with high status, serious purpose, and male authorship. Although vernacular literature, in particular poetry, could serve similarly prestigious purposes at court, it became the preferred medium for emotional intimacy, romance, psychological sophistication, and fiction, all of which were associated with female sensibility.

Because the Chinese and Japanese languages belong to radically different language families, adopting Chinese characters to write Japanese required complex adjustments. Chinese is a noninflected language, with a "subject–predicate–object" word order; and literary Chinese is largely monosyllabic, meaning that most words consist of one or at most two syllables. Japanese, in contrast, is agglutinative, meaning that it strings short semantic elements together into long, complex words. It has highly inflected verbs and adjectives, which can carry a number of suffixes; these qualify such things as the mood, probability, or duration of an action or the social status of an agent. Moreover, Japanese has a "subject–object–predicate" word order and is polysyllabic—indeed, one word can sometimes fill an entire line of poetry. Chinese-style writing was written according to the Chinese word order and used the Chinese characters "logographically" for their meaning, each character representing a word. When Chinese-style writing was read out loud, the Japanese reader would perform a translation of sorts, adjusting the Chinese-style phrase to Japanese word order and adding inflections as needed. In contrast, vernacular Japanese writing mixed characters used for meaning with characters used "phonographically," for their sound value only. These characters functioned basically like a syllabic alphabet. As a result, in phonographic writing one word could require many Chinese characters.

Despite this complexity, Japan was not a bilingual culture; very few people learned spoken Chinese in addition to their native tongue. Japanese readers voiced Chinese texts in Japanese pronunciation. Their East Asian neighbors would be able to read the same text but would pronounce it in their languages and dialects. This led to a fascinating communicative paradox that can occur only in cultures with nonalphabetic writing systems. The Japanese ambassadors who visited China in order to present tribute gifts and bring home the newest law codes, Buddhist texts, musical instruments, and poetry collections could usually not ask for directions or the simplest things. Yet they could write sophisticated Chinese-style poetry for their Chinese hosts and communicate through so-called “brush talk”: conversations through written messages in the shared Chinese script.

HEIAN COURT CULTURE (794–1185)

As the result of struggles between the imperial court and the Buddhist clergy, the court moved from Nara to a new capital in 794: Heian-kyō (“the Capital of Peace”), modern-day Kyoto. Despite centuries of warrior rule and occasional civil wars, Kyoto would remain the seat of the imperial court until 1868. The four centuries of the Heian Period, when Kyoto was the sole political and cultural center of Japan, became in retrospect a golden age, viewed by subsequent ages as the pinnacle of culture. The literature produced by Kyoto’s court aristocracy defined all later standards of taste and embodied a refinement of sensibilities that had timeless appeal.

Heian literature was mostly produced by and for the capital elite. There are descriptions of travel in the provinces, but Heian aristocrats found the countryside at best rustic and charming, at worst

The Tōdaiji Temple complex in Nara, Japan, was built in the eighth century and has been frequently repaired and reconstructed over the centuries. The building here, the “Great Buddha Hall,” is today one of the largest wooden buildings in the world.

This detail from a twelfth-century illustrated hand scroll of Lady Murasaki's diary gives us a glimpse of the dress and domestic situation of women at the Heian court.

embarrassing and primitive. The capital was the center of all ambitions and hopes: aristocrats eagerly awaited the promotion ceremonies that could secure them a higher rank and better post in the extensive court bureaucracy. In their court diaries, written in Chinese-style, they meticulously recorded the daily court routine. These diaries show mostly the official side of Heian life. For a picture of Heian after nightfall, we need to look at vernacular tales and women's diaries. Here we learn that men often had several wives and carried on several romantic affairs at once. They visited their lovers in the women's homes, plying them with allusive poetry or the tasteful calligraphy of a "morning-after note," written on a paper of just the right shade and adorned with just the right twig or blossom in season.

We get a remarkable close-up of the everyday lives, pleasures, and anxieties of Heian aristocratic women from works such as Murasaki Shikibu's The Tale of Genji and Sei Shōnagon's The Pillow Book. Heian women were dressed in a dozen layers of clothing whose shades carefully matched the season and occasion. They were hidden from view, spending their days in the dimly lit interiors of their residences waiting for welcome distractions: the banter of servants, an occasional outside caller with whom to exchange the latest gossip (if it was a man, the lady hid behind a screen as they talked), a love letter, or, even better, festivals or pilgrimages to nearby temples that broke the daily routine. Aristocratic women usually received a thorough education in waka poetry (classical Japanese verse composed in the set pattern of 5-7-5-7-7 syllables). They were also trained in music, dance, and often even the Chinese Classics, although Chinese scholarship was traditionally a male domain. Heian elite women had ample time to read and write and developed a subtle sense of propriety and distinction in social relations, clothing decorum, the delicate psychology of romantic affairs, and poetry exchanges.

By the tenth century, waka poetry was enshrined as the canonical court genre. Waka was both a way to parade one's literary sophistication and a simple form of everyday communication between men and women, who spent most of their time apart. A century earlier, two emperors with particularly Sinophile tastes had commissioned the compilation of Chinese-style poetry anthologies, which celebrated the cultural achievements of the court and its poets. But by the late ninth century the short and intimate waka form became popular: waka contests entertained the aristocracy and poets wrote waka on screen paintings in the imperial palace. Emperor Daigo's sponsorship of the first imperial waka anthology, The Kokinshū (Collection of Ancient and Modern Poems), in 905, first established the high status of waka at court. Between the tenth and fifteenth centuries Japanese emperors commissioned a total of twenty-one waka anthologies. Having one's name included in one of these anthologies was the highest aspiration for generations of poets.

Waka relied heavily on a vast, but well-defined, vocabulary of seasonal phenomena and romantic love. Poets used this metaphorical and allusive imagery on public occasions in order to commemorate court events, praise the emperor, or participate in poetry contests. But they also used waka for more intimate purposes—to rekindle a love affair, to convey travel experiences, or to express feelings of longing, loneliness, or existential frustration with the impermanence of the world.

In addition to the establishment of waka at court, the ninth century saw the invention of the kana syllabary, which profoundly changed Japanese literature. Although the invention of the kana syllabary did not fundamentally alter how Japanese wrote, it introduced a script that became specifically associated with women: it was called “women's hand.” Before the tenth century, both Chinese-style and vernacular texts were written in Chinese characters. In the new kana system, the characters used phonographically, for sound value, were replaced with a letter standing for a syllable: the curvier hiragana script was used for inflections and grammatical particles, while the square-shaped katakana script transcribed foreign loanwords such as Sanskrit terms and Buddhist vocabulary (and Western-language words in the modern period). The invention of these two kana scripts expanded Japan's rich vernacular prose literature, adding to the literary spectrum fictional tales, autobiographical diaries, and other genres that were associated with female sensibility, if not outright female authorship.

Of the world's prominent premodern literary traditions, Japan's is the only one in which women dominated certain areas. An important element in the flourishing of women's literature was the rise of the Fujiwara clan. The Fujiwara managed to gain a position of great influence by inserting themselves as regents between the emperor and the court administration. Fujiwara regents married their daughters into the imperial family, hoping that their grandsons would become future emperors. To that end, Fujiwara regents often lavished attention on their daughters, securing for them an education of the highest distinction and providing them with the most talented ladies-in-waiting. Because the emperor usually had several consorts and other lower-ranking women at his disposal, such polish was a way to attract the emperor's attention and gain a competitive advantage over rivals. Some of the greatest works of Japanese literature were written by prestigious ladies-in-waiting: Murasaki Shikibu and Sei Shōnagon served in the rival households of two Fujiwara daughters, empresses to Emperor Ichijō. The ambitions of the Fujiwara family to dominate the court and the imperial lineage created an environment in which female literary talent was instrumental in the success of the male members of the clan.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

Sei Shōnagon, From The Pillow Book is not displayed because of permissions issues.

---

MURASAKI SHIKIBU

ca. 978–ca. 1014

---

The Tale of Genji is the undisputed masterpiece of Japanese prose and often considered the first great novel in the history of world literature. That it was written by an eleventh-century court lady is even more extraordinary. Virginia Woolf, who reviewed its first complete English translation—the masterful rendering by Arthur Waley—in 1925, responded to Murasaki Shikibu with the lonely empathy of an early twentieth-century woman author: “There was Sappho and a little group of women all writing poetry on a Greek island six hundred years before the birth of Christ. They fall silent. Then about the year 1000 we find a certain court lady, the Lady Murasaki, writing a very long and beautiful novel in Japan.” Although originally written for a narrow circle of court aristocrats in Kyoto, The Tale of Genji has had unparalleled success in engaging generations of passionate readers and it is now uniquely representative of Japanese literature. Vast in scale and peopled by hundreds of characters, this thousand-page tale depicts the lives and loves of a former prince—Genji—who dies two-thirds through the book, and the lives and loves of his descendants. On a deeper level, The Tale of Genji is about the human ability to be touched by other people and by the outside world, about the tantalizing line between love and lust, and about the vulnerability of women in a male-dominated world. It celebrates the power of poetry, music, and dance to shape society and give depth to human life. Revered for its psychological insight, it captures a world that, however remote from our own, has always retained the sharp authenticity of real life. At its most basic, it chronicles the struggle with the most fundamental of human experiences: love, art, and death.

LIFE AND TIMES

The actual name of the author of The Tale of Genji is unknown. It was common at the time to name women after the office held by a male relative. “Shikibu” refers to the appointment her father held at the “Ministry of Ceremonial.” The nickname “Murasaki” (“lavender,” “purple”) is based either on the heroine Murasaki in The Tale of Genji or on the color of wisteria, the emblematic flower of her clan. Murasaki Shikibu’s ancestors had belonged to a branch of the Fujiwara (“wisteria fields”) clan, which had managed since the tenth century to dominate the throne by ruling as regents on behalf of young emperors and marrying their daughters into the imperial family. Despite Murasaki’s distinguished ancestry, her family eventually declined to the level of provincial governors. Her father had a mediocre career in the court administration, although he was known as a poet and scholar of Chinese literature. Through him Murasaki got a glimpse of life outside the Heian-era capital of Kyoto, when in her teens she accompanied him for a couple of years on one of his appointments in the provinces. After returning to the capital, Murasaki was briefly married to the much older Fujiwara no Nobutaka, a middle-ranking aristocrat. When he died in 1001, Murasaki was in her early twenties, now a widow with a two-year-old daughter. Murasaki probably started writing The Tale of Genji after the death of her husband. These early chapters won her a growing reputation and led to an invitation from Empress Shōshi around 1006 to serve as lady-in-waiting at the imperial court, where she remained until her death around 1014.

The flourishing of female literature during this time was in no small part a result of the efforts of the Fujiwara regents to fill the ranks of their daughters' entourages with the most talented and educated women. Shōshi was one of the consorts of Emperor Ichijō, and she was far more successful than her rival, Empress Teishi, whom Sei Shōnagon, the author of The Pillow Book, served. She bore Ichijō two emperors and her fortunes reflected the power of her father, the regent Fujiwara no Michinaga. Employment as ladies-in-waiting gave Heian women writers the financial support and leisure to produce literature that commanded the attention of society in the capital.

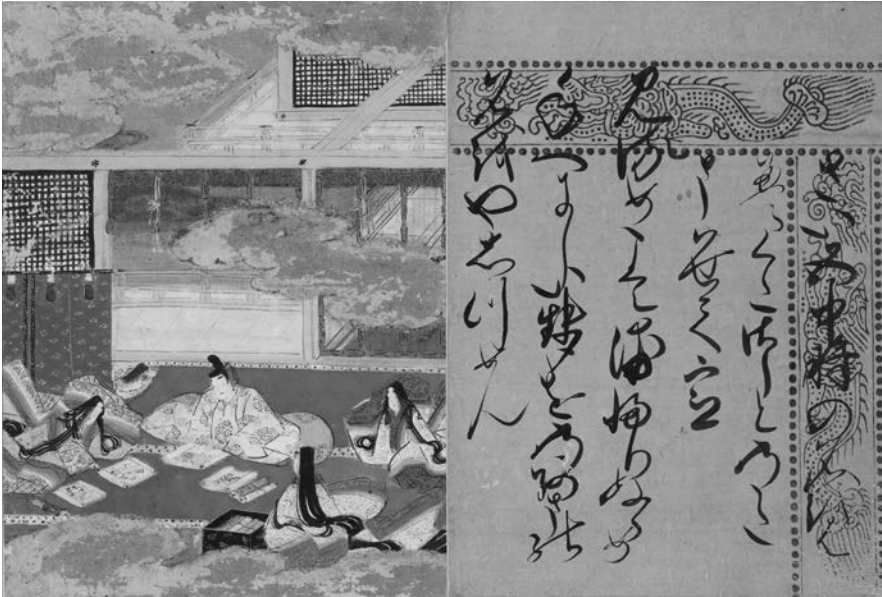

Murasaki had broad learning in Japanese vernacular literature—waka poetry, women's diaries, and tales—but also acquired a profound understanding of the Chinese classics (canonical texts) and Chinese poetry. While aristocratic women at the time were often knowledgeable in Chinese literature, they did not produce Chinese-style texts in the authoritative idiom of the male court bureaucracy and the Buddhist clergy, writing instead in the vernacular language. In her diary Murasaki confesses:

When my brother, the Secretary at the Ministry of Ceremonial, was young and studied the Chinese classics, I used to listen to him and became unusually good at understanding those passages which he found too difficult to grasp. My father, a most learned man, was always lamenting this fact: "Just my luck!" he would say. "What a pity that she was not born a man!"

A father's admiration for his daughter's academic brilliance cannot conceal the fact that in Heian society, Chinese learning was truly valuable only for men.

In Heian Japan, men and women were strictly segregated and women's lives were extremely circumscribed. The role of a lady was to marry and bear children; and if she came from a suitably good family, she was apt to find herself a pawn in the marriage politics of the imperial court. A noblewoman's days were spent behind curtains and screens, hidden from the world (or from the male world). A man's first marriage often took place when he was still a boy of twelve or thirteen; women were even a year or two younger. Because of the ages of the spouses and the likelihood of the first marriage in particular being a political and economic arrangement, both husband and wife tended eventually to seek love elsewhere, although only men could have multiple marriage partners. The purpose of marriage was procreation, continuation of the family line, and the creation of advantageous alliances with other families. Ordinarily a man's several wives lived in different establishments. His first wife would typically remain in her parents' house. Initially, the young husband might take up residence there or merely visit. Sometimes her parents would furnish the newlyweds with a house of their own, though doing so was less common when the couple married at a young age and the maternal grandparents would be expected to assume many of the child-rearing duties. If in time a man took a second or third wife, he would usually live with his first (and main) wife and commute between the separate residences. It was in this world of gender asymmetries that Heian women's literature thrived. At the same time, Heian women used the status they had as female authors to voice how women suffered from their dependence on their husbands, lovers, and patrons.

An early sixteenth-century illustrated calligraphic excerpt from chapter 17, “The Picture Contest,” of The Tale of Genji. The artwork is attributed to Reizei Tamehiro.

THE TALE OF GENJI

Although Genji’s women play an important role in the tale, it is named after its male protagonist. He is the son of the reigning emperor and his beloved but low-ranking consort, Kiritsubo (“Paulownia Pavilion”). Her favor with the emperor makes her a target of vicious rivalry among the emperor’s higher-ranking women, such as the Kokiden Consort, his principal wife. Genji’s mother dies in despair when he is in his third year, and his father is eventually forced to remove him from the imperial line to protect him from the ill will of his other consorts. He makes the boy a commoner, bestowing the family name “Genji” on him. As Genji grows up his brilliance elicits sighs of admiration wherever he appears, and he is soon being called “the Radiant Prince.” The emperor dotes on his remarkable son, who reminds him all the more painfully of his former favorite consort. He eventually finds solace in the young Fujitsubo, daughter of a previous emperor, who resembles Kiritsubo but is of highest rank.

With even more determination than his father, Genji embarks on a search for women who can replace the mother he barely remembers. His fatal attraction to Fujitsubo leads to one of his greatest transgressions. Fujitsubo gives birth to a son who later becomes emperor and whom everybody believes to be the son of Genji’s father. Later, Fujitsubo’s niece Murasaki becomes Genji’s great love. Sometimes Genji’s escapades with women of very high rank lead to disaster: after his affair with Oborozukiyo, who is the younger sister of his father’s principal wife, the Kokiden consort (and thus his mortal enemy), he is forced into exile to the rustic countryside. Sometimes inattention, rather than sexual transgression, brings about disaster: Genji’s failure to respond to the jealous passion of the lady at Rokujō, widow of a former crown prince, leads inexorably to the death of some of the most important women in his life.

Genji is charismatic, irresistible, and tantalizingly flawed. Charming and handsome, brilliant and ardent, rakish but faithful in his own way (unlike other men, he never abandons any woman he has loved), he is an extraordinary literary figure. Readers may hate Genji or adore him, but we can hardly deny that his creator has fashioned a character who is both larger than life and believably human.

The fifty-four-chapter tale falls broadly into three parts. The first thirty-three chapters describe Genji's career from his birth through his exile and his eventual glorious return to the capital. They focus on the various women with whom he becomes involved in his younger years. Chapters 34 through 41 treat the waning years of Genji's life, concluding with the death of Murasaki and Genji's own death. The remaining thirteen chapters, including the last ten so-called Uji chapters, move to the world of Kaoru, supposedly Genji's son by the Third Princess, and his friend Prince Niou, the son of Genji's daughter, the Akashi Empress. Featuring the two young men's rivalry over several women living in Uji, south of the capital of Kyoto, they draw the reader from the elegant capital to the countryside. Lacking the radiance of Genji's presence, this world is populated with compromised protagonists, darker entanglements with life's sufferings, and thinner hopes for salvation.

Though The Tale of Genji is a coherent whole, it can also be appreciated as a collection of interrelated episodes revolving around Genji, his women, and their descendants, in part because of how the work was composed. Since Murasaki wrote it over a span of a dozen years, probably starting with what eventually became chapter 5 ("Little Purple Gromwell," included here), the tale developed in thematic sequences. It first circulated in various shorter installments—single chapters or sequences—among Kyoto's court aristocracy. The sequences show how Murasaki's protagonists, interests, and narrative techniques evolved over time. The "Broom Cypress Sequence," for example, which includes chapters 2, 4, 6, and sequels in chapters 15 and 16, was apparently inserted later. Whereas the core chapters of the tale's first part show Genji dangerously in love with high-ranking women who were close to the emperor, in the "Broom Cypress Sequence" he pursues women of the middle and lower aristocracy. The key prelude to Genji's later conquests occurs in chapter 2 ("Broom Cypress," included here), when the seventeen-year-old Genji and his friends while away a rainy night in his quarters at the palace debating what makes the perfect woman. In the process, the young men trade stories of their experiences with women. Although Genji dozes off now and then, he takes away the lessons from that night and applies them to his pursuit of women in the following chapters of the sequence.

In The Tale of Genji Murasaki sometimes relied on conventions from earlier tales, so-called monogatari. A typical plot element was an illustrious aristocrat's discovery of a heroine in humble circumstances. This describes the situation of Genji's mother, and also many of Genji's own exploits. Liaisons between high-ranking men and humble women were far more popular in literary romances than in Heian-era reality. A real-life Genji would probably never have married somebody like the character Murasaki, orphaned and without appropriate family background. But in romantic tales, the total infatuation of an aristocrat with a lower-ranking woman was an expression of passion and emotional depth; for female readers it perhaps even inspired hope that they might find salvation and social mobility through the power of romantic love. Because of the social gap between Genji and his lovers, the tale's low-ranking heroines spend considerable energy agonizing about their lowly position and trying to cope with social marginalization. Another typical plot element of earlier tales is the pursuit of love in unexpected or forbidden places. There is no lack of such episodes in Genji's career; he strongly resembles the real-life Ariwara no Narihira (825–880), the epitome of a romantic lover and hero of the earlier monogatari The Tales of Ise.

The Tale of Genji displays the remarkable blend of Murasaki's talents. She was a gifted poet, inserting several hundred poems in the tale. Where modern readers might expect Genji and his lovers to exchange love letters in prose, Murasaki has them communicate through elaborate poems. Indeed, most of the protagonists are named after imagery from those poems, and until the early modern period readers studied The Tale of Genji to enhance their skills in poetry composition. Also, Murasaki was a perceptive reader of women's confessional diaries and a masterful prose stylist, relying on the nuanced expression of interiority developed by women diarists before her for the intimate psychological portrayal of The Tale of Genji's fictional protagonists. Lastly, her expertise in Chinese literature inspired her to enrich recurring motifs with resonant references to Chinese poetry. In the first chapter she evokes "The Song of Lasting Regret" by the Tang poet Bo Juyi, which tells of the tragic love between a Chinese emperor and a low-ranking concubine, as a poignant analogy to the fate of Genji's mother; like a motif in music, Bo Juyi's gripping ballad keeps reappearing throughout the novel in various guises.

In its day The Tale of Genji was just another vernacular tale that, in the estimation of the learned elite, stood far below the Chinese-style writing by Heian men. Chinese learning—a coveted quality for a male aristocrat—was a dubious asset for a court lady. In her diary Murasaki tells how angry she was when somebody teased her for her Chinese learning and gave her the nickname "Our Lady of the Chronicles." But in fact this title should have pleased her: in "Fireflies" (chapter 25, included here) Genji discusses the worth of romantic tales with Tamakazura, his best friend's daughter, and she inspires him to argue that fiction is in some way more truthful than official Chinese-style histories such as the venerable Chronicles of Japan: vernacular tales tell the real stories that are left out of the Chinese-style histories.

Whether meant as a playful jibe or a serious polemical claim, Murasaki's bold comparison of popular vernacular tales to canonical Chinese-style histories facilitated the canonization of The Tale of Genji in later ages. The Tale of Genji became the subject of erudite scholastic commentaries; it inspired screen paintings and illustrated hand scrolls, Noh and puppet plays, poetry handbooks, parodies, and, more recently, woodblock prints, films, and manga (comic book) versions. This "Genji cult" is in part a result of the late-nineteenth-century promotion of The Tale of Genji from the status of a brilliant masterpiece to that of a modern national classic said to encapsulate Japanese sensibility. But leaving politics aside, one of the many reasons for The Tale of Genji's timeless appeal is that it is a grand meditation on the emotional and psychological dynamics of love and loss. It seduces the reader with its extensive depictions of courtship and passion, but its ultimate theme is the deeper longing to find a common language through which to connect with another person.

MAIN CHARACTERS IN THE TALE OF GENJI

AKASHI EMPRESS, daughter of Genji and the Akashi Lady; becomes empress by marrying one of Emperor Suzaku's sons, the last reigning emperor to appear in the tale

AKASHI LADY, daughter of the Akashi Novice; meets Genji during his exile and bears him a daughter who eventually becomes empress
AKASHI NOVITIATE, former governor of Harima, father of the Akashi Lady

ASSISTANT HANDMAID, Genji's aged and coquettish admirer

BISHOP, Murasaki's great-uncle, a distinguished Buddhist cleric

EMPEROR SUZAKU, Genji's elder half brother, son of the Kokiden Consort; succeeds the Kiritsubo Emperor on the throne

EMPEROR REIZEI, son of Genji and Fujitsubo, but believed to be the son of Genji's father; succeeds Suzaku as emperor

FUJITSUBO, daughter of an earlier emperor; Genji's father's empress with whom Genji has a son, the later Emperor Reizei

GENJI'S WIFE, daughter of the Minister of the Left; marries Genji at age 16, when Genji is 12

HACHINOMIYA, "Eighth Prince"; younger brother of Genji who lives as a saintly ascetic in Uji and is the father of the "Uji princesses" and Ukifune

HIGH PRIESTESS OF ISE, Akikonomu, the daughter of the Lady at Rokujō

KAORU, son of the Third Princess, Genji's wife, by Kashiwagi; friend of Niou and central protagonist of the "Uji chapters," named after his mysterious natural "fragrance"

KASHIWAGI, eldest son of Tō no Chūjō and actual father of Kaoru, believed to be Genji's son; his affair with the Third Princess leads to his early death

KIRITSUBO EMPEROR, Genji's father

KOKIDEN CONSORT, daughter of the Minister of the Right; mother of Emperor Suzaku and archenemy of Genji

KOREMITSU, Genji's foster brother and confidant

LADY AT ROKUJŌ, daughter of a Minister and widow of a deceased Heir Apparent; Genji's neglect of her has fatal consequences

MINISTER OF THE LEFT, father of Genji's wife and of Tō no Chūjo, Genji's friend

MINISTER OF THE RIGHT, father of the Kokiden Consort and Oborozukiyo

MURASAKI, unrecognized daughter of Prince Hyōbu and niece of Fujitsubo; raised by Genji, who later marries her

NIŌU, imperial prince and son of the Akashi Empress, Genji's daughter, and the last reigning emperor to appear in the tale; friend of Kaoru and central protagonist of the "Uji chapters," named after his memorable "perfume"

OBOROZUKIYO, daughter of the Minister of the Right and younger sister of Kokiden; enters the service of Suzaku; Genji's affair with her leads to his exile

PRINCE HYŌBU, Fujitsubo's elder brother, Murasaki's father

SOCHINOMIYA, also "Prince Hotaru," Genji's half brother, who unsuccessfully courts Tamakazura

TAMAKAZURA, daughter of Tō no Chūjō by a low-ranking mistress; discovered by Genji, who installs her into his mansion and passes her off as his own daughter

THIRD PRINCESS, third daughter of Emperor Suzaku, who marries her to Genji; mother of Kaoru, whom people believe to be Genji's son, but whose actual father is Kashiwagi, the eldest son of Tō no Chūjō, with whom she has an affair

TŌ NO CHŪJŌ, son of the Minister of the Left and brother of Aoi; his name is the title of a post he occupies

UJI PRINCESSES, daughters of Hachinomiya, the younger brother of Genji who lives in Uji; the older of the princesses is also known as "Oigimi," the younger as "Naka no kimi"

UKIFUNE, unrecognized daughter of Hachinomiya and half-sister of the "Uji Princesses"

YOKAWA BISHOP, bishop at the large Enryakuji temple complex on Mount Hiei, northeast of Kyoto; discovers Ukifune and ordains her as a nun

FROM THE TALE OF GENJI<sup>1</sup>

From Chapter I

Kiritsubo

THE LADY OF THE PAULOWNIA-COURTYARD CHAMBERS

In whose reign was it that a woman of rather undistinguished lineage captured the heart of the Emperor and enjoyed his favor above all the other imperial wives and concubines? Certain consorts, whose high noble status gave them a sense of vain entitlement, despised and reviled her as an unworthy upstart from the very moment she began her service. Ladies of lower rank were even more vexed, for they knew His Majesty would never bestow the same degree of affection and attention on them. As a result, the mere presence of this woman at morning rites or evening ceremonies seemed to provoke hostile reactions among her rivals, and the anxiety she suffered as a consequence of these ever-increasing displays of jealousy was such a heavy burden that gradually her health began to fail.

His Majesty could see how forlorn she was, how often she returned to her family home. He felt sorry for her and wanted to help, and though he could scarcely afford to ignore the admonitions of his advisers, his behavior eventually became the subject of palace gossip. Ranking courtiers and attendants found it difficult to stand by and observe the troubling situation, which they viewed as deplorable. They were fully aware that a similarly ill-fated romance had thrown the Chinese state into chaos.<sup>2</sup> Concern and consternation gradually spread through the court, since it appeared that nothing could be done. Many considered the relationship scandalous, so much so that some openly referred to the example of the Prize Consort Yang. The only thing that made it possible for the woman to continue to serve was the Emperor's gracious devotion.

The woman's father had risen to the third rank as a Major Counselor before he died. Her mother, the principal wife of her father, was a woman of old-fashioned upbringing and character who was well trained in the customs and rituals of the court. Thus, the reputation of her house was considered in no way inferior and did not suffer by comparison with the brilliance of the highest nobility. Unfortunately, her family had no patrons who could provide political support, and after her father's death there was no one she could rely on. In the end, she found herself at the mercy of events and with uncertain prospects.

Was she not, then, bound to the Emperor by some deep love from a previous life? For in spite of her travails, she eventually bore him a son—a pure radiant gem like nothing of this world. Following the child's birth His Majesty had to wait impatiently, wondering when he would finally be allowed to see the boy.

1. Translated by Dennis Washburn. Except where indicated, all notes are his. Murasaki Shikibu often alludes directly to works of poetry (both Chinese and Japanese), fiction, history, and court records. Most of these allusions are to Japanese poems compiled in imperial anthologies during the 10th and early 11th centuries. Notes throughout this selection cite the source of only some of these allusions.

2. The courtiers are referring to "Song of Lasting Regret" by the Tang Dynasty poet Bai Juyi (722–846). The poem recounts the infatuation of the Emperor Xuanzong (685–762) with Yang Guifei, which caused him to neglect affairs of state. His army revolted, and he was forced to execute his lover.

As soon as it could be ritually sanctioned, he had the infant brought from the home of the woman's mother, where the birth had taken place,<sup>3</sup> and the instant he gazed on the child's countenance he recognized a rare beauty.

Now, as it so happened, the Crown Prince<sup>4</sup> had been born three years earlier to the Kokiden Consort, who was the daughter of the Minister of the Right. As the unquestioned heir to the throne, the boy had many supporters and the courtiers all treated him with the utmost respect and deference. He was, however, no match for the radiant beauty of the newborn Prince; and even though the Emperor was bound to acknowledge the higher status of his older son and to favor him in public, in private he could not resist treating the younger Prince as his favorite and lavishing attention upon him.

The mother of the newborn Prince did not come from a family of the highest rank, but neither was she of such low status that she should have been constantly by the Emperor's side like a common servant. Certainly her reputation was flawless, and she comported herself with noble dignity, but because His Majesty obsessively kept her near him, willfully demanding that they not be separated, she had to be in attendance at all formal court performances or elegant entertainments. There were times when she would spend the night with him and then be obliged to continue in service the following day. Consequently, as one might expect, other courtiers came to look down on her not only as a person of no significance, but also as a woman who lacked any sense of propriety. Moreover, because the Emperor treated her with special regard following the birth of his second son, the Kokiden Consort and her supporters grew anxious; they worried about the effect of such an infatuation on the prospects of the Crown Prince and wondered if the younger Prince might not surpass his half brother in favor and usurp his position. The Kokiden Consort had been the Emperor's first wife. She had arrived at the palace before all the other women, and so His Majesty's feelings of affection for her were in no way ordinary. He considered her protests troubling, but he also had to acknowledge that she was deserving of sympathy, since she had given him two imperial princesses in addition to the Crown Prince.

Even though the mother of the newborn Prince relied on the Emperor's benevolence for protection, many of the ladies at court scorned her. She grew physically weak, and because she felt powerless and had no one to turn to for help, she suffered greatly because of his love.

Her chambers at the palace were in the Kiritsubo—named for its courtyard, which was graced with paulownia trees. Because the Kiritsubo was in the northeast corner of the palace, and thus separated from the Emperor's quarters in the Seiryōden, he would have to pass by the chambers of many of the other court ladies on his frequent visits to her. Their resentment of these displays was not at all unreasonable, and so it was decided that the woman herself would have to go more often to the Seiryōden. The more she went, however, the more her rivals would strew the covered passageways connecting the various parts of the palace with filth. It was an absolutely intolerable situation, for the hems of the robes of the accompanying attendants would be soiled. On other occasions,

3. It was customary for births to take place outside the palace in order to avoid defilement. A period of confinement for ritual purification usually followed a birth, which is why the Emperor has to wait to see his son.

4. Genji's half brother Suzaku [editor's note].

when the woman could not avoid taking the interior hallways, her rivals would arrange for the doors at both ends to be closed off so that she could neither proceed forward nor turn back, trapping her inside and making her feel utterly wretched. As the number of these cruel incidents mounted, His Majesty felt sorry that his beloved should have to suffer so and ordered that she be installed in the chambers of the Kōrōden, a hall next to the Seiryōden. To do so, however, he had to move the lady who had resided there from the very beginning of her service at court to other quarters, causing her to nurse a deep resentment that proved impossible to placate.

When the young Prince turned three, the court observed the ceremony of the donning of his first trousers. Employing all the treasures from the Imperial Storehouse and the Treasury, the event was every bit as lavish as the ceremony for the Crown Prince. Numerous objections were raised as a consequence of this ostentatious display, and everyone censured the ceremony as a breach of protocol. Fortunately, as the young Prince grew, his graceful appearance and matchless temperament became a source of wonder to all, and it was impossible for anyone to entirely resent him. Discerning courtiers who possessed the most refined sensibility could only gaze in amazement that such a child should have been born into this world.

During the summer of the year the young Prince turned three, his mother's health began to fail. She asked for permission to leave the court and return to her family home, but the Emperor would not hear of it and refused to let her go. She had been sickly and frail for some time, and so His Majesty had grown accustomed to seeing her in such a condition. "Wait a little while," he simply told her, "and let's see how you feel." Then, over the course of the next five or six days, she became seriously ill. The woman made a tearful entreaty, and at last she received permission to leave the palace. Even under these dire circumstances she was very careful to avoid any behavior that could be criticized as untoward or inappropriate. She decided to retire from the court in secret, leaving her young son behind.

Resigned to the fact that the life of his true love was approaching its end and mindful of the taboo against defiling the palace with death, His Majesty was nonetheless grief-stricken beyond words that the dictates of protocol prevented him from seeing her off. The woman's face, with its lambent beauty conveying that air of grace so precious to him, was now thin and wasted. She had tasted the sorrows of the world to the full, but as she slipped in and out of consciousness, she could not convey to him even those feelings that might have been put into words. The Emperor, who now realized that his beloved was on the verge of death, lost control and made all sorts of tearful vows to her, no longer able to distinguish past from future. She, however, could not respond to him. The expression of weariness in her eyes made her all the more alluringly vulnerable as she lay there in a semiconscious state. The Emperor was beside himself and had no idea what he should do. He had granted her the honor of leaving in a carriage drawn by servants, but when he returned to her chambers again, he simply could not bring himself to let her go.

"Didn't we swear an oath to journey together on the road to death? No matter what, I cannot let you abandon me," he said.

She was deeply moved by his display of sorrowful devotion. Though breathing with great difficulty, she still managed to compose a verse for him:

*Now in deepest sorrow as I contemplate
Our diverging roads, this fork where we must part
How I long to walk the path of the living*

"Had I known that things would turn out like this . . ."

She evidently wanted to say more to him, but her breathing was labored. She was so weak and in such pain the Emperor longed to keep her at the palace and see it through to the end, come what may. But when he received an urgent message informing him that the most skilled of priests had been called to her family home to chant the requisite prayers of healing for her that evening, His Majesty at last agreed that his beloved should leave the palace, unbearable as it was for him to make that decision.

His heart was full and he could not sleep as he impatiently waited for the short summer night to end. The messenger he sent had barely had time to get to the woman's home and return with news of her condition, yet His Majesty was assailed by a sense of dark foreboding.

As it turned out, when the messenger arrived at the woman's residence, he found the family distraught and weeping. "She passed away after midnight," they informed him. The messenger returned to the palace in a state of shock. The Emperor, stunned and shaken by the news, was so upset that he shut himself away from the rest of the court.

His Majesty desperately wanted to see the young Prince his beloved had left behind at the palace, but there was no precedent for permitting anyone to serve at court while having to wear robes of mourning. So it was decided that the boy should be sent from the palace to his mother's residence. Too young to fully comprehend what was going on, he knew from the way people around him were behaving, and from the Emperor's ceaseless tears, that something was terribly wrong. The death of loved ones is always a source of grief, but the little boy's puzzled expression only added to the unspeakable sadness of it all.

* * *

The days passed in a meaningless blur for the Emperor, who dutifully observed each of the seven-day ceremonies leading up to the forty-ninth day after the funeral. Despite the passage of time, His Majesty was so lost in grief he could find no comfort. He was indifferent to the consorts and ladies-in-waiting who attended him in the evenings and instead passed his days and nights distracted and disconsolate. For all who observed his grief, it was truly an autumn drenched by a dew of tears.

Over in the chambers of the Kokiden the mother of the Crown Prince and her faction remained implacably unforgiving. "Is he still so in love with her," she complained, "that even after her death he doesn't consider the feelings of others?" And indeed it was true that whenever the Emperor looked at the Crown Prince, his thoughts would inevitably drift in yearning to the younger Prince, and he would then dispatch his most trusted ladies-in-waiting or nurses to the family home of his late beloved to inquire after the boy.

* * *

The sighing of the wind, the chirring of insects . . . these brought only sadness to him. The quarters of the Kokiden Consort were close by on the north side of his private chambers in the Seiryōden. It had been a long time since she last came to serve him here, and on this particular evening, with the moon in full splendor, he could hear her indulging in musical entertainment to pass the night. The Emperor was appalled and found it quite unpleasant. The courtiers and ladies-in-waiting who observed his countenance at that moment listened uneasily as well. The Kokiden Consort was a proud and haughty woman who behaved as though she couldn't care less about His Majesty's grief.

* * *

The days and months passed, and the young Prince finally came back to the palace. He had grown so splendid and handsome that he no longer seemed to belong to this mortal world. His worried father, knowing that the beautiful die young, took the boy's good looks as an unlucky omen.

In the spring of the following year the time came for the Emperor to formally designate the heir apparent. He was seized by a desire to pass over the presumed Crown Prince, his son by the Kokiden Consort, and appoint his favored younger son instead, but he knew that the little Prince had no supporters and that the court would never accept such a move, which might prove dangerous to the boy. So in the end he went against his personal wishes and confirmed the Crown Prince as his heir apparent, all the while keeping his true feelings concealed. The courtiers remarked among themselves that no matter how much His Majesty preferred the younger son, he knew there were limits to his affection. When the Kokiden Consort caught wind of these rumors, she felt both relief and satisfaction.

The grandmother of the young Prince had long been sunk in a deep depression, and finding no means to console herself, she finally passed away. Was her death the answer to her prayers to be allowed to go to her daughter? The Emperor was once more plunged into grief beyond the measure of ordinary mortals. By this time the young Prince was almost six and was old enough now to understand what was happening. Deeply attached to his grandmother, he wept inconsolably. As she neared death, she recognized how accustomed her grandson had grown to being with her through the years, and she repeated over and over how sad she was to leave him alone in the world.

With both his mother and grandmother gone, the young Prince moved back to the palace for good. When he turned seven he underwent the ceremony of the First Reading, which initiated him into the study of the Chinese classics. The court had never known a child so precociously intelligent, and His Majesty, knowing how others felt and believing that talent and beauty die young, could not help but view such abilities with alarm.

"How could anyone possibly resent him now?" the Emperor declared. "Because he has lost his mother, I want him treated with affection."

Eventually even the Kokiden Consort and her attendants were won over, and whenever the young Prince accompanied his father to the Kokiden chambers, he would be permitted entry behind the curtains where the ladies-in-waiting were serving His Majesty. The fiercest warriors and most implacable enemies would have smiled had they seen him, and the ladies of the court were reluctant to let him out of their sight. The Kokiden Consort had given the Emperor two princesses as well, but neither of them could compare in beauty to this boy. The other consorts and ladies felt no inhibitions around him—indeed, they allowed him to catch glimpses of their faces—and his own appearance was so elegant that they would experience an embarrassed excitement whenever they saw him. All the courtiers considered him exceptionally splendid, a playmate to be treated with special deference.

His formal training included instruction on the koto and flute, and word of his talents echoed throughout the palace—though if I were to go into all the details about his abilities my account would seem exaggerated, and he would come across as too good to be true.

The Emperor learned that among the members of a mission from the Korean kingdom of Koryō was a diviner skilled at the art of physiognomy. An old edict by the Emperor Uda had forbidden the presence of foreigners within the palace, so His Majesty discreetly arranged to have the young Prince meet with this man at the Kōrōkan, the residence provided for foreign missions. The Major Controller of the Right assumed the role of guardian and accompanied the boy to the mission under the pretense that he was the father of the child. The diviner was both puzzled and astounded. He tilted his head back and forth, unable to believe that this child could really be the Major Controller's son.

"The young man's features tell me he is destined to be ruler of this country," the diviner declared, "and will perhaps even attain the supreme position of Emperor. Yet if that is what fate has in store for him, I foresee chaos and great sorrow for the court. On the other hand, if his destiny is to ascend to a position such as Chancellor and act as a guardian of imperial rule, then it appears he will be a great benefactor to the state. Still, I must say that judging by his features alone, the path leading to the Chancellorship seems less likely."

The Major Controller was himself a scholar of considerable learning and discernment, and his conversations with the men of the Korean mission were deeply engaging. The party composed and exchanged verses in Chinese, and because the mission planned to leave for home in a day or two, one of the diviner's poems expressed the joy at having met such a remarkable boy face-to-face and the sorrow of having to part from him so soon. In response to the heartfelt expression of this poem, the young Prince composed an accomplished verse of his own. The diviner praised his effort as auspicious and bestowed lavish gifts on him. In return, the diviner received splendid presents from the imperial household. Naturally, news of this encounter spread through the court. His Majesty did not let on that he knew anything about it, but the grandfather of the Crown Prince, who happened to be the Minister of the Right, caught wind of the gossip and, not knowing quite what to make of it, grew suspicious.

The Emperor in his wisdom had earlier sought out the opinion of a Japanese diviner, whose reading of the boy's physiognomy accorded with his own thinking at the time. His Majesty had been holding back on installing the young Prince in the line of succession, and was thus impressed by the perspicacity of the Korean diviner, who recognized the boy's imperial lineage. Even so, he could not be sure how long his own reign would last, and he hesitated to appoint his son prince-without-rank. He anxiously wondered whether the boy, who lacked support from his mother's family, would not end up precariously adrift once he was no longer in the line of succession. For that reason he determined that the boy's prospects might be better if he were made to serve as a loyal subject of the imperial court, and so he had his son tutored accordingly in the arts and in various fields of learning. The boy was so exceptionally bright it seemed a shame to demote him to commoner status, but the Emperor knew that designating his son heir apparent would invite the calumny and scorn of the court. He consulted yet another diviner who was wise in the ways of Indic astrology, and when this new reading proved to be in line with the others and with His Majesty's own thoughts on the matter as well, he decided to confer on the boy the clan name of Minamoto—Genji<sup>5</sup>—thereby making him a commoner.

Months and years passed, but there was never a moment when the Emperor forgot his love for the lady who had resided in the chambers looking out on the paulownia courtyard. Thinking he might find someone who could assuage his grief, he had women of appropriate breeding and talents brought before him. But it was all in vain, for where in the world could he expect to find her equal? Just when he had reached the point where he found everything tiresome and was contemplating retiring from the world, an Assistant Handmaid informed him of a young woman, the Fourth Princess of the previous Emperor, whose beauty was matchless, whose reputation at court was beyond reproof, and whose mother had raised her with extraordinary care and devotion. Since this Assistant Handmaid had once served at the court of the previous Emperor, she was familiar with the mother of this young woman and accustomed to waiting on her. In the course of her service she had been able to observe the Fourth Princess as she grew from childhood, and even now would occasionally see her.

"I have served at court for three successive reigns," she told the Emperor, "and I have never before seen anyone who even closely resembles the late lady of the Kiritsubo. The daughter of the former Empress, however, definitely puts me in mind of her. She is a woman of exquisite refinement and beauty."

Could this really be true? His Majesty, who could barely contain himself, began to make some discreet inquiries.

The mother of the Fourth Princess warned her daughter about the situation at the palace. "The Kokiden Consort is a vindictive woman. Just look at the unfortunate example of the lady in the Kiritsubo. The treatment she suffered was truly appalling." Unable to decide if she should allow her daughter to go to the palace, the mother was still struggling with the Emperor's request when suddenly she passed away.

Thinking that the Princess was now helpless and alone, His Majesty again approached the young lady. "I will think of you as an equal to my own daughters," he assured her. Her ladies-in-waiting, her supporters from her mother's family, and her older brother, Prince Hyōbu, who served in the Ministry of War, were all of the opinion that attending the Emperor would bring solace to her—and in any case it certainly would be preferable to remaining in her current wretched circumstances.

So it was that she was sent to the palace and installed in the Higiyōsha, which was also called the Fujitsubo because its chambers looked out onto a courtyard graced with wisteria. The young woman was thereafter referred to as "Fujitsubo," and truly in face and figure she bore an uncanny resemblance to the deceased lady of the Kiritsubo. Fujitsubo, however, was of undeniably higher birth, and that status protected her from criticism, since the courtiers were predisposed to judge her a superior woman. Since she lacked no qualifications, the Emperor did not feel constrained in his relationship with her. The court had never accepted

5. The name "Genji" is the reading of the characters for Minamoto (gen) and "family name" (shi/ji).

His Majesty's love for the lady of the Kiritsubo, and so his affection for her was viewed as inappropriate and inopportune. The Emperor never wavered in his undying love for the lady of the paulownia-courtyard chambers, but it is a poignant fact of human nature that feelings change over time. Inevitably his attention shifted toward Fujitsubo, who, it seems, brought comfort to his heart.

Because the young Genji was always at his father's side, he was constantly in the presence of the women who attended His Majesty most frequently. These women grew familiar with the boy and gradually came to feel that they did not have to be reserved around him. Of course, none of the consorts considered herself inferior to the others, but even though each one was very attractive in her own individual way, there was no denying that they all had passed, or were on the verge of passing, the peak of their charms . . . all but Fujitsubo, that is. She still possessed the loveliness of youthful beauty and, try as she might to keep herself hidden away behind her screens, Genji, who was always nearby, would catch glimpses of her figure. He had no memory of his mother, and when he heard the head of the imperial household staff say that Fujitsubo looked just like her, his young heart ached with wistful longing—if only he could always be close to his father's new consort!

Genji and Fujitsubo were the two most precious people to the Emperor. "Do not be shy around the boy," His Majesty told Fujitsubo. "It may seem strange and curious, but I feel as though it is fitting for him to think of you as his mother. Do not think him discourteous, but cherish him for my sake. His face and expressions are so like his mother's . . . and since you resemble her so closely, you can hardly blame him for thinking of you the way he does."

After the Emperor made this request, Genji, in his boyish emotions, would try everything—even references to the transient blossoms of spring or the blazing leaves of autumn—to gain Fujitsubo's recognition of his yearning affection for her. When the Kokiden Consort learned of the unprecedented favoritism His Majesty was displaying toward these two, she once more grew cold and distant toward Fujitsubo and her retinue. Moreover, her earlier ominous dislike of Genji and his mother flared up again, and she found the boy repellent. Her son, the Crown Prince, was considered flawlessly handsome, and his reputation was above reproach. Nonetheless, he was no match for the lustrous beauty of Genji, who possessed an aura that prompted the courtiers to call him "the Radiant Prince." Because Fujitsubo was his equal in looks and in the affections of the Emperor, she came to be referred to as "the Princess of the Radiant Sun."

It pained the Emperor that his son would eventually grow out of his youthful good looks, but when Genji turned twelve, preparations were made for the coming-of-age ceremony in which his hair would be done up and his clothes and cap worn in the style of an adult. His Majesty personally tended to every little detail of the ceremony, adding touches that went beyond custom and set a new standard. The ceremony that had initiated the Crown Prince into manhood had been a spectacular affair held in the Shishinden, the great ceremonial hall of the palace. The Emperor wanted Genji's ceremony to be just as majestic and proper. He had various offices—including the Treasury and the Imperial Granaries—make formal preparations for the many banquets and celebrations that would follow the ceremony, and he left special instructions that no expense should be spared and that his directives should be carried out so as to make the occasion one of utmost splendor.

His Majesty was seated facing east under the eastern eaves of his residence in the Seiryōden, and the seats for Genji and the minister who would bestow the cap were located in front of him. Genji appeared before the Emperor at around four in the afternoon, during the Hour of the Monkey.<sup>6</sup> The lambent glow of his face, which was still framed on either side by the twin loops of his boyish hairdo, made his father feel all the more regretful about the change in appearance that was about to take place. The honor of trimming back Genji's hair fell to the Minister of the Treasury, whose face betrayed the pain he felt the moment he cut Genji's beautiful locks. The Emperor had a hard time keeping his emotions in check. If only his mother were here to see this ceremony, he thought, struggling to maintain his composure.

The capping ritual followed, and when that was finished, Genji withdrew to an antechamber to rest and change into the formal attire of an adult: an outer robe with the underarm vents sewn up. Stepping down into the garden east of the Seiryōden, he faced his father and performed obeisance, placing his ceremonial wand on the ground, rising and bowing left, right and left again, then sitting and repeating his actions to show his gratitude. He cut such a magnificent figure that all in attendance were moved to tears. As might be expected, the Emperor found it harder than the others to hide his feelings. At that moment the sad events of the past, which he normally kept himself from dwelling on, came flooding back. Since Genji was still at a tender age, His Majesty had fretted that cutting his locks and putting his hair up in the style of an adult man would spoil his looks. To his amazement the ceremony only added to Genji's aura of masculine beauty.

The Minister of the Left, who performed the capping ritual, had taken the younger sister of the Emperor as his principal wife. She gave him a daughter, whom he doted upon, raising her with the utmost care. The Minister was troubled when he learned that the Crown Prince evidently desired his daughter, because he was secretly planning to arrange a match for her with Genji. And so in the days leading up to the ceremony, he approached the Emperor with his proposal.

"I see," His Majesty replied. "Well . . . given that the boy seems to have no patrons for his coming-of-age ceremony, and since we have to select an aristocratic young woman to sleep with him on the night of his initiation, let's choose your daughter." Thus encouraged, the Minister followed through with his plans.

After the ceremony, Genji withdrew into the attendant's antechamber. As the party was making a celebratory toast in his honor, the Emperor gave permission for Genji, who had no rank, to sit at a place below the imperial princes but above the ministers. The Minister of the Left, who was seated next to him, casually dropped a few hints about his daughter, but Genji, who was still at an age when he felt diffident and embarrassed about such matters, did not respond.

An attendant from the imperial household staff brought a message from the Emperor to the Minister, requesting his presence. The Minister went to the imperial quarters, where a senior lady-in-waiting presented him with the appropriate gifts that custom demanded: a white oversized woman's robe made especially for this presentation, along with a set of three robes. His Majesty vented his pent-up emotions, presenting a cup of rice wine to the Minister and reminding him of his responsibilities toward Genji:

6. In premodern Japan the hours of the day, like the months, were designated by the signs of the Chinese zodiac. The Hour of the Monkey was about 3–5 p.m. [editor's note].

*When you with purple cords first bound his hair
Did you not also bind your heart and swear Eternal vows to give him your daughter*

The Minister composed this reply:

*So long as the deep purple of these cords that bind
Our hearts as tightly as your son's hair never fade
So our mutual vow will retain its deep hue*

He stepped down from the long bridge that connected the imperial residence in the Seiryōden and the Ceremonial Court in the Shishinden and performed obeisance in the east garden. There he received a horse from the Left Division of the Imperial Stables and a falcon caged in a mew from the Office of the Chamberlain. Princes and nobles lined up along the foot of the stairs leading down from the Seiryōden into the east garden, and they each received gifts appropriate to their rank.

Decorative boxes of thin cypress wood filled with delicacies and baskets of fruit were among the items prepared for the Emperor that day. The Major Controller of the Right, who had acted earlier as Genji's guardian, had been put in charge of the presentations. The garden overflowed with trays stacked with rice cakes flavored with various fillings and with four-legged chests of Chinese-style lacquer stuffed with presents for the lower-ranking attendants—so many that their numbers surpassed even the presentations made at the coming-of-age ceremony held for the Crown Prince. Indeed, it was an incomparably magnificent affair.

That evening, Genji departed for the residence of the Minister of the Left, which was located on Sanjō Avenue. The ceremony welcoming Genji as groom and solemnizing his wedding was conducted with unprecedented attention to proper form. Feeling a touch of dread, the Minister was captivated by the masculine beauty of Genji, who still looked quite boyish. In contrast his daughter, who at sixteen was four years older than her new husband, was put off by Genji's youthfulness and considered their match inappropriate.

The Minister enjoyed the full confidence of the Emperor. After all, his principal wife, the mother of the bride, was His Majesty's full sister. Thus, the bride came from a distinguished line on both sides of her family. Moreover, the addition of Genji to the Minister's family diminished the prestige of his rival the Minister of the Right, who as grandfather of the Crown Prince would eventually assume power as Chancellor. The Minister of the Left had numerous children by several wives. His principal wife had given him, in addition to Genji's bride, a son who was now Middle Captain in the Inner Palace Guard. This young man, Tō no Chūjō,<sup>7</sup> was exceptionally handsome, and the Minister of the Right could hardly ignore such a promising prospect, even though he was not on good terms with the Minister of the Left, his main rival for power. He therefore arranged to marry the young Tō no Chūjō to his fourth daughter, who

7. I am following custom and using this name for Genji's close friend, brother-in-law, and rival. The name Tō no Chūjō refers to his positions as Middle Captain in the Inner Palace Guard (Chūjō) and in the Office of the Chamberlain. Like most of the male characters, he is identified by his position at court throughout the narrative, but since his positions and ranks change over time, it is easier to refer to him throughout by this initial appellation.

was his greatest treasure in the world. His regard for his son-in-law was every bit as strong as that given to Genji by the Minister of the Left. For their part, the two young men forged an ideal friendship.

Because the Emperor was always summoning him, Genji found it difficult to live at his wife's residence.<sup>8</sup> In his heart, he was obsessed with the matchless beauty of the Fujitsubo Consort, who seemed to be exactly the kind of woman he wanted to take as his wife. Is there no one else like her? he wondered. He found his bride to be a woman of great charm and proper training, but he was not really attracted to her. He had been drawn to Fujitsubo when he was a child, and the torment caused by his feelings for her was excruciating. Now that he was an adult, he was no longer permitted behind the curtains of the consorts. Whenever there was a musical entertainment, he would play the flute in accompaniment to Fujitsubo's koto, his notes subtly conveying his true feelings for her. The sound of her soft voice was a comfort to him, and the only time he felt happy was when he was at the palace. He would serve there for five or six days in succession, occasionally spending a mere two or three days at his wife's residence. His father-in-law attributed Genji's behavior to his youth and did not fault him for it, but instead continued to do all he could to offer support at court. He chose only the most exceptional ladies-in-waiting to serve his son-in-law and daughter, and he went out of his way to put on the musical entertainments that Genji so enjoyed and to show him every favor.

When Genji stayed at the palace, he took up residence in the Kiritsubo. The women who had once served his mother had not been dismissed and scattered, and so they were now assigned to wait on him. Orders were sent down to the Office of Palace Repairs and to the Bureau of Skilled Artisans to rebuild and expand the former residence of Genji's mother, a villa on Nijō Avenue. The project was to be carried out so splendidly that there would be no other villa like it. The setting of the surrounding woods and hills was already unparalleled, and when the garden pond was enlarged, the result was so eye-catching that it created a stir. Genji thought wistfully that such a villa would be the perfect residence for a wife who had all the qualities of his ideal woman, Fujitsubo.

It is said that it was the Korean diviner who, in his admiration, first bestowed on Genji the sobriquet Radiant Prince.

From Chapter II

Hahakigi

BROOM CYPRESS

The Radiant Prince—a splendid, if somewhat bombastic, title. In fact, his failings were so numerous that such a lofty sobriquet was perhaps misleading. He engaged in all sorts of flings and dalliances, but he sought to keep them secret out of fear that he would become fodder for gossips who delighted in circulat-

8. Uxorilocal marriage arrangements were widespread in the Heian period, and thus it was common for a young nobleman to make his father-in-law's residence his primary abode [editor's note].

ing rumors about him and end up leaving to later generations a reputation as a careless, frivolous man. Genji was keen to avoid the censure of the court and, thus constrained, went about feigning a serious and earnest demeanor for a time, abstaining from all elegantly seductive or charming affairs. No doubt the Lesser Captain of Takano, that legendary lover, would have been amused.<sup>9</sup>

Genji was serving as Middle Captain in the Palace Guard at the time, and in fact he preferred being stationed there. Consequently, his visits to his wife, who resided at the estate of her father, the Minister of the Left, all but ceased. Although people expressed their suspicions about him, wondering if his heart wasn't in wild turmoil over a secret lover, Genji was not the sort who carried on common affairs impulsively or brazenly. There were rare occasions, however, when he strayed from his professed path of moderation, and he had an unfortunate tendency to become obsessed with relationships that brought him stress and pain, giving himself over entirely to behavior that could hardly be called proper.

During a stretch in the rainy season when there was no break in the clouds, a directional taboo<sup>1</sup> forced Genji to stay on and attend the Emperor for a longer than normal period. The members of the household of the Minister of the Left grew anxious and resentful at Genji's neglect of his wife, but they continued to arrange every detail of his wardrobe so that he would cut a remarkable figure at court. Moreover, the sons of the Minister, Genji's brothers-in law, would spend all their free time in Genji's palace quarters when they happened to be in service. One of these sons, Tō no Chūjō, was a Middle Captain who also served in the Office of the Chamberlain. He was a full sibling to Genji's wife—he and his sister had both been born to Princess Ōmiya—and of all the Minister's children he was closest to Genji and could behave in a more intimate and relaxed manner in his friend's presence at entertainments and amusements. Tō no Chūjō preferred the company of Genji because the residence that his own father-in-law, the Minister of the Right, had painstakingly provided and maintained for him and his wife was a dreary, uninspiring place. It must be added that he was fond of having affairs with other women.

Tō no Chūjō also had dazzlingly furnished quarters at his father's residence at Sanjō, but he was always accompanying Genji on his comings and goings. They were constantly together, day and night, pursuing the same interests and diversions, and he in no way lagged behind the Radiant Prince in his accomplishments. Because they were inseparable, it was natural that they did not stand on ceremony with one another. They never kept their innermost feelings hidden, but displayed an easygoing harmony whenever they spoke.

They had endured an especially tedious day, having spent the time in idleness on account of the interminable rain, and because the palace seemed practically deserted during the early evening hours, Genji's quarters took on a more relaxed atmosphere than usual. Drawing an oil lamp beside him, Genji perused some Chinese classics. Tō no Chūjō pulled out some letters written on paper of vari-

9. The tale of the amorous Lesser Captain of Takano referred to here has not survived.

1. A directional taboo, or prohibition, required a person to avoid traveling in a certain direction so as not to disturb gods whose movements over time were predictable (based on Chinese zodiacal and calendrical practices) and could be charted by the Bureau of Divination. Such prohibitions were often used as a convenient excuse for a gentleman to avoid meeting his wife or lover [editor's note].

ous hues from a small cabinet near him and was seized by the desire to read them. Genji would not allow that, but he did say, "I'll let you look at a few of the more appropriate ones . . . there are several I'd be ashamed for you to read."

Tō no Chūjō resented his friend's refusal. "But it's just those letters you don't feel free to share with me that I'm curious to see. I've exchanged many letters of the most common variety with ladies of all ranks, and at the time we were corresponding I couldn't wait to read them. Yet when I reread them now, the only ones really worthwhile were written when the women were being petulant or impatient with me for keeping them waiting."

Despite his protests, he knew full well that Genji would never have letters from high-ranking ladies—letters that had to be kept strictly confidential—lying scattered about in a commonplace cabinet like this where anyone could see them. Genji would certainly hide his most intriguing missives in a secret location, and would be comfortable sharing only those from easygoing ladies of decidedly second-rate backgrounds.

"Well, you certainly have a lot of them, don't you?" said Tō no Chūjō, who went on to interrogate Genji about the author of each of the missives. He found it amusing that his suppositions and guesses about the letters were sometimes right on the money, and other times wildly off the mark. Still, Genji gave very little away, and, by leading his friend on, he managed to disguise the identities of the letter writers.

"You must have a great number of letters at your place," said Genji. "I'd really like to take a peek at them. If you let me, I'll gladly open this cabinet to you."

"I have very few worth looking at," Tō no Chūjō answered. "You see, I've come to the realization that as far as women are concerned, there aren't many who are flawless enough to make you think she's the one. I've come across many who have passable skills in the arts, who can write flowing characters that create an impression of superficial elegance, who show a kind of facile understanding of how to respond in verse on certain occasions. Yet even when one chooses a woman on the basis of such accomplishments, she almost always fails to live up to the expectations created by her talents and disappoints in the end. She'll swell with pride, going on and on about her own accomplishments, looking down on others and, all in all, behaving rather foolishly. Her parents are always waiting on her, spoiling her with affection and lavishing attention, keeping their precious little princess hidden away in the recesses of their estates until some man hears about her extraordinary gifts and gets all worked up. Beautiful, young, and carefree, with little to distract her, she'll follow the lead of others, dedicate herself to some trivial diversion, and as a result acquire and perfect some skill. Naturally, those who look after her keep silent about her flaws, keeping up appearances and spreading plausible-sounding rumors that make her seem better than she really is. Since such rumors are all a man has to go on, can he really afford to assume the worst about her without actually meeting her? So a man goes about, wondering if she's the genuine article, and when they finally meet . . . well, it's rare that a woman actually lives up to her reputation."

Listening to Tō no Chūjō's lament, which gave the impression of a world-weary man who had experienced the shame of such disappointments, Genji smiled wryly. Although he knew that his friend's account of women was hardly the whole of the matter, he had had a few affairs that matched Tō no Chūjō's experiences.

"Can there really be women," Genji asked, "who lack even the most trivial merits?"

"I'm not saying that," Tō no Chūjō responded. "Who would be foolish enough to be drawn to a woman with absolutely no talent? A woman who has nothing to recommend her is as rare as one who is perfect in every way. My point is that a woman who is born into the nobility is raised with the greatest care, which includes concealing her many faults. So of course she's going to look superior to other women. A woman born into a family of middling rank will reveal her sensibility and habits of mind with a style and personality all her own, and so you would expect to discover various things that distinguish her from others. As for women of the lowest class . . . well, I'm not especially interested in learning anything about them."

Genji's curiosity was piqued by the worldly posture his friend had assumed. "I wonder about your standards. Can you really classify all women on the basis of just three levels? How do you discriminate between a woman born of a noble family . . . say rank three or above . . . whose social position has been ruined and whose rank has fallen so that it is indistinguishable from others, and a woman of less distinguished background . . . say rank four or lower . . . whose family has so prospered at court that they can now lavishly furnish her residence and adopt a smug attitude that proclaims their daughter inferior to no one?"

Just as Genji posed his question, the Warden of the Left Mounted Guard and the Junior Secretary from the Ministry of Rites showed up, explaining that directional prohibitions for that day were keeping them confined to the palace. They both had reputations as elegant lovers, and since they were also eloquent speakers—fluent, logical, and precise—Tō no Chūjō was eager to detain them and get their opinions on his idea of classifying women according to three levels. Their subsequent conversation touched upon topics of a highly questionable and even slightly disreputable nature.

The Warden addressed the matter straightaway. "A woman who is a parvenu will likely be judged by court society as inferior despite her rise in status, especially if her pedigree is not appropriate to her rank. On the other hand, a woman who may have a distinguished pedigree, but who lacks the means to make her way at court, will see her fortunes and position diminish over time, and her prospects and reputation crumble away until she cannot maintain her status in spite of her pride. Events will then conspire to make her situation more and more untenable. Looking at each of these types of women, I'm afraid we have to relegate them both to your middle category. Provincial governors toil away, tied up with petty people and affairs, but even among that lot, consigned to a middling station in life, there are various gradations that distinguish them. We live in an age when we sometimes find governors who are really not at all inferior, even though they come from the middle ranks. Actually, there are some of the fourth rank who are qualified to serve as a counselor, who have unsullied reputations and comfortable fortunes and prospects, and who are easier to take than some inexperienced or immature nobility of higher rank. There are many instances of such men who maintain splendid households where their daughters are nurtured with the utmost care. Nothing is lacking, nothing held back, no expense spared to raise them in the most dazzling manner . . . and as a result they grow into excellent young ladies who are beyond reproach. These women go into court service and many of them find unexpected good fortune, marrying above their station."

Genji smiled at that. "I guess that when all is said and done, the key is finding a girl from a rich family."

Tō no Chūjō responded petulantly. "Now you're talking nonsense. Such a remark is not worthy of you."

The Warden continued his disquisition: "The highborn lady who brings together both pedigree and public reputation, yet who in private lacks personal breeding and manners, is eccentric and not worth discussing. She's the type who makes you wonder in disappointment how she could have been brought up like that. Of course, it strikes you as perfectly natural when a woman's pedigree and reputation are in harmony and her character is flawless. So you assume that's the way things ought to be and aren't surprised by her, even though such a woman is a rarity. But perhaps I should set aside any discussion of the highest-ranking ladies, for someone as lowly as I could never be on their level.

"Beyond these types, you sometimes unexpectedly come across an adorable, defenseless girl whose existence is unknown to court society. She lives in a lonely, sublimely dilapidated residence shut away from the world behind a gate overgrown with weeds, and so of course you think of her as an exceptionally rare find. You're mysteriously drawn to her, your imagination stimulated by the things that make her different, and you wonder how she could have ended up in a place like that. Her father is likely to be some pathetic, overweight old man, her brothers probably all have unpleasant faces, and there in the women's quarters in the inner recesses of the residence . . . which, no matter how you try to imagine it, is nothing out of the ordinary . . . is a fiercely proud lady with all the refined demeanor of one who has somehow managed to acquire some accomplishments, even if she is not of the first rank and thus not all that much to talk about. And yet because you would never expect to find a woman like that in such a place, how could you not find her alluring? Of course, you can't compare the discovery of a woman like that to opting for a flawless woman of superior rank, but by the same token it is difficult to simply toss her aside."

The Warden glanced knowingly at the Junior Secretary, who, interpreting the expression as a subtle reference to the flawless reputation of his own sister, kept his counsel on the matter.

Genji seemed lost in thought: I wonder about all this. Are there really women like that out in the world? After all, when I consider my wife, there don't seem to be any perfect women among the highest classes.

Genji was dressed in an intentionally casual manner in an informal robe, minus trousers, over soft white under-robos. He had neglected to tie up the cords of his outer robes, and as he half-reclined amidst his books and papers in the dim shadows cast by the lamp, he cut such an attractive figure that the other men felt a desire to see him as a woman. He was so beautiful that pairing him with the very finest of the ladies at the court would fail to do him justice.

During the course of the young men's discussion of various types of women, the Warden remarked, "There are women who are flawless enough for a commonplace affair, but when the time comes to take a wife, you find it impossible to decide even if you have a large number of women to choose from. The same is true of men who serve at court and are expected to be rock-solid pillars of society. It proves quite difficult to produce a man of true worth and ability, and so no matter how gifted or clever he may be, in the end there will never be more than one or two who are fit to govern. That's why superior people command their inferiors, and inferiors follow their superiors, mutually accommodating each other to carry out public affairs.

"Now then, just consider the person who is to take charge of the private affairs of your household. It wouldn't do at all if she doesn't have the proper qualifications. That being the case, a man is naturally going to look around because he knows that a woman may possess some good qualities while lacking others. After all, it is rare to find one who, though maybe not perfect, is at least acceptable . . . and even a man who is not inclined to compare the appearance of one woman to another is going to take great care in making his decision, since the one he chooses will be his mate for life. All things being equal, he will take someone whose tastes match his own and who does not have the kind of flaws he must spend all his time correcting and setting in order. Well, this is all very hard, and a woman is not necessarily going to fulfill all of a man's expectations. That's why a man who does not allow his affections to stray, who focuses his attention on one woman and does not discard the karmic bonds of his first marriage vows, will always be seen as sincere, honest, and loyal. And a woman who is able to keep her husband from straying is the one we take to be refined and attractive.

"Given all that—how should I put this?—having observed all sorts of relationships in society, I can't help having doubts as to whether there is any woman who is perfectly elegant, or who can live up to the ideals in a man's heart. In the case of your lordships, what kind of woman could ever be worthy enough to meet your exalted standards? No doubt she would have to be young and beautiful and beyond reproach in every way. She would be well versed in composition, but her choice of words would be modest and her brushstrokes light and delicate, leaving you a little agitated and longing for a more revealing response. You are forced to wait, feeling unbearably impatient until that moment when you can get close enough to her to make your advances and exchange a few words. But she will say very little, speaking under her breath in a faint voice that shows how adept she is at concealing her flaws. Just when you think she is most pliant and feminine, she starts to fret about whether or not you really love her. And then when you humor her, she becomes flirtatious. This has to be the worst fault in women.

"Above all, a wife must never neglect her duty to assist her husband. A husband can get along well enough if a woman is not too emotionally demanding, does not make a big fuss over niceties, and doesn't give herself over to fashion. Of course, a man doesn't want a wife who is too serious, who busies herself with supporting her husband and managing the household to the extent that she keeps her hair swept back all the time, exposing her ears and making herself unattractive. A man who goes to work in the morning and returns home in the evening doesn't want to have to go to the trouble of talking with a stranger about the odd behavior of people he has encountered in public and private or about the good and bad things he has seen and heard. If he has a wife who is close to him and will listen to his stories and understand him, then doesn't he assume he should be able to discuss such matters with her? Maybe he suddenly recalls something and smiles, or perhaps tears come to his eyes, or maybe he relives some feeling of righteous indignation at something that happened to someone. Or he might have feelings that he just cannot keep to himself and thinks he might share them with her and ask her opinion. But if she is unattractive or too preoccupied to understand, he ends up turning away from her in disillusionment. Remembering something he has kept inside, a thought that makes him laugh or let out an audible sigh, he will mention it, almost as if speaking to himself, and all she will do is look up with a blank expression and reply, 'Did you just say something?' What man wouldn't regret marrying someone like that?

"When all is said and done, we men really should consider picking a completely childlike, compliant woman . . . a woman we can mold into an acceptable and flawless wife. Even when she gives you some cause for concern, you still have the feeling that there is some value in disciplining her. When you are with such a woman face to face, she is truly vulnerable and precious to you, and you are compelled to view her faults through forgiving eyes. Even so, there will be occasions when you have to be apart, and you tell her about something important that must be done, or give her some task, trivial or practical, that must be carried out to the letter. It will turn out that she cannot act on her own and is unable to do things as you instructed. This is really quite annoying and her unreliability will cause you no end of trouble. Why does it always seem that it's the cold, distant, slightly unpleasant woman who, depending on the occasion, is able to perform well in front of others and bring honor to your house?"

The Warden had tried to cover all aspects of the subject, but he was unable to come to any firm conclusions. Instead, he finished his analysis by heaving a great sigh. "Considering all of this," he continued, "you can't choose a wife solely on the basis of her family background, and certainly not on the basis of her looks alone. If you can find a woman who is not so strange or demure as to make you regret your choice, if she is serious through and through and has a quiet personality, then you ought to consider her dependable. Should she have any talents beyond these basic qualifications or be sweet-tempered, you should count yourself lucky. Even if she is deficient in certain respects, you shouldn't make unreasonable demands for her to improve. So long as she is morally upright and not fretful or jealous, then she will over time acquire an outward grace. Her comportment will be modest, she will protect her honor, and she will endure things she has a right to complain about, hiding her resentment behind feigned ignorance or pretending to be nonchalant.

"Unfortunately, there are cases where a woman can no longer suppress the emotions that have been building up inside her heart, and she will leave behind some fierce words that chill your soul, or compose a moving poem to which she has attached a memento that will remind you of her, then hide herself away in some village deep in the mountains or on a deserted strand along the shore. When I was a child I would hear stories like that, which the ladies-in-waiting would read aloud, and I found them so touching I was moved to tears. Now, when I think back on it, their tales seem frivolous and overly dramatic. A woman who casts aside a man who has deep feelings for her and runs off to hide in utter disregard of the husband's feelings, even when she has just cause for being upset, will stir anxieties that last a lifetime. The whole affair is extremely tiresome. Some people will praise her actions, saying how exquisitely profound her emotions are, and as a result her feelings of sad regret will accumulate to the point where she decides to become a nun. Having made up her mind, her heart seems pure and serene and she can no longer even consider returning to her former life. Her acquaintances come to call on her, telling her how melancholy it is that things should have come to this. When her husband hears of this he weeps, and the messenger and older ladies-in-waiting tell her what a shame it is and how sad that her husband has such deep feelings. The woman, who still has lingering affection for him, will then realize she had no reason to throw away his love. She will gather together the hair she had clipped from her forehead when she took vows as a nun and, feeling forlorn and helpless now that there is no turning back, will break down and cry. Though she had kept her emotions in check up to that moment, once she gives in to her feelings she is no longer able to hold back her tears whenever she considers her situation. Because she now seems to have so many regrets, the Buddha himself must look at her as one whose heart is tainted by base attachments. Halfhearted devotion to the Buddha is an even more certain path to Hell than being mired in the five evils of earthly existence.<sup>2</sup> Even if the marital bond was deep enough that the husband takes her back before she renounces the world, is there any couple that would not harbor at least some resentment upon recalling such an incident? For better or worse they live together as husband and wife, and their relationship is based on a deep karmic bond and shared emotions that can weather almost anything that might happen. Yet whenever a wife runs away, can any couple ever completely put aside their feelings of mutual reproach?

"It is folly for a wife to resent her husband, display her anger, and quarrel obsessively over some little affair he has had on the side. A man's affections may stray, but so long as he is still capable of the kind of feelings he had for her when they were first married, then she has good reason to think that their relationship has strong emotional bonds. If she makes a big fuss over his dalliances, however, those bonds may be cut for good.

"In general, then, a woman should be modest in all things. She should give a gentle hint when she knows something is going on that justifies her resentment. Or she should imply, without being spiteful, that there have been some occasions that have bothered her. If she behaves in such a way, her husband's regard for her will surely increase. Most of the time a man's wandering heart can be calmed by the guidance of his wife. A woman who is too lenient and turns a blind eye to her husband's behavior may in contrast seem easygoing and lovable, but in the end she will be dismissed as frivolous. As Bai Juyi put it, 'Who can tell where an unmoored ship will drift?'<sup>3</sup> Isn't that the truth?"

Tō no Chūjō nodded and replied, "Staying on the same subject, it's a serious matter when a person you like for their charm and sensitivity gives you cause to wonder if they can be trusted. Although people may choose to put up with their partner's wayward behavior and even fool themselves into believing they see some improvement, that doesn't mean that the wayward partner has reformed. In any case, when an indiscretion brings discord to a marriage, there is probably no better recourse than to calmly ignore it." His remarks described perfectly the situation of his own sister, which was no doubt his intention, and

2. In Buddhism the five evils are lust, wrath, greed, worldly attachment, and pride (ego).

3. A reference to a poem on marriage included in the collected writings of Bai (Bo) Juyi.

so it irritated him that her husband, Genji, was not joining in the discussion but was pretending to nod off instead.

The Warden, who now found himself regarded as the expert on such matters, whinnied on and on. Tō no Chūjō, who wanted to hear what he had to say, assumed the role of disciple and listened eagerly.

"Compare women to artisans, if you will," the Warden continued. "For example, a woodworker may indulge his imagination and create all sorts of items . . . toys meant for a moment's diversion, objects not based on any model or pattern. These things look fashionable and amaze you with the cleverness of their construction, and insofar as they are new and different and in keeping with the times, they attract attention as modern and up-to-date and so have a certain charm. Yet when one has something of true beauty made properly . . . formal furnishings, say, or some decorative object for your residence that has a conventional form . . . the distinction between a maker of novelties and a master craftsman is plain for all to see. To take another example, there are many skilled painters at the palace, but when you have to pick one to do basic sketching for a work, it's hard to tell at a glance which ones are the truly skilled artists. Paintings that present startling scenes of the mountains on the Isle of Hōrai where the immortals dwell, or that show the stern visages of beasts from exotic lands or the faces of demons no man has ever seen, all give play to the imagination and astonish our eyes, since they bear no resemblance to the real world. Such works are fine, given what they are, and any painter should be able to execute them. But when it comes to realistically depicting scenes in the everyday world . . . mountain vistas, flowing streams, the appearance of our dwellings . . . what matters is the attention to detail and technique a master painter brings to his representation of both serenely commonplace objects and steep, rugged landscapes. Whether creating the impression that one is far removed from society by piling up layer upon layer of thick foliage, or giving one a sense of familiarity and comfort by foregrounding a garden enclosed by a bamboo fence, all such effects require a special power and grace far beyond the skills of an ordinary artist.

"Or take calligraphy. Even a person with no real knowledge of the art can add a flourish here and there to create the impression . . . at least at a cursory glance . . . that he has great talent, while a person who can in fact write with true skill and care may appear to lack the ability of a master. But when you compare the works of such people side by side, you can see that the latter is closer to the genuine thing. So it is with all trivial matters of art and pleasure. I know that when it comes to human emotions, it is even more the case that you cannot trust the affected elegance a woman puts on for show on a special occasion. Shall I tell you how I came by this knowledge, though I may have to speak indiscreetly about an affair?" He shifted a little closer, and Genji woke up. Tō no Chūjō was sitting across from him, his chin cupped in his hands, listening in earnest anticipation. It made for a charming tableau, resembling a scene in which a learned priest expounds on the ways of the world. It was the kind of moment, however, when young men find it hard to keep their relationships secret.

"Some time ago," the Warden resumed, "when I was still a very low-ranking official, I was quite taken with a young woman. But, as I presumed to mention to Your Highnesses earlier, she was not exceptionally beautiful, and so I decided in my youthful, fickle heart that I would not take her as my main wife. Though I thought of her as someone I could always turn to and rely on, there was something lacking, and I was sure I could do better. So I played around and cheated on her, and when she became distressingly jealous, she lost favor with me. I kept hoping that she would not be like that, and wanted her to be a little less sensitive. While I found it irksome that she was so unforgiving and suspicious, I was also puzzled that she had lost patience with a man of such a low rank as I. At the same time, I couldn't understand why she still had feelings for me. I often felt sorry for her, and so I eventually brought my tendency to stray under control.

"Her temperament was such that somehow or another she contrived to do her best for me, even in matters for which she had no innate ability. She prodded herself, ashamed of faults she didn't want others to see, and she earnestly supported me in every way, trying her best never to go against my wishes in even the slightest matter. At the beginning I had thought of her as a strong-willed woman, but in the end she was yielding and accommodating. She worried that she might put me off if she did not make herself attractive, and whenever she allowed herself to be seen by someone not close to her, she would fret about it, feeling that perhaps she had shamed her husband. She did her utmost to maintain her wifely virtue, and as we grew accustomed to living as husband and wife, I was not at all ill disposed toward her except for that one detestable flaw . . . her jealousy, which she could not control.

"At the time she seemed so absurdly obedient and fearful, I thought I should teach her a lesson . . . you know, shake her up a little so she would stop being jealous and mend her ways. So I pretended I was truly fed up and that we should break off our relationship. Since she had previously shown only a submissive attitude to me, I thought for sure I could teach her a lesson and intentionally treated her with wretched callousness. When, as usual, she got angry, I told her that if she were going to be so willful and disagreeable, I would put an end to our marriage and not meet her again despite the deep bond we shared as husband and wife. I said, 'If you really want us to separate, just keep harboring your baseless suspicions. But if you want us to have a long future together, then you have to accept that there will be hardships and try to not let things bother you. Rid yourself of your twisted disposition, and I will find you endearing. As soon as I work my way up at court and achieve respectable status, no other woman will ever compete with you for my devotion.' I thought I was being so clever in straightening her out with such assertive words, but she just smiled vaguely and replied, 'It doesn't bother or worry me that you are in a period in your life when you have neither status nor distinction, nor am I waiting impatiently for you to achieve success. But I find it painfully unbearable to have to always hide my feeling of wretchedness and rely on the uncertain hope that as the months and years go by the day will finally arrive when you reform your behavior. So the time has come when we must go our separate ways.' Her spiteful words made me very angry and I said a number of hateful things to her. At that point the woman, unable to control her passions, grabbed my hand and bit one of my fingers. I put on a show of outrage and, holding out my crooked finger, stalked out. 'Now that you've disfigured me like this,' I threatened, 'how can I possibly show myself at court? You yourself said I'm of no consequence, so now that you've done this, how do you expect me to get ahead? If this is how things are, then it looks like we really are through once and for all.' I composed a poem:

*As I bend my wounded fingers counting
The times I called on you, your flaws it seems
Are not confined to jealousy alone*

'You won't have me to resent anymore,' I said, and as expected she burst into tears and shot back:

*Having counted in my heart the times
I showed restraint at your behavior
Now I have to take my hand from yours*

"She challenged me in this manner, and even though I did not believe our relationship would really change, I drifted about seeing women here and there and let many days pass without once communicating with her. Then one night, near the end of the eleventh month, I was detained at the palace in order to rehearse music and dance for the Rinji Festival at the Kamo Shrine. A miserable sleet was falling that night, and as I was saying goodbye to my companions, who were going their separate ways, it occurred to me that I had no other place to go but hers. Sleeping at the palace seemed a dreary prospect, and the thought of visiting some woman who puts on an air of refined elegance chilled me to the bone. And so, all the while wondering what she thought about me, I went to peek in on her and see how she was faring. As I brushed the snow off myself, I felt constrained by feelings of embarrassment, and yet I hoped that perhaps tonight her icy resentment had thawed. The lamps had been dimmed and turned toward the walls, and softly padded robes had been plumped up and hung over a large filigree basket to be warmed and perfumed. The blinds were raised just as they were supposed to be, and the room gave the appearance that she had been waiting for me to return that very evening. Since everything was prepared just to my liking, I felt a swelling pride until I noticed she was nowhere to be found. Only the women who served her were there, as I had expected, and they told me she had gone to her parents' residence for the evening. She had left no elegant poem to rouse my interest, no word at all that she was anxious to see me. She had simply left and locked herself away, showing no consideration for me. I was quite let down and couldn't help wondering if her unyielding spitefulness wasn't implicitly signaling to me that I should go ahead and hate her if I wanted. The rooms gave no indication she was having an affair . . . was her aim to make me angry and suspicious of her? Yet the hues and stitching of the robes she had laid out for me were prepared with more than normal care, just as I would have wished. Clearly she was taking care to look after me even though she now assumed I had abandoned her.

"Things being the way they were, I figured she would never cut me off completely, and so I tried to downplay our spat and make up with her. And though she did not defy me by hiding herself away and making me run around looking for her or by replying in a way that would cause me embarrassment, still she told me, 'I cannot continue putting up with you the way you are now. If you reform and develop a more steady disposition, then maybe we can see each other.' Even though she spoke to me like that, I was convinced she could never leave me, and so I thought I'd let her stew a while longer to punish her. 'All right, then, let's do as you suggest,' I told her, showing her just how stubborn I could be. She suffered so much during that time that at last she died. I knew then that I should never have made light of her, and I can't help thinking now that it's good enough for a man if his wife is someone who is wholly dependable. It was always worthwhile talking to her, regardless of whether we were discussing some trivial, passing matter or an important issue. She was so skilled at dyeing cloth that it's no exaggeration to compare her to the goddess of fall foliage, Princess Tatsuta herself. And when it came to weaving, she was as skillful as the Celestial Weaver Maid we celebrate at Tanabata.<sup>4</sup> Gifted in such ways, she was an exceptional wife."

The Warden felt a keen sorrow at the memory. Tō no Chūjō tried to console him, saying, "Her weaving may have been unsurpassed, but her real virtue was following the example of the Celestial Weaver Maid, who faithfully keeps her vow of love with the Herdsman. The fact is, you cannot expect to find someone again whose weaving compares with that of Princess Tatsuta. When the passing flowers or autumn foliage are not in harmony with the hues of the season, they do not stand out as brightly, and their beauty dissipates. Women are just like that . . . their beauty passing out of season. That's why it's so difficult in this hard life to decide upon a wife."

These words acted as encouragement to the Warden, who promptly resumed his discussion. "After she died, I started calling on a woman whose family lineage was peerless and who seemed to have an exquisitely refined temperament. She wrote poetry in a flowing hand, was well trained in the plucking style of the koto, and sang like a master. I couldn't find any flaws in anything I saw or heard of her. She was also passably good-looking, and so even while I continued to be on familiar terms with the woman who bit my finger, I was also secretly visiting this other woman and eventually grew very attracted to her. After the death of my wife, while I was grieving and wondering what I should do, I came to the realization that nothing could be done for those who have died and started visiting the other woman more frequently. After I became familiar with her, I began to notice that she was somewhat ostentatious . . . and flirtatious. Since she did not seem to be the sort of woman I could trust, I began to keep my distance a little, and when I did so she started meeting another man in secret.

"It was an autumn evening during the tenth month. The moon was bright and seductive, and as I set out from the palace I encountered a certain high-ranking courtier. We got into my carriage together, and though I was intending to stay the night at the home of my father, who was a Major Counselor at the time, this courtier told me he was quite eager to stop by a certain place where a woman was waiting for him. Because the house he mentioned happened to be on the way to my father's house, I caught a glimpse of its garden through the fence and saw the moon shimmering on the surface of the pond. Finding it hard to pass by a dwelling where even the moon seemed to have taken up residence, I dismounted the

4. Tanabata is a festival on the seventh day of the seventh lunar month that celebrates the annual meeting of the young lovers Orihime (the Celestial Weaver Maid, i.e., the star Vega) and Hikoboshi (the Celestial Oxherd, i.e., the star Altair). Because their love distracted them from their heavenly responsibilities, they were separated by the Milky Way and are allowed to meet only once a year, crossing over a bridge formed by the wings of a flock of magpies. Princess Tatsuta (Tatsuta-hime) is the goddess of fall who weaves the brocade of autumn foliage on Mount Tatsuta. She is thus the patron goddess of weaving and dyeing.

carriage with the man. He apparently had had this sort of rendezvous before and seemed very excited when he sat down on the widely spaced boards of an open veranda near the inner gate. He struck a dashing pose as he gazed up at the moon. Chrysanthemums, their colors faded by the autumn frost, were arrayed gorgeously, and the scarlet profusion of scattered maple leaves rustling in the breeze looked magnificent. The man took out a flute from the breast fold of his robe and began to play various popular saibara such as “The Shade Is Good.”<sup>5</sup> He also sang a few verses: ‘Let us tarry awhile at the well of Asuka, the shade is good, the waters cool, the grasses inviting . . .’ The woman inside accompanied him skillfully, having apparently readied her six-string koto. Her instrument reverberated clearly, and she played it flawlessly, softly, having tuned it to a folksy minor key, and the sound that wafted from the other side of the bamboo blinds seemed quite fashionably modern, a perfect accompaniment to the pure autumn moon. The man was charmed and impressed and moved closer to the blind. Alluding to a poem about visiting the abode of a beautiful woman, he tried to get a response from her, saying, ‘I see no trace of anyone having disturbed the fallen leaves in your garden.’ He picked some chrysanthemums and composed a poem:

*How lovely are the peerless moon
And music here . . . yet do they draw
None but coldhearted men to you*

‘I hear you have spoken ill of me. But never mind. Let me have one more song. When a person you want to encourage to listen is present, you should put all your skills on display.’ The woman replied to his brazen bantering, affecting a disinterested voice:

*A leaf can never hope to stay the autumn breeze
Any more than words or music could make tarry
This flutist who accompanies the bitter wind*

“She responded seductively, unaware that I was witness to her distasteful forwardness. She then switched to a larger thirteen-string koto tuned to the ban-shiki mode,<sup>6</sup> darker in tone and thus appropriate for the season. Her style of plucking was lively and contemporary, and yet even though her playing sparkled, listening to her left me feeling unsettled and embarrassed. When a lady you are seeing intimately from time to time goes out of her way to be fashionably elegant, she is certainly very alluring, at least on those infrequent occasions when you actually meet. But if on one of your rare visits a woman you are considering as a possible mate behaves too voluptuously, then you begin to grow wary and worry she might not be reliable after all. On the basis of what I observed that evening, I decided to end my affair with that lady.

“Though I was young and inexperienced at the time, when I look back and compare those two women, their capriciousness made them seem inscrutable and unreliable to me. And from now on I will likely be even more inclined to feel that way about women. Your lordships may take delight only in the pleasures of those fragile and fleeting charms of a young lady whom poets would liken to the dew on bush clover that scatters when you pluck the flower, or to sleet on leaves of dwarf bamboo that melts away at your touch. But though you may feel that way now, just wait another seven years, and when you reach my age you will think the same way I do. Please take my poor, humble advice and be careful with women who lead you on. They'll cheat on you and make you look foolish in the eyes of others."

5. The genre of music referred to here, the saibara, was a popular form in which the lyrics of folk songs (usually) were set to Chinese music. Lines from various saibara appear throughout the narrative.

6. This is one of six modes (or keys) used in gagaku, Japanese court music, which is based largely on the court music of Tang China. The various modes usually had seasonal or poetic associations.

And so he advised them.

Tō no Chūjō continued to nod his head.

Genji smiled faintly, apparently agreeing with the Warden, then remarked, "It seems in both cases your romantic escapades were awkward and unlucky." They all had a good laugh.

Tō no Chūjō spoke up next: "I'd like to tell you about a foolish woman I knew. I started seeing her in secret, and because it looked as though I would have to keep seeing her on the sly, I didn't think our affair would last. But as we grew intimate I came to have deeper feelings for her, and even though I could not meet her very often, I simply couldn't get her out of my mind. Eventually our relationship reached the stage where I could see she trusted me, and many times I honestly thought if she depends on me so much, then there must be things I do that upset her. If there were, however, she never let on about them. Even when I did not visit her for long stretches, she did not jealously resent me or think me inconsiderate. Instead, she kept up appearances morning and night, as if she expected me every day. She was so meek and docile that I was moved to pity and assured her that she could always rely on me.

"She had no parents and was quite lonely and helpless. That's why I found it touching that she apparently thought of me as her provider. She was so quiet and unassuming that I was unconcerned and let my guard down. But then, during one of those long stretches when I did not call on her, she received some rather deplorable messages from my wife's household . . . messages that implied threats against her. Unfortunately, I heard about that only much later.

"I was unaware there had been such unpleasantness, and even though I had not forgotten her, we went so long without exchanging a word that she grew despondent. She was so wretched worrying over the baby girl I had fathered by her that she sent me a wild pink, suggesting, I suppose, that the child was like the flower, hidden from sight and easy to overlook." Tears welled up in Tō no Chūjō's eyes.

"And the letter that accompanied the flower?" asked Genji.

"Nothing special, really," he replied. "She sent this poem:

*The hedge around the hut of the mountain peasant Grows untended now . . . let fall your tender mercy
Let it fall like dew and settle on this wild pink<sup>7</sup>*

7. The word I have translated as "wild pink" is nadeshiko. In the two poems that follow immediately below, the word for wild pink is tokonatsu. Although the two names refer to the exact same flower, Murasaki Shikibu uses both in this sequence of poems to distinguish between mother and child. In the first poem, nadeshiko refers to Tō no Chūjō's child by his

“With her verse fresh in my mind, I went to see her. She was as faithful and uncomplaining as ever, but her face was worn with care. It was autumn, and as she gazed out from her dilapidated house at the overgrown garden drenched in dew, her tearful expression seemed to vie in sadness with the melancholy chirring of the bell crickets. I felt as though I were part of some old romance:

*I cannot judge which of these flowers is fairest
Their colors mingling in never-ending summer
But there is none dearer than my little wild pink*

“I turned my attention from the child and comforted the lady by reminding her of the old poem in which a lover promises to visit always, so that dust never settles on their bed.<sup>8</sup> She replied with this.

*Autumn arrives and rough winds shake
Dew from wild pinks and tears from sleeves
That wipe dust from my lonely bed*

“She spoke casually, giving no hint that she harbored any serious resentment. Even when she wept, she seemed ashamed and awkward and tried to hide her face from me. It pained her to think that I might view her suffering as accusatory, and that attitude so reassured me about our relationship that I did not visit her again for a long time. During that interval she ran off, disappearing without a trace.

“She may still be alive somewhere, but her situation must be precarious and uncertain. If only she had given me some indication of how strongly attached she was to me at that moment when I was so moved by her plight, then she would never have had to run away like that. I would never have neglected her as I did but would have treated her properly, just like any other woman I called on, and looked after her forever. I cherished that little wild pink and so assumed I would always be able to visit her. But now I am unable to track her whereabouts. Certainly this woman is an example of the unreliable type you mentioned earlier. She appeared so unruffled, never letting on that she found my treatment of her cruel, but in the end my feelings for her, which had never waned, turned out to be nothing more than a futile, one-sided love. Now, even as I am slowly getting her out of my heart, I sometimes think about her, imagining that she has not forgotten me altogether . . . that there are evenings when lover, while in the second and third poems tokonatsu refers to the woman. Both nadeshiko and tokonatsu may be identified as other flowers (e.g., a carnation or a gillyflower), but both are generic names for pinks. I have chosen to use the name “wild pink” to suggest the well-worn theme in the tradition of Japanese literature that Murasaki Shikibu drew on of a beautiful lover who is discovered by a man in an out-of-the-way place, like a wildflower growing in a hidden spot. The two poems below also play on the word tokonatsu, which is a homophone for “never-ending summer,” and which has an element, toko, that is a homophone for “bed.” [The mother appears in chapter 4 (Yūgao) as Genji’s lover, the lady of the Evening Faces. The little girl is the future Tamakazura, who will later be taken in by Genji. In chapter 25, included below, she discusses with Genji the virtues and vices of romantic tales—Editor’s note].

---

8. Kokinshū 167 (Ōshikōchi no Mitsune): “I long to stop even a mote of dust from settling on this bed of pinks that have come into bloom since first you and I lay on our bed.”

she realizes she cannot blame anyone else for her predicament and her heart smolders with regret. She is certainly the type of woman you cannot rely on or hold to for very long.

"Although a difficult woman is memorable, and thus hard to get out of your mind, when things do not go well and you find it troublesome to continue seeing her . . . as you found with the woman who bit your finger . . . you tire of the relationship. And a talented woman like your koto player is almost certain to be burdened by the sin of infidelity. As for the woman I spoke of, she was so utterly lacking in character that I have doubts about her as well. So I have reached the point where I find it impossible to choose which type of woman is best. It has proven difficult to compare each respective relationship between men and women in this manner. Where is the woman who could combine the virtues of the three women we discussed without inevitably bringing with her all their unmanageable flaws? Set your sights on the beautiful goddess of fortune, Kichijōten,<sup>9</sup> and not only will her holiness bore you stiff, but you'll end up reeking of incense to boot!"

The young men all laughed at that.

"But come now," Tō no Chūjō prodded the Junior Secretary from the Ministry of Rites. "There must be a few unusual affairs going on around your place. Tell us a little about them."

"Do you honestly think anything worth discussing happens in a place as lowly as mine?" the young man asked.

Tō no Chūjō remained insistent, however. He declared that he was waiting for a response, and so the Junior Secretary wracked his brain to come up with some tale.

"When I was still a student of letters in the Bureau of Education,<sup>1</sup> I happened to be calling on a clever young woman. Like the woman the Warden mentioned, she was a good companion. I could discuss official matters with her, and she was also deeply prudent when it came to the conduct of household affairs. Her brilliance would put an unprepared scholar to shame, and so it was hard to hold my own with her in any conversation we had.

"I began to attend an academy to study Chinese with a certain scholar who just happened to have many daughters. As things turned out, I became intimate with one of them, and when her father found out, he brought out some ceremonial sake cups and spoke to me in an overly suggestive tone, reciting a line from Bai Juyi's poem in praise of marriage: 'Listen while I recite a poem about the two paths of life.' You know the poem . . . the one that extols the virtues of a wife who comes from an impoverished home and urges the husband to cherish her. I hadn't actually fallen head over heels for the woman or anything like that, but I was mindful of her father's feelings. In any case I was beholden to him, and she was a kind and considerate support to me. Even during our pillow talk she would impart her knowledge of Chinese, teaching many crucial things

9. Images of Kichijōten were common in Buddhist temples, and it was said that monks often fell in love with her [editor's note].

1. This official academy or university was loosely based on Chinese bureaucratic models and used to train young men for positions in the government. The course of study largely emphasized the Confucian canon and focused on the fields of Chinese classics, law, ethics, and letters (primarily history and poetry). It also provided instruction in practical fields such as mathematics and yin-yang studies (i.e., divination) [editor's note].

I would need for my official position. Her own writing was clear, almost man-nish. She employed a precise, rational diction and never mixed the more feminine kana script with her Chinese characters. Naturally I couldn't break off the relationship, because with her as my teacher I was able to learn how to write halting verses in Chinese. Even now I can't forget the debt I owe her . . . but then again, for a man like me who has no intellectual talents at all to have to rely on a woman I was intimate with and have her witness my pathetic performances . . . well, it was too shameful. Your lordships, of course, would never need such an efficient and rigorous helpmate. As for me, even though our relationship strikes me as trivial and regrettable now, at the same time she was someone I was drawn to, perhaps as a result of a karmic bond from a former life. It seems that men are really the feckless ones."

The moment he finished, both Genji and Tō no Chūjō cajoled him, saying, "Well, well, a most intriguing lady indeed," in order to get him to finish up his story. Knowing he was being led on, the Junior Secretary feigned distaste, a comical sneer crinkling his nose as he continued.

"Now then, I did not go to see her for the longest time, and when I finally dropped in on some errand, she was not at all the relaxed, familiar woman she had once been, but instead stayed behind a bothersome screen when we met. It seemed to me she was being peevish, which was foolish behavior, and so I thought this might be the perfect opportunity to break up with her. Yet I knew that such an intelligent woman would never hold a grudge for a frivolous reason. She understood the ways of the world and would not be resentful. She spoke in a voice that sounded rushed and breathy. 'These past few months I have been indisposed by a severe malady and prescribed a regimen of herbal tonic concocted mainly of garlic. This has rendered me extremely malodorous and incapable of meeting you tête-à-tête. Though we cannot meet directly, I would be pleased to undertake any miscellaneous tasks you might request of me.' Her words were so admirably learned, and so . . . manly. When I got up to leave she was perhaps feeling anxious and restless, for she added in a screechy voice, 'Please do come by when this odor has dissipated!' I felt very sorry to leave without responding to her, but there was no reason to hang around and, to tell the truth, the odor was getting to me. So I had no choice but to cast an imploring look at her as if to excuse myself. I sent this poem:

*On a night when the spider's busy spinning Foretold my arrival, why insist I wait
And put me off till the smell of garlic fades*

"'What sort of excuse are you giving me?' I asked. The words had barely left my lips, and I was on the verge of making my escape, when her reply came chasing me down:

*If my love could bring you every night,
Why then should the daytime be so blinding
Or this smell of garlic so offensive<sup>2</sup>*

2. The poem plays on the word hiru, meaning either "daytime" or "garlic." This wordplay explains the Junior Secretary's admiration of her quick wit [editor's note].

"You have to admit that she was certainly quick." He spoke so calmly that the young nobles found the whole account implausibly sordid.

"A complete fabrication," they said, laughing. "Where could anyone ever find a woman like that? You might just as easily have gone off to meet a demon. The whole thing is unpleasantly weird." Flicking their thumbs with the nail of their index finger to indicate their pique, they chided the Junior Secretary and pressured him to tell them something better than that. But the young man just sat there and replied, "How can I serve you up anything stranger than that?"

The Warden interceded.

"Generally speaking," he said, "it is really pathetic how people of no importance, men or women, think they have to show off every last little thing they have learned. A woman who acquires knowledge of Chinese and has read the Three Histories or the Five Classics lacks all feminine charm. But then again, why should we assume that a woman, just because she's a woman, would go through life without acquiring any knowledge at all of public and private affairs? Though she may not receive any formal education, a woman who has even a modicum of intelligence will retain many things she sees and hears. Through such knowledge she may learn to write cursive Chinese characters, and the next thing you know she is sending stiffly written letters half-filled with Chinese script to other ladies who don't have a clue what to do with them. When you see such a woman you're filled with chagrin, wondering why she couldn't be a bit more soft-spoken and ladylike. She may not have intended to show off her learning in the letter, but of course as it is being read aloud in a halting, strained voice the whole thing seems calculated. There are many examples of this sort of behavior among the upper ranks of court ladies.

"A woman with aspirations to being a poet will become so obsessed with the art of composition that she'll insert allusions to felicitous old phrases even in the opening lines of her correspondence. She'll send off a poem at the most inopportune moments, which can be quite offputting. If the man doesn't reply, he's inconsiderate, and if he can't come up with an equally learned allusion, he looks ridiculous. For instance, at some seasonal festival, when a man is really busy . . . let's say on the morning of the Sweet Flag Festival in the fifth month when you don't have a moment to think calmly about anything . . . she whips out a poem with some fabulous allusion playing on the words 'sweet flag' and 'sweet eyes,' or some such nonsense. Or maybe it's the Chrysanthemum Festival, when you have no time at all to wrack your brains to come up with some difficult poem in Chinese as the occasion demands, and here she is sending you a lamentation that strains to play on the words 'chrysanthemum' and 'dew.'<sup>3</sup> The poem is not only unsuitable to the time and place but also a downright nuisance. What otherwise might have seemed a charming or moving poem at a subsequent reading ends up being totally inappropriate and not worth a second glance because of the manner in which it was sent. Composing a poem with no forethought is not very tactful.

3. The Sweet Flag Festival, which fell on the fifth day of the Fifth Month, was celebrated at the court with equestrian and archery competitions. The Chrysanthemum Festival was observed on the ninth day of the Ninth Month; chrysanthemums were thought to possess properties that ensured a long life, and so on that day, the flowers were wrapped in thin cotton cloths that, once dampened with dew, were rubbed over the body to take advantage of chrysanthemums' supposed life-prolonging properties [editor's note].

“It is far easier to deal with a woman who has no talent for discerning the proper moment or season to compose, who does not put on airs and try to act refined in a way that leaves you wondering why she did what she did. In all cases a woman should pretend to be ignorant, even if she has a little learning. And when she has something to say, she should just focus on a couple of points and skip the rest.”

While the Warden was droning on, Genji was preoccupied with thoughts of one particular woman. Comparing her to the women he had heard about this evening, he was moved to an even greater admiration, since she seemed to be that rare type who was neither extravagant nor lacking in any way.

There was no conclusion to their discussion, and in the end as daybreak neared their ramblings came to include some rather queer and disreputable stories.

* * *

From Chapter V

Wakamurasaki

LITTLE PURPLE GROMWELL

* * *

With no one to talk to and idle time to kill after the healing rites were completed, he stepped out under cover of the heavy evening mist and set off with Koremitsu toward the fence he had spotted earlier. Peering at the bishop's residence through gaps in the fence, he could see into a room on the near side that faced Amida's Pure Land<sup>4</sup> in the west. The blinds had been raised slightly, which allowed him to observe a nun performing religious devotions before her own personal image of Amida Buddha. She was apparently making an offering of flowers. Leaning against one of the central pillars, she had placed a sutra scroll on top of an armrest and was struggling to read the scripture. She did not look like a common woman. She was probably over forty, her complexion exceptionally fair and graceful. Though she was thin, her cheeks were plump, and the strands of her hair, which had been cut attractively to neatly frame the area around her eyes, struck Genji as more distinctively fashionable than the long hair that was the common style. Watching her, he was touched by her appearance.

Two pretty adult attendants, also neatly turned out, were with her, and some young girls were playing there, running in and out of the room. One of them, who must have been about ten years old, was wearing a white singlet under a soft, crinkled outer robe dyed the rich yellow of mountain rose and lined with a yellow fabric. She didn't look like the other girls at all; her features were so attractive that Genji could tell at once that she would grow up to be a woman of surpassing beauty. Her hair flowed out behind her, spreading open in the shape of a fan as she stood there, her face red from brushing tears away.

4. Devotees of Pure Land Buddhism believe that they will be reborn in the “Western Paradise” of the Buddha Amitabha [editor's note].

"What happened?" the nun asked her. "Did you get into a quarrel with the other girls?"

When the nun looked up to speak, Genji could see the resemblance in their faces and assumed that they must be mother and daughter.

"Inuki let my baby sparrow out of the cage and it flew away." The girl was pouting.

One of the young women sitting there said, "Careless as usual. Inuki's in for a real scolding this time. What a nuisance she is! So where did the sparrow go? It's such a darling little thing; it would be horrid if the crows get to it."

She stood up and went out, her hair quite long and luxuriant. Certainly easy on the eyes, Genji thought. Apparently her name was Shōnagon, and she was the nurse who looked after the little girl.

"How childish!" the nun said. "Really, this whole thing is just too petty. You pay no heed to me, even though I could pass away any day now, and instead go running about chasing after sparrows. How many times have I told you it's a sin in the sight of Buddha to capture living creatures. It's deplorable. Come over here!"

The girl knelt down beside her. Her face was remarkably sweet, her unplucked eyebrows had the most charming air about them, and the cut of her hair and the look of her forehead, with those bangs swept up so innocently, were unbearably cute. Genji couldn't stop gazing at her. I'd really love to see her when she's grown up, he mused. It occurred to him that his desire to see her grown up was kindled by her uncanny resemblance to Fujitsubo, the woman to whom his heart was eternally devoted. It was thus natural that his gaze would be drawn to the girl, and tears came to his eyes.

Stroking the child's hair, the nun told her, "You may not be fond of combing your hair, but it's so lovely. You're such a silly girl, and your childishness weighs heavily on my mind. Other children your age don't act like this. Even though your mother was only ten when her father passed away, she still understood everything going on around her. It won't be long before I die and you'll be left completely alone in the world. How will you ever manage to get by?"

Seeing the nun weep so bitterly, Genji felt a pang of sympathetic sorrow. The girl, with her childish emotions, stared at her grandmother, then hung her head and stared at the floor. Her hair came cascading down around her face. It was splendidly lustrous.

Just then the nun composed a verse:

*The evanescent dewdrop tarries, reluctant To disappear into the sky and abandon
The tender shoot of grass to its uncertain fate*

The other young woman, who was still sitting in the room, was now crying. "How true!" she said, and composed this reply:

*How could the dewdrop disappear
Without knowing the destiny
Of the shoot of grass it clings to* Just then the bishop entered and said, "What are you doing? You're clearly visible from the outside. Why, today of all days, are you out on the veranda? I just found out from the ascetic who lives up the mountain that His Lordship, Captain Genji, has arrived to receive treatment for his fever. He arrived in such secrecy that I knew nothing about it. I've been here all this time and didn't pay my respects to him."

"How awful," the nun said, lowering the blinds. "Has anyone seen us like this? We're not at all presentable."

"Don't you want to take this opportunity," asked the bishop, "to catch a glimpse of the Radiant Genji? After all, he has such a noble reputation at the court. His looks are enough to make even the heart of a monk who has renounced society forget the sorrows of life and desire to live on in this world. I shall send him a letter."

Upon hearing the bishop stand up to leave, Genji also retired, delighted at the thought that he had discovered such a gorgeous child under these circumstances. His amorous companions were always going out, and so they were skilled at finding the kind of unusual woman that one rarely meets at court. Genji, however, could only go out occasionally, and so he was even more delighted to have the unexpected good fortune to stumble across a girl like this. She was certainly lovely, but her beauty made him curious. Who was she? She resembled Fujitsubo so closely that he was completely taken with the notion that he might be able to make her a replacement for the woman he loved, keeping the girl by him mornings and evenings as a comfort to his heart.

Genji had withdrawn and was lying down and resting when a disciple of the bishop called out for Koremitsu. They were close by, so Genji could hear everything they said. The disciple was apparently reading aloud the bishop's message:

"I just now learned that His Lordship has passed by my residence, and though I was caught by surprise, I still should have called on you. However, as you know, I have secluded myself in this temple, and so I regret that you have traveled here in secret, for I could have made my abode, rough and humble though it is, ready for you. I feel this is truly unfortunate, for it was in no way my intention to slight you."

Genji sent back a reply:

"Starting around the tenth of this month I began suffering repeated bouts of ague. The attacks were so frequent I found them hard to bear, and so on the advice of others I came discreetly to see the ascetic here. I chose to keep my journey a strict secret, because if the ascetic's spells were ineffective for me, it would certainly damage his reputation. It would be a much greater pity if such a venerable ascetic were to fail than it would be if the healer were some ordinary priest, and so I wanted to exercise some caution. I shall go to your residence presently."

The bishop himself appeared soon after. Even though he was a priest, he had a reputation at court as a man of flawless breeding and dignity, and his bearing was enough to put people to shame. Genji, who was dressed in humble fashion, felt awkward before him. The bishop spoke of the time he had spent in seclusion here, and then insisted repeatedly that Genji pay him a visit.

"My house is but a rustic hut," he said, "not all that different from this abode here, but at least it will provide you a view of the cool stream there."

Genji felt embarrassed as he recalled the fawning manner in which the bishop had described his radiant looks to the women, who had never seen him. Still, he was eager to learn more about the lovely little girl, and so he went with the bishop.

Just as the bishop said, the garden at his residence exuded an air of elegance. The trees and grasses, which were familiar varieties, had been cultivated with special care. Because it was the night of the new moon, cressets had been set along the banks of the stream, the light from their fires reflecting in the water, and oil lamps were hung beneath the eaves. The room facing south at the front of the house had been cleaned and neatly prepared. The refined scent of incense wafted out from the interior and mingled with the scent of the ritual incense offered to the Buddha, suffusing the entire area around the residence. Genji's perfumed robes carried their own special scent, which the people in the house could not help but notice.

The reverend bishop instructed Genji on the evanescence of this world and on the worlds to come. Genji, with some trepidation, was forced to acknowledge to himself the gravity of his sin of loving Fujitsubo, and it was torment knowing he could do nothing about the one thing preoccupying his heart. It seemed that he was doomed to suffer obsessively on account of his sin for the rest of this life; and what made it worse for him was always imagining the kinds of terrible retribution that awaited him in future lives. He thought he would like to leave the base temptations of this world and retreat to a humble abode like this, but then he found it hard to concentrate on the bishop's lesson, since the alluring vision of that young girl he had spied on during the day lingered in his heart alongside the image of the woman, Fujitsubo, the girl so resembled.

"Who lives here?" Genji asked. "Upon arriving today, I was reminded of a dream I wanted to ask you about."

The bishop smiled. "So you want to suddenly change the subject to your dreams, do you? Well, you can ask, but I'm afraid I'll disappoint you. You probably didn't know the former Major Counselor, since he passed away some time ago, but his primary wife is my younger sister. After he died, she took religious vows and left her household to become a nun. She's been suffering from a variety of ailments recently, and since I no longer go back to the capital she has decided to go into seclusion, using my residence as her haven."

Genji said, "I've heard that the Major Counselor had a daughter. My motive in asking about her, by the way, is quite sincere. It is not frivolous curiosity."

"He did indeed. One daughter. Let's see . . . it's been more than ten years now since she died. The late Counselor intended to send her into service at the court, and so he raised her with the greatest care. When he passed away before he could realize his hopes and dreams, my sister ended up raising her daughter by herself. When the girl reached womanhood Prince Hyōbu, who was Minister of War at the time,<sup>5</sup> was able to conduct a clandestine affair with her, using one of her scheming ladies-in-waiting as his go-between. Prince Hyōbu's primary wife, however, was a woman of impeccable birth, and as a result my niece suffered various insults that brought worry and grief. She grew increasingly despondent day by day, until at last she died. I have witnessed with my own eyes how sick from worry a person can get."

Genji gathered from the bishop's story that the little girl he had seen was the granddaughter of the nun. The Prince in question was the older brother of Fujitsubo, which explained the resemblance between the woman Genji loved and

5. The name Prince Hyōbu is taken from the Ministry of War (Hyōbushō). Since this prince is identified by his position, I am using this name as a matter of convenience.

the little girl. Now he felt an even stronger desire to see the girl and make the child his own. She was possessed of both a noble lineage and extraordinary beauty, but she also had an obedient temperament and was not impudent or forward. He wanted to get close to her, raise and train her in accordance with his own desires and tastes, and then make her his wife.

"A sad tale, indeed," Genji remarked. Since he wanted to find out for sure what had become of the little girl he had seen earlier, he added, "Did your niece leave any children behind to remember her by?"

The bishop told him, "A child was born just before my niece died . . . a girl. The child is the cause of terrible worry for my sister, who as death approaches fears she will leave her granddaughter in an unsettled situation."

So she's the one I was looking at, Genji thought.

"I know this will sound like a bizarre request, but would you do me the kindness of asking the girl's grandmother to consider allowing me to take charge of the child? I have good reasons for this request. I do call upon my primary wife from time to time, but we really don't get along so well, and I live alone for the most part. You may not consider her the proper age for such an arrangement, and you may think I am motivated by some common, base desire. But if you do, you are being unkind and dishonoring my intentions."

"Such a proposition would normally be met with great joy, but the girl is still so innocent it would be difficult, would it not, to take her as a wife—even if the whole thing was done in jest? A woman becomes an adult when a husband looks after her, and so it is not my place to deal with the details concerning such a matter. If I may, I will consult with her grandmother and try to obtain an answer for you."

The bishop was so forbiddingly sincere and stiffly formal in his manner of speech that it made Genji's youthful spirit feel small, and he was unable to come up with a clever response.

"It's time," continued the bishop, "to perform my devotions before the shrine of Amida Buddha in the prayer hall. I have not finished early evening services yet, but I will call on you again when they are over."

The bishop left and Genji was feeling ill. It had started to rain, bringing a cooling breeze. Moreover, the water in the pool of a nearby waterfall had risen with the spring runoff, and the roar was clearly audible. He could just barely make out the sound of sleepy voices reciting sutras, a sound that sent chills through him. The atmosphere of the place would have affected even the most insensitive of people, and, coupled with his preoccupation with both Fujitsubo and the girl, it prevented him from getting any sleep at all. The bishop had told him that he was off to early evening devotions, but it was already late at night. Genji could clearly sense that the women who resided in the interior of the house were not asleep, and though they were trying to be quiet he could make out the clicking of rosary beads rubbing against an armrest and the elegant, inviting rustle of robes. Because they were near him, he slid open ever so slightly the center panels of the screens that had been set up outside his room and lightly tapped the palm of his hand with a fan in order to draw their attention. Apparently they thought it unlikely that anyone would be there, but at the same time they couldn't very well ignore his summons. He heard one of the women moving over toward him.

Apparently confused, she retreated a bit and said, "That's odd. I thought I heard something. I must be deluded."

Genji spoke up. "They say the guiding voice of the Buddha will never delude you or lead you astray, even in the darkest places."

His voice was so youthful and aristocratic that her own voice sounded hesitant and embarrassed in response. "Guiding to where?" she asked. "I'm not sure I understand you."

"You probably think something is amiss, which is reasonable, since I called out so suddenly. Please present the following to your mistress."

*Glimpsing that sweet child so like a shoot of spring grass
The sleeves of my traveling robes never dry out Damp as they are from dew and my own endless tears*

The woman responded, "You surely must know there's no one here who would accept that kind of message. To whom should I give it?"

"It so happens," Genji explained, "that I have reasons for my entreaty, and so I ask for your understanding."

The woman retreated back into the interior of the house and spoke with the nun, who was confused by the request. It was, after all, shocking in so many respects.

"Really, these young people and their modern ways!" she grumbled. "Apparently this lord is under the misapprehension that the girl is old enough to understand the relationship between men and women. And how did he come to hear about our poems that referred to her as 'spring grass'?"

She was confused but realized it would be rude to take an inordinately long time to respond. So she sent the following:

*Are you comparing the dew-soaked pillow
Of a single night's journey to these sleeves
Covered by the moss of ancient mountains*

"Unlike your robes," she added, "it seems that mine will never dry."

"I'm not very experienced at communicating this way through a messenger," Genji answered. "Please forgive me, but I would be grateful if you would allow me a moment to speak with you about a serious matter."

The nun turned to her attendants. "I'm afraid he's mistakenly heard that the girl is older than she is. He seems such a high-ranking lord that I feel humbled before him. How should I respond?"

"You must answer him," one of her women advised. "It would be a pity if you made him feel awkward."

"Yes, I suppose you're right," the nun relented. "But if I were still a young woman, I'd find it rather improper to meet him. His words are so earnest they make me feel unworthy."

She rose and moved nearer to him.

"I realize that this is all quite sudden for you," Genji said, "and that under these circumstances you must think my request rash and immoderate. But I assure you, I have no base desires in my heart, and swear to you that the Amida Buddha himself understands the depths of my feelings, which you seem to find incomprehensible."

He spoke in a very respectful manner, since he himself was feeling awkward about raising the subject so directly in the presence of her quiet dignity.

"I must admit I never imagined that we would meet," the nun responded, "but that doesn't mean I consider the karmic bond between us to be shallow. Why should I, since we are speaking to one another like this?"

"I was moved when I heard about the painful struggles the girl has endured," Genji continued, "and wondered if you would consider me a substitute for the mother who has passed away. I was at a very tender age myself when I lost my mother and grandmother, the ones who should have looked after me most closely. As the months and years have passed I feel I have been living in a peculiar, drifting state. The girl's situation is so similar to my own that I sincerely ask permission to be her companion. Because I'm concerned about how you will interpret my request, I feel constrained in bringing it up. However, I'll have very few opportunities to approach you."

"I know I should be overjoyed by your request, but I'm reluctant to grant it. I don't know what you've heard about the girl, but isn't it possible that you are misinformed about how old she is? Insignificant though I am, the girl who lives here is completely dependent on me for support, and she's so young, I couldn't possibly agree to your request."

"I know all about her," Genji pressed his case. "If you'll just consider the depths of my feelings, which are anything but common, you will put your reservations aside."

In spite of his insistent pleadings, the nun was convinced that Genji was unaware of the inappropriateness of the request and would not give her assent. When the bishop returned, Genji at once closed up the folding screen. Well, at least I've pleaded my case. At least I can feel relieved about that.

With the arrival of dawn the sound of monks confessing their sins in the hall where they devotedly chanted the Lotus Sutra came drifting down the mountainside. Their voices mingled nobly with the roar of the waterfall.

Genji sent a verse to the bishop:

*Voices of atonement waft down the mountain . . .
As I awake from dreams and earthly desires
The sound of falling waters calls forth my tears*

The bishop replied:

*Purified in these mountain waters
My own heart is unmoved by the sound
That calls forth those tears that soak your sleeves*

"Have my own ears grown accustomed to the falling waters?" he added.

The sky brightened to reveal an overcast day. The continuous crying of mountain birds mingled together so that Genji could not tell from which direction they were coming. The various blossoms on the trees and grasses, whose names he did not know, were scattering in wild profusion, making it look as though someone had spread a brocade cloth over the landscape. He looked on in wonder at the deer ambling about, pausing here and there as they moved along. The scene was a diversion from his illness.

Normally, the old healer wasn't able to get out and about very easily, but somehow he managed to make his way to the bishop's residence and performed a protective spell. He was hoarse and missing so many teeth that his pronunciation was a little off, but he read the dharani<sup>6</sup> in a voice that possessed the august quality appropriate to a priest of great distinction and merit.

The party that would escort Genji back to the capital arrived and, after offering their congratulations on his cure, presented him with a message conveying best wishes from the Emperor. The bishop busily prepared delicacies not normally served at court, offering unusual types of fruits and nuts that had been harvested from various places, including the deep valley below.

"I have made a solemn vow to remain here for the year," the bishop told Genji, offering him some rice wine, "and so I will not be able to see you off. Ironically, my vow is now making me regret having to part with you."

"The waters of this mountain will remain in my heart. I have been undeservingly blessed by a gracious message from His Majesty, who is anxiously awaiting my return. However, I shall come here again before the season of spring blossoms has passed."

*Returning to court, I shall tell them
You must go see the mountain cherries
Before the breeze scatters their petals*

Genji's manner of speaking and the tenor of his voice were dazzling.

The bishop replied:

*The udumbara blooms once in three thousand years
When a perfect lord appears<sup>7</sup> . . . having looked on you
I no longer have eyes for those mountain cherries*

Genji smiled and sagely remarked, "The Lotus Sutra teaches that the flower of the udumbara blooms only once and in its proper time, which is quite rare. You flatter me."

The healer received the winecup and looked at Genji in tearful reverence:

*The pine door waiting deep in the mountains
Has now been opened so that I may see
The face of a flower ne'er glimpsed before*

As a memento of their meeting, he presented Genji with a tokko.<sup>8</sup> The metal rod, with its diamond-shaped points at both ends, was one of the implements he used in his esoteric rituals to symbolize the strength and wisdom needed to break free of earthly desires.

The bishop also presented several appropriate gifts. One was a rosary made of embossed seeds from the fruit of the bodhi tree that the famed Prince Shōtoku had acquired from the Korean kingdom of Paekche. The rosary had been placed in a Chinese-style box that was wrapped up in a gauze pouch and attached to a

6. Dharani are spells or incantations used for meditation, healing, or protection. They consist of a phrase or line originally in Sanskrit that encapsulates a central teaching of a sacred text in Buddhism. Often the syllables in the phrase had no semantic force, but dharani were used as an aid in meditation and, in this case, as a protective spell.

7. A Buddhist belief (the udumbara is a variety of fig) [editor's note].

8. This is an abbreviation of tokkoshō (Sanskrit, vajra), a Buddhist ritual implement [editor's note].

branch of five-needle pine. Another gift was a set of medicine jars made of lapis lazuli, which were filled with medicines and attached to branches of wisteria and cherry.

Genji had arranged to have gifts and offerings brought from the capital for the healer and for the monks who had chanted sutras for him. He presented the required gifts to everyone there, even the woodcutters who lived in the vicinity, and after making an offering for continued sutra readings, he prepared to leave.

The bishop went inside with Genji's message and conveyed it directly to the nun. She replied to him, "No matter what he says, I couldn't possibly give him an answer now. If his heart is really set on the girl, then maybe we can consider it in four or five years."

The bishop agreed with her and told Genji how matters stood. Genji was deeply dissatisfied that the nun had thwarted his desires and responded by having one of the pages serving at the bishop's residence take a note to her:

*As I travel home through morning mists Having seen the flowers hue at dusk
How painful to have to leave it now*

Though the nun dashed off her reply, the brushstrokes were elegant and her characters truly graceful:

*It may be hard for the mist to leave the flower
But gazing at the sky obscured by morning haze
I can judge neither what it portends nor your aims*

Just as Genji was about to board his carriage, a crowd of people, including his brothers-in-law, arrived from the palace to greet him.

"You left without bothering to tell any of us where you were going!" Tō no Chūjō complained.

He and his brothers had wanted to accompany Genji, and so they vented their grievances: "We would have loved to join you on your excursion here, but you heedlessly abandoned us. It would be a shame to return to the capital without resting for a while in the shade of these stunningly beautiful blossoms."

They all sat down on the moss in the shade of some craggy outcroppings and passed around the winecups. The cascading waterfall behind them made an elegant backdrop.

Tō no Chūjō pulled a flute from the breastfold of his robe and began to play clear, dulcet notes. Sachūben kept time by tapping a fan on the palm of his left hand and sang the line "West of the temple at Toyora" from the saibara "Kazuraki." The men in the party were all extraordinarily handsome, but Genji, still listless from his fever and leaning against a boulder, was incomparable. His looks were so awesomely superior that no one could take their eyes off him. Tō no Chūjō was gifted at playing the flute, so he had made certain to bring with him attendants who could accompany him on the double-reed hichiriki and the seventeen-pipe shō.<sup>9</sup>

9. The hichiriki is a type of flageolet. The shō is a mouth organ, similar to panpipes, made of bamboo.

The bishop brought out his own seven-string koto and insisted that Genji play it: “Please, just one song for us. I’d like to give the birds in the mountains a surprise.”

Genji demurred, saying, “I’m not feeling all that strong.”

Still, he managed to pluck out a not uncharming tune before they all set off.

Even the humblest monks and pages wept tears of regret that Genji should be leaving so soon. Within the bishop’s residence some of the older nuns, having never before seen a man of such extraordinary appearance, remarked, “He surely cannot be a person of this world.”

The bishop wiped away a tear and said, “Ahh, it makes me terribly sad to think that such an impressive, handsome man should have been destined by his karma to be born during the final period of the Dharma in this troubled realm of the rising sun.”<sup>1</sup>

To the little girl’s innocent heart, Genji seemed a paragon of beauty.

“He is even more splendid than my father, the Captain of the Guards,” she gushed.

“If that’s how you feel,” said one of the female attendants, “then why don’t you become his child?”

The girl nodded, thinking how wonderful it would be if only she could. Subsequently, whenever she played with her Hina dolls<sup>2</sup> or drew pictures of the court, she pretended that the lord was the Radiant Genji, and she would dress him in the finest attire and treat him most solicitously.

Genji first went straight to the palace to inform his father of all that had happened in recent days. The Emperor thought his son looked thin and haggard and worried that it might be something serious. He asked Genji about the effectiveness of the venerable healer, and, on hearing the details, remarked graciously, “We must promote him to a more senior rank as a priest. He has apparently accumulated much merit through years of austerities, so why have we never heard of him before?”

The Minister of the Left arrived at the palace as well and spoke to his son-in-law: “I thought about coming to meet you, but since you had gone off in secret I hesitated, not knowing what you were doing. Why don’t you come and spend a leisurely day or two at my residence? I can escort you there right away.”

Genji did not feel much like going with him and left the palace reluctantly. The Minister had his own carriage brought around and humbled himself by getting in second. His deferential gesture was a polite way of showing the care and consideration with which he was treating his son-in-law, but it made Genji feel uncomfortable.

Once they arrived at the Minister’s residence, Genji could see that they had made preparations for his visit. It had been a long time since they had last seen him, and in the interim they had refurbished everything, adding decorations so that the place shone like a burnished jewel. As usual, Genji’s wife stayed in her

1. A reference to the doctrine of mappō, one of the Three Ages of Buddhism. Mappō, the age when the law or Dharma is corrupted, is the final historical stage of Buddhism. Although various timelines were given, the most widely accepted view was that mappō would begin 2,000 years after Sakyamuni Buddha’s passing and last for 10,000 years. The first two ages are the age of the correct Dharma/Law and the age of the imitated Dharma. This doctrine was extremely influential during the Heian period, when it was believed that mappō would begin in the year 1052 C.E.

2. Dolls dressed as highborn men and women [editor’s note].

quarters and did not come out to meet him. She finally appeared only after her father had coaxed her repeatedly. Genji watched as she sat there stiffly, not moving a muscle, so prim and proper, arranged like some fairy-tale princess in a painting.

I doubt if it would do any good to tell her what's in my heart, he brooded, or to speak about my trip to the mountains, but it would be wonderful if she would just respond to me in a pleasant manner. Still, the plain truth is that she remains cold and remote in my presence, and we're becoming increasingly distant and estranged as the years go by.

He considered the situation unfair and intolerable.

"Just once in a while I'd like to see you acting like a normal wife. I've been quite ill recently, but you couldn't be bothered to even ask how I was. I know that such callous behavior isn't rare for you, but I resent it all the same."

She paused for a moment, then responded, "Yes, I know how you feel. As the poet put it, 'How hurtful it is to be ignored.'" She cast a sidelong glance at him—an expression that gave her face an air of extreme reticence and an affect of grace and beauty.

"You so rarely speak to me," Genji shot back, "so why is it that when you do, you have to say such strange and unpleasant things? You cite the line 'How hurtful it is to be ignored,' but that poem referred to lovers having an affair, not to married couples. What a deplorable thing to say! You're always doing things to put me off, to make me feel awkward. And all the while I've tried various things hoping that the time will come when your attitude toward me changes. But now I see that you have grown even more distant. All right then, perhaps some day, in some life to come . . ."

He withdrew to their bedchamber for the night, but she did not follow after him. He couldn't bring himself to call for her, and so he sighed and lay down. He pretended to fall asleep, even though he was thoroughly disgruntled, his mind troubled by all the difficulties that may arise in relationships between men and women.

He couldn't get the girl out of his mind, and he was curious to see what that little shoot of grass would look like when she was fully grown. The nun, acting as the girl's grandmother, had not been at all unreasonable in thinking that the child was not an appropriate age for him. It would thus be difficult to make any hurried advances at this stage. So how could he contrive to bring her with him and always have her as a comfort and joy? The girl's father, Prince Hyōbu, was certainly a refined and graceful man, but his looks did not possess her lambent sheen. So how could it be that the girl bore such a striking family resemblance to Fujitsubo? Was it because the girl's father and aunt were both born to the same imperial consort? Mulling over these points, the family connections made him feel closer to her, and somehow his desires became more urgent.

The day after returning from his mountain retreat, Genji sent letters to the house in Kitayama. His letter to the bishop merely implied what his intentions were. In the letter to the nun he wrote:

Awed and constrained by your august countenance, I was unable to express my thoughts clearly and openly to you. I would be overjoyed if you could at least understand that my decision to address you in this manner is evidence of the depth of my feelings and the sincerity of my motives.

He enclosed a letter to the girl as well, which he had folded up in a knot:

*The vision of the mountain cherry Continues lingering inside me
Though I left my feelings there with you*

“As Prince Motoyoshi put it, ‘I fear the wind that blows in the night.’<sup>3</sup> I too worry that the wind might scatter the blossoms so that I may no longer view them.”

The handwriting was of course magnificent, and even though the letter had been wrapped casually, to the eyes of the older people there it was startlingly beautiful. They were troubled and perplexed by the situation, unsure how to respond.

The nun sent a reply:

I did not give your proposition any serious consideration after you left, and now, even though you have so graciously written to us, I have no idea how to respond. She is not even capable of writing the Naniwazu<sup>4</sup> in kana yet, and so even though she now has your letter, it really does no good.

*You left your heart just before
The mountain blossoms scatter
Short-lived like your devotion*

“I am now all the more concerned,” she added.

The bishop’s reply was essentially the same, and Genji was frustrated. After a few days he sent Koremitsu off with the following instructions: “There should be a person there, a nurse named Shōnagon. Meet her and find out what you can.”

It’s his nature, I suppose, Koremitsu thought. He can never let anything go. Koremitsu had caught only the briefest glimpse of the girl—and thought she looked very young—but it was pleasant to recall the moment he had seen her.

Receiving yet another letter of proposal from Genji, the bishop thanked Koremitsu, who then met with Shōnagon and conveyed Genji’s wishes. He spoke in detail about Genji’s feelings and told her about his status and circumstances. He was a smooth, glib talker and was able to put together quite a convincing case for his lord. For all that, the girl was absurdly young to be married off, and everyone there felt that the request was somehow ominous, even distasteful, and they wondered what Genji had in mind.

Genji had poured his soul into his letter, which was written with deep sincerity, and as he had done before, he included a folded note for the little girl:

“I know you do not yet write in cursive style, but still I long to see those characters you practice when you copy the lines: My love for you is not shallow like the reflection of Mount Asaka you see when you peek into the mountain spring.”<sup>5</sup>

3. Shūishū 29: “Anxious that the wind during the night may have scattered the blossoms of plum, I rise early to view them.”

4. The Naniwazu refers to a poem in the kana preface to the Kokinshū that children in particular used, along with the poem on Mount Asaka that appears below, as a text to practice writing the kana syllabary: “The trees in bloom at the inlet of Naniwa announce that winter is over, spring has arrived! The trees in bloom!”

5. The place name Asaka plays on the homophone asa, meaning “shallow.” The poem Genji cites that the girl would have practiced writing is from the Man’yōshū. The poems that follow make variations on similar lines in the Kokin rokujō, a waka anthology.

*What does shallow Mount Asaka have to do
With these deep feelings . . . why is the reflection
Of your face in the mountain spring so distant*

The nun replied for the girl:

*They say one feels regret after drawing water
From a mountain spring . . . so how could you see the face
Of a lover in a spring as shallow as this*

Before Koremitsu returned to Genji, Shōnagon, the girl's nurse, told him, "Once we have spent some time here and my young lady's grandmother is feeling better, we will travel to the capital and definitely be in touch with you then."

Genji was irritated and dissatisfied when he learned from Koremitsu's report that his proposal had been rejected.

Fujitsubo was ill and had withdrawn from the palace to her home. Genji could see his father's anxious, grieving expression, which aroused great feelings of pity. Yet he also considered it an opportunity, and was soon lost in a reverie, as if his spirit had drifted out of his body. He stopped calling on his various women and instead idled away the days at the palace or at his own villa, dreamily gazing out until evening, when he would then pester one of Fujitsubo's ladies-in-waiting, Ōmyōbu, to intercede on his behalf. It is not clear how she managed to arrange a tryst, but after some truly outrageous and exhausting machinations she pulled it off, and Genji was able at last to be with the woman he considered perfect. His meetings with her were so brief, however, they merely intensified the pain of his lonely yearnings. Were these trysts real, or were they a dream? He could no longer tell.

Her Highness was in a state of constant distraction, for she was all too aware that her unimaginable affair with Genji was genuinely shocking. She was determined to put an end to their relationship, since she found the prospect of continuing to meet him extremely unpleasant and depressing, and her appearance betrayed just how difficult it was for her to cope with the situation. Still, she somehow managed to maintain a sweet and familiar attitude toward Genji, and her dignified demeanor and discretion put him to shame. Her behavior only made him realize that there was no one like her in the world, that he could find no flaws in her—and that realization gave rise to a wistful anguish as he was left to wonder why it was that the woman who turned out to be his ideal was forbidden to him.

How could he possibly tell her all the things he wanted to say? He wished he might reside in obscurity in the perpetual darkness of the Kurabu Mountains. Unfortunately, his nights were short, and brought him nothing but sorrow and pain.

*Though I am with you here and now
So rare are these nights that I long
To lose myself inside this dream*

He was sobbing now.

Feeling pity for him, she replied:

*Will we not be forever the stuff of gossip . . .
No one has ever suffered the anguish I feel Trapped in a dream from which I never awaken*

Fujitsubo's turmoil was understandable, and he felt ashamed before her. Ōmyōbu gathered up his robes and brought them to him.

Genji returned to his residence and spent a tearful day in bed. When he was told that Fujitsubo would no longer accept his messages, even though he knew she had always refused to read them anyway, he was hurt and could not focus his thoughts. He did not appear at court but locked himself away for two or three days. His Majesty was worried by his son's absence and wondered if something was wrong, if he had fallen ill again. In the face of what Genji had done with Fujitsubo, his father's concern terrified him.

Fujitsubo was distressed by her plight, and her illness, which had prompted her to withdraw from the palace in the first place, worsened. Messengers arrived one after another urging her to return, but she refused. There could be no doubt that she was not feeling normal, but no one knew what was wrong with her. As it turned out, she had already secretly surmised her condition, and the shock of realizing that she was expecting a child upset her. She was now panicked and confused. What will become of me? More and more, as the summer progressed, she refused to get up. She was now in her third month, and her condition was obvious. Her ladies-in-waiting observed this and grew worried and suspicious. She lamented that she should have to suffer such a strange and unhappy fate.

Because no one guessed what had actually happened, Fujitsubo's attendants were surprised to learn that their lady had said nothing to His Majesty until now. Only Fujitsubo knew, in her heart of hearts, what had happened. Her closest attendants, Ōmyōbu and Ben, the daughter of Fujitsubo's nurse, tended to her intimately in the bath, and so they had clearly seen her condition and recognized what was happening. They were troubled, because they knew they did not dare discuss the situation between themselves. Ōmyōbu in particular felt sad that her lady's inescapable karmic destiny had brought her to this pass. In order to explain the delay in reporting the pregnancy, they had no choice but to tell the Emperor that they had been beguiled by a spirit and had not recognized their mistress's condition right away. The women who served Fujitsubo all assumed that that was indeed the case, and the Emperor, overwhelmed with even more feelings of pity and concern, was constantly sending messengers to ask how she was doing. Their visits, however, only kept her in a constant state of dread and depression.

One night Genji had a weird and terrifying dream. He summoned a diviner who interpreted the dream to mean that Genji would become the father of an Emperor. This was shocking and unthinkable.

The diviner added, "Your dream also means that your fortunes are crossed and that you must exercise caution and good behavior."

Genji felt awkward, and so he told the diviner, "This isn't my dream. I have merely relayed to you what someone of very high rank told me. So until the dream actually comes true, don't say anything to anyone about it."

Genji was trying to make sense of things in his own mind, but when he heard that Fujitsubo was pregnant, he realized that her child might be what his dream portended. He sent increasingly desperate messages to Fujitsubo, but Ōmyōbu was now having second thoughts. Communicating like this was extremely risky and difficult, and she found that she could no longer act as a go-between for Genji. Even her brief one-line replies, which had always been infrequent at best, stopped altogether.

Fujitsubo returned to the palace in the seventh month. Because he had not seen her for so long, His Majesty's desire had only grown stronger, and he lavished his gracious affection on her. She was now a little plump, and her face had grown thin and careworn, but her appearance was truly, incomparably lovely. As he had done before, the Emperor would spend the whole day in her chambers. The early autumn sky signaled to them that it was the appropriate season for musical diversions, and so His Majesty was constantly calling for Genji, who had a talent for performance, to come and play various pieces on the koto or the flute. Genji had to struggle to keep his emotions in check on these occasions, though there were moments when his expression betrayed the feelings he found so hard to suppress. For her part, Fujitsubo would obsess over things she wished had turned out differently.

The health of the nun who had been staying at the mountain temple in Kitayama improved, and she finally returned to her residence in the capital. Genji inquired after her and sent her letters from time to time. It did not surprise him that in her replies she continued to refuse his proposition, but it didn't bother him that much because he was preoccupied by his concern with Fujitsubo and had little time to think much about other matters.

By the ninth month, as the end of autumn was approaching, Genji was lonely and depressed. A gorgeous moonlit evening inspired him at last to go to the place of a woman he had been secretly visiting. But then the weather changed—it turned stormy and a chill evening rain began to fall. The lady lived in the vicinity of Rokujō and Kyōgoku, and as he left the palace her place began to seem a little too distant. On the way he saw a weather-beaten house standing in the gloomy shade of an ancient grove of trees.

Koremitsu, who was accompanying Genji as usual, said, "That used to be the house of the late Major Counselor. I guess you should know that I visited it recently and learned that the nun has taken a turn for the worse. They have no idea what to do for her."

"What a pity," Genji replied. "I must pay her a visit. Why didn't you tell me about this earlier? Have a message taken to her."

Koremitsu sent one of the attendants in with instructions to say that Genji had arrived with the express purpose of calling on the nun. When the messenger entered and announced his lord's visit, the women were caught off guard.

One of them said, "This is most awkward. Our lady has been feeling much worse these last few days and couldn't possibly meet your lord."

It would have been rude and uncouth to send him away, however, so they prepared a space on the veranda under the eaves on the south side of the house and invited Genji to enter there.

"Frightfully untidy, I'm afraid," another of the women remarked, "but my lady wanted to show some gratitude for your visit. Your arrival was so unexpected, however, that you caught us unprepared. So please forgive the dark and gloomy atmosphere of this chamber."

The place did strike Genji as quite odd, but he answered, "I've been meaning to visit you all this time, but I refrained from doing so because I've been treated in such a way as to make me believe nothing would come of it. I'm anxious about you, having just learned that your illness has taken a turn for the worse."

"My ailments are no worse than usual, though I do sense now that I am nearing my end," the nun told him. "You have been gracious enough to call on me, but I'm not able to greet you directly. With regards to your proposal, the girl is still at an innocent age and lacks judgment, but once she is a little more mature, by all means think of her as you would any other woman and take her as one of your own. I'm so worried about leaving her behind in this world, isolated and helpless, that my anxiety creates a burden of attachment for me that will surely be a hindrance on the path to the salvation I pray for."

Because she was in a room close by, Genji could catch fragments of her weary voice.

"We are not worthy of this, and should be grateful for his attentions," she added. "If only the girl were old enough to be able to thank him properly."

Genji was keenly moved.

"If my feelings for the girl were truly shallow, then why would I embarrass myself by coming here and possibly looking lecherous? The moment I recognized there was some kind of karmic bond between us, I was deeply attracted to the girl and convinced to an almost mystical degree that our bond was not something that belonged to this world."

He turned to one of the attendants and continued, "My visit here may have been in vain, but may I ask for a word with the girl herself?"

"Oh, I don't know about that," one of the nun's attendants interjected. "She has been kept in the dark about all of this, and is now fast asleep."

Just as the woman spoke these words, the girl's voice could be heard from inside.

"Grandmama, Lord Genji is here . . . you know, the man who visited us at the temple? So why haven't you gone out to meet him?"

The women were all mortified and tried to hush the girl, but she protested, "Didn't Grandmama say that the sight of him was always a comfort to her?"

She spoke as if she were informing them of something that would benefit her grandmother. Genji was utterly charmed, but he had to be considerate of the bruised feelings of the flustered women there, and so he pretended he hadn't heard a thing. After politely bidding farewell and leaving his best wishes for them, he made his way home. She may be a little girl, he thought, but I can't wait to see her after she's been properly trained.

The next day Genji sent a most solicitous letter inquiring after the health of the nun. As always, he included a small folded letter for the girl:

*Hearing a young crane cry I long to go to it
But my boat tangled among the reeds is hindered
And I cannot leave this inlet to tend its needs*

"As the poet put it, 'I always yearn to go back to the same person.'"<sup>6</sup>

Genji deliberately composed his note in a childish hand that was so delightful the women told the girl to imitate it in her copybook.

Shōnagon replied, "Our lady may not make it through the day, and we are preparing to take her back to the temple in Kitayama. She may not be able to express in this world her gratitude for your visit and your expressions of concern."

Genji felt very sad when he heard this.

6. Kokinshū 732 (Anonymous): "I always yearn to go back to the same person, like a little boat that has made its way through the channel and comes rowing home."

One autumn evening, when he was more preoccupied than ever with his longing for Fujitsubo, the woman who constantly tormented his heart, he felt his seemingly perverse desire to possess her little niece growing even stronger. He remembered a line from the nun's poem—"The evanescent dewdrop tarries, reluctant to disappear into the sky"—and thought lovingly of the girl. At the same time he was anxious and unsure, thinking that she might not live up to his expectations. An image of wakamurasaki<sup>7</sup>—a little purple gromwell—popped into his head:

*How I yearn to quickly pluck up and make my own
That little purple gromwell sprouting in the wild
With roots that share their color with wisteria*

During the tenth month His Majesty decided to plan a visit to the Suzaku Palace. The dancers for the day of departure were to be selected from among sons of aristocratic families, high-ranking officials, and courtiers who had talents suitable for the occasion. From princes and ministers on down, each and every one practiced their skills. It was a hectic, busy time.

Because of all the preparations, it occurred to Genji that he had not contacted the nun in her mountain temple for some time. When at last he sent a messenger there, he received the following reply from the bishop:

"I am sorry to report that she passed away on the twentieth of last month. I know it is the reality of this world that we must all die, but still I cannot help mourning her."

After reading this, Genji experienced the poignant sorrow of the evanescent world and wondered what would become of the girl who had been the source of such worry for the nun. The girl was so young, she must be pining for her grandmother. Genji had vague memories of being left behind by his own mother, and so he sent his deepest condolences. Shōnagon composed a sympathetic reply.

Genji learned that after the twenty-day period of mourning and confinement was over, the girl came back to the capital and was now at the late nun's residence. He waited until a seemly period of time passed, then went to call on her one evening when he had some free time. The place was run-down and desolate, and there were few people about—the kind of place that would surely frighten a child. Genji was shown to the same space on the south side of the residence that they had used on his previous visit. He was moved to tears by Shōnagon's heartbreaking account of her mistress's final days.

"There is talk that the girl's father would have her come to his villa," Shōnagon told him. "But the nun was quite concerned about that prospect. After all, her own daughter, this child's late mother, found that household unbearably cruel and depressing. The girl is now at that in-between stage, no longer a child, but

7. The Japanese species of gromwell is a small plant that produces white flowers in the summer. Its purple roots were used to make dye for clothing. As in other cultures, purple was associated with royalty, and so I have translated murasaki as "purple gromwell" to indicate both the rustic image of the word and its imperial associations. The Japanese name for wisteria is fuji, alluding to the girl's aunt, Fujitsubo, and suggesting by way of the color purple shared by the two plants the nature of their relationship. That is, since murasaki (or wakamurasaki) is the smaller, more rustic plant, Genji's poem acknowledges a difference in their relative status. His poem alludes to Kokinshū 867 (Anonymous): "Because of this one purple gromwell, I look on all the grasses in Musashino with tender feelings."

not old enough to really understand the motives of other people. And with all the other children at her father's residence, she is not likely to be welcomed with open arms, but will instead be belittled and treated as a stepchild. With so many indications that the girl will be badly served there, we are grateful for your passing words of kind consideration. Still, we cannot fathom your future intentions, and even though we should feel happy on occasions like this when you visit us, we remain extremely hesitant about your proposal . . . after all, the girl is simply not appropriate for you. Her character is immature and undeveloped, even for someone her age."

"Why do you continue to waver when I have repeatedly opened up to you like this? I know in my heart that my feelings of longing and pity, which her innocence stirs in me, are signs of a special bond between us from a former life. If I may, I would like to speak with her directly and tell her how I feel."

*Seeing the young tangled seaweed struggle to grow
Amidst reeds in the bay of Wakanoura
Can the wave, once it has drawn near, recede again*

"It would be too hateful for the wave to have to withdraw now," Genji concluded. Shōnagon answered, "You are truly gracious, my lord, but . . ."

If the algae at Wakanoura yielded Without knowing the true intentions of the wave Would it not be set adrift upon the shallows<sup>8</sup>

"It just isn't reasonable."

The polished manner of her verse made it almost possible for Genji to forgive her refusal.

"Why does the day when we may finally meet never come?"<sup>9</sup> he murmured. The younger women in the house shivered in delight and admiration.

The little girl had been lying down, crying and grieving for her grandmother until her playmates told her, "A lord dressed in court robes has arrived. Perhaps it is the Prince, your father!"

She got up and went out to see for herself, calling out, "Shōnagon! Where is the nobleman in court robes? Is my father here?"

Her voice sounded achingly sweet as she approached.

"I'm not your father," said Genji, "but that doesn't mean you should treat me as a stranger. Come over here."

The girl immediately recognized his voice and realized that this was the splendid lord who had called on them before. Embarrassed that she had spoken improperly, she went over to her nurse and said, "I want to go now. I'm sleepy."

"Why do you want to hide from me? Please come over here and rest at my knees. Please, come closer."

"As you can see," said Shōnagon, pushing the girl toward him, "she really knows very little about the world."

8. Both poems play on the homophone waka, meaning "youthful."

9. Compare this waka poem by Fujiwara no Koremasa: "Though I keep my impatience a secret, as the years go by, why is it so hard to pass beyond the barrier gate of Ōsaka, the slope where we may finally meet?"

The girl sat innocently on the other side of the blinds from Genji, who put his hand through to search around for her. Her lustrous hair was draped over soft, rumpled robes, and even though he did not have a clear view of her, when he touched the rich thickness of the strands he imagined how attractive she must really be. When he tried to hold her hand she was put off that a stranger should have come so close to her and pulled away in fright.

"I told you I was sleepy," she said to Shōnagon.

At that moment Genji slipped inside the curtains and told her, "You must think of me now as the one you will rely upon. So please don't be distant or afraid."

His actions were upsetting to Shōnagon, who exclaimed, "What are you thinking, my lord, impetuously barging in here like this during a period of mourning? It's outrageous. You can talk to her all you like, but it won't do you any good. She's just too young to understand."

"You may be right," Genji answered, "but just what do you think I'm going to do with someone so young? Carefully observe the sincerity of my feelings, the purity of my heart, and you will realize that they are peerless, that you will find nothing like them in this world."

The wind was blowing violently and hail began to fall. It was a lonely, terrifying night.

"Why," Genji asked, tears in his eyes, "should she have to spend any more time in this isolated, deserted house?"

He couldn't stand the idea of going home and abandoning them here.

"Lower the shutters. It looks like it will be a frightful evening," he ordered. "I shall stand guard for you tonight. Please, everyone, gather closer to me."

With a remarkable air of familiarity about him, he went inside the curtained area where the girl slept. The women found his behavior shockingly abnormal, but they did not know what to do and did not even try to move from where they were sitting. Shōnagon couldn't stand it. She was beside herself, but she couldn't very well offer vehement objections or make a scene, and so she stayed put as well, sighing in lament.

The girl, not knowing what was going on, was truly scared and trembling. Genji felt sorry for her, thinking that her beautiful figure was shivering because of the cold, and he had a singlet brought in and wrapped around her. Genji knew perfectly well that his behavior was not normal, and so he spoke sensitively to the girl.

"You really must come with me. There are many gorgeous paintings at my residence and Hina court dolls to play with." His manner was kind and intimate as he spoke of things he was sure would appeal to her childish heart and allay her fears. Nonetheless, she still found it hard to sleep, and spent the night tossing and turning.

As the night wore on, the wind continued to gust and the women whispered among themselves:

"How forlorn we would have been had he not come here. If only they were a little closer in age, it would be so wonderful."

Shōnagon, worried about her charge, hovered just outside the curtains the whole time. When the wind began to die down a little, Genji got ready to go home. It was still dark, and he had a knowing look on his face, as if he were leaving some romantic tryst.

"Now that I've witnessed her situation with my own eyes," Genji said, "it's all too pathetic, and I will now be more anxious about her than ever. She should be moved to my residence, where I spend my days and nights in solitary reverie. How can she remain here like this? It's a wonder she isn't in a constant state of terror."

Shōnagon replied, "Prince Hyōbu has hinted that he would come for her, but that won't happen until after the forty-nine-day period of purification is complete."

"He is the one who really ought to look after her," Genji agreed, "but they have grown accustomed to living apart and the girl most likely regards him as much a stranger to her as I am. I may have only just met her today, but my feelings and motives are not shallow—indeed, they are far more worthy than her father's."

Genji stroked the girl's hair, then glanced back repeatedly at her as he made his way out.

* * *

Genji experienced a swirl of conflicting emotions. There would be gossip about what was going on,<sup>1</sup> and he would undoubtedly gain a reputation as a lecher. If the girl were of an age when she could understand these matters and consent to the relationship, then people would understand, and it would all seem normal. But she was not of that age, and if her father were to come searching for her, then Genji's own actions would be seen as wild and rash. Yet despite his reservations, if he were to let this opportunity slip away, he would have bitter regrets. And so he departed while it was still dark. His wife remained her usual sullen and distant self.

"I just remembered some pressing matters I have to attend to," Genji told her. "I shall return shortly."

After going to his own quarters in the house at Sanjō and changing his robes, he set off alone with Koremitsu, who was riding alongside the carriage on his horse. He left before the women attendants even realized he was gone.

He knocked on the gate and someone who had been apprised of the situation opened it. Genji had his carriage drawn inside quietly. Koremitsu tapped at the double doors in the corner of the main hall, then coughed as a signal. On hearing this, Shōnagon knew who was there and came out.

"My lord has arrived," Koremitsu announced.

"The girl is resting inside," Shōnagon told him. "Why have you come out so late at night?" She assumed they were stopping by on the way back from their previous rendezvous at the palace.

"I have something I must tell her before she is moved to her father's residence," Genji replied.

"Whatever would that be? And how could she possibly give you a clear answer?" Shōnagon laughed and began to withdraw.

Genji suddenly barged in, and Shōnagon was completely taken aback. "The older women are in there! They are absolutely unpresentable!"

1. That is, Genji's intentions to take away the girl [editor's note].

"She's not awake yet, is she?" Genji said. "Well, then, I suppose I shall have to get her up. How can she remain asleep, oblivious to this lovely morning mist?"

He barged straight into the girl's sleeping quarters. Shōnagon was so flabbergasted that neither she nor her women could utter a peep in protest.

Genji picked up the girl, who was sleeping innocently, and woke her in his arms. She was still half asleep, and so she thought her father had come for her. Stroking her tangled hair, Genji said to her, "Come with me. I'm acting as a messenger for your father."

When she saw that it wasn't her father holding her, she was startled and fearful. "Come now, is that any way to act? I am just the same as your father." As he was carrying the girl out, Koremitsu, Shōnagon and the others all asked him what was happening.

"I told you I was worried about not being able to come here very often, and so I want to move her to my residence, which is much safer and more comfortable. If she were cruelly taken away to her father's villa, it would be that much more difficult for us to communicate. One of you may accompany me if you wish."

Shōnagon, who was now frantic, replied, "But today is the worst possible time you could have chosen. What should I say when her father comes for her? If it is, as you say, truly fated for her to be your wife, then surely that is how things will turn out later on. As it is now, she is just too young, and you have given us no time to think about things, which is putting all of the attendants in an awkward position."

"Very well, then," Genji responded, "some of you may follow later."

He had his carriage brought around. Everyone there was stunned and at a loss as to what to do. The girl, who did not understand what was happening, was frightened and started to cry.

With no way to stop him, Shōnagon brought out the clothes she had been sewing the previous night and, changing into a not altogether unattractive robe herself, got into the carriage with him.

Genji's residence in Nijō was close by, and so they arrived before first light. The carriage was drawn up to the west hall and Genji alighted. He easily swept the girl up in his arms and brought her out.

Shōnagon wavered: "This is all like a dream. What should I be doing?"

"That's entirely up to you. Now that I've brought the young lady here, you may return if you wish. I'll be happy to have someone escort you back."

Shōnagon smiled bitterly at his words, for she had no choice but to resign herself to the situation. She got out of the carriage. This had all been so sudden and outrageous that nothing could be done about it. She could not calm her heart. What will her father say? And what about my young mistress? What will become of her? To have been left behind by all the people who loved her . . . it's just too much to bear.

She could hardly hold back her tears, but she found a way to restrain herself, knowing that it would bring bad luck to cry on a momentous occasion like this.

The west hall was not usually inhabited, and there were no curtains or furnishings. Genji summoned Koremitsu and ordered him to have curtains, screens, and the like placed here and there where he indicated. He had the silk blinds hanging between the pillars around the inner chamber removed, and he had his attendants straighten up the room. When they were finished, he sent for robes and bedding from the east hall, then went in to rest. The girl now found the scene genuinely menacing and, uncertain about Genji's intentions, she began to tremble. Still, she managed not to cry out loud.

"I want to sleep with Shōnagon," she whimpered in a girlish voice.

"You must no longer sleep with her," Genji instructed, and the girl fell prostrate, weeping and feeling completely forlorn. Her nurse couldn't sleep either and stayed up all night lost in her thoughts.

As the dawn broke, Shōnagon studied her new surroundings. The residence and furnishings gave off a resplendent air—even the sand in the garden looked like jewels scattered all around. She remained hesitant, but it appeared that there were no other women serving in this hall. It was a pavilion where Genji would receive less intimate guests who called infrequently.

There were male servants just outside the bamboo blinds, and one of the men, who had heard that his lord had brought a woman here, was whispering to the others, "I wonder who she is? She must be someone extraordinary."

Cooked rice and water for their morning ablutions were brought in, and the sun was already high when they finally got up. Genji said, "This won't do at all. We have no one in service here. Choose those women at your former residence you would like to have as attendants for your young lady and I will send for them this evening."

Genji next summoned some page girls from the east hall, then told his servants, "Have these pages select several younger girls to serve over here."

Presently four captivating little girls appeared. The young lady was still asleep, her robes wrapped around her. Genji made her get up.

"This pouting and cold behavior will not do!" Genji scolded. "Would a man who is wild at heart have done all this for you? A woman must be kindhearted and obedient."

And with those words, from that moment on, her training began.

Her features were even more beautiful than when he had seen her from a distance. He spoke warmly to her, telling her stories and showing her all sorts of delightful pictures and playthings, which he had brought in for her, and did everything he could to soothe her feelings. Eventually she got up and inspected her quarters. She was wearing her dark mourning robes, soft and rumpled, and looked so adorable as she sat there with her innocent smile that Genji couldn't help smiling himself as he watched her.

Genji left for the east hall, and the young lady went over to the edge of the veranda and peeked out at the pond and the trees in the garden. She was fascinated by the grasses, which had been withered by the frost so that they looked like something out of a painting. A crowd of male courtiers of the fourth or fifth rank, none of whom she knew, bustled in and out, making her feel that she had come to some splendid world. She examined the captivating pictures on the folding screens and door panels, and with her childish disposition she was able quickly to comfort herself.

Genji did not go to the palace for two or three days so that he could spend time talking with the girl and making her feel at ease in her new surroundings. He wrote poems and drew pictures, presenting them to her with the thought that they might serve as a model for her own practice. He put them together to make a very charming collection. One of the poems, which he copied on purple-colored paper, was taken from Kokin rokujō:

*I've never been there but lament my fate
Each time I hear the name "Musashino" . . .
The place where little murasaki grows*

The girl took up the sheet of paper and studied the unusual, exquisite brushstrokes. In smaller characters Genji had added his own verse:

*Unable to cross Musashino's dewy plains
I've yet to see the purple roots of the gromwell . . .
How I long for the wisteria's little kin*

"Why don't you try writing something?" Genji encouraged her, though Fujitsubo was still obviously on his mind.

"But I can't write well," she protested, looking up at him. She was so lovely he couldn't help but smile.

"Even if you can't write well, you must at least try. You won't get better if you don't write anything. Let me show you."

He found it charming the way she held her brush and how she turned away from him when she wrote, and he thought it strange that he should have such feelings.

"I've made a mistake," she said, trying to keep him from seeing what she wrote. But he made her show it to him anyway.

*I worry, unsure why you grieve . . .
Tell me again which plant is it
The one I am related to*

Her writing was quite immature, but he could see at once that she had the talent to be accomplished in composition. The lines of her brushstrokes were rich and gentle, and they resembled the hand of her late grandmother. If she practiced more modern models, he knew that she would be able to write very well.

He had court dolls and dollhouses made especially for her, and as they passed the time together he was able to distract himself from his painful longing for Fujitsubo.

The women who had remained behind at the girl's former residence were flustered and embarrassed when Prince Hyōbu came back and asked for his daughter, for they did not know what they should say to him. Genji had told them not to let anyone know what had happened—at least not for a while. Because Shōnagon agreed with him, she insisted that it was best to keep the matter quiet. Thus, all they could say to the father was that Shōnagon had taken his daughter into hiding, without telling them where.

Prince Hyōbu assumed that nothing could be done at this point, and he resigned himself to the situation. Her grandmother was opposed to sending the girl to my residence, and so Shōnagon was moved to carry out her wishes, even if it meant going to this extreme. But why couldn't she just gently tell me that it would be too unbearable to move the girl, rather than willfully spiriting her away?

When he left the house he said tearfully, “Let me know if you hear any news of her.” This troubled the women.

He sent an inquiry to the bishop as well, but the bishop had no clue as to her whereabouts. Prince Hyōbu suffered longing and regret over the child’s beauty, which would now go to waste. The enmity his primary wife had harbored toward the girl’s mother had abated, and even she regretted that she would not be able to raise the child as she had hoped.

Gradually attendants arrived and gathered in the quarters of the girl—whom Genji called his little Murasaki. As a couple they possessed a rare, modern look. The youngest attendants and the little girls who were her playmates passed the time together without a care. Although there were lonely evenings when Genji was away and she cried out of yearning for her grandmother, she gave no thought at all to her father. From the beginning she had grown accustomed to not having him around, and she was now exceedingly close to the man who was her new father. Whenever he returned, she would be the first to go out to greet him. They would talk together lovingly, and she never felt distant or embarrassed when he held her to his bosom. Insofar as they looked like a father and a daughter, their behavior was quite endearing.

If a woman has a calculating heart and a troublesome disposition that makes an issue of everything, then a man has to take care that he not allow her emotions to lead her astray and keep her from fulfilling his desires. She will tend to be jealous and resentful, and difficulties he never imagined, such as a separation, will naturally arise. Murasaki, however, was an absolutely captivating companion for Genji. A real daughter, when she had reached this age, would not have been able to behave so intimately, to have gone to sleep or risen in such close proximity to him. Genji came to feel that his young Murasaki was a rare hidden treasure, his precious plaything.

From Chapter VII

Momiji no ga

AN IMPERIAL CELEBRATION OF AUTUMN FOLIAGE

The procession to the Suzaku Palace was set to take place sometime after the tenth day of the tenth month. Because it promised to be an unusually lavish event, the imperial consorts and ladies, who were not permitted to leave the palace, complained bitterly that they would not be able to see it. His Majesty was also disappointed that Fujitsubo would not be able to view the procession, and so he had the musicians and dancers perform a dress rehearsal in front of his living quarters in the Seiryōden.

Genji, a Captain in the Palace Guard, performed a dance called “Waves of the Blue Sea.” His partner was Tō no Chūjō, who, as son of the Minister of the Left, was unquestionably superior to other men in terms of his looks and training. Performing next to Genji, however, he seemed like some nondescript tree deep in the mountains growing beside a cherry in full bloom. As the bright slanting rays of the setting sun shone down on them, the music swelled and the performance reached its climax. Genji was carefully following the prescribed form of the dance, but his movements and expressiveness were without peer. The music paused and he recited the accompanying verse in Chinese by Ono no Takamura in a voice as sweet and ethereal as the cry of the Buddha's heavenly Kalavinka bird.<sup>2</sup> The Emperor was so moved by the performance that he brushed away a tear, while all the upper-ranking courtiers and princes were weeping. At the conclusion of Genji's recitation, the lively music, which had paused for him, started up again. Genji had twirled the sleeves of his robe around his arms at the very end of the verse, and he was now readjusting them, his face flushed, looking even more radiant than usual.

As auspiciously splendid as Genji's dance had been, the Kokiden Consort found it strangely disturbing and remarked, "His looks are enough to captivate the gods in the heavens. It seems weirdly unpleasant."

The younger women deplored her unkind words.

Fujitsubo might have enjoyed viewing the dance more had it not been for the terrible guilt she felt at having received the Emperor's gracious gift of ordering this rehearsal for her benefit. To make matters worse, she had to watch a dance performed by the very man with whom she had conducted her outrageous affair. The whole thing seemed like a dream to her. That evening she was in service to the Emperor in his chambers.

"Waves of the Blue Sea" had swept everything before it at the rehearsal that day.

"What did you think of it?" His Majesty asked Fujitsubo. She struggled to answer, but managed to stammer out, "It was certainly a special performance."

"Genji's partner did not look bad either," the Emperor continued. "When it comes to form and gesture, good breeding will out. Professional dancers, those who have some reputation, are no doubt skillful, but they cannot display the same natural, unaffected beauty and grace that we saw today. The two men performed so magnificently, I have to admit I'm worried that when they dance under the autumn foliage on the day of the procession, it might be a bit of a letdown. But never mind . . . I so wanted you to see the performance that I had them prepare for it."

The following morning Genji sent a note to Fujitsubo:

"How did I look yesterday? As I danced, my heart was being torn apart by an unrequited love such as the world has never known."

*I should never have danced in your presence
With thoughts so troubled . . . did you understand
When, in wild abandon, I twirled my sleeves*

"I feel uncertain before your grace."

Unable to shake the captivating sight of his face and elegant dancing figure, Fujitsubo could not very well pretend she had not seen his note, and so she replied:

*Chinese dancers conceived the "Waves of the Blue Sea"
Twirling their sleeves so long ago and far away . . .
But your every gesture touched me here and now*

2. A bird mentioned in Buddhist sutras for its surpassingly beautiful voice, to which the Buddha's voice is often compared [editor's note].

“My heart is overflowing.”

Genji had not expected a reply, and so he was ecstatic. Smiling, he thought that her words, which displayed knowledge of ancient dance and foreign courts, showed she had already acquired the dignity expected of a future Empress. He unrolled the letter and pored over it as if it were some treasured sutra.

On the day of the procession the princes of the blood and all members of the court participated. Genji's older half brother, the Crown Prince, accompanied the Emperor. As custom demanded, two boats were rowed around the lake at the site of the performance. One boat, adorned with the head of a dragon, held performers playing Chinese court music, while the other boat, adorned with the head of a blue heron, carried performers playing Korean court music.<sup>3</sup> There were many varieties of Chinese and Korean dance, and the sound of musical instruments and drums reverberated in all directions. Genji had looked so spectacular at the rehearsal the previous evening that the Emperor's old fears that his son might be fated to die young were revived, and he had sutras read for Genji at various temples around the capital to ward off evil. Everyone at the court who heard about this was sympathetic and thought it a reasonable precaution—everyone, that is, except the Kokiden Consort, mother of the Crown Prince, who spitefully remarked: “Isn't this really taking things a bit too far?”

The Emperor had gathered and selected the most distinguished players from among courtiers of both high and low rank to serve as the flutists and drummers who would accompany “Waves of the Blue Sea.” He had the performers divided into sides—those playing Chinese music on the left, those playing Korean music on the right. He then chose two Consultants from the Council of State, men who also served as the directors of the Left and Right Gate Guards, to conduct the Chinese and Korean music respectively. Prior to this performance each aristocratic house had sought out the most skilled dance instructors and secluded themselves away to practice under their tutelage.

The intermittent sighing of the wind in the pines mingled with the indescribably polished sound of forty musicians playing in the shade of tall trees in autumn foliage. Truly it sounded like a breeze blowing down from the deepest mountains, and amidst the multihued leaves that had fallen all around, the dazzling performance of “Waves of the Blue Sea” was sublime. The autumn leaves that had adorned Genji's headdress at the outset had dropped off as the dance proceeded. Having lost a little of its luster, the headdress was now suffering in comparison with Genji's lambent face. So the Consultant who was conducting the musicians of the Left plucked some of the chrysanthemums that had been placed in front of the Emperor and inserted them into the headdress.

As the day drew to a close, a chill evening drizzle began to fall, as if the scene had moved the very sky itself. The color of the chrysanthemums now adorning Genji's spectacular figure had faded slightly with the frost, and their beauty was beyond the power of words to describe. Genji himself was putting all his skill into his performance, dancing in a way that would never be equaled again. As he executed the final movements, retracing his steps just before he exited with a flourish, it seemed that an unearthly chill coursed through all of the spectators. Lower-class people

3. The term for these boats is ryōtōgekisu (dragon head, blue heron head). In China it referred to a single boat with a carving of a drag-on's head at the prow and one of a blue heron's head at the stern, but in Japan it referred to a pair of boats.

were also watching from the shade of craggy rocks, or from beneath the leaves falling from the mountain trees, and though one would hardly have imagined that they had the sensitivity to appreciate the performance, they were able to dimly recognize the sadness of transient beauty and wept accordingly.

The Fourth Prince, the Emperor's son by the Shōkyōden Consort, was still a boy. Nonetheless, his performance of "Dance of the Autumn Wind" proved to be the most spectacular event after Genji's dance. Because those two performances were so dazzling, everything that followed seemed bland by comparison, which put a damper on the whole affair.

That evening, both Genji and Tō no Chūjō were promoted—Genji to the senior third rank, which was rather an extraordinary rise given his previous status, and Tō no Chūjō to the lower division of the senior fourth rank, which was also an unusual rise. Other high-ranking courtiers had reason to rejoice as well, since those who deserved promotions received them. Since they had all benefited from Genji's success—his own rise having helped pull everyone up with him—it makes one curious to know just what virtue from a previous life now endowed him with the qualities that drew everyone's admiring eyes and caused hearts to be joyful.

At around the time of the procession Fujitsubo left the court and withdrew to her own residence. As always, Genji sought out every opportunity to see her, and consequently he was subjected to complaints from the Minister of the Left's household that he never visited his wife. Moreover, he learned that his wife was more distressed than usual because one of her attendants had reported to her that Genji had plucked a certain "wild grass"—meaning his little Murasaki—and that "he was keeping her in his villa at Nijō."

It's natural she would feel upset, Genji thought, since she knows nothing at all about the situation or how young Murasaki is. Even so, why can't she just tell me how she feels and vent her resentments like a normal woman? I could then speak without reserve, tell her all the things I feel in my heart and put her mind at ease. But no, she has to be so damnably suspicious all the time. It's no wonder I find myself conducting these illicit affairs.

Still, he had to admit that there were no flaws in his wife's appearance or manners that made him feel dissatisfied. And even though she did not understand his feelings for her, she was the first woman he had known, and so he could not help but regard her with special tenderness. He was sure that over time her attitude toward him would change and she would come to understand. After all, he had faith that, given her gentle and serious nature, she would naturally come around to him. The feelings he had for her were special and different from those he had for other women.

Murasaki was now comfortable with Genji. Possessed of both a virtuous character and attractive looks, she would innocently follow after Genji, clinging to him. For the moment, he was inclined not to give the people in his residence too much information about her, and he kept her in a separate wing of the villa, which he had done up in a lavish manner. He would visit her mornings and evenings, instructing her in all manner of things, copying out books for her to emulate in her writing practice. It made him feel as though he had taken in a daughter from some aristocratic household. He gave special care to setting up the household office and choosing the staff to serve her, so that she would never have cause for worry or complaint. Apart from Koremitsu, Genji kept everyone else in the dark about this woman he was treating so solicitously. Her father, Prince Hyōbu, had been unable to discover what had happened to her.

Murasaki would often reflect on the past, and she missed her grandmother terribly. For that reason Genji would try to divert her whenever he was at Nijō, and he even spent the night with her on occasion. Yet he was busy traveling here and there, visiting his many other women and going out during the evening, and so there were times when she would call after him and tell him how she ached to be with him. He found her unbearably sweet at those moments. Whenever he returned from two or three days of service at the palace, or from a visit with his wife at Sanjō, she would always look depressed. He found this distressing, and because he sometimes felt as though he were caring for a motherless child, he was no longer comfortable going out on his nighttime escapades. Upon hearing how well Genji was caring for the girl, the bishop at Kitayama was relieved and happy, even though he still considered the arrangement abnormal. Each time he conducted a memorial service for his sister, the late nun, Genji never failed to provide him with solemn, elaborate offerings.

Genji very much wanted to find out how Fujitsubo was doing. She had withdrawn to her own villa on Sanjō Avenue, and so he called on her there. He was met by several of her ladies-in-waiting—Ōmyōbu, Chūnagon and Nakatsukasa—and it bothered him that they acted so formally, clearly treating him as if he were a stranger. He stayed calm, keeping his feelings to himself as he exchanged pleasantries and court gossip with the women. Just then the Minister of War, Prince Hyōbu, arrived. When he learned that Genji was there as well, he granted him an audience. The Prince's elegant looks and bearing bespoke his high breeding, and Genji found his softly erotic, seductive manner so appealing that he imagined that the Prince would be a very alluring partner were he a woman. What's more, because the Prince was the older brother of Fujitsubo and the father of Murasaki, Genji felt a surge of intimacy with the man, speaking to him in a relaxed, warmly familiar way. Noticing that Genji was kindly opening up to him more than usual, the Prince found him quite enchanting. Unaware that Genji was now his son-in-law, he had a similar fantasy, imagining what Genji would be like as a woman.

Being Fujitsubo's older brother, he had the right to go in behind her curtains to speak to her when evening came. Genji was jealous of him, recalling the times when, as a little boy, he would be permitted to accompany his father behind Fujitsubo's curtains and address her face-to-face with no intermediaries. When he thought of the pain their separation caused him, he could hardly stand it.

"Though I should visit you more often," Genji said, "I normally don't have any reason to come here, so naturally I have neglected to stay in touch. Still, it would make me happy if you would send word should you ever need me to take care of something."

His manner was serious and he made no pretense of showing the usual charming warmth as he left Fujitsubo's residence. Ōmyōbu had been useless to Genji in arranging a meeting with Fujitsubo, and it was clear that Fujitsubo now regretted more than ever the karmic destiny that had brought them together. In the face of her mistress's coldhearted attitude, Ōmyōbu felt so ashamed, so at a loss, that as the days went by she found she was no longer able to help Genji in any way. Mutually lost in their unending torment, Fujitsubo and Genji realized how evanescent their bond had been.

Murasaki's nurse, Shōnagon, observed the wonderful though completely unexpected rapport that had developed between Genji and her young mistress and was convinced that their relationship was a blessing from the Buddha, to whom the old nun had constantly prayed and made hopeful offerings. Yet Shōnagon continued to be assailed with doubts about Murasaki's future.

Genji's wife is a woman of unquestionably high status and breeding, and he is involved with a number of other women as well. Surely when the girl comes of age someone will cause problems for her, will they not?

It was only because Genji seemed so devoted to Murasaki that Shōnagon felt she could trust him.

Murasaki was told that three months was an appropriately long period to wear robes of mourning for her grandmother, and so she put them away at the end of the twelfth month, just in time for the New Year. Having known no parent other than her grandmother, she was influenced by the old nun's tastes and continued to wear modest robes of plain crimson, purple, or yellow. In spite of these preferences, she was lovely—indeed, it could even be said that she was rather chic.

On the morning of the first day of the New Year, Genji peeked in on Murasaki's quarters on his way to court to attend the ceremony offering congratulations to the Emperor.

"Your change of attire makes you look more grown up than usual," he laughed, exuding a dazzlingly gentle and affectionate appeal.

Before he knew it, Murasaki was absorbed in arranging her Hina court dolls, setting out various accessories on a series of three-foot-long shelves and spreading the little dollhouses that had been made for her all around the room until it was overflowing with her playthings.

"That Inuki!" Murasaki grumbled. "Last night during the demon purification ritual, she was following the exorcist and got so excited by his mask and lance that she broke this. I've been trying to fix it."

Clearly she regarded this as a major crisis.

"She really is inconsiderate, isn't she?" Genji responded. "I'll have it repaired for you. You just remember that there is no crying or pouting today—it would bring bad luck."

His dashing looks, together with the grand size of his retinue, made his departure for court seem so ceremonious that the women attendants at his residence came out onto the veranda to see him off. Murasaki also stepped outside to watch him leave, then went back inside and dressed up her Genji doll to match the attire he was wearing to the palace.

"I hope you'll start acting a little more mature this year," Shōnagon scolded her charge. "Here you are, already past your tenth birthday, and you're still playing with these dolls. It just won't do. You have a husband now, and you really must start behaving more like a proper wife and looking more like a lady for him. You still can't stand for me to fix up your hair."

Shōnagon scolded Murasaki in order to shame the girl for always being so absorbed in her playthings. But the effect of her admonition was to make Murasaki finally understand her circumstances for the first time.

So he's my husband, is he? The attendants here all have husbands, but they're really ugly. Mine, on the other hand, is a dashing, handsome young man.

It may have been true that she was still attached to her playthings, but her newfound awareness of her relationship with Genji signaled that she was now a year older. The people who served at Genji's mansion had found her childish behavior, which could be quite pronounced at times, awkward and inappropriate, and yet they had no idea that she was in fact a wife in name only, for Genji had not had sex with her even though they slept together.

Following the ceremony at the palace, Genji went to the Minister of the Left's residence on Sanjō. His wife, as always, presented an icy, beautiful perfection that emitted not the slightest hint of demureness or endearing warmth. He felt uncomfortable in her presence.

"How happy it would make me if—this year, at least—you could change your attitude toward me so that we might have a little more normal relationship as husband and wife."

She, however, was in no mood for reconciliation. Having heard that he had set up another woman at his villa—evidently someone of great value worthy of his special attentions—she could not help feeling depressed and awkward around him. She struggled to act nonchalant, to pretend that she knew nothing about what was going on, and she found it hard, whenever he was intimate and unreserved, to remain stubborn and refuse to open up to him. Indeed, the gentle way she always responded had a special quality that set her apart from other women. Four years older than her husband, she was, at the age of twenty-two, now in her prime, and this was a problem for Genji because her flawless beauty and manners made him lose confidence when he was in her presence. There was nothing lacking in her, no flaws that he could detect anyway, and when he reflected on his own behavior he had to admit that her resentment was justified, since it was caused by those inexcusable affairs his fickle heart led him to pursue. After all, she was the only daughter of the Minister of the Left—a man who of all the nobles of similar rank had the weightiest reputation at court—and Princess Ōmiya, who was the younger sister of the Emperor. The greatest care had been lavished on his wife's upbringing, which meant that her sense of pride was exceptionally strong and that she would take even the most trivial slight or indiscretion as a serious and unpleasant injustice. This in turn made Genji resentful, wondering why it was that he was the one who always had to humor her pride. And so their hearts remained distant and unreconciled.

The Minister of the Left was disturbed by his son-in-law's fickleness, and yet whenever he saw Genji he would always forget his resentments, treat him deferentially, and do everything in his power to look after him. The following morning, as Genji was dressing and preparing to leave for court, the Minister dropped by to look in on him. Now that Genji had been promoted to the third rank, his father-in-law had ordered the servants to bring in a famous obi sash made of lacquered leather studded with gemstones that would show at the back of his robe and indicate his new status. He also had his servants straighten up the back of Genji's robes and was so particular about the choice of shoes it was almost as if he were putting them on Genji's feet himself. His solicitous behavior was somehow both touching and a little pathetic.

"Should I wear this on official occasions?" Genji asked. "The privy banquet will be held soon, on the Day of the Rat . . . is it the twenty-first or the twenty-third this year? Either way, I have to practice my Chinese verse for the event."

"I have better obi for events like that," the Minister sniffed. "This one just struck me as rather unusual-looking. That's all."

He pressed Genji to put it on, being almost religiously devoted to looking after him any way he could. Genji's appearances at Sanjō were certainly infrequent, but just to see this remarkable young man coming and going from his residence was a source of great joy and pride for the Minister.

Genji set off to make his New Year's round of visits. He did not have all that many places to call on: he paid his respects to the Emperor, to the Crown Prince, and to the former Emperor. He also dropped by Fujitsubo's villa on Sanjō.

"He's more remarkable than ever today. It's thrilling to realize that as he grows older, he's becoming even more handsome."

Fujitsubo's women were praising him up and down, and so she could not resist peeking through the gaps between her curtains to steal a glimpse. Immediately she was lost in her own troubled thoughts.

Her pregnancy was a source of considerable anxiety. Would she survive it? She was supposed to have given birth during the twelfth month, but here it was the New Year already. Her attendants were in a state of anticipation, thinking that surely their mistress would give birth sometime this month. Even His Majesty was having preparations made at court. But the first month passed with no indication that the birth was imminent, and rumors were now flying around court society. Was this delay the fault of some malign spirit? Such gossip made Fujitsubo feel even more miserable, for just as she was frightened by the possibility that she might die in childbirth, she was just as deathly afraid that the secret of her affair with Genji would be exposed. Her mental anguish eventually made her physically ill.

It was now increasingly clear to Genji that he was the father, and so to ward off evil spirits he discreetly ordered esoteric rites to be performed at various temples around the capital. He fully understood the evanescent nature of the world, but he could not help torturing himself with the thought that his relationship with Fujitsubo would end too soon and come to naught.

Then, sometime after the tenth of the second month, Fujitsubo gave birth to a Prince. The Emperor and all the people at Fujitsubo's residence in Sanjō were relieved and excited by this auspicious event, even if Genji and Fujitsubo were not. His Majesty had been praying for her to live a long life, yet now the thought of a long life was a burden to Fujitsubo, given all her cares. When rumors reached her that the Kokiden Consort had tried to curse her by praying for an unlucky birth, she realized that news of her death would have served as a source of amusement to some at the court. She drew strength and determination from that thought, and gradually her health and spirits improved.

The Emperor's desire to see the child as quickly as possible was boundless. Genji, who was keeping his feelings to himself, was also extremely anxious to see the child to confirm whether or not he was the father. Choosing a time when he knew there would be no one else around, he paid a visit to Fujitsubo.

"My father is eagerly waiting to see the child," Genji told her. "I thought I might take a look at the baby and then report to the Emperor."

"That's out of the question . . . he was just born and is not presentable in his present condition."

Fujitsubo quite reasonably refused, for there was no denying that the baby bore a shocking, almost otherworldly resemblance to Genji—a living reproduction.

Suffering from the demon of guilty conscience, Fujitsubo was convinced that anyone who saw the baby would instantly recognize the sin that she had committed with Genji. Since sanctimonious people were always eager to discover and condemn even the most minor of faults, what would they say about this? What would happen to her reputation? Dwelling on such possibilities, Fujitsubo was deeply distressed, body and soul.

Genji would meet with Ōmyōbu once in a while, doing his utmost through her to plead his case with Fujitsubo. Not surprisingly, his pleas fell on deaf ears.

He continually pestered her about the young Prince until finally Ōmyōbu told him, "Why must you insist on seeing him? You'll have your chance in due time." Even though she tried to reassure him, she seemed as troubled at heart as he.

Constrained by his surroundings, Genji could not speak frankly with Ōmyōbu. "Will there ever be a time or conditions when I can speak directly to Fujitsubo, without having to rely on an intermediary?"

It was heartbreaking to see him on the verge of tears.

*What karmic bond forged in a former life
Destined us to meet again in this world
Only to find ourselves always apart*

"I cannot understand these things," he lamented.

Having witnessed the torments her lady was experiencing, Ōmyōbu found it impossible, in the face of Genji's sadness, to curtly refuse him. She recalled the poem by Fujiwara no Kanesuke that evoked the "hearts of parents lost in darkness," and replied:

*The one looking on the child suffers regret
The one who cannot see the child suffers grief . . .
Must all parents wander lost in such darkness*

"How sad that the birth of this child should keep your hearts from finding peace," she murmured.

With no means of communicating with Fujitsubo, Genji returned to his residence. Troubled by the possibility of idle chatter at the court, Fujitsubo told Ōmyōbu that she could no longer tolerate her leading Genji here; that was how she really felt. Wary that Ōmyōbu might bring Genji to her, she was no longer able to trust her lady-in-waiting as she had in the past, and stopped treating her as a confidante. She continued to treat Ōmyōbu kindly, so that no one would suspect anything was amiss, but there were times now when she appeared displeased by Ōmyōbu's conduct. Aware that she was estranged from Fujitsubo, Ōmyōbu felt sad that things had not turned out as she had expected.

The baby was taken to the palace during the fourth month. Larger than usual for a baby that age, the boy was already able to turn himself over. His face bore a striking resemblance to Genji's, but it never occurred to the Emperor that Genji might be the child's true father. Rather, he assumed that people who shared unparalleled good looks would naturally resemble one another. His affection and care for the baby were boundless. His affection for Genji also knew no limits, but the lack of recognition and support for Genji among the high-ranking courtiers had made it impossible for him to install Genji in the line of succession. He constantly regretted his decision, and it was a source of pain for him to now look on his son's mature bearing and features and have to think what a waste it was to have removed Genji from the imperial line. It was thus a source of consolation for him that Fujitsubo, the fourth daughter of the previous Emperor and a woman of unimpeachable status, had given him a son who possessed the same radiant beauty as Genji. He considered the child a flawless jewel and lavished the greatest care on him—attention that, for Fujitsubo, merely added to the guilt and anxiety filling her heart.

One day, when Genji decided to pass the time performing music in Fujitsubo's quarters at the palace, as was his wont, His Majesty joined them. He was carrying the infant Prince in his arms.

"I have many, many children," he remarked to Genji, "but you were the only one I was able to be with all day from the time you were this one's age. Maybe it's because this little one brings those days back to me that I think he looks so much like you. I wonder if all children look the same when they are very young?"

It was obvious that the Emperor found the child adorable.

Genji felt himself blanch. Fear, shame, elation, pity . . . all these emotions over whelmed him to the point that he felt he was going to cry. The baby prattled and smiled, and looked almost preternaturally cute. Was it all that unreasonable or vain of Genji to think—assuming he really did resemble this child during his own infancy—that he himself must indeed have been incredibly precious? Fujitsubo could hardly stand to be there—she was so mortified that she began to perspire. At the same time Genji, who had been so eager to see the child, was unnerved in his presence, and the turmoil in his heart forced him to withdraw from Fujitsubo's quarters.

Genji returned to his Nijō villa, and after resting for a while to calm his nerves, he decided that he should pay a visit to his wife. Pinks were brightly blooming amidst the vibrant green of the plantings that seemed to cover the entire front garden, so he had one of them picked and sent to Ōmyōbu. There were so many things he had to write to Fujitsubo:

*Though I see you in him, the one so like this little pink,
I cannot tell you so, and thus my heart knows no comfort
My tears heavier than the dew on this flower's petals*

"No matter how much I long to see the little one bloom, because our relationship was not meant to last in this vain world . . ."

His note must have been delivered at an opportune moment. Ōmyōbu showed it to Fujitsubo and encouraged her lady to write back:

"You really should answer him, even if, as Ōshikōchi no Mitsune put it, your response is no more than a mote of dust on the petal of a pink."<sup>4</sup>

Fujitsubo was deeply moved and sent back a simple poem written in the faintest of hands. Her characters looked as though she had pulled the brush away before finishing each stroke:

4. Kokinshū 167 (Ōshikōchi no Mitsune): "I long to stop even a mote of dust from settling on this bed of pinks that have come into bloom

since first you and I lay on our bed." Mitsune's poem is alluded to in the Hahakigi chapter.

*Though I may consider it the source Of the heavy dew that soaks my sleeves
How could I discard this precious pink*

Ômyôbu was overjoyed that her lady had responded, and she promptly delivered the poem to Genji. At that moment Genji was lying languidly, absently lost in melancholy thoughts, sure that his poem had been in vain and that no reply would be coming back to him. But as soon as he saw Ômyôbu, his heart beat wildly and he was so happy he wept.

Feeling that it was not good for him to just lie around and mope, absorbed in his cares, he decided he should go to the west hall to see the one person who was his solace. His hair was mussed, he had carelessly tossed on a loose robe, and he was playing a sweetly nostalgic air on his flute when he looked in on Murasaki. She was reclining on an armrest, her elegant appearance calling to mind the image of pinks drenched in dew—perfectly lovely and cute. As enchanting as she looked, it turned out that she was nursing a new grudge against Genji. This was unusual for her, but there she was, sitting with her back toward him, annoyed that he had not come to see her sooner even though he had been in his quarters for some time. Genji moved over to the veranda at the edge of the room and knelt there.

“Come over here,” Genji coaxed her, but she ignored him and continued to sulk.

She expressed her resentment toward him by murmuring lines from the Man'yôshû: “Is he like seaweed on the shore at high tide, which I long for so much, but see so seldom?”

She covered her mouth with the sleeve of her robe, apparently embarrassed at her own precociousness. Her gesture made her all the more adorable.

“Ahh, that’s unfortunate . . . you’ve already learned how to complain just like an adult. Well, then, let me remind you of this poem: ‘Were I to see you morning and night, just as often as the divers at Ise see the seaweed, would I not grow weary of you?’”<sup>5</sup>

He summoned a servant and had her bring in a thirteen-string koto for Murasaki to play.

“This instrument is difficult because the second string closest to you is thin and easily broken,” Genji told her. He then tuned the instrument to a lower key to reduce the tension on the strings. He played a few short songs to test the tuning and then pushed the koto over in front of her. Murasaki found it impossible to continue sulking, and she played beautifully. She was still so small that she had to raise herself up and stretch to reach the strings, but he found the movements of her left hand, as she pressed the strings to make the instrument reverberate, delightfully refined. He instructed her by accompanying her on the flute. She had a quick memory and could pick up even the difficult keys in just one try. Clever, possessed of a sweet disposition, she was everything he had long hoped for in a woman. The court song “Hosoroguseri” may have had a peculiar-sounding title, but as Genji focused on playing it in his inimitable style, Murasaki accompanied him, skillfully keeping time to the rhythm even though she was so young.

Oil lamps were brought in and they passed the time poring over paintings together. He had mentioned earlier to his retinue that he intended to go out, and so a member of his escort began to cough to signal it was time to go.

"It looks like it might rain . . ." one of his guards remarked, and Murasaki at once became sullen and depressed, as she always did when Genji was about to leave.

She pushed the paintings away and lay facedown. Genji found her so endearing that he began to stroke her hair, which was spilling abundantly over her shoulders.

"I suppose you miss me when I'm away?" he asked her.

She nodded.

"I hate going even a single day without seeing you," Genji tried to comfort her, adding, "But since you are still a child, I have to ask you to be patient a little while longer and to not worry so. I have such fond feelings for you, but I must also consider the feelings of others and not offend those who may be jealous and resentful. Those women are troublesome, and that's why, for the present at least, I have to visit them as I do. When you are grown up I won't have to go out anymore, but for now I want to avoid the harm that might arise as a result of the jealousy of other women so that we might live a long life and be together as much as we desire."

Murasaki felt embarrassed to hear Genji speak about their relationship in such detail, and so she did not answer him. She drew herself up onto Genji's lap and went to sleep.

Genji felt terribly sorry for her and told his attendants, "I'll not be going out this evening." They all rose and withdrew, and he had his dinner, which he normally ate in his own rooms, brought to her quarters instead.

He woke Murasaki and told her, "I'm not going out after all."

Her mood at once improved and she got up. They ate together, but Murasaki was still anxious about his plans and merely picked at her food.

"If you're not going out," she suggested, "then why not sleep here tonight?"

If it is so difficult for us to part at a moment like this, Genji mused, then how much more difficult will it be when we have to part on the inevitable road of death?

* * *

From Chapter IX

Aoi

LEAVES OF WILD GINGER

The court changed when His Majesty abdicated and the Crown Prince took the throne as Emperor Suzaku. The Kokiden faction, headed by the Minister of the Right, was now in ascendance, and Genji began to feel that everything was more difficult for him. Just before His Majesty stepped down, he had promoted his favored son to Major Captain of the Right—a rise in status that required the Radiant Prince, in keeping with the dignity of his new position, to begin showing more restraint in pursuing his frivolous nightly adventures. The result was that his many lovers began to complain more and more of his heartlessness. Was it in retribution for causing all these lamentations that Genji suffered from what he saw as the unending cruelty of Fujitsubo, who kept her distance from him? Now, more than ever, she served at the side of the Retired Emperor—almost as if she were some low-ranking attendant. This did not sit well with the Kokiden Consort, but she was now Imperial Mother and had to serve exclusively at the palace—an arrangement that was a source of considerable relief to Fujitsubo.

Depending on the occasion, the Retired Emperor would sponsor musical entertainments so lavish and spectacular that they became the talk of court society. He seemed more content now than when he had held power. The only thing lacking for him was Fujitsubo's little son, the new Crown Prince. He yearned to see the boy, who could not be by his side. Having long worried that Fujitsubo's son had no supporters at court, he asked Genji to look after the boy's affairs—a request that was of course awkward for Genji, but one that also made him happy.

At this point I must bring up another, entirely separate matter. At the time Emperor Suzaku ascended the throne, an imperial princess was appointed as the new High Priestess for the Imperial Shrine at Ise. The mother of this princess was the lady at Rokujō—the woman Genji had long been visiting discreetly—while the father was an imperial prince who had actually been ahead of Suzaku in the line of succession, but who had died before he could take the throne. Because the Princess was appointed High Priestess under these circumstances, the lady at Rokujō, who no longer had any confidence in the reliability of Genji's feelings, was greatly worried about her daughter's future. The girl was, after all, only thirteen and would be alone in Ise. Thus, the lady at Rokujō had for some time been giving serious consideration to leaving the capital herself and accompanying her daughter to the Imperial Shrine. When the Retired Emperor heard about her plans to leave, he was extremely upset and spoke sharply to Genji about the matter.

"Do I need to remind you," he scolded, "that she was the first wife of my late brother and would have been an Imperial Consort? He had special affection for her, but now I hear rumors about how carelessly you treat her, as if she were some ordinary woman. It's pathetic. I look on her daughter, the High Priestess, as one of my own, and so you must put an end to this frivolous behavior—not just for her sake, but for mine as well. If you persist in playing these irresponsible little games, then don't be surprised when your reputation is in ruins."

Genji could not deny that his father was speaking the truth. Thoroughly chastened, he refrained from answering, whereupon the Retired Emperor added, his tone a little softer, "Never do anything to dishonor or shame a woman. Treat them all gently and give them no cause to resent you."

With that admonition ringing in his ears, Genji humbly withdrew from his father's presence, terrified at the thought that a day might come when his father learned the truth about Genji's wildly reckless affair with Fujitsubo.

If his father was lecturing him about it, then obviously gossip about his affair with the lady at Rokujō had spread through the court. His promiscuity had damaged her honor and his own reputation. He could just imagine how terribly she must be suffering, but there was simply no way he could formally acknowledge their relationship. For one thing, the lady herself was embarrassed that at the age of twenty-nine she was having an affair with a man seven years younger. Moreover, she always tried to appear distant and aloof, and so Genji had grown more reserved with her. Now, however, everyone at court, even the Retired Emperor, knew what was going on, and she lamented that Genji's feelings for her were so shallow.

Genji had long been pursuing the daughter of Prince Shikibu—a lady he knew as Asagao, his Princess of the bellflowers. His efforts had so far proven futile, however, and when Princess Asagao heard rumors of his affair, she resolved never to end up like the lady at Rokujō and refused to give even the most perfunctory of replies to his vain entreaties. Even so, she showed a proper attitude and conducted herself in a way that would give no offense to Genji, and so he continued to consider her a woman of superior qualities.

Needless to say, the household of the Minister of the Left was not amused by Genji's restless disposition, but then again, since he showed no qualms about carrying on so openly, it would have been useless to have complained to him about it. His wife, for one, did not harbor any deep resentment toward him, not least because she was now pregnant and suffering most pitifully not only from morning sickness but also from anxiety over the dangers posed by the coming birth. Genji thought the pregnancy remarkable, and for the first time felt sympathy for his wife. Because everyone was so overjoyed for her, there was a concern that such happiness could invite bad fortune, and so various prayers and rituals of abstinence<sup>6</sup> were commissioned in order to ensure safe delivery for mother and child. With all these things going on, Genji had less and less time to even consider the feelings of his other women. He was especially mindful of the feelings of the lady at Rokujō, but despite his best intentions not to neglect her, his visits practically ceased altogether.

The High Priestess of the Kamo Shrine also stepped down at about that time, and her successor was the third daughter of the Retired Emperor by the Kokiden Consort. This girl was a special favorite of both parents, and it bothered them that unlike her siblings she would have to live isolated from court life. Unfortunately, there were no other princesses appropriate for the position. Although the rituals of investiture were austere, as was customary with Shinto shrines, they would nonetheless be solemn and grand. The Festival of the Kamo Shrine, which was held in the fourth month, was always a major event in the capital; those who accompanied the High Priestess's procession would decorate their carriages and headdresses with heart-shaped leaves of wild ginger<sup>7</sup> Because this year marked the new Priestess's inaugural procession, many attractions would be added to the public events already scheduled, and the festival, in keeping with the special status of the High Priestess, would be an especially glorious one.

A few days before the start of the Kamo Festival, twelve high-ranking officials were required to attend the Priestess during the procession to her ritual of

6. That is, periods of seclusion [editor's note].

7. Aoi, the Japanese name for wild ginger, is also a homophone for the words au hi, which means "the day we will meet." The combination of the heart-shaped leaves of the plant, which is an evergreen, and the romantic implications of its name are played on later in this chapter in an exchange of poems between Genji and the older lady, Naishi, who appeared in the Momiji no ga chapter. Because much of this chapter centers on Genji's wife, she has been identified traditionally as Aoi.

purification, which took place on the banks of the Kamo River. Given the auspicious nature of the event, only men with honorable prospects and good looks were chosen for this task, and every detail of their appearance was carefully considered—from the color of the trains on their robes and the pattern of their trousers to the choice of horses and saddles. By special order of Emperor Suzaku, Genji was chosen to participate, and when those who planned to view the procession heard about this decision, they gave extra thought in advance to preparing and positioning their carriages along the route.

The thoroughfare of Ichijō was crammed with carriages and bustling with people. Viewing platforms had been erected at various sites and decorated with great care. Those decorations, together with the sleeves of the court ladies' robes, which trailed out from beneath the blinds set up on the platforms, created their own splendid spectacle.

Genji's wife rarely left her father's residence to go view events like this. Moreover, she had given no thought at all of going to view this particular procession, since she was feeling ill and nervous. Her younger attendants, however, all complained to her.

"What is my lady thinking? How could we ever hope to enjoy the beauty of the procession if we have to sneak off just to take a peak?"

"Ordinary folk, even the lowest woodcutters and hunters who have no connection with anyone in the procession, will be there to take in the sights. They'll especially want to catch a glimpse of your husband."

"People from distant provinces will bring their wives and children to take a look. So it's just not fair that we have to miss it!"

Princess Ōmiya, who, as the younger sister of the Retired Emperor, truly understood the importance of such matters, heard these complaints and urged her daughter to go.

"You've been feeling better recently, and your attendants will feel left out and dissatisfied if you don't."

And with that, all the women were suddenly informed, to their joy, that their lady would be going out after all.

Because the sun was already well up, they left without formally preparing the carriages in a manner befitting the status of the Minister's household. By the time they arrived, Ichijō Avenue was already packed with carriages lining both sides of the street, and it was difficult finding a place to park the imposing and dignified vehicles, unhitch the oxen, and set the shafts on their supports. Many noblewomen already had their carriages positioned there, and the male guards escorting Genji's wife decided to clear a space by pushing aside those that had no guardsmen protecting them.

Among the carriages that had been lined up in that space, two of them exuded a special air of refinement—informal in style, with roofs and blinds made of hinoki<sup>8</sup> wicker, slightly worn, but adorned with silk curtains. The women inside had obviously intended to remain inconspicuous. The fresh, vibrant colors of the cuffs of their sleeves, the hems of their skirts, and the ends of their singlets all peeked out coyly from beneath the blinds. The guards escorting Genji's wife were explicitly told not to touch these two carriages and warned, "This is not a carriage you can just push aside as you wish!" Unfortunately, the young men in both parties had been drinking too much, and in the end there was no way to prevent the situation from getting out of control. The older retainers from the Minister's household commanded the young men to desist, but they were unable to stop a fight from breaking out.

8. A Japanese evergreen used for various building purposes [editor's note].

The lady at Rokujō, whose daughter would soon go off to serve as the Ise Priestess, had been thinking she might find relief from her tormented feelings about Genji by coming discreetly to view the procession for the Purification Ritual. Her attendants, aware of her desire to remain incognito, did not reveal her identity, but it was obvious to the men accompanying Genji's wife whose carriages they were moving.

"Don't let them talk to us like that," several of the men shouted. "They must think they can still rely on Lord Genji!"

Several of Genji's attendants had been assigned to accompany his wife's party. They all regarded this incident as most regrettable, but it would have been extremely awkward for them to intervene, and so they looked the other way. In the end, the carriages of Genji's wife and her attendants were positioned in the spaces that had been cleared away, and the carriages of the lady at Rokujō had been relegated to a place behind them, where she could neither see nor be seen. She was in an agony of anger and indignation, and now that her identity had been revealed, after having gone to such great lengths to conceal it out of concern that her shameful feelings for Genji might be exposed, there was no limit to the feelings of chagrin and remorse she suffered. Because the stands for her carriage shafts had been broken in the melee, they had to be propped up on the wheel hubs of some unknown carriages next to hers. It must have looked unsightly, and she was mortified, wondering vainly why she had ever decided to come here.

She no longer wanted to view the procession and wished instead to go home, but there was no space to move her carriage. Just then cries rang out from the crowd:

"They're on their way!"

Her resolve weakened, and now she wanted to wait until her cruel lover had passed. She recalled an ancient poem in which the Goddess of Ise asks a man to stop his horse at Sasanokuma to let it drink from the Hinokuma River—all so that she might have the chance to gaze upon him.<sup>9</sup> Anxious, she wondered if Genji would stop to acknowledge her . . . but no, he continued on, coldly passing by without so much as a glance in her direction. The turmoil in her heart was greater than ever. Genji feigned disinterest in the many carriages that lined the way, even though they were more splendidly decorated than usual, with the hems of robes spilling out from beneath the blinds as though the occupants were in competition with one another. Still, he did occasionally smile and give a sly, sidelong glance at certain carriages, and when he recognized the carriages of his father-in-law, he assumed a solemn expression as he passed. The men in his escort silently bowed to show their deep respect for Genji's wife. The Rokujō lady, overwhelmed by this display, which clearly demonstrated the inferiority of her status, could not have felt more wretched.

9. A sacred song for the Sun Goddess from The Kokinshū.

*How cruel of those chill waters of lustration
To grant but a glimpse of your reflected image
Reminding me all the more of my wretched fate*

She knew it would be disgraceful to weep in front of her women, so she comforted herself with the thought that she would have regretted passing up the opportunity to witness the radiance of his appearance and the beauty of his countenance on such a dazzling occasion.

The high-ranking nobles who accompanied the Kamo Priestess on the procession were superbly decked out in fine robes, each in keeping with his status at court, and attended by magnificent-looking escorts. The appearance of those of the highest rank was especially breathtaking, and yet, as remarkable as they were, they seemed to pale in comparison with Genji's radiance. One of the eight men in his retinue, which had been assembled just for this event, was a man of the sixth rank, a Lesser Captain in the Right Imperial Guard. It was most unusual to assign someone of his status to this kind of duty, but he was so remarkably good-looking that he was chosen anyway. The other men in Genji's escort were also dazzlingly resplendent, and Genji's appearance, which was always esteemed by the court, was so awe-inspiring that the very trees and grasses seemed to bow before him. Normally, it would be considered improper and unsightly for ladies of rank who, for the sake of modesty, wore veils beneath their deep-brimmed hats, or for nuns who had renounced the world to literally fall over one another in an effort to catch a glimpse of him. Today, however, was different, and no one reproved them. Women of the lower classes—their mouths drawn in where they were missing teeth, their hair tucked modestly inside their robes—jostled each other and made fools of themselves, clasping their hands to their foreheads in supplication to Genji. Vulgar men were grinning stupidly from ear to ear, unaware of how ridiculous their faces looked. Daughters of minor provincial officials, whom Genji would never so much as glance at, had arrived in their lavishly decorated carriages, hopelessly preening and posturing because they knew Genji would be passing by. So many amusing things to observe—including the many women who, having been favored by a covert visit from Genji, were now lamenting to themselves that they no longer belonged among the blessed few he favored.

Prince Shikibu, the Minister of Ceremonials, was viewing the procession from one of the platforms, and when he saw Genji, ominous thoughts came to him: He has matured so, and his appearance is so truly spectacular that I fear he will attract the attention of gods and demons.

Prince Shikibu's daughter, Princess Asagao, had exchanged many letters with Genji over several years and so she knew his sensibilities were anything but ordinary. Now that she was seeing his beauty for the first time, her heart was deeply moved.

A woman can be touched by a man's sincerity, she told herself, even if he is rather ordinary-looking. How much more appealing, then, is the sincerity of a man whose looks are as stunning as his?

Despite these sentiments, she was not inclined to allow her relationship with Genji to become any more familiar or intimate. Her younger attendants were all praising him so much they sounded uncouth, and she found it irritating to listen to them.

When the Kamo Festival proper was held a few days later, no one from the Minister of the Left's residence came out to view it. Genji had been informed of the quarrel between the carriages, and he felt sorry for the lady at Rokujō. He was also offended by his wife's conduct.

"It's a shame," he remarked, "that such a dignified person should show so little sympathy or kindness toward others. She probably never intended for such a thing to happen, and yet her temperament prevents her from even considering the possibility that women who share the kind of relationship she and the lady do should be mutually affectionate and supportive. No wonder her subordinates, who lack judgment and status, acted as outrageously as they did. As for the lady who suffered this insult, she has such a superior upbringing and is so sensitive to any slight that the whole sordid incident must have been terribly unpleasant for her."

Genji felt such pity that he went to Rokujō to visit the lady. She, however, was reluctant to meet him. Her daughter, after all, was still living in the residence while undergoing the rites of purification that would prepare her to serve as the High Priestess at Ise. Branches of the sacred sakaki tree<sup>1</sup> had been placed at all the corners and gates, and thus the lady did not feel comfortable letting Genji in to see her, since that would run the risk of defilement. Genji thought her precaution perfectly reasonable, but he still muttered to himself, "Why must things always be like this? Why do women have to flash their horns and quarrel?"

Genji retreated to his own residence at Nijō. On the day of the Kamo Festival he went with Murasaki to view the festivities. After ordering Koremitsu to prepare their carriages, he went over to the west hall.

"Will all your little ladies be going as well?" he teasingly asked, referring to Murasaki's playmates.

Observing her outfit and makeup, which exuded an exceptionally graceful air, he couldn't help smiling.

"Very well, then, shall we be going? Let's go view the festival together."

He stroked her hair, which looked even more lustrous than usual, and added, "It's been a while since you've had the ends trimmed. Today would be an auspicious time to do it." He summoned a scholar from the Bureau of Divination and asked him which hours that day would be lucky or unlucky for trimming hair. He then told Murasaki, "Have your little ladies come forth." He looked them over and found their childish figures delightfully charming. Their hair had been trimmed gorgeously and hung down in sharp relief over the outer trousers of their festive robes . . . altogether adorable. "I'll cut your hair," Genji said to Murasaki. "It's really thick, isn't it? What would become of it if you just let it grow out?" He found trimming her hair a little difficult. "Ladies with very long hair tend to cut the sidelocks that frame their foreheads a little shorter than the rest. I don't think you would look as attractive without short locks." When he finished with the trimming, Genji offered the obligatory benediction, expressing the hope that her hair might grow "a thousand fathoms."

Murasaki's nurse, Shonagon, had been watching them, her heart filled with gratitude. Genji composed and recited a verse:

1. Sakaki is a flowering evergreen tree native to Japan. It is sacred in the Shinto religion, and branches of sakaki, decorated with slips or streamers of paper, are used for ritual offerings and purifications.

*I shall protect you, watching your hair grow
Like strands of rippling seaweed stretching up
From the thousand-fathomed depths of the sea*

Murasaki chose to write out her reply:

*You swear love as deep as the thousand-fathomed sea
Yet how am I to know that's true, since you wander Coming and going like uncertain, restless tides*

Such clever wit, and such youthful beauty. She's perfect, Genji thought.

So many sightseeing carriages had arrived for the Kamo Festival that there were not enough spaces to park them all this day as well. Because they were having trouble finding a place to stop, they pulled up near the parade grounds and pavilion where the Mounted Guard held their archery competition during the fifth month of each year.

"So many high-ranking officials have brought their carriages here, the area is really bustling," Genji said, sounding a little confounded and irritable. He had his carriage pause for a moment next to a lady's carriage that was not at all inelegant. The carriage was filled with occupants, and a fan was thrust out beckoning him over to them.

"Would you like to set your carriage here?" a woman asked. "We could make some space for you."

Genji was somewhat taken aback, wondering what kind of woman could be so coquettish. This spot, however, was an excellent place from which to view the festival parade, and so he decided to accept the invitation.

"How did you manage to come by this space?" he asked. "It's good enough to make people resent you, so I'll take you up on your offer."

The lady in the carriage then broke off a section of her stylish folding fan and wrote out the following:

*Heart-shaped leaves of wild ginger adorn another
Though their name promises some day we'll meet . . . vainly
I waited for the Kamo gods to bless this day*

"I cannot pass beyond the ropes marking off that sacred space."

Genji recognized the handwriting. It was the old Assistant Handmaid, Naishi no suke. He found it shocking that someone her age should be flirting like a young woman. He was genuinely displeased and sent back a curt reply:

*The feelings of one adorned with those heart-shaped leaves
Are certainly fickle, since she can "meet this day"
Any man she wants from among the eighty clans*

Naishi was filled with resentment when she received Genji's cruel response:

*A bitter adornment, this wild ginger
With its empty promise of meeting you . . .
Mere leaves signifying vain and false hopes*

Many women, not just Naishi, experienced pangs of jealousy as they tried to guess the identity of the lady riding with Genji. They resented that for her sake he chose to keep his blinds down, because it denied them an opportunity to catch a glimpse of him. The women gossiped among themselves:

“He was so splendid-looking the day of the procession.”

“Yes, but today’s he’s going about rather informally, don’t you think?”

“Who is that riding with him? I wonder. She must be a special woman.”

Genji remained disgruntled, thinking, What a complete waste of time, exchanging verses that play on a subject like leaves of wild ginger.

Anyone else would certainly have refrained from sending a note out of respect for the lady riding with him—but not someone as impudent as Naishi.

For her part, the lady at Rokujō had never in all her life experienced the kind of torment brought on recently by her dark, obsessive thoughts. She had, it is true, resigned herself to Genji’s cruel neglect, but the thought of leaving him behind in order to go with her daughter to Ise brought on agonizing loneliness. She was also fully aware that she would be an object of derision at the court. Whenever she thought, wistfully, that perhaps she ought to stay behind in the capital, she would become anxious, for she knew that if she stayed she would expose herself to even more extreme levels of ridicule. Her days and nights were so filled with troubled thoughts that she couldn’t help but recall the Kokinshū poem: “Am I a float on the line of the fisherman of Ise that my heart should be adrift like this, bobbing on the waves?”<sup>2</sup> Finding no relief from her obsessive, insecure state of mind, she fell ill.

Genji wasn’t in the least concerned about her stated desire to accompany her daughter to Ise, and he never once tried to dissuade her by telling her that it was out of the question. Instead he remarked, rather sarcastically, “I understand. It’s perfectly reasonable for you to find repugnant the prospect of continuing a relationship with a man as worthless as I. Yet no matter how unpleasant it may be for you now, if you were to stay with me to the end, your choice would prove that you’re a woman of uncommonly deep sensibility, would it not?”

On hearing such hateful words, the lady withdrew even deeper into her dark thoughts. Distressed and depressed, she had decided to go see the procession only because she wanted some relief from her insecurity and indecisiveness. And then, when she did go, she found herself buffeted about, as if she were adrift on the violent rapids of the river of lustration.

While all of this was taking place, a malignant spirit was causing concern for everyone at the Minister of the Left’s Sanjō residence. Genji’s wife was suffering terribly, and under the circumstances it was not appropriate for him to be going around visiting his other women. Indeed, during this period he only rarely went to his own residence in Nijō. True, he had never warmed to his wife much, but he did consider her someone of special importance to him. He was wracked with grief that she should now be suffering so much as a consequence of her remarkable pregnancy, and he had prayers and rites performed for her in his own quarters at his father-in-law’s residence.

Many souls of the deceased and spirits of living persons were exorcised and forced to reveal their names. One particular spirit, however, resisted all attempts to move it into the body of a medium and persisted in clinging fast to Genji’s wife. It did no real harm, but it would not leave her body, even for a few moments. The deeply obsessive nature of this spirit, which would not obey the holiest of exorcists, made it clear that this was no commonplace possession. The attendants considered the various women Genji called on and whispered among themselves:

2. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū.

“Only the ladies at Rokujō and Nijō have a special place in his heart—perhaps their resentment is especially strong.”

Diviners were brought in to confirm these suspicions, but they failed to do so. Whenever they questioned the spirits, they learned nothing that would suggest any of them was driven by revenge or hatred. There was the spirit of a former nurse and spirits that had haunted the families of the Minister and Princess Ōmiya for generations, but these had appeared simply because their daughter was in a fragile condition. None of them were really malicious but seemed to have shown up at random. Why, then, was Genji’s wife constantly shouting out and weeping? She was always nauseous or had choking sensations, and she would writhe around as if in unbearable agony. Genji and her parents were frightened and upset, wondering how this would all turn out and worrying that she might die.

Because the Retired Emperor repeatedly sent messages of concern and graciously ordered prayers and rituals, her death would be all the more lamentable. Upon hearing that everyone at the court was worried, the lady at Rokujō was afflicted with the troubling thought that she was being diminished as sympathy for her rival grew. She had always had a jealous, competitive streak, but until that absurd quarrel over the carriages had unsettled her heart, it had never been as pronounced as it was now, and she felt a degree of resentment that no one at the Minister’s household could have ever imagined.

The lady knew, as a result of her confused emotions, that her condition was not normal, and so she decided to undergo esoteric Buddhist healing rites. However, she had to move out of her residence and have the rites performed elsewhere in order to avoid defiling her daughter, who was still preparing to be the High Priestess of Ise. Genji heard about her plans and, moved to pity as he wondered how she was feeling, went to call on her. Because she was not at her usual residence in Rokujō, he had to be exceptionally discreet when he visited. He repeatedly asked her to overlook the way he had neglected her recently, pointing out that it was due to circumstances beyond his control. He even tried to elicit her sympathy by describing the terrible suffering of his wife.

“I’m not all that concerned about her myself,” he said, “but I do feel sorry for her parents, who are upset and making rather too much of a fuss about it. So while she is in this condition, I really should stay close by her. If you could take all of these things into account, I would be very grateful.”

Genji pleaded with her, but he could see from the expression on her face that she was suffering even more than usual, and he felt terribly sorry for her.

The lady had been moody and withdrawn that night, but when—in the welter of her yearnings and resentments—she saw how ravishing he looked as he prepared to leave at the crack of dawn, she was tempted to reconsider her decision to leave the capital with her daughter. At the same time, the lady was realistic enough to know that Genji, who already held that wife of his in high esteem, would feel even greater affection and lavish his attentions solely on her once the child was born. And when that happened, she would be left waiting, fretting impatiently over whether Genji would ever show up and knowing that whenever he did come to see her, it would be out of some lukewarm sense of duty or pity. Her tangled emotions opened her eyes afresh to the reality of her situation. After waiting all day for his morning-after letter, it finally arrived that evening—a short, curt note with no poem attached:

“Her condition had been improving recently, but now she has suffered a relapse, and I really must stay here.”

She read the note and thought it was just another of his typical excuses. Even so, she sent a response:

*Intimate with love's path where dew has soaked my sleeves
I followed too far . . . now my sad fate is to end
Like a peasant planting fields, my robes soaked in mud*

“Perhaps it is fitting to remind you of the old poem about the water of the mountain well. The poet, having tried to draw water from a well so shallow, regrets that she too gets nothing but damp sleeves.”<sup>3</sup>

Genji pored over her response, marveling at the beauty of her script, which was far superior to everyone else's, and wondered why the world had to be so damnably complicated. He felt painfully torn—on the one hand, he couldn't simply abandon a woman of her sensibility and looks, and, on the other, there was no way he could settle on just one woman. He sent his reply well after dark:

“What do you mean that only your sleeves are damp? Your feelings for me must not be very deep.”

*How shallow the path of love you follow
That you merely dampen your sleeves with dew
While I drench myself where the mud is deep*

He added, among other things, “Do you imagine that my feelings for you are insincere, that I would not reply to you in person were my wife's condition not truly serious?”

At the Minister's residence the obsessive spirit was appearing more persistently and causing Genji's wife great distress. The lady at Rokujō then heard gossip to the effect that it was either her own living spirit or that of her late father. She gave the rumors careful consideration. Even though she had never wished ill fortune to befall others, she had often lamented her own bad luck, and she was aware that the living spirit of a person who is preoccupied with personal desires and attachments might wander from the body. She had lived for so many years convinced that she had suffered as much grief and anxiety as it was possible for one person to suffer, and now it was as if her soul had been torn asunder. That day when the foolish incident with the carriages occurred, she had been treated disdainfully, and that woman, Genji's wife, had in effect ignored her as though she were beneath contempt. After the procession to the Purification Ritual was over, her heart and mind lost their moorings and drifted, all on account of that one incident, and she found it truly difficult to calm her nerves.

Lately, whenever she dozed off, she began having a recurring dream. She would find herself in the beautifully appointed, luxurious quarters of some woman—Genji's wife, she assumed—and would then watch in horror as her living spirit, so completely different from her waking self, would move around the woman, pulling and tugging at her, and then, driven by menacingly obsessive emotions, violently striking and shaking her. Because of this recurring dream, the lady had many moments when she believed she was losing her grip on reality.

3. Anonymous poem from an earlier waka anthology, the Kokin waka rokujō.

Ah, how horrible this is! What they say is true after all. A person's living spirit really can leave the body and wander about.<sup>4</sup> And even if it isn't true in my case, people at the court prefer to speak ill of others, and this situation will provide fodder to those who relish spreading malicious gossip.

Fearing that she would be notorious, the lady made a resolution to herself: They say it's common for people to leave behind their obsessive attachments and resentments when they die. I've always considered such a thing deeply sinful and ominous, even when it has happened to people with whom I have no connections. But now there are rumors that it's my living spirit that's acting in such a grotesque, unearthly way. It must be retribution for the sins of a former life. I must never give another thought to that cruel man.

She resolved over and over to put him out of her mind, but, try as she might, her resolutions were just another way to think about him.

As part of a series of purification rites in preparation for her departure for Ise, the daughter of the lady at Rokujō was to have moved during the previous year into a detached residence at the palace called the Shosai-in, which served as the pavilion of the First Lustration. However, there had been a number of complications, and so it was decided that she would not move into the pavilion until the autumn. Thereafter, in the ninth month, the Ise Priestess would move again, undergoing the Second Lustration at a temporary shrine built for this purpose on the plains of Sagano, famous for its lovely autumn vistas. The attendants in the residence at Rokujō thus had to make preparations for two purification rites, one right after the other. Their mistress, alas, was distracted and depressed and lying prone in her suffering, unable to rouse herself. This was no trivial matter for the ladies-in-waiting to the Priestess, since her mother's illness could be defiling, and so they commissioned prayers and rites. In truth, the lady didn't really seem all that sick, and as the days and months passed no one was sure exactly what was wrong or how serious it was. Genji was constantly inquiring after the lady's health, but because his wife—who was far more important to him—was suffering so much, he was burdened with seemingly endless concerns.

Because they assumed it was not yet time for Genji's wife to give birth, everyone at the Sanjō residence was caught off guard when she went into labor and appeared to be on the verge of delivering the child. More and more malignant spirits were drawn to her as the moment of the birth neared, and the number and intensity of the prayers and rites meant to assure a safe childbirth increased. Still, that one stubborn, obsessive spirit remained, more intransigent than ever. Even the most venerable of the priests found this spirit abnormal, and they were unable to exorcise it. As they tried to make the spirit show itself, their prayers finally forced it to speak to them through Genji's wife.

The spirit, in a weeping voice wracked with pain, pleaded with the priests, "Please stop for a moment. I have something I must say to Lord Genji."

4. Kokinshū 977 (Ōshikōchi Mitsune): "It must have wandered off, abandoning my body . . . this heart of mine that goes its own way, doing things I do not intend."

The attendants at once whispered among themselves, "Just as we thought; there's some reason for this after all."

Genji was shown in to where his wife was lying behind her curtains. Because she seemed to be near death, her parents withdrew a short distance away in case their daughter had some last words for her husband. The priests ceased their prayers and lowered their voices as they chanted the Kannon chapter of the Lotus Sutra. Their murmuring created an atmosphere at once uncanny and sublime. Genji lifted the curtains and looked in on his wife. There was something alluring about her as she lay there, her belly large and distended. Even someone with whom she had no connection at all would have been distracted gazing at her, so it was natural for Genji to feel overwhelmed with regret and sorrow. Her long, luxuriant black hair, which had been pulled back and tied up, stood out in vivid contrast to the white of her maternity robes. She was always so prim and proper that Genji had never found her special elegance all that attractive. Now, for the first time, as she lay there in her vulnerable, helpless condition, she struck him as not just precious but voluptuous. He took her hand.

"How terrible this is. Must you cause me to grieve so?"

He began to cry and could speak no further. She weakly raised her head and gazed at him with that expression that had hitherto always made him feel uncertain and inadequate in her presence. Tears filled her eyes, and when he gazed back at her—a woman who now seemed so accessible to him—how could he not be deeply touched?

Because she was crying so intensely, Genji assumed she was thinking of her poor, anxious parents and, on seeing him here like this, regretting that they would soon part.

"You mustn't brood so much about everything," Genji comforted her. "You don't feel well now, but you'll get better. And even if death should separate us, remember that husbands and wives are destined to meet in the next world. You have a deep bond with your father and mother, and no matter how many times you are reborn, that bond is never-ending. I am sure there will be a time when you will see them again."

"No, no, that's not why I'm crying. I'm crying because the exorcists' prayers hurt me so. I asked for you to come here so that I might have a moment of relief from them. I never imagined that I would come here in this form, but now I know the truth. The spirit of a person lost in obsessive longing will actually wander from the body." The voice that came from his wife's lips had a gentle, seductive familiarity. "Just as they did in ancient times . . ."

*Bind the hems of my robes
To keep my grieving soul
From wandering the skies*

As he was listening to the voice, his wife's appearance changed and she no longer looked like herself. Genji was trying to comprehend this inexplicable, eerie phenomenon when he suddenly realized he was gazing on the countenance of the lady at Rokujō. He was horrified. He had dismissed out of hand the rumors claiming the spirit possessing his wife was the lady's, considering them nothing more than the idle gossip of vulgar, insensitive people. But he was witnessing the possession with his own eyes and understood now that such things did happen in this world. It was uncanny. How wretched, he thought. He then answered her, saying, "You sound like someone I know, but I'm not certain. Tell me who you are."

The spirit replied in a way that left no doubt it was she. To say that he was shocked would not do justice to the sense of horror he experienced. At the same time, the presence of the attendants made him feel awkward and embarrassed, since they might recognize that the spirit was the lady's.

When the voice grew a little more subdued, Genji's mother-in-law, thinking that her daughter was feeling more comfortable, brought in a hot medicinal infusion. The attendants raised his wife from behind and supported her in a squatting posture. She gave birth to a boy.

The joy everyone felt was boundless. In contrast, the malign spirits that had been forced into the mediums were raising a tremendous fuss, since they resented the safe delivery. There was still the afterbirth to worry about, but thanks to the numerous prayers and supplications to the Buddha, it was a normal birth. The abbot of the Enryakuji Temple on Mount Hiei and the other distinguished priests quickly withdrew, wiping the sweat from their proud, satisfied faces. All the women in the household were finally able to relax a little after so many days of worry and devoted service. They were sure that the worst was over; and even though new prayers and rites for the mother were ordered, for the moment the baby became the center of attention. Everyone let their guard down as they were absorbed in helping out with the remarkable child. The Retired Emperor, princes of the blood, and the highest-ranking officials all attended, without fail, the traditional banquets held on the third, fifth, seventh, and ninth nights following the birth. In joyous celebration, they brought with them exquisite and remarkable gifts of food and clothing, and because the child was a boy, the celebrations were all the more lively and auspicious.

When the lady at Rokujō learned about all of this, she grew agitated. She had heard that Genji's wife had been in a precarious state, but now, apparently, everything was fine, and she felt both jealous and disappointed. She continued to feel weird, as though she were not herself, and her robes reeked of the smell of the poppy seeds that exorcists burn to drive out a lingering spirit. Strangely, the smell would not dissipate, but continued to permeate her body no matter how often she tried washing her hair and changing her robes. She was disgusted with herself and worried what others might say or think. She couldn't very well discuss this with anyone, so she was forced to suffer in isolation, which only made her emotional turmoil worse. Genji was feeling somewhat calmer, but whenever he recalled the unpleasant moment when the lady's spirit had addressed him unbidden in that weird and shocking manner, he was reminded of the pain she was experiencing because he had not called on her in such a long time. He vacillated, thinking that perhaps he should visit her in person. But then every time he considered the idea of a visit, he couldn't help worrying that he might be appalled, wondering how she could have fallen into such a state. After considering all the options, he decided it would be best for her if he just sent a message.

Everyone was worried about the prognosis for Genji's wife, who had suffered so grievously, and kept a vigilant watch over her. Naturally, Genji stopped going out on his nightly amorous excursions, even though his wife was still quite sick and unable to see her husband in the customary manner. The baby boy was exceptionally handsome, and because there were worries that his looks might attract the resentful attention of malignant spirits, every effort was made from the moment of his birth to protect him and bring him up with the greatest care. Genji's father-in-law was tremendously pleased, since things had worked out as he had hoped. Though he continued to show concern over his daughter, who had not yet fully recovered, he assumed that her condition was simply the aftereffect of having been so ill and that there was no reason to be unduly alarmed.

On seeing the beauty of the eyes and features of the baby, who bore a striking resemblance to Fujitsubo's child, Genji thought lovingly of his other, unacknowledged son, the new Crown Prince, and he was seized with an unbearable desire to go to the palace to visit him.

"I've not been to the palace for some time, and that concerns me. Since my confinement ends today, I had better go there." He then added, with some resentment, "I wonder if I might speak to my wife directly, without a curtain between us? Why do we always have to be so formal with one another, especially now?"

"As you wish, my lord," one of the women responded. "Your relationship with my lady need not be so formal and distant. Though she is terribly weakened by her ordeal, there is no need to separate the two of you with screens or curtains."

The attendants brought in a cushion for him and placed it close to where his wife was lying. He went in, sat down, and began speaking to her. She answered from time to time, but she still seemed very weak. He remembered the state she had been in at that moment when he had been certain she was about to die. He now felt as if it had all been a dream. He spoke of the period when she had been in mortal danger, and it made his heart ache to think that she had been on the point of death, and to recall how she had stopped breathing, but then recovered and spoke to him so urgently.

"There is so much I want to tell you, but they say you are too weak and not up to it, so I'll let it go for now," he said. He reminded her to drink her medicine and showed her consideration in other ways as well. Her attendants were deeply impressed by his ministrations, amazed that he had learned such things.

Her appearance as she lay there was heartbreakingly sweet, so weak and pale that he could hardly tell if she were dead or alive. Her abundant hair was properly done up, and the strands that were lying across the pillow were incomparably elegant. He gazed possessively at her, feeling strange that in all their time together he should ever have found her deficient in any way.

"I must go visit my father, but I shall return quickly," Genji told her. "How happy it would make me if I could always gaze on you as I'm doing now. But your mother is constantly nearby, so out of deference to her I have refrained from seeing you directly, lest I be considered rash. You must do all you can to get well, then move back to your own chambers. One reason you are not improving may be that you have become too childishly dependent on others."

With these words he took his leave, put on splendid robes and went out. In the past she rarely saw him off, but this time she lay there watching him in rapt attention.

The Autumn Ceremonial for Court Promotions was scheduled for that evening, and because the Minister of the Left had to preside over the event, he too left his daughter at his Sanjō residence and headed for the palace. Each of his sons was hoping to receive a promotion, and since they didn't want to be separated from their father on this particular day, they all left with him.

As a result, there were very few people at the Minister's residence that evening, and while the villa was deserted a malignant spirit suddenly assaulted Genji's wife. The choking sensation she experienced made breathing difficult, and she was in great distress. She stopped breathing before there was time to inform those who had gone to the ceremony.

On hearing the news, everyone was stunned, and they left the palace not knowing where their feet were taking them. Though it was the evening of the Autumn Ceremonial, in the face of such a tragedy it would not have been appropriate to continue the event. The crisis had arisen in the middle of the night, and so they were unable to call for the abbot at Mount Hiei, or even for a distinguished priest. They had all relaxed and let their guard down, assuming that the worst was over, and because her death was so unexpected, the attendants at the Minister's residence were in a panic—confused, stumbling about, bumping into things. Messengers bearing condolences from various noble houses crowded into the residence at Sanjō, but there was no one to take their messages, and the whole house was shaking from the uproar. It was frightening to see how upset everyone was.

Because so many malignant spirits had possessed her, they followed prescribed custom and left her body lying there. They didn't disturb her or move the position of her pillow, lest her soul fail to find its way back should it try to return. They kept watch over her for two or three days, but when her appearance began to change, they realized they had reached the end, that she was indeed gone, and were overwhelmed by grief.

With his wife's tragic death coming on the heels of his shocking encounter with the living spirit of the lady at Rokujō, Genji was preoccupied with thoughts of the tiresome nature of this world, and as a result he felt put off by the words of condolences he received from people—even from women with whom he had a special relationship. Genji's father-in-law, the Minister of the Left, was deeply honored to receive condolences directly from the Retired Emperor. It was an honor that brought a moment of relief to his unremitting sorrow, and it left him crying tears of both joy and grief. On the advice of others, the Minister spared no expense or effort in commissioning mystery rites intended to revive his daughter, and though it was evident for all to see that her body was decaying away, in his distracted state he vainly persisted until there was nothing more to be done. When at last they took his daughter's body to be cremated on the plains of Toribeno, there were many heart-rending moments along the way.

* * *

At the Nijō villa his men and women were preparing for his arrival, cleaning and polishing. The senior attendants all appeared before him, and they vied to outdo one another in the splendor of their clothing and makeup. Genji couldn't help but be touched by the lively scene before him, which contrasted so starkly with the lonely, melancholy scene he had left behind at the Sanjō residence. He changed out of his mourning robes and went over to Murasaki's quarters in the west hall. The clothing and furnishings there had been changed with the advent of winter, and the rooms had a bright, fresh look to them. The outfits of the pretty women and girls there were pleasing to his eyes, and Murasa-ki's nurse, Shōnagon, had made sure that all the preparations had been carried out to his complete satisfaction. Indeed, everything looked wonderful to him.

Murasaki was sweetly done up . . . truly lovely.

"It's been a long time," Genji began. "You've become quite the young lady."

He raised the lower half of the curtains to peek in on her, and when he did so she shyly turned away from him. Even so, he could see that her beauty was perfection itself. Glimpsing her profile in the lamplight, he could tell from her eyes and face that she looked exactly like Fujitsubo, the woman who had so possessed his heart, and he was overjoyed. He moved closer to her and spoke of all the things that had happened, and of how anxious he had been, wondering how she had fared during his period of mourning.

"I want to talk to you at leisure, tell you stories of all that took place while I was away. For the time being, however, I'll sleep in the east hall. Having just come out of mourning, it might be bad luck for me to stay here just now. But soon we will have all the time in the world to be together . . . so much so that you may come to regard me as a nuisance."

Shōnagon, who was listening in on them, was delighted by his words, but then she immediately began having anxious thoughts about the precarious position of her young charge. After all, Genji discreetly visited many highborn ladies, and it was also possible that he would be drawn to some new lady who might appear on the scene and take the place of his late wife. Shōnagon's suspicious nature was an unattractive trait, but her doubts were understandable, since her primary responsibility was to look after Murasaki.

Genji returned to his own chambers. One of his female attendants, Chūjō no kimi, massaged his legs, and he was finally able to relax and fall asleep. The next morning he sent a letter to his little son at Sanjō. The melancholy reply, obviously written for him by the boy's grandmother, filled him with inexhaustible grief.

With little to occupy him, Genji would lose himself in reveries of longing. Yet because he was reluctant to wander about on some random nocturnal adventure, he could not rouse himself to go out. His little Murasaki was now grown up and ideal in all respects. She looked spectacular, and he felt that now was the appropriate time to consummate their relationship. From time to time he would casually drop hints about their marriage, but she seemed to have no idea what he was talking about.

They whiled away the hours, relieving their tedium by playing Go or word games like hentsugi, writing down radicals or parts of a Chinese character and trying to guess which one it was. Murasaki had a clever and engaging personality, and she would demonstrate endearing talents in even the most trivial of pastimes. For several years he had driven all thoughts of taking her as a wife out of his mind, dismissing her talents as nothing more than the accomplishments of a precocious child. Now he could no longer control his passion—though he did feel pangs of guilt, since he was painfully aware of how innocent she was.

Her attendants assumed he would consummate their relationship at some point, but because he had always slept with her, there was simply no way for them to know when that moment would come. One morning Genji rose early, but Murasaki refused to get up. Her behavior worried her attendants.

"What's wrong?" they whispered. "She seems unusually out of sorts today."

Right before Genji returned to his own quarters, he placed just inside her curtains a box filled with inkstones, brushes, and paper, which she was to use for the customary morning-after letter.<sup>5</sup> When there was no one else around, Murasaki finally lifted her head and found his betrothal note folded in a love knot at her pillow. Still in a daze, she opened the letter.

*How strange that we have stayed apart so long Though we slept together night after night
With only the robes we wore between us*

The poem was written in a playful, spontaneous manner, as if he had allowed his emotions to carry him along. It had never crossed her mind that he might be the kind of man who harbored such thoughts about her, and she burned with shame when she recalled their sordid first night: How could I have been so naive? How could I have ever trusted a man with such base intentions?

Genji returned to her quarters at midday, peeking in through her curtains.

“Something seems to be bothering you . . . are you not well? It would be quite tedious for me if we weren’t able to play Go today.”

Murasaki was still lying face down. She pulled the bedding up over her face so that she would not have to look at him. When her attendants withdrew, Genji went over to her.

“Why are you acting so despondent? Are you displeased with me? I never imagined that you could be so cold. Your women must think this is all very queer.”

He tugged her bedding away. She was bathed in perspiration, and tears had soaked the hair framing her forehead.

“Now this won’t do at all!” Genji was put out. “Tears on the first day of your marriage? It’s ominous . . . very inauspicious.” He tried all sorts of things to cheer her up, but she thought him utterly horrid and refused to speak.

“All right, then, have it your way,” he told her spitefully. “I won’t come here any more if you insist on putting me to shame!”

He opened the box with the writing implements and checked inside. There was no reply note. She’s still a child after all, he thought ruefully. He now felt sorry for her and decided to stay with her inside the curtains for the rest of the day. He passed the whole time trying to comfort her, but this proved difficult. Her refusal to warm up to him, however, merely made her look all the more precious to him.

It was the First Day of the Boar in the tenth month, when the moon rose in the north-northwest. The custom was to serve cakes made of pounded rice on this day, so as evening wore on and they reached the Hour of the Boar a little after 9:00 p.m., Genji had rice cakes shaped to look like baby pigs brought in to him and Murasaki. The boar was a symbol of fertility, but the First Day of the Boar was not an auspicious time for marriage. Moreover, Genji was still in mourning, and so he made sure their celebration was subdued, serving the rice cakes in Murasaki’s quarters only. Observing the various colors of the rice cakes, which were flavored with beans, or chestnuts, or poppy, among other things, and nestled in cypress boxes, Genji remembered that he had to have white rice cakes prepared for tomorrow evening, the Third Night of their marriage. He stepped out and summoned Koremitsu.

5. After a couple’s first night together the man was supposed to leave the woman a poem, to which she should respond [editor’s note].

"Have rice cakes brought here tomorrow," he ordered, "though not as many as today. This was not a particularly auspicious day for such things."

Seeing Genji's wry smile, Koremitsu caught on immediately. He did not press his lord on the matter, but simply replied with a perfectly serious expression on his face.

"Of course, my lord. It's most reasonable of you to choose an auspicious day to serve rice cakes." He then added, rather drolly, "Let's see . . . tomorrow is the Day of the Rat. Shall I tell them you're having rice cakes in the shape of baby mice to celebrate the event? And just how many will you need?"

"I suppose a third as many as we had today . . . that should be enough," Genji answered. And with that Koremitsu, who knew just what to do, withdrew. He's certainly an experienced hand, thought Genji. Koremitsu spoke of this to no one else, and had the rice cakes prepared at his own residence, without telling anyone why he needed them. He was so discreet, in fact, it was almost as if he had made them himself.

Genji was finding it so difficult to comfort Murasaki that he was at a loss. At the same time he was delighted when it occurred to him that, for the first time in her life, she must have felt like a stolen bride. With that realization came another.

She has been precious to me for many years, but my feelings for her during all that time were nothing compared to what I feel for her now. The heart is a peculiar thing. Now I find it impossible to be apart from her, even for a single night.

Koremitsu stealthily brought a box filled with the rice cakes Genji had ordered late the previous night. Deeply considerate and sensitive to the situation, Koremitsu thought it might be embarrassing for Murasaki if he asked her nurse, Shōnagon, to take the box into her chambers. So instead he summoned Shōnagon's daughter, Ben.

"Take this to your young mistress, and don't let anyone see you." He handed her an incense jar, inside of which he had hidden the box of rice cakes. "Now listen to me. This is a gift to celebrate an auspicious event, so you must set it beside her pillow. Be very careful. You must carry out my instructions to the letter." Ben thought that this request was suspicious, but she took the jar anyway.

"I have never," she insisted, "been unfaithful in serving my lady."

He cut her short.

"Don't use the word 'unfaithful.' The very uttering of it on an occasion like this is bad luck."

Ben considered the whole affair very odd, but she was young and really had no idea what Koremitsu was talking about. She placed the jar inside her lady's curtains next to her pillow. Genji, as he always did, explained the significance of the rice cakes to Murasaki.

Murasaki's attendants had known nothing about this. It wasn't until the next morning, when Genji had the box of rice cakes taken away, that they finally realized their lord had formally taken their young mistress as his wife. When could all of the dishes have been brought in? The stands on which the plates rested looked fabulous, their legs intricately carved in the shape of flowers. Various kinds of rice cakes had been specially prepared, and everything used for the Third Night celebration—the silver plates, silver chopsticks, silver chopstick rests—had been exquisitely arranged. Shōnagon wondered, Has he actually gone so far as to recognize her as his wife? And when she saw it was true, she was profoundly grateful and wept at this proof of Genji's honorable intentions.

The other women were disappointed that they had not been let in on the secret, and they grumbled among themselves. "Of course it's wonderful that things have turned out like this, but why did our lord have to keep it secret? And that Koremitsu . . . whatever could he have been thinking?"

Following his marriage to Murasaki, Genji would feel so anxious about her whenever he went to the palace or called on the Retired Emperor, even for a short visit, that a vision of her would come to him and he would see her face. He found his own attraction to her mysterious. He received resentful letters from his other women enticing him to visit, and their notes did make him feel bad for them. But the very thought that such visits would be hard on his new bride troubled him. He recalled a line from an old Man'yōshū poem: "How can I endure a single night apart from you?"<sup>6</sup> He simply could not bring himself to go out on his nocturnal forays, but instead pretended he wasn't feeling well and was indisposed. He passed the time sending replies to his ladies along the lines of "I've been preoccupied of late with thoughts of the sad evanescence of this world. Once this mood of mine has passed, we shall, I assure you, meet again."

Oborozukiyo, the lady Genji associated with that evening of the misty moon, could not get him out of her mind. Her older sister, the Kokiden Consort, who was now the Imperial Mother, was extremely displeased to learn about this infatuation, and was further annoyed when her own father, the Minister of the Right, dismissed her concerns.

"Why should I be bothered about this?" he said. "If she realizes her heart's desire and becomes one of Genji's wives, I won't complain. After all, the woman who was most significant to him has apparently died."

The Kokiden Consort replied, "And what's wrong with her entering service in the women's quarters?" She seemed to have her heart firmly set on sending her younger sister to court to serve her son, Emperor Suzaku.

For his part, Genji did not consider Oborozukiyo just another woman, and he thought it a shame that she should be sent into service at the palace. At the present moment, however, he was not inclined to divide his attention among his women. He wanted to focus on Murasaki alone.

I'd better let it be, he thought. Murasaki is good enough. Life is brief, and so I should just settle down with her. I must never again stir resentment in a woman.

This train of thought brought back the incident with the lady at Rokujō. He had learned a fearful lesson. He was sorry for her, but now he could never feel comfortable recognizing her formally as a wife. If she could be satisfied with continuing to meet as we have over the years, if she could go on being my companion, a woman who could talk with me on those occasions when it's natural and proper to do so, if we could just be a comfort to one another . . .

As he mulled over their relationship, he realized that no matter how difficult she might be, she was someone he could not easily abandon.

* * *

6. Poem from Man'yōshū: "Now that we are betrothed, sharing a pillow of new grasses, how can I endure a single night apart from you?"

From Chapter X

Sakaki

A BRANCH OF SACRED EVERGREEN

The day of departure for the new High Priestess of Ise was drawing near, and her mother's heart was filled with melancholy and loneliness. Following the death of Genji's wife, whose special status the lady at Rokujō had found such an affront to her dignity, rumors spread around the court to the effect that now, at last, Genji would surely make her his primary wife. Even her own ladies-in-waiting were atwitter with anticipation at the possibility. Contrary to expectations, however, Genji's visits to the lady abruptly ceased altogether, and upon experiencing his shockingly cold behavior, the lady realized that something must have happened to truly upset him. She therefore resolved to abandon her lingering attachments and strengthened her resolve to accompany her daughter to Ise.

There was no precedent for a parent to accompany the High Priestess to Ise, but the lady, who wanted to distance herself from her troubled relationship with Genji, explained that she couldn't be separated from her daughter because the girl was simply too young to be on her own outside the capital. Hearing that the lady had decided to leave, Genji felt a twinge of remorse and exchanged with her a series of elegantly touching letters. The lady, however, was convinced that it was now too late for them and that they should not meet face to face. Genji would almost certainly consider her refusal hateful, but she was firmly resolved, heart and mind, for she knew it was inappropriate to do anything that would further disturb her troubled spirit and cause her more pain and suffering.

She would return occasionally to her villa on Rokujō, but she did so infrequently and in such secrecy that Genji was never able to learn when she was in residence there. Since she had moved out to the compound of the temporary shrine on the plains of Sagano—a place difficult for him to visit no matter how much he longed to go—they remained apart as days and months passed, even though he continued to be deeply concerned about her. On top of everything else, Genji's father was from time to time troubled by various ailments, which was unusual, and these additional worries burdened his heart and gave him no rest. Still, Genji was shamed by the prospect that the lady might think him cold and that people who heard about their relationship might consider him heartless, and so in spite of his travails he decided to go to the temporary shrine in Sagano. It was already the seventh day of the ninth month, and he assumed that their departure for Ise was imminent—perhaps in the next day or two. The lady was feeling restless, pressured by the numerous preparations she had to make for the departure. Now, on top of everything else, Genji was sending note after note begging to meet, if only for a moment. He told her that he would even stand outside her blinds. She struggled, unsure what to do, until she finally concluded that it would be excessively unfriendly not to meet him. She agreed to have him visit her secretly, but with a screen between them.

Once he had set out to cross the broad plains of Sagano, he was moved to sorrowful compassion. The autumn flowers were withering, and the lonely sound of the wind in the pine trees harmonized with the rasping cries of insects coming from the sere thickets of satin-tail grass. Faint notes of music, gentle and tender, were wafting faintly on the wind, though he could not quite make out the song or the kind of koto being played.

An escort of ten or so of Genji's most trusted guards accompanied him. In an effort to avoid attracting attention, his men had eschewed wearing formal robes. Genji, on the contrary, had not bothered to disguise himself, but had taken special care in preparing his attire. Because he looked so resplendent, he made the sophisticated, urbane young men traveling with him appreciate the profound beauty of the setting.

Why did I wait until now to come here? Genji reflected, bitterly regretting the time that had been lost.

A scattering of temporary dwellings roofed with wood-plank shingles stood inside a low, fragile, rustic-looking enclosure of brushwood. The torii<sup>7</sup> gate was made of logs that had not been stripped of their bark, creating an atmosphere of solemnity that, given the purpose of his visit, made him hesitate to enter such sacred ground. Here and there several Shinto clerics were coughing or clearing their throats in order to signal that Genji had arrived, and another group of priests stood talking amongst themselves. It was a different world altogether, one that struck Genji as strange and unfamiliar. The building where the ceremonial fire was kept constantly blazing was glowing faintly, and, since there were so few people about, stillness had settled over the compound. Genji felt a stab of keen sorrow when it occurred to him just how many days and months she had spent in isolation here, lost in her obsessive longings.

He withdrew, moving out of sight to what he assumed was the appropriate building on the north side of the main hall, and sent in a message to the lady announcing his arrival. He could hear intriguing sounds of people bustling about, but received only a reply from an intermediary. It irritated Genji that his lady showed no inclination to meet face to face, and so with great sincerity he spoke to her.

"If you could just appreciate how difficult and inappropriate it is for someone of my position to be coming here in secret like this, then you would not keep yourself apart from me, as if you had drawn a sacred straw rope between us. I wish to clear away the dark feelings and resentments that cloud my heart."

At that point her attendants interceded for him.

"Truly it would be a pity to leave him standing outside, looking so forlorn."

What should I do? the lady fretted. I risk being shamed if I go out to meet him now, especially with my women watching . . . and even he might think it inappropriate for someone of my age.

But as reluctant as she was to see him, she didn't want to seem cold or willfully aloof. In the end, the impression she made on his heart when she went out and sat behind her blind with much sighing and hesitation was one of magnificent refinement.

"May I be permitted to come up onto the veranda?" he asked, and stepped up.

His handsome figure and graceful movements gave off an incomparable radiance in the evening moonlight, which shone clearly into the space. They had reached the point in their relationship where he felt embarrassed to try to give some plausible excuse for all the months he had ignored her, so instead he presented her with a small branch of sakaki, the sacred evergreen, which he had broken off on his way here. “Having made a signpost of my feelings, which, like the color of this sacred branch will never fade, I have entered this holy compound. And yet, how unfeeling you remain.”

7. Gateway to a Shinto shrine [editor's note].

She responded with a poem:

*With no cedar trees to serve as signpost
To guide you to this sacred enclosure
Have you in error brought sakaki here<sup>8</sup>*

Genji replied as follows:

*Thinking you might be where the shrine maiden dwells
In longing I plucked this branch along the way
Drawn by the fragrance of sacred evergreens*

He felt constrained by the atmosphere of their surroundings, but he entered just inside her blind and leaned against one of the tie beams around the entrance.

During all those years when Genji ought to have followed the dictates of his heart and bestowed visits on her—a period during which the lady also thought longingly of him—his complacency, born of self-conceit, prevented him from feeling any sense of guilt or urgency about their relationship. Then, after he had been convinced in his heart that she was frighteningly flawed, his passion for her cooled to the point that now they were estranged. Yet as memories of their affair came back to him on the occasion of this extraordinary meeting, his heart was roiled by powerful emotions of sorrow and pity. Thinking of all that had happened and of all that was to come, he wept, brokenhearted. Although the lady seemed to be trying to steel herself, since she did not want her true feelings to show, she was unable to hold her emotions in check, and the sight of her struggling became more and more difficult for him to bear. As she looked at him, his appearance seemed to be telling her to reconsider her plans to leave the capital for Ise. Gazing into the sublime beauty of the sky—was it the early setting of the moon that made it seem so lovely?—his complaints spilled forth as he pleaded with her not to spurn his love. His pleas should have been enough to make the numerous hurts and resentments that had accumulated in her heart vanish. Indeed, even though she had finally resolved to make a clean break with him, now that they were meeting again her resolve began to crumble, and she found herself wavering.

Young noblemen accompanied one another on visits to this temporary shrine, and they cut remarkably splendid figures as they wandered about the garden there—a place they found difficult to leave. The scene before Genji and the lady was thus perfect, and there is simply no way to convey in writing all the words and feelings that these two, who had tasted sorrow to the full, shared with each other.

The sky was gradually growing light—its appearance seemed to have been made especially for them. Genji, who was finding it difficult to depart, took her hand and hesitated, overwhelmed by feelings of intimacy.

8. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū: “If you truly long for me, come to the foot of Mount Miwa, to my hut . . . to the gate where the sacred cedars stand.”

*Partings at the break of dawn are always Soaked by the dew . . . but never have I known
So sorrowful an autumn sky as this*

A chill wind was blowing, and the raspy, mournful voices of bell crickets seemed to capture the mood of the moment. No one—not even a person untroubled by sad thoughts—could have passed by this scene without having been deeply affected. That being the case, it is hardly surprising, then, that the two of them, who were so distraught, found it hard to find the words for their poems of parting. Finally, she was able to reply:

*Parting in autumn is sorrow enough . . .
Let me not hear as well the mournful cries
Of bell crickets in fields of withered grass*

Though he was filled with frustrations and regrets, it was no use obsessing over them; and so, wishing to avoid the gaze of others, Genji departed. His path was drenched in dew and tears.

The lady, unable to maintain a stoic bearing, was lost in melancholy reverie, staring sadly at the place where Genji had been just moments earlier. His visage, which had been faintly visible in the moonlight, and the lingering fragrance of his perfumed robes, made a deep impression on the young women in attendance, and their praise for him perhaps went beyond the bounds of what was proper.

“Is any journey worth abandoning a man like this?” they tearfully whispered among themselves, unaware of all that had taken place between Genji and their mistress.

His letter the next morning provided an unusually detailed account of his feelings, and though she found it difficult to resist his blandishments, she could not reverse herself and be indecisive once again. Thus, his letter came to naught. Genji was a man capable of unparalleled eloquence in expressing romantic emotions—even for affairs that didn’t mean all that much to him—and so for a relationship that he could never have considered ordinary, it must have been all the more painful to have her reject him this way. He had magnificent robes and furnishings and goods of all sorts prepared and sent to her and her attendants for their journey, but she felt neither joy nor resentment at his show of concern. She was leaving behind a reputation as a frivolous and cruel woman, and as the day of departure drew near, she was now constantly regretting her situation, as if she were aware for the first time of the consequences of her actions. Her daughter, the High Priestess, had a youthful outlook on things, and she was happy that the departure date, which had been unsettled, was now firmly fixed. Naturally, gossip about the mother’s unprecedented decision to accompany her daughter swirled about the court—some of it sympathetic, some sharply critical because of her relationship with Genji.

People whose status is such that they are never subjected to the barbed comments of others seem to have an easier time in life. Unfortunately, for those of high status who stand out in society, there are also many constraints on their behavior.

On the sixteenth day the Rite of Purification for the Ise Priestess was conducted at the Katsura River to the west of the capital. The ceremony was grander than most, in part because it was customary to choose men of high status and splendid reputations—a Consultant, for example, or a Middle Counselor—to serve as a member of her imperial escort. All of this of course reflected the interest that the Retired Emperor was taking in the matter.

Just as they were departing, a letter arrived from Genji revealing all the emotions he had not yet been able to fully express. He had addressed it “To the High Priestess, with Humble Reverence” and bound it with a ritual cord made of paper mulberry bark. “They say,” he had written, “that the god of thunder himself has never sundered a relationship between lovers.”<sup>9</sup>

*O Gods of the land of the Eight Isles
If you feel pity, then judge kindly
Two who taste in full parting's sorrow*

“Thinking about you, I cannot help but feel depressed and dissatisfied.”

Although she was extremely busy with her preparations, the High Priestess replied. Her Head of Household wrote out the response:

*Were the gods of our land to judge you Would they not first and foremost condemn
The thoughtlessness of your heart and words*

Genji was curious about the Ceremony of Parting and wanted to go to the palace, but he decided against it because he thought it would look pathetic for a man to be seeing off a lover who had rejected him. So, with nothing to occupy him, he was lost in his own thoughts. The High Priestess's reply poem was so mature that he had to smile as he read it. She must be alluring beyond her years, he thought, aroused to abnormal fantasies about her not as a Priestess but as a woman. His disposition always drew him toward relationships that were unusual and problematic.

How unfortunate that I wasn't able to see her when she was a child, he mused, when I might have been able to get a good look at her. Oh well, nothing in this world is fixed forever, and so I should be able to meet her at some point.

On the day of the Ceremony of Parting a large number of carriages lined up to view the procession, since it featured the presence of a lady and a daughter of exceptional beauty and breeding. At the Hour of the Monkey, around four o'clock in the afternoon, the procession arrived at the palace. The lady had last come here borne in a palanquin when she was to have become Empress. Her father had always aimed for her to reach the pinnacle of court society, but then her circumstances, which he had nurtured so carefully, suddenly changed. Upon seeing the palace now, after the collapse of her father's dreams, she was reminded of the mutability of all things in this world—a thought that moved her profoundly. She had come as the bride of the Crown Prince when she was sixteen and left the palace at twenty when he died. Now she was thirty, and upon seeing the ninefold palace again she composed a poem to herself:

*On this day, as much as I try to suppress Memories of all that happened long ago
Unbearable sorrow lingers in my heart*

9. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū: “Would even the thunder-spirit who stomps and rages in the high plains of the heavens ever try to rend our love?”

The Ise Priestess had turned fourteen. She was exquisite, and her figure, properly attired for this occasion, was so stunningly beautiful that it raised concerns that she might draw the attention of gods or demons. The Emperor Suzaku was smitten by her, and when he placed the Comb of Parting in her hair, he could not hold back his emotions, and tears welled up in his eyes.

The carriages of the ladies accompanying the High Priestess to Ise were lined up along the compound of buildings housing the Eight Ministries under the Council of State. As they awaited departure the variegated hues of the sleeves of those ladies seated inside were spilling out from under the blinds, giving off a fresh appearance and vivacious charm. Many lords were feeling wistful regret, each of them seeing this moment as his own personal farewell to his parting lover.

The party set off after dark, and when they turned at Nijō Avenue onto the boulevard of Tōin, they passed by Genji's villa. Feeling great pity, Genji attached a poem to a branch of sakaki and sent it to the lady.

*When you depart today will your sleeves be dampened
By the Eighty Rapids at Suzuka River . . .
Or by tears of regret for leaving me behind*

It was already quite dark when his letter arrived, and the lady was feeling rushed and flustered. Her reply, which she sent from the barrier gate at Ōsaka, did not reach him until the following day.

*I cannot tell if my sleeves were dampened
By the rapids at Suzuka River . . .
Do your thoughts escort me to far Ise*

Though terse and hastily written, her calligraphy was interestingly elegant. Even so, he felt she should have written something that showed a little more depth of feeling for him. A thick fog had settled over everything, and as he stared out aching at the misty early dawn, he whispered a poem to himself:

*I gaze in longing toward the path you travel
Hoping from afar that this year the autumn fog
Will not hide Mount Osaka, where lovers meet*

He did not go over to the west hall to see Murasaki, but kept to himself, sunk in lonely, distracted thoughts. Compared to him, however, the lady on the road to Ise must surely have been suffering an even more exquisite agony.

Genji's father was ill, and by the tenth month his condition had become serious. Everyone in court society was concerned and grieving. Emperor Suzaku was so troubled that he personally called on his father. Although weakened by illness, the Retired Emperor asked repeatedly after the Crown Prince. He then spoke about Genji.

"When I'm gone I want you to continue thinking of him as an adviser in all matters of state, both great and small, just as when I was alive. In my opinion, you should not hesitate at all to entrust the government to him just because he is young. As the Korean diviner predicted, he is a man destined to rule the court. For that reason I was afraid that conflict might arise, and so I took him out of the line of succession and made him a commoner, with the idea that he would be of service to the throne. Do not go against my wishes on this matter.”

Although there were numerous heartrending last requests, these are not the sort of things a woman should be relating, and I feel awkward having mentioned what little I have here. Emperor Suzaku was moved to sadness and gave repeated assurances that he would carry out his father’s final instructions. He was so glorious in appearance and mature in demeanor that the Retired Emperor looked on him with joy and a sense of trust. Because the audience with his father was formal and public, Suzaku felt constrained, and he soon returned to the palace, regretting that many things had been left unsaid.

The Crown Prince had wanted to accompany Suzaku on his visit, but because it would have been too much excitement for the Retired Emperor, his visit was changed to another day. The boy was graceful and mature-looking beyond his years, and his longing to see his father had been building all throughout the illness. He was, in his innocence of the true circumstances of his birth, overjoyed when he was finally allowed to visit, and the scene of them together was touching. When the Retired Emperor saw Fujitsubo weeping disconsolately, his heart was filled with conflicting emotions. He spoke to the Crown Prince about all the things he should expect as future sovereign, but the boy was at such a tender age that the Retired Emperor couldn’t help looking on him with a mix of concern and pity, and he repeatedly admonished Genji to be vigilant in attending to affairs of state and in looking after the interests of the Crown Prince. It was late at night when the boy left, and the tumultuous scene of his procession, which included virtually all of the upper ranking courtiers, was so grandly solemn that it was indistinguishable from that of Emperor Suzaku’s. The Retired Emperor was sorry to see the boy go and dissatisfied that they had not had enough time together.

The Kokiden Consort also wanted to pay a visit, but the presence of Fujitsubo made her hesitate . . . and while she was vacillating, trying to decide what to do, the Retired Emperor passed away peacefully and with dignity. Many at the court were caught off guard and panicked. Even though the Retired Emperor had abdicated, he had maintained control of political power so the court would continue to function as it had during his reign. Suzaku, however, was still young, and his maternal grandfather, the Minister of the Right, was shallow, impulsive, and spiteful. Senior ministers and high-ranking nobles all fretted over what would become of the court under his control.

Fujitsubo and Genji had cause to be more distraught and uneasy than anyone. Observing that Genji’s filial devotion in carrying out the subsequent memorial rites was much greater than that shown by the other princes, courtiers looked on him with pity and awe. Even in the unadorned robes of mourning, the extraordinary purity of his appearance stirred sympathy in onlookers. He had encountered misfortunes in consecutive years, and so he came to consider the world of the court vain and tedious. It occurred to him that the death of his father provided the perfect opportunity for him to withdraw from society and take religious vows, but because he was still bound by many relationships, he was not ready to do so just yet.

From Chapter XII

Suma

EXILE TO SUMA

* * *

Oborozukiyo<sup>1</sup> returned to court service in the seventh month. Suzaku had a strong lingering affection for her, and so he kept her near him as he had always done, acting as though he knew nothing of the imprecations directed at her by certain courtiers. He would on occasion reproach her for one reason or another while also offering tender vows of love. In both looks and bearing Suzaku possessed a youthful grace and elegance, and Oborozukiyo was certainly grateful for, and embarrassed by, his show of noblesse oblige. Yet her heart had room only for memories of Genji.

On one occasion, during a musical performance, Suzaku remarked, "It's at times like this that I miss Genji the most. I venture to say that there are many here who miss him even more than I. It seems as if the light has gone out of everything." He then added, "I have acted contrary to my father's wishes. I shall come to regret my sin." Tears welled up in his eyes, and at that moment Oborozukiyo could no longer restrain her own.

"I have learned from experience that the world is a tiresome place," he continued, "and no longer feel that I want to remain in it much longer. If I were no longer here, how would you feel about it? It makes me bitter to think that my death would not affect you nearly as much as the absence of one who still lives nearby. The poet who wrote the line 'while I am in this world'<sup>2</sup> did not express noble sentiments." His manner was so gentle, and his words suffused with such profound emotion, that tears began to stream down Oborozukiyo's cheeks.

"For whom do you weep?" Suzaku asked. "It makes me sad that you have yet to give me a child . . . it's as if something were missing in my life. I have considered adopting the Crown Prince as my father instructed me, but, given the enmity between my mother and the Fujitsubo Consort, it would cause too much trouble to do so."

Certain people were conducting affairs of state in a manner contrary to his wishes, but he was too young and weak-willed to resist, even though he was disappointed and bothered by many things, including Genji's exile, that had been carried out in his name.

At Suma the winds of autumn—the "season of anxious grief"<sup>3</sup>—were intensifying. Though his villa was some distance from the shore, each night the waves, which Middle Counselor Yukihira observed were stirred by winds blowing through the barrier pass, sounded as if they were breaking quite close. Genji had never experienced anything as affecting as the autumn in this place.

1. Genji's affair with her, described in pages not included here, forced him to leave the capital and go into exile to rustic Suma [editor's note].

2. Poem from an imperial waka collection, the Shūishū (Ōtomo no Momoyo): "What good would it do to die of longing? I want to be with my love for those days I am alive." The line ikeru

hi ("those days I am alive") is misquoted in the text as ikeru yo (literally, "the world I live in").

3. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū: "Looking upon the light of the moon filtering through the trees, I see that autumn, season of anxious grief, has arrived."

He had only a few attendants with him. Because they were all asleep, he was lying awake by himself, his head propped up on his pillow, listening to the winds howling from every direction. Feeling as though the waves were crashing near his residence, tears welled up instinctively—so many that it seemed his pillow might float away. He tried playing his seven-string koto a little, but the music just made him feel even more frightened and alone, and so he abruptly stopped and murmured the following poem:

*Does the wind blow from where my loved ones mourn
For I seem to hear in the sound of waves Voices crying in pain from loneliness*

Hearing his poem, his attendants were startled awake. Seeing how splendid Genji looked, they were overcome by emotion, and as they arose unsteadily they were quietly wiping their noses to disguise their tears.

Genji wondered, How must my attendants feel? For my sake alone they have come wandering with me to this sorry existence, having left behind their comfortable, familiar homes and parted with parents and siblings from whom even the briefest absence would be hard to bear.

Such musings made him miserable, but then he realized that it must make his attendants feel forlorn to see him so downhearted like this. And so, during the days that followed, he diverted them with playful banter, and in moments of idle leisure he would make scrolls by gluing together pieces of paper of various hues and practice writing poems. He also drew remarkable-looking sketches and paintings on rare Chinese silk of patterned weave and used them to decorate the front panels of folding screens. Before he came to Suma he had heard about the views of the sea and mountains here, and he had imagined from afar what they looked like. Now that they were right before his eyes, he depicted those rocky shores—their incomparable beauty truly surpassed anything he had imagined—in charcoal sketches of unrivaled skill. A member of his escort remarked with impatient frustration, “If only we could summon the great masters Chieda and Tsunenor<sup>4</sup> and have them color in your sketches . . .” Genji’s gentle, familiar behavior and splendid bearing helped his attendants forget the cares of the world. Four or five were in constant attendance, and they were overjoyed to be able to serve him in such close proximity.

One pleasant evening, when the garden flowers near the veranda were a riot of colors, Genji stepped out into a passageway that framed a view of the sea. As he stood there motionless for a few moments, he didn’t look like an earthly being, given the odd juxtaposition of his beauty and the setting, and so the divine splendor of his appearance was eerily unsettling. His loose purple trousers, cinched at the ankles, were lined with a pale green; his robe was a soft white silk twill. His dark blue cloak was loosely tied, giving him a casual air as he began reciting in hushed tones the opening lines of his ritual devotions: “I, a disciple of Sakyamuni Buddha . . .”

He slowly chanted a sutra in a voice so sonorous that it too seemed like nothing of this world. From boats in the offing came voices of fishermen singing as they rowed over the waves. Viewed from a distance, the vague outlines of the boats resembled little birds floating on the sea, creating a lonesome effect. Just then a line of migrating geese flew overhead, their cries like the creaking of the oars, and Genji gazed out at the scene in rapt silence, his hands, white and lambent in contrast to the dark beads of his rosary, moving almost imperceptibly to brush away the tears running down his cheeks. His magnificent appearance gave comfort to his retainers, all of whom were yearning for their loved ones back home. Genji composed a verse:

4. Tsunenor<sup>4</sup> flourished during the reign of Emperor Murakami (946–67). Not much is known about Chieda.

*Is it because these wild geese, the first of autumn
Were with the loved ones I miss in the capital
That their cries echo mournfully across the skies*

Yoshikiyo responded:

*Though not companions of mine from the past
These geese crying out still stir memories
One after another of my old life*

Koremitsu also responded:

*Am I to consider these geese as companions
On my exile when they willingly chose to leave Familiar homes for distant realms beyond the clouds*

The Lesser Captain of the Right Palace Guard—the young man whose loyalty cost him a promising career—composed yet another poem:

*Even wild geese who leave familiar homes
To migrate through distant skies find comfort
So long as they are with their companions*

“What would become of me if I were to lose sight of my companions?”

Although the Lesser Captain’s father, who had once been Vice Governor of Iyo, had recently been appointed Vice Governor of Hitachi, the young man had decided not to accompany him, but went into exile with Genji instead. The choice must have caused him great distress, but he put on a brave front and pretended that nothing bothered him.

The full moon rose vivid and bright, bringing back memories to Genji. “That’s right . . . tonight is the fifteenth.” Staring up at the face of the moon, he lovingly imagined the music that would be playing on a night like this at the palace, with all the ladies gazing out at the night sky. When he murmured a line from Bai Juyi—“Feelings for acquaintances of old, now two thousand leagues distant”<sup>5</sup>—his attendants could not restrain their tears. With indescribable yearning he recalled the poem Fujitsubo sent him complaining about how the “ninefold mists” kept her from the palace. As memories of this and other moments came to him, he wept aloud. He heard a voice saying, “The hour is late.” However, he could not bring himself to retire.

5. She is mentioned in passing in the Hanachirusato chapter.

*As I gaze at the moon I am at peace
Even if only briefly, for it shines
On the distant palace I long to see*

He had warm recollections of a certain night when he had talked intimately with Emperor Suzaku about times past. How closely he resembles our late father! Genji whispered a line from a poem in Chinese by the exiled Sugawara no Michizane: “The robe bestowed on me by the Emperor is now with me here.”<sup>6</sup> Truly the robe never left his sight but was always near him.

*My sleeves both right and left are wet with tears
Tears of bitter resentment on the one Tears of longing for you on the other*

* * *

As the days and months passed, there were many occasions back in the capital when the courtiers, Emperor Suzaku first among them, experienced pangs of wistful longing for Genji. The Crown Prince in particular constantly shed tears whenever he thought of him, so that his nurses, especially Myōbu, looked on with pity.

Fujitsubo, who had always been fearful about her son’s position, was beside herself with anxiety now that Genji was not there to look after his interests. At the beginning of his exile the princes who were his half brothers and other high-ranking noblemen who had been close to him would send sympathetic notes inquiring how he was faring. Many at the court deemed these exchanges of heartfelt correspondence, which included poetry in Chinese, extraordinarily felicitous. When the Kokiden Consort learned about these letters, however, she harshly disparaged them.

“One might expect a man who has incurred official censure to find it a daily struggle just to savor the taste of food as he would like . . . but not Genji. He resides in an attractive villa, writing letters critical of the court, and like that traitorous official in the Qin dynasty, gets his sycophants to go along with everything he says. Why, they’d call a deer a horse if he told them to!”<sup>7</sup> When word spread of what she said and the asperity with which she spoke, people at the court were afraid, and no one wrote to Genji anymore.

The passage of time brought no comfort to Murasaki. When the women who had been serving Genji in the east hall moved to her quarters in the west hall, they had been skeptical of her, wondering why their lord would have brought such a young lady to his villa. But after they got to know her—her charming, endearing looks, her steady, sincere personality, her kindness and deep sensitivity—not one of them chose to leave. Those ladies-in-waiting of higher status and greater discernment were able once in a while to catch a glimpse of her behind her screens, and when they did they saw that their lord’s preference for her over his other ladies was perfectly justified.

6. A line from a Chinese-style poem that Sugawara no Michizane wrote in exile when he looked at a robe he had received from the emperor while still at court. The poetry of famous Chinese and Japanese exiles, such as Bai (Bo) Juyi and Michizane, keeps Genji company during his own time in exile [editor’s note].

7. This anecdote is related in Sima Qian’s Historical Records [editor’s note].

The longer Genji stayed at Suma, the more living apart from Murasaki became intolerable. Despite his torment, he rejected the idea of having her come to live with him in a place completely unsuitable for her: How could I have her live in a place I myself consider retribution for past sins? Everything in this province was so different from the capital. He had never before been exposed to the sight of lower-class people, who had no inkling of who he was, and they were a shock to his sensibilities—naturally he found them uncouth and beneath him. From time to time smoke would rise quite near his villa, and at first he imagined it was from the fires the fishermen used to extract salt. Later he learned it was smoke from smoldering brush that had been cleared on the mountain behind the villa. It was all such a marvel to him that he composed a poem:

*Like brush burning at the huts of rustics
My heart smolders with my constant yearnings
For tidings from my loved one back at home*

* * *

Just when life was feeling most tiresome, Tō no Chūjō suddenly paid a visit. He may have been the son of the Minister of the Left, but he was also the husband of the younger sister of the Kokiden Consort, and so his career had not suffered. He was a man of sterling character and, having been promoted to Consultant at the third rank, he now possessed an impeccable reputation. Despite his good fortune, however, the palace was a dreary place for him with Genji gone, and at every event he found himself longing for his old friend. It finally reached the point where he no longer cared that he might become the subject of malicious gossip and censure, and he decided to venture to Suma. The moment he laid eyes on Genji he experienced a joy, mingled with a few tears, that he had not savored in a long time.

In Tō no Chūjō's eyes, the villa at Suma had a vaguely Chinese style about it. The setting was like something out of a painting, and the effect created by the fence of bamboo wattle, the stone steps, the pine pillars, all as rustic and simple as Bai Juyi's hut, was peculiarly charming. Eschewing royal colors, Genji was dressed without ostentation, wearing dark bluish-gray hunting cloak and trousers, cinched at the ankles, over a humble light red robe, creating the impression that he was a mountain peasant. Though Genji was intentionally dressed like a provincial, his looks were so dazzling that Tō no Chūjō couldn't help smiling. The personal effects he kept close at hand were simple and humble-looking, and his sitting room was completely exposed to view from the outside. The boards for Go and backgammon, the furnishings, and the pieces used for playing tagi<sup>8</sup> had all been fashioned intentionally to have an appropriately countrified look, while the implements used for the Buddhist rituals he practiced showed signs of his wholehearted devotion. Even the meal provided was prepared in an intriguing way in harmony with the setting.

Tō no Chūjō, spotting some fishermen carrying shellfish they had just harvested, summoned them over and asked them what it was like to live for so many years on these shores. They told him about the various hardships and worries that they had experienced, and though their babbling speech was in a rough dialect he found hard to follow, he was nonetheless moved as he observed them—they made him realize that all people, no matter what their status, experienced similar emotions and were not that different. As a reward for the shellfish, he adorned them with robes and other gifts, and the honor he bestowed on them made them think, if only for a moment, that the world was their oyster.

8. A game that is similar to tiddlywinks, except that the object is to flip stones onto a board instead of counters into a cup.

Genji's horses were stabled close by, and Tō no Chūjō watched in amazement as someone brought rice stalks from a strange-looking storehouse in the distance—apparently some kind of granary—to feed them. The scene reminded him of a line from the saibara “Asukai,” from which he sang the words “the grasses are inviting.” He then told Genji all that had happened during the months he had been away, alternately crying and laughing.

“My father,” he said, “is always fretting over your son, and it makes him feel sad that the little one should be so innocent about what is happening in the world.” Genji could hardly bear to think about the boy.

There is no way for me to record all that was said between them, and I can't even do justice to a small part of their conversation. They did not sleep that night but passed the time composing Chinese poetry until dawn. Still, even Tō no Chūjō had to be mindful of the consequences of rumors at the court, and so he hurried back to the capital at daybreak. Such haste made his departure all the harder for Genji to take. They took up their cups of wine and toasted one another, reciting together a line of verse composed by Bai Juyi to bid farewell to his friend, Yuan Zhen, who had visited the poet in exile: “Into the winecup in spring pour tears of drunken sorrow.” All their companions wept with them, apparently in bitter regret that the two friends should have to part after so short a time together.

A formation of wild geese flew across the dimly lit sky. Genji composed the following:

*In what spring will I be allowed at last
To go and view the capital again . . .
How I envy these geese returning home*

Tō no Chūjō could hardly bring himself to leave.

*Will not the wild geese that leave unsated
From this enchanting abode lose their way
On the road to the capital in bloom*

The gifts from the capital were elegant and in good taste. In seeing off his guests, Genji showed his appreciation for them by making a present of a black horse.

“You may think it inauspicious to receive a memento from someone in exile,” he said, “but, like me, this horse misses home, for he tends to neigh whenever he feels a breeze coming from the direction of the capital.”<sup>9</sup> It was an exceptionally fine-looking steed.

“Keep these in remembrance of us,” Tō no Chūjō replied, presenting Genji with several items, including a remarkable flute that had a reputation at court for its pure tonal qualities. All the same, he was careful not to give presents that might invite censure. By now the sun was rising. Because it was already late to be starting off, he hurried away, flustered, glancing back over and over. How forlorn Genji looked as he saw the party off. “When will I see you again? Surely your exile won’t last much longer.”

9. Allusion to a Chinese poem in Selections of Refined Literature [editor's note].

Genji replied with a poem:

*O crane, you who can soar so near the clouds
Above the palace . . . look on one whose life
Is pure and spotless as a day in spring*

“While I fully expect to return, it is difficult for people who suffer the misfortune of exile, even the wisest sages of the past, to mingle again successfully in court society, and so . . . well, I don’t feel as though I want to see the capital again.”

To no Chūjō answered with a verse of his own:

*Longing for the companion who flew beside him
Wing to wing, the solitary crane with no guide
To help cries out within the clouds and the palace*

“Your absence is so painful, I now regret the good fortune of being your close friend.” They had not had time to converse at their leisure, and his departure left such a void that Genji spent the rest of the day sunk in melancholy reverie.

On the Day of the Serpent, which fell during the first ten days of the third month, one of Genji’s attendants, a person who took pride in his knowledge of such things, told him, “This is a day when a person who has the sort of cares that trouble you should perform rites of purification.” And so Genji, who had wanted to go view the shore in any case, headed down to the sea. He had some simple soft blinds erected to create a temporary enclosure for himself, then summoned a diviner, a master of the way of yin-yang who traveled back and forth between the capital and this province. As part of the Purification Ritual, a large doll to which all defilements and malign spirits had been transferred was placed in a boat and set adrift on the waves. Watching it float away, Genji was reminded of his own fate.

*Like a ritual doll drifting out Into an unknown expanse of sea
I am overwhelmed by my sorrow*

Sitting in the midst of the bright, cheerful scenery, he looked indescribably handsome. The surface of the sea was serenely calm and gave no sign as to which way the currents were flowing, but as he pondered the flow of his own life, his past and his future, he composed another poem:

*Surely the myriad deities Must take pity on me . . . after all
Is what I have done truly a crime*

The wind suddenly picked up, and the skies darkened. People began bustling to get ready to leave, even though the Purification Ritual was not finished. Rain fell suddenly and violently, and his attendants were so flustered that they were unable to raise their parasols as they made their way back to the residence. The party had not prepared for this kind of storm; the wind, unlike anything they had seen before, blew away everything around them, and the waves broke with terrifying power, forcing everyone to flee before their fury. With each flash of lightning and crash of thunder, the surface of the sea shimmered like a silk quilt spread out before them. While the party struggled, barely managing to make it back, they feared they might be struck by lightning at any moment.

"I've never gone through anything like this!" said one of the attendants.

"Usually you see some signs that the wind is going to pick up. This is a shockingly rare occurrence," replied another.

Even as they spoke, stunned and dismayed, the thunder continued unabated, and the torrential rain fell so hard it seemed as though it would pierce through whatever it struck. Is the world coming to an end? they all wondered, feeling forlorn and confounded. All the while Genji was calmly reciting a sutra. The thunder lessened somewhat when darkness fell, but the wind howled on throughout the night.

When it seemed that the storm was subsiding, one of the attendants remarked, "Surely this is a sign of the power of all the prayers I've been offering."

"If it had gone on much longer," his companion added, "we would have been swallowed up by the waves for sure."

"I've heard that a tsunami can kill a person in an instant," someone else chimed in, "but I never knew anything like this could happen."

When dawn approached, everyone was finally able to fall asleep. Genji was also able to rest a little, but as he dozed off, someone—a person whose features he could not make out very clearly—approached him in a dream. "You have been summoned to the palace," the figure demanded, "so why have you not made an appearance?" The figure was walking about, apparently searching for him. Seeing this, Genji was startled awake. The Dragon King in the sea was known to be a connoisseur of genuine beauty, and so Genji realized he must have caught the deity's eye. The dream gave him such a horrifying, uncanny sensation that he could no longer stand residing in this abode by the sea.

From Chapter XIII

Akashi

THE LADY AT AKASHI

Several days passed, but the rain and wind did not let up, and the thunder did not abate. These endless hardships made Genji increasingly lonely and miserable, and under such circumstances, facing a dark past and bleak future, he could no longer put on a brave front.

What should I do? he asked himself as he pondered his situation. If this storm drives me back to the capital before I receive a pardon, I'll be a laughingstock. Perhaps it would be best to leave here and seek out some abode deep in the mountains, leaving no trace of myself in the world. But then he had second thoughts. Even if I were to leave for the mountains, people would still gossip about me, saying that I retreated in a panic, driven off by the wind and waves. Later generations would consider me utterly contemptible.

These thoughts weren't the only thing troubling him. The dream he had a few nights earlier, during which he had seen that foreboding figure, kept recurring. Day after day went by without a break in the clouds, and he grew increasingly anxious, fretting about what was happening in the capital and thinking abjectly that, if things continued like this, he would be cast utterly adrift. Yet because it was too stormy to even poke one's head outside, no one arrived from the capital to see him.

At last a messenger arrived from his Nijō villa. The man, who had rashly braved the weather, was soaked to the point of looking weird and unearthly. He was also of very humble station—had Genji passed such a person on the road at an earlier point in his life, he would not have recognized him as human and would have had his servants brush him aside. The fact that Genji now felt a deep kinship with such a man brought home just how far he had come down in the world and how much his self-esteem had collapsed.

The man carried a letter from Murasaki:

"This terrible, tedious storm goes on without end, making me feel as though the skies were closing me off from you even more than before, for now I cannot even gaze in your direction."

*How fiercely must the winds blow across those strands
During this time when endless waves drench the sleeves
Of one who is longing for you from afar*

The account she gave of her anguish affected him greatly. After opening her letter, his mood turned to dark despair, and he felt like the poet whose river of tears "overflowed its banks."<sup>1</sup>

"Even in the capital," the messenger informed him, "people are viewing this storm as an eerie omen, and I've heard that they plan to hold a ritual congregation of the Sutra for Benevolent Rulers to protect against a disaster."<sup>2</sup> High-ranking officials who usually attend the palace to conduct affairs of state cannot do so because the roads are all blocked."

The messenger's way of speaking was stiff and unclear, but because Genji was curious about court matters, he was eager to learn more. He summoned the man to appear before him and questioned him further.

"Day after day the rain falls with no letup and the winds continue to gust," the messenger said. "Everyone is alarmed and amazed by this extraordinary weather. Of course, we haven't seen anything like what you've had here at Suma, what with hail falling so hard it drills into the ground and with this constant rumbling of thunder."

The expression on the man's face, which told of his surprise and fear of the terrible conditions at Suma, sharpened all the more the sense of isolation felt by Genji's attendants.

1. Poem from Ki no Tsurayuki's Tosa Diary included in this volume: "The river of tears has overflowed its banks and further dampens the sleeves of both the one who goes and the one who stays behind."

2. This congregation, called Ninnōe, was held in the palace in the fall and spring or in times of emergency to protect the realm.

As the storm raged on and on, Genji began to wonder if this might not be the end of the world . . . but then, the following morning, the wind picked up with even greater intensity, the tide surged, and waves broke violently on the shore, looking as if they might sweep away even the rocky crags and hills. No words could describe the booming thunder or the flashing lightning, which seemed to be crashing down right on top of them. Everyone was frightened out of his wits.

"What misdeed did we commit," bemoaned one retainer, "that we should suffer this tragic destiny? Must we die without seeing our parents again, without looking on the beloved faces of our wives and children?"

Genji regained his composure, resolute in the conviction that having committed no great crime his life would not end on these shores. Still, his attendants were in such a state of panic that he had an offering of multicolored strips of cloth made to the gods of the sea. He also made numerous supplications: "O deity of Sumiyoshi,"<sup>3</sup> he intoned, "you who calm and protect these nearby shores, if truly you are a manifestation of the Buddha taken form as the guardian divinity of this region, then deliver us from harm!" His attendants were deeply distressed by the prospect that not only they themselves but their lord as well would be swept into the sea and perish in this unheard-of fashion. A few of them gathered their courage as best they could and, regaining a sense of propriety, joined their voices in praying to the Buddha and the gods, each offering his own life in exchange for the safety of their lord. Turning in the direction of the Sumiyoshi Shrine, they made their supplications.

"Our lord was reared in the bosom of the Emperor's palace and had every sort of pleasure lavished upon him. Yet has not his profound compassion spread throughout this great realm of eight islands, lifting up and saving many who were mired in sin and impiety? What crime has he committed that he must now suffer retribution by drowning here amidst these foul, unjust waves and wind? You gods of Heaven and of Earth, show us clearly that you discern right from wrong! Though guiltless, he has been charged with crimes, stripped of office and rank, separated from home, driven into exile. Grieving anxiously morning and night, he has suffered this tragic fate . . . is he about to lose his life as well because of some sin in a former life, or some crime committed in this one? Gods and Buddha, if you are just, then put an end to our lordship's suffering!"

Genji once more offered prayers to the Dragon King and to the myriad gods of the sea, but the thunder only crashed all the more loudly, and lightning struck the gallery connecting Genji's quarters to the rest of the villa. Flames leapt up and the passageway caught on fire, throwing everyone into a state of panic. No one had enough wits about him to be able to deal with the situation, and so they had their lord move to the rear of the residence to a room that, from the looks of it, must have been the kitchen. Everyone, irrespective of rank, crowded into the space, and the thunder could barely be heard above the tumultuous din of the crying and shouting there. As the day ended, the sky was black as an inkstone.

Finally the winds gradually subsided, the rain tapered off, and sparkling stars were visible. Genji's attendants felt embarrassed for their lord, thinking it was an affront to his dignity to remain in a place as strange and disreputable as this,

3. A Shinto shrine near Osaka [editor's note].

and so they wanted to try to move him back to the main hall. They hesitated, however, debating what they should do.

One of them declared, "Even the quarters that escaped the fire have an ominous air about them. The people over there are in a state of shock, noisily stomping about, and the blinds have all been blown away."

Another attendant replied, "In that case, let's wait until morning."

All the while Genji was meditating and softly invoking the name of the Buddha. Feeling unsettled and restless, he mulled over all that had happened. After the moon rose he could make out clearly just how close to the villa the tide had surged. Pushing open a door of rough wattle and glancing outside, he gazed off toward the shore at the roiling surf left in the wake of the storm. No one in the immediate vicinity possessed the qualifications—sensitivity, proper judgment, ability to divine past and future—needed to make sense of all this and reliably sort things out. Instead, the only people to make their way to the villa were those strange, lowly fisherfolk, who gathered at a residence where they had heard a nobleman resides, babbling away in an unfamiliar dialect. Even though Genji considered them exceedingly bizarre, he couldn't very well have them chased away.

One of his attendants remarked, "If the wind hadn't subsided for a while, the high tide would have left nothing behind. The mercy of the gods is boundless!"

Feeling forlorn, he composed a verse:

*Had the gods of the sea shown no mercy
Then the tide surging from all directions
Would surely have swept me into the deep*

Genji had maintained his composure throughout the tumult of the storm, but it had been terribly nerve-racking and exhausting, and he began to doze off in spite of himself. The room he was using as a temporary shelter was so crude and rough that he could not lie down, so he slept while propping himself up against a pillar. As he did so, his late father came to him in a dream and stood before him, looking just as he did when he was alive.

"Why do you remain in such a strange, unseemly place as this?" His father took his hand and, pulling Genji to his feet, exhorted him: "Hurry now! Board a boat and leave these shores, following wherever the deity of Sumiyoshi may lead you!"

Genji felt overjoyed. "From the moment I was separated from your august presence," he said, "I have been beset with all manner of sorrows, so that now I feel I ought to end my life on this shore."

"Such rash thoughts simply will not do! All these trials are a mere trifle . . . retribution for some minor misdeeds. Though I committed no serious breach of conduct during my reign, I was unknowingly guilty of some misdeeds and have spent all my time after death atoning for them<sup>4</sup> without once giving any thought to matters of this world. But then I saw how deeply mired you are in your troubles here, and I could not bear it. I entered the sea and rose up to these shoals. Though I am now utterly exhausted, I must take this opportunity and hurry on to the capital, where I will speak to Suzaku on your behalf." With that he rose to leave.

4. This statement by Genji's father is an apparent reference to a vision by the monk Nichizō, who saw the historical Emperor Daigo suffering the torments of Hell.

Genji was upset that his father was going away so soon, and because he wanted to accompany him, he began to weep. He looked up, but there was no one there—only the shining face of the moon. It had all felt so real, it hadn't felt like a dream at all. The lingering presence of his father remained, so palpable that Genji was profoundly moved by the sight of the wispy lines of clouds trailing across the night sky like traces of his father's ghostly presence. He had not seen his father's figure for many years, not even in his dreams. Now, even though he had glimpsed for only a few fleeting moments the face he had been longing so impatiently to see, the image continued to linger, hovering before his mind's eye. The poignant sense of gratitude he felt toward his father, who had flown to aid him when his life had reached its nadir and he was in despair and contemplating the end of his life, also made him look at the storm in a different, more positive light. The aftereffect of his dream was a boundless sense of happiness and relief that someone was looking out for him. His heart was full of conflicting emotions, and even though he had seen his father only in a dream, the turmoil in his heart distracted him from the sorrows of the waking world. He wanted to go back to sleep in hopes of seeing his father again, but the irritation he felt at himself for not responding to his father in more detail kept him from being able to close his eyes, and he stayed awake until dawn.

A small boat approached the shore and several men came toward the exile's abode. When one of Genji's retainers asked them to identify themselves, they answered, "The former Governor of Harima Province, a novitiate who has recently taken his vows, had this boat readied, and we journeyed here from the bay at Akashi. If Yoshikiyo, the Minamoto Lesser Counselor, is here, our lord would like to meet and discuss some matters at length."

Yoshikiyo was startled by their arrival and seemed not to know what to make of it.

"I was familiar with the man before he was a novitiate and still Governor of Harima and had opportunities to converse with him over the course of several years. However, we had a mutual falling-out over some trifling matter, and so it has been a long time since we exchanged any correspondence of a particularly personal nature. What business would bring him here over such rough seas?"

Genji's dream, especially his father's exhortation, was still vivid in his mind, and he told Yoshikiyo to hurry up and meet with the novitiate. So Yoshikiyo went down to the boat, scarcely believing that it had set out during the storm amidst such violent waves and wind.

"Earlier this month," the novitiate explained, "a remarkable-looking figure came to me in a dream and told me something incredible. 'On the thirteenth of this month,' he announced, 'I will give you a clear sign, so have a boat prepared and no matter what happens, make for Suma when the wind and waves subside.' Because he had informed me in advance, I did as instructed and had a boat ready. I waited as long as I could, until the ferocity of the rain and wind and thunder alarmed me and made me worry for the safety of your lord. Then it hit me that there have been many examples, even in other lands, in which a person who acted on his belief in a dream saved the state. Though your lord may have no use for my message, I could not let the appointed day spoken of in my dream pass without reporting these tidings to him. So I set out in the boat, and a miraculously favorable wind blew it along until we arrived at this strand. Truly this can only be a sign of divine favor. Is it possible that some sign was given to your lord here as well? If so, then please convey my words to him, ashamed though I am to beg your indulgence.”

Yoshikiyo discreetly reported what he had heard.

Genji mulled over the information, turning over in his mind all things past and future—disturbing things he had seen in both his dreams and his waking life—that might be taken as signs from the gods: If I hesitate out of fear that gossips will ruin my reputation by criticizing me for following after some eccentric novitiate, I could end up rejecting what might be genuine divine assistance. If that happened, I'd be an even greater laughingstock. It is hard enough to turn away from the advice of men . . . how much harder, then, to defy the gods. It's proper that I should be deferential, even in minor matters, and yield to the views of those higher in rank who are older, respected and trustworthy. A sage of old once advised that "one cannot be censured for following." In truth, I failed to heed those words, and as a result I've had to undergo many bitter, unprecedented hardships, including this life-threatening storm. In the face of all that, salvaging my reputation for posterity no longer seems so important. What's more, my father did admonish me in my dream, so why should I have any doubts about the novitiate's story?

After deliberating in this way, Genji sent his reply: “Though I have encountered unheard-of difficulties in this unfamiliar province, no one from the capital has inquired after me. I have gazed after the sun and moon coursing through the sky to who knows where, and thought of them as my only companions from home . . . but now, to my great joy, a fisherman's boat arrives.<sup>5</sup> Is there a retreat on the shores of Akashi, some place where I might withdraw in peace?”

The novitiate's delight knew no bounds, and he expressed his deep gratitude.

“This is all fine and well,” said a member of Genji's escort, “but our lord should go aboard before dawn so that he will not be seen.”

Genji boarded the boat accompanied by the usual retinue of four or five of his most trusted attendants. The miraculous breeze that had brought the boat here picked up again, and they arrived at Akashi so quickly it was as if they had flown there. The shores of Suma and Akashi were separated by only a few miles, and so the journey would have been short in any case. Even so, the willfulness of the breeze seemed uncanny all the same.

What Yoshikiyo had told him years earlier was true—the scenery on the shores of Akashi was truly spectacular. For Genji, who was hoping for a peaceful sanctuary, the only distraction was the large number of people bustling about. The novitiate's estate extended from the waterfront up into the recesses of the hills, and he had brought together on his land all sorts of attractive buildings constructed with an eye to how well they suited the seasons and the topography—a thatched-roof cottage near the shore that would intensify the pleasures of viewing the four seasons, a magnificent meditation hall standing beside a stream flowing down out of the hills on a site perfect for performing ritual devotions and focusing one's thoughts on the next world, a row of granaries built to provide for the needs of this world and filled with the bountiful harvests of autumn in order to sustain the novitiate throughout his remaining years of life. Fearful of the recent tidal surges, the novitiate had moved his daughter and her entourage to a residence at the foot of the hills, allowing Genji to comfortably occupy the villa near the sea.

5. Poem by Ki no Tsurayuki: “To my great joy a fisherman's boat arrives, borne by a breeze that blows on one who has been soaked by waves.”

The sun was rising just as Genji was moving from the boat to a carriage. As soon as the novitiate caught a glimpse of him in the dim early morning light, he immediately forgot about his own advancing years and felt as though his life had been extended. With a beaming smile, he at once offered a prayer to the deity of Sumiyoshi. It seemed to him that he had been allowed to grasp the light of the sun and the moon in his hands, and so it seemed perfectly natural that he should busy himself tending to Genji's needs.

To capture the scene in a painting—not just the beauty of the setting, which goes without saying, but also the elegance of the buildings, the indescribable appearance of the grove of trees surrounding them, the rocks and plants in the gardens, the waters of the inlet—seemed impossible for anyone but the most inspired of artists. The residence here was much brighter and more cheerful than the villa at Suma Genji had occupied these many months, and the utterly charming furnishings brought back fond memories. The novitiate's lifestyle was, as Yoshikiyo had reported, no different from that enjoyed at the most distinguished aristocratic houses in the capital; indeed, the blinding brilliance of his lifestyle appeared, if anything, to be superior.

* * *

It was now the fourth month, and with the change of the seasons Genji was provided with superb new robes and silk curtains to hang around the dais in his sleeping quarters. He found the tendency of his host to obsess over every last detail when serving him somewhat pathetic and overdone. But, at the same time, he observed that the old man's proud dignity revealed a nobility of character, and so he allowed the novitiate to have his way in such matters.

Murasaki continued to send messages as frequently as ever. One quiet, calm moonlit evening, when a cloudless sky spread far into the distance over the sea, the scene brought to mind the water in the garden pond at his Nijō villa. He was filled with an ineffable yearning—a yearning for what or for whom he could not articulate. Before his eyes, off in the distance, was the island of Awaji. “Ah, how far away it seems . . . ,”<sup>6</sup> he murmured.

This moon illuminates the poignant beauty Of Awaji Island . . . ah, how far it seems Bringing painful longings for my distant home

He took his seven-string koto from its cover and plucked a few notes. He had not touched it for some time, and the sight of him aroused restless emotions in his attendants, who found their lord troublingly sad and beautiful.

Genji performed a tune titled “Kōryō,”<sup>7</sup> utilizing all his skills to produce an immaculate rendition. The music mingled with the rustling of the pines and

6. Poem by Ōshikōchi no Mitsune: “Ah, how far away it seemed . . . the moon I viewed at Awaji. Is it the special atmosphere of the setting here this evening that makes it look so near?”

7. A “secret” song composed by the legendary musician Reirin for the Yellow Emperor.

the rippling sound of the waves and wafted toward the lady's residence at the foot of the hill, sending shivers of delight through the refined young ladies-in-waiting there. The rustic denizens of that shore, who certainly were unable to recognize the song, walked along the beach feeling exhilarated, even though they ran the risk of catching cold in the sea breeze. Unable to restrain himself, the novitiate relaxed his devotions and hurried over to Genji's residence.

"It would seem I am still driven by memories to return to the world I supposedly left behind when I took my vows," he said, tears welling up. "The atmosphere conjured by your music, which draws me here this evening, is surely a harbinger of the Pure Land paradise I pray for in the coming life."

Memories came flooding back to Genji's heart as well . . . the musical entertainments celebrating various seasons at court . . . so-and-so playing the koto . . . such-and-such on the flute . . . the sound of voices singing in chorus . . . courtiers praising him lavishly for his own musical skills. How wonderful was the honor and respect shown to him by everyone from the Emperor on down; and of course how grand were the circumstances of those he loved and his own status back then. He felt like he was in a dream, and the overtones his koto produced as he played in that trancelike state conveyed an unearthly, frightening loneliness.

The novitiate could not help feeling maudlin, and he sent for a biwa lute<sup>8</sup> and a thirteen-string koto from the villa at the base of the hill. Playing the role of an itinerant priest performing on the lute, he played a couple of very charming, unusual tunes. He presented the thirteen-string koto to Genji, who played a little on the instrument. The novitiate marveled at how brilliantly talented the young lord was in a variety of arts. Even an instrument that does not produce an especially distinct timbre may, depending on the occasion, sound quite superior. As the music drifted across the waters stretching interminably into the distance, the stirring cry of a Water Rail—so like the rapping of some paramour at the gate of his beloved—rang out amidst the shadows of trees in rampant foliage more vivid and fresh than even the blossoms of spring or the leaves of autumn at their peak.

Genji was impressed by the novitiate's koto, which produced such unique tones, and by his host's own sweetly charming skills. "The thirteen-string koto is most delightful when played in a relaxed, informal style by a woman who exudes a gentle and intimate grace." Genji was referring to women in general, but the old novitiate, misinterpreting his intent, smiled and replied, "I'm not sure that any woman, no matter how gentle or graceful, could play better than Your Lordship. I myself learned to play under the tutelage of a disciple of the Engi period Emperor, Daigo,<sup>9</sup> but as you can see I'm not especially gifted, and so I've cast aside the things of this world. Still, whenever I was depressed I would play a little, and as a result there is someone here who learned the instrument by imitating me, and so her style naturally resembles Emperor Daigo's. Of course, I am just a humble mountain rustic, hard of hearing, and it may be that I am so used to the sound of the wind rustling in the pines that I can no longer tell the difference between it and the sound of the koto. Even so, would you

8. A four-stringed pear-shaped Japanese lute [editor's note].

9. Daigo (885–930) ruled 897–930 C.E. and his reign included the Engi period, from 901 to 923 C.E.

permit me to arrange for you to hear her in private?" His voice was tremulous, and he seemed to be on the verge of breaking down in tears.

"I should have known that in a place such as this, where people are accustomed to the superior music of nature, my performance would not sound like a koto. All very regrettable . . ." Genji pushed the instrument away. "It's odd, really, but since ancient times the thirteen-string koto has been considered a woman's instrument. Emperor Saga<sup>1</sup> passed down the techniques, and it is said that his daughter, the Fifth Princess, was the most skillful virtuoso of her age, though no one remains in her lineage to pass along that style of performance. Nowadays, for the most part, those who have achieved a reputation as master of the koto choose to approach this instrument superficially, as a pleasant diversion and no more. Thus, it's fascinating that an older style of performance should have survived, hidden away in a place like this. How will I manage to hear this person you spoke of?"

"There is nothing to prevent you from listening to her," the novitiate said. "You could even summon her. After all, if I may point to the story handed down by Bai Juyi, there was a woman, the wife of a merchant, who won praise for her talent with the lute . . . and what you said of the koto is true of the lute as well. In ancient times there were very few people who could calmly strum that instrument and reveal its true nature, but the lady I mentioned can play it exceptionally well, with a gentle charm and few hesitations. I'm not sure how she managed to learn the lute as well, but when I hear her music mingling with the sound of the waves, it sometimes brings on feelings of melancholy. At other times it provides a respite from my accumulating sorrows."

Delighted that the old man was a true connoisseur, Genji swapped instruments with him, exchanging the thirteen-string koto for the lute. As expected, the novitiate's skill on the koto was well above average. He played tunes in a style no longer heard in the modern world. His spectacular fingering showed a touch of continental flair, and the vibrato he produced with his left hand was deep and clear. Though they were not at Ise, Genji had one of his men, who had a fine voice, sing the line "Shall we pick up shells along the pristine shore?" from the saibara "The Sea at Ise," while he himself kept rhythm by using flat wooden clappers. From time to time he joined in the singing, and the novitiate would often pause to praise him. As the night wore on, the old man had unusual delicacies brought out and pressed wine upon everyone so that they would naturally forget the cares of the world.

The late night breeze off the shore was chilly, and the light of the setting moon seemed intensely clear. As the world grew quiet the novitiate opened up to Genji, telling him one small anecdote after another about all that had happened in his life—the burdens he had assumed when he first moved to Akashi and how he had devoted himself single-mindedly to his religious practice with the next life in mind. He even brought up, without prompting, his daughter's situation. Genji was amused by this show of paternal devotion, but at the same time he was also touched by the young lady's predicament.

"I hesitate to mention it," the old man continued, "but I wonder if your move to a strange province such as this—temporary though it may be—isn't the work of the gods and the Buddha who, by troubling your heart for a brief period, are showing kindness and pity toward an old priest like me who has prayed to them for so long. I say this because it has been eighteen years since I first placed my faith in the deity of Sumiyoshi. From the time my daughter was a little girl I had ambitions for her, and so each spring and autumn, without fail, I go to pray at the Sumiyoshi Shrine. I practice my devotions day and night at each of the six prescribed times. But, rather than concentrating my prayers on the wish to be reborn on a lotus in the Pure Land, I ask that my ambitions for my daughter be fulfilled and that she be granted a noble position at court. Regrettably, sins from a previous life have brought me misfortune in this one, and I've become the miserable mountain peasant you see before you. My father was able to rise in status as a Minister of State, but I have ended up a rustic provincial. It grieves me to imagine what might become of my descendants, how low they might sink should my family's decline continue; that is why from the moment my daughter was born, I've invested all my hopes and expectations in her. As a consequence of my deep resolve to present her by any means possible to a high-ranking nobleman in the capital, I've rejected many suitors who wished to take her as a wife. Some of those suitors were men whose status was higher than mine, and I've suffered harsh treatment on account of their resentment of me. However, I don't consider that a hardship, and I admonish my daughter by reminding her that as long as I'm alive I'll look after her, even though, as you can see from the narrow cut of my sleeves, I don't have much wealth to give her. And I've told her that if I die while she is still young and unmarried, she should throw herself into the sea."

1. Ruled 809–23 C.E.

He broke down sobbing. He said so many other things besides, it is impossible to relate them all here. Genji was listening to all this during a period in his own life when he had been beset constantly with various problems, and so the old man's story invited tears of sympathy.

"Accused without basis and cast adrift in an unfamiliar land," Genji responded, "I have wracked my brain trying vainly to identify the misdeed I supposedly committed. But now, on hearing your tale this evening and reconsidering the matter, I'm deeply moved by the realization that we truly share a bond from a previous life that is anything but shallow. Why did you not tell me earlier that you knew all this? Once I had departed the capital I lost my attachments and came to find the fickleness of the world insipid and tiresome, and while passing the days and months pursuing only religious austerities, I grew disconsolate and melancholy. I heard faint reports about your daughter, but because it seemed likely that you would reject as inauspicious the suit of an exile without status, I had no confidence to even try. Now it appears that you are beckoning me to her quarters. To have her share my lonely bed would be a comfort."

The young lady's father was thrilled beyond measure at these words.

*Do you know as well what it means to sleep alone
Then perhaps you understand the boredom she feels Waiting for the dawn on Akashi's lonely strand*

"You may well appreciate," he added, "how much greater my own sense of melancholy has been, wearied as I am from years of concern over her." Now that he had finally spoken of his daughter, his body was trembling in agitation—though he did not lose his air of refinement and dignity.

“That may be,” Genji replied, “but those who are accustomed to living on this bay may not appreciate how lonely it is for someone like me . . .”

*In lonely travel robes, on a pillow of grass
I wait in sleepless grief for dawn at Akashi
Unable to weave a dream and join my lover<sup>2</sup>*

Genji was in dishabille; there is simply no way to describe how charming he looked at that moment.

The novitiate talked on and on at length about all sorts of things, but it would be annoying to record them all here. However, because I have not written down everything exactly as it happened or was spoken, I may have accentuated some of the man’s more eccentric and stubborn characteristics.

With things going more or less as he had hoped, the novitiate felt as though a burden had been lifted from him. At around noon the following day, Genji sent a letter to the lady’s residence at the base of the hill. He had given careful attention to the letter, thinking that the lady seemed on the one hand like someone of dauntingly superior talent who would be hard to approach, and on the other, like an unexpected find hidden away in this obscure location. He prepared the letter with exquisite care, writing on light brown Korean paper.

*Gazing sadly at the sky, is it near or far . . .
How I want to pay a visit to those treetops
At the abode obscured by mist and faint rumor*

“My longing for you has overwhelmed my secret love.”<sup>3</sup> Was that the full extent of his letter?

The novitiate had already arrived at his daughter’s residence and was waiting with secret anticipation. Things were working out as expected, and by the time the letter arrived he had already arranged for refreshments for the messenger, plying him with wine until the man was embarrassingly drunk.

The lady took a long time to compose her reply. Her father entered her quarters and pressed her to answer, but she refused to listen to him. Intimidated by the brilliant wit of Genji’s letter, she felt inadequate and ashamed to set her own hand to paper, which would expose the truth about her. Comparing his status to hers, it was obvious that the gulf separating them was enormous. She withdrew to lie down, telling her father that she wasn’t feeling well. Unable to persuade his daughter and with his patience now exhausted, the novitiate wrote the reply for her:

“For a woman whose sleeves have about them the rustic air of the provinces, your graciousness brings a surfeit of happiness that is too much for her to bear. She is too overwhelmed even to read your letter, but observing her . . .”

2. This poem, like the one it answers, plays primarily on the word akashi—referring to the place name and to dawn breaking. Lovers would share robes as part of their bedding, and it was believed that this act ensured that they would meet in their dreams. Travel robes convey an image of sleeping alone, thus making it impossible to meet one’s lover in a dream and intensifying the sense of loneliness.

3. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū: “Though I never wanted to let the colors of my love show, my longing for you has overwhelmed my secret.”

*Lost in lonely thoughts, gazing sadly
At the same sky you are viewing now
Are not her feelings the same as yours*

“Is my view of her perhaps too romantic?”

The note was written on Michinokuni paper, which lent it an old-fashioned aura, but Genji was a little surprised, shocked even, at the seductive allure of the calligraphy, which was embellished with refined flourishes. The novice had presented Genji’s messenger with, among other things, an exceptionally fine set of women’s robes.

The following day Genji sent another note:

“I’ve never seen a letter by proxy before.”<sup>4</sup>

*How wretched my uncertain heart
Knowing there is no one who asks “Do tell me, how are things with you”*

“The difficulty of speaking of my feelings to one I have not yet seen . . .”

This time he used an extremely soft, thin paper, and his calligraphy was exquisite. Only a young lady who was excessively shy and introverted would have failed to appreciate it, and indeed when the Akashi lady saw it, she was amazed. Still, she remained convinced that the immeasurable difference in status between them made any relationship hopelessly unsustainable, and it made her cry to know that he was courting her even though she was of such inferior rank. She remained outwardly impassive, but this time she did as she was told and replied to him. Writing on heavily perfumed paper of light purple hue, her brushstrokes were thick and bold in some places, thin and wispy in others—a technique she employed to disguise any flaws in her hand.

*How could you ever declare such feelings
To me, a person you have never met
Can rumors really trouble you so much*

Her calligraphy and phrasing had an aristocratic flair not at all inferior to those of the most distinguished ladies.

Remembering all the exchanges he had engaged in with women back in the capital, Genji regarded the lady’s letter with delight. Of course, he was mindful of prying eyes and of the censure he would surely suffer if he wrote too often, so he would let two or three days lapse between letters, and even then he corresponded only when he guessed that she might be experiencing emotions similar to his own—on an early evening passed in the quiet diversion of solitary idleness, for example, or a dawn that provided a scene of poignant beauty. Her replies on these occasions were always appropriate, and after thinking about her responses he concluded that she was a lady of discretion and noble character, and thus someone he very much wanted to meet. He asked Yoshikiyo to describe her and reacted with some distaste at the look on the young man’s face as he did so—a look that seemed to say, she belongs to me—and he felt a twinge of pity that his retainer's aspirations to win the lady for himself, which he had harbored for many years, would be thwarted right before his eyes. Genji believed, however, that he could justify his actions so long as the lady encouraged him to pursue a relationship. The problem was that she was proving even more aloof and proud than most highborn women. Genji found this kind of behavior damnably irritating, and so as time passed they began to engage in a contest of wills.

4. The word Genji uses, senjigaki, refers to a letter dictated by the emperor or by an aristocrat.

After crossing the barrier pass at Suma, his anxiety about Murasaki back in the capital only grew worse, and many times his resolve weakened as he wondered what to do—after all, being apart made it difficult to “bear this foolish game.”<sup>5</sup> Should he have her come in secret to Akashi? Each time he asked himself this question, he ended up thinking better of it. No matter what happened, he believed that he would not spend many more years like this in exile, and so if he brought her here now, he would be criticized.

That same year the court witnessed many uncanny omens and disturbing incidents. On the evening of the thirteenth day of the third month—that is, the very day of the storm at Suma—thunder and lightning crashed, and wind and rain raged at the palace. During the night Emperor Suzaku dreamed that his father, the late Emperor, appeared below the steps leading out to the garden on the east side of the imperial quarters in the Seiryōden. His father was glaring at him, obviously in a foul mood, and so Suzaku sat up in a formal posture to show his respect. His father told him many things, and so must have said something about Genji. Suzaku was extremely frightened, but he was also moved to pity at the realization that his father's spirit had not yet been reborn in the Pure Land. Later, when he discussed his dream with his mother, the Kokiden Consort, she told him, “On nights when it rains and storms it's natural for you to dream of things that preoccupy your mind. A sovereign mustn't allow such trivial matters to upset him.”

For some reason—perhaps because he had looked directly into his father's furious gaze—Suzaku began to have trouble with his eyes. His suffering was beyond endurance, and purification rites and exorcisms were performed constantly at both the palace and the residence of the Kokiden Consort.

Other incidents also brought grief to the palace. Suzaku's grandfather, the Minister of the Right who served as his Chancellor, suddenly died. Being advanced in years, his death was not unexpected or strange, but it was still a shock all the same, coming as it did after everything else that had happened. Then, on top of all this, the Kokiden Consort began to suffer from an unknown malady, and she grew weaker over time.

Occasionally Suzaku would give voice to his concerns, telling his mother, “If Genji has been exiled without just cause, then there is no escaping the conclusion that all of these problems are the result of karmic retribution. I think the time has come to restore him to his former rank.”

The Kokiden Consort brushed aside his concerns and strongly admonished her son. “If you do that, you'll be criticized for lacking substance and lose respect. If you permit a man who has been expelled from the capital to return after less than three years, what will people say?" Her words made Suzaku waver, but as the days and months continued to go by, the afflictions that he and his mother suffered grew ever more severe.

5. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū: “When I try to stay away and not meet you, just to see what will happen, my yearning is so great that I can no longer bear this foolish game.”

With the coming of autumn to Akashi, the sea breezes began to blow, stirring melancholy thoughts that were especially poignant. Genji was still sleeping in his solitary bed, but his loneliness was unbearable. He often spoke to the novitiate, telling the old man, "One way or another you will have to devise some pretext to have your daughter come here." Genji was convinced that it would be improper for him to go to her, and in any case the lady had shown no indication that she was inclined to meet him.

Only a provincial woman whose circumstances were utterly wretched, she thought, would frivolously exchange vows as my father has encouraged me to do on the basis of some flimsy, seductive flattery from a man of the capital who has come here for a brief stay. He would never respect me or consider me one of his wives, and if I were to yield to him it would only add to my misery and woe, would it not? During this period of my life, while I remain a young, unmarried woman, my parents, who harbor these unattainable ambitions for me, seem to have placed their extravagant expectations for the future on very uncertain supports. And even if he did take me as a wife, wouldn't that merely add to their worries? So long as Genji remains at Akashi, the happiness I feel just exchanging letters with him is fortune enough for me. For many years I heard reports about him, and now I'm able to catch brief, indirect signs of his presence at a place where I never imagined I might meet such a man. I was told that his skill on the koto was peerless, and when I hear the notes from his instrument wafting to me on the breeze, I can guess what he is doing during the day. Now he has gone so far as to recognize my existence by courting me like this, and that is too great an honor, much more than someone like me, someone whose circumstances have been reduced to the status of the fisherfolk here, could ever deserve.

As these thoughts raced through her mind, she felt more and more ashamed, and could not bring herself to even contemplate the possibility that she might have an intimate relationship with Genji.

Although the lady's parents were confident that the prayers they had offered over so many years would surely be answered, they also began to have ominous misgivings as they imagined how much sorrow they would experience if, having thoughtlessly rushed to give their daughter to Genji, there came a time when he no longer cared for her or counted her among his wives. They had heard how great and magnanimous he was, and yet how bitter would be their misery were he to abandon her! Relying upon the unseen Buddha and gods with no sign or proof of their blessing, knowing nothing of Genji's intentions or of their own daughter's karmic destiny, they tortured themselves with their obsessive worrying.

Genji was constantly pressing the novitiate. "If only I could hear the sound of her koto mingling with the sound of the autumn waves . . . what a waste, not to be able to listen to her play in this perfect season."

The novitiate ignored his wife's concerns and, without a word to his servants, secretly chose a propitious day to arrange a tryst. He went about busily sprucing up his daughter's quarters so that her rooms looked resplendent. Then, on the thirteenth day of the eighth month, with a nearly full moon shining gloriously, he sent a message to Genji that consisted of nothing more than a single line of verse: “On an evening too precious to waste.”<sup>6</sup> Though Genji considered the wily old man a rather elegant pander, that didn’t stop him from donning an informal cloak and setting out very late that night. A stylish carriage had been provided for him, but he thought it was too ostentatious for an occasion such as this and set out on horseback instead. His escort, which included only Koremitsu and a few attendants, was modest. He realized for the first time that the villa at the foot of the hill was farther away than he thought. From the road he could see all around the shore, and the moonlight reflecting off the inlets brought to mind an old verse describing such a scene as one to be viewed with “dear companions.”<sup>7</sup> The words “dear companions” at once brought his beloved Murasaki to mind, and he immediately felt the urge to ride on past the villa and continue on to the capital. Instinctively, he muttered a poem to himself:

*Take flight, my stallion, with autumn moon reflecting Off your lustrous coat . . . carry me through cloudy skies
So I may meet my love, if but for a moment*

The villa of the Akashi lady, a stylish structure with many admirable touches, was set deep in a grove of trees. Whereas the residence near the shore that Genji was using was grand and attractive, the villa here was the kind of place where a person would lead a forlorn, solitary existence. Genji experienced a sweet, sublime sorrow at the thought that living here would allow him to contemplate to the full the sadness of life. The novitiate’s handbell sounded a note of profound melancholy as it reverberated faintly from the meditation hall nearby and mingled with the sighing of the pines. The roots of the pine trees growing on the craggy rocks created a tasteful backdrop, and the chirruping of insects filled the garden. Genji glanced about, surveying the scene. The lady’s quarters had been burnished with special care, and the door, made of exceptional wood, had been left open a crack so that the moonlight could stream in.

Genji stood uncertainly, hesitating before finally saying a few words of courtship. The lady, however, had been determined not to allow her relationship with him to become as intimate as this, and so she grew sullen and depressed, displaying a cold disposition that signaled she would not permit him to have his way.

She’s getting above herself with these superior airs. Genji was irritated and resentful. When a courtship has gone as far as ours, it is customary for the woman, even one whose high status makes her difficult to approach, to set aside her stubborn willfulness and yield. Could it be that she is belittling me for my loss of status? It would hardly be appropriate under the circumstances to force myself on her, but to lose a battle of wills with her would make me look pathetic.

If only his handsome figure, confused and resentful, could have been displayed to a woman who was truly sensitive to beauty!

A curtain close by rustled and one of the silk streamers decorating it brushed lightly across the strings of a koto. The faint notes conjured in Genji’s mind a pleasant image of the lady plucking the instrument, looking relaxed and unguarded. “Is this the koto I’ve heard so much about?” He asked her this and many other things besides, all trying to persuade her to play.

6. Poem by Minamoto no Saneakira: “On an evening too precious to waste, if only I could show the moon and the blossoms to one who understands, as I do, true beauty.”

7. The source is not clear. An early commentary cites the following poem: “Shall we go to view it, dear companions . . . the moon’s visage in the depths of the inlets at Tamatsushima?”

*If there were someone I could talk to Intimately, would I awaken
From the dream that is this world of woe*

She replied:

*Wandering just as I am, lost in the darkness
Of a night without end, how could I speak to you
Not knowing what is dream, what is reality*

The dignified bearing of her figure, which he could barely make out in the dim light, put him very much in mind of the lady at Rokujō, who was now in Ise with her daughter.

Apparently the Akashi lady had not been prepared for his visit and, unaware of her father's machinations, had been caught off guard. It had never occurred to her that Genji might make such outrageous advances like this, and so she was quite flustered and upset. Moving into a room just off her private chambers, she somehow managed to securely latch the sliding door from the inside. Genji had no intention, it seemed, of trying to force the door open. Then again, how could he simply leave things as they were? The lady was aristocratic and tall, and her sense of propriety and dignity made Genji feel embarrassed and uncertain. Thinking about how their relationship had been destined by these strange circumstances, he was moved by the depth of the bond ordained by their karma. Surely his love for her would grow stronger the more intimate they became with one another.

He had come to loathe the long nights of autumn, which dragged on tediously for him in his solitary bed. But this night seemed to be rushing toward dawn, and so, mindful as ever that prying eyes might catch sight of his visit, he hurriedly left her, murmuring sweetly gentle words to her.

He discreetly dispatched the customary morning-after letter. His secrecy makes one wonder: was he bothered by a guilty conscience? The Akashi lady, worried about gossip, was equally careful to keep their affair secret, even from the others at her villa at the foot of the hill, and so she did not show the messenger bearing Genji's letter any special treatment or give him any lavish gifts. Her father deplored her aloof behavior.

Following this initial tryst, Genji would from time to time call on the lady in strictest secrecy. Their residences were separated by some distance, and there were nights when he was reluctant to venture out, concerned that he might encounter some of the local fishermen, who were by nature loquacious and prone to gossip. On those nights when he did not visit, the lady would be upset, taking his absence as proof that—just as she had imagined all along—his feelings for her were not sincere. Her father, seeing his daughter suffer and knowing that she had good reason for feeling the way she did, worried about how it would all turn out. He forgot about his devotions and his prayers for rebirth in paradise, unable to focus on anything besides waiting and listening for indications that Genji was calling on his daughter. It was truly pathetic that the heart of a man who had ostensibly taken religious vows could be so troubled by worldly affairs.

From Chapter XXV

Hotaru

FIREFLIES

[In omitted chapters, Genji is summoned back from exile, Reizei, Genji's son by Fujit-subo, becomes emperor, and the Akashi lady gives birth to a little girl, the future Akashi Empress. Genji finally persuades the Akashi Lady to move from the provinces to the capital and has Murasaki rear their daughter. Genji builds a mansion in the Rokujō area to accommodate his various women. He also takes in Tamakazura, the lost daughter of Tō no Chūjō, and is caught between fatherly and romantic feelings.]

* * *

The rainy season continued for longer than usual this year, and because the women at Rokujō were bored and had no way to brighten either the skies or their mood, they passed the days and nights amusing themselves with illustrated tales. The Akashi lady prepared some stylish and interesting works of that type and sent them over to the quarters of her daughter, the Akashi Princess.<sup>8</sup>

Meanwhile, the lady in the west hall, Tamakazura, was more intrigued than the others by these stories, which she found fascinating and strange, perhaps because she had come from the provinces. Whatever the reason, she was utterly absorbed in reading them day and night. Quite a few of the young women who had been assigned to her quarters were proficient at reading and copying, and so she was able to collect quite a few texts describing the personal circumstances of a variety of remarkable characters. She couldn't tell if those stories were true or mere fiction, and, moreover, she couldn't find a single character whose circumstances were similar to her own. It appeared as though the heroine Princess in The Tale of Sumiyoshi<sup>9</sup> experienced many remarkable incidents considered unusual as much in her own day as in the present. She compared the heroine's narrow escape from a forced marriage to the Chief Auditor to her own experience with the loathsome Taifu no Gen.

Genji couldn't avoid seeing these illustrated tales, which were left scattered all around Tamakazura's quarters.

"Ahh . . . how tedious," he chided. "Women are by nature blithely content to allow others to deceive them. You know full well these tales have only the slightest connection to reality, and yet you let your heart be moved by trivial words and get so caught up in the plots that you copy them out without giving a thought to the tangled mess your hair has become in this humid weather."

Genji smiled. "Of course, if we didn't have these old tales to read," he continued, "we'd have nothing to divert us in our idle hours. What's more, even among this mass of falsehoods we find some stories that are properly written and exhibit enough sensitivity to make us imagine that they really happened. On the one hand, we may know that it's all silly, but we're still fascinated and affected by the fiction. When we read about some lovely princess lost in troubled thoughts, we're drawn to her story . . . or, when we encounter a tale that makes us wonder uncertainly if what it describes is really plausible or proper, we're nonetheless

8. Genji's daughter by the Akashi lady [editor's note].

9. A well-known tale in the author's time [editor's note].

surprised and amazed that it could be told with such marvelous exaggeration. Of course, later on, when we come back to the tale in a calmer state of mind, we might dislike it or think it inappropriate . . . yet even then there may be aspects of the story that seem as charming to us as when we first read it. Recently, whenever I overhear one of the ladies-in-waiting reading to my little daughter, I'm struck by the realization that there are without doubt skilled storytellers in this world and that such tales must come from the mouths of people accustomed to spinning lies . . . but perhaps that is not the case?"

As soon as he spoke those words, Tamakazura shot back, "There is certainly no doubt that someone practiced at lying would be inclined to draw such a conclusion . . . for all sorts of reasons. I remain convinced, however, that these stories are quite truthful."

She pushed her inkstone away, and, when she did, Genji responded, "Have I been speaking rudely of your stories? Tales have provided a record of events in the world since the age of the gods, but histories of Japan like the Nihongi<sup>1</sup> give only partial accounts of the facts. The type of tales you are reading provide detailed descriptions that make more sense and follow the way of history."

Genji smiled again before continuing.

"A story may not relate things exactly as they happened out of consideration for the circumstances of its characters. Yet there are moments when one wants to pass on to later generations the appearance and condition of people living in the present—both the good and the bad. These are the subjects that people never tire of, no matter how many times they read about them. Thus, it's hard to keep such matters to oneself, and so you begin to tell stories about them. If you want to be upright and proper, then you will select only the good details to relate. Or, if you want to play to people's baser interests, then you will compile the strange and wondrous details of bad behavior. But in either case, you will always be speaking about things of this world. Styles of storytelling may differ in other lands, and even in Japan tales from the past certainly differ from those of the present . . . and of course there are distinctions between deep and shallow topics and themes. For that reason, the narrow-minded conclusion that all tales are falsehoods misses the heart of the matter. Even the Dharma, which was explicated for us through Sakyamuni's<sup>2</sup> splendidly pure heart, contains hōben, those parables that he told to illustrate the truth of the Law. There are many contradictory parts in the sutras that raise doubts in the mind of an unenlightened person. However, if you carefully consider the matter, you realize that all of the sutras have a single aim. The distinction between enlightenment and suffering is really no different from the distinction between the good and the bad in tales such as these. In the end, the correct view of the matter is that nothing is worthless." Genji was now claiming that tales were beneficial.

"Tell me, then," he concluded, "have you found any stories of piously foolish men like me among all your old scrolls? There couldn't possibly be any fictional princesses in this world who are as extremely aloof and heartless as you . . . who pretend not to notice anything. So, how about it? Shall we make a story unlike any other that has ever been told and pass it on to later generations?"

1. Chronicles of Japan. One of the two 8th-century chronicles of Japan, written in Sino-Japanese and modeled on the Chinese official histories, that told the history of the Japanese islands from the Age of the Gods to recent times [editor's note].

2. The Buddha (literally, "Sage of the Sakyas") [editor's note].

Genji sidled over to her. Tamakazura turned away from him, hiding her face in her collar, and said, "Even if we don't make a story together, the relationship we do have is so bizarre and unbelievable that it will likely never become the subject of court gossip."

"You think it's bizarre? Truly, there has never been a daughter as cruel as you." He had moved even closer, and his behavior was much too forward.

*Having a surfeit of cares and longings
I seek answers for them in tales of old
But find there no child as unfilial*

"Even the teachings of Buddha admonish unfilial children," he added. When she refused to show her face, he began stroking her hair. As he did so, her resentment led her to reply:

*Though I have searched through all these ancient tales Truly I find no models in this world
For parental feelings resembling yours*

He felt ashamed when he heard her poem and went no further than stroking her hair. Given her situation, whatever would become of her?

Murasaki was also reading illustrated tales under the pretext that the Akashi Princess had requested them, and she was finding it hard to put them down. Looking at an illustration from Tales of Kumano<sup>3</sup> she remarked, "This is quite skillfully rendered." She gazed at the little girl, who was innocently taking a nap, and remembered when she was that age.

Genji studied the illustration. "How precocious children were back then. I was quite reserved by comparison when I was their age . . . a model of behavior, really." In truth, he was fond of being the model for all sorts of unheard-of behavior.

"You shouldn't be reading love stories in front of her," he continued. "She may not be all that intrigued by some young girl holding a secret love in her heart, but she is destined to be Empress, and it would be most unfortunate if she grew to accept the idea that it was normal for such affairs to actually take place." Had Tamakazura heard what he just said, she certainly would have taken umbrage at the difference in the way he treated his daughter and the way he treated her.

"People with shallow minds may imitate the behavior they read about in these stories, but they look rather pathetic when they do," Murasaki replied. "In The Tale of the Hollow Tree, the young Fujiwara Princess, Atemiya, is a prudent, dignified woman who never goes astray. However, her manner is stiff and unyielding, she lacks feminine grace, and her story ends up being just as bad an influence."

"People in real life seem to be the same," Genji said. "Everyone has their own way of doing things, but it's hard to strike a proper balance. A woman who has been brought up with the greatest care by parents who are not without breeding may grow up to be innocent and childlike, but the fact that she may also have many flaws will, sad to say, lead people to wonder what her parents were up to and how they went about raising their daughter. On the other hand, when you see a young woman who in appearance and behavior is exactly what she should be for someone of her status, clearly her parents' efforts have paid off, and she brings honor to their house. If a young lady's nurses or attendants praise her to an absurd degree, then when her actions or words don't match her puffed-up reputation she will not seem as attractive. Parents should never let people who lack taste and judgment go about praising their daughters." He was determined to do everything in his power to ensure that his own daughter would avoid criticism.

3. This work has been lost.

Many of the tales depicted mean, vindictive stepmothers. He worried that the Akashi Princess might get the idea that all stepmothers were like those she read about. As a result, he took extra precaution when selecting stories and having clean copies and illustrations of them made for her.

* * *

From Chapter XL

Minori

rites of the sacred law

* * *

The following day she<sup>4</sup> was in pain and unable to get up, perhaps because she had overexerted herself by staying up throughout the dedication ceremony. At every similar event that she had attended over the years, she would wonder if this day would be the last time she would see the faces and figures of those who had gathered, the last time she would see them display their various talents or hear them play the koto or the flute. On such occasions, she would be moved even by the sight of faces normally beneath her notice. Her feelings were, of course, even stronger whenever she observed the other ladies at Rokujō. They were, after all, women with whom she shared both gentle rivalry and mutual affection, especially when they appeared together at some concert or diversion held in the summer or winter. Although no one can expect to remain for very long in this world, the thought that she would soon leave the other ladies behind, going forth all alone to an unknown destination, brought home to Murasaki the poignant sorrow of the evanescence of life.

When the dedication ceremony ended and each of the guests had begun to make his or her way home, she felt a twinge of regret that this would likely be the last time that she saw any of them. She sent a poem to Hanachirusato:<sup>5</sup>

*While my life, like these rites, must soon come to an end
We may rely on the truth of the sacred law
That karma will bind us through all the worlds to come<sup>6</sup>*

4. Murasaki [editor's note].

5. One of Genji's ladies, also living in his Rokujō mansion [editor's note].

6. This poetic exchange gives the chapter its title. It should be noted, however, that the word minori, which clearly means "rites" here, also refers to the Law (the Dharma), that is, the truth of the Buddha's teachings. That double sense operates implicitly in both poems.

Hanachirusato replied:

*Even had these rites not been this magnificent
They would still have forged a lasting bond between us Undeserving though I am, with little time left*

Immediately after the dedication ceremony, other solemn rites, such as the continuous reading of the Lotus Sutra and the ritual of confession and penance, were attentively performed. The esoteric healing rites that had been carried out every day over a long period showed no signs of helping Murasaki recover. Genji commissioned additional services at various holy sites and temples known for the efficaciousness of their prayers.

When summer arrived, Murasaki's fainting spells increased even though the weather was no hotter than usual. There were no alarming symptoms that one could point to as the source of her malaise. She was simply growing weaker, without ever suffering the sort of pain that caused others distress. Worried about what was to become of their mistress if she continued to weaken, her attendants observed her condition with regret and sorrow and fell into dark despair.

Because Murasaki's health was slowly failing, the Akashi Empress<sup>7</sup> withdrew from the palace and went to the Nijō villa. She was to take up residence in the east hall, and so Murasaki waited there to receive her. The ceremony greeting Her Majesty's arrival was nothing out of the ordinary, but Murasaki found everything about it moving, since she knew that she would never witness it again. She listened attentively as the name of each nobleman who had escorted the Akashi Empress—a very large group of senior officials indeed—was read out.

Since the two women had not seen each other for a long time, they seized this moment as a rare opportunity to speak intimately and at length. Genji arrived and said, "I feel like a bird evicted from its own nest. It's obvious that I'm of absolutely no use this evening. I'll take my leave and retire for the night." He went back to his quarters feeling quite happy to see Murasaki up and about—it was, however, only a brief moment of comfort for him.

"Since we will be staying in separate quarters," Murasaki said, "I would be deeply honored to have Your Majesty come to see me in the west hall. I know it is presumptuous of me to make such a request, but it is a considerable strain on me to leave my residence to visit you here." She stayed a while longer, and when the Akashi lady joined them, they continued their quiet, heartfelt conversation.

Murasaki had many things on her mind, but wisely she did not broach the subject of what would happen after her death. She calmly made a few passing references to the ephemeral nature of life, but the serious manner in which she talked made it clearer than any words she might have spoken just how sad and forlorn she felt. When she saw all of the children of the Akashi Empress, tears welled up and her face blushed with a most lovely glow. "I had so wanted to see each of them grow up . . . it would seem my heart regrets having so little time left."

Her Majesty wept as well and wondered why Murasaki had to be so fixated on death. The subject of their conversation shifted, providing Murasaki the chance to speak about the ladies-in-waiting who had served her closely over the years. She did her best to avoid saying anything inauspicious, as if she were making last requests, but she felt sorry for her attendants, who would have nowhere else to turn once she was gone. “When I am no longer around,” she remarked, “please remember to look after them.” A sutra reading<sup>8</sup> was about to begin, and so Murasaki retired to her own quarters in the west hall.

7. As noted above, Genji's daughter, the Akashi Princess who becomes the Kiritsubo Consort, has been elevated to the title of empress. The narrative does not explain when this event took place. From this point on, I will identify Genji's daughter as the Akashi Empress.

As he walked around the villa, Niou, the Third Prince, had the most charming appearance of all Her Majesty’s many children. During those intervals when Murasaki was feeling a little better, she would have him sit next to her and, when no one was around, ask him, “Would you remember me if I were not here?”

“I would miss you very much, Grandmama. You are much more important to me than Father or Mother! If you weren’t here, I’d feel awful!” The way he rubbed his eyes to hide his tears was so adorable that she had to smile despite her sadness.

“When you are all grown up, you are to live here. And when the red plum and the cherry tree that grow in front of the west hall are in bloom in their respective seasons, you must not forget to view and enjoy them. At the appropriate times, you must make offerings of their branches to the Buddha in my memory.”

The little boy nodded solemnly, then stared into Murasaki’s face. Just as he was about to cry, he stood up and scampered off. She had raised him and the Third Princess with special consideration, and it filled her with pity and regret to know that she would not be able to help raise them to adulthood.

The heat of summer was so oppressive, she couldn’t wait for the cool of autumn to arrive; and when it did, her spirits revived a little. Still, this was but a temporary respite, for even though the chill autumn winds were not yet blowing—cutting winds that bring only sorrows<sup>9</sup>—she was already spending her days in dewy tears.

The Akashi Empress was preparing to return to the palace. Murasaki wanted to ask her to stay on a little longer, even though such a request would overstep the bounds of propriety. It would also have been awkward, since His Majesty was now sending one messenger after another urging her to return. In the end, she didn’t ask, and because she was so weak, she was unable to go to the east hall to see Her Majesty off. That was when the Empress took the extraordinary step of calling on her in the west hall. Murasaki was humbled and shamed that the Empress would deign to visit her, but she thought that it would have been senseless not to meet. Thus, she had special seating and furnishings prepared to receive her exalted guest.

Despite the fact that she was terribly emaciated, Murasaki still looked remarkable; the loss of weight had, if anything, distilled her beauty, which now possessed a boundless nobility and grace. Once, in the glorious flowering of her prime, her looks exuded to an almost excessive degree a lambent glow that was like the bright fragrance of blossoms. Now her infinitely cherished appearance,

8. This reading may be the Sutra of Great Wisdom (Daihannyakyō), which an empress would normally have performed during the second and eighth months (though the reading could be held on special occasions as well). However, the timing does not seem right here, and it is likely that the sutra reading is part of the healing rites for Murasaki.

9. Poem by Izumi Shikibu: “What sort of wind is it, this wind that blows in autumn . . . how cutting it is, bringing only sorrow.”

which brought to mind the transient nature of the mortal world, possessed a deeper loveliness, one that evoked incomparable feelings of compassion and sweet sorrow.

At dusk, a terrible, chilling wind began to blow, and just as she propped herself up on an armrest, thinking that she would gaze out at her garden, she saw Genji arriving.

“How good that you’re able to get up today! Her Majesty’s visit has apparently cheered you, has it not?”

She felt bad for him—he looked so happy whenever she was briefly feeling better that it moved her to imagine how devastated he would be when the end came.

*How brief the moment when you see me sitting up
As brief as the time that dew clings to bush clover
Before being blown off and scattered by the wind<sup>1</sup>*

It was an apt comparison, for the dew clung precariously to the stems of bush clover in her garden that bent and sprang back with each gust of wind. Genji gazed out at the scene, and the melancholy desolation that accompanied this season was unbearable.

*Our lives are like fragile dewdrops vying
To disappear . . . would that no time elapse Between the first one to go and the last*

He could not brush all the tears from his eyes.

The Akashi Empress replied:

*Who can look at this world, so like the droplets
That cannot resist the blasts of autumn winds
And think that only dew on the top leaves fades*

As they exchanged poems, Genji treasured the sight of these two women, ideal beauties both. Though he wished he could go on gazing at them like this for a thousand years, his heart ached, knowing that such a dream could never be fulfilled, for he had no way to keep his beloved from dying.

“You should leave now. I’m feeling very ill,” Murasaki said. “It’s terribly rude of me to say that I’m too ill to do anything for you.” She pulled a standing curtain over and lay down so that they would not have to see her suffering. This time, it did not appear she would recover.

“What’s wrong?” The Akashi Empress took Murasaki’s hand and watched her tearfully. She looked every bit like a dewdrop fading away, and so they hurriedly sent off countless messengers to commission more sutra readings. There had been episodes like this in the past from which she had always recovered, but Genji suspected that the malignant spirit of the Rokujō lady might still be at work; accordingly, he did everything he could to protect Murasaki, ordering prayers and services to be held throughout the night. His efforts were in vain, however, for just as dawn approached her spirit vanished and she passed away.

1. Murasaki’s poem plays on two senses of the word oku—“to be up/sit up” and “to settle.”

The Akashi Empress thought it a sign of the boundless karmic bond she shared with Murasaki that she had not returned to the palace and was with the woman who had raised her until the very end. Neither she nor Genji could accept that her death was part of the natural order of things, that such partings were common to all. To them, her passing was singular and overwhelming, and so they felt as if they were wandering lost in the sort of dream one has in that twilight time between night and the dawn. No one there could make a rational judgment about anything. The attendants and other servants were completely stunned.

Genji suffered the most. Because he was upset and not thinking clearly, he summoned his son,<sup>2</sup> who was in attendance nearby, and had him move over in front of Murasaki's curtain.

"It appears that this is the end," he said. "It would be a great shame to go against her wishes at this point and not carry out what she had desired for so many years. The holy men who performed the healing rites and the priests reading scripture have all gone silent and have probably left, but some of them may still be here; tell one of them to cut her hair like a nun's. It won't do any good for her in this life, but if she shows a mark of her devotion to the Buddha, then at least she may rely on his mercy to comfort her on the dark path she is to follow. Is there some priest suitable for the task?"

Judging by his expression as he spoke, Genji was trying to be strong, but the color had drained from his face, and unable to bear his loss, he could not stop his tears. His son looked on in sympathy, thinking that his father's grief was perfectly understandable.

"Sometimes a malignant spirit will do this kind of thing just to torment the bereaved ones," said Genji's son. "What I mean is, the spirit may be making it appear that she is not breathing . . . that may be what's happening here. If that's the case, then it would be best to do what she wanted in any case, since according to the Contemplation Sutra,<sup>3</sup> making vows to uphold the precepts for even one day and night will lead to rebirth in Amida's Pure Land. Of course, if she is dead, simply cutting her hair at this point would have little benefit . . . it won't provide a light to guide her in the next world and would make the grief of those who look at her even worse. I wonder if it's for the best?"

He wanted to do all he could to make arrangements for the funeral and period of confinement, and so he summoned several priests from among those who had not yet withdrawn and were willing to serve during the weeks ahead. He also saw to all other necessary preparations.

Although he had longed for Murasaki for years after catching a glimpse of her on that morning after the autumn tempest, Genji's son had never harbored any improper or presumptuous fantasies about her. In what world to come will I ever see her again as I did on that morning long ago? I never did hear her speak . . . not even a faint whisper. Not a day had gone by since then when she hadn't been on his mind. As it turns out, I will never hear her voice . . . and if

2. Genji's oldest child from his first marriage. Long ago this son once caught an enthralling glimpse of his stepmother Murasaki, but has had no chance since to satisfy his yearning to see her again [editor's note].

3. The Kanmuryōjukyō is one of the three major scriptures of Pure Land Buddhism, along with the Sutra of Infinite Life, which is also known as the Larger Pure Land Sutra, and the Amida Sutra.

I'm ever to satisfy my hope of seeing her again, the only time to do so is right now, even if it means gazing at her lifeless form. He had been trying to control himself, since it would look odd if he exhibited excessive grief, but these thoughts brought him to tears. The attendants were loudly weeping and wailing, and Genji's son scolded them. "Really now, be still for a while!" As he spoke, he lifted one of the panels of Murasaki's standing curtain and peered inside. Because it was difficult to make things out in the dim light of early dawn, Genji had placed a lamp near Murasaki's bed and was gazing at her. He so regretted that such a lovely face would soon be no more—a face infinitely dear to him, one possessing such noble grace—it seemed that he no longer had the will to even try to hide his beloved from the gaze of his son, who was peeking in on this scene.

"Here she is, her face looking the same as ever . . . and yet it's obvious that she's no longer with us." Genji covered his face with his sleeves. His son, blinded by tears, could not see very well. To clear his vision, he closed his eyes tight and then opened them so that he could look at her; when he did, he was overcome by a feeling of sadness unlike anything he had ever known. He feared that he would lose his composure completely. Her hair was stretched out beside her, left just as it was when she died, incomparably lustrous and beautiful with not one strand of those thick, cascading tresses out of place. It no longer mattered to her that she was exposed to his gaze. In the bright glare of the lamplight, her complexion had an alabaster glow, and her face, needless to say, looked more pure and spotless than when she was alive, since she had always avoided being seen and concealed her real appearance under makeup. Gazing on her unique, extraordinary beauty, he wished that her soul, which had already departed, would soon return to her body—though he knew such a wish was unreasonable.

The women who had been her closest attendants were too overcome by grief to think clearly, and so Genji forced himself to calm down and set about making arrangements for the funeral. Although he had witnessed many sorrowful events in the past, he had no experience handling such matters directly himself. Undertaking this sad responsibility was like nothing else he had ever done in the past or would do in the future.

* * *

From Chapter XLI

Maboroshi

SPIRIT SUMMONER

Observing the bright cheer of the New Year season only served to make Genji's mood darker and more disordered. The sorrow that had completely overtaken his heart did not dissipate over time as might have been expected. Outside his quarters people were gathering for the customary seasonal visit, but he chose to remain inside his blinds, offering the excuse that he was not well. When Sochinomiya<sup>4</sup> arrived, Genji sent out a message saying that he preferred to meet in a private room in the interior of the residence. He included a poem with his note:

4. Genji's half brother, who unsuccessfully courts Tamakazura [editor's note].

*The one who always lavished praise
Upon these blossoms here is gone
Why should spring care to visit me*

Tears welled up in Sochinomiya's eyes, and he replied:

*Does the spring seek in vain the fragrance
Of the red plum . . . are you suggesting
It comes for common blossoms only*

Genji experienced a sense of deep nostalgia as he watched his younger brother strolling beneath the red plum trees. Does anyone appreciate such beauty as deeply as Sochinomiya? The blossoms were just barely open, and their fragrant glow was delightful. There was no music or entertainment this year—indeed, the celebrations were very different in form.

The ladies-in-waiting who had been in Murasaki's service for many years made no effort to change their wardrobes with the advent of the new season. Instead, they continued to wear dark robes of mourning. Their grief was hard to assuage, but since they remained devoted to Murasaki, they continued to serve Genji. It gave them a measure of comfort that he chose to stay with them in his quarters at the Nijō villa, where they could be near him, rather than going off to call on his other ladies at the Rokujō estate. After Murasaki died and Genji began sleeping by himself, he treated even those women whom he had previously regarded as lovers the same as any other attendant—though, to be sure, his relationship with them had never really been all that serious. He even had the women who served on duty at night withdraw to a spot some distance away from his sleeping chambers.

Whenever Genji was bored, he would reminisce about the old days. Though his devotion to following the path of Buddha had deepened and he had purged all traces of his former, fickle disposition, he would nevertheless recall things from the years he spent with Murasaki—especially the way she looked when her jealousy flared up over one of his passing affairs. I suppose it made no difference whether my affairs were serious or mere dalliances . . . either way, they hurt her. Why did I have to be so impulsive? She got used to my peccadilloes as time went on and adopted an attitude of tolerance that allowed her to deal with them and to understand the true depth of my devotion to her. Though she never grew resentful or bore a grudge, she must have suffered from the turmoil in her heart, wondering with each passing affair what would become of her. He was overcome by feelings of remorse and pity, and his heart was filled to bursting with shame and regret. Some of the women who most closely served him knew how their departed lady felt about Genji's betrayals, but they were circumspect about the subject, and would only discuss it with him in the most delicate terms.

Murasaki's face had betrayed no hint of her emotions when he brought the Third Princess<sup>5</sup> to Rokujō. Still, thinking back on it, he recalled how grief-stricken she looked during those moments when she sadly contemplated her wearisome existence. One time in particular—that snowy dawn following the Third Night with the Princess when Murasaki's spirit appeared at his pillow and he rushed back to her quarters—he remembered how he had tapped at her lattice shutter and was kept standing outside because no one could hear him; he had waited so long he thought he was going to freeze. Beneath those glowering skies, she had received him so sweetly and gently, hiding her tear-soaked sleeves from his view and doing everything she could to divert his attention from her own sorrow.

5. Third daughter of Emperor Suzaku, who marries her to Genji, much to Murasaki's dismay [editor's note].

Every night until dawn, one thought ran through his mind over and over even in his dreams: When will I be able to see her again . . . in what future world will we meet? In the faint light of dawn Genji overheard a woman who must have been returning to his attendants' quarters saying, "My . . . it snowed heavily last night, didn't it?" Those words transported him back to that dawn long ago, and the loneliness that swept over him when he realized his beloved was not lying there beside him was shattering.

*I long to melt like snow, to disappear
From this world of sadness . . . but snow still falls
And I still live on against my wishes*

To distract himself from sorrowful thoughts, Genji called for water to cleanse his hands and, as was now his custom, performed his devotions. The attendants stirred up the charcoal embers in the brazier, and then moved it closer to him. Two of the women, Chūnagon and Chūjō, sat nearby and talked with him. "Sleeping by myself last night, I felt lonelier than ever," Genji told them. "I still seem to be caught up in my attachments to this world, which I ought to understand well enough to renounce." He gazed off, lost in reverie. Then, as he glanced around, it occurred to him how sad these women would be and how much more grief they would have to endure were he to turn his back on the world. He privately continued his devotions out of sight, and anyone who heard the sublime beauty of his voice reading the sutras would have been moved to weep. One can only imagine the overwhelming feelings of those who were with him all the time, day and night. Their compassion for him was so great that they would not have been able to hold back the flood of tears even if their sleeves had been weirs.

"I was born into such a high station in life that I have lacked for nothing in this world," Genji remarked. "Yet I've always had the feeling that I was destined to experience more misfortune and regret than the average person. The Buddha has determined that I must know the truth about this world . . . that it is an ephemeral realm of woe. Throughout my long life, I pretended to ignore that truth. However, as I approach my final years and have had to experience the ultimate sorrow of witnessing my beloved's death, I now fully appreciate the nature of my karma and the limits of my desires. Since the fragile, dewlike bonds that tied me to this world have disappeared, I'm at peace. Still, I've grown closer to you now than when you were serving your late mistress, and so when it comes time to say my farewells I know that my heart will be in even greater agony than it is now. Our lives and loves are so fleeting . . . my mind is not right, for it is wrong of me to have such attachments."

He wiped his eyes in an effort to hide his tears, but he could not hold them back and they fell in spite of him. The women who witnessed his grief could not help but weep themselves. They each wanted to tell him how sorry they would be if he abandoned them, but their hearts were too full to say anything, and the conversation ended.

In moments of quiet solitude, Genji would have Murasaki's women sit nearby and converse with him either at dawn, following a sleepless night filled with regrets, or at dusk, following a day spent gazing off in pensive reverie. He did not look down on them as ordinary in any way; in fact, he had known one of the women, Chūjō, from the time she was a child. She had once been an object of his desire, and it must have been awkward for her when she first came to attend Murasaki, for soon after she began keeping her distance from Genji. For his part, he remembered how much Murasaki favored Chūjō over the other ladies-in-waiting, and it touched him to think of her now as a memento of his late beloved. Though he no longer considered her a sexual intimate, she had retained her attractive looks and personality. Indeed, because she resembled Murasaki a little, she was a living memorial, an evergreen planted beside a grave, and thus dearer to him than the other ladies-in-waiting.

Genji stopped meeting people with whom he felt no close affinity. Senior officials who were on good terms with him or his imperial brothers would often call on him at his estate, but he rarely met them directly. He even stayed behind his blinds when he spoke to his son.

If I agree to meet people, he had reasoned, I risk exposing just how feeble-minded I've become over the past few months. Even if I'm in command of my faculties and keep my emotions in check. I'm likely to say something foolish, embarrass myself, and leave a bad reputation to later generations. I suppose that if people gossip about me and claim that I refuse to see anyone because I've grown senile, the effect on my reputation will be much the same. Still, it's far worse to have people witness my infirmities with their own eyes than to have them merely speculate about them.

Genji was not yet ready to turn his back on the world. Biding his time and composing himself, he felt that he should wait to take vows, even during this period when people must be gossiping about how much he had changed. Whenever he made a rare, brief visit to one of his ladies—Akashi or Hanachirusato—he would be so overcome with emotion that tears would fall like rain. This was too shameful for him to bear and, consequently, he would let so much time elapse between visits or letters that the two ladies were always fretting about him.

The Akashi Empress returned to the palace, leaving the Third Prince, Niou, to comfort his lonely grandfather. “Grandmama Murasaki told me to give special attention to this tree,” the boy announced, carefully tending the red plum in the garden that fronted the west hall of the Nijō villa. Genji was very touched watching him. It was the second month and the tops of the plum trees were in full bloom. Spring mists provided a delightful cover to those trees not yet in blossom. Hearing the cheerful voice of a warbler singing in the red plum tree just outside the west hall—a tree that also served as a memento of Murasaki—Genji stepped out to have a look. Walking about, he murmured a poem:

*Feigning ignorance of her passing, the warbler
Still comes to the house of the lady who planted
This red plum tree and admired its fragrant blossoms*

It was now deep into the spring season, and the garden at the southeast residence at Rokujō looked just as spectacular as it did when Murasaki was still alive. However, Genji could no longer savor its beauty; just to look at it unsettled him and brought back all sorts of heartrending memories. His desire to go off to a remote spot deep in the mountains far removed from this world of woe—a place where he would not hear even the cry of a bird to remind him of spring<sup>6</sup>—only intensified. The sight of mountain roses and other flowers blooming in wild profusion suddenly brought dewy tears to his eyes.

The single-petal cherry blossoms had scattered already, the double-petal blossoms were past their peak, and the mountain cherries were now in bloom. The wisteria apparently darkened in color later than the cherries . . . Murasaki had had a good understanding of the plants in her garden, knowing which ones bloomed early, which ones late, and she had planted many varieties so that every season of the year would be filled with fragrant splendor. “My cherry is in bloom,” Niou declared, referring to the one Murasaki had planted. “I’d hate it if the petals fell! There has to be some way to protect them . . . I know! I’ll put a curtain around the tree, and so long as the cloth stays up, the wind won’t be able to touch it!” The little boy’s face showed just how clever he considered his plan to be. He was so precious-looking that Genji couldn’t help but smile. “That’s quite a good idea,” he told his grandson. “You’re much cleverer than the man who wanted to cover the sky with his sleeves!”<sup>7</sup> Genji considered this Prince his sole pleasure in life.

“We won’t have much time to get to know one another. Life being what it is, regardless of how much time we may have together, the day will come when I’m no longer with you.” Seeing his sentimental grandfather tear up as he was so wont to do recently, the boy was put off. “Grandmama Murasaki was always talking that way . . . I don’t like it.” Niou turned his face away, fingering his sleeves as he tried to hide his own tears.

Genji would often lean on the railing of the veranda just outside the corner of Murasaki’s old quarters, lost in reverie as he gazed longingly around her garden or into the interior spaces beyond her blinds. Some of her women were still wearing mourning robes as a remembrance of their mistress; others wore robes of more everyday colors, though the pattern of their silks was plain and subdued. His own cloak was dyed an everyday hue, but its pattern was drab and inconspicuous. The furnishings and decorations were extremely austere—not much craftsmanship had gone into them, and they had such a forlorn air that he composed the following:

*After I have renounced this world of woe
Will it fall to ruin, this springtime hedge
My departed love tenderly nurtured*

No one was forcing him to take vows, but, even so, his decision made him terribly sad.

Bored and with time on his hands, Genji went to pay a call on the Third Princess. Niou, carried by an attendant, accompanied him, and when they arrived, he ran around playing with the Third Princess’s little boy, Kaoru. Still very much a child, it seemed that Niou had forgotten all about the scattering cherry blossoms that had so worried him earlier.

6. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū: “Does she not know my feelings are as deep as those mountain recesses, where not even the cries of birds can be heard?”

7. Anonymous poem from the imperial anthology The Gosenshū: “If only I had sleeves wide enough to cover the heavens, I would not leave spring blossoms to the mercy of the wind.”

The Third Princess was reading a sutra before the altar. She did not strike Genji as being especially devoted to the religious life, nor did she appear troubled at heart or regretful at having taken vows. She practiced her devotions quietly, without distraction, and Genji envied her ability to single-mindedly distance herself from the world. He deplored the fact that his own resolve to follow the religious life should be inferior to this shallow woman's. The flowers decorating the altar possessed a beguiling beauty in the dim twilight of dusk, prompting Genji to remark, "Now that the woman who was so attracted to the spring is gone, the colors of the blossoms have lost their charms for me. But seeing those flowers adorning the Buddha, I can't help finding them lovely. I've never seen the mountain roses in her garden bloom like they have this year . . . their petals are enormous! It's not a flower that one usually associates with refined elegance, but their vibrant colors are so exquisite and charming! How sad that they should be so much more lush and fragrant this spring, as if they were heedless of the fact that the one who planted them is gone."

The Third Princess offhandedly replied, "No spring comes to this dark valley . . ."<sup>8</sup>

Couldn't she have put it another way? Genji found her allusion tasteless and insensitive. It occurred to him that even at casual moments like this, Murasaki never once said or did anything that would cause him to think, I wish she hadn't done that. He tried conjuring up her appearance at different stages of her life, beginning from the time she was a child. A succession of images of her on various occasions in the past came to him one after another, reminding him of the wit and charm that had characterized her attitude, her behavior, and her manner of speech. Genji, who was now susceptible to teary sentimentality, was embarrassed that his memories should cause him to weep in the presence of the Third Princess.

The dusk, made indistinct by shimmering mists, was lovely to behold, and he decided to call on the Akashi lady. Since he had not looked in on her for some time, she was not expecting this visit and was caught by surprise. Still, she managed to receive him with grace and charm, which, to his eyes, made her look every bit the superior lady she was; and yet, try as he might, he could not control the natural inclination to compare her with Murasaki and note the differences in their personalities and talents. Recalling images of Murasaki ought to have brought some relief to him, but instead it merely increased his longing and sorrow, making it all the more difficult for him to find consolation.

The atmosphere of the quarters of his Akashi lady was very different from that of the apartments of the Third Princess, and Genji felt that here he could speak at ease about the old days. "I learned long ago that obsessing sorrowfully over a woman was certainly not proper, and in all my relationships I have tried to avoid attachments to this world. During the period of my life leading up to my exile—a time when people at the court were convinced that my fortunes were in decline—I thought things over carefully and concluded that there was nothing in particular to stop me from wandering off deep into the fields and mountains where I could take it on myself to abandon this world. But now in my

8. Poem by Kiyowara no Fukayabu from The Kokinshū: "Because spring comes not to this valley where no light shines, there are no lamentations for the scattering of blossoms."

twilight years, as I near the end of my life. I find myself entangled in bonds that will prove a hindrance to salvation. How frustrating to be weak-willed!"

Though he was speaking of his sorrows in general, the Akashi lady understood with pained sympathy the real reason why he was in such a mood. At that moment he seemed especially miserable to her.

"Even a person," she began, "who in the eyes of ordinary people appears to have nothing at all to regret, may in fact keep many bonds hidden away in their hearts. How could such a person possibly abandon those relationships with an easy conscience? Such ill-advised action would invite criticism for being frivolous and rash. When it comes to making a decision about a matter as serious as renouncing the world, it is best, in my opinion, to take your time, so that in the end you will make a deeply considered choice and bring peace and calm to your heart and mind. From what I know of past examples, they say it is never proper to renounce the world when your heart and mind are unsettled, when things have gone against your wishes and you find the world detestable. In your case, you should resist the impulse to take vows and hold off making such a life-changing decision until the children of the Akashi Empress are grown up and their positions truly secure. I would feel more at ease and happier if you would wait." The Akashi lady looked magnificent as she offered him her mature, sensible advice.

"You may be right," Genji replied, "but the deep wisdom that recommends taking time to think it over before renouncing the world may in fact prove the shallower choice." He went on to share with her things that had been on his mind for a long time. "The spring Fujitsubo passed away I felt just like the poet who wrote about those cherry trees blooming on the plains of Fukakusa.<sup>9</sup> I felt that way because I had seen her when I was young and was deeply moved by her beauty, which was apparent even to the court at large. Being more familiar with her than others, my grief was of course greater at the time of her death, but the special loss I felt was not due simply to our relationship as a man and woman . . . it grew out of feelings that were more complex than that. Now Murasaki has preceded me in death, and it is so hard to forget her that I find no way to console my heart. In this case, too, my grief is not simply the kind that comes when death severs a relationship between husband and wife. No, when I think back over the circumstances that led me to want to raise her from childhood, the way we grew old together, and how, in the end, I was left behind, the grief I feel arises out of all that happened between us and possesses a special quality that makes it too hard to bear. With all of the things that we experienced together—the sad and the sublime, the exquisite and the elegant, the amusing and the delightful—with such memories filling my thoughts, how could my grief be shallow?"

Genji shared his memories and talked about current happenings at the court until late that night. It occurred to him that he should stay with the Akashi lady until dawn, but instead he returned to his own quarters in the southeast residence. She could not help but be moved to sorrow and pity. For his part, he startled himself when he realized what a peculiar change had come over him.

9. Poem by Kamitsuke no Mineo from The Kokinshū: "If the cherry trees on the plains of Fukakusa have any feelings at all, for this year only let them put forth blossoms of mourning gray."

He set about his regular devotions, and in the middle of the night moved to his daytime quarters and lay down temporarily. When morning came, he sent a letter to the Akashi lady:

*Crying on and on, wild geese head north, longing to return . . .
I weep as well, longing to return, but in this sad world
Nothing remains as it was and there is no place to rest*

She had resented his leaving her early the previous night, but seeing how much pain he was in, she realized that he was no longer himself. She put her own feelings aside, tears welling up in her eyes.

*The water in the seedling paddy
Where wild geese once gathered disappears
And with it the flower's reflection*

Her calligraphy was lovely as ever.

For some reason, Genji recalled, Murasaki had never taken to her, though in her final years the two of them recognized their mutual interests and grew friendlier. Still, even after they realized that they were not a threat to each other and were able to establish a trusting relationship, Murasaki remained uncomfortable around her . . . and I was the only one who ever noticed how stiff and formal she was.

Whenever his loneliness became too much for him, Genji would suddenly drop in on the Akashi lady just to talk about everyday matters. Now, however, nothing remained of his former passion, and he showed no inclination to spend the night with her.

From her quarters in the northeast residence Hanachirusato sent new summer robes for the change of season. A poem was attached:

*This day brings the start of the season . . .
Will your heart be filled with memories
As your old robes are exchanged for new*

Genji replied:

*From this day forward, each time I put on these robes Diaphanous as cicada wings, the sorrows
Of this fragile, fleeting world will only deepen*

During the fourth month, on the day of the Kamo Festival, the atmosphere at the Rokujō estate was so tedious that Genji told his female attendants, "It would make all of you feel better if you were to go off to see the sights today." Recalling how the Kamo Shrine looked during the festival, he added, "You will likely feel left out if you don't go. Perhaps it would be best if you returned discreetly to your family homes and then went to the festival from there."

Chūjō was taking a nap on the eastern side of Genji's quarters. When he stepped out and saw her lying there she got up, looking very dainty and adorable. The expression on her face was fresh and bright, and her hair, mussed from sleep, cascaded down and hid her face in a most charming fashion. Her trousers were dyed a scarlet hue tinged with yellow; her singlet was burnt orange and over it was an outer robe of dark gray and black. Her robes were not properly layered, since she had just got up from her nap, and her train and jacket had slipped down. While she casually pulled them back up, Genji picked up some of the sprigs of wild ginger that she had set aside in preparation for the festival. “What are these called?” he asked. “I’ve completely forgotten their name.” Chūjō responded with a poem:

*Gods do not reveal themselves in a vessel choked with weeds
Nor do you show yourself . . . so I adorned my hair with leaves
That promise a tryst, only to find you forgot their name<sup>1</sup>*

She seemed embarrassed as she spoke. Genji realized that what she said was true and felt sorry for her.

*Having now forsaken the things of this world Including the ways of love, is it sinful
Of me to pluck off these leaves of wild ginger*

Apparently Chūjō alone remained an object of Genji’s affection.

With nothing else to do during the fifth month but gaze out at the endless rains of the season, Genji, sinking ever deeper into his brooding thoughts, was overcome with a sense of desolation. It was the tenth day of the month, and Genji’s son was in attendance that evening. There was a rare break in the clouds, and the instant the bright moonlight broke through, the mandarin orange tree, which was then in full bloom, stood out vividly before their eyes. The fragrance of the tree wafted toward them on the breeze, stirring nostalgic memories. As they waited in anticipation for the sound of “the cuckoo’s voice, which calls out for a thousand years,”<sup>2</sup> the clouds gathered again and suddenly took on an ominous appearance. They were startled when a driving rain began to fall and the wind accompanying the rain caused the lamps to flicker and nearly extinguished them. The sky seemed to have turned black. “The sound of the rain at the window.”<sup>3</sup> Genji murmured these and other rather trite, common lines of old verse. Perhaps it was due to the atmosphere of the moment, but his son fervently wished that Murasaki had been there to hear his father’s voice—truly a voice to be heard, as the old poem had it, “from my beloved’s hedge.”<sup>4</sup>

“Things aren’t all that different now that I’m living by myself,” Genji remarked, “but still, I feel strangely alone. Having grown accustomed to this solitary life, I wonder . . . even if I were to live in a hut deep in the mountains, would my heart really grow pure and tranquil?” He then called out to his attendants: “Bring

1. In addition to the oft-used play on the word aoi, the poem refers to a yorube, a sacred vessel containing water used in Shinto rituals to draw a god to its reflection. The comparison of Genji to a deity in this context is sexually suggestive: though the original text is coy, it leaves no doubt that he accepts the invitation, for in his reply poem he plays on the word tsumi, which means both “sin” and “to pluck.”

2. Anonymous poem from The Gosenshū: “I hear the cuckoo’s voice, which calls out for a thousand years amidst the orange blossoms, whose colors remain forever the same.”

3. A reference to a poem included in the collected writings of Bo Juyi, the Tang Poet [editor’s note].

4. The source of the poem is uncertain. It is cited in later commentaries.

food and refreshments here! I suppose it's much too late to summon some men to join us."

Genji's son could tell from the expression on his father's face as he gazed up distractedly toward the skies that the old man was in no mood for entertainment.<sup>5</sup> It was painful to see him in such a state, and he worried that his father's inability to take his mind off Murasaki was a lingering attachment that would make it difficult for him to purify and calm his heart. It occurred to him that if he himself found it so hard to forget Murasaki after only the briefest glimpse of her, how much more difficult must it be for his father?

"It seems like she left us only yesterday," he said, "but the first anniversary is already upon us. What sort of memorial service have you planned?"

Genji replied, "I don't plan to do anything out of the ordinary. This would be the right time to dedicate the mandala of Amida's paradise that she commissioned. She also had a large number of sutras prepared, and before she died she explained what she wanted done for the dedication to that bishop . . . I've forgotten his name . . . anyway, he knows what to do. If there are other details that need to be seen to, I'll just have to go along with whatever bishop what's-his-name recommends."

"She put a lot of thought into arranging these things ahead of time, and they'll certainly be a comfort to her in the afterlife. When I think back on it now, she was destined not to live long in this world, which makes it all the more regrettable that she left behind no children to remember her by."

"That may be," Genji said, "but of all my women, even those who are destined to live a long life, only a few gave me children. In that regard, I consider myself unlucky. It is you, my son, with all of your daughters, who will ensure that our family line flourishes."

Cognizant of his own tendency to break down over every little thing—a weakness he found difficult to conceal—Genji tried to avoid bringing up the past very often. Just then, the cuckoo that they had been waiting for gave a faint cry. Upon hearing it, Genji was unusually moved and whispered a line of verse: "How could it have known?"

*Is it yearning for the one who is gone
That leads you back here, O mountain cuckoo
Soaked by a sudden evening shower*

Genji looked up ever more intently into the sky.

His son replied:

*Take this message with you, mountain cuckoo
To one who is beloved of me . . . tell her
The orange tree at home is in full bloom*

Many of the women in attendance also composed poems, but I shall refrain from setting them down here. Genji's son stayed on in service—a task that he

5. Poem by Sakai no Hitozane from The Kokinshū: "The vaulting heavens are no memento for the lady I loved . . . why then, should I gaze distractedly up at the sky each time I long for you?"

assumed from time to time because he felt sorry that his lonely father was now sleeping by himself. He had many memories associated with these bedchambers—a place familiar to him now, but one that had been off limits while Murasaki was alive.

The following month, during the hottest season of the year, Genji stayed in a room cooled by the nearby pond. Looking at the lotus blooming profusely, the dew covering the many flowers brought back a line from a poem by Lady Ise: “How can there be so many tears?” He remained distracted, lost in his thoughts until the sun went down. Amidst the shrill cries of the cicadas, he sat by himself observing the pinks in the garden, which were aglow in the slanting light at sunset.<sup>6</sup> But they were no comfort to him.

*Do these cicadas take this summer day
A day I pass in idleness and tears
As a pretext for incessant crying*

Swarms of fireflies reminded Genji of a line spoken by the Emperor in Bai Juyi’s Song of Everlasting Sorrow:<sup>7</sup> “Here in the evening pavilion fireflies flit about, and I long for Yang Guifei.” Reciting lines like this from old Chinese verse had now become habitual for him.

*They at least know it is night, these flickering fireflies . . .
But because my grief and sorrow are with me always
I can no longer distinguish between night and day*

The seventh day of the seventh month arrived, and with it the festival of Tanabata. Genji did not have the heart to celebrate with the customary composition of verses in Chinese and Japanese. He did not call for music, but instead whiled away the time by gazing outside in idle reverie. There were no attendants to observe the meeting of the two celestial lovers, the weaver maiden and the oxherd. Late at night, Genji arose by himself in the dark and pushed open the hinged door at the corner of the hall. Dew had drenched the garden just below the veranda. He passed through the door into the walkway and, after looking around, went outside.

*I look up to observe the heavenly lovers
But their tryst belongs to a world beyond the clouds
In this garden of parting, only dew remains*

* * *

6. Poem by Sosei from The Kokinshū: “Am I the only one who finds them moving . . . these Japanese pinks aglow in the light of sunset when crickets cry?”

7. Known in this anthology as “The Song of Lasting Regret.”

From Chapter XLV

Hashihime

THE DIVINE PRINCESS AT UJI BRIDGE

In those days a certain aging prince of the blood, Hachinomiya<sup>8</sup> was living in obscurity, no longer counted as a member of court society. His mother was from a most distinguished family, and at one point there was hope that he might be named Crown Prince and attain the heights of glory. His circumstances, however, changed with the coming of a new sovereign, and as a consequence of certain incidents, he was censured and the court turned its back on him. All traces of his earlier aspirations faded. In the end, his supporters withdrew one after another, their hearts filled with bitter resentment, and he was left with no one to turn to either in public or in private. It seemed that he was utterly abandoned.

His principal wife was the daughter of a Minister who served long ago. Hachinomiya's many trials and tribulations left her feeling sad and forlorn whenever she recalled the ambitions her parents had for her, and yet she found comfort from the woes of the world in the intimate, unrivaled bond she shared with her husband over the years. Their mutual devotion was truly extraordinary.

Though they were married for many years, they had no children, and Prince Hachinomiya would often wistfully express his hope that somehow they might have an adorable child to relieve their loneliness and boredom. Then, miraculously, a beautiful little girl was born to them. Their joy was boundless, and they did everything they could to love and care for her. Soon after, Hachinomiya's wife was pregnant again; and though they wanted their second child to be a boy, they had another girl. Sadly, the mother suffered terribly from the effects of the birth and died. Her husband was in a state of shock and grief.

I have lived in a world that has brought me nothing but a surfeit of unbearable sorrows, Hachinomiya told himself, but my attachment to the beauty and grace of the woman I loved kept me fettered to it . . . and now it's come to this. I'm on my own again, and the loneliness and tedium I suffer will be more intense than ever. Trying to raise two small daughters, constrained by my position as a Prince . . . I shall look a proper fool, utterly pathetic!

He considered acting on his deepest wish by taking vows and renouncing the world, but he struggled terribly with the decision, hesitant to leave behind two girls who had no one to look after them. As he wavered, the months and years passed, and before he knew it, his daughters had grown to womanhood, lovely and ideal in looks and demeanor and a constant source of comfort to him.

The attendants who waited on the younger child did not serve her with wholehearted devotion and were always whispering among themselves, "Really now, her birth was so inauspicious!" Her mother, however, had been deeply concerned over the little girl's future, which preoccupied her thoughts even when she was on the verge of death, fading in and out of consciousness. "Have pity and look on her background is explained. I am introducing the name here in this fashion as a matter of convenience.

8. Hachinomiya means "the Eighth Prince." It is not in the original text at this point, but appears later when more of Hachinomiya's

as a memento of me," she pleaded with her husband over and over. Thus, despite his resentment that the birth of the child had broken the karmic bond he shared with his wife from a previous life, he accepted that his beloved's death was meant to be. Remembering that his wife had begged him to the very end to look after and cherish the girl, he treated his second daughter as a precious treasure.

This younger girl was truly beautiful—so much so that it made people uneasy, since her looks might be ill-omened. Her older sister was quiet and thoughtful by nature, nobly refined and attractive in both appearance and manner. Of the two, the younger sister created the stronger impression as a woman of distinguished aristocratic lineage—a lady whom people were inclined to treat with tender favor. Their father, however, looked after each of them with equal consideration, though there were many things that he could not do for them given his straitened circumstances. As the years went by, his residence grew increasingly desolate, and the attendants, despairing of the bleak prospects facing their young mistresses, found the situation intolerable and began to leave one after another, scattering to other households. The younger sister's nurse, who had been selected without much consideration during the turmoil that followed the death of the mother, was a woman of shallow sensibility—as one might have expected given her breeding and low status—and she abandoned her charge when the girl was still quite young. As a result, the Prince had to bring her up entirely on his own.

The Prince's estate at the time was extensive and eye catching, and the vistas created by the pond and the landscaped hills in the garden remained as lovely as ever—except that now the garden was terribly overgrown. He would spend his idle days gazing out in reverie at the scene, but because there was no longer anyone on his household staff who could properly take care of the grounds, they were neglected. Lush green grasses and weeds grew in thick profusion while shinobugusa ferns,<sup>9</sup> whose very name makes one long for the past, spread under the eaves as though they were taking possession of the place. The colors and fragrances of the flowers of each season or of the autumn foliage often brought him comfort, since he had once enjoyed them with his beloved wife. However, as his estate grew ever more deserted and lonely and there were fewer and fewer people he could rely upon, he began to spend all of his time on his religious devotions, fastidiously looking after the decorations for the altar in his meditation hall.

He was frustrated that his circumstances bound him to the world against his wishes, and could only assume that the obstacles he faced in fulfilling his desire to renounce it all were the effects of his karmic destiny. As time went by, he grew ever more detached from relationships with women. At this point in my life, he wondered, why should I act like other men and marry again? He became a hermit in spirit. After losing his beloved wife, it never occurred to him—not even as an idle fancy—to give himself over to normal human emotions.

There were some who reproached him for his behavior: "Why must you insist on remaining alone? You certainly experienced more than a normal share of grief when your wife passed away, but to continue to dwell on your loss after all this time . . . well, you ought to show consideration for others and remarry like any other man. If you did, your neglected villa, which is an unsightly mess, would be in good shape in no time.” He had many such reasonable suggestions from people here and there hoping to establish a connection with an imperial prince, but he paid no attention to any of their proposals.

9. Literally, "ferns of nostalgic longings."

Between periods of meditation and prayer, Hachinomiya would relax with his daughters; because they were getting older, he taught them how to play the koto and engaged them in trivial pastimes such as Go and hentsugi.<sup>1</sup> Observing the character of his daughters, he could see that the older sister was refined, serious and contemplative. The younger girl was sweet and gentle, and her shy, deferential air was most endearing. Each had distinctive merits.

* * *

A saintly ascetic who was a master of esoteric Buddhism lived in the mountains at Uji. He had a reputation as a most learned man, but he remained secluded and hardly ever appeared at court. When he learned that a prince of the blood was living alone nearby, doing noble religious practices and studying sutras, he thought him admirable and visited regularly. The ascetic elucidated the deeper meaning of the texts that Prince Hachinomiya had been studying for many years, bringing him to greater awareness of the vain mutability of the world. Despite his spiritual progress, Hachinomiya had to explain to the ascetic why he had not chosen the path of renunciation. “Though my heart is set on rebirth in the next world, where I may take my seat on the lotus and dwell in the unsullied pond of paradise, I am too anxious about leaving behind my young daughters to take priestly vows just yet.”

As it turned out, this very same ascetic would, from time to time, travel to the capital to teach Retired Emperor Reizei about scripture and doctrinal matters. On one such occasion, after answering questions Reizei posed concerning the profound sutras they were reading, he took advantage of the opportunity to mention Hachinomiya.

“The Prince is very wise,” the ascetic remarked, “and has gained a deep understanding of the teachings of the Buddha.<sup>2</sup> I believe he was truly born to follow the path of enlightenment . . . a saintly man who is sincerely dedicated to his devotions.”

“But is it true that he has not yet become a priest?” Reizei asked. “The young men here refer to him as the earthbound saint . . . a most poignant situation.”

Kaoru happened to be in service to Reizei at that moment and privately pondered what was being discussed: I myself know full well the insipid nature of the world, but my practice of religious austerities is hardly enough to draw the attention of others. To my shame, I thoughtlessly let the time pass. He listened intently to the conversation, wondering how it was that a man could become saintly while still living in this vulgar world.

“He originally intended to take priestly vows,” the ascetic remarked, “but, as he once lamented to me, some trivial matters held him back, and now he finds that he cannot possibly abandon his poor daughters.” Holy man though he was

1. This game is mentioned in the Aoi chapter. It involves writing down radicals or parts of a Chinese character and trying to guess the whole character.

2. The text uses the word naikyō, literally,

“inner teachings,” to distinguish Buddhism from the “outer teachings,” gaikyō, which refers mainly to Confucian works. The use of this word reinforces Hachinomiya’s political fecklessness and his otherworldly preoccupations.

the ascetic was a connoisseur of the finer things. “When his daughters perform in concert,” he added, “their captivating music vies with the sound of the rapids, putting one in mind of paradise!”

This praise of the young princesses had an old-fashioned ring to it that made Reizei smile.

“One would imagine that having grown up in the house of such a saintly man they would have been completely unfamiliar with secular diversions,” he said. “What a delight to hear otherwise. He can’t very well abandon them, being so worried about their future . . . apparently, he has a very difficult problem on his hands. If it happens that I should outlive him, even for a brief time, I wonder . . . would he give his daughters to me?”

Reizei was—or so people thought—the tenth son of the old Emperor, and thus Hachinomiya’s younger half brother. He recalled the example of the cloistered Third Princess, whose father, Suzaku, had placed her in Genji’s care. If only I could have his daughters . . . they would be companions to me in my idleness.

Kaoru’s thoughts were focused not on the two princesses at Uji, as might have been expected of a young man, but on their father. He now wanted more than ever to meet and observe someone whose state of mind seemed so utterly devoted to religious practices. As the ascetic was preparing to return to his mountain retreat, Kaoru spoke to him and requested his help in arranging a visit. “I very much want to go there and study under Prince Hachinomiya’s guidance, so please make some discreet inquiries on my behalf.”

Reizei sent a message to Hachinomiya: “I have heard through an intermediary about the conditions in which you are living and have been greatly moved.”

*Though my heart, weary of this tiresome world
Travels to the Uji mountains, the veil
Of eightfold clouds you’ve drawn obscures my view*

The ascetic sent Reizei’s messenger on ahead, and so the man reached Hachinomiya first. It was a rare occurrence for anyone, let alone a messenger from such a distinguished figure, to visit this humble abode in the shadow of the mountains. Hachinomiya was overjoyed and welcomed the man in a suitable manner, plying him with wine and local delicacies. He then composed his reply:

*I did not cut all ties to purify my heart
It’s just that I grew weary of this world of woe
And made a home of this but in Ujiyama<sup>3</sup>*

Because Hachinomiya refused to consider himself an enlightened holy man, it was clear that he harbored lingering resentments against the world. Reizei was deeply affected by the reply.

The ascetic conveyed to Hachinomiya Kaoru’s profound desire to follow the path of the Buddha: “The young man told me that he has had an abiding inter-

3. Hachinomiya’s poem alludes to a poem by Kisen from The Kokinshū. The play on Uji/ushi will become a dominant, recurring element throughout the final chapters of the narrative. However, this poem also suggests that Hachinomiya did not voluntarily choose to follow the religious path at Uji and thus hints at a lingering bitterness that Reizei picks up on immediately [editor’s note].

est since childhood in acquiring knowledge of the holy scriptures, but so long as he remains unavoidably caught up in the mundane world, he will be kept busy day and night with public and private matters. He said that someone as unimportant as he should have no cause to feel constrained about turning his back on the world, shutting himself away and studying. And yet his current lifestyle naturally causes him to neglect his devotions and give himself up to worldly diversions. That's why he spoke so earnestly to me, saying that after hearing about the admirable life you lead, he was eager to turn to you for religious guidance."

Hachinomiya replied at length: "Normally, the realization of the truth of mutability and the beginnings of an aversion to this world can be traced to some moment when a person suffers a reversal of fortune that makes him resentful and motivates him to pursue the path of religious devotion. It is thus remarkable that a young man like Kaoru, who has everything he wants, who has known no disappointments, should be so focused on the afterlife. In my case, perhaps it was destined that I should come to detest the world and turn to religion, as though the Buddha were giving me special encouragement. In the course of things, I was able to fulfill my wish to quietly practice my devotions; but now I sense that my life will soon come to an end without ever achieving any true spiritual enlightenment after all this time. Kaoru will be a companion in the study of the Dharma, but one who will put me to shame, since I'm all too aware that I've learned nothing of the past and future." He exchanged letters with Kaoru, and the young man set out to visit him.

In truth, the scene was even more poignantly desolate than what the ascetic had described. The villa was so simple and severe that it reminded Kaoru of a hermit's temporary grass hut. Other residences may be referred to in similar terms as mountain villas, but those are places of repose with their own special charms. Here, the violent roar of the rapids and crashing of waves made it seem impossible that one could forget one's cares, and with the fierce howling of the wind at night, there would not have been a moment to dream peaceful dreams. The appearance of the place moved Kaoru to speculate that Hachinomiya, who was determined to find enlightenment, may have found it easier to renounce the world in this environment, which had nothing appealing about it that might distract his attention from his devotions. But what do his daughters think about it? It's certainly a far remove from the gentle, feminine places where princesses usually reside.

A single sliding door separated the chapel from the daughters' quarters. Given the alluring atmosphere, a young man of amorous proclivities would have wanted to make advances to see how the young women might respond and thus find out what they were like. Kaoru, however, checked himself, thinking that to engage in suggestively playful banter would undermine the true purpose of his visit. After all, he had come to this place deep in the mountains with the intention of turning away from worldly desires. Thus, he sensitively focused on expressing his concern for Hachinomiya's difficult circumstances, and continued thereafter to visit again and again. Despite maintaining his connection with the vulgar world, Hachinomiya had gained profound insight from pursuing religious studies and austerities in his mountain retreat, and, just as Kaoru had hoped, he humbly shared his wisdom without ever flaunting his knowledge.

There are many holy men and learned priests in the world, but virtuous men at the rank of bishop or abbot are often officious and aloof. They are always busy, and so they tend to be curt and blunt in manner. Kaoru found them much too pompous and overweening to ask them to clearly explain the meanings and workings of things in the world. There were also disciples of Buddha, men at a much lower rank who had accrued great merit by practicing austerities and upholding the Precepts, but they were usually vulgar in appearance, rough in speech and uncouthly familiar in comportment. Kaoru was usually occupied with official duties during the daytime and had time to reflect on profound subjects only during the quiet evening hours. He thus found it altogether unpleasant to summon such boorish disciples close to his bedchambers to discuss the teachings. In contrast, Hachinomiya was truly refined and ennobled by his suffering. The words and expressions he used when discussing the teachings of the Buddha that the bishops and disciples lectured on were simpler and more familiar to Kaoru. Moreover, though he had not achieved an especially profound understanding of the scriptures, as a man whose karmic destiny was to be born a prince of the blood he had an unusually fine, innate grasp of the true nature of the world. The two men gradually grew closer. Kaoru began to wish he could be with his mentor all the time and longed to meet him during those periods when he was busy at court and could not go to Uji.

Reizei could see how highly Kaoru esteemed Prince Hachinomiya, and so he too began sending a constant stream of messages to Uji. Hardly a word had been spoken about Hachinomiya for years, but now gradually more and more visitors found their way to his lonely, desolate abode. Reizei would on appropriate occasions honor him with messages inquiring after his well-being, and Kaoru would take every opportunity to be of faithful service, seeing to both elegant celebrations and more serious, practical matters. In this way, three years passed.

It happened in late autumn, The seasonal Invocation of the Holy Name was at hand, and because the roar of the rapids at the fishing weir had been especially grating recently, Hachinomiya went up to the meditation hall at the temple where the ascetic lived to spend a week practicing his devotions.

While their father was gone, the two sisters felt more forlorn, bored, and depressed than ever. Kaoru, remembering that he had not called at Uji in some time, very discreetly set out during the wee hours of the night just as the pre-dawn moon was rising. He had a very small escort and was dressed in a manner that would disguise his identity.

Because Hachinomiya's villa was on the near bank of the river, there was no need to arrange for a boat. Kaoru traveled on horseback; the closer he got to Uji, the denser the fog grew. As he made his way through undergrowth thick enough to obscure the path, he struggled against a fierce wind that shook the dew from the leaves of the trees. He was thoroughly soaked and chilled to the bone, but he couldn't complain, since he was the one who decided to come here. Having hardly ever set out on this sort of adventure, he felt sad and exhilarated at the same time.

*How much stranger than the dew dropping from leaves
Helpless in the blasts sweeping down the mountain
Are these tears of mine that fall so easily*

He ordered his escort to be quiet lest they awaken some meddlesome mountain peasant. He also took care to minimize the clapping of his horse as he cut through fences of brush wattle or waded through murmuring streams. However, for all his caution, he could not disguise his fragrance, which was carried on the wind. At house after house people startled awake, wondering, Whose fragrance do I smell?<sup>4</sup>

As they neared the villa they heard chillingly sublime music, though they could not tell what the instruments were. I have heard that Hachinomiya always plays in this manner, but I have never had the chance to hear his koto, so famous for its tonal beauty. What a stroke of luck that I should arrive at this moment! With such thoughts in mind, Kaoru entered and realized that he had been hearing a biwa lute. The instrument was tuned to the ōshikī mode,<sup>5</sup> and though the song was an ordinary prelude used for tuning, in such a setting it had an otherworldly feel: the sound produced by the plectrum was pure and enchanting. A thirteen-string koto could be heard accompanying the biwa intermittently, and its graceful, feminine tone was deeply affecting.

He had concealed himself since he wanted to listen a while longer, but then a man—a guard or watchman of some sort who had clearly heard Kaoru's arrival—stepped out brusquely. "My lord has gone into retreat for certain reasons," the man said. "I shall have a messenger inform him that you are here."

"There's no need to bother with that," Kaoru replied. "I really mustn't intrude on him during the limited number of days he has to practice his devotions. It would, however, be a shame if after having drenched my robes getting here I should have to go back disappointed that it was all for naught. Please inform your mistresses about my situation . . . it would be some consolation to hear at least a word of pity from them."

A knowing smile spread over the man's unattractive face. "As you wish, my lord," he said, and started back inside.

"Wait a moment!" Kaoru called the man back. "I've heard from various people over the years how well the Prince's daughters play together and have been eager to hear them. This is a welcome chance for me. Is there no hidden corner nearby where I might conceal myself for a short time? I don't want my unexpected appearance to make them stop."

Even someone of rough, common sensibilities like the watchman could recognize from Kaoru's features and overall appearance that he was a remarkably impressive person—this despite his being dressed in hunting robes.

"They play all the time," the watchman informed him, "mornings and evenings when no one is around to hear them. But whenever someone calls from the capital, even a person of lower rank, they refuse to play at all. In fact, our lord has largely kept the presence of his daughters a secret, and he has made it clear that he does not want us to tell anyone that they live here."

Kaoru smiled and replied, "It's deplorable of Prince Hachinomiya to hide them away. Everyone praises him as a rare exemplar of virtue, yet here he is, behaving secretly. Be that as it may, take me to where I may listen to them. My intentions are strictly honorable. How very strange that they should be living like this . . . in truth, they can hardly be considered normal."

4. Poem by Sosei from The Kokinshū: "Whose fragrance do I smell? Someone has hung his purple trousers over mistflowers in the autumn fields."

5. This mode is equivalent to the key of A.

"As you wish, my lord. Were I to refuse, I would be criticized afterward as a man of no judgment." So saying, he showed Kaoru to a spot in the garden in front of the residence that was closed off by a fence made of a lattice of bamboo. The watchman then called the escort into a gallery in the west hall and received them there himself.

A gate in the wattle fence appeared to lead to the residence beyond, and so Kaoru pushed it open a crack and peeked through. Gazing across the misty garden, enchanting in the pale light of the moon, he could see the two sisters sitting just inside their raised blinds. A page girl was seated on the veranda, looking thin and cold in her soft, shabby robe. Several grown-up attendants were sitting there as well, dressed in a similar manner. The sisters were seated inside in the aisle room. One of them was partially hidden behind a pillar. A biwa lute was set out in front of her and she was turning over the plectrum with her fingertips, toying with it. When the moon suddenly emerged from behind a cloud and brightly lit up the scene, she said, "I may not have a fan, but I can still call forth the moon with this."<sup>6</sup> The lovely glow of her face, which peeked out from behind the plectrum, was utterly adorable.

The other sister, who was reclining nearby, was leaning over a koto. "I've heard of people calling forth the setting sun,"<sup>7</sup> she said, "but you are certainly prone to some peculiar notions!" She was smiling, and her figure seemed a little more dignified and modestly refined.

"Even if this plectrum can't call forth the moon," her sister retorted, "that doesn't mean the biwa and the moon aren't connected!"<sup>8</sup> Their silly, sisterly exchanges touched Kaoru with their warmth and charm. They were not at all what he had imagined earlier from his distant vantage. Though he would on occasion hear younger ladies-in-waiting reading romances handed down from the past—stories that invariably included scenes involving characters like these two sisters—he himself had always remained skeptical, doubtful that such things could ever actually take place in real life. Yet here he was, finding himself irresistibly drawn to these young women. It's true . . . remarkable things really do occur in out-of-the-way places in this world!

Because the fog was thick, he could not make the princesses out all that clearly. Just as he was hoping the moon would emerge from behind the clouds

6. Quotation from the Japanese and Chinese Poems for Recitation 587: "We raise a fan to call forth the moon, hidden behind mountain ranges; winds blow through the empty heavens, and we know them by the swaying trees." This allusion is especially noteworthy because the source of the verse is the Zhi guan (On Cessation and Contemplation) by the Chinese monk Chih-I (538–597), which was an important Tendai Buddhist text on meditation. The moon and wind stand for truth, which may be blocked from view or invisible to humankind until some evidence, expedient teaching, or symbol (such as a moon-shaped fan, or in this case a plectrum) makes them evident. Murasaki Shikibu is remarkably consistent in fitting poetic allusions to a narrative situation, and here she has the younger daughter cite a verse that reveals the extent of the unusual influence of her religious father.

7. The playful reference here is to a Chinese-style bugaku dance called "The Masked Warrior King" (cf. the Wakana chapter, Part 2). As part of the dance a rod or baton was lifted toward the sun.

8. The plectrum could be stored by slipping it into a space between the tailpiece (fukujū, the piece of the instrument on the bottom front of the soundboard where the strings are attached) and the face of the soundboard. Beneath the tailpiece was a round acoustic hole called the "hidden moon" or "dark moon" (ingetsu), and so the younger sister is defending her poetic allusion by stressing a figurative relationship between the plectrum and the moon.

again, it appeared that someone stepped out from the interior of the residence and announced the arrival of a visitor, for the blinds were lowered immediately and everyone moved back inside. Neither sister look flustered; their quiet, gentle movements as they concealed themselves without so much as a rustle of their robes created an impression of endearing feminine softness, and he found their extreme elegance and courtly grace alluring.

Kaoru silently withdrew and then had a messenger rush back to the capital with orders to bring a carriage.

"I came at an inconvenient time," he told the homely watchman, "but as things turned out, my visit has given me joy and some small comfort from my cares. Inform your lord's daughters that I have arrived . . . and do be sure to let them know just how soaked I am as a result of my exertions." The man went off and delivered the message.

The two princesses, who never imagined that they might be spied on like this, were terribly embarrassed when they realized that Kaoru had possibly overheard their casual conversation. The breeze had earlier carried in a mysteriously wonderful fragrance, but because they had noticed it at an hour when a visitor was unlikely, they had not been at all alarmed. Their carelessness made them feel ashamed, and they didn't know what to do.

The attendant who was to deliver his message requesting an audience with the princesses struck Kaoru as much too young and inexperienced for the task. He thought that timing was crucial in all matters, and because the fog had not cleared yet, he took advantage of the moment to stride over to a spot in front of the blinds and kneel there. The unsophisticated young attendants had no idea what to say to him and seemed ill at ease even offering a cushion.

"It's discomfiting to be left outside these blinds," Kaoru said. "If my heart were really impulsive and shallow, would I have bothered traveling the rugged mountain path all the way here? This is a most peculiar welcome, I must say. Still, I would hope that if I were to come through the drenching dews over and over, you might at least recognize the sincerity of my feelings." He spoke in a genuinely earnest manner.

Not one of the younger attendants was capable of a smooth, coherent response—indeed, they felt so awkward and embarrassed that they wanted to disappear. As a result, some time passed while they went to wake up the more experienced women. The older sister, uncomfortable that the delay in replying would create the impression that they were teasing Kaoru, spoke up at last. "We are, as you can tell, inexperienced in such matters, so how could we pretend to know how to answer you?" She spoke in a hushed, reserved tone, her voice noble and gracious.

"I realize that it's customary for a woman to pretend that she knows nothing of the aching sorrow in a man's heart, even when she is all too aware of his feelings. But it's especially disappointing that you in particular should feign complete ignorance about me. I imagine that, since you reside in the house of a remarkable, enlightened man, you too have a clear understanding of the world. Thus, it would be best to use your wisdom to judge the depth or shallowness of my feelings, which are too powerful for me to keep hidden any longer. Must you cut me off, believing I am driven by wanton passions? There are some who have urged me to be more amorously inclined, but I stalwartly refuse to yield to such temptations. Reports about me must no doubt have reached you. How happy it would make me if I could turn to you as a companion, one who would listen in sympathy to my stories about tedious court society, or if you would come to trust me enough that I in turn could provide a diversion from your feelings of isolation and brooding sorrow." He said many other things besides. She, being diffident, found it hard to answer him and left it instead to an old attendant who had just been roused from sleep to respond in her place.

This older woman, who was known as Bennokimi, was anything but reticent.

"Really, now . . . this is unacceptable. How rude to leave his lordship seated in such a spot! He should be seated inside the blinds! These young women . . . they know nothing about protocol."

The two sisters felt ill at ease, since the voice speaking so bluntly was that of an old woman.

"It is exceedingly strange, you see," Bennokimi continued, "but due to the circumstances of my young mistresses' father, who is no longer counted as one who resides in this world, we receive neither visits nor expressions of concern from those people one might assume would still remember him. That's why your unexpected devotion to my lord is so moving, even to the heart of someone as insignificant as I am. My young mistresses feel grateful to you as well . . . it's just that they are shy and have a hard time expressing their emotions."

* * *

From Chapter XLVII

Agemaki

A BOWKNOT TIED IN MAIDEN'S LOOPS

* * *

Bennokimi informed Kaoru of all her mistress had said. What is driving the Princess to turn her back on the world like this? he wondered. Did she learn the truth of the world's mutability at the side of her saintly father? Because her heart seemed all the more in tune with his own, he could not despise her as someone who was making a pretense of her wisdom. "If that's how she feels," he said, "then naturally she would think it improper to see me now, even with a blind or curtain between us. But, come now . . . find some place where I may discreetly enter her private chambers." On hearing his words, Bennokimi set about complying with his orders. She dismissed most of the attendants early and told those ladies-in-waiting who were in on the plot to make preparations.

A little later that evening, the wind suddenly picked up and blew violently, causing the crude, rickety shutters to rattle and squeak. Kaoru was certain that the Princess would not be able to hear him enter her chambers because of all the noise, and so Bennokimi stealthily led him there. The old attendant was concerned that the Middle Counselor might make a mistake, since her mistresses were in the same room. However, the princesses were accustomed to sleeping together, and it might have seemed odd to ask them to retire to separate quarters. Besides, Bennokimi assumed that Kaoru was well enough acquainted with the sisters not to confuse them.

As it turned out, the older Princess was wide awake, fearful that something was afoot. As soon as she heard Kaoru enter, she quietly got up to make her escape, hurriedly slipping out through the curtains around her bedding. She felt terrible for her sister, who was innocently sleeping away, and it broke her heart to imagine what would happen. If only we could hide together, she thought—but it was too late to go back now. Trembling, she looked on in the dim, flickering lamplight as Kaoru, wearing only a single under robe, lifted one of the panels on the standing curtains and entered their bedchamber with an impudent expression, as if the place belonged to him. How dreadful! What must my sister be thinking?

With these thoughts running through her mind, she opened up a folding screen along the front of a crumbling wall and withdrew behind it, where she sat feeling miserable and uncomfortable. It was deeply upsetting to think that her sister, who had vehemently deplored the very idea of a future as wife of the Middle Counselor, might now mistakenly think she had planned this shocking tryst and hate her for it. As she reflected sadly that all of their troubles stemmed from having been left behind in this world with no one to support them, she had the sensation that she had last seen her father's figure departing for his retreat up the mountain only just this evening. She was filled with longing and grief.

When Kaoru entered the chambers and saw a woman sleeping alone, his heart leapt with joy, since it appeared that everything was going according to plan. But then it gradually became apparent that the woman was not the Princess he desired, but someone slightly more beautiful and alluring in appearance. Her shock and desperation as she startled from her slumbers made it clear that she had absolutely no idea what was happening, and he was moved to sympathy at her plight. At the same time, he was extremely angry, provoked by the callous behavior of the older sister who had fled into hiding. Though he could hardly deny that he was attracted to the younger Princess and did not want her to go to another man, he was nonetheless frustrated that his true desires were being denied. I don't want the Princess to think I'm a man of fickle, shallow character, but I have no choice but to spend the night here. If it's my destiny after all to end up with the younger sister instead, well . . . it's not as though she's a complete stranger to me. With those thoughts in mind, he regained his composure and, behaving the same way he did that earlier night with the Princess he loved, he did not force himself on her sister, but passed the time engaging in gentle, courtly conversation until dawn broke.

The older attendants, thinking that they had given the couple more than ample time, were just then questioning one another:

"Where has our younger mistress gone? This is very strange!"

"Oh well . . . she must have gone off for some reason. I'm sure she's fine."

Marriage proposals aside, Kaoru's remarkably splendid, attractive features and figure were enough to make the attendants feel their wrinkles would disappear just by gazing at him. One old woman, a toothless hag given to making unpleasant remarks, said, "Why must our older mistress be so aloof toward him? Perhaps she's been possessed by one of those fearsome gods that people always seem to be going on about."

"Really, now, watch what you say . . . such inauspicious words! Why would some spirit possess her? She acts like this because she was brought up far removed from people. With no one to advise her on how to behave appropriately, she feels awkward interacting with others. Just wait . . . once she gets used to having him around, she'll naturally warm to him soon enough."

"I just hope that she warms to him soon . . . I do so wish for her to fulfill her ideal destiny."

While the attendants were talking, they fell asleep one by one, and soon the discordant sounds of snoring and other noises reverberated.

A poet once claimed that the length of an autumn's night is "determined by one's companion."<sup>9</sup> Though this particular night had been awkward, unlike any other he had experienced, Kaoru still felt that the dawn arrived much too quickly. As he gazed at the younger Princess, who looked so fresh and lustrous that he could no longer decide which of the sisters was more attractive to him, he did not want to leave with his desires unsated. "Think lovingly of me as I think of you . . . and never emulate the behavior of one who is cold and heartless." He promised her as he left that they would meet again. It was all like a strange dream to him; while he was composing himself, thinking that he wanted to try again to be with the older Princess who had cruelly rejected him, he returned to his room, just as he had before, and lay down.

Bennokimi entered. "This is most peculiar," she remarked. "Where has my lady gone?" The younger Princess, mortified and dazed, continued to lie there trying to understand how all of this had come about. Recalling what had been said to her the day before, she was bitterly aggrieved by her sister's cruel scheming.

With the coming light of day the "cricket" emerged from her hiding place in the wall. She pitied her sister and was all too aware of how she must feel. The two of them could not bring themselves to speak to one another. The older Princess's thoughts were in chaos. Now that we've both been exposed to his gaze, we've lost our air of mystery . . . what misery! From now on, we will never be able to relax or let down our guard.

Bennokimi went over to the room where Kaoru was staying and learned about her mistress's shockingly stubborn rejection. The lady was too particular, given to brooding too deeply over her situation—so much so, indeed, that she made herself hateful. Bennokimi was stunned and most sorry for the Middle Counselor.

"Even when she rejected me before," Kaoru said, "I took comfort in thinking that there was still some hope that I might somehow persuade her . . . but what happened last night was utter humiliation. I ought to throw myself in the river. After observing just how troubled Hachinomiya was by the prospect of abandoning his daughters and leaving them on their own, I decided it wouldn't do for me to turn my back on this world and abandon them as well. Well, what's done is done . . . I shall never again consider either one of them an object of romantic interest. In return, they must never forget the anguish and bitterness they have caused me to suffer. Prince Niou remains unabashed in his pursuit of the younger sister, and if she were to yield to him I would fully understand

9. Poem by Ōshikōchi Mitsune from The Kokinshū: "How long and endless an autumn night feels has since ancient times been determined by one's companion."

her decision—all things being equal, it seems perfectly natural for her to seek out someone of the highest rank. In fact, her attitude is reasonable, which is why I feel ashamed and have no intention of subjecting myself ever again to the unpleasant, mocking gaze of the women here. I must insist, however, that you never divulge to anyone what a fool I've been." He vented his frustrations, then hurried off much earlier than normal.

"How sad for the both of them," the attendants whispered among themselves.

What happened with him? What if he grows spiteful and turns against my sister as well? The older Princess was brokenhearted, in utter misery. She deplored and resented the meddlesome ways of her women, who always acted against her wishes. While she was turning over these various thoughts in her mind, a letter arrived. She was bemused to find herself so uncharacteristically happy and grateful to receive a message from him. Almost as if he were unaware of the season, he had attached it to a bough covered almost entirely in green leaves, with only a single sprig displaying the crimson foliage of autumn.

*How I long to ask the mountain goddess
Who dyed the same branch different colors
Which one of these two hues is the deeper*

He had controlled the angry resentment that had seemed so evident when he left, concealing it beneath a few words written on a letter wrapped up with an outer sheet of paper. It was obvious that he was prepared to let the incident pass as if nothing had happened, but she felt agitated and uneasy all the same. Her ladies-in-waiting were annoyingly insisting that she must respond, but she was in a quandary and found it difficult to write anything. It was too unpleasant to ask her younger sister to reply, since that would have been a tacit acknowledgment of last night's tryst with the Middle Counselor. And yet, if she herself wrote back, it would be as good as acknowledging her own affair with him. She finally managed the following:

*I know not why the mountain goddess dyed this branch
With two colors . . . but surely the leaves that have changed
Hold the deeper hue that attracts your changing heart*

Though she had casually scribbled her reply, Kaoru was charmed, and his grudge against her faded away.

She has indicated to me over and over that even though as sisters they are two, at heart they are one, and she wants to yield and have me take the younger Princess in her place. Apparently, she's unhappy that I would not accept such an arrangement, and so she devised the scheme that she carried out last night. If her plans come to naught and I remain indifferent toward her younger sister, she may well come to pity her and think me cruelly insensitive . . . if that happens, it will be all the more difficult to win the lady I've truly wanted from the very beginning. Even the old lady-in-waiting who has served as my intermediary will very likely consider me rash and thoughtless. How I regret letting my heart be stained by love's passion . . . I resolved to renounce all attachments to this world, yet I was unable to achieve what I most desired.

Kaoru realized how ridiculous he would look to others. No, it was worse than that . . . he resembled some common lover who rows his laughable little boat back and forth to see the same woman over and over.<sup>1</sup> He spent the entire night lost in such reflections. The next morning, beneath a delightful dawn sky, he went to call on Niou.

After the Sanjō residence of the Third Princess burned down, Kaoru moved with his mother back to the Rokujō estate; because his quarters there were near the rooms Niou used when not at his Nijō villa, he was able to visit the Prince regularly. This arrangement pleased Niou very much. His residence at Rokujō, which was ideal for living a leisurely life untroubled by distractions, looked out from the veranda onto a front garden unlike any other—the same types of flowers grew there as elsewhere, the trees and grasses swayed in similar fashion, and yet somehow their shapes and elegant movements had a special appeal. Even the reflection of pure, clear moonlight in the garden stream looked like something out of an illustration.

Knowing Niou's fondness for such scenes, Kaoru had assumed that his friend would still be up when he arrived, and sure enough, he was. When Kaoru's distinctive scent came wafting in on the breeze, a startled Niou noted his arrival immediately and, putting on a court cloak, properly arranged himself before stepping out to greet his guest. Kaoru showed his respect by stopping partway up the front steps. Niou at once leaned against the railing and, without so much as a word inviting his friend to come up to the veranda, began making small talk. As they were chatting, something reminded Niou of the Uji villa, and he complained bitterly about how his proposal was being handled. His reproaches were a bit much for Kaoru, who was finding it so difficult to satisfy his own desires. Then it occurred to him that having Niou get his way might also work to his advantage by removing an obstacle to courting the older Princess, and so he spoke more openly than usual about what needed to be done.

Fog settled at a most inopportune moment in the predawn darkness. The sky took on a chill aspect, misty clouds obscured the moon, and the shadows of the trees presented an elegant gloominess in the faint light. Reminiscing about the poignant beauty of the Uji villa, Niou insisted to his friend, "You must take me there again in the very near future." Observing the obvious reluctance in Kaoru's expression, he playfully composed the following:

*Are you so petty that you'd rope off
Those wide fields where maidenflowers bloom
In order to keep others away*

Kaoru replied in kind:

*Maidenflowers blooming in morning fields Covered in deep mists may only be seen
By those whose hearts are truly drawn to them<sup>2</sup>*

1. Anonymous poem from The Kokinshū: "I always yearn to go back to the same person, like a little boat that has made its way through the channel and comes rowing home."

2. Poem by Mibu no Tadamine from The Kokinshū: "Is it because maidenflowers find it painful to be viewed by men that they bloom hidden in the autumn mists?" Kaoru's poem mentions the place name Ashitanohara (in modern Nara Prefecture), which I have rendered according to its literal meaning, "morning fields," in keeping with the setting of this scene as a whole. Ashitanohara was famous for maidenflowers, but it was also associated with morning fog.

"These are no ordinary flowers," he added, as if intentionally trying to get a rise out of his friend—and, indeed, Niou was thoroughly irritated, exclaiming, "Ahh . . . how cheeky you are!"<sup>3</sup>

Niou had been talking like this about the younger Uji Princess for several years. Until last night Kaoru had been concerned about her looks, but now he considered it unlikely that Niou would be disappointed in her charms. He had also worried that her breeding and character might not meet expectations when seeing her up close, but evidently she had no flaws that might give cause for regret. He felt sorry for the older Princess, since it seemed unkind to undercut the plans that she was secretly making, but, regardless, he felt that he simply could not transfer his feelings from one sister to the other. If I yield the younger Princess to Niou, neither he nor the woman I love will have any cause to resent me.

Niou, who had no idea what Kaoru was secretly planning in his heart, was railing on about how his friend was selfishly intending to keep both Uji Princesses for himself. Kaoru found this amusing and couldn't resist tweaking his friend by assuming the role of father to the sisters. "It would be most unfortunate were you to cause her to suffer on account of your incorrigible tendency to pursue frivolous affairs."

"All right, then . . . I'll show you," Niou replied earnestly. "I've never been more devoted to anyone."

"That's all fine and well, but neither princess has shown the slightest indication that she's willing to give herself to you. This will be an excruciatingly difficult task to carry out," Kaoru said, then explained in detail just what needed to be done when they traveled together to Uji.

The twenty-eighth day of the month—the final day of the Equinox Festival—happened to be an auspicious one on the calendar. Kaoru, after privately making arrangements, decided that it would be the perfect time to make a secret excursion with Niou to the Uji villa. Niou's heart was so set on the younger Princess that there would have been no end of trouble had his mother, the Akashi Empress, found out about this adventure, for she certainly would have forbidden it. With that risk in mind, Kaoru went about the tricky task of planning the trip, all the while maintaining a nonchalant air, as if nothing out of the ordinary was afoot. The country estate of Genji's son was in the vicinity of Uji, and they had to be cautious and not attract attention when ferrying across the river. The need for secrecy also prompted Kaoru to forego staying over at some grand residence on the way. He chose instead to take Niou quietly to an inconspicuous residence of one of his retainers at a nearby manor, and then to go on to the Uji villa by himself. It was highly unlikely that anyone would notice them, but Kaoru did not want to give away the slightest hint of what he was up to—not even to that homely watchman who occasionally patrolled the grounds of the Uji villa.

As they always did whenever the arrival of the Middle Counselor was announced, the attendants bustled about preparing themselves to receive him. The princesses considered this something of a nuisance, with the older sister thinking, I've made it abundantly clear that he should turn his fragrant atten-

3. Poem by Bishop Henjō from The Kokinshū: "Ahh, how cheeky you are, you maidenflowers standing in autumn fields flaunting your seduc-tive charms . . . but blossoms too will soon fade."

tions to my sister . . . to the leaf that has changed colors. Will he finally come to understand? Meanwhile, the younger sister's thoughts were of a different order. I'm not the one he truly desires, so what does his visit today have to do with me? Still, she felt that she had to be on her guard, since she could no longer just blithely trust her sister—not after what had happened the night the Middle Counselor stole into her bedchambers. Indeed, her distrust was so great, she no longer spoke directly to the older Princess, but communicated through an intermediary. Her women were upset by this break between siblings, and they fretted over how it all might end.

Kaoru had Niou ride to the Uji villa on horseback. He then led him inside under cover of a dark, moonless night and summoned Bennokimi. "I must have a word with your older mistress," he said. "The way she insists on keeping her distance from me is deeply humiliating, but I cannot bring myself to just slink away and leave things between us as they are. I want you to show me to her chambers later this evening, just as you did before." His words struck Bennokimi as sincere, and he seemed to have no hidden motives. Thus, she agreed to go in and speak with the older Princess—after all, from her perspective it hardly mattered which of her mistresses he chose to take for his wife.

When the older Princess was informed of Kaoru's request, she was at once pleased and relieved. Just as I thought . . . he now prefers my sister. She had all of the sliding panel doors between the main chamber and the surrounding aisle rooms securely locked—all of them, that is, except for the ones that led to her younger sister's quarters. After taking that precaution, she received him.

"I must speak briefly with you," Kaoru began, "but it's awkward to have to speak as loudly as this, since others may hear what I have to say. Won't you open the panels just a bit? This is truly maddening."

"I can hear you perfectly well," she replied, leaving the doors locked.

But then she reconsidered. He must feel that he owes it to me to say something, since he has undergone a change of heart and doesn't want to offend me. What harm could it do at this point to see him? It's not like I haven't met him face to face before. It would be unkind of me to let the night pass without responding. With those thoughts in mind, she moved toward him and opened the panels.

At that moment, he reached through, grasped her sleeve, and while pulling on it to keep her from escaping, gave voice to all his complaints. She was mortified and immediately regretted her decision. How dreadful! Why did I ever agree to meet him? Still, she kept her wits and used all of her wiles to try to cajole and convince him to go to her sister instead. "You must not make a distinction, but consider us as one and the same." Kaoru found her demeanor, so sweet and pitiful as she pleaded earnestly with him, deeply affecting.

Niou, meanwhile, was doing just as he had been instructed. He drew near the door that Kaoru had used that earlier night, and then signaled Bennokimi by opening his fan. She showed him the way in, and as he entered he found it delightfully charming that she should be guiding him along a familiar path that another had obviously taken before him.

The older Princess, of course, knew nothing about Niou's presence, and so she continued trying to persuade Kaoru to go to her sister. Kaoru was amused but, at the same time, he felt sorry for her. He also recognized that if he said nothing about what was going on now, she would later come to resent his deception, and he would have no way to absolve himself of blame. He thus concluded that it was best to apprise her of the situation. “Prince Niou followed me tonight, and I was unable to turn him away. Evidently, he was able to enter furtively, without making a sound. That scheming old lady-in-waiting of yours, Bennokimi, has no doubt been speaking with him. Now that I’ve been rejected by both you and your sister, I’m destined to become a laughingstock at court.”

The Princess was blindsided by this appalling turn of events, for it had never crossed her mind that something like this might occur. “I had no idea,” she said, “just how far you were willing to go to carry out such an outrageous scheme. My lack of caution makes it obvious how feckless and naive I truly am, and you must take me for an utter fool.” She was at a loss for words to describe her feelings at that moment.

“Nothing I say would make any difference now,” Kaoru replied. “Even if I offer repeated explanations and apologies, they would not be enough. Go ahead . . . pinch and scratch me if you wish. Apparently, you were holding out hopes for a man of more distinguished lineage than I, but, as I know all too well, karmic destiny does not always work out exactly as our hearts might wish. That’s why I sympathize with you now that Prince Niou has bestowed his affections on your sister . . . for I too am acquainted with the hopelessness that comes with being rejected and cast adrift with no haven. What is to be will be, and you should resign yourself to your fate. No matter how securely you may fasten these panels, no one believes our relationship is pure and chaste. Do you really imagine that the man who asked me to bring him to your sister is, at this moment, bothered by a conscience as full and troubled as ours?”

She was upset beyond words. Nonetheless, as it appeared that he might force the sliding panels open any moment, she maintained her composure, determined to calm his passions. “This ‘karmic destiny’ you speak of . . . it’s not something tangible, not something I can see with my own eyes. I can’t follow what you mean by such words, no matter how much I try. I feel as though a mist arising from tears of uncertainty<sup>4</sup> obscures and obstructs my path ahead. Trying to fathom your intentions toward me is unpleasant, like a bad dream. If future generations should ever speak of my sister and me, no doubt they will cite our story as an example of the foolishness of those easily deceived women who appear so often in ancient tales. Does Prince Niou possess the same degree of judgment and sincerity as someone who’s capable of scheming the way you have? You’ve caused enough anguish and grief . . . don’t confound me further. I don’t expect to live much longer, but if I do, I shall speak to you when I’m feeling somewhat calmer. For now I must retire, since I’m really quite ill . . . it feels as though darkness has swept over me. Let go of my sleeves.”

The reasonableness with which she pleaded with him despite being extremely upset made Kaoru feel at once ashamed of himself and protective. “I have gone to extraordinary lengths to respect and obey your wishes, my beloved . . . so much so that I’ve become obsessed, fixated on you. It seems that you find me inexpressibly despicable and unpleasant, and so there’s nothing I can say to you. More and more, I’ve come to feel that I no longer want to live in this world.”

4. Poem by Minamoto no Wataru from The Gosenshū: “That tears of uncertainty, of not knowing what the future brings, are sorrowful is due simply to the fact that they fall in plain sight”.

He paused for a moment, then continued." Very well, then, since you are ill I shall let go . . . but please let me speak with you through your blinds. Do not completely abandon me."

When he released her sleeves, the Princess withdrew toward the interior of the room, but not all the way. Kaoru was moved by her gesture and said, "I shall spend the night here taking consolation from the fact that you have remained this near to me. It is more than I dared dream of, and so I swear I shall do nothing untoward." The roar of the rapids kept him awake, and a storm that raged in the middle of the night made him feel like a pheasant sleeping apart from his mate.<sup>5</sup> In that state of mind, he spent the night sleepless till dawn.

* * *

When the older Princess overheard her women gossiping, she felt her chest tighten in despair. My sister's bond with Prince Niou is broken for good. So long as he had yet to decide on some distinguished lady to be his principal wife, he was probably content to use my sister as his plaything. He was no doubt mindful of what Kaoru and others might think of him, and so he offered up an endless string of pretty words professing his deep devotion. She was convinced of Niou's deceitfulness. But that hardly mattered now, for who was she to resent his cruelty, given her own failures? More and more, she felt that there was no haven for her in this world, and she collapsed facedown, weeping.

In her frail condition, the Princess increasingly felt as though she should no longer go on living in this world. Although her attendants were not of such high status that she was ever constrained or awkward in their presence, it would be too painful to bear if they knew that she had overheard their gossip about Prince Niou's marriage. And so she lay down to sleep, pretending that she had heard nothing.

The younger Princess was napping, which apparently is something one does when longing for someone. It was adorable the way she slept with her arm as a pillow, her hair gathered at her head. The older Princess continued gazing at her sister's surpassing features; she grieved as her father's words of warning came back repeatedly: Father, you surely have not sunk to those depths that await the deeply sinful . . . but, if you are not in Hell, then just where are you? Please come for us, call us to wherever you may be. You left us to our suffering and will not appear even in our dreams.

The chill rain gave a terrifyingly lonely cast to the winter sky at dusk, and the sound of the wind blowing around the base of the trees was ineffable. Reclining on an armrest, pondering the past and the future, she cut an incomparably dignified and graceful figure. Even though her hair had not been properly groomed for a long time, perfect tresses draped down over her white robes.<sup>6</sup> She had a slight pallor from days of illness, but this merely added an alabaster glow to her complexion. The gentle curve of her eyes and forehead as she gazed

5. Yamadori (literally, "bird of the mountain") refers to a species of pheasant. The male and female supposedly roosted on separate slopes at the peak of a mountain, and so they became a poetic symbol of loneliness.

6. White robes were worn at times of illness or confinement. An example of this is found in the "Leaves of Wild Ginger" chapter at the time Genji's wife gives birth to his son. Page girls and ladies-in-waiting might wear white robes as well if they were in attendance at night.

pensively outside made one wish to show her to any man sensitive enough to appreciate such sublime beauty.

The younger Princess was startled out of her nap by a violent gust of wind. Her layers of clothing, which included robes in the mountain-rose style of fallen-leaf gold with a pale violet lining, as well as robes of pale blue lined with white, were bright and vibrant. Her face had a special glow as if it had been tinted, and she looked as if she didn't have a care in the world.

"I dreamed of our father just now," she said. "He appeared briefly just over there. He seemed terribly worried."

"After Father died," the older Princess replied, her grief now greater than ever, "I had so hoped that I would see him in my dreams . . . but he has never once appeared to me."

They both broke down and wept. The older Princess contemplated the world to come. Of late Father has been on our minds constantly, and so he was bound to appear in a dream. How I long to go to him . . . but as a woman, I'm too deeply sinful. She desperately wanted to obtain the magical incense from China that, when burned, enabled one to see the spirits of the dead.<sup>7</sup>

A messenger from Niou arrived late that night when it was pitch-black outside. The letter should have been a comfort to them, coming as it did when they were feeling so forlorn, but the younger Princess would not look at it right away.

"You must reply to him in a sweet, gentle manner," her older sister advised. "I am in a fragile condition and may not be around much longer, and so I worry that some someone even more cruel and inconsiderate than Prince Niou may appear and deal with you as he wishes. So long as the Prince thinks of you once in a while, no matter how rarely, I'm sure that no other man would dare have such evil designs on you. I know that it's difficult for you to accept this situation, but at least you can count on him for support and protection."

"Are you planning to abandon me? How horrible of you!" She pulled her sleeves completely over her face.

"The term of life is fixed, and death awaits us all," the older sister replied. "When Father died, I didn't want to live on after him for even a few brief moments. Despite my wishes, I lived on anyway. I know not if death will come tomorrow,<sup>8</sup> but even though I accept that the world is fleeting, I still grieve. After all, for whose sake do I value my life, if not for yours?"<sup>9</sup>

They pulled an oil lamp over and read the letter. As always, it was long and detailed.

*The clouds that we sadly gaze at are the same
As any other clouds . . . so why should these rains Increase my anxious yearning this winter night*

7. Poem 160 from Collected Writings of Bo Juyi. Bai (Bo) Juyi's poem retells the famous story of how, during the early Han dynasty, Emperor Wu, following the death of his imperial wife Li, had a Taoist adept prepare a special magical incense that when burned enabled Wu to see the figure of his beloved Li faintly in the smoke.

8. Poem by Ki no Tsurayuki, written on the death of Ki no Tomonori: "Though I may reflect on life, not knowing if death will come on the morrow, I grieve for one who did not live to see the evening of this day."

9. Poem from the personal collection of Lady Ise: "Scooping up water from a mountain spring gushing forth from rocky crags, I realize, for whose sake do I value my life if not for yours?"

Apparently, he had added conventional phrases such as “sleeves that have never been as drenched in my tears as they are now,”<sup>1</sup> but they were nothing more than common clichés. With the letter looking as if it had been scribbled out like some tiresome chore that Niou had to perform, the older Princess’s resentment grew even greater. Still, his looks and figure were so splendid and his demeanor so elegant that it was natural that the younger Princess was still attracted to him. Indeed, the longer his absences, the more she missed him. In any case, Niou had made so many extravagant vows that she knew in her heart that he would never stop calling on her. For that reason alone her anger waned, and she remained devoted to him.

The messenger remarked, “I must be returning this evening,” and pressed for a reply. The younger Princess gave him a poem and not a single word more.

*The skies that I gaze upon from this village
Pelted by hail, deep in mountain recesses
Are, mornings and nights, ever dark and cloudy*

It was the final day of the tenth month, and Niou was disturbed to realize that yet another month had passed by since he last saw his love. Night after night, he kept telling himself that this was the night to go. However, something always prevented him, and he began to feel like a small boat caught up in countless reeds.<sup>2</sup> For one thing, the Gosechi Festival would be held early this year,<sup>3</sup> and as a result there were many stylish diversions throughout the palace that kept him occupied. Even though he did not deliberately neglect his Uji Princess, he allowed more time to slip, and she was left to suffer the unbearable loneliness of waiting for him. Nonetheless, even when he was having a passing affair with one of the ladies at court, she was constantly on his mind.

His mother, the Akashi Empress, brought up the matter of his engagement to the Minister’s daughter, Roku no kimi. “If there’s someone you love and want to call on, then once you have secured the steady support that a marriage like this promises, bring her in discreetly as one of your ladies and treat her with honor and respect.”

“Let’s wait awhile. I have things to consider,” he replied, cutting her off.

Niou was concerned that his bride might truly end up suffering the indignity of becoming one of his “ladies,” as his mother put it, and he wanted to avoid that outcome. But the anxious princesses at Uji did not know what was in his heart. As the days and months passed, they could only languish after him.

Appearances to the contrary, Niou is not the serious, trustworthy man that I took him to be. In his heart, Kaoru was sorry he ever vouched for the Prince, and now he very rarely visited Niou’s quarters. He sent message after message

1. A poem from which this line is taken is cited in a later commentary, but the source is unknown.

2. Poem by Kakinomoto Hitomaro: “Unable to meet my love these days, I feel like a small boat trying to make port caught up in countless reeds.”

3. The Gosechi Festival was held during the eleventh month. In most years, it was scheduled around the middle of the month on the second of the three Days of the Ox that occurred during that month (zodiacal days cycled around once every twelve days). However, in some years there were only two Days of the Ox, and, when that occurred, the festival was held on the first of those days.

to the Uji villa inquiring after the older Princess and learned that her condition had improved a little around the beginning of the eleventh month. Subsequently, during this busy season at the court, his time was entirely taken up with both public and private responsibilities, and he did not dispatch anyone for five or six days. Then, suddenly, he had an alarming premonition about the Princess's health; having no other recourse available to him, Kaoru dropped everything that he was supposed to do and went to Uji.

He had left orders that healing rites were to be conducted thoroughly with no letup, but the Princess had sent the ascetic back to his mountain retreat, insisting that she was feeling much better. There were few people attending her when Kaoru arrived, and so, as always, he summoned Bennokimi and asked about her mistress's condition.

"Her symptoms are vague," the old woman informed him, "and she doesn't seem to be suffering from anything serious . . . it's just that she won't eat anything, my lord. She's always been extremely delicate compared to most women, but ever since our young mistress's affair with Prince Niou began, her mood has darkened and she goes on refusing to even glance at the slightest piece of fruit. She's shockingly emaciated, and her condition seems hopeless now. I've experienced so much sorrow in my long life, but to have to witness this horror . . . I only hope that I may die first, before my mistress . . ." Understandably, words failed her and she broke down in tears.

"This is hard for me to hear. Why didn't you let me know sooner? I've been very busy recently at both the palace and the villa of Retired Emperor Reizei, and I was worried at not being able to ask after her for several days." He went into the Princess's chambers and sat down near her pillow. He tried to speak with her, but she was unable to answer, as if she had lost her voice.

"No one, not one person informed me that you have taken a turn for the worse," he said reprovingly. "It's deplorable! I was so worried, I left specific instructions to look after you, but what good did it do . . . it's too late now." He sent for the ascetic again and also summoned a large number of priests and healers who had a good reputation for the efficacy of their prayers. The healing rites and sutra readings were set to begin early the following morning, and so he ordered a great many of his own retainers and staff to come to Uji to assist with preparations. Soon the villa was bustling with people of both high and low station, and the attendants there took heart and felt reassured as all traces of their feeling of isolation faded.

When evening came, Kaoru was offered a simple meal of steamed rice gruel and then asked to retire to the guest rooms that he always used. He protested, insisting, "I want to stay close by to help nurse the Princess." Because the priests were seated in the aisle room to the south, he set up a folding screen in a space on the east side of his beloved's bedchamber, very near to her. The younger Princess was troubled by his presence, but her attendants had all concluded that the relationship between their older mistress and the Middle Counselor was far from ordinary; they could not bring themselves to cruelly keep him away from her. After the priests started the early evening services, they began a continuous reading of the Lotus Sutra. The twelve priests chanting the sutra all had sonorous voices, and the effect was nobly inspiring.

With lamps lit in the space on the south side, the interior of the Princess's room was dark. Kaoru lifted up one of the panels on her standing curtain and slipped just inside to look at his beloved. When he did so, two or three older attendants shifted closer to her. The younger sister quickly hid herself from his sight and, with so few people about, lay down feeling lonely and helpless.

"Why will you not speak to me?" Kaoru pleaded, taking her hand and startling her awake.

"I would like to talk to you, but it hurts whenever I talk," she said quietly, speaking under her breath. "You didn't come here for so long that I was worried. I would have regretted it had I passed away without being able to see you again."

"That I should have kept you waiting for me this long . . ." Kaoru began sobbing. He gently placed his hand on her forehead. She was a little feverish. "What sin did you commit to bring about this illness? It must be retribution for having made someone suffer," he said, speaking softly in her ear. As he went on to tell her all of the things that he felt for her, she began to find his words troublesome and embarrassing and covered her face. He gazed down at her frail, delicate body and felt his chest tighten at the thought of what it would feel like to have to look on her lifeless figure.

"I'm sure that it has been terribly trying for you to have to look after her for so long," he said to the younger sister. "Tonight I shall stand watch, so please try to get some rest."

She was concerned, but withdrew a short distance away on the assumption that the Middle Counselor must have reason to want to speak privately to his beloved.

Kaoru should not have addressed her face to face, but when he drew closer to look at her, the Princess, despite her embarrassment and discomfort, accepted that their relationship was destined by a bond they shared in a previous life. She also recognized his noble virtues. After all, compared to Prince Niou, the Middle Counselor was exceptionally kind, gentle and trustworthy. No . . . she simply couldn't be so cruel as to send him away now, for she did not want him to remember her after she died as willful or thoughtless.

All through the night, Kaoru ordered her women to prepare medicinal infusions, but she refused to take even a sip. Aghast at the situation, he was desperate beyond words, wondering if there was anything he could do to save her life.

The ascetic, who was napping after having performed services during the night, was startled by the sublime voices of the priests who arrived in the pre-dawn hours and took over the continuous reading of the Lotus Sutra. Now awake, he chanted a dharani spell in a voice that, despite being hoarse and cracked from age, sounded mature and truly efficacious.

"How did the Princess get along last night?" he asked, and then began to reminisce tearfully about the late Hachinomiya, all the while blowing his nose over and over. "Which realm does he inhabit now? I always imagined that he would end up in paradise, despite the lingering attachment of his concern for his daughters, but recently I saw him in a dream . . . he was dressed in earthly robes and spoke quite distinctly to me. 'Because I detested the world and was deeply estranged from it,' he said. 'I had no desire to tarry in it for long. Yet, at the time of my death, some trivial worries distracted me from focusing on my salvation. To my bitter regret, the realm that I had hoped to attain still remains beyond me. Perform memorial rites to hasten my entry into paradise.' I couldn't think of what to do right away, and so I asked five or six of my disciples who happened to be performing services just then to chant the holy name. Then another idea occurred to me, and I sent them out in all directions to perform the Never-Disparaging austerity to teach that all people may attain Buddhahood.”<sup>4</sup>

Kaoru wept bitterly as the ascetic spoke. The older Princess, who was already troubled, realized that she had committed a grave sin by hindering her father’s salvation and wanted more than ever to just disappear completely. As she lay there listening to the ascetic, she thought, Somehow I want to find Father’s spirit while his destination is still unsettled and go together with him to the same place.

The ascetic withdrew without saying much more. The priests who had been sent off a few days earlier to perform the Never-Disparaging austerity had gone to villages in the vicinity and even as far as the capital, but after laboring through rough winds at dawn, they sought out the place where the ascetic had summoned them. Kneeling at the center gate, they continued the reading of the Lotus Sutra in a most venerable manner. The final lines of the scripture, with their invocation to do good deeds for all sentient beings who are destined to become Buddhas, were especially moving. Kaoru, whose heart had long been drawn toward the path of enlightenment, found the scene unbearably affecting. The rustling of silk told him that the younger Princess, nervous and fretful about her sister’s condition, had moved tentatively behind the standing curtain at the back of the room. He straightened himself up and assumed a more formal posture.

“How do those abject voices that never disparage sound to you?” Kaoru asked. “They may not have carried out an abject practice, but their humility is noble and awe-inspiring.”

*Plovers cry mournfully at the water’s edge
Amidst an icy frost glinting bright and clear
How desolate a sound in predawn twilight*

He did not intone his verse, but spoke it as if he were simply conversing with her.

Something in his manner reminded the younger Princess of her cruel lover, prompting her to compare the two men in her mind. However, she found it difficult to reply directly to Kaoru, and so she gave her reply to Bennokimi to pass to him:

*Plovers calling out in the early dawn
As they brush away the frost from their wings
Do they understand my sad, pensive heart*

4. This extreme religious austerity is called jōfukyō (literally, “never treat lightly”). Jōfukyō is the Japanese name of the bodhisattva Sadāparibhūta, who appears in the Lotus Sutra. Sadāparibhūta was the name of Sakya-muni in one of his previous lifetimes as a bodhisattva. He recognized the truth that all living beings could attain Buddhahood, and so he practiced humility before all he met (and suffered persecution as a result), saying that he could never disparage them because they possess the Buddha nature. Priests sent out on this austerity would go out and abject themselves before those they met, regardless of the person’s status, as a way to teach this truth.

The old attendant was hardly an appropriate stand-in for her mistress, but she conveyed the poem with stylish grace. A trivial exchange, to be sure, but her response was warm and sensitive, even if she was retiring by nature. It disturbed him to wonder how he would feel if he had to be separated from her following the death of her sister.

Kaoru contemplated Prince Hachinomiya's appearance in the ascetic's dream, and after imagining what the troubled figures of the princesses must look like from their father's vantage on high, he commissioned sutra readings at the mountain temple above where Hachinomiya used to go into retreat. He also dispatched messengers to various temples here and there with requests for prayers and sent letters requesting leave from all of his public and private affairs. No rite of purification, prayer ceremony, or exorcism was overlooked in his effort to heal the Princess. Nonetheless, because her illness was not the result of some sinful behavior, nothing seemed to work.

If the Princess herself prayed to the Buddha for her recovery, she might have improved, but her thoughts were on different matters. I must take this infirmity as my opportunity to die. He has now attended to me so closely—seen my face, touched me—that there is no longer any distance between us; now I have no excuse to treat him as anything other than my husband. Of course, even if he were to take me as his wife, the ardor that has driven him to treat me with such kindness would surely cool over time as we both grew familiar with one another, and I would be left in the end with nothing but uncertainty and heartache. No . . . if it turns out that I'm forced to live on, then I will use my illness as a pretext to take vows and become a nun. That is the only way to ensure that we stay together to the end, that our hearts remain as one forever.

She was convinced that she must fulfill her wish one way or another, but she couldn't bring up the matter in such detail that others would catch on to her plans. Thus, she said to her sister, "I feel that my condition is more and more hopeless, but I've heard that taking vows to uphold the Precepts is very effective for healing and may extend my life. Would you please speak to the ascetic? He is a master of esoteric rites."

Her attendants wept and objected vociferously. "It's unthinkable," they told her. "The Middle Counselor is at his wits' end, frantic over your illness. He would be devastated if you did such a thing!" To the Princess's chagrin, they all found the idea outrageous and would not even mention it to the man they relied on for support.

Because Kaoru had withdrawn from the court and gone into seclusion like this, word spread and gentlemen soon arrived from the court to inquire after him. Seeing how concerned he was over the princess's illness, his retainers and those members of his staff who were close to him grieved for their lord, each offering prayers for her recovery.

When he realized that today was Toyo no Akari—"the Feast of the Glowing Harvest"—Kaoru's thoughts turned toward the capital. The winds at Uji were frightful, and the snow swirled about madly. The weather in the capital wouldn't be like this at all, and yet, while he himself had chosen to stay here to be with his beloved, his loneliness was unbearable. He gazed outside, lost in wistful thoughts. Is she destined to die while the two of us remain strangers, never consummating our relationship? It's hard for me to accept such a fate, but I will not give voice to any bitterness. If only she could recover a little, display once more her sweet and gentle disposition even for a brief time, I would share with her all my thoughts and feelings!

Evening fell at last on a gloomy, sunless day. He whispered the following to himself:

*Deep in the mountains, beneath cloudy skies
I see no sunlight, no festive headbands
A season indeed to darken my heart<sup>5</sup>*

The attendants were all encouraged that the Middle Counselor remained with them like this. He was seated as always near her pillow; when the rough winds caused the standing curtains to flutter, the younger Princess withdrew to a room in the interior to avoid being seen. Her unsightly old attendants followed after, their faces flushed in embarrassment as they too scurried to hide themselves. As they did so, Kaoru moved closer and spoke tearfully to his beloved. “How are you feeling? I have prayed for you with all my heart and soul, but none of it seems to be doing any good. It makes me feel desolate, not having heard even a word from you . . . I shall suffer terribly if you leave me behind.”

Although the Princess was slipping in and out of consciousness, she still made sure that she kept her face hidden. “If I were feeling a little better, there is much I would like to tell you, but I regret for your sake that I must soon pass on.”

Her demeanor told of the deep compassion that she felt for him, and he found it harder than ever to hold back his tears. He was reluctant to show any signs of sorrow, knowing that would be inauspicious, but he began sobbing anyway.

He kept watch over her, reflecting on their relationship. What sort of bond did we share in a previous life? Despite my boundless love, I must be parted from her having tasted only a surfeit of bitter hardships. If she would reveal at least some small imperfection in herself, it might help temper the longings I will feel for her after she's gone. To his eyes, she seemed more precious than ever, radiant and lovely. Her arms were terribly thin, her body wraithlike, but her complexion was still lustrous, pale, and graceful. In her soft white robes, with her bedcovers pushed to the side, she gave the impression of a court doll, hollow inside its robes, lying asleep. Her hair, which was not excessively thick or long, had been laid out just as it was. It spilled down over her pillow in shimmering undulations that had a delightfully charming air.

What will become of her in the end? Is there no possibility that she may live on? Must her beauty pass from the world? He would never again experience such profound regrets. She had been ill for so long and had not been properly groomed or dressed all that time, yet her looks were still far superior even to a woman who endlessly fusses over herself and remains unapproachable, lest someone see her unprepared. As he studied his beloved's face, he could not calm his fear that her spirit would soon slip away.

“If you should abandon me after all,” he said, “I doubt that I will survive much longer myself. And if by chance I should live on for many years, I shall withdraw from the world and go off somewhere deep in the mountains. The one thing that might hold me back are the hardships your sister would face on her own.” He was hoping to get some sort of response by mentioning her sister.

5. The poem plays on the word hikage, meaning “sunlight” and “headband” (referring to the headband worn by Gosechi dancers at the Feast of the Glowing Harvest).

The Princess pulled her sleeves away from her face a little.

"I always knew that my life would be brief, and so I could not accept your proposal. I don't want to die and leave you with memories of me as willful and unkind, but there was nothing else I could do. That's why I suggested that you think of the sister I leave behind in the same way you think of me. If you had not defied my wishes, I might have been at peace now . . . it is the one lingering regret that may yet keep me attached to this world and hinder my salvation."

"Am I fated to suffer the extremes of sorrow? I am by nature different from others . . . I was never attracted to worldly affairs of any kind. You're the only one that I have ever loved, so I simply could not do as you requested and take your sister instead. I regret that now and feel bad for you, but you need not worry about her."

Kaoru did his best to comfort and reassure her, but when her suffering seemed to grow more intense, he summoned the ascetic and other venerable priests and had them use all of their powers to perform healing rites and prayers. He himself offered heartfelt prayers to the Buddha.

Is it to encourage the rejection of this world that the gods and Buddha expressly allow so much grief and anguish in it? As he sat there gazing at her, she vanished before his eyes, fading like withering grasses in winter. He was mad with grief, frantically stamping his feet in frustration at not being able to call her back, oblivious to how others might view his behavior.

When the younger Princess realized that the end had come, she too was stunned and distraught at being left behind. Her attendants, who as usual were acting wise and in control, could see that their mistress was not in her right mind and escorted her out of the room, saying that it would bring bad luck if she were to remain near a defiling corpse.

This simply can't be happening, Kaoru told himself. It must be a dream. He brought the lamp closer to her face, which was still partly hidden by her sleeves. She looked as if she were asleep: nothing about her had changed, and she was lying there as beautiful as in life. He thought wistfully, If only I could go on like this, looking upon her as I would the empty shell of a cicada!<sup>6</sup>

In order to prepare the body for the funeral rites, her women combed and arranged her hair; the air around them was suffused with the warm, rich perfume that had always scented her hair when she was alive. Kaoru prayed to the Buddha. She was a superior woman, unrivaled in this world. Is there nothing ordinary about her that would make it easier for me to accept her death . . . some small flaw at least? If you really are the guide who will show me how to renounce this world, then let me see something other than her beauty—something fearful and offputting about her corpse that will lessen my regrets and assuage my grief.

His prayer served no purpose, however, for his yearning only grew more intense the more he gazed at her. Knowing that soon her body would have to be consigned to the flames, he set about making the proper arrangements for the services—but it was all much too much for him. He felt unsteady, drifting along as though he was walking through the air. When the last feeble-looking

6. Poem by Bishop Shōen from The Kokinshū composed after the burial of the Horikawa chancellor, Fujiwara no Mototsune, at Mount traces of the pyre disappeared, so few plumes of smoke had risen to the sky that he was left feeling defeated and hopeless. He returned to the villa in a daze.

Fukakusa: "One finds comfort in gazing on the body, an empty shell of a cicada . . . send up at least a plume of smoke, Mount Fukakusa!"

Many attendants secluded themselves at the villa for the period of confinement and mourning. Though their presence helped to relieve the loneliness a little, the younger Princess was so depressed and ashamed at how others viewed her that she herself did not seem to be among the living any more. Niou sent one message after another, but the Princess could not forget that her sister had died never wavering in her attitude that his neglect was unforgivably cruel. It was her woeful lot to be married to such an awful man.

Kaoru now found the world thoroughly wearisome, but though he was inclined finally to fulfill his most cherished wish and follow the path of the Buddha, he couldn't bring himself to take that step just yet. For one thing, he had his mother, the Third Princess, to consider. For another, he was troubled by the heartrending circumstances of the Princess at Uji. He mulled over the situation. I should have done as the late Princess requested . . . I should have taken her sister as my wife and looked on her as a memento. But at the time she asked, I felt in my heart that I could never shift my affections, even though my beloved insisted that her heart was one with her sister's. Had I known that I would cause the younger Princess such misery by bringing Niou here, I would have married her instead. Had I done that, I might have found in my visits here some consolation for my unrequited love.

He didn't go back to the capital for even a brief visit. Because he had thoroughly cut himself off and remained inconsolable in his seclusion, people at the court concluded that his affection for the late Princess had been anything but ordinary, and everyone, from the palace on down, sent letters expressing their condolences.

Empty days passed by. Kaoru arranged for the memorial services held every seven days, and he made sure they were each conducted in a most solemn and dignified manner. He showed extraordinary devotion to her memory, but since they had not been married, there were limits on what he could do. Forbidden by custom to change the color of his clothing, he would steal mournful glances at the black robes worn by those women who had been closest to their late mistress.

*It is useless for one not permitted to mourn
To shed these blood-red tears, for they can never dye
My crimson cloak gray in memory of my love*

Kaoru cut a youthful, dashing handsome figure as he gazed out lost in reverie, soaking his sleeves with his endless tears; the light crimson cloak he was permitted to wear seemed to glisten like melting ice. The attendants, peeking in to observe him, were all in tears.

"What's done is done, and I suppose it's useless now to lament the loss of our mistress . . . but it's truly regrettable that the Middle Counselor, who has been so close to this household over the years, will soon become an outsider to us all."

"What a strange, unexpected destiny has befallen him!"

"That a man as deeply thoughtful and kind as he should have been rejected by both of our ladies . . ."

Kaoru spoke to the younger Princess. “I think of you as a memento of the past, and from now on I hope that we might be able to speak freely with one another and that I may still call on you and be of service. Do not be aloof and treat me as a stranger.”

The Princess, however, was still overwhelmed by her misfortunes and was too shy to meet or talk with him. She had always struck him as a little innocent and child-like, more open and noble compared to her sister, and yet to him she lacked the gentle warmth and beauty of spirit of the woman who had so touched his heart.

One day, when the skies were darkened by heavy snowfall, Kaoru passed the time from morning until evening staring blankly outside. That night the clouds cleared away, and the moon of the twelfth month—the moon that people always invoke as a symbol of chill desolation—shone clear and bright. He rolled up the blinds on the veranda to look up at it. The distant sound of the bell at the mountain temple echoed from high above, and as he strained to listen at his pillow, he heard it tolling out the close of day.<sup>7</sup>

*Not wishing to be left behind, to linger on
I would follow the moon in its course . . . for this world
Is not a realm I shall reside in forever*

A stronger wind began to blow. When Kaoru got up to lower the shutters again, he glanced out into the garden. The ice at the water's edge, which was reflecting the image of the snow-covered mountains all around, sparkled brilliantly in the light of the moon. He could refurbish his villa on Sanjō in the capital all he liked, but nothing he could add to it would ever equal the scene before him.

If only she could come back to me, even for a moment, he thought, I would talk with her about this sublime beauty! His obsessive longing was simply too much to keep inside his breast.

*In my anguish over the loss of my beloved
I long to vanish into the Snowy Mountains
Leaving no trace while seeking the potion of death*

If only there were some demon to teach me the second part of that verse of scripture, then I might well have an excuse to toss myself from some great height like that youth in the Snowy Mountains.<sup>8</sup> For someone who supposedly aspired to enlightenment in this way, his motivations were certainly less than pure.

7. Poem 978 from Collected Writings of Bo Juyi: “Straining to listen at my pillow, I hear the sound of the temple bell. I roll up the blinds and look out at the snow on the peaks.” Anonymous poem from The Shūishū: “In grief and sorrow I listen to the sound of the temple bell as it tolls out the close of day.”

8. In his poem and in this statement, Kaoru alludes to the story of Sessen Dōji (Youth of the Snow Mountains) that appears in the Mahāparinirvāna Sutra (the Nirvana sutra). Sessen Dōji, who was Sakyamuni in a previous life, is a young man seeking enlightenment by practicing austerities in the Himalaya Mountains (the Snowy Mountains). The deity Śakra (Indra) decides to test the young man and approaches him disguised as a demon. He gives Sessen Dōji the first half of a Buddhist verse (“All is fleeting, nothing is constant/this is the law of birth and death”) and offers the second half in exchange for his flesh and blood. The young man agrees, carves the verse into the stone wall of the cave that serves as his hermitage, then throws himself from a high place to fulfill the bargain. At that moment, Śakra changes back to his real form and saves Sessen Dōji.

Kaoru would summon the attendants and speak with them. At such times, he struck them as a paragon of noble virtue, gentle and deeply thoughtful. The younger ladies-in-waiting were completely smitten and thought him magnificent. The older women could only look at him and regret all the more what might have been.

"Our late mistress realized that Prince Niou was not trustworthy, and she was distressed at the prospect of being ridiculed. That's what made her ill."

"Yes, but she didn't want to let our young mistress know how worried she was, and so she kept her bitterness locked inside her heart and refused to eat anything—not even the smallest piece of fruit. She just grew weaker and weaker."

"On the surface she never gave any indication that she was deeply concerned about such things, but deep down she must have brooded endlessly over their situation."

"Her suffering began when all her hopes for her sister's future went awry and she realized that she had failed to live up to her father's admonition."

They went on sharing stories, relating what the late Princess had said on this or that occasion. With each anecdote, they invariably ended up breaking down and weeping.

Kaoru blamed his own folly for these tragedies and wanted to go back to the past and redo it. The world was unbearably trying to him, and he would spend sleepless nights immersing himself in prayer and meditation until dawn. Late one night as a heavy snow was falling, the shouts of men and the neighing of horses broke in on the freezing darkness. The venerable priests who had been commissioned for evening services were startled. Just as they were wondering what sort of men could have made their way here through the snow in the dead of night, Niou arrived, disguised in hunting robes and thoroughly soaked through. Kaoru knew by the impetuous rapping at the gate that it was the Prince, and so he withdrew and hid in a private space in the interior of the villa. The period of mourning and confinement had not yet passed, but Niou had been so fretful and impatient to see his Uji Princess that he had traveled all night long to get to her, struggling to make his way through the blizzard.

* * *

From Chapter XLIX

Yadoriki

TREES ENCOILED IN VINES OF IVY

* * *

The Uji Princess had never forgotten that peculiar night they spent together; having observed the workings of Kaoru's sincere, sensitive character—so unlike other men—did she wistfully imagine what might have been? A woman her age was no longer an inexperienced young girl, and when she compared the Middle Counselor to the man who had given her cause for resentment, she realized that Kaoru was far superior in all respects. Was that why, on this particular night, she took pity on him for having always kept her distance and, perhaps worried that she might come across as cold and inconsiderate, allowed him to be seated in the aisle room inside the veranda blinds? A standing curtain was set up inside the blinds of the main chambers, and she received him after withdrawing to the interior of the room.

"Although I did not receive an explicit invitation, I'm very happy to have been granted this rare permission to call on you," Kaoru began. "I wanted to come right away, but then I learned that the Prince might be returning and worried that it might prove awkward if I were here. So I decided to come today instead. Is it possible that, after all these years, you're showing some inclination to at last reward my earnest devotion to you? You've taken the remarkable step of relaxing your guard a little and allowing me inside your blinds."

The Princess still seem reserved toward him and had difficulty finding words to express what she wanted to say, but she finally replied with an air of modesty:

"It made me glad to hear about the memorial services the other day, and I would have regretted it if, as I always do, I simply kept my feelings to myself and let the occasion pass without somehow letting you know how much I appreciate all you've done." Because she had withdrawn so far back in her room, he could only catch faint snatches of her soft voice.

Feeling impatient and dissatisfied, he said, "You sound so distant. I should like permission to speak seriously with you about a certain worldly matter."

She thought his request reasonable, and his heart suddenly raced again at the sound of her moving closer toward him. He nonetheless exerted great self-control and maintained a nonchalant attitude. His manner of speech made it clear that he considered Niou's behavior inconsiderate. He criticized Niou and offered her words of comfort, talking to her soothingly on all sorts of subjects.

The Uji Princess could not openly voice her discontent with her marriage. Instead, she hinted indirectly, with few words, that she did not blame her misfortune on Niou so much as on her own karmic destiny.<sup>9</sup> She also expressed her heartfelt desire to go to the Uji villa for a brief visit.

"I'm afraid I can't decide on my own to help you," Kaoru replied. "It would be best to approach Prince Niou honestly and modestly with your request, and then do as he wishes. If you don't do that, he might misinterpret your motives a little, and it would be most unfortunate if he were then to consider you frivolous and untrustworthy. Once it's clear to him that he has nothing to be concerned about, then nothing will prevent me from accompanying you to Uji, and I will do all I can to be of service. The Prince knows full well that I am not like other men and that he can trust me completely."

While he was speaking with her, however, Kaoru did not for a moment forget his regrets, and he mentioned that he would like to go back to the past: "If only I could do it all over again."

It was growing dark, and the Princess was troubled that Kaoru showed no inclination to leave. "I'm not feeling all that well," she told him, "and so perhaps we might talk again some other time when I'm better."

He could tell from her movements that she was preparing to withdraw; because he desperately wanted her to stay, he said, as if to mollify her, "So tell me,

9. The source of this line has not been definitively identified, but a later commentary cites the following poem: "Is my misfortune due to my woeeful destiny or to his cruelty? I recall the little shrimp that live amid the seaweed the fishermen harvest and know it is my own fault." The poem plays on the word warekara, which may be read as the name of a species of shrimp or as a phrase meaning "I'm to blame."

then . . . when were you thinking of going to Uji? The paths must be terribly overgrown, and I shall have to have them cleared before then."

She stopped and paused for a moment. "This month will soon be over, so I was thinking perhaps the first of next month. But still, it seems best to keep the trip secret. If I were to ask Prince Niou for permission, it might lead to all sorts of troublesome complications."

Her voice was sweet and soft—so like her older sister's! He was assailed by memories and longings and could no longer restrain himself. He quietly stretched his arm through the blinds hanging next to the pillar he was leaning against and gently took hold of her sleeves.

Was this his intention all along? Ahh . . . how horrid he is! Not knowing what to say, she did not reply. Instead, she tried to move further back into the interior of the room. When she did so, he slipped further through the blinds—as if he had the run of the place!—and lay down beside her. "You have me all wrong, do you not?" he complained. "I was delighted when you said that you thought it best to travel to Uji secretly, and I entered because I wanted to ask if perhaps I hadn't misheard you. How unpleasant you are! You have no reason to be so cold and aloof."

She did not feel up to replying to him. Shocked by his behavior, she now detested him, though she remained sufficiently in control of her emotions to admonish his actions: "I never expected this sort of thing from you. What will my attendants think? Your behavior is atrocious!"

She was on the verge of tears—and with just cause. But though he felt sorry for her, he continued to plead his case: "Am I so outrageous that people would censure me? Meeting you face to face like this brings back memories of that night we spent together. A meeting your late sister approved, I might add. You think me shocking and atrocious, but your reaction is deeply offensive to me. You may rest assured that my intentions are in no way lascivious." He was very calm and gentle, but he talked on and on, telling her how keenly he felt the pain caused by the feelings of remorse he had kept inside himself for so many months.

She did not know what to do, since there was no indication that he was going to let go of her sleeves. It is difficult for me to convey just how frightened and disturbed she was. She felt more awkward and disgusted with him than she would have with a man who was a total stranger. When, at last, she began to cry, Kaoru said, "Why are you carrying on so? You're being childish, you know." She was adorable beyond words, and he felt bad for her, but at the same time her demeanor was so deeply thoughtful and prudent that it made him feel ashamed. He could see that she was even more mature and lovely than in the old days at Uji.

The yearnings that unsettle my heart this way are all the result of having given her up of my own volition to another man. Overwhelmed by self-reproach, he broke down in tears, sobbing.

Only two ladies-in-waiting were in close attendance that evening. Still, they would have been vigilant and would have been suspicious had a man with no relationship to the Princess—and thus no reason to be there—entered the main chamber. They would have drawn nearer, wondering what was happening. The Middle Counselor, however, had been a confidant of their mistress for a long time, and if he was on familiar-enough terms to be allowed to speak directly and intimately with her, then the situation seemed perfectly acceptable. Indeed, given the circumstances at that moment, they felt uncomfortable being so near and pretended not to notice anything. They quietly withdrew, which made the Princess feel even more wretched. As for Kaoru, he was finding it extremely difficult to suppress the overpowering regrets he harbored for all that had happened in the past. Nonetheless, his matchless prudence, a virtue he had possessed since his youth, kept his passions in check, and he did not do as he wished with the Uji Princess. It wouldn't do to describe this scene in any greater detail. For Kaoru, the visit had proven completely pointless; because he was reluctant to be seen by others he withdrew, reflecting remorsefully on all he had done.

Kaoru had been under the impression that it was still early evening, but in fact dawn was approaching. He grew anxious that censorious eyes might see him leaving at this hour, worried not for his own reputation, but for that of the Uji Princess. I'd heard rumors of late that she hasn't been feeling well, and now I understand why. She was extremely embarrassed that I saw her pregnancy belt,<sup>1</sup> and her reaction made me feel so bad that I did not take her. What a fool I am . . . as usual.

Other thoughts, however, tempered these reflections. And yet I never intended to do anything cruel. If, in a moment of weakness, I had given in to my baser instincts and forced myself on her, I'd never be able to feel at ease meeting her after that. Even if we carried on an affair, it would take tremendous effort on my part to arrange our secret trysts, and that would cause her to suffer the torment of constant dread.

Despite these seemingly wise rationalizations, he could not completely repress his desires, and his unbeatable yearnings for her in the present moment<sup>2</sup> left him feeling utterly helpless. Come what may, he had to see her again, and yet his was a desire that would never be truly sated. He could not get the image of her out of his mind—the elegantly refined, enchanting figure that was even more willowy than in the old days at Uji. As a result, he had the sensation that she was always with him, and he could think of nothing else.

She very much wants to go back to Uji, and I would like to escort her there, but Niou would never permit such a thing. And if we went in secret against his wishes, it might well end in calamity. Is there any way I can get what I want without destroying our reputations? He lay there staring out blankly, lost in these pensive thoughts.

His letter to the Uji Princess arrived early in the morning in the predawn darkness. Just like his previous letters, it was folded so as to resemble a formal missive rather than a love note.

*All for naught did I travel o'er
That dew-drenched path, the autumn sky
Stirring memories of the past*

“Not understanding the reasons for your cruelty only makes it all the more intolerable. There are no words to describe how I feel.”

Since she always replied to his letters, her women would surely take notice and think something amiss if she did not do so this time. However, it was too arduous a task for her to write a letter, and so she simply scribbled a note: “I received your letter. I am much too ill right now and cannot reply.” When Kaoru read it, he was let down by its brevity. He longingly recalled her alluring air.

1. This belt was a kind of sash (obi) worn low on the belly to provide support during pregnancy.

2. Anonymous poem from The Gosenshū: “How must they have been, those times before ever we met? For when I cannot see you in the present moment, I yearn for you.”

Now a little wiser in the ways of men and women, the Uji Princess did not consider Kaoru's behavior entirely shocking or despicable. For his part, when he recalled her demeanor at the moment she saw him off—her gentle kindness and humility, her complete lack of coldness, the warm familiarity with which she spoke—envy and sadness assailed his heart and he was disconsolate, tormented by conflicting emotions. He thought her far superior in every way from the young woman she was when he first saw her at Uji.

If, for some reason, Niou should ever be estranged from her, he fantasized, I would likely be the only person she could turn to for support. Yet even if that happened, it would not be easy for me to visit her openly. Instead, I would have to meet her in secret, and she would be my haven, the lasting object of my heart's desire, the woman I would love above all others.

How truly despicable that his heart should have been so fixated on her! Men may exude an air of kindness and sagacity, but they are cruelly fickle. Kaoru was sure that the sorrow over his lost love could never be assuaged, and yet here he was, suffering much worse over his love for her younger sister. Her attractiveness was all he could think about; when he heard someone mention that Niou would be returning to the Nijō villa that day, all his altruistic impulses to act as her support disappeared as his chest burned with jealous rancor.

* * *

From Chapter LIII

Tenarai

PRACTICING CALLIGRAPHY

In those days, there was an exceptionally pious priest residing at Yokawa on Mount Hiei<sup>3</sup>—a certain bishop whose name slips my mind. He had a mother who was over eighty years old and a younger sister who was in her fifties. Both of these women had become nuns, and together they undertook a pilgrimage to Hatsuse in fulfillment of a long-standing vow they had made to Kannon. Their traveling party included one of the bishop's closest and most highly regarded disciples, an ascetic who accompanied them in order to perform the dedication of sutras and images of the Buddha.

After completing numerous acts of devotion, they started for home. Unfortunately, just as they were crossing the hills on the slope of Narasaka, the mother fell ill. Her condition caused tremendous apprehension among the attendants, who worried that their mistress might not be able to complete her pilgrimage. Thinking it best to rest for a day, the party stopped in the vicinity of Uji at the house of an acquaintance of the bishop. But then the old woman took a turn for the worse, and a messenger was immediately dispatched to Yokawa.

His Holiness had made a firm vow to remain in retreat for the year and not leave Mount Hiei. Nonetheless, he rushed to his aged mother's side, disturbed

3. Yokawa, along with Tōdō (east pagoda) and Saitō (west pagoda), was one of three extensive compounds that comprised the important and influential monastic center of Enryakuji. Part of this temple's prestige derived from geomantic practices. Mount Hiei is located northeast of Kyoto. Northeast was considered a permanently unlucky direction, and it was thus believed that a holy site like Enryakuji protected the capital from evil influences.

by the possibility that she might die on the road. Although his mother had lived such a long life that there would have been no need to feel any special regret about her passing, the bishop himself, along with his most efficacious disciples, raised a tremendous clamor as they performed healing rites.

The master of the house where they were lodging listened to this uproar with a worried expression: What effect will the defiling presence of an ill, very old woman have as I purify myself in preparation for a pilgrimage to Mitake? What if she should die here?

Upon hearing these concerns, the bishop recognized that his host had good reason to be anxious, and he felt sorry for being such an imposition. Moreover, the house was quite small and inconvenient. For these reasons, he decided that he would move his mother little by little whenever she felt well enough to travel. His plan, however, was thwarted when he learned that the direction to his mother's house was prohibited to them, blocked by the presence of the Middle Deity. He then remembered that an old imperial villa formerly used by the late Emperor Suzaku was nearby, just north of the Uji River.<sup>4</sup> Since His Holiness knew the steward who oversaw that estate, he sent a note requesting permission to stay there for a day or two.

"The steward and all the members of his household left yesterday on a pilgrimage to Hatsuse," reported the messenger, who had brought back with him the caretaker of the villa, an eccentric, ragged-looking old man.

"Yes, that's right," the caretaker affirmed. "The main hall is empty at the moment, so you must come right away before anyone else arrives. You see, pilgrims are always stopping by to lodge there."

"That sounds perfect," the bishop replied. "I know it's an imperial residence, but if no one is using it right now, we'll be able to rest at our leisure."

His Holiness sent some members of the party to inspect the site. The old caretaker was accustomed to looking after people who needed lodging, since visitors arrived regularly, and so he had already arranged to have plain and simple furnishings set out for the guests. The bishop then made his way over to the villa ahead of his mother and sister. The place had fallen into disrepair, and when His Holiness observed its frighteningly eerie atmosphere, he ordered his most saintly disciples to begin chanting sutras. The ascetic and one other disciple—a priest of equal rank and eminence—expressed their concern that something uncanny might happen in such a setting. Both men had experience with situations like this, and so they ordered the lighting of torches, a task they assigned to some lower-ranking monks whose burly appearance made them the appropriate choice for driving off lingering spirits.

The monks took up their torches and immediately set off to inspect the grounds behind the main hall, a neglected spot that people rarely approached. Warily peering into an eerie stand of trees that resembled a sacred grove at a shrine, they spotted something white amidst the undergrowth.

"What could that be?" The party froze in its tracks. Raising their torches higher, the men could make out the seated figure of a young lady.

"It must be a fox spirit in human form. Abhorrent creature! I'll make it show its true shape," one of the monks said, taking a few steps closer to the figure.

4. This may be a reference to the real-life Emperor Suzaku (923–952), who used a villa near Uji as a retreat from the capital. However, since the association of fictional characters with real-life figures is a recurring feature of Murasaki Shikibu's narrative technique, it may be that the author is simply introducing new information about her character, Suzaku.

"Don't be rash! It could be a malevolent spirit," warned another who, just to be safe, was keeping his eyes fixed on the strange apparition and displaying the mudra<sup>5</sup> used to ward off evil. Had there been any hair on his head, he felt sure it would have been standing on end.

The fearless monk was undeterred, however, and moved closer to the strange figure to get a better look. It was a young lady with long, lustrous hair leaning against the thick gnarly roots of a tree. She was weeping most piteously.

"This is passing strange," he said. "I should like for His Holiness to have a look."

"Yes, indeed . . . exceedingly weird," replied one of his companions, who hurried off to inform the bishop of the unearthly discovery.

"I have long heard of fox spirits taking on human form, but I've never witnessed such a thing personally." So saying, the bishop left the main hall with the express intent of investigating the matter himself.

The bishop's mother and sister were now on their way to the villa, and the menial servants were busy tending to their responsibilities in the kitchen and living quarters as they hastened to make preparations for the arrival of their guests. As a result, the area behind the main hall remained deserted except for the four or five monks who were keeping an eye on the strange creature. They observed no change in its condition. Hours passed as they watched in doubtful wonder.

It will soon be dawn, and finally we shall see if it's human or something else. With that thought in mind, they recited the proper incantations in their hearts and formed the correct mudras. While they were doing so, the true nature of the creature became evident to the bishop.

"It's not a fox spirit, it's a young woman. She's human. Approach her and find out her name. She's obviously not dead. Probably someone left her body here thinking she had passed away, and she revived after they left. That must be what happened here, wouldn't you agree?"

"Why would anyone abandon a woman like this at an imperial villa?" one of the monks asked.

"Even if she is human, maybe she was bewitched by a fox spirit or wood sprite and tricked into following it here," suggested another.

"Either way, this is most unfortunate. Her presence defiles this place, and your mother is just about to arrive."

The monks shouted for the caretaker. The echoing of their voices was eerily disturbing.

The disheveled old man emerged from the main hall, pushing the unkempt hair on his forehead back up under his cap.

"Does a young woman live close by? Look at what we've found," one of the monks said, pointing to the young lady.

"Must be the work of a fox," the caretaker replied. "Queer things happen from time to time in this grove. Why, just the year before last, in the autumn, a fox took a little child who lives on the estate . . . barely two years old, mind you . . . and left him in these woods. Nothing to be shocked about, really."

"Did the child die?"

"No, no, he's fine. Foxes like to alarm folks, but they don't do any real harm." The caretaker seemed utterly nonchalant about the matter, as if being bewitched

5. Mudras were an important practice in Shingon Buddhism. Shingon esoteric practices during the Heian period were influential and had an impact on other Buddhist sects, including the Tendai Monastery at Enryakuji on Mount Hiei.

by a fox spirit was the most natural thing in the world. Apparently, he was more preoccupied with preparing food for all the visitors who had arrived in the middle of the night.

"In that case," the bishop said, "we'd better check again to see if that's what befell this young lady."

The fearless monk who had confronted the apparition earlier approached once again and began tugging on one of the sleeves of the young lady's robes.

"Be you demon or deity, be you fox or woodland sprite, you cannot hope to conceal your identity in the presence of these most eminent priests. Announce yourself! Tell us your name!"

The woman buried her face in her sleeves and wept all the harder.

"Come now, insolent sprite or demon! Do you really think you can keep your true shape hidden?"

Though he was determined to get a better look at her face, the monk was steeling himself just in case this was one of those female demons with no eyes or nose that he had read about in ancient tales. Still, he felt that he had to put on a brave front with the bishop watching him, and so he tried to pull the woman's sleeves back. Whereupon she threw herself facedown, sobbing loudly.

The intrepid monk remained convinced that anything so unusual and suspicious could not be a creature of this world and that it would be best for them to continue observing it to see if any transformation took place. However, the weather was changing and there was no time for that. "A heavy storm is coming," he said. "If we leave the creature here like this, it will surely die and defile the residence. We should drive it away, outside the enclosure."

"She's obviously human," the bishop reassured him, "and it would be cruel to knowingly abandon her while she's alive. After all, it's natural for us to feel bad if we do nothing to help the fish that swim in the lakes or the deer that cry in the mountains when such creatures have been caught and are about to die. Human life is all too fleeting as it is, and so even if this young lady is destined to survive only a day or two more, we shouldn't begrudge her the time she has left. Perhaps a god or a demon possessed her, or maybe she was driven from her home, or deceived by someone plotting against her. Whatever the case, even if it seems that she's fated to die in this strange, pathetic manner, the Buddha would certainly show mercy to one in her situation. It is our duty to do no less. At the very least, we must try to help her. Give her medicinal infusions for a while. If she passes away after that, then I suppose there's not much more we could have done for her."

The bishop ordered the ascetic to pick up the young lady and carry her inside the villa. Some of the monks objected: "But Your Holiness . . . that's out of the question. To take a foul creature like this inside the villa will surely have a baleful effect on your mother, who's suffering enough as it is."

Others showed greater sympathy: "But if she has been bewitched by a shape-shifter, then it would be a grave sin to leave a living being out in this rain and allow her to pass away before our very eyes."

The menials would have raised a tremendous fuss and said all sorts of crude things had the monks brought the young lady into the main hall, and so they laid her down in an inconspicuous corner where people wouldn't be bustling in and out.

The carriages bearing the bishop's mother and his sister arrived at the villa. As soon as the women alighted, a clamor arose when, to everyone's alarm, it was discovered that the mother was feeling worse as a result of the strain of the journey. Only after things had settled down did the bishop turn his attention once more to the young lady.

"How's she doing?"

"Lethargic and unresponsive," one of the monks reported. "She doesn't even seem to be breathing at times. It's as if she's been possessed by a malevolent spirit and is no longer aware of herself or her surroundings."

"What are you two talking about?" asked the bishop's sister, who had overheard their conversation.

"I've witnessed many strange occurrences in my lifetime," the bishop answered, "but in all my sixty-plus years, this has to be one of the most unusual I've ever encountered."

Tears came to the nun's eyes as she listened to her brother explain what had happened.

"When we were staying at the temple in Hatsuse," she said, "I had a dream about a young lady. Could you describe this woman to me? May I see her?"

"By all means, go to her at once," the bishop replied. "She's resting just beyond the sliding doors on the east side."

The nun hurried over and peeked into the room. There wasn't a servant in sight. A woman was lying there, alone and abandoned. She seemed very young, but exuded an air of refined beauty. Dressed in crimson trousers over a singlet of white damask that was suffused with an ethereal scent, her appearance gave the impression of boundless grace and nobility.

"Why . . . she's the very image of my late lamented daughter," the nun gasped. Unable to stop her tears, she summoned her attendants and had them pick up the young lady and carry her to chambers further inside the villa. Of course, the attendants could not tell just by looking what tribulations this woman had endured, and so they carried out the nun's orders without fear or hesitation.

The young lady appeared to be lifeless, but then she opened her eyes ever so slightly.

"Say something," the nun implored. "Tell me who you are and how you ended up like this."

The young lady was silent. It seemed as though the nun's words were incomprehensible to her.

The nun picked up a cup containing a medicinal infusion and, with her own hands, tried to get the patient to drink. The lady, however, did not have the strength to take the medicine and seemed to be on the verge of breathing her last.

At that moment the nun turned in desperation to the saintly ascetic. "This infusion is no use. Her condition is worse than ever. She's going to die if we don't do something. Please, please perform a healing rite for her!"

"This is exactly what I was worried about," the ascetic replied. "I advised His Holiness against getting involved with such a strange and hopeless case." Despite these misgivings, the ascetic began chanting the Heart Sutra in order to appease the local deities before he commenced with the healing rites.<sup>6</sup>

6. The Heart Sutra is a central scripture of Mahāyāna Buddhism. The syncretic nature of religious belief at the time meant that even Buddhist priests had to be respectful of Shinto practices. The desire to maintain a proper balance between different religious systems is depicted at several points in the narrative.

The bishop stuck his head in and asked again, "How is she doing? Try to find out what sort of spirit is possessing her so that we may exorcise it."

The young lady was extremely weak, and it looked as if she might expire at any moment. "I don't think she'll last much longer," one of the attendants remarked.

"What a nuisance. If she dies, then we'll have to go into retreat. And all because of an unexpected defilement," grumbled another.

"You're right. It really will be a nuisance. What's more, she looks like she comes from a distinguished noble family, so even after we know for sure that she's dead, we won't be able to dispose of her body right away!"

"Be still," the nun scolded, "and make sure that no one hears about this matter! Any kind of gossip about this is bound to stir up trouble."

The nun kept constant vigil and was so preoccupied by her desire to save the young lady that she seemed to others to be more concerned about the threat to the well-being of a stranger than she was about the illness afflicting her own mother. Still, even though the young lady was an outsider, she was so extraordinarily beautiful that all of the attendants who saw her thought it would be terrible to just let her die. So moved, they fussed over her, doing all they could to be of assistance.

Weak as she was, she managed to open her eyes from time to time. Whenever she did, an endless stream of tears would pour forth.

"Ahh . . . how heartbreaking," cried the nun. "I believe the Buddha has brought you to me as a replacement for the beloved daughter whose death I continue to mourn. If you should die as well and this all comes to naught, then our chance encounter will have left me with nothing but one more bitter, painful memory. We must have been destined to meet. Perhaps we share a bond from a previous life. Please . . . won't you at least speak to me a little?"

The nun continued to plead in this fashion until, finally, the young lady replied in a thin whisper: "I may have survived, but I'm a woman of no importance, and my life is worthless. Don't let anyone else see me. This evening, after darkness falls, throw me back into the river."

"You've uttered hardly a word to me since you were brought here, and so I suppose I should be thrilled to hear your voice. But what fearful things you say! Whatever could possess you to speak like that? And how did you come to be in those woods behind the villa?"

The young lady did not respond. The nun examined her body, looking for wounds or any sign of strange anomalies. Finding nothing out of the ordinary, she was at once shocked and saddened by the sight of such unblemished beauty, for it caused her to have doubts about the young lady, who might truly be a shape-shifter come to bewitch people and lead their hearts astray.

The bishop's party remained in retreat at the villa for two full days, and the unceasing reverberation of voices chanting prayers and healing rites for the two afflicted women left everyone on edge and feeling uneasy about the strange, suspicious events that had occurred.

A number of peasants living in the vicinity of the villa had once been in service to the bishop. When they learned that His Holiness was staying there, they came to pay their respects and express condolences for his mother's illness.

As the bishop was listening to them prattle on and on about trivial, everyday matters, one of the peasants offered an apology to him: "We're sorry that we couldn't be of service to you earlier, but you see, Lady Ukifune, a daughter of the late Prince Hachinomiya, died suddenly, without any prior indication that she was ill. Well, this lady was being courted by the Major Captain of the Right, and so I can assure you that her death caused quite a stir. We were so busy yesterday taking care of the funeral arrangements that we couldn't get away to see you until now."

The man's story got the bishop to thinking about the young lady who had been found in the grove behind the villa: Is it possible that a demon snatched the soul of Hachinomiya's daughter and brought it here? Similar cases have been known to occur in the past. His doubts were prompted by his observations over the past couple of days, for no matter how often he checked in on her, he never got the sense that she was really alive. There was something alarmingly sinister about her that greatly disturbed him—a precarious, ephemeral quality, as if she might suddenly disappear.

Several people questioned the peasant's story: "But the smoke and flames we observed last night didn't seem big enough for a proper funeral pyre."

"The rites were kept simple on purpose," the man explained. "If you ask me, it wasn't much of a ceremony." The peasants, who had been defiled by their proximity to death, were kept standing outside and were eventually sent away.

Some in the bishop's party began to gossip among themselves.

"The Major Captain was once enamored of Hachinomiya's eldest daughter, but she passed away several years ago. I wonder who that menial could have been referring to?"

"Now that the Major Captain has wed the Fujitsubo Princess,<sup>7</sup> do you really think it likely that he would give his heart to another woman?"

With his mother's condition improving and the direction toward her home no longer prohibited, the bishop decided that the party should make its way back, especially given how awkward it was to remain any longer in such a dreary, haunted place.

Several people wondered aloud about the decision: "But the young lady is still in such a delicate state," they pointed out. "Is she really up to the journey? The poor little thing may suffer terribly on the way."

Despite these concerns, two carriages were readied. The bishop's mother rode in the lead carriage and was accompanied by two other nuns who had been assigned to care for her. The young lady was placed in the second carriage and was accompanied by the bishop's sister and an attendant who stayed by her side throughout the trip.

Progress was slow and fitful, mainly because the party had to make frequent stops in order to prepare medicine for the young lady. Since the nuns resided in Ono on the lower slopes of Mount Hiei, their journey was a long one.

"We should have arranged to stop somewhere along the way," someone complained; and indeed, it was very late at night when they finally arrived.

The bishop looked after his mother, while his sister, the nun, tenderly cared for the young lady, whose identity remained unknown. Each of the nun's attendants took turns assisting her, taking the woman from the carriage and carrying her inside to rest. The bishop's mother was constantly beset by the infirmities of old age, and for a time her condition worsened as a result of the lingering effects of the journey. Nonetheless, she eventually recovered, and His Holiness was able to retire back up the mountain to his temple at Yokawa.

7. This "Second Princess" is the second daughter of the present emperor and is married to Kaoru. She resides in the "Chambers of the Wisteria Court" (Fujitsubo) [editor's note].

It was rather scandalous for a priest to be traveling in the company of a young woman, and so the bishop spoke not a word about his trip to those disciples who had not been with him to witness what had taken place. For her part, his sister made all of her attendants swear an oath of silence, for she feared that someone might come looking for the young lady.

How is it possible that someone who seems to be of such high status should have fallen so low and ended up in a place inhabited by rustics? The nun imagined several possibilities. Did she fall ill while traveling on a pilgrimage, only to be betrayed and abandoned by a duplicitous stepmother? She has uttered nothing apart from that horrid request to be thrown into the river.

The nun was extremely anxious, hoping that the patient would soon recover her health and faculties. Sadly, the young lady made no effort to get up, but remained lethargic and disoriented. Her condition was so alarming that survival seemed unlikely. Still, the nun couldn't bear the unpleasant thought of giving up, and so she revealed to others the dream she saw on her pilgrimage at Hatsuse. She also discreetly contacted the ascetic who had granted her pleas for healing rites when they were staying at the imperial villa in Uji and asked him to burn poppy seeds in an effort to exorcise any malicious spirits that might be lingering.

The rites of exorcism continued to be performed throughout the fourth and fifth months. Saddened and perplexed that nothing seemed to be helping, the nun sent a letter to the bishop:

Please come down to us again. Help this woman. That she has managed to hold on this long shows that it is not her destiny to die at this time. Whatever spirit or demon has possessed her will not let go. My dear brother, I know that you vowed to stay in retreat and not venture out, not even to the capital, but can there be any harm, would you really be breaking your vow, in coming to Ono?

After reading this heartrending message, His Holiness decided to leave his mountain retreat and descend to Ono. What a curious affair! The young lady has survived so long . . . what if I had made a snap judgment to abandon her at that villa? My discovery of her there must have been the workings of a shared karmic bond, and so I must do my utmost to save her. If I fail, then I'll have to assume that she was fated to die after all.

Receiving her brother with reverence and joy, the nun described to him the young lady's condition over the past few months: "A patient who's been ill as long as this would normally show the unpleasant effects, but she hasn't deteriorated at all. You can see that she's as youthful and lovely as ever . . . nothing of her appearance shows any sign of disfigurement. True, she does appear to be nearing death, and yet she continues to cling to life." The nun spoke with sincere intensity, weeping the whole time.

"From the moment I first saw her," the bishop replied, "I knew there was something out of the ordinary. Well . . . I shall see what I can do." He peeked in on the young lady, and then added, "She really is quite beautiful, isn't she! No doubt she was born with such features as a reward for good deeds performed in a previous life. What trespass could she have possibly committed to deserve this cruel fate? Have you heard anything that might explain what happened?"

"I've heard nothing . . . no rumors or gossip. I'm convinced that she's merciful Kannon's answer to my prayers."

"No, no, that's not right. There must exist some prior bond between people for karmic destiny to bring them together. Nothing happens by accident, so how could you think it possible, absent some necessary cause, for Kannon to have brought you someone who has no connection to you?" After voicing his priestly doubts about his sister's interpretation of events, he at once set about performing an exorcism.

The nun, who for her own reasons wanted to keep the young lady's presence a secret, felt that it would be awkward if word got out that her brother, who had declined to interrupt his vows even when summoned by the palace, had inexplicably left his mountain temple to go to the trouble of performing prayers and rites for a woman like this. The other priests in attendance shared the nun's concern, and they advised His Holiness to perform the rites quietly in order to keep them secret.

"I will hear no more of this, my noble disciples," the bishop replied. "I've proven to be a shameless priest, for I have broken many of the prohibitions that I'd sworn to uphold. Still, when it comes to women, I've never defiled myself or done anything that would merit censure. I'm over sixty now, and if at this point in my life I'm condemned for trying to save a young woman, then so be it. I would simply consider that my karmic destiny."

"But whenever vulgar rumormongers spread vicious gossip about a holy man of your high repute, that damages the Buddha's sacred teachings," the disciples said, voicing their displeasure.

The bishop made a gravely solemn vow: "If she shows no signs of improving while I am performing these incantations, then I swear I shall never do them again!" He persevered with the rites all through the night, and at dawn succeeded in driving out the stubborn spirit and forcing it into the body of a medium. The bishop and his disciple, the ascetic, wondered just what kind of creature had possessed the young lady, and they took turns continuing the rites in the hopes of pressing the spirit to reveal its situation and motives.

The spirit, which had for several months resisted revealing anything at all about its true nature, was finally overcome and began to shout and curse: "Once, my status was such that no one would ever have expected a man like me to end up in a place like this, subdued in this fashion. You see, long ago I was a monk who practiced austerities, but as a result of some petty resentments I harbored toward the world, I was unable to break free of my attachments and achieve salvation. While wandering adrift in the limbo between realms of existence, I came upon a place where several beautiful sisters resided, and I managed to steal the life of the eldest. Sometime later, I heard the young lady who lies here before you bemoaning her fate and insisting day and night that she wanted to die. One night, when she was alone in the pitch darkness, I took advantage of her despair to possess her. Alas, merciful Kannon protected her, allowing this saintly bishop to defeat me in the end. I shall leave you now!"

"Who are you? Announce yourself," the bishop demanded. However, the spirit's words were no longer intelligible, perhaps because the medium was exhausted.

Her mind and soul restored, the young lady regained her senses a little and glanced around the room. Surrounded by a throng of wizened old monks, she didn't recognize a single face. The sensation of having arrived in some strange, unknown land was profoundly unsettling. She tried recalling details from her past, but couldn't remember anything clearly—not the place where she lived, not even her own name.

All I remember is that I decided to throw myself in the river because it was unbearable to go on living. But where am I now? She struggled to make sense of fragmentary memories. I was suffering dreadfully, lost in hopeless sorrow, but everyone around me was asleep. Stepping out through the hinged doors at the corner of some room, I felt the wind blowing wildly and heard the violent roar of a river. Frightened and alone, oblivious to past and future, I collapsed on the edge of the veranda and pondered uncertainly which way I should go. Having come this far, I felt ambivalent about going back inside, and as I sat there brooding, I kept telling myself that I should be resolute and leave this world behind once and for all, that it would be better to be devoured by demons than have anyone see me looking so foolish and pathetic. And then, at that moment, a radiantly handsome man approached and said, "Come with me, come to my home." I recall the feeling of being embraced in his arms, and then, just as I recognized him as the man whom people addressed as "Your Lordship,"<sup>8</sup> I must have fallen into a trance. When I came to and looked around, I was in an unfamiliar grove and the man had disappeared without a trace. I remember weeping bitterly as I realized that I had not, in the end, been able to die as I had wished. After that, I can't recall what happened, no matter how hard I try. I gather from what people have been saying that many days have passed since then. And to think, what a wretched-looking figure I must have presented to these strangers who were caring for me all that time.

During those days when she was sunk in that trancelike state, she had eaten at least a few morsels of food on occasion. Now, however, because she was ashamed and filled with remorse at the thought of having been resuscitated in this way, she fell into a deep depression and refused everything, even her medicine.

"Why must you remain so weak, seemingly unwilling to let us help you?" the nun tearfully pleaded. "I was so happy when your fever finally broke and you seemed to be feeling more yourself, but now . . ."

The nun kept a constant bedside vigil, lavishing attention on her patient. The attendants in residence also did everything they could to help, thinking it would be most regrettable if the young lady were to die under their care, especially seeing how fair and graceful of face and figure she was.

The young lady was grateful, but in her heart she continued to long for death. Still, she had managed to come back from the brink, clinging to life despite her ordeal, and because of her youthful vitality, she gradually regained the strength to raise her head, and eventually began to eat and take her medicine again. Despite this improvement, she also continued to lose weight, and her face looked increasingly gaunt.

The nun was happily anticipating a speedy recovery when the young lady said to her, "You must make me a nun. Otherwise, I can no longer go on living."

"It would be a great pity to alter such beauty as yours," the nun protested. "How can you ask me to do such a thing?"

8. Although he is not explicitly named in the text, the implication is that Ukifune is recalling her relationship with Niou, who is depicted several times in the Ukifune chapter embracing her.

As a compromise, the bishop snipped a few wisps of hair from the top of the young lady's head and had her take an oath swearing to uphold the Five Precepts.<sup>9</sup> This did not satisfy her, but being passive and yielding by nature, she couldn't bring herself to insist on being allowed to take the full formal vows that would make her a nun.

Setting off back up the mountain, the bishop gave instructions to his sister as he parted: "Let's leave it at this for now and focus on nursing her back to health."

The nun was overjoyed to have been entrusted with the care of this young lady, who seemed like a dream come true to her.<sup>1</sup> In her zeal, she would have her charge sit up and personally see to combing her hair, which, although it had been braided in a rather unsightly fashion and carelessly left that way during the long ordeal of spirit possession, was not especially tangled. By the time the nun finished, the young lady's tresses had a vibrant, lovely sheen. The presence of such beauty in a place with so many gray-haired nuns who all seemed to be just a year shy of one hundred<sup>2</sup> made everyone feel as though a dazzling, wondrous angel had descended from the heavens. This stirred a sense of foreboding in the nun, who pressed the young lady to tell her more.

"Why do you seem so cold, keeping your distance from me even though I fret so terribly over you? Who are you? Where are you from? How did you end up in that grove?"

Feeling deeply ashamed at what the nun must think of her, the young lady replied, "I must have lost my memory while I was in that weird trance, for I have almost no recollection of anything that happened before that spirit possessed me. The only thing I can vaguely recall is sitting at the edge of a veranda, gazing blankly at a garden and thinking that I no longer wanted to live in this world. Suddenly, a man stepped out from beneath a large tree nearby. I have the feeling that he took me with him somewhere. After that, I can't remember a thing . . . I can't even remember who I am."

Her manner of speaking was sweetly endearing. She then broke down in tears as she added, "Whatever happens, I don't want anyone to find out that I'm still alive. It would be too much to bear if someone were to come looking for me."

Realizing how painful her questions must be, the nun felt that she could press the young lady no further. She was even more astounded than the old bamboo cutter must have been when he discovered the moon princess, Kaguyahime, inside a stalk of bamboo.<sup>3</sup> Knowing how that story ended, the nun was uneasy, wondering if this young lady like Kaguyahime, might disappear, like moonlight slipping through some narrow gap.

Now, the bishop's mother had come from a distinguished background, while his sister, the nun, had been the principal wife of a high-ranking official. The nun had given her husband a daughter, but when he passed away she was left to raise their only child on her own. She did everything she could for the girl, eventually arranging a promising marriage to a young groom of exceptional

9. The Five Precepts constitute a vow against killing, stealing, lying, promiscuity, and intemperance. The vows to become a true nun are more numerous.

1. The phrasing of this line calls to mind the dream the nun had at Hatsuse, implying that her prayers were answered.

2. Tales of Ise, section 63: "The grizzled lady who is just a year shy of one hundred seems to be yearning for me, for the image of her face appears before my eyes."

3. The divine protagonist of the Tale of the Bamboo Cutter who, after her adventures on Earth, ascends to heaven again [editor's note].

breeding. But then her daughter died as well. Heartbroken and despondent at being a childless widow, she took vows and withdrew to begin life at her mountain retreat in Ono.

Lamenting the tedium of her forlorn existence, the nun desperately wanted to find someone comparable in age and looks to her lost daughter—a keepsake of the one she mourned day and night. And then, quite unexpectedly, she was granted this young lady, who in face and figure was even lovelier than her own daughter. Hardly able to believe this was really happening, the nun was at once astonished and overjoyed. Although she herself was now in her fifties, she had retained a graceful beauty and dignified demeanor.

* * *

It may be awkward, but I must be brave and take advantage of this opportunity to ask His Holiness to administer vows to me. There's almost no one here to stop me, so the timing couldn't be better. With that in mind, Ukifune arose and addressed the bishop's mother.

"I'm seriously ill, so when your son, His Holiness, arrives, please inform him that I would like to take the vows that will make me a nun."

The senile old woman nodded in vague agreement.

Ukifune returned to her usual quarters. The nun was the only person who was permitted to comb her hair—Ukifune couldn't stand having anyone else touch it—and because she couldn't dress it herself, she simply loosened the cords and let it hang down a little. It made her sad to think that it was by her choice and no one else's that her mother would never again see her the way she looked now. She had been under the impression that her hair had thinned out as a result of the terrible ordeal she had been through, and yet, far from falling out, it was if anything thicker, a full six feet in length, and beautiful all the way to the ends. Each strand was fine and gave off a lovely sheen.

Ukifune recited a snatch of verse to herself: ". . . hoping that it would come to this."<sup>4</sup>

The bishop arrived at dusk. The aisle room facing south had been cleaned and cleared away, and soon a host of round shaven heads were scurrying about raising an alarming uproar that disturbed the normally quiet atmosphere of the place. His Holiness went over to his mother's quarters to ask after her.

"How have you been doing these past few months? I see that the rooms on the east side are vacant. Has my sister already left on her pilgrimage? Is that young lady still in residence here?"

"She is," the old nun replied. "She decided to remain here. She told me to tell you that she's not feeling well and that she wants to become a nun. She wants you to administer the vows."

The bishop arose and went over to the young lady's chambers. "Excuse me, are you in here?"

Because she was sitting behind a standing curtain when he called out, she moved closer to him by way of reply, her demeanor quiet and demure.

"From the moment I first met you under those startling circumstances, I felt certain that there must be a bond between us from some previous life. Since then, I have prayed devotedly for you. Of course, as a priest, it wouldn't do for me to call on you or send you letters without some reason to do so, and so naturally I have not kept in touch. How has it been, living among old women who have renounced the world? They must look frightfully strange to you, no?"

4. The Gosenshū 1240 (Bishop Henjō, written when he first took the tonsure): "Surely my mother never stroked my pitch-black hair hoping that it would come to this."

"It's depressing for me. Despite my desire to end my life, I continue to survive for reasons that remain a mystery. Please don't get me wrong . . . there's no way someone as foolish as I can adequately express the gratitude I feel for all the kindness you've shown on my behalf. It's just that I can no longer lead the sort of life expected of a woman. Please make me a nun. Even if I were to return to society, someone in my situation would never be able to settle into a normal relationship."

"But you have such a long future ahead of you," the bishop counseled her. "Why is your heart so firmly fixed on this one desire? Becoming a nun may instead lead to regrets and attachments that will only increase your sins. You may think yourself strong enough at the time you stir your heart to action and make the decision, but being a woman, your resolve will waver as the years go by, and you will face many impediments to salvation."

"From the time I was a child," Ukifune replied, "I knew only heartache and misfortune, and for that reason my mother even told me once that she had thought about making me a nun. Later, after I came to understand things a little better, I had no desire to live as a normal woman, but increasingly focused my thoughts and placed my hopes on the world to come. Now I feel as if I'm on the verge of collapse and that death is gradually drawing nearer. So I ask you again . . . please . . ." She was crying as she spoke.

It makes no sense. What could have made someone so beautiful despise her life so much? Even the spirit that possessed her said that she wanted to die. Making this connection, the bishop considered her request. She certainly has good cause to feel the way she does. In fact, it's amazing that she's managed to live this long. Having been possessed once by such an evil creature, she's in terrible danger.

"Despite my reservations, the Buddha himself<sup>5</sup> would praise the merits of your stated resolve. So who am I, a priest, to stand in your way? It is no trouble to administer the vows to you, but because I've been called out on an urgent matter, I have to go to the palace tonight. Starting tomorrow I must undertake healing rites for the First Princess. It will take about seven days to complete, and when I withdraw from the palace, I'll drop by here on the way back and perform the ceremony for you."

Ukifune was bitterly disappointed to hear that, for she knew that if the nun were back by then, she would most certainly object.

"I'm suffering just as much as when you administered to me the vows to uphold the Five Precepts. If my condition worsens, I fear that taking vows to become a nun will do no good at all. I would be grateful if you could do the ceremony today."

She was weeping so violently that she moved his pious heart to pity. "It's late, isn't it? In the old days I never gave a thought to going up and down this mountain, but as the years pass by it's getting harder for me to bear the strain, and so I thought I should rest here on my way to the palace. If you're really in such a hurry to take your vows, then I'll carry them out today."

5. The text uses the phrase "the Three Treasures" (sanbō—the Buddha, the Dharma/Law, the priesthood), but in this context the word refers to the Buddha.

Ukifune was overjoyed. She picked up a pair of scissors and pushed the lid of a comb box toward the bishop.

"Come here, my noble disciples," he called out.

The two monks who had first discovered the young lady happened to be accompanying the bishop, and when they entered the room he told them, "Prepare to cut her hair."

The ascetic thought this was a reasonable course of action. She was in such a terrible state when we found her, it would seem cruel to force her to remain in society as a laywoman. Nevertheless, the length of hair that she had laid out through the gaps in the curtain panels was so beautiful that he hesitated for a moment, reluctant to use the scissors.

At that moment, Shōshō was in her own room talking with her older brother, who was also an ascetic, while Saemon was receiving another of the priests who was a personal acquaintance of hers.<sup>6</sup> Because visits from people close to the nuns were so rare at this out-of-the-way place, both women were preoccupied entertaining their guests, leaving the page girl, Komoki, as the only one attending the young lady. When Komoki reported to them what was happening, Shōshō rushed in a panic over to Ukifune's chambers, where she found the bishop helping the young lady, who did not have proper religious attire, put on one of his own outer robes and a surplice for the ceremony.

"This is merely for the sake of form," he said. "Now, please face in the direction of your parents and pay obeisance to them."

Ukifune had no idea which way to turn, and with the memory of her mother being too much for her to bear, she wept.

"Oh my dear . . . how distressing!" Shōshō exclaimed. "Why are you taking such an ill-advised step? What will my mistress say when she returns?"

We've already begun the ceremony, His Holiness thought, and now that we've come this far, such talk will only serve to upset the young lady and put her in the wrong frame of mind. He admonished Shōshō, preventing her from saying anything more or coming any closer to interfere.

"Turning round and round, wandering through the Three Realms where all is in flux . . .," the bishop chanted.

At last, I've cut myself off from all obligations and attachments, Ukifune mused. Still, as she recalled the debt she owed her mother, taking this step made her sad.

The bishop's disciple was having difficulty cutting her hair. "In a quiet moment," the ascetic said, "have the nuns trim it up for you."

His Holiness clipped the locks around her forehead. "Never regret the change in your appearance," he told the young lady, and then instructed her in the noble truths. They had all advised against rushing into this, but how happy she felt to have finally renounced the world. She felt that only by taking this step did she have a sign from the Buddha that surviving had been worthwhile after all.

The bishop and his entourage departed for the capital and the residence fell silent. As the evening breeze rustled outside, the nuns let the young woman know of their disappointment. "You've been living in this forlorn house for some time, and given your situation, we were expecting that you would soon be leading an auspicious life with the Middle Captain. But now that you've taken this

6. Two attendants to whom the nun had entrusted Ukifune [editor's note].

drastic action, how do you plan to spend the many years of life that remain to you? It makes even those of us who are old and decrepit sad to think that a normal life is over for a woman when she becomes a nun.”

Despite their comments, at that moment Ukifune felt only relief and joy. She had come to the point where she couldn’t imagine having to live on in this world and so, for her, becoming a nun was a wonderful thing, one that brightened her mood and lifted her burdens.

Early the next morning, however, she was ashamed to see her changed appearance, in part because no one around her had agreed with her decision, which they considered thoughtless. The ends of her hair had been cut so carelessly that they had suddenly gone all wild and uneven. Ukifune wanted someone to come in—preferably without making any snide or disapproving comments—and dress her hair properly, but because she was by nature shy and timid, she remained in her room with the blinds down to keep it dark.

She had never been able to express her most private feelings easily. Moreover, she now had no confidante to whom she could open up. Thus, all she could do when her emotions were too much for her to hold in was sit down in front of her ink-stone and pour her heart into the poems she would scribble out under the pretext of practicing her calligraphy.

*Yet again have I turned my back on this world . . .
A world I once renounced, thinking of myself
And those I knew as not among the living*

“By taking these vows, I’ve made an end of it at last,” she wrote. Still, looking at her own poem, her heart was filled with sorrow and pity.

*Over and over have I turned my back
On a world that I have been determined
To make an end of once and for all time*

As she sat scribbling other poems that expressed similar sentiments, a letter from the Middle Captain arrived. The old nuns had been shocked and stunned about what had happened, and in the midst of the uproar someone had sent word to the Middle Captain. He thought it a great shame, but he was also filled with regret and disappointment. She was deeply determined to take this step, and that must be why she kept her distance and refused to reply to me, since she probably wanted to avoid any frivolous exchanges. But even so, what a drastic thing to do! The night I mentioned how much I wanted to get a closer look at her hair, which seemed so alluring that time I caught a glimpse of it, I was told, “All in due time.”

He sent off a reply: “I don’t know what to say to you.”

*I must make haste, for I do not wish to be late
And fail to board the fishing boat that from this world
Rows away, bearing a nun to that distant shore<sup>7</sup>*

7. This poem (and the reply that follows) plays on the word ama, which can mean both “fisherman (or diver)” and “nun.”

Ukifune made an exception and agreed to read his note. In that moment of intense emotion, how must she have felt, moved by the thought that now, indeed, it was over? Along the edge of a mere scrap of paper, she wrote the following, again under the pretense of practicing her calligraphy:

*Though her heart is leaving behind the shore
Of this woeful world, the destination
Of the nun's drifting bark remains unknown*

Shōshō wrapped the poem up to send to the Middle Captain.

"You should make a cleaner copy of it first," Ukifune said.

"But I might make an error if I do that," Shōshō replied, and sent it off just as it was.

It was a rare sight indeed to see a reply in the young lady's own hand. There are no words that can adequately describe the anguish the Middle Captain experienced.

The bishop's sister returned from her pilgrimage only to be deeply distressed to find out what had happened. "I'm aware that a woman in my position should be encouraging you for taking this step," she said to the young lady, "but you have so many years ahead of you, how are you going to get by? I have no idea how much longer I will live—I could pass away today or tomorrow—and so all my thoughts have been on ensuring that your future is secure once I'm gone. That's why I went to Hatsuse to pray to Kannon."

The nun was prostrate, writhing in grief. Ukifune found her extremely pitiful, but then she thought of her true mother and felt her heart break as she imagined just how terrible it must have been for a parent who had been left without even a body to mourn.

As usual, Ukifune was unresponsive and sat with her back to the nun. Because she looked so very tender and lovely, the nun couldn't hold back her tears as she remarked, "You certainly are a passive, fragile little thing!" She then made arrangements to provide her with the appropriate religious attire. A short outer robe and a surplice were tailored in the dark gray cloth that the nuns were accustomed to wearing. As the women there stitched the robes and tried them on the young lady, they vented their disappointment.

"She unexpectedly brought a radiant light to this mountain abode, and it was a joy to look at her every morning and evening. What a shame it's come to this!"

The women also expressed their resentment of the bishop and bitterly criticized his actions.

* * *

When the First Princess had completely recovered, the bishop returned to Yokawa. On the way he dropped by the residence in Ono, where he was met with a bitter outburst from his sister.

"You may have intended to set her on the path to salvation in the next life, but she is still young and beautiful, and if she comes to regret her decision, your rash actions will stir lingering attachments that will surely add to the burden of her sins. Why didn't you consult with me first? It's incomprehensible!" The nun's complaints, however, were useless at this point.

"You must now concentrate solely on your devotions," the bishop told Ukifune. "No one, neither the old nor the young, knows how long they have to live. The fact that you have rejected this world as a fleeting illusion is the proper frame of mind for someone in your situation."

His words were mortifying to Ukifune, for they were reminders that he had earlier witnessed her wretched condition.

The bishop brought out the damask, gauze and silk cloth he had received from Her Majesty as a reward for his services. "Take these," he told Ukifune, "and have a new habit made for you. So long as I'm alive, I'll do what I can to assist you. Nothing need worry you. We're all born creatures of this vulgar world, and insofar as we're pressured by our attachments and desire for its glories, it seems that all people find renunciation difficult. Why would anyone in your position, pursuing religious devotions in the midst of this forest, ever have cause to feel regret or shame?"

And so he instructed her, finishing with two lines from Bai Juyi: "Life is as thin and fragile as a leaf on a tree. The moon wanders through the sky until dawn breaks over the pines at the gate."<sup>8</sup> He may have been a monk, but to Ukifune, who sat there listening to him speak in his formidably elegant and erudite manner, he was saying things that she very much wanted to hear.

The wind, which blew all day long, sounded forlorn and melancholy. She heard the bishop saying, "On a day like this, even a hermit in the mountains is moved to weep aloud."

Am I not also a hermit now? Ukifune asked herself. That must be the reason why I cannot stop my tears.

She stood up and moved toward the edge of the veranda. Looking out at the valley spreading off into the distance, she saw a hunting party of men dressed in robes of various hues. Although they were heading up Mount Hiei, it was unusual for anyone to travel along the path that ran past the residence here. Once in a great while she might catch sight of a monk walking along from the direction of Kurodani, but to see a layperson out here was rarer still. Then she realized that the party belonged to the Middle Captain, who had been so aggrieved by her behavior.

He was visiting with the intent of making yet another of his complaints—useless though they were now—but because the autumn foliage was so delightful, having turned a deeper crimson here than in other places, he was enchanted, his mind distracted, from the moment he entered the valley.

How astonishing it would be to come across a beautiful woman in a place like this, he thought.

"I had some free time," he told the nun, "and feeling bored, I took to imagining how lovely the autumn leaves must look right now. Even your trees seem to beckon me to lodge for the night beneath their sheltering shade."

He was seated on the south-facing veranda, gazing around at the view. The nun, lachrymose as ever, composed the following:

*The chill blasts of late autumn sweep
The mountain's base, wither the trees
Leave no sheltering shade for you*

8. Poem from Collected Writings of Bo Juyi [editor's note].

The Middle Captain replied:

*I know no one awaits me, but gazing
At the treetops in this mountain village
It is hard for me to just pass them by*

He continued talking on and on about the young lady, though words could do nothing to win her now. “Do let me steal a glance of her to see how her appearance has changed,” he pleaded with Shōshō. “You can at least do that much, as a token of the promise you once made to me.”

Because he pressed her this way, Shōshō went inside, and when she saw how beautiful Ukifune looked, she felt the urge to do anything she could to show the young lady to the Middle Captain. Wearing subtly figured robes of simple, serene colors—light gray over pale orange-brown—she had a dainty physique, lithe and elegant, her face had a bright, modern appeal, and the ends of her hair, thick and abundant, spread across her back and shoulders like an opened multiribbed fan. Her fine complexion and delicate features gave off a lambent, rosy glow, as if she had applied her makeup with exquisite care.

Shōshō wanted to paint a picture to capture the scene of Ukifune performing her devotions, absorbed in reading a sutra with a rosary hanging from the frame of the standing curtain next to her.

Each time I see her like this, Shōshō reflected, I’m moved to tears. And if I feel that way, how much more intense would be the reaction of a man whose heart was drawn to her? Thinking that perhaps this was the appropriate moment to act, she let the Middle Captain know that there was a small opening just beneath the latch on the sliding door, and then moved aside the standing curtain that might otherwise have obstructed his view.

Seeing the young lady for the first time, the Middle Captain was filled with regret, resentment and sorrow, as if he himself were somehow to blame for what had happened. I never once imagined that she was this beautiful. For a woman so extraordinary, so perfect in all respects, to have become a nun . . . He could not contain his emotions and so he withdrew before she could hear him weeping madly, as if he had taken leave of his senses.

* * *

VII

Islam and Pre-Islamic Culture in North Africa

The Prophet Muhammad and the emergence of Islam united disparate Arab tribes over the course of the seventh century, turning them into a potent cultural and political force. Islam initially spread as the religion of a dynamic Arab state that took advantage of the weakness of the Byzantine and Persian Empires in the Middle East, and soon extended its political boundaries even further, to Spain, Central Asia, and Afghanistan. Once conquests slowed down and political boundaries were consolidated, traders carried the religion even further, to West Africa and China, as well as South and Southeast Asia. Arab traders established an increasingly far-flung network of cities and trading posts, facilitating an extraordinary exchange of goods. In Cordoba, the center of Muslim Spain, one had access to goods coming from Delhi, the Sultanate in northern India, and from what is now Bulgaria in eastern Europe to Sudan. Along with commodities, what traveled along these trade routes were armies. Islam became the religion of the ruling classes in the different empires. However, unlike Christianity, Islam did not seek converts, which meant that it often allowed local religious practices to exist alongside Islam, thus creating multicultural societies in

---

A contemporary photograph of the Grand Mosque at Djenne, Mali, which was first built in the thirteenth century.

WESTERN AFRICA

1200–1400

Approximate line of division between the Sahel and the Sahara Desert

Approximate southern limit of the spread of Islam by 1500

Major trade route ———
Important trading center ●
Major cultural/political center or city/state ○
Approximate extent of the Mali empire at its height [white box]
Approximate area of the core Mande homeland [dotted box]

Designation of empire that reached its height after the Mali empire

Designation of empire that reached its height before the Mali empire

Designation of a smaller core political area

Designation of a major ethnic group of a region which different religions existed side by side.

The same pattern held true of culture. Far from seeking to export a homogeneous notion of culture, the various Islamic empires were places of vibrant cultural exchange, in which art and ideas traveled as freely as goods and armies. Writing was especially enriched by the interchange; new literary forms that blended imported styles with existing local ones emerged throughout the Islamic world. Oral literature, such as the Mali epic Sunjata, continued to flourish, while incorporating Islamic elements, much as the pre-Christian epic Beowulf had received a late Christian layer or veneer to make the traditional story compatible with the new dominant religion. The result was a fascinating encounter of cultures and religions, whose products are presented here.

Between 640 and 700 C.E., North Africa was occupied by Arab invaders seeking to expand the growing sphere of influence of an Arab world increasingly united by Islam. One far-reaching result of the Arab conquest was that it led to an economic revolution by combining the faltering economy of late Roman North Africa with the desert and savannah lands of West Africa into a vast commercial network that extended from the Atlantic to East Asia and from the equator throughout northern Europe. By the latter half of the eighth century, most of the native Berber peoples of the Maghreb (Northwest Africa) had been converted to Islam. Owing to increasingly dynamic market forces to the north of the desert and the spread of camel-herding in the desert itself, Muslim Berber merchants became engaged in the systematic development of trans-Saharan trade.

The ninth-century Arab occupation of southern Morocco gave rise to a string of oasis cities south of the High Atlas

Mountains. These included the bustling market town of Sijilmasa, which became the northern counterpart of the commercial centers of Tadmekka and Awdaghust on the southern edge of the Sahara. By the end of the tenth century, the southern trading centers had been colonized by Muslim (mostly Berber) immigrants from the north. They were merchants eager to trade with the markets of desert-edge kingdoms like Ghana, Takrur, and Gao, and especially to extract wealth from parts of the western Sudan described by Arab travelers as "the land of gold."

Thus, Islam arrived in West Africa via Muslim traders, and by 1068 the respected Arab geographer Al-Bakri was writing that there were significant Muslim populations occupying towns of the Mande peoples, which included the Maninka of the Upper Niger region who became founders of the Mali Empire in the thirteenth century.

But Islam was not only an economic force; it also reshaped the cultural landscape. By the thirteenth century Islam had become a common, though not universal, aspect of Mande culture. Far from imposing onto North Africa, including the Mali Empire, its own conception of art, Islam was gradually integrated into Mande culture, with Mande bards (jeliiv) assimilating elements of Islamic tradition. Some of the stories told by Muslim clerics and by pilgrims returning from Mecca were adapted to local narrative repertoires. The Prophet Muhammad and various characters from his life and times were borrowed by Mande bards and incorporated into their most important oral traditions, including the epic Sunjata, which tells the story of the thirteenth-century hero who is credited with the founding of the Mali Empire.

---

SUNJATA: A WEST AFRICAN EPIC OF THE MANDE PEOPLES

late thirteenth–early fourteenth century

---

The West African epic named after its central hero, Sunjata, is an essential part of Mande culture. The heartland of Mande territory is located in what is now northeastern Guinea and southern Mali, but the Mande peoples are found throughout a much larger portion of sub-Saharan West Africa, speaking various related languages and dialects. The Mande, also known as “the people of Manden,” who include the Bamana of Mali and the Maninka of Guinea, are heirs to a vibrant historical legacy, the high point of which was the Mali Empire that flourished from the mid-thirteenth to the early fifteenth century. The epic narrative of Sunjata and his contemporaries illustrates the Mande peoples’ own view of this glorious past both before and after Islam began to influence their culture, and it rightfully credits their ancestors with establishing one of the great empires of the medieval world.

In Mande culture, oral tradition is the domain of bards popularly known as griots, but as jeliw or jelilu (sing. jeli) to their own people. They are the hereditary oral artists responsible for relating the alleged deeds of the early ancestors, keeping them and their exploits alive in the community’s memory. For many centuries the jeliw have served as genealogists, musicians, praise-singers, spokespersons, and diplomats. As the principal narrators of oral tradition, the bards have been responsible for preserving narratives that express what peoples of the Mande cultural heartland believe to have happened in the distant past. For centuries, stories of the ancestors have passed from one generation of jeliw to the next, and the principal Mande clans frame their identities in terms of descent from the ancestors described in epic tradition.

As specialists in maintaining the oral traditions of their culture, jeliw are known to their people as guardians of “The Word.” In early times they served as the spokespersons of chiefs (dugutigiw) and kings (mansaw), and were thus responsible for their patrons’ reputations in the community. Generations of jeli families were permanently attached to leading households and ruling dynasties, who supported the bards in exchange for their services in the verbal arts. The jeliw encouraged their patrons to strive for ambitious goals by reminding them of the examples set by their heroic ancestors, as described in the epic narratives. They pointed out mistakes through the use of proverbs, and admonished their patrons when they seemed likely to fail in their duties. At the same time, the bards’ own security depended on their rulers’ political power and social prestige, so the stories they told tended to be biased in favor of their patrons’ own ancestors.

In Mande societies, all matters involving family, clan, and ethnic kinship are of supreme importance. People are identified by their jamu—the family name or patronymic associated with famous ancestors remembered for important deeds alleged to have occurred around the beginning of the thirteenth century. Thanks to regular exposure to live or locally taped performances by jeliw that are played privately or heard regularly on local radio broadcasts, general awareness of the heroes and heroines of ancient times, like those in Sunjata, enters the people's consciousness in childhood and grows there throughout their lives. Memories of the ancestors are constantly evoked in praise songs and narrative episodes that are sung or recited by the bards on virtually any occasion that calls for entertainment. When elders meet in village council, the ancestral spirits are felt to be present because, according to tradition, it was they who established the relative status of everyone present, as well as the administrative protocols to be followed and the values underpinning every decision. The ancestors who are described in kuma koro or "ancient speech" define the identity of virtually everyone of Mande origin.

The performance of Sunjata would often be accompanied by musical instruments: a small lute (nkoni), a twenty-one-string calabash harp (kora), or a Malian xylophone (bala). Even without music, Mande oral poetry incorporates a kind of call-and-response rhythm through the repeated assent of the "naamu-sayer" (responding person) to each line sung by the jeli. The naamus of this secondary performer might be translated as "yes" or "We hear you." Common interjections include tinye ("it's true") in the indigenous language, as well as terms borrowed from Arabic and reflecting the influence of Islam, such as walahi ("I swear") and amina ("amen"). In all cases, the community hears not only the poem but an enthusiastic, repeated approbation of it. The jeli's own language when narrating the stories of the ancestors is also distinct from everyday speech, as he turns to kuma koro ("ancient speech") for the performance. Even the most central names in the story may vary according to the pronunciation of the individual jeliw and to regional differences, so that Sunjata, for example, may appear as Son-Jara, So'olon Jara, or Sunjara.

Oral literature that has been passed down from generation to generation is difficult to date. The epic material feeding this version of the Sunjata epic was narrated and recorded only in the late twentieth century, although it retells stories that go back centuries. Djanka Tasseý Condé, the jeli who narrated this version, lived his entire life in the small village of Fadama near the Niandan River in northeastern Guinea. Nominally a Muslim like most people in today's Mande society, Tasseý was descended from a lineage of Condé bards who trace their ancestry to forebears who lived before the arrival of Islam in the land of Dò ni Kiri as it is described in the Mande epic. Even among other bardic Manden families, the Condé of Fadama are respected for their vast knowledge of Mande epic tradition. In the 1970s and 1980s, Tasseý's brother Mamadi Condé was belentigi (chief bard) of Fadama, and one of the best-known Manden orators, distinguished for his depth of knowledge. When Mamadi died in 1994, his brother Tasseý became the belentigi. Several months later, David C. Conrad, who edited this version of Sunjata, began a collaborative relationship with Tasseý Condé that lasted until that great bard's death in 1997.

The passages collected here are from the rendering by Tasseý Condé of this communal, epic story. The narrative is episodic and often disjunct, full of magic (dalilu) and humor, as the jeli gives his own version of a story familiar to his listeners. The epic tells of the great expectation surrounding the birth of Sunjata, whose heroism has long been foretold. Foreigners come to defeat a wild buffalo that has been decimating Mande lands, and their first achievement is to recognize the buffalo woman Dò Kamissa as the culprit. They tame her with kindness, claiming that she resembles their mother, until she relents and offers them her wisdom. Urging them to look beyond appearances, she commends to them the deformed Sogolon, who will be the mother of Sunjata. When Sunjata is finally born, into a world full of sorcery and treachery, he barely escapes the many plots against him, and is eventually driven into exile by the jealousy of his stepbrother. His greatest achievement comes with the defeat of the tyrannous Sumaworo to liberate Manden, which the text recognizes as a foundational imperial gesture. Sunjata also emphasizes, however, that the hero's exalted stature comes at a great cost to the community: while Sumaworo furiously seeks the man who is fated to succeed him, we are told, the Mande people suffer his violent attacks.

Like most epics, Sunjata is a relation of the hero's many trials, which he surmounts through his courage, tenacity, and piety. Yet the singular hero is also deeply ensconced in his community: in order to lead he must find allies, cultivate friends, and honor his family. Part of the charm of Sunjata lies in its attention to detail, and its fresh humor as it relates the interactions of legendary heroes with the very concrete world around them. This is a poem about the power struggles that can lead to war, certainly, but it is also about people's relationship to a place and a landscape. Land takes on a concrete quality beyond its political significance as Sunjata pleads for a plot in which to bury his mother when she dies in exile. In its vivid re-creation of the hero's experience, Sunjata knits together the mythic and the everyday, the ancestral and the contemporary, providing for its Mande listeners a recognizable, living history, and for everyone else rich insight into the culture of a once-glorious empire.

From Sunjata<sup>1</sup>

The Search for a Special Wife

When Maghan Konfara<sup>2</sup> was a mansa in Manden, he had power, he had wealth, he was popular, and he had dalilu—but he had no child. Maghan Konfara, Sunjata's father, craved a child. Though his friends had begun to have children, he still had no child. But then his dalilu<sup>3</sup> showed that he would finally have a child. His moriw,<sup>4</sup> his sand diviners, and his pebble diviners<sup>5</sup> all said, "Simbon, you will sire a child who will be famous." Everybody he consulted said the same thing. "But try to marry a light-skinned woman," they told him. "If you marry a light-skinned woman, she will give birth to the child that has been foreseen." Because Maghan Konfara was powerful, he married nine light-skinned women. But aside from Flaba Naabi, none of them gave him a child. He was perplexed. From the

1. Translated from the Maninka by David C. Conrad. All notes were made by the translator unless otherwise indicated. In an excerpted section, the narrator, Tassef Condé, introduces the birth of the seventh king (mansa) Sunjata by recalling the lineage of kings born before Sunjata. He declares that he will not start from the very beginning since the listeners and the Mande people are all Adam's descendants.

2. Maghan Knofara is the father of Sunjata, also referred to as Simbon (Master Hunter) and Mansa (ruler) [editor's note].

3. Magic, occult, or secret power; in everyday use, any means used to achieve a goal.

4. Nominal Muslims who, in oral tradition, often perform divination.

5. Seers and healers who identify the source of all kinds of problems by spreading a pile of sand and reading symbols in it, or casting multiple objects such as pebbles or cowrie shells and reading the configurations in which they land. Diviners then prescribe appropriate sacrifices to remedy the problem.

last Wednesday of the month of Jomènè<sup>6</sup> to the same time the following year, Maghan Konfara did not sire a child. (If you want to know about Sunjata, then you have to learn what Sunjata's father and the people of Manden had to endure!)

He sent the moriw back into retreat, telling them, "I need a child, so do your best. It's said that if I sire the child that has been foreseen, that child will rule Manden. I must sire this child." The moriw, all of whom were present, went back into retreat. When they returned, they told him, "Simbon, marry somebody who is a mulatto." So he married nine mulatto women. But aside from Marabajan Tarawelé, none of those mulatto women gave birth. From that time of the year to the same time the following year, none of those women who were with him in the house bore any male children. Simbon was frustrated. Maghan Konfara sent the moriw back into retreat. He said, "Tell me the truth. Ah! If you see that I will not have any children, tell me. A child is something that only God can provide; it cannot be bought in the market." This time the moriw told him, "Very well, marry a black woman. Find a black woman who has a white heart." This time he married nine black women. But aside from Nyuma Damba Magasuba, none of them bore any children.

Maghan Konfara was frustrated. His moriw told him again, "Very well, man, free one of your slave girls and marry her." (In those days they still practiced slavery.) He liberated and married nine slave girls. But aside from Jonmusoni Manyan, none of the slave girls bore him any children. Frustrated, Simbon gathered the people of Konfara together on the last Wednesday of Jomènè.

When the people of Konfara had gathered, he separated the moriw, the sand diviners, and the pebble diviners into groups and sent them all into retreat. He said, "I told you not to hesitate. If you see that I won't have a child, tell me. Go into the house. If you do not tell me the truth, I'll kill all of you and replace you." When the moriw came out of retreat, they told him, "Simbon, you will sire a child. Make one of your jelimusow<sup>7</sup> happy. Marry her so she will give birth." He made nine jelimusow happy, but aside from Tunku Manyan Diawara, none of them ever gave birth.

Now all of Manden was frustrated. (It's hard to give birth to a child who will be famous!) And when all of Manden became frustrated, the diviners were ashamed of themselves. They met and swore an oath: "Any one of us who has broken a taboo should confess it. Maybe this is our fault. If we don't get together and tell this man the truth, the feet of our descendants will not be able to even break an egg in Manden." They went into retreat and came back out, telling Simbon, "Someone will come from the East. He will be coming from the land of the white-skinned people. This much has been revealed to us. Let this man pray to God for a solution to your problem. If you let this man pray to God on the matter of your son, anything he tells you will be God's word. We won't be able to accomplish this ourselves. God has shown us a good man."

While they waited there in Farakoro,<sup>8</sup> Manjan Bereté arrived. Manjan Bereté was the first Muslim leader of Manden; he opened the door<sup>9</sup> to the

6. The first month of the year.

7. Female bards (sing. jelimuso).

8. Sometimes shortened to "Farako." Evidently the hometown of Sunjata's father, located in the territory (jamana) of Konfura [editor's note]. Farakoro appears in the longer version of Maghan Konfura's name, as he was known to Tassej Condé and his ancestral bards of Fadama: Farako Manko Farakonken.

9. That is, he was instrumental in the introduction of Islam.

Mande people. (He is also the ancestor of the Bereté in Manden. The home of the Bereté people is Farisini Hejaji,<sup>1</sup> a region in the land of Mecca; the Bereté are Suraka.<sup>2</sup>) Bereté packed up some books and came from Farisi to the land of Manden because it was a powerful place. If he found someone in the land of Manden who would join him, who would work with the Koran, then his blessings would be great. Because he could not get used to the food here, Manjan Bereté brought Sansun Bereté, his little sister, with him when he came to meet Simbon. He brought his sister so she could prepare his food until he became better acquainted with the Mande people.

Manjan Bereté came and lived with Simbon. He said, "You need the religion practiced in my homeland. The Prophet has said nobody should take up swords in the religion again, that we should now be gentle with one another. Let us win people over with kindness, so we can awaken their minds and they can join the religion. The blessings will be great for anyone who accomplishes this."

[In an omitted passage, Konfara suggests that Bereté's sister is his destined wife. Bereté forbids this union, but his fathers and brothers convince him that Konfara can have his sister if he converts to Islam. Bereté's sister gives birth to a son, but it is not the foretold son.]

Simbon said, "How do I get that son? Pray to God for me to have that son. Will I get that son?"

"Yes, you will get that son."

"Very well, pray to God for that."

Manjan Bereté prayed to God. He said, "Simbon, you will get this child. When I was praying, God revealed to me that there are others like me who will come. They too will come from the land of the white-skins. Those people will not bring any woman with them when they come. But they will tell you the name of the place that is their destination, and if you ask them to, they will bring you a woman from that place. She will bear that child."

[In an omitted passage, the narrator describes the Moroccan background of two brothers, Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu, who will travel to the land of Dò ni Kiri to hunt a buffalo that is devastating the countryside, and will eventually become known as Danmansa Wulanni and Danmansa Wulanba.]

Two Hunters Arrive in Manden

Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu came to Manden from Morocco. When they got here they walked all night and all the following day, and were already under the three nkiliki trees of Manden by the evening of that second day. When Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu arrived under the trees, they measured out their food, cooked their meal, ate, and slept there.

(People used to rest under those three nkiliki trees when traveling to and from Dò ni Kiri, the home of the Condé. Travelers of Manden, from the home of the Mansaré, used to rest there, as did travelers from Negeboriya, the home of the Koroma. Travelers from Soso, from the home of the Kanté, also used to rest under those trees. People could get the news of the world there.)

1. "Farisi" is from Fars, a region in Persia. "Hejaji" is from Hejaz, a region that was the ancient cradle of Islam, including the Red Sea coast of Arabia and the cities of Mecca, Medina, and others.

2. A Maninka and Bamana term for the local perception of "Arab," which includes "Moors" and North Africans in general.

Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu, who were Arab kamalenw,<sup>3</sup> were worried, for they did not know where they were headed. They found a place where some traders had left their cooking pots. After eating, the Arab kamalenw said, "Let's lie down here and wait for these traders to return. We'll soon learn our next destination."

While Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu were sleeping, some traders who were on their way from Manden arrived. Some traders also arrived from Negeboriya, home of the Koroma. They all greeted one another.

The Arab kamalenw asked, "Is everything all right with the people of Manden?"

The traders replied, "There is nothing wrong with them."

"Is everything all right with the Koroma of Negeboriya?"

The traders said, "Nothing is troubling them." They too measured out their food; then they went to sleep.

While the brothers were lying there, some traders who were on their way from Soso arrived. These traders had visited Dò ni Kiri and found it in turmoil. Upon meeting Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu, they asked, "Where are you from?"

The kamalenw said, "We are from Morocco."

"Where are you going?"

The kamalenw replied, "We were on our way to the land of the Condé, but we don't know the way."

The traders said, "The mansa of Dò ni Kiri is Donsamogo Diarra; he is quarreling with his sister."

I just told you about this sister, called Dò Kamissa, the first daughter of Ma'an Solonkan. She and her brother, Donsamogo Diarra, were quarreling over the issue of the legacy left by Ma'an Solonkan, their mother.

Dò Kamissa said, "Donsamogo Diarra, if you refuse to share our mother's legacy with me, I'll take it myself."

The Condé elders said to her, "Go ahead and try to take a share for yourself; you are too headstrong."

"You think I can't take it for myself?"

"Yes, that's right." They did not know she had the power to transform herself into different things.

Dò Kamissa left the town and stayed in a farm hamlet near Dò ni Kiri. At that time, the place known as Dò ni Kiri included the twelve towns of Dò, the four towns of Kiri, and the six towns on the other side of the river. At the break of day, Dò Kamissa transformed herself into a buffalo and began to kill the people living in those places.

It became a bad time for Dò ni Kiri.

Donsamogo Diarra said, "This buffalo has killed all of the hunters that I requested from Manden." He sent a message to the Koroma of Negeboriya, but the buffalo killed all of the hunters who came from there. He sent for the hunters of Soso, but when they came the buffalo killed them all, too.

Donsamogo Diarra was at a loss. He sent out the word from Dò ni Kiri. He said, "People have died because of me. Anyone who kills this buffalo will get to choose a wife from three age sets<sup>4</sup> of Dò ni Kiri's girls." Everybody who visited Dò ni Kiri

3. Kamalenw: plural form of kamalen, a circumcised youth 15–25 years old.

4. Children born within the same span of about three years are identified as a single group or age set that grows up together, going through the various initiation rituals into adulthood.

was told about this. And when the traders returned to the camp under the nkiliki tree, they told Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu about the turmoil in Dò ni Kiri.

The traders said, “Things in Dò ni Kiri have become very bad. Donsamogo Diarra’s quarrel with his sister has resulted in many deaths. Hunger has come to Kiri because no one can go in or out. The paths to the village and farms have been closed. There is no way for crops to be brought home, for the buffalo is blocking the way. The Condé say that anyone who kills this buffalo will get to choose a wife from three sets of Dò ni Kiri girls.”

The Arab kamalenw were still camped there. The younger brother, Abdu Karimi, said, “Big brother, do you hear what they are saying?”

Abdu Kassimu replied, “I hear it.”

Together they said, “Let us go to Dò ni Kiri.”

The elder brother said, “Hey, little brother, what about these things they are talking about? Suppose the buffalo kills us?”

Abdu Karimi replied, “If the buffalo kills us, at least we’ll die for the sake of the Condé. They are having a bad time in Dò ni Kiri. I feel bad for them. Remember how our fathers told us the story of the Condé ancestor Samasuna?<sup>5</sup> Before the Prophet could make any progress, God told him to fight at Kaïbara.<sup>6</sup> The Condé ancestor Samasuna took a thousand of his sons to go and help our ancestors fight at the battle of Kaïbara, and there he lost all thousand of his sons. No matter how difficult the fight at Dò ni Kiri will be, it can’t be more difficult than the battle at Kaïbara.

“The thousand sons that the Condé ancestor Samasuna gave all died on the battleground of our ancestors’ war at Kaïbara. If the two of us should die for the sake of the Condé, will our deaths be equal to the deaths of those thousand men? If it’s our time to die, we should die for a good cause. We do not equal a thousand men. But if we should die for the sake of the Condé, we will only be doing what the thousand men did for those ancestors. So let us go to Dò ni Kiri. Knowing what the Condé ancestors suffered for our sake at Kaïbara, we would be bastards if we retreated now, after hearing that the Condé are suffering.” Thus Abdu Karimi encouraged his elder brother.

Abdu Kassimu now had the courage to go to Dò ni Kiri. But first the brothers packed their belongings and went straight to Konfara. They bypassed Dò ni Kiri and went straight to Manden.

When the brothers arrived in Manden, Manjan Bereté was sitting in a circle near Maghan Konfara. The two men were playing wari.<sup>7</sup> Manjan Bereté was sitting in the circle near Simbon, with prayer beads in his hands, praying to God: “May God not let me be embarrassed by my prediction.” They remained sitting when they saw Abdu Karimi and Abdu Kassimu approaching. When the two brothers arrived, all of the men met in that same circle, and Manjan Bereté and Maghan Konfara stopped playing wari.

5. Samson (Shamsūn in Arabic) is not mentioned in the Qur’an, but according to other sources of Muslim tradition (e.g., al-Tha’labi and al-Tabari), he dedicated his life to God and continually fought against idolators.

6. Maninka usage of Khaybar, an oasis ninety-five miles from Medina, Arabia, the site of a famous battle fought by the Prophet Muhammad and his army.

7. A popular game played with two rows of shallow holes, usually in a carved wooden board, with small stones or cowrie shells used as counters.

Abdu Karimi said, “My respected karamogo, we have come to God, we have come to the Mande people, and we have come to Simbon. What makes us walk fast will also make us talk fast.”

After greeting the brothers, the Mande people asked them, “Where did you come from?”

The Arab kamalenw said, “We come from Morocco.”

“What is your family?”

“We are Sharifu.”<sup>8</sup>

The Mande people saluted them, “You Haidara,”<sup>9</sup> to which the kamalenw replied, “Marahaba.”<sup>1</sup>

The Mande people said, “The honor is yours, the honor is Simbon’s.”

The Arab kamalenw said, “We come from Morocco. We are children of Abdu Sharifu. We are descendants of Saïdina Ali.”<sup>2</sup>

The kamalenw explained, “We have heard that the Condé are suffering, that they are quarreling with their sister who has transformed herself into a buffalo. Every morning the buffalo has killed people in all of the twelve towns of Dò, the four towns of Kiri, and the six towns across the river. That is why we have come. We want to go to Dò ni Kiri, to help the Condé with their trouble. We want you to perform the sand divination for us. If our sand is sweet, we will go to Dò ni Kiri. And if our sand is not sweet, we will still go to Dò ni Kiri.”

[In an omitted passage, the narrator recounts that the sand is indeed sweet and a sacrifice must accompany the divination. Before the hunters leave, Maghan Konfara asks for a wife but the younger brother refuses. The narrator introduces the buffalo's female genie companion, who advises the brothers on how to respond to abusive women they will meet, and how to approach Dò Kamissa, the Buffalo Woman, and avoid being killed by her.]

Dò Kamissa the Buffalo Woman

After walking for one kilometer, the brothers passed into the land of Konfara, and from there crossed into the land of the Condé. There they met a woman who had borne one child, just as the female genie had told them. The genie had said, “You will not see me again. But if you don’t heed the advice I give you, the buffalo will kill you.”

When they greeted this woman who had borne one child, she spoke abusively to them. She said, “Eh! Is it the woman who should greet first, or is it the man? You do not pass by a beautiful woman without greeting her!” She said every possible bad word to them.

8. Contraction of the longer plural form Shari-fulu from the Arabic Shurafa’ (sing. Sharīf, a lineage claiming descent from the family of the Prophet Muhammad).

9. A prestigious Muslim family name in Manden, here used in a greeting as the equivalent of Sharifu.

1. Response to a greeting that honors people by saluting their ancestors with the family name or jamu (patronymic, identity). From Arabic mrehba (“welcome”).

2. ‘Alī ibn Abī Tālib, cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet Muhammad, and one of the first converts to Islam; renowned as a warrior during Islam’s struggle for survival, he took part in most of the Prophet’s expeditions and displayed legendary courage at the battles of Badr and Khaybar.

They said, “M’ba.<sup>3</sup> We are children of the road. We do not know anything about women or men. We have never been to this country. We speak to everyone we meet, so they can help us.”

She replied, “Am I the one who is supposed to help you?”

Huh! They passed on by her without quarreling further.

After they passed that woman, they walked another kilometer and met the full-breasted girl. When they met this girl they said, “Lady, we greet you, God is great.”

Ah! She abused them. She said every bad word to them.

The younger brother said, “Aaah, you do not understand. A beautiful woman like you will pass by a man like that? You do not know what is happening.” (No matter how proud a girl is, once you call her “beautiful,” she will soften.)

After the hunters passed by the full-breasted girl, she went on her way. (Humility really comes only with death, but men act humbly until they get what they want.)

After walking on for another kilometer, they heard the pounding of the mortars and pestles<sup>4</sup> of Dò ni Kiri, and there they met Dò Kamissa herself. She carried a hoe on her shoulder and a walking staff served as her third leg.

When they said, “Greetings mother.” Heeeh! She cursed their father. After that, she cursed their grandfather. Then she cursed their mother.

“You are calling me mother? Was I the one who gave birth to your father or your mother?” She said every bad word to them.

Abdu Karimi said, “Big brother, don’t you think this lady resembles our mother?”

[In an omitted passage, the brothers help the buffalo woman feed her chickens before they arrive in Dò ni Kiri and are given lodging. They set out on their plan, treating the buffalo woman as they would treat their mother. After three failed attempts at forming a bond, she finally invites them into her home for a conversation.]

Dò Kamissa’s Revelations

Dò Kamissa the Buffalo Woman said, “You have outdone me. No one can get the better of people like you. You are polite. You were brought up well. Eh! Despite everything you were told, you were not discouraged. You favor me? Now I will cooperate with you. Were it not for you, I would have wiped out Dò ni Kiri.

“You know that Donsamogo Diarra, with whom I am quarreling, is my brother. I was the firstborn of my father’s children. When I reached puberty, I said, ‘My Lord God, I will give the largest of the two gold earrings that are on my ears to whoever brings me the news that my father has had a son. My Lord God, I will also give the beautiful outer one of the two wrappers I am wearing to the person that brings me such good news.’ I was the first to offer a sacrifice for my brother. So who does he think he is, telling me that women shouldn’t have property? Huh!

“I would have wiped out Donsamogo’s entire lineage. But you Sharifu, you have outdone me. I will cooperate with you and give you my life, for I know that if you kill me, you will bury me; you will not let my body go to God as a bad body.

3. Contraction of marahaba, a response to a greeting that honors people by saluting their ancestors with the family name or jamu (patronymic, identity). From Ar. mrehba (“welcome”).

4. The mortar is a large wooden receptacle in which women pound grain with a heavy, wooden, dub-shaped pestle that can be as long as five feet.

"Before I give myself up to you, though, I will ask you to do three things for me. If you agree to do those three things, then I will cooperate with you. But if you do not agree to those three things, I will keep after you until you do."

The kamalenw said, "Ma, tell us the three things you want us to do for you."

She said, "Here's the first: Don't go to town immediately after killing the buffalo; come to this hamlet instead. You'll find me dead. Because I am the only one who knows what I have done,<sup>5</sup> my brother must not see my corpse. When you arrive here, you'll see that I have poured water on the fire. There will be a hoe; there will also be an axe. Take the axe and cut down a toro tree. Take the hoe and dig my grave. After you have laid me in it, fire the musket. At no point can my brother, my father's son, see my body; nor can my body be carried to Dò ni Kiri. I have not done any good for them. I have wiped out their children, I have wiped out their wives, I have widowed their husbands; this is all my doing.

"That's the first thing you must do. Now, you know that whoever kills me will be rewarded with the choice of a wife from three sets of Dò ni Kiri's girls. The second thing you must do for me is refuse all of the fine young girls they bring out for you. Do not choose any of those girls as your wife, because they would be forcing my father's last-born to remain in the house. Five sets of girls have gone to their husbands, but she has not married, and if you do not marry her, she will never be married. She holds something special in her breast for whoever marries her. You, Sharifu, must marry her.

"She is very ugly. She's the 'Short Sogolon' you've heard about, the one who is so very ugly. I damaged one of her tear ducts and now her eyes water all the time. Her head is bald, she has a humped back, her feet are twisted, and when she walks, she limps this way and that. I, Dò Kamissa, did all of that to her.

"How could I make her so ugly when I loved her so much? I put my far-seeing mask<sup>6</sup> on her face before she was old enough to wear it, and, in doing so, cut her tear duct, caused her hair to fall out, and put a hump on her back. By putting her on my sorcery horse when she was too young, I twisted her feet, stretched her tendons, and made her knock-kneed. All of this is my fault. I take the blame, and if she does not get married, it will be my curse.

"So, when the men of Dò ni Kiri bring those beautiful Condé women to you, do not accept any of them. Choose my father's last-born. Some call her 'Humpbacked Sogolon.' Some call her 'Ugly Sogolon.' Everybody used to call her whatever they felt like. But the real name of that last-born child is Sogolon Wulen Condé. There will be something special in her breast for you because she'll have all the dalilu.<sup>7</sup>

"If you choose her over all the beautiful daughters they offer you and are not satisfied with the way she looks, then cut off the buffalo's tail when you kill it. The tail is heavy with gold and silver, because I took the gold and silver earrings of every Dò ni Kiri woman I killed and hung them from the hair of my tail. I have a lot of hair on my tail, and it is heavy with the gold and silver ear jewelry of the Dò ni Kiri women. If you exchange some of that gold, you can go and marry a beautiful woman somewhere else, a wife to have along with Sogolon Condé. But do not refuse to take Sogolon! Then there will be no problems. Will you do this, or not?"

5. Contrary to what the narrator has previously indicated.

6. A magic object allowing the wearer to see unimaginable distances. The concept might have entered oral tradition when Europeans were observed using telescopes and binoculars, but there also could have been an indigenous mask imbued with such power.

7. The mother's physical deformities signal her possession of special occult powers that she will pass on to her child.

The Sharifu said, “We agree to that.”

She said, “That is the second thing you must do. Here’s the third thing: the dead buffalo’s carcass must not be taken to the town.”

“Eh, Condé woman! We have agreed to your other demands, but we might not be able to do this. What if we can’t convince the people of Dò ni Kiri not to take the carcass back to town? What if they force us? We’ll be powerless to fight them off or to take the carcass from them.”

“Oh, you will do your best to heed what I have said. If you can do the other things, then forget about that last request. But you must respect my other two wishes.”

“Very well.”

As the brothers were about to leave, she said to them, “Sit down.” Once they were sitting, she said, “The weapons you brought won’t do anything to me. The arrows and quivers you brought won’t do anything either. I am in control of my own life.”

She put her hand in her basket of cleaned cotton, pulled out the spindle, and handed it to them. Then, putting her hand in her storage basket, she took out the distaff that usually holds the thread, and gave it to them, saying, “Put this in your bow and shoot the buffalo with it. It will stop the buffalo. If you do not shoot the buffalo with it—if you shoot a big arrow at the buffalo instead—then the buffalo will kill you.”

[In an omitted passage, Dò Kamissa provides the brothers with various enchanted objects that will help them kill her buffalo wraith.]

Death of the Buffalo

The brothers left the town and went into the bush, past the lake of Dò ni Kiri and into the forest. They crossed another open space and entered more forest. There, before going any further, they saw the buffalo.

(Before they came to the bush that day, the brothers’ name was Sharifu. But afterwards they were called Diabaté or Tarawèlè. They left their Sharifu identity behind in Manden<sup>8</sup> and came to be known as Tarawèlè and Diabaté. We will soon come to the reason for this.)

There was the buffalo. Abdu Karimi, the younger brother, said to Abdu Kassimu, “Big brother! You should be the one to take the magic dart and shoot the buffalo, because the killing of this buffalo will make history. The person who kills this buffalo will be mentioned in all of the future generations’ histories, right up until the trumpet is blown on Judgment Day. You are my big brother, so you kill the buffalo.”

Abdu Kassimu said, “Little brother, a job must be left to the experts. Yes, I was the first to be born. But I know what dalilu you have—and I know you must be the one to kill the buffalo.” He handed the magic dart to his younger brother.

Abdu Karimi told his elder brother to go on ahead. Crawling through the grass, Abdu Karimi came ever closer to the buffalo. He remembered what the old woman had told him: that he should not try to kill the buffalo until he was in its

8. Only after the buffalo is mortally wounded does Tassey begin to use the names by which the brothers are usually known, Danmansa Wulanni and Danmansa Wulanba. These probably originated as praise names based on the brothers’ exploits, e.g., Danmansa Wulanba can be roughly translated as “Big Lord of the Solitary Forest Buffalo.”

shadow. She'd said, "Do not miss me! If you miss the buffalo, I'll kill you." The younger brother crawled until he reached the buffalo's shadow. He took the distaff and put it on the spindle. He pulled the string of his bow back, back, back, he pulled it still harder, and he could feel that he had something very powerful in his hand. When he'd pulled the bowstring back to his shoulder, he let the spindle go, pow! It shot right into the buffalo's chest.

The buffalo was startled when the spindle pierced its chest. It raised its head, saw Abdu Karimi, and bellowed, hrrr! And there, while he was still right beside the wounded buffalo, Abdu Karimi told his elder brother, "Run!" for the buffalo had been shot and the struggle between them had begun.

(It's said that greatness will not be acquired without hardship. We've been telling you about the hardship Manden had to endure before the country could know peace. Sunjata would not have been born without this hardship, and without Sunjata, Manden would never have been sweet. And if Manden was never sweet, we Mande people would never have known ourselves!)

Bellowing, the buffalo began to chase the kamalenw, it came up behind Abdu Karimi, who was trying to catch up with his elder brother. Abdu Karimi dropped the bamboo stick, which instantly sprouted into a grove of bamboo, and before the buffalo could get through it, the kamalenw were far ahead.

Once it was clear of the bamboo, the buffalo started chasing them again. When it came up behind them and bellowed, the brothers dropped the hot charcoal. In those days, the Mande bush had been there a long time and had never been burned. So when the kamalenw dropped the hot charcoal, the bush caught on fire, stopping the buffalo and forcing it back while they dashed ahead through the grass.

When the fire died out, the buffalo jumped into the ashes and started chasing them again. But by the time it reached them and bellowed, they were already at the lake of Dò ni Kiri. There Abdu Karimi dropped the egg, which turned the ground into deep mud. The buffalo got stuck in the mud. (This is the mud referred to in the Condé song "Dala Kombo Kamba":

"Condé drinker of big lake water,
Those who drank the big lake water,
They did not stop to clean it.
Those who clean the big lake,
They did not drink its big water."

It was Danmansa Wulanba and Danmansa Wulanni<sup>9</sup> who cleaned the water of the big lake.)

By the time the mud started to dry, it was too late for the buffalo: the spindle wounds were letting water into its intestines, and it fell down. When the buffalo fell, Danmansa Wulanni said, "Big brother, look behind you! The buffalo has fallen."

A new family lineage was created at the moment the elder brother looked back and saw that the buffalo was dying. Going back, he put his foot on the buffalo's body. He said, "Ah, little brother! You have given me a name. Ah, little brother! You were sired by Abdu Mutulu Budulaye, Abdu Mutulu Babatali. Aba Alibi's own son is Sedina Alia, to whom God gave a sword, and you were sired by Alia. Sedina Alia's son is Hassana Lonsani, and you were sired by him. Hassana Lonsani's son

9. The elder brother is Wulanba, the younger Wulanni.

is Sissi; Sissi's son is Kèmo; Kèmo's son is Kèmomo Tènè; Kèmo Tènè's son is Sharifu—and you were sired by Sharifu. Aah, Karimi! You have given us names.”

After hearing this praise, the younger brother said, “Eh, big brother! If you were a praise-singer or jeli, no one could surpass you (i jèmba tè)!”

That was the beginning of the jeli family known as Diabaté;<sup>1</sup> that was the origin of the lineage. “Diabaté” was first said in Manden, in the Mande language, when the buffalo was killed in the bush.

Once the buffalo was dead, the brothers saw that its tail was heavy with gold and silver.

In cutting off the buffalo's tail, the brothers were able to take for themselves all of the gold and silver in its hair. The kamalenw were also able to use the tail as proof that they really had killed the buffalo. As soon as they showed the tail, people knew that the business was finished, because the tail of Dò Kamissa's buffalo wraith could only be cut off if the buffalo was dead. Ahuh! (And this was the beginning of the custom of removing the tails of dead game.)

[In an omitted passage, Danmansa Wulanba and Danmansa Wulanni try to respect Dò Kamissa's wish that her wraith be buried in the bush, but the townspeople insist on retrieving the buffalo carcass and dragging it into town to be desecrated.]

Sogolon Wulen Condé of Dò Ni Kiri

After the buffalo was dead, the people of Dò ni Kiri started beating the ceremonial drum. All of the people living in the twelve towns of Dò, the four towns of Kiri, and the six towns across the river were expected to attend, and they all came. When the twenty-two towns were all present, the people said, “What did we say? We said that we'll bring out three age sets of girls for the hunter that kills this buffalo, and that he can choose any girl from among them to be his wife. Bring your daughters forward.” (Huh! If you bring out three age sets of daughters from twenty-two towns, you should bring out the oldest set first, then the next oldest, then the youngest set.)

The villagers brought out the beautiful Condé girls, formed them into three circles, and told the boys to choose. The people said, “Even if you choose ten or twenty girls, they will be your wives. Or if you choose only one girl, she will be your wife. You have delivered us from disaster! And everyone here wants to have their daughters married to you two boys.

“You Sharifu, we don't go back on our promises. Take a look at these girls, and take any one that pleases you.” The two men followed one another, walking around, around, around the circle. When they had returned to where they started they said, “Where are the rest of the girls?”

The Condé ancestor said, “You young men search every house, so that no one can hide his daughter.”

1. The singing or chanting of praises is an occupational specialty of jeliw. This is a popular etymology explaining how the Diabaté jeliw acquired their family name. When the younger brother killed the buffalo and the elder brother praised his courage by reciting their family genealogy, this was the way a jeli would do it. When the younger brother said, “no one could surpass you,” the phrase jèmba tè evolved through repetition into “Diabaté” which, along with “Kouyaté,” is one of the two names exclusive to traditional bards.

The villagers searched the entire town but found no other girls. Everybody wanted to marry their daughter to the brothers!

When the searchers returned they said, "There is nobody left."

A bystander said, "What about the bad old woman who was just killed? She has her father's last-born still in her house."

Somebody said, "Eeh, man! Heeeye, can we show that one to the strangers?"

Danmansa Wulanni said, "Go and get that woman you're talking about. Has she been married to another man?"

They said, "No."

"Has she been married before?"

"No."

The brothers said, "Well, if she is unmarried, go get her."

The people said, "Out of five age sets of girls that have found husbands, only she has remained unmarried."

The brothers said, "If she is an unmarried girl, go get her."

Ma Dò Kamissa had told them that the door of Sogolon Wulen Condé's father's house was the one facing the town's meeting ground. She'd also told them, "When Sogolon is coming from my father's house to go into the town meeting ground, a little black cat will come from behind her and pass in front of her; the little black cat will go from in front of her and pass behind her. If you see that happening to anyone, then you'll know that she is the girl I am talking about."

They sent for Sogolon, and as she was being brought out of the house—just as she reached the edge of the town meeting ground—a black cat came from behind her and passed in front of her; it went from in front of her and passed behind her.

As soon as the brothers saw Sogolon, they said, "This is the one we've been talking about."

They heard people go, "Wooo!"

They were asked, "Is this really the one you were talking about?"

To which the brothers replied, "Yes, this is the one we have been talking about."

Ancestor Donsamogo Diarra said to them, "You Sharifu, is this the one you want?"

To which they replied, "Yes, this is the one we want."

"Are you sure this is the one you want?"

"This is the one we want."

He said, "This one is even more powerful than my sister, whom you killed, and you know how much dalilu she had. This one has really powerful dalilu. But if you say that you want her, I'll give her to you. Go ahead and take her with you. If you're not compatible, just bring her back. I'll return her to where you found her, and I'll give you another wife.

"Now, I don't want to contradict myself, but just take another look at these other girls. We'll give you up to three months. If, after three months, you're not compatible with my sister, come back and I will give you one of these girls. I will put my sister back where she came from."

The brothers said, "Very well."

She was Sogolon, the woman who was given to them, the mother of Simbon. Simbon, whose birth was foretold and who united Manden—this is the child about to be born. We can talk about Turama'an, we can talk about Kankejan, or of Tombonon Sitafa Diawara, of Fakoli, Sumaworo, or of Tabon Wana Faran

Kamara; but the one who organized them all, united them into one place and called it Manden, well, the person who did all those things was Sunjata, and this is how his mother was married.

[In an omitted passage, both brothers try to consummate the marriage but are unsuccessful. They reach Konfara and offer Sogolon to Maghan Konfara. While Simbon prepares for their meeting, the community shows the new bride a mixed welcome. At the threshold of the new couple's home, Sogolon and Konfara test each other with three magical back-and-forth attacks before Sogolon acquiesces to her role as a traditional bride. On their wedding night, she uses sorcery to watch the other women dancing, making them wary of her.]

Sogolon was still a virgin when she came to Maghan Konfara. After three days, her bloody virgin cloth was taken out. The following month, she became pregnant with Sunjata. That is how Sunjata was conceived.

The co-wives said, "We won't be able to do anything against this woman." She had gone to her husband almost at the end of the lunar month, and for the rest of that month, she did not see the other moon. She had conceived.

When the women of Manden heard this, they went outside the town and held a meeting under a baobab tree. They said, "Getting pregnant is one thing, delivering is another. Make miscarriage medicine, anything that will spoil the belly with a touch. Everyone must prepare her own."

Sogolon Condé also had very powerful dalilu. When her belly started to expand, the other wives would visit her, saying, "Younger sister, this is the medicine we use here in Manden for pregnant women. Aah, all of the women here wanted a child, but we have not been able to conceive. You may be the lucky one bearing our husband's child—but the child belongs to all of us. Here, M'ma,<sup>2</sup> dilute this medicine in water and drink it."

Heh, Sogolon, the Condé woman, diluted that medicine in water and drank it. She drank it and drank it, for seven years. And each time she drank it, her belly would shrink away, jè!

After seven years of this, Sogolon Condé went outside the town.

She prayed to God. She said, "M'mari! That is enough! Enough of what those Mande people have done to me. I come to you, God. I am only a stranger here, and the men who brought me here cannot help."

[In an omitted passage, the narrator describes his own family's relationship with characters in the narrative, and with ancestors from Arab tradition.]

The Childhood of Ma'an Sunjata

God made Ma'an Sunjata into a person, made him into a human fetus and brought him into the world.

When the Mande women heard the news of Ma'an Sunjata's birth, they again gathered together under the Mande baobab tree. They said, "It is one thing to give birth to a son, but another thing for him to survive."

Then what did they do to him? Through sorcery they stretched the tendons of his two feet. They lamed him and forced him to crawl on the ground for one year!

2. Affectionate greeting to a woman, equivalent to the masculine "M'ba" [editor's note].

Two years!
 Three years!
 Four years!
 Five years!
 Six years!

Then, in Sunjata's seventh year, the co-wives provoked Sogolon to anger. (Because we are walking on a straight path, we cannot wander from one side to the other. We have to take the main road, so we will know how Manden was built.)

One day, in Sunjata's seventh year, Maramajan Tarawèlè was picking some leaves from the same baobab tree that we've already mentioned. As Maramajan Tarawèlè was on her way back to the villiage, Ma Sogolon Wulen Condé, who was sitting under the eaves of the house she shared with Ma'an Sunjata, asked, "Big sister Maramajan Tarawèlè, won't you give me a few of your baobab leaves?"

Maramajan Tarawèlè said, "Ah! Younger sister, you are the only one of us to have a son. Why would you ask us for baobab leaves? Your lame son is sitting right there inside the house. If you want baobab leaves, why don't you tell your son to stand up and go get some?"

Ma Sogolon Wulen Condé said, "Ah, that is not what I meant. I thought I could depend on the help of my sisters. I didn't know you were upset because I had this child."

The two women didn't know Sunjata was listening to them.

Afterwards, when Ma Sogolon Condé walked by, Sunjata said, "Mother! Mother!" She did not answer because she knew he had overheard them.

He said, "Mother, what are they saying?"

"Forget about that talk."

"Ah, how can I ignore that? Mother, I'll walk today. They insult you by saying you have a lame person in your house, and yet you beg them for a baobab leaf? I'll walk today. Go and get my father's sunsun<sup>3</sup> staff, and bring it to me. I'll walk today."

Ma Sogolon Condé went and got the sunsun staff and brought it to Simbon. When he attempted to stand by thrusting the sunsun staff firmly into the ground and holding on to it, the sunsun staff broke.

Sunjata said to Sogolon, "Ah, mother. They say you have a lame son in the house, but you gave birth to a real son. Nothing happens before its time. Go and bring my father's iron staff." But when she gave him the iron staff, he broke it, too.

He said, "Go and tell my father's blacksmith to forge an iron staff so I can walk." The blacksmith carried one load of iron to the bellows, forged it, and made it into an iron staff. But when Sunjata thrust that iron staff into the ground and tried to stand, the staff bent. (That iron staff, the one they say was bent by Sunjata into a bow, is now in Narena.)

Sunjata broke both of his father's staffs and an iron one that was forged for him. Therefore, when he stood, he did it on his own, first lifting one foot, then the other foot, then the other one, and so on.

His mother said, "Simbon has walked!"

The jeliw sang this song:

3. An extremely hard wood called "false ebony" or "West African ebony" [editor's note].

“Has walked,
Jata has walked.
Has walked,
Jata has walked.”

Thus it was his mother's rivalry with her co-wives, and their humiliation of her, that caused Jata to walk. (That is why I can't believe it when I hear people saying they do not love their mother! Heh! Jelimoril<sup>4</sup> Your father belongs to everyone, but your mother belongs only to you. When you meet people for the first time, they don't ask you about your father; they ask about your mother.)

After that, God gave Sunjata feet. Sunjata went into the house, took his father's bow and quiver, and left town. (Some people say he made the bent iron staff into his bow, but don't repeat that.)

When he reached the baobab tree, he shook it, uprooted it, and put it on his shoulder. He carried it into his mother's yard and said, “Now everyone will come here for baobab leaves.”

So it was that when the Mande women next saw Sogolon they said, as they picked the baobab leaves, “Aah, Sogolon Condé! We knew this would happen for you. The prayers and sacrifices we made on your behalf have been answered.” (Now, when you are having a hard time, everyone abuses you. But when things are going well for you, people say, “We knew this would happen for you.” May God help us persevere!)

Sogolon eventually had three more children. After So'olon Ma'an was born—but before he could walk—his younger brother So'olon Jamori was born. Then, while So'olon Ma'an was still crawling on the ground, Manden Bori was born. Finally after So'olon Ma'an walked, So'olon Kolonkan was born.

[In an omitted passage, Sunjata's enemies conspire with nine sorceresses to kill him, but one sorceress warns him and reveals that the sorceresses agreed to kill him only because the reward is a dead bull and the sorceresses crave meat. Sunjata suggests that he provide the meat instead and that they spare his life. He upholds his end of the compromise and the sorceresses vow that no female, human or animal or otherwise, will ever hurt him. Dankaran Tuman and his mother conspire to have Sunjata murdered in his sleep. Meanwhile, Sunjata spends a rainy day playing the hunter's harp while he waits for the weather to change so he can go hunting.]

Mistaken Murder and the Question of Exile

As So'olon Ma'an waited for the rain to stop so he could go hunting, he sat in his hammock with his six-stringed hunter's harp and sang to himself. (His younger brothers Manden Bori and So'olon Jamori were also harp players.) After playing “Kulanjan”<sup>5</sup> for a while, Sunjata changed tunes and played “Sori.”<sup>6</sup>

Some youths passing by So'olon Ma'an's door heard him singing in a low, sweet voice and stopped in his door to listen. One of these youths was an apprentice hunter. He said, “I will listen to Sunjata until the rain stops.”

4. During performances, jeliw occasionally speak to people in the audience, commenting on something in the narrative.

5. One of the oldest melodies in the bards' repertory; often dedicated to hunters, Sumaworo is praised as “Kulanjan.”

6. A lesser-known melody dedicated to hunters.

While the youth stood at the door, Sunjata put some snuff into his mouth. When the snuff was wet, he stopped playing the harp and went to spit out the door, where he noticed the young man. Sunjata said, "Who's there?"

The youth said, "Brother So'olon Ma'an, it is me."

"Ah, what are you doing here?"

"Your brother sent a message that we should bring him some food and supplies. So that's what I'm doing. But it is raining, and a slave with wet clothes does not enter the house of his betters. I am an apprentice hunter at the farm. I stopped under your eaves when I heard your music. Let me keep listening to you until the rain stops."

(Meanwhile, the musket<sup>7</sup> of conspiracy was being loaded in town.)

So'olon Ma'an said to the youth, "Come into the house."

The young man entered the house and sat on the edge of the bed. Simbon was playing the harp. When he played certain parts, the young man would tap his feet, because the harp music was so sweet. But the youth was also tired, and the warm room felt good to him. He became sleepy and started to nod. Ma'an Sunjata told him, "Lie on the bed." When the young man was asleep on the bed, Simbon stood up and covered the young man with a blanket. When the rain stopped, Sunjata—who forgot about the young man sleeping there—stood up, put on his crocodile-mouth hat, took his hunter's hammock, his quiver, bow, and fly whisk,<sup>8</sup> shut the front door, and went out the back. Taking a deep breath, he went into the bush.

While Simbon was in the bush, Dankaran Tuman came and stood under the eaves of the house, where he heard the young man snoring. He did not know that Ma'an Sunjata had left the house.

Dankaran Tuman went and told the seven young men, "Didn't I tell you that Sunjata sleeps anytime it rains into the evening? He's sleeping now; go get your clubs."

After getting their clubs, the seven young men came to Simbon's door. But they were afraid of him. To each other they said, "Man, don't you know who So'olon Ma'an is? One man can't outdo him, two men can't outdo him, even the seven of us together can't outdo him. When we go in, listen carefully for the sound of his breathing, and be sure to hit him on the head. If we only hit him on the back, he'll be sure to capture us." They went in and surrounded the young man. When they located the source of his breathing, they raised their clubs and hit him on the head. They beat him until his body went cold.

When the body was cold, they left to tell Dankaran Tuman that they'd finished the work he had given them. Dankaran Tuman told his mother, "Ahah, Mother. The bad thing is now off our backs. He is dead." (No matter how good you think you are, you'll always do something bad to your enemy!)

"Eh! Dankaran Tuman," she said, "has he died?"

"Yes! The son of the Condé woman has died today!"

7. Maninka morifa. The first firearms did not arrive in West Africa until the 16th century, but the jeliw frequently speak of muskets in the time of Sunjata. Linear chronology is not a pressing issue in their views of the distant past, but what is of interest is the imagery of a formidable weapon and a hero's power to repel any iron projectile.

8. Ideally made from the tail of a dangerous wild animal and possibly symbolizing the one cut from the slain Buffalo of Dò, although elephant tails were highly prized for this essential hunters' device carrying occult protective qualities.

"Ah, my son! Now I will not be the failure in my husband's home. Now my heart is cool. If you have killed Ma'an Sunjata, aagba! Manden Bori and So'olon Jamori can't stand up to you. The only brother I was worried about has been killed."

They did not sleep that night.

Sansun Bereté said, "Hee, just wait until Sogolon Condé knows about this."

When day broke, Dankaran Tuman and his mother went to spy on Sogolon.

"Huh!" they whispered. "Don't say or do anything! When he's slept for a long time, his mother will go and open the door on him."

Sansun Bereté said, "If you don't say anything, no one will guess that you are the one who killed him."

As the soft morning sun rose on them, they saw Sunjata, Danama Yirindi<sup>9</sup>—yes, the son of the Condé woman—walking along, carrying three dead animals; one was hanging over his left shoulder, one was hanging over his right shoulder, and one was on his head.

When they saw him, Sansun Bereté said, "Dankaran Tuman! Didn't you say that Sunjata was dead?"

Dankaran Tuman replied, "Mother, we really killed him."

"Then who is this coming? Who is coming?"

"It is Sunjata who is coming."

When they saw that it really was Sunjata, Dankaran Tuman peed in his pants.

Walking up to them, Sunjata said to Sansun Bereté, "Big mother, here is some wild game for you." Then, laying another animal before his step-brother, he said, "Big brother, here is one for you."

There was nothing they could say.

Sunjata carried the last animal to his mother's place and said, "Mother, here is your animal."

His mother said, "Ah, my son, thank you."

When he returned to his house and pushed the door open, there were flies all over the stinking body—wooooo!

Sunjata shouted, "Mother, Mother! Come here! I'll kill someone today. Ever since I was born, I've never done anything bad like this. My brother did this, and I'll take revenge."

Ma Sogolon Condé came to the door.

Sunjata said, "You see this? I went to the bush and forgot about the young man you see lying here. My brother's men beat him to death with their clubs. I'll kill for this young man. I know this is Dankaran Tuman's boy, but he died my death. I'll prove to them that I am not the one who died."

Ma Sogolon Condé knew that Konfara would be destroyed by So'olon Ma'an's revenge, because he would kill anyone known to be one of Dankaran Tuman's supporters.

Sunjata dashed out of the house. When he reached for his iron staff, his mother ran and called Jelimusoni Tunku Manyan Diawara.

Sogolon said, "Sunjata is going to kill someone right now if you don't stop him."

Jelimusoni Tunku Manyan Diawara went and took hold of Simbon.

She said, "Simbon, won't you think about your mother? Simbon! Won't you think of me? Won't you leave this to God? Don't you realize that Dankaran Tuman has poked himself in the eye?" Sunjata tried and tried to break away, but she would not let go. Ha! She was able to hold him.

9. A praise-name for Sunjata that can be translated as "superhero."

Then Ma Sogolon Condé said, “My son Sunjata, your popularity is your biggest problem. If they have started murdering people because of you, shouldn’t we go away?”

This is why they went into exile. (One never sells his father’s homeland, but it can be pawned!)

Departure for Exile

[In an omitted passage, Sunjata repeatedly refuses to flee from his step-brother, but Sogolon argues that neither he nor Dankaran Tuman can understand the special circumstances of her background in Dò ni Kiri and how she was brought to their father because of Sunjata’s destiny. She convinces Sunjata that even if they go away, he will eventually take over the leadership of Manden.]

Ma Sogolon Condé then set out to visit Sansamba Sagado, the Somono<sup>1</sup> ancestor. (This is the Sansamba Sagado you always hear about in the histories of Manden. He was involved with the organization of Manden, and those towns along the bank of the river—Jelibakoro, Sansando, and Baladugu—are populated with his Mande descendants. If you talk about Manden without talking about Sansamba Sagado, you have not covered the subject of Manden.)

Saying, “Sansamba Sagado,” Sogolon removed her silver wrist and ankle bracelets and gave them to the Somono ancestor as the price for a future river crossing. This way, he would take her children across the river whenever they needed to cross, at any time of day or night, without anybody in Manden knowing that he’d done so.

The days passed. Then, one day, at three o’clock in the morning, Sogolon woke up her children and said, “The time has come for what we talked about.”

They left together. When they came to the riverbank, she took the path to Sansamba Sagado’s house. Waking him, she said, “This is the day we talked about.”

He was not a man to break his promise. Taking his bamboo pole and his paddle, he left to meet Sogolon and her children in the bushes by the bank of the river. The water was rising; it nearly touched the leaves on the bushes. Sansamba Sagado’s canoe was attached to a npeku tree; he untied it and brought it to them, saying, “Get in!”

Ma Sogolon Condé, her daughter Ma Kolonkan, Manden Bori, and So’olon Jamori got into the canoe. But when they told Sunjata to get in, he refused.

Ma Sogolon Condé said, “Ah, Sunjata! Do you want to make me suffer?”

He said, “Mother, if I told you that I will go with you, then I will go. You take the canoe now; I will join you later.”

They crossed the river in the canoe, and before they could reach the other side, they saw Sunjata sitting on the bank. He had brought his dalilu with him.

A Visit to Soso

[In an omitted passage, Sogolon decides to stop in Soso to ask for the help of Sumaworo, a powerful sorcerer who, in his youth, had been her husband’s hunting apprentice. Meanwhile, Sumaworo’s personal oracle informs him that the man who will eventually take Soso and Manden away from him has not

1. Maninka- or Bamana-speaking specialists in fishing, canoeing, boating, and the water-borne transport of people and goods.

only been born, but has grown up into a hunter and will be identifiable as the one who violates Sumaworo's taboo.]

They were now in Soso.

Sogolon Condé arrived and said, "Eh, Soso mansa. These are the children of your former master. Their relationship with their brother is strained, and murder has been committed as a result. The death of one of two friends<sup>2</sup> does not spoil the friendship; the one who survives continues the friendship. I've come to put Ma'an Sunjata and his younger siblings under your protection. You should train them to be hunters, people who can kill their own game." (Oh! She did not know that Dankaran Tuman had sent a message ahead of them to Soso!)<sup>3</sup>

Sumaworo said, "Condé woman, that pleases me. I agree to care for them and take them under my protection, so long as they do not interfere with my sacred totem."

"God willing, they will never spoil your totem."

"Well, if they do not interfere with my totem, then I agree to protect them."

They spent the day there. That evening Ma Sogolon Condé said that she had brought a small amount of cotton she wanted to spin at night, and asked the children of Soso to collect a pile of dried cow dung she could use to light her lantern of conversation.<sup>4</sup> The children brought her the cow dung she needed. Sumaworo owned all the musical instruments, and he brought all of them—except for the bala<sup>5</sup>—out for the first time that night. He brought out the kèrèlèng-kèngbèng,<sup>6</sup> the kòwòro,<sup>7</sup> the donso nkoni,<sup>8</sup> the three-stringed bolon,<sup>9</sup> the soron,<sup>1</sup> and the kora.<sup>2</sup> (The kora was the last of the instruments to be brought out; that is why they call it ko la, which means "the last one.")<sup>3</sup> Eventually it came to be called kora. It is played in Kita and Senegal.)

Taking out his nkoni,<sup>4</sup> Sumaworo sat down by the people who were talking. Sunjata and his siblings came and sat down too. Contented, Ma Sogolon Condé said, "Wait. I will sing three songs." They said, "Very well." When anybody sang, Sumaworo would accompany them on the nkoni.

For Ma Sogolon Condé's first song, she sang:

"Big ram,
The pen where the rams are kept,
The leopard must not enter,
Big ram.

2. Sumaworo and Sunjata's father.

3. Offering a reward to kill Sunjata.

4. When villagers gather after dark to socialize and play music, they do it around a lantern to avoid burning valuable fuel needed for cooking fires.

5. An indigenous xylophone.

6. Named from the sound it makes (i.e., onomatopoeic), this child's instrument consists of a tin can resonator (or a tiny gourd) and a stick for a neck that supports a single string.

7. More commonly known as dan, an inverted open calabash instrument with a neck for each of its six strings; technically known as a pentatonic pluria.

8. The hunters' harp, a large animal-skin-covered calabash with a single neck and six strings, played to praise hunters.

9. The harp used to praise warriors; larger and deeper toned than the hunters' harp, an animal-skin-covered calabash with a single neck supporting three or four strings.

1. A large, rarely seen harp of northeastern Guinea, similar to the kora but with twelve strings.

2. With twenty-one strings, the largest of the calabash harps.

3. Ko la = literally "later on," another popular etymology.

4. Bamana ngoni; a traditional lute consisting of four to five strings attached to a single neck on a wooden, trough-shaped body covered with animal skin.

The pen where the rams are kept,
The leopard must not enter.”

Sumaworo’s nkoni was in harmony with her song.
After that, what else did she sing? She sang:

“Pit water,
Don’t compare yourself with clear water flowing over
rocks,
The pure white rocks.
Pit water,
Don’t compare yourself with clear water flowing over
rocks,
The pure white rocks.”

Again, Sumaworo’s nkoni was in harmony with her song.
The third song she sang was:

“Big vicious dog,
If you kill your vicious dog,
Somebody else’s will bite you,
Vicious dog.
If you kill your vicious dog,
Somebody else’s will bite you.”

Sumaworo’s nkoni was still in harmony with her song.
Then the gathering broke up.

[In omitted passages, Sumaworo performs a ritual to identify his rival for power, learns that it is Sunjata, and resolves to kill him. Sunjata intentionally violates a taboo by sitting in Sumaworo’s sacred hammock, confirming that he is the rival described by the oracle. In an episode about Sumaworo’s youthful rebelliousness and leadership, he invents different stringed musical instruments at various stages of his youth. The narrator describes Fakoli’s birth by his father’s second wife, Kosiya Kante, who was also the sister of Sumaworo. During his hunting apprenticeship, Sumaworo encounters a group of genies and their instruments. Sumaworo covets the bala, but when he hears that the price would be people, four members of his family, he refuses. Kosiya, upon hearing this, decides to sacrifice herself, and Fakoli is raised by his father’s first wife, who carries him to the sacred sites of Manden to receive protective devices and become a hunter.]

The scene then shifts back to Soso at the time of Sogolon’s visit with her children, when Sumaworo is in power. Sumaworo interprets the meaning of the songs sung earlier by Sogolon. Sunjata violates Sumaworo’s sacred taboo, the two men engage in the deadly snuff-taking ritual, and Sunjata is banished from Soso. Continuing the journey into exile, Sunjata violates sacred taboos in each of the places they stop, including Nema, where they remain.]

Sumaworo’s Tyranny over Manden

When Sogolon and her children were staying with ancestor Faran Tunkara at Kuntunya in Nema, he sometimes sent Sunjata on journeys out between the edges of the village and the place where the sun sets. Whenever war broke out, the village sent for Sunjata, who would come and join the Kuntunya army, marching along with them. Whenever he captured three prisoners, he kept one for himself. Whenever he captured five prisoners, he kept two. Whenever he captured ten prisoners, he kept four as his share. (The other six captives were given to the Kuntunya mansa.) This is how Sunjata collected his own band of men.

Sunjata stayed in Kuntunya for twenty-seven years, and before the end of the twenty-seventh year, well, things turned very bad in Manden. Things were terrible in Manden! Sumaworo, who was looking for Sunjata, had sent his warriors to Manden. Whenever Sumaworo consulted Nènèba, his oracle, it would say, "Your successor has grown."

Before consulting Nènèba, Sumaworo first had to have three age sets of young men pile wood beneath Nènèba's cauldron; this had to be done morning and evening, for the oracle always said, "Fire, fire, fire, fire, fire, fire." Then Sumaworo would bathe in the cauldron's medicines whenever he went to visit Nènèba. And Nènèba would tell Sumaworo what to sacrifice before setting out to war.

Every morning Nènèba told Sumaworo, "Sumaworo, only God knows the day. Your successor has grown up."

Sumaworo asked the Mande people, "Has Ma'an Sunjata returned to Manden?" Meanwhile, he laid waste to Manden nine times. The Mande people struggled and rebuilt their villages nine times during Sumaworo's failed search for Sunjata.

Whenever Sumaworo killed some Mande villagers, he would tell his men to search among the bodies for the Condé woman's son. But his men never found Sunjata; instead, they would return saying, "The Mande people do not know the whereabouts of the Condé woman's son."

Sumaworo then summoned all of the Mande villagers to Kukuba. He killed all of the men who attended this meeting except for the leaders Turama'an and Kankejan, who could disappear in broad daylight, and Fakoli, who could stand and vanish instantly. The people who had that kind of dalilu were the only ones he did not kill; he killed all of the other men. The people of Manden mourned and wept. But Ma'an Sunjata and his brothers were not there.

After another month had passed, Sumaworo summoned his men to Bantamba, saying, "I have to finish off the Mande. If I do that, I'll find my successor. If I kill all the human beings, my successor will be among them."

So he called the Mande to a meeting in Bantamba. After looking them over he said to his men, "Kill them all." Only those who had the power to disappear in broad daylight escaped. Again Manden wept.

He summoned the Mande to Nyèmi-Nyèmi, and they wept there, too.

Every time Mande people were summoned by Sumaworo, it ended in mourning. Sumaworo was killing the people of Manden, searching among the bodies for his successor. After every massacre, he would go to his Nènèba. (The Kantés now have that Nènèba in Balandugu, the only town they established. Sumaworo's descendants did not establish any other towns, because he was so ruthless.) The Nènèba would say, "Sumaworo, uh heh. You still haven't found him yet? You've killed so many, yet the one you want is not among them."

Sumaworo asked, "What should I do?" To which the oracle replied, "Keep searching for him. He has reached maturity."

When the Mande people were summoned again, this time to Kambasiga, Fakoli went to see Kani Simbon, the Kulubali ancestor.

He said, "Simbon. Manden is about to be wiped out. We must sit down together and find a solution to this problem in Manden. Manden will be reduced to being Soso's peanut farm, because Sumaworo has said two things. He has said, 'Manden's reputation is better than Manden itself,' and 'The Mande women are better than the Mande men.' By this he meant that Manden has only women because he's killed all the men. He said these things to provoke Sunjata, who he now knows to be his successor, into responding." Having said that, Fakoli then returned to Manden and said, "Let us build a council hall at the edge of town, and let the surviving men of Manden hold meetings there. If we don't get together, Manden is doomed." So the men worked hard and built a council hall. Afterwards, they sat in front of the council hall while Fakoli addressed them.

He said, "We have finished building this council hall, which belongs to all of us—except for the one who wants to destroy Manden. If you are a man of courage, this is your council hall. If you are a man of truth, this is your council hall. If you are a master of sorcery, this is your council hall. If you have love for Manden in your heart, this is your council hall."

The Expedition to Find Sunjata and Return Him to Manden

[In an omitted passage, the assembled elders decide to summon diviners to learn who will be the liberator of Manden, and where he can be found. After an extended period of divination it is determined that Ma'an Sunjata is the one who was foreseen, and that a special delegation must be sent to find Sogolon and her children. Volunteering for this delegation are the Muslim diviners Manjan Bereté and Siriman Kanda Touré, as well as the female bard Tunku Manyan Diawara and the female slave Jonmuseoni Manyan. They plan to visit distant markets with special sauce ingredients that can only be found in Manden, as a way of finding the people they seek.]

Manjan Bereté laid down his prayer skin<sup>5</sup> as soon as he'd left town, and made two invocations to God: he asked that no one would see the travelers leave, and that they would meet no one on the road. He said, "Siriman Kanda Touré, we mustn't be seen on the road. It doesn't matter whether you are a man or a woman: every one of us must use their dalilu." When he'd finished making his two invocations, Manjan Bereté shook hands with his companions, who asked where they would sleep that night.

"Ahhh," said Manjan Bereté, "let us try to reach Soso today. Because tomorrow is Soso's market day."

As a result of his two invocations, each of his companions became invisible when Manjan Bereté shook their hands. When he gave his hand to one of his companions and withdrew it, the person became invisible. Then Manjan Bereté circled his prayer skin and became invisible himself.

They traveled on to the outskirts of Soso, where they spent the night. At daybreak Manjan Bereté said, "Take the things to the market." They set their goods out in the Soso market, but nobody wanted them. They went on to the market of Tabon; but no one wanted what they had. They went to the market of Kirina; no one was interested.

On Thursday they took the road to Kuntunya and slept outside that town to be ready for the market on Friday.

Meanwhile, at a house in that same town, Ma Sogolon Condé was saying to her daughter, "Ma Kolonkan, aaaoy! My stomach is hurting me because it's been

5. His Muslim prayer rug, the hide of a goat or sheep.

twenty-seven years since I last had dado<sup>6</sup> in Manden. Tomorrow morning, do not wash the dishes, do not scrub the pots; instead, be the first one into the market, my child, and get me some dado to eat.” (When a dado eater goes for a long time without having any, their stomach hurts; this is why Ma Sogolon Condé was complaining all night to Ma Kolonkan. It was a good thing that the Mande people spending the night outside of town had brought dado!)

As soon as the sun started to show its face the next morning, Manjan Bereté said, “Take the things into the market.” The two women went and sat outside the covered part of the market. They had the dado there, along with some namugu and some nèrè seeds<sup>7</sup> they had on display.

Ma So’olon Wulen Condé said to Ma Kolonkan, “Go early to the market so you can get the dado I want.” As soon as she’d arrived at the market, Kolonkan saw two women standing there with dado. She clapped her hands, saying, “From the time we came from Manden, my mother has not said anything about dado, nothing at all. It was only yesterday that she suddenly spoke of dado—and here it is! Heh! My mother has dalilu.” She did not even stop to greet the dado seller; she immediately reached for the dado and put some in her mouth.

Jelimusoni Tunku Manyan Diawara said, “Eh! You, girl, are impolite! Don’t touch our merchandise without greeting us or asking us first.”

“Eeh, I was so surprised! My mother told me to come to the market today to see if I could find dado. She said she’s gone for so long without eating the old things of Manden that her stomach hurts. We haven’t seen dado since we arrived here; we haven’t even seen anyone who sells it. I just wanted to taste it because it is something we always used to have.”

Tunku Manyan Diawara asked, “Who are you? Where do you come from?”

“Ah, mother, we come from Manden.”

“Who is with you here?”

“I am here with my mother Sogolon Wulen Condé, my elder brother Ma’an Sunjata, and my elder brother So’olon Jamori.”

“Aaah! You are the people we have come for! Our road has been good. Let us go to your house.”

[In omitted passages Kolonkan conducts the Mande delegation to her house for a joyful reunion with Sogolon. Manjan Bereté announces that they have been sent to ask Sogolon to return to Manden because her children are needed there. Sogolon explains that her sons are hunting in the bush and concerns herself with providing the customary hospitality to the guests.]

Kolonkan goes out of town to find meat for the guests from Manden and discovers animals killed by her brothers. Her brother Manden Bori is enraged that she has removed the animals’ internal organs, and they fight. Kolonkan’s curse on his descendants—they will not be able to decide on a ruler until the final trumpet is blown—still affects them in today’s Hamana region of Guinea. Tasseý Condé mentions a childhood experience with his famous father, Babu Condé, toward the end of the colonial era and describes how he, Tasseý, became the spokesman for

6. Dried hibiscus blossoms and/or leaves, used as a condiment in sauces.

7. Namugu is powdered leaves of the baobab tree, used as an ingredient in sauces. Nèrè:

Parkia biglobosa; the seeds are pounded into a paste that is fermented and rolled into balls to make a pungent condiment called sumbala.

the bards of Fadama. Reverting to his story, Tasseý describes Sogolon's great happiness at the prospect of her sons' returning to Manden. The next episode describes a momentous family meeting of Sogolon and her children, in which the rarely mentioned brother Jamori plays a conspicuous part.]

Sogolon Bestows the Legacy of Maghan Konfara

Sogolon said to her children, "Let us go outside the town. I want to give you my final words." They left the Mande delegation behind and went out of town. When they arrived there, Ma So'olon Condé said to Manden Bori, "Break off that termite mound."<sup>8</sup>

When Manden Bori broke off the termite mound, Sogolon said, "Pick some leaves." He picked some leaves.

She said, "Lay them on the termite mound."

When they were laid on it, she said, "Ma'an Sunjata, you sit on that."<sup>9</sup>

Then she said, "Go and break off another termite mound." So Manden Bori went and broke another one and put leaves<sup>1</sup> on it.

She said, "So'olon Jamori, you sit on that. Now go and break off another one for you to sit on." Manden Bori broke off another termite mound and brought it over.

The three men sat, but Ma So'olon Condé stood up. Ma Kolonkan stood behind her. Women would usually be seated during a hunter's ceremony,<sup>2</sup> but here they did not sit down.

While they were standing, Ma So'olon Wulen Condé said, "Manden Bori! What I say to you is also for So'olon Jamori and for Ma'an Sunjata<sup>3</sup> to hear. The people of Manden have come for you; they are calling you to war.

"When your father died, Dankaran Tuman wanted your father's gold and silver; he also wanted your father's dalilu but did not know where to find it. That's why he has plotted against you all this time: he thought that when he killed you, he could take your father's legacy, his dalilu.

"But my sons, you do not have your father's dalilu; Dankaran Tuman does not have it either. I have your father's dalilu here. If you are seeing that a man's dalilu went to his last wife,<sup>4</sup> it is because my husband trusted me. When my husband was dying, he gave his dalilu to me so that I could keep it safe and give it to you when you reached maturity. I have brought you here now to give you your father's dalilu, because the Mande people have come to take you to war. But what worries me is that there are three things in your father's dalilu, and they cannot be separated. They can only go to one person. Ah! There are three things, but your father had three sons. These three

8. As the youngest of three sons, Manden Bori is ordered to perform the menial tasks.

9. Of the many kinds of termite mounds (some well over six feet tall), the type referred to here is approximately one to two feet high, shaped like a hard clay mushroom, and the larger ones could be used as stools.

1. For a soft and clean seat.

2. If present at a hunters' meeting, women would be seated in the background. In this and the following line, the bard explains that mother and daughter remain standing because Sogolon is in charge of this solemn occasion.

3. On occasions where oral communication must be precise, it is customary for an important speaker's words to be repeated several times by various people in the presence of the person addressed. When a jeli is available the speaker addresses the bard, who repeats and validates what was just heard. At Sogolon's secret meeting, the youngest son serves to repeat and reaffirm her words.

4. The legacy would normally go to the first (senior) wife.

things would not be of any benefit to you if we were to divide them up amongst you.

“The Mande messengers have come for your brother Ma’an Sunjata. You must allow him to be given the three things, because the three things—the sorcery horse, the sorcery bow, and the sorcery mask—all work together: when you sit on the sorcery horse, you must also wear the sorcery mask and take up the sorcery bow. Then you are ready for combat against all comers.

“If you mount the sorcery horse without carrying the sorcery bow, or without wearing the sorcery mask, then somebody will strike you down while the horse is galloping. If you put on the sorcery mask without carrying the sorcery bow and you are not on the horse, you will not be able to kill the enemies you see. If you take up the sorcery bow without wearing the mask and without being on the horse, what good is that? The three things must go to one person: please, allow me to give them to Ma’an Sunjata.”

So’olon Jamori said, “Manden Bori, tell our mother that I do not agree to what she is saying. Ah! She herself says there are three things. There are three of us. They are easily divided.

“Have you not heard the Mande saying that if you cannot take your father’s legacy on your head, you must at least drag part of it behind you? If I cannot carry it, I will drag it behind me. Let her bring the three things out and divide them between the three of us.”

Ma So’olon Condé said, “Eh, So’olon Jamori my son! Eh, So’olon Jamori! I was afraid you’d cause trouble; that is why I wanted to bring you out of the town. Did you not hear me say that there are three things, but they can only solve one problem? Will you not be agreeable?”

Manden Bori said, “Big brother So’olon Jamori,<sup>5</sup> will you not have pity on our mother, who is so worried about this? Let us agree to give the dalilu to brother So’olon Maghan.”

Ah! Jamori said if Manden Bori did not shut his mouth, he would slap his ears.

Manden Bori said, “You can’t slap my ears. Why should you slap my ears for this? Don’t you know our brother can battle Soso with or without our father’s legacy?

“And who used up our mother’s legacy? You and I did; our brother did not take part in that. Our mother took her gold earring and silver bracelet and gave them to Sansamba Sagado, the Somono ancestor, as a future day’s river-crossing fee. And how many of us got into the canoe that day, when we left Manden by crossing the river? The canoe our mother paid for with her legacy? Our mother went in the canoe, our little sister got into the canoe, you got into the canoe, and I got into the canoe. Did our brother get in? Hah! Didn’t our brother say he was not getting in? Didn’t my mother weep? Didn’t he say that we should go ahead and he would follow? And by the time we got to the other side of the river, didn’t we see our brother already sitting there?

“The dalilu with which our brother crossed the river was our father’s legacy, and Sunjata can battle Sumaworo with that. But you say you will slap my ears? Why didn’t you slap my ears on the riverbank?”

Ma’an Sunjata said, “Manden Bori, be quiet. Tell my mother that we will not quarrel. If you see somebody taking your friend’s share of the sauce, your own sauce cannot satisfy you. Does she think I will quarrel with this foolish person? I will never quarrel with So'olon Jamori over our father's legacy. Even if he were to ask me to give it all to him, I would do it. Tell my mother to bring out the legacy.

5. In many variants of the epic, Sogolon’s son Jamori is not mentioned at all, and the claim here that Manden Bori was the youngest of the three brothers is an especially rare detail.

"But mother, we will never forget the two things you have done for us. First, we were legitimately born, and it is because of our legitimacy that the Mande people came to find us. Second, my father married fifty women—fifty wives!—and two other women, none of whom gave birth to a child. Sansun Bereté was one of the other two women: she gave birth to Dankaran Tuman and Nana Triban.

"But you! You were the fifty-second wife. Eh! Out of all his wives, why did my father give his legacy to you? Because of your devotion, and it was for us you were so devoted. I trust in God. Even if you do not give me the legacy, I will vanquish Sumaworo because of your devotion. Bring out the legacy."

Ma So'olon Wulen Condé said, "I am pleased with that, now excuse me." She pushed her hand into her abdomen. When she did that, ho! The dalilu fell out. When the three dalilu were piled together, Ma'an Sunjata laughed.

He started to say, "So'olon Jamori," but suddenly his mother began to shake. So'olon Ma'an held his mother until her dizziness passed. When the dizziness left her eyes, Sunjata said, "Manden Bori, tell our mother that she should tell So'olon Jamori he should choose one of the things. Ah eh! My little brother and I will not quarrel over my father's legacy."

So'olon Jamori said that he chose the sorcerer's mask. They asked, "Is that your choice?" And he replied, "Uhuh, that is mine." They said, "Very well, take it."

Sunjata said, "Manden Bori, choose one."

Manden Bori said, "I will not take a share in this legacy. I am holding your shirt-tail, and so long as I hold your shirt-tail, nothing will happen to me in the war with Soso. When you die, Sunjata, your legacy will come to me anyway. It was my father's legacy, but you are my father now, and so it belongs to you. Take both my share and your share."

Ma'an Sunjata said, "Is that your word?"

"Uhuh. It is your name, not mine or So'olon Jamori's, that will become attached to the bow and mansaya<sup>6</sup> we are quarreling over." (That is why, when people go outside town for a private meeting, they say, "Let us speak with the truth of Manden Bori.")

Manden Bori, the youngest of the brothers, had his oldest brother's blessing. Ma So'olon Wulen Condé spoke. She said, "Manden Bori, is that your word? Come here."

Taking Manden Bori behind a bush, Sogolon said, "Manden Bori, you've honored me, and so now God will honor you. Nobody will ever dishonor you. If you'd acted the way So'olon Jamori acted, then all of the Mande people would know that your father's dalilu had been divided—and if your rival knows your secret, he will vanquish you. You preferred to keep all of this secret so I would not be shamed.

"Come and let me give you my legacy. My legacy is something that did not come from here, in Nema, or Manden. It came from Dō ni Kiri, the home of my brothers. I will give this ring to you. So long as you live, it will protect you from genies or enemies that might threaten you; it will also keep you safe in the bush. If you find yourself in trouble, look at this ring and say, 'Ah, mother!' If you do that, God will protect you. If you look at it and say, 'Ah, genie!' God will save you from genies. If you look at it and say, 'Genie and man!' God will spare you from both." (That was the first of the brass rings hunters now wear on their fingers. Some people call such a ring "genie and man.") Sogolon said, "This is your keep-sake." Then they all returned to town.

6. The bow and quiver were symbolic of Mande kingship (mansaya).

[In the next scene, Sogolon suddenly dies and Sunjata tells Manden Bori to request a plot of land for her burial.]

The Burial of Sogolon and Departure from Nema

On the path to town, Manden Bori met with Faran Tunkara, the mansa of Nema. He said, "Mansa, my brother says that I should come and tell you that my mother is dead. He'd like you to agree to give him some land he can use for her burial."

Now, Faran Tunkara had been unhappy to see the messengers from Manden arrive in Nema. From the time Sunjata arrived in Nema, he'd helped the Kuntunya people win every single battle they'd faced, and he returned with slaves from every campaign. But Faran Tunkara could not keep Sunjata in Nema, because Sogolon and her family had arrived there by choice. He decided to start a quarrel so he could detain Sunjata.

So Nema Faran Tunkara said, "Manden Bori, go and tell your brother that I, Nema Faran Tunkara, say that I own all the land here. Unless you brought a piece of land with you from Manden to bury your corpse in, you should load her body on your head and carry it back to Manden the same way you brought her. Tell him that if you bury her in my land, I will blast her out of the ground with gunpowder. Go and tell your brother that."

Manden Bori returned on the path and relayed Nema Faran Tunkara's message to Sunjata. When he heard what Manden Bori reported, Manjan Bereté said, "What kind of man is Nema Faran Tunkara? Simbon, let me go and give him a real 'message.'"

"Eee," said Sunjata, "just leave it alone. Don't worry, he'll provide the land. I've spent twenty-seven years here; I'm in his army. And he says I should carry my mother's body back to Manden? He'll soon provide the land."

To Manden Bori, Sunjata said, "Go back and tell Nema Faran Tunkara that I, the son of the Condé woman, say he should give me some land in which I can bury my mother. Tell him it is I who say so."

When Tunkara was told this, he said to Manden Bori, "I do not want ever to see you here again. From the minute you first arrived here, I knew that you're a hotheaded man. Go and tell your brother that I don't go back on what I've said twice. Tell him I have no land for him here."

Manden Bori went and told this to Ma'an Sunjata. Manjan Bereté and Siri-man Kanda Touré became angry. They were all brave men; they all had dalilu, and they all knew how to fight. But when they started to leave the house to find Nema Faran Tunkara, Ma'an Sunjata said, "Be patient and take your seats. He will soon provide the land."

Sunjata took the path that passed behind the house. Along the way, he picked up a fragment of old clay pot, a piece of old calabash, the feather of a guinea fowl, and a partridge feather. To these things he added a stick of bamboo. He gave all of these things to Manden Bori, and said, "Tell Tunkara that I say he should give me land to bury my mother in. If he's asking a price for his land, well, tell him I'll pay his fees with these things. Tell him he must agree to let me lay my mother in the ground."

As he gave Faran Tunkara these things from Sunjata, Manden Bori said, "My brother says this is payment for your land, and that you should agree to let him bury his mother."

Faran Tunkara said, "Is this what you pay for land in your country? Huh, Manden Bori? I do not ever want to see you here again. Take these things and go away."

But Tunkara's jeli man, who was sitting there beside him, said, "He should not take those things away from here. Heh! Sunjata has sent you an important message."

"M'ba, when these people came to Nema, didn't I say you should kill Sunjata? And didn't you reply that Sunjata had come to place himself in your care, and that therefore you must not do anything to him? Ahuh! Well, now he has said something to you; there's a message in these things he sent. Since you do not understand the message, I will tell you what these things mean."

To which Faran Tunkara replied, "All right, tell me what they mean."

The jeli said, "This piece of bamboo means that you should give him land so he can bury his mother in it. If you do not give him land, the Mande people will come and take it for themselves. If he should be named king after he finishes fighting that war for Manden, he will bring the Mande army here to Nema, and he will break Nema like this old clay pot or this old calabash. Then the guinea fowls and the partridges will take their dust baths in the ruins of Nema. See? These are the feathers of those guinea fowls and partridges. Nothing will grow in the ruins of Nema but weeds; that's what this piece of bamboo stick means."

Now, Mansa Tunkara was a good debater, and he always won arguments. So he said, "I am right."

The jeli said, "How can you be right about this?"

"I am right," said Faran Tunkara, "because these people have been here for twenty-seven years. During the time those three brothers served in my army, I lost no battles. They never cheated me, were never disobedient to me; I never had to discipline them for chasing women. Now their mother has died. Are they going to do the right thing and say the corpse is mine, or are they just going to demand that I give them land?"

Everyone agreed that the three brothers should have observed the custom of saying, "This is your corpse."

Faran Tunkara said, "Ah! This is why I refused. Eh! If they were raised correctly as children, they should have said that God has made this my opportunity, and that this is my corpse. But did they show me the proper respect? Should they be looking for land to lay their mother in?"

Everybody said, "You are right!" Even Manjan Bereté himself came and said, "You are right."

"Very well," said Faran Tunkara. "If I am right, give her to me and I will conduct the funeral."

Even though she was a woman, the people of Nema gave Sogolon a man's funeral. They killed cows, fired their guns, and beat the special drum. (This tradition started with Ma So'olon Wulen Condé's funeral.) Then they took her body to the town of Kuntunya, and on Thursday they buried her.

When they were finished with the burial, Simbon asked for Faran Tunkara's permission to leave Nema. Because all debts had now been settled between the two men, Sunjata was able to say, "I will leave tomorrow."

Faran Tunkara said, "Go with my blessing. I give you the road." But once Sunjata and his brothers had returned to their house, Faran Tunkara summoned his warriors, telling them, "I cannot allow Sunjata to leave with his men, because those men are rightfully mine; Sunjata had no men of his own until he arrived here. Prepare yourselves and go on ahead to cut them off. Go ahead as far as the second village and wait for them there; attack them when they arrive, and try to capture them. If you bring them back, they will never leave Nema again."

Faran Tunkara's warriors left, passing the first village and preparing their attack at the second. And when Sunjata and his companions arrived at the second village, they were attacked. So'olon Jamori did not survive the attack! He died there; he did not live to reach Manden. So the three parts of his father's legacy were combined and given to Simbon. (That is why we say that if a kamalen of the Mansaré lineage becomes selfish, do not bother to curse him. He won't live long.)

Sunjata and his men escaped that ambush, and Sunjata added the captives they took from among Faran Tunkara's warriors to his own troops.

[The narrator explains that despite the ambush that killed So'olon Jamori, Faran Tunkara sent troops to support Manden's campaign against Soso, and Sunjata never attacked Nema. Claiming that he wants to notify Sumaworo of his return so he will not be accused of sneaking back into Manden, Sunjata stops in Soso. Sumaworo issues a series of warnings to Sunjata that he must not attack Soso. They engage in a traditional boasting contest, concluding with Sunjata's vow to return and Sumaworo's reply that he will be waiting.]

The Return of Sunjata

Sunjata took the road toward home. When they arrived at the edge of town, the townspeople could hear nege music<sup>7</sup> played by Jelimusoni Tunku Manyan Diawara. She sang to Manden:

"The danama yirindi<sup>8</sup> that we have been looking for,
He is at the edge of town.
Come, let us go.
For the sake of the Condé woman's son,
Come, let us go.
The person that Manden was busy searching for,
Known as So'olon Ma'an,
Come, let us go."

Sansamba Sagado crossed the river with his canoe that day. He put the canoe into the river without a pole or paddle, and as soon as he untied the canoe, it headed straight for Sunjata and his men—prrrr, just as if it had a motor.

Sunjata loaded his men into the canoe and said, "You will now see the power of my dalilu." He struck the water, the canoe went prrrr, and they landed on the

7. Nege = iron; also a synonym for the nkarin-yan, a rhythm instrument consisting of a notched iron tube seven to eight inches long, held in one hand and scraped with a thin metal rod.

8. Roughly translated as "superhero."

riverbank in Manden, where Simbon stepped out. His fathers, brothers, and all the men of Manden were there to greet and embrace him. (The shade tree under which the people of Manden welcomed Sunjata home is still living today.) When he arrived, Manden was jubilant, Manden celebrated. They named that place Nyani, the town of happiness, the town of rejoicing, ko anyè nyani so.<sup>9</sup>

As the people of Manden welcomed Sunjata and his men, they said, “Manjan Bereté, you are welcome; Siriman Kanda Touré, you are welcome; Tunku Manyan Diawara, you are welcome; Jonmusoni Manyan, you are welcome. You have brought a gift for Manden: you have found Simbon! We knew that someday the son of Farako Manko Farakonken and the Condé woman would return. But Manden suffered while he was away; we have suffered so much at Sumaworo’s hands. Let Sunjata see for himself how many of those he knew here have been killed by Sumaworo. The only people left here are those with dalilu, and Sumaworo has even caused those who have dalilu to suffer.

“When we knew Sunjata was returning, we carried out divinations and swore oaths and saw that only he could receive ancestor Mamadi Kani’s legacy. And now that he has come, heh! We all—the Kulubali, the Konaté, and the Douno—say that he should accept the legacy and help Manden. Simbon, you have been called to take the legacy.” (This saying—“Take your legacy,” or ko ila kè ta—came to be spoken as “Keita.”)

[In the following brief departure from his narrative, the bard (who is traditionally expected to instruct as well as entertain) reiterates his view of human origins and explains who really built Paris. In the omitted passage, the bard explains the power of the Condé people, their descent from Isiaaka, and the equality of all humans as children of God.]

Fakoli Reveals His Power

While the Mande men were in a meeting, a message from Sumaworo arrived. He said that he’d been waiting a long time for a message from the Mande. He said it had been a long time since their mansa arrived, and that he’d not seen any Mande messengers. Finally, Sumaworo said that since So’olon Ma’an had now returned home, he wanted to see all of the Mande people at Dakajalan on the fourteenth of the new month. The battle had now been set.

As soon as he heard Sumaworo’s message, So’olon Ma’an replied by having his people beat the signal drum, calling everyone to the council hall. On his way to the council hall, Fakoli was thinking, “We are going to march against Soso!” But his mother and Sumaworo had suckled at the same breast, and he wondered if it was right for him to join the Mande people in attacking Sumaworo. He decided, “As soon as I get to the council hall, I will ask the Mande people to let me go to Soso. Let Manden come and fight both me and my uncle.”

But before Fakoli had the chance to say this to the men gathered in the council hall, Manden Bori laughed at him. Manden Bori always ridiculed Fakoli whenever he entered the council hall. When he heard Manden Bori laughing at him, Fakoli became angry and said, “Turama’an, let me give you a message for Simbon. Tell Simbon to ask his younger brother why he always laughs at me. Of all the people that enter the council hall, it’s me that Manden Bori laughs at. Why does he laugh at me? What have I done to him?"

9. This and the following line comprise a popular etymology.

When Ma'an Sunjata was given this message, he said, "Manden Bori, stop laughing at Fakoli. Didn't you hear him saying that you are shaming him? Why do you laugh at him?"

Manden Bori replied, "Big brother, the tall men always duck their heads as they enter the council hall. Though Fakoli is only one and a half arm-spans tall, he also ducks his head when he comes in. That is what makes me laugh. Aaah, that Fakoli, heh, heh."

Fakoli said, "Turama'an, tell Simbon that he should tell his younger brother that short Mande people can do things that tall Mande people cannot do. And he'd better believe it."

Manden Bori said, "I won't believe that until I see it. Really, do you believe that? I don't."

Fakoli picked up his goatskin rug and, placing it in the center of the council hall, sat down on it. He waved his hand and grunted. He raised the roof from the house! The sun shone in on everybody. He said, "Well, Manden Bori, what about that?"

Manden Bori said, "You spoke the truth."

(They were fair about crediting one another with the truth, for there was respect among those with dalilu.)

The people asked Fakoli to put the roof back where it belonged. They said, "No tall Mande man has ever done such a thing."

Then Fakoli placed his hand in the middle of the council hall floor. He crouched there and wrinkled his face. Wrinkled his face and wrinkled his face! He squeezed everyone against the wall. That was the origin of the song "Nyari Gbasa," which goes:

"Fakoli, our arms will break,
Fakoli, our heads will burst,
Fakoli, our stomachs will rupture."

(That song belongs to the Koroma family.)

The people said, "Fakoli, stop! No tall Mande man has done such a thing."

Fakoli Explains His Dilemma and Takes His Leave from Manden

After performing these feats, Fakoli spoke to the assembled elders. He said, "Turama'an, Simbon, and everyone in the council hall: Sumaworo has sent a message that we should meet at Dakajalan. But my mother and Sumaworo were the children of the three Touré women, and it would be shameful for me to participate in Manden's attack on my uncle. I ask that you give me leave to go to Soso. I should be at my uncle's side when you come to attack him."

Ma'an Sunjata heard what Fakoli said, even though Manden Bori refused to repeat it to him. To Manden Bori, Sunjata said, "Haven't I told you? Fakoli is right. You and I have uncles whose home is Dò ni Kiri. What if we knew that Dò ni Kiri would be attacked? Would we stay here and do nothing?"

Manden Bori said, "Would anyone dare to attack Dò ni Kiri?"

"That's not the point. If Fakoli says he is going to help his mother's kinsman, leave him alone and let him go." Then, turning to Fakoli, Sunjata said, "Fakoli, you have done well by Manden. You helped us during Sumaworo's nine invasions of Manden, and our nine efforts to rebuild our homeland. So if you should say that you are going to help your uncle, very well; we won't stop you. But remember that if we meet on the battlefield there will be no brotherhood, no friendship between us. Don't think us ungrateful. But there's no gratitude when the guns start firing. That is all I have to say."

Fakoli said, "Bismillahi,"<sup>1</sup> and returned to his house for the night.

The next morning Fakoli bathed in the water of his seven medicine pots. Taking his battle-axe on his shoulder, he brought out his horse and mounted it. His groom, Nyana Jukuduma,<sup>2</sup> was with him. He lifted up his wife, Keleya Konkon, and sat her behind him on his horse; then he took the ends of his scarf and tied them together, saying, "Because I know the kind of man my uncle is, he might wait for me on the road."<sup>3</sup>

While he was preparing to leave, another message from Sumaworo arrived. Sumaworo said that he'd been informed of Fakoli's plan to help him fight against Manden, and that Fakoli must not go to Soso. Sumaworo said he'd learned that if the Mande were successful in defeating him, they planned to replace Sumaworo with Fakoli as ruler of Soso. When the people of Soso heard this, they promised to cut off Fakoli's head, just as the Mande people already wanted to. Thus, one way or another, said Sumaworo, Fakoli's "feet would be bringing his head" if he dared to come to Soso. Fakoli laughed, "I'm not going to die for anyone—not Sunjata, and not Sumaworo." (Even today, that expression is often quoted.)

Fakoli said, "Go and tell my uncle that I'll soon be there. If I were really planning to get myself killed, then I'd let him carry out his threats against me. But since I don't intend to die, I'll go to Soso today. Tell him to get ready."

[In an omitted passage, Sumaworo deploys soldiers to intercept Fakoli and kill him, but Fakoli makes himself and his companions invisible and arrives unscathed at the gates of Soso.]

Fakoli Finds Trouble in Soso

When Sumaworo learned that Fakoli was accompanied only by his wife and his slave, he told Bala Fasali,<sup>4</sup> "Take the bala and welcome my nephew."

Bala Fasali took up the bala and sang the song we now call "Janjon":<sup>5</sup>

"Eh, Fakoli!
You became a son.
If death is inevitable,
A formidable child should be born.
The Mande people said
That if you came, they would wait for you on the road.
The people of Soso said
That if you came, your feet would bring your head.
Knowing that, you still had no fear.
If death is inevitable,
A formidable child should be born."

1. Literally, "in the name of Allah" (Arabic), a traditional Muslim invocation spoken at the outset of an undertaking [editor's note].

2. A slave that cared for his horse.

3. To ambush him.

4. An unusual pronunciation of this famous bard's name, which is usually given as Bala Fasaké, or a variant thereof.

5. One of the oldest and most famous songs of Manden, said to have been originally composed for Fakoli, but in later times played to honor any distinguished personage.

Sumaworo welcomed Fakoli by standing and raising his elephant tail in salute. Fakoli sat down and explained why he had come to Soso. He said, “Bala Fasali, you take part in this.”<sup>6</sup> Let Sumaworo hear what I have to say. I have come because Sumaworo has done many things, and though I was invisible as I traveled, I come in good faith.

“The three Touré women gave birth to my mother and to Sumaworo. I have been thinking about my mother ever since war was declared between Soso and Manden. Had my mother been a man, she would have fought in this war alongside Sumaworo, her brother. That is why I decided to come: to fight in place of my mother. I have come to Sumaworo through the will of God; let us unite and fight the coming war together.”

Sumaworo replied, “Bala Fasali, I’ll tell you what to say to Fakoli. Tell him that I appreciate his words, and that I am pleased he has come.”

After this meeting, Fakoli was taken to meet Sumaworo’s wives. Sumaworo had three hundred and thirty-three wives. Fakoli had only one wife, Keleya Konkon.

To his three hundred and thirty-three wives, Sumaworo said: “Fakoli has arrived just as I am going to war. The oracle Nènèba says that in order to win this war I must offer three hundred and thirty-three different dishes as sacrifice. I want these dishes to be prepared the day after tomorrow, on Friday. I mention this because Fakoli should know about this sacrifice if we are to be allies.”

Fakoli said, “Fine. Since I have come to take the place of my mother, my wife will cook the one bowl of food my mother would have provided.”

When the Soso women heard Fakoli say that, they said, “Paki! We’ll show that Mande woman how much better a Soso woman’s cooking is.” This was insulting to Keleya Konkon, who said, “I’m going to build my fire near theirs. Fakoli, go and find a cooking pot for me. Those Soso women want to brag? They’ll soon learn that Mande women can also cook. They will realize that Manden has kitchens, too.” Fakoli left to find a cooking pot for Keleya Konkon.

Among the three hundred and thirty-three dishes prepared by Sumaworo’s wives were beans, rice, fonio, cereal paste, millet wafers, wheat meal, cassava, and porridge: all of these different foods were included in the sacrifice.

Fakoli’s wife said to him, “Bring me rice, pounded cassava, and fonio for my pot. God willing, I’m going to cook a meal that the jelilu will sing about for years to come.”

Keleya Konkon put her one pot on the fire. Whenever she saw the Soso women who were cooking rice put some into their pots, she would put rice in her one pot, then sit down. Whenever she saw the Soso women who were cooking fonio put some into their pots, she would add some fonio in her one pot then sit down.

When the women who were cooking monie<sup>7</sup> were rolling their monie balls, Keleya Konkon also rolled monie balls. When the women put the monie balls into their pots, Keleya Konkon would put monie balls into her pot too, then take her seat. When the women who were baking takura<sup>8</sup> were putting their takura balls into their pots, Keleya Konkon also put takura balls into her pot, then sat down.

6. Custom dictated that the dignitary, in this case Fakoli, would speak to the jeli, who would then add weight to the message by repeating it to the person addressed.

7. A millet porridge made with small balls of millet flour flavored with tamarind or lemon.

8. A millet cake made with five balls of soaked millet flour and baked or steamed in a clay pot buried in the ground; one of the preferred foods for sacrifice or alms-giving.

So Keleya Konkon put into her one pot all of the same things the Soso women put into their three hundred and thirty-three pots. Then, when the women started dishing out rice, she took her rice bowl and dished out the rice from her pot. When the women started dishing out the fonio, she took her fonio bowl and dished out her fonio from the same pot.

Sumaworo's wives produced three hundred and thirty-three dishes—but Fakoli's wife also produced three hundred and thirty-three dishes, and all from her one pot! The wives couldn't get the best of her.

Some scandalmongers went to Sumaworo and told him what had happened, adding, "Didn't we tell you that Fakoli came to take your place? You have three hundred and thirty-three wives, who have cooked you three hundred and thirty-three dishes. Your nephew has only one wife, but she has also prepared three hundred and thirty-three dishes! In fact, Keleya Konkon's servings are bigger than yours! Everything that you have, Fakoli now also has. He came to take your place. If you don't take this Fakoli business seriously, he will take Soso away from you even before you go to war."

Sumaworo said, "Huh? Oho!" And he called his people together. Sumaworo sent the scandalmonger to go and bring Fakoli to the meeting.

Instead of going to find Fakoli, the scandalmonger simply went and stood on the road, then returned to Sumaworo, saying, "I have called him." A lot of time passed; Fakoli did not come to see Sumaworo. When Sumaworo sent for someone, he expected that person to arrive one minute after the messenger returned.

"Ah!" said Sumaworo. "Did you not see my nephew?"

To which the scandalmonger replied, "I saw him."

"Ah, did you not call him?"

"I called him."

"All right, go and tell him I am waiting for him."

The scandalmonger went and stood in the road again. Returning to Sumaworo, he said, "I have called him."

More time passed and still Fakoli did not appear. Now very angry, Sumaworo sent another messenger to get Fakoli. He said, "You go and tell Fakoli that I am waiting for him."

That messenger did find Fakoli. He said, "Fakoli, this is the third time you have been called. Why didn't you come when we called? Who do you think you are?"

Fakoli said, "Me? Was I called three times?"

"Yes, the message came and came again."

"Me? M'ba, I refuse."

That messenger ran back and told Sumaworo, "Your nephew refuses to come."

Sumaworo said, "Paki! That's it! Fakoli dares tell me, Sumaworo, 'I refuse?'"

Once Sumaworo's last messenger had gone, Fakoli put on his hat with the three hundred birds' heads. He put his axe on his shoulder and tied his headband around his head, because he knew there was going to be trouble.

When Sumaworo saw Fakoli approaching, he stood up in his royal seat and said, "Fakoli, am I the one to whom you said, 'I refuse?'"

Fakoli replied, "I refuse," for he believed it would be cowardly to explain himself to Sumaworo.

Again, Sumaworo asked, "Am I the one to whom you said, 'I refuse?'"

"I refuse."

"Why?"

"I refuse."

"Ah, very well." Sumaworo said. "What they told me is the truth. You claim that you came to help me. But you have not come to help me. You know what you came for. I have three hundred and thirty-three wives who have prepared three hundred and thirty-three dishes for me. You have only one wife, yet she also produced three hundred and thirty-three dishes for you."

"Did you come to help me? Were you told that your head and my head are equal? I gave you this wife you're so proud of—the one with your mother's name<sup>9</sup>—and now I am taking her back. You can't brag about what you don't have anymore! This Kosiya Kanté that you have, she is my daughter,<sup>1</sup> so now I am taking her back."

Fakoli said, "Ah! Uncle, have matters between us sunk so low? Has our dispute come to the point of taking back a wife? You can have her! I don't even want her now, at least not until the smoke from our battle with the Mande people at Dakajalan has settled. Until then, I don't want her!"

He brought out his blanket and tore off a strip, prrrrr! He threw it to Keleya Konkon and told her to use it for a mourning veil, saying, "I will not marry you again until I've defeated your brother<sup>2</sup> in gunsmoke. I am returning to Manden."

Turning his back on Keleya Kondon, he gave the tail of his horse to Nyana Jukuduma,<sup>3</sup> and the two men took the road to Manden, where the diviners were still praying to God.

When Fakoli got back to Manden, he went and stood at the door of the council hall. He said, "Simbon, my uncle and I have quarreled. He has taken my wife from me. I will not take back Keleya Konkon until I do it in gunsmoke."

"Huh," Ma'an Sunjata laughed.

Manjan Bereté and Siriman Kanda Touré also laughed. They said, "Manden is now complete." They said they had put their trust in Turama'an. (This is why you sometimes hear a person say that they put their trust in Turama'an instead of Fakoli.<sup>4</sup> The people gave their trust to Turama'an while Fakoli was off visiting his uncle.)

Still standing on the threshold of the council hall, Fakoli said, "Simbon, I do not want a wife from Manden or Negeboriya. Send a message to your uncles in Dò ni Kiri, and ask them to give you your 'nephew wife.'<sup>5</sup> Then give that wife to me. I want to have that woman before we go to the battle at Dakajalan. Then, regardless of what happens, no one will be able to blame my actions in battle on the fact that I have no wife. If I don't have a wife before going into battle, the

9. Fakoli's mother was Kosiya, so his wife Keleya was not exactly her namesake.

1. Family relationships among Manding peoples are perceived on several levels, or "paths." Keeping in mind that this is the storyteller's viewpoint, this is probably meant in the sense that the wife Sumaworo provided for Fakoli was a classificatory "daughter" of Sumaworo. In Manding societies, the children of one's cousins are considered to be one's own children.

2. In the same way that Keleya Konkon could be a classificatory "daughter" of Sumaworo, she could also be a classificatory "sister." Indeed, on one path a person can be classified as one's sibling, while on another path the same person can be referred to as one's father, uncle, mother, or aunt. This reflects the polygynous practice of men marrying wives of the same age as their children.

3. The slave would run behind the horse, hanging on to its tail.

4. Turama'an had acquired a leadership position or military command that was formerly held by Fakoli.

5. In Maninka and Bamana society, it is claimed, both jokingly and seriously, that it is the uncle's duty to give his nephew a wife, the so-called nephew wife. The obligation of this uncle-nephew bond is implied in the Bamana proverb: "When your uncle fails to give you a wife, he is no longer your uncle but your mother's brother."

people will say I fought well because I was trying to get myself a wife—that I was afraid of staying a bachelor. So let me have your ‘nephew wife’ before we leave for the war.” Ma’an Sunjata sent a message to his uncle (our ancestor!) in Dò ni Kiri, who sent Ma Sira Condé to Sunjata as his nephew wife. Ma’an Sunjata then gave this wife to Fakoli.

At that time, Fakoli was feeling bitter. Having refused to live in Negeboriya, Manden, and Soso, he’d built his own hamlet and remained there until it was time for the battle at Dakajalan. The people all said, “Eeeh, Fakoli is bitter! He has refused to live with us; he’s built his own hamlet.” (That hamlet, built in Manden, became Bambugu, and it was there that Sira Condé was brought to Fakoli.)

A Visit to Kamanjan in Sibi

Dressed in his ritual attire, Sunjata said to Fakoli, “Before she died, my mother asked God to help me earn the support of a Mande elder whose dalilu is greater than mine, and I believe I must not go to war without having first accomplished this. Now that you’re settled, Fakoli, I ask you—just as I’m asking Turama’an, Kankejan, Tombonon Sitafa Diawara, and all the Simbons—please give me sixty men so I can greet Kamanjan, because I esteem him above all other elders.”

Kamanjan was much older than Sunjata; Kamanjan and Sunjata’s father, Maghan Konfara, were born at the same time. Kamanjan never committed a shameful deed in his entire life, and anyone who commanded an army would seek his advice. This is why Sunjata said, “Let’s go to greet Kamanjan.”

With sixty men, Sunjata went to salute Kamanjan at the battle site called Kalassa, near Sibi Mountain, where Kamanjan liked to hold torchlit meetings at night. It was a special honor to be asked by Kamanjan to extinguish the torches at the end of such meetings; only those kamalemw he knew to be special in their towns would be allowed to put out the flames.

Sunjata arrived as Kamanjan was having one of his nighttime meetings, and all of the torches were lit. With his hand, Sunjata extinguished them all. Then he used a little thing to reignite them, kan! Suddenly everything was illuminated again. The people at the meeting said, “As soon as Sunjata put out the torches, he lit his own torch.”

(Sunjata’s own light was as powerful as the light from a pressure lamp, and the little town where Sunjata extinguished the torches is called Kalassa, which is near Tabon on the Bamako road. The Konaté live there.)

After relighting the torches, Sunjata saluted Kamanjan and explained the purpose of his visit, saying, “I left here with my mother; now I have returned.”

Kamanjan said, “Simbon! Have you come?”

“Yes, I have come.”

“Ah, are you the one that Manden will send against Sumaworo?”

“Uhuh. That is why I have come to greet you, father Kamanjan. The last person to be told you’re leaving on a trip must be the first person you greet upon your return.”

“Sunjata, what dalilu did you bring with you? Hm? Sumaworo is a bad one. Haven’t you heard people sing his praises? They sing:

‘Transforms in the air,
Sumaworo,
Transforms on the ground,

Sumaworo.
 Manden pi-pa-pi,
 Whirlwind of Manden,
 Kukuba and Bantamba,
 Nyemi-Nyemi and Kambasiga, Sege and Babi?”

Sunjata said, “Yes, Father Kamanjan, I’ve heard that.”

“Then what kind of dalilu did you bring to use against him?”

“Ah, father Kamanjan, that is why I have come to greet you and tell you my thoughts.”

“Well, I’ve become old since we last met here. I can’t go to war again, nor can I ask anyone else to do that. All those who attacked Sumaworo have been defeated, and this is Manden’s fault; it was Manden that made it possible for Sumaworo to become what he is. It was a mistake for us to give him the four jamanaw.<sup>6</sup> Not satisfied with that, he now wants to add Manden to Soso. That is what we must fight to avoid.”

Kamanjan and Sunjata were talking beneath the tree that is called balansan<sup>7</sup> in Manden, and when Kamanjan said, “Ah!” the balansan flipped upside down onto its top branches.

When Sunjata also said, “Ah!” the balansan flipped back over onto its roots. (It’s true, binani tinima!)

Kamanjan said, “Ah!” a second time, and the balansan flipped back over onto its top branches.

Before Sunjata could say, “Ah,” again, his sister whispered in his ear, “Big brother, this is not what my mother told you to do. Let Kamanjan do this. Our mother prayed that you would be blessed by an elder with dalilu stronger than yours. Kamanjan is trying to demonstrate to you how strong his dalilu is. If you beat him with your own dalilu, he will not give you anything. Let him do this, and he will flip the tree back once he’s satisfied. If you add his dalilu to what you already have, maybe you will win the war against Sumaworo. You should act like you do not know anything, so Kamanjan will give you his dalilu.”

A Strategic Alliance: Kolonkan’s Marriage

The battle that followed Sunjata’s meeting with Kamanjan did not go well for Manden, and the town was filled with sorrow. But Kamanjan didn’t let Sunjata leave him empty-handed. Kamanjan said, “Simbon, I see that your sister has matured since we last met. Yes, she has matured, and you should give her to me so I can marry her. Though your sister spent twenty-seven years at Nema, your mother—who was of the best stock—said she would never be given to a man there. You yourself agreed that your sister would only be married here in Manden. So give her to me.”

6. The four main provinces of Soso that commonly appear in praise-lines to Sumaworo (though rarely identified in the same way): Kukuba, Bantamba, Nyemi-Nyemi, and Kambasiga. This comment, which the bard attributes to a contemporary of Sunjata’s father, appears to imply a failed policy of appeasement toward Sumaworo.

7. Acacia albida; in Mande lore, one of the many trees, including the baobab and the dubalen, that carry strong associations with the spirit world.

Ma'an Sunjata said, "Eh! Father Kamanjan, that won't be possible. If I give you my younger sister, I would be embarrassed to discuss certain subjects with you. There are things I could discuss with you so long as there's no marriage between us. Now that my mother and father are both dead, I'm depending on your counsel on such matters. But a marriage between us would make it embarrassing for me to do so.<sup>8</sup> Besides that, you are a battle commander. If we do something to displease you, if you become offended, we might quarrel."

Kamanjan said, "Ah, give her to me."

"Well, I'll give her to you if you will command the Kamara people to show respect for the Mansaré people. Tell the Kamara people to show respect for my people and for me. The Kamara should respect us, Kamaralu yé dan a na." (The Dannalu, who take their name from that saying, live between Balia and Wulada. Now, because of Ma Kolonkan's marriage to Kamanjan, the Dannalu must be mentioned whenever the Kamara are discussed.) Ma Kolonkan was given to Kamanjan Kamara as soon as he made this promise to Sunjata. Kamanjan entered her, and she eventually gave birth to his son Fadibali.

The Battle of Negeboriya

Kamanjan said, "Simbon, I respect you, and believe you'll be successful in the war against Sumaworo. But listen: don't go to Dakajalan yet. Go to Negeboriya first and pay your respects to Fakoli's relatives. Though Fakoli is from Negeboriya, not Manden, he has done much for us. Besides, haven't you ever heard the saying, 'Negeboriya Maghan, Kayafaya Maghan'?<sup>9</sup> The Negeboriyans are our in-laws.

"Fakoli has said, 'The Mande people are wrong if they think I am helping them only because I want to win the mansaya for myself,' and we believe him. After all, none of the Koroma living in our Mansaré towns have ever tried to take the mansaya for themselves.

"Fakoli has also said, 'I am only helping Manden because of Ma Tenenba Condé; it was she who raised and blessed me. Tenenba Condé's sister is So'olon Wulen Condé, and So'olon Wulen Condé's son is Ma'an Sunjata. So I am not helping you because of personal ambition. If you listen to the Mande people's gossip about me now, you'll be ashamed to face me later.'

"Turama'an and Kankejan have said the same sorts of things. So go and pay your respects to the people of Negeboriya."

Taking their leave from Tabon, Ma'an Sunjata and his companions mounted their horses and rode straight to Negeboriya. But Sumaworo had built a wall around that town by the time they arrived. In fact, Sumaworo had built walls around many towns of Manden and was occupying them with his troops.

When Sumaworo's men heard that So'olon Ma'an and his troops were coming to pay their respects to the people of Negeboriya, they lined their musket barrels along the top of the wall and waited. When Sunjata and his men arrived, the muskets fired and fired and fired at them!

Forced to retreat, Sunjata returned to find Manden in mourning over his defeat at the Battle of Negeboriya. But Sunjata's powerful army was not destroyed, and

8. In this case of buranya ("having an older in-law"), Sunjata would have to practice great restraint and lack of familiarity toward his sister's husband, and would no longer be able to appeal to him for help or advice.

9. Kayafaya is said to have been a jamana, or province, attached to Negeboriya under the Koroma ruling lineage.

Sumaworo had lost his sacred drum Dunun Mutukuru during the battle. (That drum, the Dunun Mutukuru, was never found; only the bala was saved.)

[In omitted passages, back in Manden two rams that are named for Sunjata and Sumaworo, respectively, fight one another in a symbolic preview of the battle to come. Preparing for the Battle of Dakajalan, Sunjata calls for volunteers. The army of Manden is divided into companies of men who possess occult powers, companies of those who have no magic, and one unit made up of famous ancestral figures with the power to become invisible. In a secret meeting with Manjan Bereté, Sunjata learns the elaborate strategy he must adopt to defeat Sumaworo. He exchanges his sorcery horse for the sorcery mare of the jelimuso Tunku Manyan Diawara. He also sends a messenger to his sister, Nana Triban, who is in Soso, to retrieve from her the dibilan medicine that she steals from the tail of Sumaworo's horse]

Trading Insults and Swearing Oaths

Manden mourned after each of their battles against Sumaworo. He made many women widows. He made shirts and pants from the skins of Mande and Soso people. He sewed a hat of human skin. He even made shoes of human skin and then ordered the surviving Mande people to come and name them. If one of the people tried to name the shoes “Finfirinya Shoes,” Sumaworo would say, “That is not the name.” If someone tried “Dulubiri shoes,” he would say, “That is not the name.” Finally, the people asked him, “All right, Sumaworo, what are your shoes called?” He said, “My human-skin shoes are called ‘Take the Air, take the Ground from the Chief.’ I wear your skins because the Mande people will always be around me, Sumaworo. You will always be in my power.”

After both sides had made their preparations, the war began. Briefly, here's what happened:

The three Mande divisions—including those men who could become invisible in the daytime and the five mori diviners—arrived at the first battle. Simbon was placed in the middle of his men, with Manjan Bereté directly in front of him. The men were packed so tightly that the head of one man's horse touched the tail of the horse in front of him. Sanbari Mara Cissé and Siriman Kanda Touré were there, as were Kòn Mara and Djané, Manden Bori, Tombonon Sitafa Diawara, Turama'an, Kankejan, and Fakoli. Sunjata ordered them to maintain their positions on the battlefield, so they marched back and forth in a line, like an army of ants. Simbon was in the middle!

When they arrived at the battlefield, Ma'an Sunjata said, “Men of Manden, wait here,” and crossed the field with his masked flag bearers, headed for Sumaworo's camp. Sumaworo's troops were also there, waiting in position. Sumaworo sat astride his horse, surrounded by his corps of personal guards.

As he approached Sumaworo, Sunjata said, “Father Sumaworo, good morning.” (True bravery is revealed by the mouth!)

Sumaworo said, “Marahaba, good morning. Where are the Mande troops?”

“Ah, Father Sumaworo, they are over on the Mande side.”

“Ah, is that how you usually arrange your troops?”

Sunjata said, “Well, I am new at this. This is our first encounter in battle. If I brought my men over here, they'd mingle with your troops, and we'd be unable to tell whose men are whose.<sup>1</sup> You can see them standing over there on the Mande side.”

“Ah, So’olon Ma’an, this is not the usual procedure.”

Feeling bold, Sunjata said, “Well, you killed all of the other leaders; there was nobody left to lead the Mande troops.”

Sumaworo said, “I say to you, Bala Fasali, tell Simbon that I am doing him a favor by inviting him to meet here on the battlefield. I understand that the Mande people sent for Sunjata so he could be their commander in battle. But apparently they did not tell him about anything that happened while he was away.

“This is why I have invited him to come and meet in the field: so that I can tell him what I have to say, and he can tell me what is on his mind. Then I will do to him what I planned to do—or he can try to do to me what he wants to.”

Simbon said, “I appreciate the invitation. Ah! You are my respected elder. The person who has helped one’s father is also one’s father. But let me tell you something, father Sumaworo: people may refuse peanuts, but not the ones that have been placed right in front of them.”

Sumaworo said, “M’ba, give me some snuff from Manden.”<sup>2</sup>

“Ah! Father Sumaworo, it is more appropriate for the master to give snuff to his apprentice, rather than for the apprentice to give snuff to his master. Give me some snuff from Soso, so that I will know I have met my master.”

Sumaworo took out his snuffbox and handed it to Sunjata. Simbon put some snuff in his palm, took a pinch and snorted it, took another pinch and snorted it, and put some in his mouth. He closed the snuffbox and gave it back to Sumaworo. The snuff did not even make Sunjata’s tongue quiver.

Sumaworo was surprised. Anybody who took that snuff would immediately fall over. It was poison! But So’olon Ma’an sucked on the snuff and didn’t even cough. He spit the snuff on the ground.

Then Sumaworo said, “Give me some Mande snuff.” Simbon reached in his pocket, took out his snuffbox, and handed it to Sumaworo, who put some in his palm. He took a pinch of snuff and snorted it, took some more and snorted it, and put the rest in his mouth. That was specially prepared snuff, too, but it did not do anything to him.

Sumaworo said to him, “I asked you to meet with me because the Mande people seem to think you are their mansa, and it’s true that you would not be here if you didn’t have some dalilu. But your dalilu will do no good against me. I told you before, when you passed through Soso, that if the Mande people tried to send you to fight me, you should refuse. As you now know, I have become hot ashes surrounding Manden and Soso; any toddler who tries to cross me will be burned up to his thighs. And yet here you are.”

“Ah, father Sumaworo, as I told you, this is my father’s home, not yours. You are not from here: your grandfather came from Folonengbe; your father was a latecomer to Manden. You are only the second generation of your people in Manden. But we have been here for eight generations: our ancestor Mamadi

1. The problem of distinguishing between ally and enemy in the heat of battle was a serious concern. In an episode not included in this book, the narrator describes how Kamanjan Kamara introduced facial scarification for that purpose.

2. This request commences a standard ritual called sigifili, conducted between opposing commanders before a battle; it involved boasting about one’s powers and swearing oaths while taking a poisonous snuff that would kill a liar.

Kani first came here from Hejaji. After him came Mamadi Kani's son, Kani Simbon, Kani Nyogo Simbon, Kabala Simbon, Big Simbon Mamadi Tanyagati, Balinene, Bele, and Belebakòn, and Farako Manko Farakonken. Now I am Farako Manko Farakonken's son, the eighth generation. My people have been here all along; you only arrived yesterday, your dawn is just breaking today.

"Huh!" continued Sunjata. "And you say that I have just arrived? M'ba, huh! You are my respected elder, so I will not be the first to make a move. You invited me here to tell me that I'm a disrespectful child? You just go ahead and show what you've got."

Sumaworo said, "Bisimillahi."

The Battle of Dakajalan and Fakoli's Revenge

When something is filled to the brim, it will overflow.

When Sumaworo took his sword and struck at Sunjata, his blade flexed like a whip. Sunjata also struck with his sword; the blade of his sword also bent. Sumaworo raised his musket and fired, but nothing touched So'olon Ma'an. So'olon Ma'an then fired his musket at Sumaworo but failed to wound him.

With that, the dalilu was finished, and the two men just stood there. Sumaworo reached into his saddlebag and took his whip. As he raised his hand like this, So'olon Ma'an seized his reins like this—Clap!—and dashed away.

The two armies were waiting, Soso on one side, Manden on the other. Everybody was watching the commanders on the battlefield. Fakoli stood off to one side of Sunjata; Turama'an was on his other side. Sumaworo was also flanked by his men.

Blu, blu! Sunjata, Sumaworo, and their men dashed across the field and up the hill. Near the top of the hill, they faded from sight; even their dust disappeared. Soon they reached the edge of a very deep ravine. Gathering all her strength, Sunjata's sorcery mare (Tunku Manyan Diawara's horse) jumped the ravine and landed on the other side. When Sumaworo's horse tried to jump the ravine, it tumbled to the bottom.<sup>3</sup> Fakoli and Turama'an—whose horses safely jumped the ravine—turned and, with Sunjata, went to look down at Sumaworo who was trapped at the bottom of the ravine.

Sunjata called down, "Sumaworo, what is the matter?"

"So'olon Ma'an, kill me here; do not carry me to the town. Do not bring such shame to me. God controls all time. Please do not take me back."

Sumaworo removed his dalilu and dropped his horse-whip. He stripped completely, taking off his human-skin shirt and trousers.

Sunjata said, "I am not going to finish you off. No one can climb out of that ravine; you're stuck. I do not want your shirt of human skin, because it is the skin of my father's relatives. I will not take it." Turning to his companions he said, "Come, let's go home."

They had gone some distance when Fakoli made a decision, turned, and went back to the ravine. When he arrived there, he said to Sumaworo, "What did I tell you? When you took back your sister,<sup>4</sup> what did I say?" Taking his axe from his shoulder, Fakoli struck Sumaworo on the head, poh! He said, "This will be men-

3. Though not usually seen in versions of the Sunjata epic, the incident of the horse tumbling into a ravine is a popular motif in jeli storytelling.

ing, a favorite way of disposing of the hero's enemy.

4. Fakoli's wife, Keleya Konkon.

tioned in Ma'an Sunjata's praise song." (And he was right! Though we sing, "Head-breaking Mari Jata," it was Fakoli who broke Sumaworo's head.)<sup>5</sup>

Fakoli started to leave. But he was still angry, so he went back to the ravine again and struck Sumaworo on the leg, gbao! Fakoli broke Sumaworo's leg, saying, "This will also be mentioned in Ma'an Sunjata's praise song." (That is why we sing, "Leg-Breaking Mari Jata.")

With his axe, Fakoli returned to the ravine a third time and broke Sumaworo's arm, saying, "This, too, will be mentioned in Ma'an Sunjata's praise song." (And so we sing, "Arm-Breaking Mari Jata." Aheh! It was not Jata who broke it! It was Fakoli who broke it.)

Finally Sunjata and his men went home. Laughter returned to Manden, and eventually Soso joined in.

[In omitted passages, the narrator describes how, following the defeat of Sumaworo, the people of Soso dispersed and eventually settled in various communities along the Atlantic coast. Meanwhile, Sunjata begins to initiate reforms and organize the newly unified Mali Empire.]

The Campaign against Jolofin Mansa

After the war was over, Ma'an Sunjata said, "My fathers and my brothers: now that the war has ended and the mansaya has come to us, the Mansaré, let's send our horse-buyers to Senu to replace the many Mande horses killed by Sumaworo. We should buy enough horses for each of our elders and warriors to have one."

So the horse-buyers went to Senu and bought hundreds of horses. On the way back to Manden, the horse-buyers stopped at the jamana of Jolofin Mansa, and there Jolofin Mansa robbed the buyers of their horses; he then took the horse-buyers captive and beheaded all but two. Jolofin Mansa sent the two survivors to tell Ma'an Sunjata that even though Ma'an Sunjata had taken over the power—that Sunjata had recently received the Mande mansaya—he knew the Mande walked on all fours like dogs, and that they should leave horse-riding to others.

The two horse-buyers arrived in Manden and gave the message to Ma'an Sunjata, who said, "Jolofin Mansa has extended an invitation to me. I myself will lead the campaign against Jolofin Mansa."

His younger brother Manden Bori said, "Elder brother, are you going to lead us in that campaign? Give me the command, and I will do the fighting."

"I am not giving you command of the army."

Fakoli said, "Simbon, give me the army! We will not stay here while you lead the army. Give the army to me, Fakoli, so I can go after Jolofin Mansa."

Simbon said, "I will not give you the army. I will go myself."

Meanwhile, Turama'an was digging his own grave. He cut some tòrò branches, laid them on his grave, and had his shroud sewn. Then he said to Ma'an Sunjata, "Simbon, I'll kill myself if you do not give me the army. Would you really leave us

5. It is unusual for a jeli to describe the death of Sumaworo, as Tassey Condé does here. In many versions, Sumaworo flees to the mountain at Koulikoro where he disappears. The Kouyaté and Diabaté *jeli*w, among others, are usually careful not to say that Sumaworo was slain by Sunjata, Fakoli, or anybody else. Such things are taken seriously in modern times, because Maninka and Bamana identify with the ancestors whose names they carry. The version translated here was recorded in a private performance in the narrator's own house, but in a public performance, giving details of a humiliating defeat (even one alleged to have occurred more than seven centuries ago) risks embarrassing any people in the audience who regard themselves as descendants of the defeated ancestor.

behind while you lead the army to go after Jolofin Mansa? Give me the army. If you don't, if you go after Jolofin Mansa yourself, you will lose me, for I'll kill myself."

"Ah," said Simbon. "I did not know you felt so strongly, Turama'an. Your dalilu and my dalilu are tied together: my mother was given to your fathers, who killed the buffalo of Dò ni Kiri. If your father and my mother had gotten along, my mother would have stayed with your father. Because my mother did not get along with your fathers, your fathers brought my mother to my father, and I was born out of that marriage, as were my younger brothers Manden Bori and So'olon Jamori.

"My father took my younger siblings Nana Triban and Tenenbajan, and gave them to Danmansa Wulanni and Danmansa Wulanba, your fathers. You, Turama'an, are the son of Danmansa Wulanni. Considering what you have said, you and I are equal in this war, and I will let you take the army."

So Sunjata gave Turama'an command of the army, and Turama'an prepared the army for war. With the campaign underway, they marched to Jolofin Mansa's land.

(You know Jolofin Mansa, he was one of the Mansaré. The son of Latali Kalabi, the Mansaré ancestor, was Danmatali Kalabi; Danmatali Kalabi then also named his son Latali Kalabi. This second Latali sired Kalabi Doman and Kalabi Bomba, and Kalabi Doman sired Mamadi Kani. Mamadi Kani sired Kani Simbon, Kani Nyogo Simbon, Kabala Simbon, Big Simbon Madi Tanyagati, and M'balinene; M'balinene sired Bele, Bele sired Belebakon, Belebakon sired Maghan Konfara, and this Farako Manko Farakonken was Ma'an Sunjata's father.)

So Jolofin Mansa and Ma'an Sunjata both descended from the same person. And Jolofin's people—the Jolofin na mò'òlu—became known as the Wolofo.<sup>6</sup> Have you heard people calling the Wolofo "little Mande people"? That's because they all came from Manden.)

Turama'an marched the army of Manden to Jolofin Mansa's land and there destroyed Jolofin Mansa's place like it was an old clay pot; Turama'an broke it like an old calabash. He also captured those who were supposed to be captured, killed those who were supposed to be killed.

Though his soldiers had been defeated, Jolofin Mansa had not been captured, so he fled with Turama'an in pursuit. Jolofin Mansa headed for the big river.<sup>7</sup>

At that time, no one knew that Jolofin Mansa could transform himself into a crocodile, living on land or under water. When he came to the big river, Jolofin Mansa plunged in and swam into a cave; there he transformed himself into a crocodile and lay down to wait.

Standing above the cave, Turama'an and his men said, "Jolofin Mansa went in here." The Mande men were good warriors, but they were not used to water fighting. All of the battle commanders standing there were dressed for fighting on land; they were all wearing hunting clothes and carried quivers and bows. Until they stood at the entrance to that cave, the Mande people did not know that they had a warrior who could fight under water.

Turama'an said, "Jolofin Mansa has changed himself into a crocodile and gone into that cave. We can't leave him there, for if we destroy the war mansa's home without killing the war mansa himself, we have not won the battle. But who will go after him?"

Everybody kept quiet, lele!

6. Maninka pronunciation attaches an extra vowel. The Wolof, who call their country Jolof (see previous sentence), are mainly in Senegal (the narrator's "Senu"), and they speak a language that is not interintelligible with Manding languages.

7. The Senegal River.

Again Turama'an asked, "Who will go after him?" Nobody spoke up, so Turama'an asked a third time, "Who will follow this man?"

The Diawara chief, whose name was Tombonon Sitafa Diawara, stepped out from among the soldiers. He said, "Turama'an, tell the Mande people that if they agree, I, Sitafa Diawara, will go after Jolofin Mansa. But also tell them that I am not doing this to prove my manhood. I'm doing it because we can't return home to Simbon having only destroyed Jolofin Mansa's home. If we return home without also having killed Jolofin Mansa himself, Simbon will wonder why we told him to stay home."

(That is why, if you are a real man, you should stay low to the ground when you are among the kamalenw. You should only reveal the kind of man you are when somebody challenges your group.)

Meanwhile, Jolofin Mansa's crocodile wraith was lying in the cave, its mouth open wide. The upper jaw reached to the top of the entrance, the lower jaw reached to the bottom. Anybody who went after the crocodile would end up in its stomach, and the crocodile would just close his mouth. Eh! There would be no need to chew.

Sitafa Diawara said, "I'll give you two signs when I get down to where the crocodile is. If, while the water is bubbling and churning and turning the color of blood, you see a pelican flying from where the sun sets to where it rises, Manden should weep, for you'll know that Jolofin Mansa has defeated me. But if, while the water is bubbling and churning and turning the color of blood, the pelican flies from where the sun rises to where it sets, you Mande people should be happy, for it will mean I have honored you and God. Those are the signs I've given you."

Diawara put on his medicine clothes and gathered all his dalilu. He had a small knife fastened to his chest, and a short Bozo<sup>8</sup> fish-spear hung from his waist.

To the other warriors Diawara said, "Excuse me. We may meet in this world or we may meet in God's kingdom. If I'm successful, we'll meet in this world; I'll come back and find you here. But if I'm overcome by the crocodile, we'll meet in God's kingdom." Then he dove into the water and swam into the cave, unaware that he was actually swimming straight into the crocodile's stomach. The crocodile closed its mouth on him.

As the crocodile closed its mouth on him, Diawara the hunter demonstrated his dalilu. Though he was trapped inside the crocodile, he was still alive, as comfortable as if he were in his own house. Taking his spear from his side, he stabbed the crocodile here, pu!; he stabbed it there, pu! The crocodile went kututu. Diawara speared the crocodile over and over again.

The water bubbled, and blood came to the surface. As the water around him turned bloody, Diawara reached for the knife on his chest. He sliced a hole in the crocodile's belly and swam out of it. Then, still under the water, he twisted the crocodile's front legs and tied them together.

As Diawara swam to the surface with the crocodile, a pelican flew by, squawking, from east to west. Manden laughed. As they hauled the crocodile wraith up onto the riverbank, Jolofin Mansa himself appeared. He was captured, tied up, and taken to Sunjata, the mansa.

Turama'an, who was the commander at that battle, brought Jolofin Mansa's treasure to Ma'an Sunjata. Manden was at last free, and the war was over.

8. An ethnic group of the Middle Niger, specializing in fishing and boating occupations, mainly located between Sansanding and Lake Debo in Mali.

VIII

Europe and the New World

“All the world's a stage, / And all the men and women merely players.” William Shakespeare's famous comparison of human beings to actors playing their various roles in the great theater of the world conjures up the exhilarating liberty and mobility we associate with the memorable characters of Renaissance literature. Because “merely” meant, in Shakespeare's day, “wholly” and “entirely,” the line evokes a lively sense of the men and women of that world performing their roles with the gusto of actors. Their social roles as princes, clowns, thieves, or housewives appear, from one angle, as exciting opportunities for the characters to explore. Yet such roles are also clearly confining: Renaissance men and women were born into societies that strictly regulated their actions and even their clothing—only actors had the right to vary their garb and dress above their station. Whether Renaissance subjects relished the pleasures of playing or resented the constraints of their social roles is a subject often taken up in the literature of the day.

The most memorable characters of Renaissance literature enjoy greater autonomy and more fully realized personalities, and are much more prone to introspection than their medieval predecessors. Characters like Cervantes' idealistic but mad Don

---

A detail from Hans Holbein's 1533 painting commonly called The Ambassadors.

Quixote; Shakespeare's hesitant Hamlet; and Milton's "domestic" Adam and "adventurous" Eve are frequently presented in acts of thought, fantasy, planning, doubt, and internal debate. Deliberating with others and themselves about what to do seems at least as important to these characters as putting their plans into action.

One reason for this shift toward internal, mental, and psychological portraiture is that Renaissance authors, like the characters they invent, inhabited a world of such widespread revolutionary change that they could not passively receive the traditional wisdom of previous ages. The stage on which they played was transformed and expanded by both the scientific and the geographical advances of the age. When Nicolaus Copernicus (1473–1543) discovered that the earth moves around the sun and when Galileo Galilei (1564–1642) turned his telescope up to the heavens, the nature of the universe and creation had to be reconceived. When Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) sailed to what he thought were the Indies, he introduced a New World to Europe, which began for the first time to think of itself as the Old World. Around the time that Columbus was sailing to America, humanist thinkers in Italy began to use new scholarly methods that gave them fuller access to the cultural legacy of ancient Greece and Rome as well as a new sense of their own place in history. On scientific, geographical, and scholarly fronts, the world of Renaissance Europe was undergoing revolutionary change.

After Johannes Gutenberg's invention of the printing press in 1439, the new ideas and controversies of the age reached a broader audience than ever before. Texts of all sorts were printed widely, and the spread of the printing press across Europe meant that writers could often avoid local censorship by having texts printed elsewhere, as occurred with Protestant Bibles in local languages that circulated widely despite Catholic prohibitions, or works like the biting satire Lazarillo de Tormes, which the Inquisition banned in Spain but which were printed and reprinted in the Netherlands or Italy. Despite censorship, the average person's access to information increased dramatically.

The new discoveries, rapidly circulating, were avidly resisted in some quarters, as when the Inquisition forced Galileo to repudiate the Copernican theory that the earth rotates around the sun. At the same time, they led to an unprecedented sense of possibility. In his dialogue The City of the Sun (1602) Galileo's friend and supporter Tommaso Campanella (1568–1639) optimistically asserted that the three great inventions of his day—the compass, the printing press, and the gun—were "signs of the union of the entire world."

As the two great powers of the age, Habsburg Spain and the Ottoman Empire, grew ever more dominant, this "union of the world" could also seem threatening. With the defeat of the Muslim stronghold of Granada in 1492, and the expulsion of the Jews in the same year, Spain emerged as a centralized, militantly Christian state. Spain's modernized army effectively replaced older chivalric forms of combat with new troops armed with guns and cannons, making great inroads into Italy and France. Charles, king of Spain, was crowned Holy Roman Emperor in 1519, consolidating many of the great dynastic houses of Europe. Soon the Habsburg domains extended across the globe, from Europe to the New World in the west to Asia, in an empire without precedent.

ENCOUNTERING THE NEW WORLD

As emperor, Charles V took for his emblem the Pillars of Hercules, which for the ancients had signaled the end of the known world at the Straits of Gibraltar. But Charles reversed the motto that accompanied the emblem, from the forbidding “Ne Plus Ultra” (no further, Latin) to the endlessly ambitious “Plus Ultra,” which encouraged going ever further. So the Spanish did across the globe, all while battling the Ottomans’ own expansion into the Mediterranean and North Africa.

The new discoveries challenged European centrality in the world and in creation. Contact with New World peoples forced Europeans to consider as never before what counted as culture, civilization, and even humanity, casting into doubt the authority of the classics that scholars had recently embraced with a new fervor. In an ironic exchange on Prospero’s island in Shakespeare’s The Tempest, Miranda exclaims, “Oh brave new world, that has such people in it,” only to suffer her father’s devastating correction: “Tis new to thee.” Although Columbus considered the New World a tabula rasa—a clean slate ready to be imprinted with Christianity and European ways—by the time the conquerors Hernán Cortés (1485–1547) and Francisco Pizarro (1478–1541) encountered the great civilizations of the Aztecs and the Incas in the 1520s and 1530s, Europe was forced to grapple with other versions of what culture could mean.

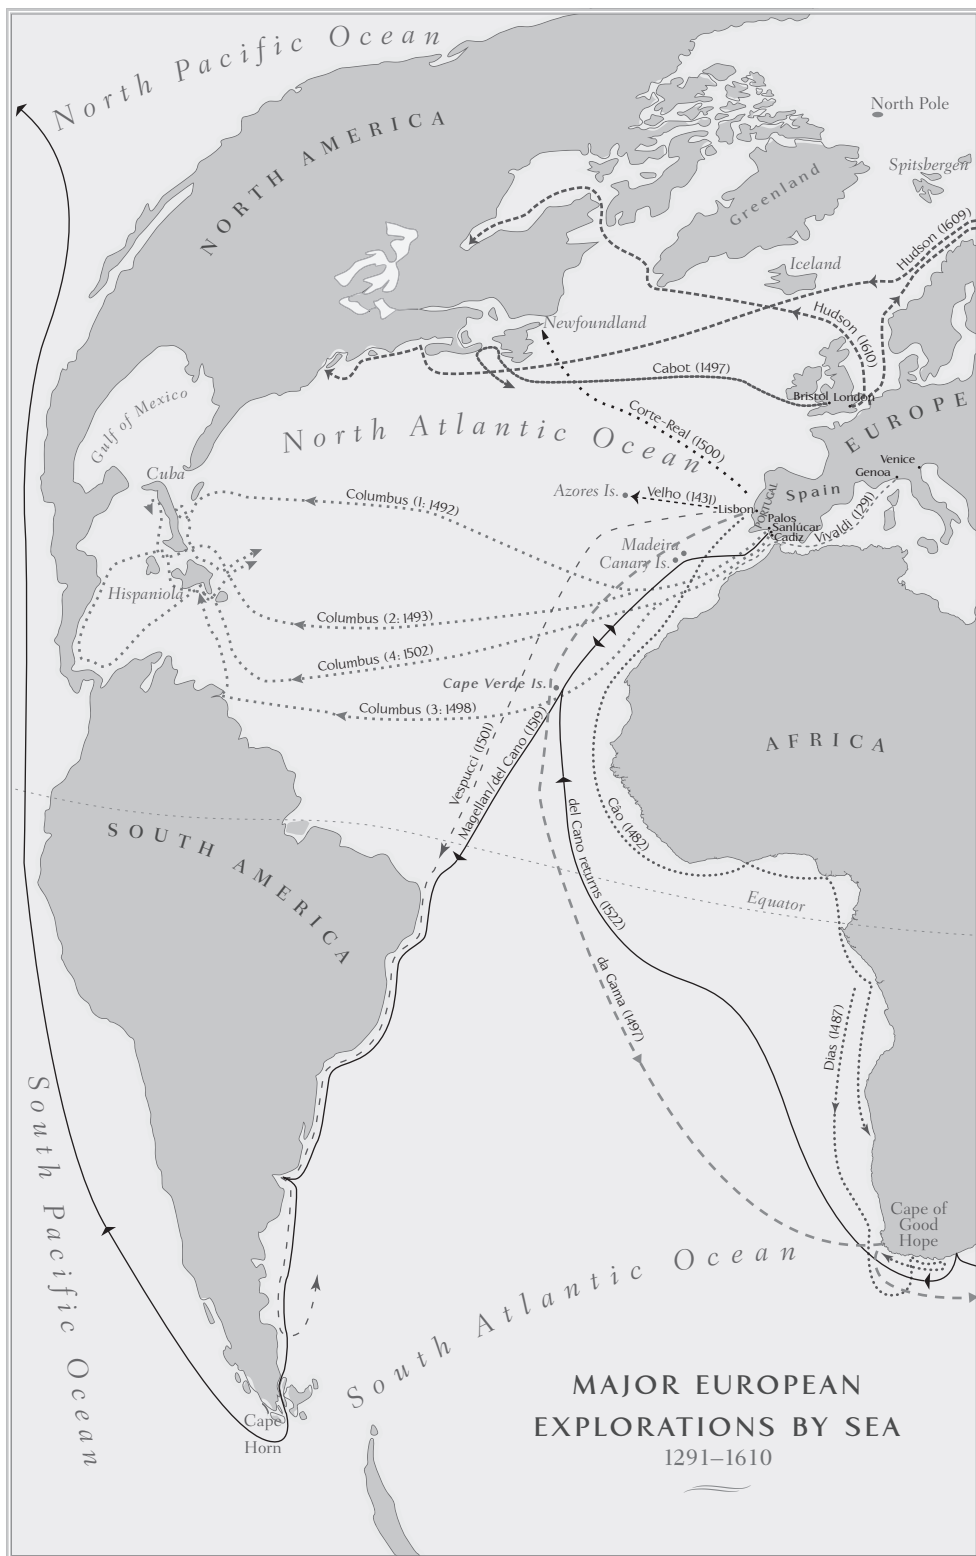

As the explorers contemplated complex societies that had been completely unknown to the Old World, the arbitrariness of European social arrangements became visible to many thoughtful observers. Thomas More (1478–1535) was inspired by reports of new social arrangements to imagine his own island of Utopia, a wry fantasy nonetheless full of hope for reform. In one of his skeptical, probing essais (called “Of Cannibals”) Michel de Montaigne (1533–1592) elaborated on Jean de Léry’s detailed and even-handed ethnography of the Tupinamba Indians in Brazil, to ask larger questions about European society, whose peculiarities proved as unintelligible to the “cannibals” as Tupinamba society was to Europeans.

Europeans assumed that the New World existed for their profit and delectation—an idea expressed everywhere from the famous engraving by Jan van der Straet that depicted America as a seductive woman welcoming the explorer Amerigo Vespucci with open arms, to John Donne’s poem “To his mistress going to bed,” in which he exclaims as he finally manages to peel off her clothes, “Oh, my America, my new found land.” Yet these assumptions were quickly challenged in the New World, both by an impregnable landscape and by the continued resistance of the native population. New World authors both indigenous and mestizo (born of the union of a European and an Indian), such as Inca Garcilaso de la Vega or Guaman Poma, demonstrated that America had its own history, far predating the encounter, and decried the abuses of the conquest as they argued for their own role in governing their societies. Spanish reformers such as Bartolomé de las Casas (1484–1566) also took up the cause of the Indians, promoting legal protections that ultimately failed to stop abuses that occurred far from the metropole. As the New World yielded untold mineral wealth, Spain set up an elaborate political structure to control it, while other European nations mounted their own expeditions or turned to piracy in efforts to rival Spanish successes. Meanwhile, the tremendous influx of wealth from the New World had a destabilizing effect across Europe, leading to persistent inflation and new possibilities of social mobility.

CONFLICTS IN EUROPE

If the New World proved difficult to control from across the ocean, Europe was no less riven by conflict. Not even the threat of “the Turk,” as the Europeans referred to the Ottoman expansion, could paper over the serious rifts that divided the continent. The Protestant Reformation, which initially targeted the abuses and corruption of the Catholic Church, quickly became a political as well as a religious crisis. Movements originally intended to reform the Church—such as those led by Martin Luther (1483–1546) and John Calvin (1509–1564)—were rapidly adopted by Renaissance princes bridleing under papal authority. The reformers’ attacks on the Pope, who wielded enormous political and military as well as spiritual power, provided an opportunity for rulers across Europe to increase their own sway. Henry VIII of England famously broke with the Catholic Church and declared himself head of the Church of England, and the pattern of contesting or breaking with papal authority was repeated throughout Europe. By nationalizing religious authority, monarchs claimed for themselves more and more rights that traditionally had belonged to the Pope or that had been shared by parliaments. Securing these rights from these other institutions brought monarchs closer to the absolutist rule that they craved. And yet, the Protestant Reformation had so emboldened subjects to challenge religious and political authority that the advantage enjoyed by European monarchs in the later sixteenth century would occasionally give way to a violent overthrow, as it did during the English Civil War (1642–51), when Charles I, a king reviled for his dismissal of Parliament and for failure to grant religious liberties to the more extreme Protestants among his subjects, was beheaded and the monarchy temporarily abolished.

From Jan van der Straet, Vespucci Discovering America, 1589. The fertility of the New World is represented as a sexualized female body.

Given the political force of the Catholic Church and the Protestant Reformation, it is no wonder that the Renaissance often appears to be more preoccupied with earthly princes and empires than

EUROPE

ca. 1590

- MOSTLY ROMAN CATHOLIC
- MOSTLY PROTESTANT (Lutheran, Calvinist, Anglican, Presbyterian)
- MOSTLY EASTERN ORTHODOX
- MOSTLY MUSLIM
- Areas of mixed religious populations with the heavenly King. In this new world of politics, the role of the Renaissance prince and his courtiers was instrumental. Niccolò Machiavelli's revolutionary treatise The Prince underscored the importance of the strong ruler—or at least a ruler who always appeared strong—as the head of his state. Dispelling with all pieties in favor of practical advice and placing ruthless effectiveness over morality, Machiavelli broke with a long tradition of advisors who preached moral behavior to their rulers, recognizing instead the exigencies of his time and the importance of projecting strength and authority. In his Book of the Courtier, Baldassare Castiglione (1478–1529) explained how to comport oneself with courtly grace, suggesting in the process that nobility could be learned. In an uncertain and rapidly changing world, performance and self-improvement were intertwined.

HUMANISM

The new Renaissance consciousness of how individuals could fashion themselves through their actions was in part due to the influence of the classics. Humanism, the intellectual movement that championed the return to the culture of Greece and Rome as a way to renew Europe, sought civic and moral guidance as well as aesthetic inspiration in the ancient texts. As the modern European rulers took on cadres of secretaries, ambassadors, and advisors, humanist pedagogy made education a road to power and privilege as never before.

The literal meaning of the word renaissance—"rebirth"—casts the great intellectual and artistic achievements of the period as a reprise of ancient culture. The artists and intellectuals of the Renaissance imagined the world of antiquity "reborn" through their work, in a vigorous renewal comparable to the thrilling discoveries of their own age. The degree to which European intellectuals of the period engaged with the writings of the ancient world is difficult for the average modern reader to realize. For these writers, references to classical mythology, philosophy, and literature are not ornaments or affectations. Along with references to the Scriptures, they are a major part of their mental equipment and way of thinking. Every cultivated person wrote and spoke Latin, with the result that a Western community of intellectuals could exist, a spiritual "republic of letters" above individual nations.

The archetypal humanist is often said to be the poet and scholar Francis Petrarch (1304–1374), who anticipated certain ideals of the high Renaissance: a lofty conception of the literary art, a taste for the good life, and a strong sense of the memories and glories of antiquity. In this last respect, what should be emphasized is the imaginative quality, the visionary impulse with which the writers of the period looked at those memories—the same vision and imagination with which they regarded such contemporary heroes as the great navigators and astronomers.

The vision of an ancient age of glorious intellectual achievement that is "now" brought to life again implies, of course, however roughly, the idea of an intervening "middle" age, by comparison ignorant and dark. The hackneyed, vastly inaccurate notion that the "light" of the Renaissance broke through a long "night" of the Middle Ages was not devised by subsequent centuries; it was held by the humanist scholars of the Renaissance themselves. Petrarch imagined himself living in "sad times": "It were better to be born either earlier or much later, for there was once and perhaps will be again a happier age. In the middle, you see, in our time, squalor and baseness have flowed together." Addressing his book, Petrarch expresses his longing for a new age: "But if you, as is my wish and ardent hope, shall live on after me, a more propitious age will come again: this Lethean stupor surely can't endure forever. Our posterity, perchance, when the shadows have lifted, may enjoy once more the radiance the ancients knew." The combination of self-deprecation, aspiration, and arrogance aptly characterizes the period's sense of its own superiority over not only the New World but also the recent past.

Despite the fractured political and religious landscape of Europe, especially in the sixteenth century, the great intellectual innovations of the Renaissance expanded across all boundaries. The movement had its inception in Italy with Petrarch, and developed most remarkably in the visual arts, made its way across Europe to Spain, France, and England, where its main achievements were in literature, particularly the drama. The intellectual fervor of humanism, like the poetic conventions of Petrarchism, gradually expanded into multiple languages and national traditions. Their dissemination led to new genres and to playful recombinations of older ones, inaugurating a period of great innovation in all forms of literature.

Definitions of the Renaissance must take account of the period's preoccupation with this life rather than with the life beyond. Though an oversimplification, one might say that an ideal medieval man or woman, whose mode of action is basically oriented toward the thought of the afterlife (and who therefore conceives of life on earth as transient and preparatory) contrasts with an ideal Renaissance man or woman, whose enthusiasm for earthly interests is actually enhanced by the knowledge that one's time on earth is fleeting. Once again, Petrarch provides the best example: the Rime Sparse (Scattered Rhymes), the extensive sequence of love poems for which he is best known, are full of renunciation, as the poet searches in vain for religious consolation for the travails of earthly desire. Yet in the process of charting the futility of earthly love, the poems paint an incredibly detailed portrait of the poet-lover in all his earthly variations, rendering his interior life both immediate and engrossing.

THE WELL-LIVED LIFE

The emphasis on the immediate and tangible is reflected in the earthly, amoral, and aesthetic character of what we may call the Renaissance code of behavior. Human action is judged not in terms of right and wrong, of good and evil (as it is judged when life is viewed as a moral "test," with reward or punishment in the afterlife), but in terms of its present concrete validity and effectiveness, of the delight it affords, of its memorability and its beauty. Much of what is typical of the Renaissance, then, from architecture to poetry, from sculpture to rhetoric, may be related to a taste for the harmonious and the memorable, for the spectacular effect, for the successful striking of a pose. Individual human action, seeking in itself its own reward, finds justification in its formal appropriateness; in its being a well-rounded achievement, perfect of its kind; in the zest and gusto with which it is, here and now, performed; and, finally, in its proving worthy of remaining as a testimony to the performer's power on earth. In this sense, the purpose of life is the unrestrained and self-sufficient practice of one's "virtue," the competent and delighted exercise of one's skill.

The leaders of the period saw in a work of art the clearest instance of beautiful, harmonious, and self-justified performance. To create such a work became the valuable occupation par excellence, the most satisfactory display of virtue. The Renaissance view of antiquity exemplifies this attitude. The artists and intellectuals of the period not only drew on antiquity for certain practices and forms but also found there a recognition of the place of the arts among outstanding modes of human action. In this way, the concepts of “fame” and “glory” became particularly associated with the art of poetry because the Renaissance drew from antiquity the idea of the poet as celebrator of high deeds, the “dispenser of glory.”

At the same time, there is no reason to forget that such virtues and skills are God’s gift. Renaissance intellectuals, artists, aristocrats, and princes did not lack in abiding religious faith or fervor. Machiavelli, Rabelais, and Cervantes take for granted the presence of God in their own and in their heroes’ lives. For many, the Protestant Reformation and the growth of mysticism within the Catholic Church led to a more intimate and individualized relationship with the divine. Much about the religious temper of the age is expressed in its art, particularly in Italian painting, where Renaissance Madonnas celebrate earthly beauty even as they inspire thoughts of the divine.

SKEPTICISM AND MELANCHOLY

Especially where there is a close association between the practical and the intellectual—as in the exercise of political power, the act of scientific discovery, the creation of works of art—the Renaissance assumption is that there are things here on earth that are highly worth doing, and that by doing them, humanity proves its privileged position in creation and therefore incidentally follows God’s intent. The often-cited phrase “the dignity of man” describes this positive, strongly affirmed awareness of the intellectual and physical “virtues” of the human being, and of the individual’s place in creation. And yet, alongside the delight of earthly achievement, there lurked in many Renaissance minds nagging doubts: What is the purpose or ultimate worth of all this activity? What meaningful relation does it bear to any all-inclusive, cosmic pattern? The Renaissance coincided with, and perhaps to some extent occasioned, a loss of firm belief in the final unity and the final intelligibility of the universe. In the wake of the geographic and scientific discoveries, thinkers such as Montaigne and Descartes became skeptics, doubting and questioning received knowledge.

Madonna and Child, ca. 1465, by Fra Filippo Lippi. The object of the painting’s devotions is somewhat unclear: is our eye focused on the baby Jesus, or on the beauty of Mary’s face?

For some Renaissance writers and artists, the sense of uncertainty became so strong as to paralyze their aspiration to power or thirst for knowledge or delight in beauty. The resulting attitude we may call Renaissance melancholy. It was sometimes openly expressed (as by some characters in Elizabethan drama) and other times merely provided an undercurrent of sadness or wise resignation to a work (as in Montaigne's Essays). Thus while on one, and perhaps the better-known, side of the picture, human intellect in Renaissance literature enthusiastically illuminates the realms of knowledge and unveils the mysteries of the universe, on the other it is beset by puzzling doubts and a profound mistrust of its own powers.

Young Man Holding a Skull, 1519, by Lucas van Leyden. This young nobleman, a paragon of Renaissance fashion, points to a skull that he cradles in his left arm, reminding the viewer of the inevitable fate that even the best-dressed courtier will face.

Doubts about the value of human action within the scheme of eternity did not, however, diminish the outpouring of ideas about the ideal ordering of this world. Renaissance poets and intellectuals tested ideas about the ideal prince, courtier, councilor, and humble subject as well as the ideal court and society. More's Utopia imagines a perfectly ordered society, as improbable as it is optimistic, while Machiavelli proposes his amoral ideas about the effective (rather than ideal) prince. Shakespeare's Hamlet gives us a prince far from ideal, confronting the effects of private violations on the public realm. In all these works, Renaissance writers can be seen tirelessly examining the nature of their own world, the problem of power, and the vexed relations between the absolute authority of the prince and the rights and liberties of the people. Its zeal for defining the social contract partly explains why the Renaissance is often viewed as the "early modern" period; the "rebirth" and flourishing of antiquity also heralded ideas that we associate with the modern political world.

The joining of philosophical and imaginative thinking in literary expression is characteristic of the Renaissance, which cultivated the idea of "serious play." Throughout the literature of the period, we see the creative and restless mind of the Renaissance intellectual "freely ranging," as Sir Philip Sidney put it, "only in the zodiac of his own wit," creating fictional characters and worlds that might, if the poet is sufficiently persuasive, be put into practice and change the nature of the real world.

---

FRANCIS PETRARCH

1304–1374

---

Although Petrarch, a contemporary of Dante, lived and died in the Middle Ages, he did everything in his power to distinguish himself and his scholarship from the period he dismissed as the “Dark Ages.” Petrarch dedicated himself to the recovery of classical learning in a spirit commonly associated with a later period, in which humanist scholars zealously pursued the rebirth of antiquity. Yet Petrarch’s status as a precursor of the Renaissance is primarily due to an aspect of his work that neither he nor his contemporaries regarded as a lasting contribution: his 366 lyric poems in the vernacular, mostly dedicated to his frustrated desire for an elusive woman named Laura. Petrarch’s experience of love and sense of his own fragmented and fluid self set the standard for the lyric expression of subjective and erotic experience in the Renaissance. His efforts to scrutinize himself intently and at times unflatteringly and to capture his own elusive inner workings in verse inspired a poetic tradition that has influenced lyric sequences from Shakespeare’s sonnets to Walt Whitman’s Leaves of Grass to contemporary pop lyrics.

Francis Petrarch was born in Arezzo on July 20, 1304, three years after his father and Dante Alighieri were exiled from Florence. In 1314, Petrarch’s father moved his family to Avignon, the new seat of the papacy (1309–77), where he became prosperous in the legal profession. Petrarch himself initially trained as a law student, but chose instead to pursue the study of classical culture and literature. He soon came to the attention of the powerful Colonna family, whose patronage launched his career as a diplomat-scholar and allowed him to travel widely and move in the intimate circles of European princes and scholars. He refused the offices of bishop and papal secretary, preferring instead to ground his growing prestige in his humanistic scholarship. Imaginative conversation with the ancients, like imitation of their poetry, brought him into contact with the past: his research into classical history and arts profoundly influenced his sense of himself and his own cultural moment. He died in 1374 near Padua, his head resting on a volume of his beloved Virgil.

Petrarch’s most famous work, the Rime Sparse (Scattered Rhymes) or Rerum Fragmenta Vulgarium (Fragments in the Vernacular), is a collection of 366 songs and sonnets (based on the calendar year associated with the liturgy) of extraordinary technical virtuosity and variety. Written in Italian and woven into a highly introspective narrative, the lyric collection takes the poet himself as its object of study. The poems painstakingly record how his thoughts and identity are scattered and transformed by the experience of love for a beautiful, unattainable woman named Laura. Even some of his friends suspected that Laura was merely the theme and emblem of his lyric poetry and not a historical woman; she appears to have been both. On the flyleaf of his magnificent copy of Virgil, Petrarch inscribed a note on her life:

Laura, illustrious through her own virtues, and long famed through my verses, first appeared to my eyes in my youth, in the year of our Lord 1327, on the sixth day of April, in the church of St. Clare in Avignon, at matins; and in the same city, also on the sixth day of April, at the same first hour, but in the year 1348, the light of her life was withdrawn from the light of day, while I, as it chanced, was in Verona, unaware of my fate. * * * Her chaste and lovely form was laid to rest at vesper time, on the same day on which she died in the burial place of the Brothers Minor. I am persuaded that her soul returned to the heaven from which it came, as Seneca says of Africanus. I have thought to write this, in bitter memory, yet with a certain bitter sweetness, here in this place that is often before my eyes, so that I may be admonished, by the sight of these words and by the consideration of the swift flight of time, that there is nothing in this life in which I should find pleasure; and that it is time, now that the strongest tie is broken, to flee from Babylon; and this, by the convenient grace of God, should be easy for me, if I meditate deeply and manfully on the futile cares, the empty hopes, and the unforeseen events of my past years.

(Translated by E. H. Wilkins)

Petrarch's note illuminates the powerful role that Laura plays in his personal struggles between spiritual aspirations and earthly attachments. Thoughts of Laura return him to the problem of his own will, torn between spiritual and sensual desires, always delaying worldly renunciation. Even when he expresses disgust with earthly rewards and pleasures, it is conditional: he will choose the right course of action, Petrarch writes, if he meditates "deeply and manfully" on the disappointments and failures of his past and denies memory's seductively bittersweet pleasures.

In the Rime Sparse, Laura's ambiguous position between divine guide and earthly temptress contrasts sharply with the role that Beatrice played in Dante's spiritual pilgrimage, the Divine Comedy. Whereas Dante's love finally leads him to paradise, it is never clear to Petrarch whether he is pursuing heavenly or earthly delights and whether he will safely reach any destination or "port" (in the nautical image of sonnet 189). When Dante looks into Beatrice's eyes on Mount Purgatory, he sees a reflection of the heavens; when Petrarch gazes into Laura's eyes, he sees himself. Not even his use of the liturgical year (especially the anniversaries of Christ's death and resurrection) to structure his account of their relationship guarantees that a spiritual conversion will follow Petrarch's self-analysis or "confession" of his life. In a contrary and skeptical mood at the end of one of his most philosophical poems (song 264), Petrarch asserts, "I see the better, but choose the worse."

The lyric collection's first sonnet, in which Petrarch solicits compassion as well as pardon from his readers, establishes the Rime Sparse's close relationship to confessional narrative. Its themes of conversion, memory, and forgetfulness (of God and oneself) evoke the model of St. Augustine and raise the question of whether Petrarch will follow suit: will he ultimately transcend his attachment to a woman's physical beauty, his love of language and poetic figures, and his narcissistic preoccupation with himself? In dramatic opposition to the transcendent model of Augustine is Ovid of the Metamorphoses, the classical counter-epic that artfully uses fragmentation, fluid change, and scattering to describe the effects of power—divine, political, or erotic—on bodies and on minds. Petrarch refers to a variety of Ovidian figures in the Rime Sparse, including Narcissus and Echo, Actaeon and Diana, Medusa, and Pygmalion. His chief Ovidian model, however, is the story of Apollo, the god who “invents” the genre of lyric during his amorous chase of the nymph Daphne. While running, Apollo describes her various beauties—eyes, figure, and hair—and imaginatively embellishes what he sees. When Daphne eludes him through her transformation into the laurel, Apollo claims her as his tree, if not his lover, and declares that the laurel will be the sign of triumph in letters and warfare. The prominence of this tale in the Rime Sparse suggests that if Laura had not lived, Petrarch would have had to invent her. Her name interweaves key attributes of Petrarch’s poetic imagination: lauro and alloro (“laurel”), oro (“gold,” for her tresses and value), l’aura (“breeze” and “inspiration,” which etymologically relates to “breath”), laus or lauda (“praise”). Such wordplay suggests the selective, even obsessive character of Petrarch’s poetic style. Like Apollo, Petrarch also “translates” his beloved’s elusive body into the more tangible figures of rhetoric.

Petrarch’s great legacy to Renaissance European literature is the Rime Sparse’s language of self-description, which starts from the conventional hyperbole, antithesis, and oxymoron (rhetorical exaggeration and opposition) that characterized troubadour songs, provençal lyric, and classical love elegy: I freeze and burn, love is bitter and sweet, my sighs are tempests and my tears are floods, I am in ecstasy and agony, I am possessed by memories of her and I am in exile from myself. Petrarch transformed such rhetorical figures or tropes of love into a powerful language of introspection and self-fashioning that swept through European literature. Although it soon became so popular that writers endlessly repeated and even trivialized it, Petrarchism had serious dimensions that helped articulate growing questions about the self: is it determined by God or flexible and in the shaping hands of humankind? Do culture, history, and force of will compose and transform it?

Petrarchism offered rich formal possibilities as well: although Petrarch often wrote in other meters, the sonnet became in his hands an extraordinarily supple metrical form. A Petrarchan sonnet, as the form is now known, is a fourteen-line poem with a break after line eight. The octet is usually broken into two stanzas of four lines each, with a rhyme scheme of abba, and the sestet is made up of two three-line stanzas, rhyming cde. The sonnet proved remarkably flexible, allowing poets to express themselves in a compact and striking manner. The sestet and the octet may contrast formally or semantically, as may the stanzas within a section of the sonnet, while its rhyme can reinforce or contradict meaning. The possibilities are virtually endless, as Petrarch’s many imitators were to demonstrate.

Across sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Europe, writers turned to Petrarch as a beacon of Italian humanism who offered a powerful intellectual and formal toolkit for introspection. Through their own poems, they made Petrarchism into an international language, adapting it to various national traditions and rehearsing it in countless iterations.

RIME SPARSE

1<sup>1</sup>

You who hear in scattered rhymes the sound of those sighs with which I nourished my heart during my first youthful error,<sup>2</sup> when I was in part another man from what I am now:

for the varied style in which I weep and speak between vain hopes and vain sorrow, where there is anyone who understands 5 love through experience, I hope to find pity, not only pardon.

But now I see well how for a long time I was the talk of the crowd, for which often I am ashamed of myself within;<sup>3</sup> and of my raving, shame is the fruit, and repentance, and the clear knowledge that whatever pleases in the world is a brief 10 dream.

3<sup>4</sup>

It was the day when the sun's rays turned pale with grief for his Maker<sup>5</sup> when I was taken, and I did not defend myself against it, for your lovely eyes, Lady, bound me.

It did not seem to me a time for being on guard against Love's blows; therefore I went confident and without fear, and so my 5 misfortunes began in the midst of the universal woe.<sup>6</sup>

Love found me altogether disarmed, and the way open through my eyes to my heart, my eyes which are now the portal and passageway of tears.

Therefore, as it seems to me, it got him no honor to strike me 10 with an arrow in that state,<sup>7</sup> and not even to show his bow to you, who were armed.

1. Translated by Robert M. Durling.

2. Mental and physical "wandering" as well as a moral "mistake." "Scattered rhymes": reference to the sonnet collection's title, Rime Sparse.

3. The Italian, di me medesimo meco mi vergogno, suggests intense self-consciousness.

4. Translated by Robert M. Durling.

5. The anniversary of Christ's crucifixion. Elsewhere (sonnet 211 and a note in Petrarch's copy of Virgil) given as April 6, 1327.

6. The communal Christian grief that contrasts with Petrarch's private woes.

7. State of grief over the crucifixion.

34<sup>8</sup>

Apollo, if the sweet desire is still alive that inflamed you beside the Thessalian waves,<sup>9</sup> and if you have not forgotten, with the turning of the years, those beloved blond locks; against the slow frost and the harsh and cruel time that lasts as long as your face is hidden, now defend the honored and holy 5 leaves where you first and then I were limed;

and by the power of the amorous hope that sustained you in your bitter life, disencumber the air of these impressions.<sup>1</sup>

Thus we shall then together see a marvel<sup>2</sup>—our lady sitting on the grass and with her arms making a shade for herself. 10

62<sup>3</sup>

Father in heaven, after each lost day,
Each night spent raving with that fierce desire
Which in my heart has kindled into fire
Seeing your acts adorned for my dismay;

Grant henceforth that I turn, within your light<sup>4</sup> 5
To another life and deeds more truly fair,
So having spread to no avail the snare
My bitter foe<sup>5</sup> might hold it in despite.

The eleventh year,<sup>6</sup> my Lord, has now come round
Since I was yoked beneath the heavy trace 10
That on the meekest weighs most cruelly.

Pity the abject plight where I am found;
Return my straying thoughts to a nobler place;
Show them this day you were on Calvary.

8. Translated by Robert M. Durling.

9. Petrarch links his love of Laura to the love of Apollo for Daphne in Ovid's Metamorphoses. Daphne, daughter of the god of the Peneus River in Thessaly, was pursued by Apollo, the god of poetry. She begged her father to change her form, which had "given too much pleasure," and was transformed into the laurel tree. Apollo, whom Petrarch associates with the sun god, claimed the laurel as his personal emblem.

1. Grief, cloudy weather, and aging.

2. Supernatural and highly meaningful spectacle.

3. Translated by Bernard Bergonzi.

4. Of grace.

5. Satan.

6. I.e., 1338.

126<sup>7</sup>

Clear, fresh, sweet waters,<sup>8</sup> where she who alone seems lady to me rested her lovely body, gentle branch where it pleased her (with sighing I remember) to make a column for her lovely side, grass and flowers that her rich garment covered along with 5 her angelic breast, sacred bright air where Love opened my heart with her lovely eyes: listen all together to my sorrowful dying words.

If it is indeed my destiny and Heaven exerts itself that Love close these eyes while they are still weeping, 10 let some grace bury my poor body among you and let my soul return naked to this its own dwelling;
 death will be less harsh if I bear this hope to the fearful pass, for my weary spirit could never in a more restful port or a more tranquil grave flee my laboring flesh and my bones. 15

There will come a time perhaps when to her accustomed sojourn the lovely, gentle wild one will return and, seeking me, turn her desirous and happy eyes toward where she saw me on that blessed day, and oh the pity! seeing me already dust amid the stones, 20
 Love will inspire her to sigh so sweetly that she will win mercy for me and force Heaven, drying her eyes with her lovely veil.

From the lovely branches was descending (sweet in memory) a rain of flowers over her bosom, and she was sitting humble in such a glory,<sup>9</sup> already covered 25 with the loving cloud;
 this flower was falling on her skirt, this one on her blond braids, which were burnished gold and pearls to see that day;
 this one was coming to rest on the ground, this one on the water, this one, with a lovely wandering, turning about seemed to say: 30
 "Here reigns Love."<sup>1</sup>

How many times did I say to myself then, full of awe: "She was surely born in Paradise!"

Her divine bearing and her face and her words and her sweet smile had so laden me with forgetfulness 35 and so divided me from the true image, that I was sighing:
 "How did I come here and when?" thinking I was in Heaven, not there where I was. From then on this grass has pleased me so that elsewhere I have no peace.

If you had as many beauties as you have desire, you could 40 boldly leave the wood and go among people.<sup>2</sup>

7. Translated by Robert M. Durling.

8. Of the river Sorgue.

9. An image associated with the Virgin Mary.

1. Amor (Cupid) or Christ. The floral and bejeweled images associate Laura's body with the bride of the Song of Songs, whose erotic chastity is celebrated as an "enclosed garden" and "fountain sealed."

2. The last two lines are addressed to the poem.

189<sup>3</sup>

My ship laden with forgetfulness passes through a harsh sea, at midnight, in winter, between Scylla and Charybdis, and at the tiller sits my lord, rather my enemy;<sup>4</sup>

each oar is manned by a ready, cruel thought that seems to scorn the tempest and the end; a wet, changeless wind of sighs, hopes, 5 and desires breaks the sail;

a rain of weeping, a mist of disdain wet and loosen the already weary ropes, made of error twisted up with ignorance.

My two usual sweet stars<sup>5</sup> are hidden; dead among the waves are reason and skill; so that I begin to despair of the port. 10

333<sup>6</sup>

Go, grieving rimes of mine, to that hard stone
Whereunder lies my darling, lies my dear,
And cry to her to speak from heaven's sphere.
Her mortal part with grass is overgrown.

Tell her, I'm sick of living; that I'm blown 5
By winds of grief from the course I ought to steer,
That praise of her is all my purpose here
And all my business; that of her alone

Do I go telling, that how she lived and died
And lives again in immortality, 10
All men may know, and love my Laura's grace.

Oh, may she deign to stand at my bedside
When I come to die; and may she call to me
And draw me to her in the blessed place!

3. Translated by Robert M. Durling.

4. Love. Scylla and Charybdis are the twinned oceanic dangers through which Odysseus, in Homer's Odyssey, and Aeneas, in Virgil's Aeneid, must chart a middle course. Forgetfulness of oneself and of God is sinful in Augustinian terms. The ship, captained by Reason, is a traditional figure for the embodied soul.

5. Laura's eyes.

6. Translated by Morris Bishop.

---

NICCOLÒ MACHIAVELLI

1469–1527

---

Widely vilified and secretly admired, Niccolò Machiavelli attempted to teach the rulers of his time how to get power and hold on to it. With his mix of clear-eyed, pragmatic observation and humanist idealism, Machiavelli transformed our conception of political power. Sharply contrasting traditional morality to the pragmatic necessities of ruling, Machiavelli tried to address the painful fragmentation and constant warfare of the many states that then made up what is today Italy. His solution—a strong, effective prince unconstrained by moral pieties—struck his contemporaries as a terrifying prescription for the use of force and deception, even though Machiavelli always stressed the ruler’s need for popular support. Seeking to discuss the conduct of political affairs from a new rational basis, Machiavelli has been credited with having turned politics into a science.

LIFE AND TIMES

The son of a lawyer, Machiavelli was born to a well-connected but not wealthy family in the city-state of Florence, ruled by the beloved Lorenzo di Medici. He received a modest education, and was introduced to the scholarly circles around the ruler. Machiavelli’s adult life was closely bound up with the political fortunes of his city-state. Renaissance Italy was a fractured collection of polities, constantly overrun by the armies of France, Spain, and the Holy Roman Empire, all of which took advantage of Italian fragmentation to expand their territorial claims. When Machiavelli was a young man, Florence experienced its own profound political upheavals: after Lorenzo’s death in 1492, the Medici were expelled from power and Florence was ruled by the Dominican preacher Savonarola. When Savonarola’s regime collapsed, the city returned to republican government, and Machiavelli embarked on a distinguished career of public service, serving a city-state whose government was the most widely representative of its time. From 1498 to 1512, Machiavelli was secretary to the Second Chancery, charged with internal and war affairs. He also served as a diplomatic envoy (his low rank meant he could not be an ambassador), and, during the conflict between Florence and Pisa, he dealt with military problems firsthand. His many missions to some of the most powerful rulers of his time—King Louis XII of France, Cesare Borgia, Pope Julius II, the Emperor Maximilian—allowed him to observe up close their methods for gaining and maintaining political power; this led to two books—Portraits—of the affairs of their territories, written in 1508 and 1510. Machiavelli noted what made for effective conquest and rule, and contrasted the ruthlessness of a figure like Borgia to the slow deliberations of the consensus-based government in his own city. The constant threats and emergencies faced by Florence and other Italian states made Machiavelli’s ideal leader—the hardheaded, strong prince—seem an appealing figure as a possible savior against foreign invasions.

As a student of politics and an acute observer of historical events, Machiavelli tried to apply his experience of other states to strengthening his own. He noted that one weakness of the Italian city-states was their reliance on mercenary soldiers, who were ever ready to change sides for higher pay. Instead, following Cesare Borgia's example, he set out in 1505 to establish an army of Florentine citizens, animated by their love for their country, which achieved some surprising victories. Yet the republican forces were not enough to fend off all attackers, and, in 1512, in a moment of military weakness, the Medici faction regained power. With the end of the republic, Machiavelli lost his post. The Medici accused him unjustly of conspiracy and had him imprisoned and tortured. Once released, he retreated from the city to his family's farm, with his wife, Marietta Corsini, and their five children. There, in a study where he imagined himself in conversation with the classical writers he most admired (as detailed in the "Letter to Francesco Vettori," also included in this anthology), Machiavelli produced his major works: a study of republican government, the Discourses on the First Ten Books of Livy (1513–21), and one on statecraft, The Prince, written in 1513 with the hope that the Medici would ultimately grant him a public office. As his exile grew longer, he also wrote a number of literary works, including the much-applauded comedy La mandragola (The Mandrake), first performed in 1520. That same year Machiavelli was commissioned to write a history of Florence, which he presented in 1525 to Pope Clement VII (Giulio de' Medici).

After a reconciliation of sorts with the ruling Medicis, Machiavelli was entrusted with the upkeep of military fortifications in Florence. Here, too, he served the city well, presenting a strong enough defense that when the Holy Roman Empire invaded Italy in 1527, Florence avoided being attacked. Instead, the imperial forces sacked Rome with incredible violence. For Florence, which had long benefited from the strength of a series of Medici popes in Rome, the result was the collapse of Medici domination and, once more, the return of republican government. Despite Machiavelli's long history of service to the republic, however, he was now regarded as a Medici sympathizer and passed over for public office. This last disappointment may have accelerated his demise. He died on June 22, 1527, and was buried in the church of Santa Croce.

THE PRINCE

Although he wrote widely across many genres, Machiavelli's reputation—and his notoriety—is based on The Prince. This "handbook" on how to obtain and keep political power consists of twenty-six chapters. The first eleven deal with different types of dominions and how they are acquired and preserved—the early title of the whole book, in Latin, was De principatibus (Of Princedoms)—while the twelfth through fourteenth chapters focus on problems of military power. The book's astounding fame, however, is based on the final part (from chapter fifteen to the end), which deals primarily with the attributes and "virtues" of the prince himself.

Traditional manuals for rulers—a genre often referred to as the "mirror of princes"—couched their advice in the language of Christian morality. Their point was to remind the ruler to remain virtuous as they educated him and gave him advice. Erasmus's roughly contemporary The Education of a Christian Prince (1516), for example, which he presented to the future Charles V of Spain and also to Henry VII of England, held that what the prince most needed was "the best possible understanding of Christ." Machiavelli's point, by stark contrast, is to make the ruler effective by giving him advice on how to stay in power. For Machiavelli, the end of political stability justifies the means, even if those means include deception and violent force.

The view of humanity in Machiavelli is not cheerful. Indeed, the pessimistic notion that humanity is evil is not so much Machiavelli's conclusion about human nature as his premise, the point of departure for the course a ruler should follow: "A prudent ruler . . . cannot and should not observe faith when such observance is to his disadvantage and the causes that made him give his promise have vanished. If men were all good, this advice would not be good, but since men are wicked and do not keep their promises to you, you likewise do not have to keep yours to them." The idealism of Christian morality is checked by realism, by the facts on the ground. Machiavelli sees humanity as it is, not as it should be, and indicates the rules of the game as his experience shows it must, under the circumstances, be played. This kind of bald assessment did not sit well with European Christians invested in moral absolutes and in the idea that it was God who bestowed power to rulers.

Yet despite his emphasis on ruthlessly preserving power, Machiavelli stresses over and over again the importance for a ruler of preserving the goodwill of his subjects. In Machiavelli's view, a ruthless leader such as Cesare Borgia would at least avoid the weakness of lords who "plundered their subjects rather than governed them" and allowed "thefts, brawls, and every sort of excess." It is better for a prince to be thought stingy, he explains, than for him to grow poor through lavishness and then be forced to rob his subjects.

Machiavelli's pragmatism, his emphasis on fact, on how the real world works rather than on lofty ideals, contrasts with his own idealization of the strong ruler. His picture of the perfectly efficient ruler shows the Renaissance tendency toward "perfected" form. In this, he is closer than one might suspect to that more obvious treatise of political idealism, Thomas More's Utopia (1516), in which the desires and venality of humankind are curbed by a strong ruler and the rules he bequeaths to society. Most clearly at the end of the book, Machiavelli abandons complex reality in favor of an ideal vision and he offers the conclusion to his many lessons: the ideal ruler, now technically equipped by Machiavelli's lessons, is to undertake a mission—the liberation of Italy. The realistic method described throughout now appears directed toward an ideal task. Instead of technical political considerations (choice of the opportune moment, evaluation of military power), Machiavelli invokes religious and ancient precedents, calling for a new Moses to lead Italy out of bondage: "Everything is now fully disposed for the work . . . if only your House adopts the methods of those I have set forth as examples. Moreover, we have before our eyes extraordinary and unexampled means prepared by God. The sea has been divided. A cloud has guided you on your way. The rock has given forth water. Manna has fallen."

Although The Prince did not succeed in winning Machiavelli the favor of the Medici, or, for that matter, in achieving the unification of Italy, it was hugely influential throughout Europe. The work circulated widely in manuscript before being published in 1532, and the response to it was unmitigated outrage. Whatever truths readers recognized in Machiavelli's little book, it was tempting to accuse him of provoking the amorality (or immorality) that in some cases he simply described. "Machiavellian" became an insult denoting amorality in the service of Realpolitik, and the intricacies of Machiavelli's study of political power were overlooked. A careful reading of The Prince offers a very different impression, however, as the acute realism of the political observer gives way to the humanist dreaming of ancient glories.

FROM THE PRINCE<sup>1</sup>

[New Princedoms Gained with Other Men's Forces and through Fortune]

From CHAPTER 7

* * *

[Cesare Borgia]<sup>2</sup>

Cesare Borgia, called by the people Duke Valentino, gained his position through his father's Fortune and through her lost it, notwithstanding that he made use of every means and action possible to a prudent and vigorous man for putting down his roots in those states that another man's arms and Fortune bestowed on him. As I say above, he who does not lay his foundations beforehand can perhaps through great wisdom and energy lay them afterward, though he does so with trouble for the architect and danger to the building. So on examining all the steps taken by the Duke, we see that he himself laid mighty foundations for future power. To discuss these steps is not superfluous; indeed I for my part do not see what better precepts I can give a new prince than the example of Duke Valentino's actions. If his arrangements did not bring him success, the fault was not his, because his failure resulted from an unusual and utterly malicious stroke of Fortune.<sup>3</sup>

[Pope Alexander VI Attempts to Make Cesare a Prince]

Alexander VI,<sup>4</sup> in his attempt to give high position to the Duke his son, had before him many difficulties, present and future. First, he saw no way in which he could make him lord of any state that was not a state of the Church, yet if the Pope tried to take such a state from the Church, he knew that the Duke of Milan and the Venetians<sup>5</sup> would not allow it because both Faenza and Rimini were already under Venetian protection. He saw, besides, that the weapons of Italy, especially those of which he could make use, were in the hands of men who had reason to fear the Pope's greatness; therefore he could not rely on them, since they were all among the Orsini and the Colonnese<sup>6</sup> and their allies. He therefore was under the necessity of disturbing the situation and embroiling the states of Italy so that he could safely master part of them. This he found easy since, luckily for him, the Venetians, influenced by other reasons, had set out to get the French to come again into Italy. He did not merely oppose their coming; he made it easier by dissolving the early marriage of King Louis.<sup>7</sup> The King then marched into Italy with the Venetians' aid and Alexander's consent; and he was no sooner in Milan than the Pope got soldiers from him for an attempt on Romagna; these the King granted for the sake of his own reputation.<sup>8</sup>

1. Translated by Allan H. Gilbert.

2. Son of Pope Alexander VI and duke of Valentinois and Romagna. His skillful and merciless subjugation of the local lords of Romagna occurred between 1499 and 1502.

3. Ill health.

4. Rodrigo Borgia (ca. 1431–1503), pope (1492–1503), father of Cesare and Lucrezia Borgia.

5. The Venetian Republic opposed the expansion of the papal states. "Duke of Milan": Ludovico Il Moro, the flamboyant duke of the Sforza family.

6. Powerful Roman families.

7. Louis XII, king of France (d. 1515).

8. According to his agreement with Pope Alexander VI.

[Borgia Determines to Depend on Himself]

Having taken Romagna, then, and suppressed the Colonnese, the Duke, in attempting to keep the province and to go further, was hindered by two things: one, his own forces, which he thought disloyal; the other, France's intention. That is, he feared that the Orsini forces which he had been using would fail him and not merely would hinder his gaining but would take from him what he had gained, and that the King would treat him in the same way. With the Orsini, he had experience of this when after the capture of Faenza he attacked Bologna, for he saw that they turned cold over that attack. And as to the King's purpose, the Duke learned it when, after taking the dukedom of Urbino, he invaded Tuscany—an expedition that the King made him abandon. As a result, he determined not to depend further on another man's armies and Fortune.

[The Duke Destroys His Disloyal Generals]

The Duke's first act to that end was to weaken the Orsini and Colonnese parties in Rome by winning over to himself all their adherents who were men of rank, making them his own men of rank and giving them large subsidies; and he honored them, according to their stations, with military and civil offices, so that within a few months their hearts were emptied of all affection for the Roman parties, and it was wholly transferred to the Duke. After this, he waited for a good chance to wipe out the Orsini leaders, having scattered those of the Colonna family; such a chance came to him well and he used it better. When the Orsini found out, though late, that the Duke's and the Church's greatness was their ruin, they held a meeting at Magione, in Perugian territory. From that resulted the rebellion of Urbino, the insurrections in Romagna, and countless dangers for the Duke, all of which he overcame with the aid of the French. Thus having got back his reputation, but not trusting France or other outside forces, in order not to have to put them to a test, he turned to trickery. And he knew so well how to falsify his purpose that the Orsini themselves, by means of Lord Paulo,<sup>9</sup> were reconciled with him (as to Paulo the Duke did not omit any sort of gracious act to assure him, giving him money, clothing and horses) so completely that their folly took them to Sinigaglia into his hands. Having wiped out these leaders, then, and changed their partisans into his friends, the Duke had laid very good foundations for his power, holding all the Romagna along with the dukedom of Urbino, especially since he believed he had made the Romagna his friend and gained the support of all those people, through their getting a taste of well-being.

[Peace in Romagna; Remirro de Orco]

Because this matter is worthy of notice and of being copied by others, I shall not omit it. After the Duke had seized the Romagna and found it controlled by weak lords who had plundered their subjects rather than governed them, and had given them reason for disunion, not for union, so that the whole province was full of thefts, brawls, and every sort of excess, he judged that if he intended to make it peaceful and obedient to the ruler's arm, he must of necessity give it good government. Hence he put in charge there Messer<sup>1</sup> Remirro de Orco, a man cruel and ready, to whom he gave the most complete authority. This man in a short time rendered the province peaceful and united, gaining enormous prestige. Then the Duke decided there was no further need for such boundless power, because he feared it would become a cause for hatred; so he set up a civil court in the midst of the province, with a distinguished presiding judge, where every city had its lawyer. And because he knew that past severities had made some men hate him, he determined to purge such men's minds and win them over entirely by showing that any cruelty which had gone on did not originate with himself but with the harsh nature of his agent. So getting an opportunity for it, one morning at Cesena he had Messer Remirro laid in two pieces in the public square with a block of wood and a bloody sword near him. The ferocity of this spectacle left those people at the same time gratified and awe-struck.

9. Member of the Orsini.

[Princely Virtues]

From CHAPTER 15

On the Things for Which Men, and Especially Princes, Are Praised or Censured

* * * Because I know that many have written on this topic, I fear that when I too write I shall be thought presumptuous, because, in discussing it, I break away completely from the principles laid down by my predecessors. But since it is my purpose to write something useful to an attentive reader, I think it more effective to go back to the practical truth of the subject than to depend on my fancies about it. And many have imagined republics and principalities that never have been seen or known to exist in reality. For there is such a difference between the way men live and the way they ought to live, that anybody who abandons what is for what ought to be will learn something that will ruin rather than preserve him, because anyone who determines to act in all circumstances the part of a good man must come to ruin among so many who are not good. Hence, if a prince wishes to maintain himself, he must learn how to be not good, and to use that ability or not as is required.

Leaving out of account, then, things about an imaginary prince, and considering things that are true, I say that all men, when they are spoken of, and especially princes, because they are set higher, are marked with some of the qualities that bring them either blame or praise. To wit, one man is thought liberal, another stingy (using a Tuscan word, because avaricious in our language is still applied to one who desires to get things through violence, but stingy we apply to him who refrains too much from using his own property); one is thought open-handed, another grasping; one cruel, the other compassionate; one is a breaker of faith, the other reliable; one is effeminate and cowardly, the other vigorous and spirited; one is philanthropic, the other egotistic; one is lascivious, the other chaste; one is straightforward, the other crafty; one hard, the other easy to deal with; one is firm, the other unsettled; one is religious, the other unbelieving; and so on.

1. My lord (from the French monsieur).

And I know that everybody will admit that it would be very praiseworthy for a prince to possess all of the above-mentioned qualities that are considered good. But since he is not able to have them or to observe them completely, because human conditions do not allow him to, it is necessary that he be prudent enough to understand how to avoid getting a bad name because he is given to those vices that will deprive him of his position. He should also, if he can, guard himself from those vices that will not take his place away from him, but if he cannot do it, he can with less anxiety let them go. Moreover, he should not be troubled if he gets a bad name because of vices without which it will be difficult for him to preserve his position. I say this because, if everything is considered, it will be seen that some things seem to be virtuous, but if they are put into practice will be ruinous to him; other things seem to be vices, yet if put into practice will bring the prince security and well-being.

CHAPTER 16

On Liberality and Parsimony

Beginning, then, with the first of the above-mentioned qualities, I assert that it is good to be thought liberal. Yet liberality, practiced in such a way that you get a reputation for it, is damaging to you, for the following reasons: If you use it wisely and as it ought to be used, it will not become known, and you will not escape being censured for the opposite vice. Hence, if you wish to have men call you liberal, it is necessary not to omit any sort of lavishness. A prince who does this will always be obliged to use up all his property in lavish actions; he will then, if he wishes to keep the name of liberal, be forced to lay heavy taxes on his people and exact money from them, and do everything he can to raise money. This will begin to make his subjects hate him, and as he grows poor he will be little esteemed by anybody. So it comes about that because of this liberality of his, with which he has damaged a large number and been of advantage to but a few, he is affected by every petty annoyance and is in peril from every slight danger. If he recognizes this and wishes to draw back, he quickly gets a bad name for stinginess.

Since, then, a prince cannot without harming himself practice this virtue of liberality to such an extent that it will be recognized, he will, if he is prudent, not care about being called stingy. As time goes on he will be thought more and more liberal, for the people will see that because of his economy his income is enough for him, that he can defend himself from those who make war against him, and that he can enter upon undertakings without burdening his people. Such a prince is in the end liberal to all those from whom he takes nothing, and they are numerous; he is stingy to those to whom he does not give, and they are few. In our times we have seen big things done only by those who have been looked on as stingy; the others have utterly failed. Pope Julius II,<sup>2</sup> though he made use of a reputation for liberality to attain the papacy, did not then try to maintain it, because he wished to be able to make war. The present King of France<sup>3</sup> has carried on great wars without laying unusually heavy taxes on his people, merely because his long economy has made provision for heavy expenditures. The present King of Spain,<sup>4</sup> if he had continued liberal, would not have carried on or completed so many undertakings.

2. Pope Julius II (r. 1503–13) was known as the “Warrior Pope” and led efforts to drive French forces from Italy.

Therefore a prince ought to care little about getting called stingy, if as a result he does not have to rob his subjects, is able to defend himself, does not become poor and contemptible, and is not obliged to become grasping. For this vice of stinginess is one of those that enables him to rule. Somebody may say: Caesar, by means of his liberality, became emperor, and many others have come to high positions because they have been liberal and have been thought so. I answer: Either you are already prince, or you are on the way to become one. In the first case liberality is dangerous; in the second it is very necessary to be thought liberal. Caesar was one of those who wished to attain dominion over Rome. But if, when he had attained it, he had lived for a long time and had not moderated his expenses, he would have destroyed his authority. Somebody may answer: Many who have been thought very liberal have been princes and done great things with their armies. I answer: The prince spends either his own property and that of his subjects or that of others. In the first case he ought to be frugal; in the second he ought to abstain from no sort of liberality. When he marches with his army and lives on plunder, loot, and ransom, a prince controls the property of others. To him liberality is essential, for without it his soldiers would not follow him. You can be a free giver of what does not belong to you or your subjects, as were Cyrus, Caesar, and Alexander,<sup>5</sup> because to spend the money of others does not decrease your reputation but adds to it. It is only the spending of your own money that hurts you.

There is nothing that eats itself up as fast as does liberality, for when you practice it you lose the power to practice it, and become poor and contemptible, or else to escape poverty you become rapacious and therefore are hated. And of all the things against which a prince must guard himself, the first is being an object of contempt and hatred. Liberality leads you to both of these. Hence there is more wisdom in keeping a name for stinginess, which produces a bad reputation without hatred, than in striving for the name of liberal, only to be forced to get the name of rapacious, which brings forth both bad reputation and hatred.

From CHAPTER 17

On Cruelty and Pity, and Whether It Is Better to Be Loved or to Be Feared, and Vice Versa

Coming then to the other qualities already mentioned, I say that every prince should wish to be thought compassionate and not cruel; still, he should be careful not to make a bad use of the pity he feels. Cesare Borgia was considered cruel, yet this cruelty of his pacified the Romagna, united it, and changed its

3. Louis XII (r. 1498–1515), mocked for his economy.

4. Ferdinand the Catholic (1452–1516), king of Aragon, whose marriage to Isabel of Castile unified Spain.

5. Great conquerors and imperial leaders of the classical world: Cyrus the Great, founder of the Achaemenid (Persian) Empire; Julius Caesar, Roman general and statesman; and Alexander the Great, king of Macedonia.

condition to that of peace and loyalty. If the matter is well considered, it will be seen that Cesare was much more compassionate than the people of Florence, for in order to escape the name of cruel they allowed Pistoia to be destroyed.<sup>6</sup> Hence a prince ought not to be troubled by the stigma of cruelty, acquired in keeping his subjects united and faithful. By giving a very few examples of cruelty he can be more truly compassionate than those who through too much compassion allow disturbances to continue, from which arise murders or acts of plunder. Lawless acts are injurious to a large group, but the executions ordered by the prince injure a single person. The new prince, above all other princes, cannot possibly avoid the name of cruel, because new states are full of perils. Dido in Virgil puts it thus: "Hard circumstances and the newness of my realm force me to do such things, and to keep watch and ward over all my lands."<sup>7</sup>

All the same, he should be slow in believing and acting, and should make no one afraid of him, his procedure should be so tempered with prudence and humanity that too much confidence does not make him incautious, and too much suspicion does not make him unbearable.

All this gives rise to a question for debate: Is it better to be loved than to be feared, or the reverse? I answer that a prince should wish for both. But because it is difficult to reconcile them, I hold that it is much more secure to be feared than to be loved, if one of them must be given up. The reason for my answer is that one must say of men generally that they are ungrateful, mutable, pretenders and dissemblers, prone to avoid danger, thirsty for gain. So long as you benefit them they are all yours; as I said above, they offer you their blood, their property, their lives, their children, when the need for such things is remote. But when need comes upon you, they turn around. So if a prince has relied wholly on their words, and is lacking in other preparations, he falls. For friendships that are gained with money, and not with greatness and nobility of spirit, are deserved but not possessed and in the nick of time one cannot avail himself of them. Men hesitate less to injure a man who makes himself loved than to injure one who makes himself feared, for their love is held by a chain of obligation, which, because of men's wickedness, is broken on every occasion for the sake of selfish profit; but their fear is secured by a dread of punishment which never fails you.

Nevertheless the prince should make himself feared in such a way that, if he does not win love, he escapes hatred. This is possible, for to be feared and not to be hated can easily coexist. In fact it is always possible, if the ruler abstains from the property of his citizens and subjects, and from their women. And if, as sometimes happens, he finds that he must inflict the penalty of death, he should do it when he has proper justification and evident reason. But above all he must refrain from taking property, for men forget the death of a father more quickly than the loss of their patrimony. Further, causes for taking property are never lacking, and he who begins to live on plunder is always finding cause to seize what belongs to others. But on the contrary, reasons for taking life are rarer and fail sooner.

6. Pistoia was a city under Florentine rule, riven by quarrels among its aristocratic families, which Cesare Borgia attempted to conquer. Machiavelli was Florence's envoy to Pistoia on several occasions in 1501–2, and wrote a memorandum on its problems. Here, he condemns what he considers Florence's insufficiently decisive actions against the leaders of the rival factions in Pistoia.

7. Virgil, Aeneid 1.563–4. Dido, queen of Carthage, is building her city as Aeneas arrives on her shores.

But when a prince is with his army and has a great number of soldiers under his command, then above all he must pay no heed to being called cruel, because if he does not have that name he cannot keep his army united or ready for duty. It should be numbered among the wonderful feats of Hannibal<sup>8</sup> that he led to war in foreign lands a large army, made up of countless types of men, yet never suffered from dissension, either among the soldiers or against the general, in either bad or good fortune. His success resulted from nothing else than his inhuman cruelty, which, when added to his numerous other strong qualities, made him respected and terrible in the sight of his soldiers. Yet without his cruelty his other qualities would not have been adequate. So it seems that those writers have not thought very deeply who on one side admire his accomplishment and on the other condemn the chief cause for it.

* * *

Returning, then, to the debate on being loved and feared, I conclude that since men love as they please and fear as the prince pleases, a wise prince will evidently rely on what is in his own power and not on what is in the power of another. As I have said, he need only take pains to avoid hatred.

CHAPTER 18

In What Way Faith Should Be Kept by Princes

Everybody knows how laudable it is in a prince to keep his faith and to be an honest man and not a trickster. Nevertheless, the experience of our times shows that the princes who have done great things are the ones who have taken little account of their promises and who have known how to addle the brains of men with craft. In the end they have conquered those who have put their reliance on good faith.

You must realize, then, that there are two ways to fight. In one kind the laws are used, in the other, force. The first is suitable to man, the second to animals. But because the first often falls short, one has to turn to the second. Hence a prince must know perfectly how to act like a beast and like a man. This truth was covertly taught to princes by ancient authors, who write that Achilles and many other ancient princes were turned over for their upbringing to Chiron<sup>9</sup> the centaur, that he might keep them under his tuition. To have as teacher one who is half beast and half man means nothing else than that a prince needs to know how to use the qualities of both creatures. The one without the other will not last long.

Since, then, it is necessary for a prince to understand how to make good use of the conduct of the animals, he should select among them the fox and the lion, because the lion cannot protect himself from traps, and the fox cannot protect himself from the wolves. So the prince needs to be a fox that he may know how to deal with traps, and a lion that he may frighten the wolves. Those who act like

8. Carthaginian leader who fought against Rome in the Second Punic War (218–201 B.C.E.). He famously marched his army, including war elephants, across the Alps into Italy.

9. In Greek myth, Chiron was the wisest of the centaurs (half men, half horses). He was renowned as the teacher of gods and heroes, including the great warrior Achilles, the Greek champion in the Trojan War.

the lion alone do not understand their business. A prudent ruler, therefore, cannot and should not observe faith when such observance is to his disadvantage and the causes that made him give his promise have vanished. If men were all good, this advice would not be good, but since men are wicked and do not keep their promises to you, you likewise do not have to keep yours to them. Lawful reasons to excuse his failure to keep them will never be lacking to a prince. It would be possible to give innumerable modern examples of this and to show many treaties and promises that have been made null and void by the faithlessness of princes. And the prince who has best known how to act as a fox has come out best. But one who has this capacity must understand how to keep it covered, and be a skilful pretender and dissembler. Men are so simple and so subject to present needs that he who deceives in this way will always find those who will let themselves be deceived.

I do not wish to keep still about one of the recent instances. Alexander VI<sup>1</sup> did nothing else than deceive men, and had no other intention; yet he always found a subject to work on. There never was a man more effective in swearing that things were true, and the greater the oaths with which he made a promise, the less he observed it. Nonetheless his deceptions always succeeded to his wish, because he thoroughly understood this aspect of the world.

It is not necessary, then, for a prince really to have all the virtues mentioned above, but it is very necessary to seem to have them. I will even venture to say that they damage a prince who possesses them and always observes them, but if he seems to have them they are useful. I mean that he should seem compassionate, trustworthy, humane, honest, and religious, and actually be so; but yet he should have his mind so trained that, when it is necessary not to practice these virtues, he can change to the opposite, and do it skilfully. It is to be understood that a prince, especially a new prince, cannot observe all the things because of which men are considered good, because he is often obliged, if he wishes to maintain his government, to act contrary to faith, contrary to charity, contrary to humanity, contrary to religion. It is therefore necessary that he have a mind capable of turning in whatever direction the winds of Fortune and the variations of affairs require, and, as I said above, that he should not depart from what is morally right, if he can observe it, but should know how to adopt what is bad, when he is obliged to.

A prince, then, should be very careful that there does not issue from his mouth anything that is not full of the above-mentioned five qualities. To those who see and hear him he should seem all compassion, all faith, all honesty, all humanity, all religion. There is nothing more necessary to make a show of possessing than this last quality. For men in general judge more by their eyes than by their hands; everybody is fitted to see, few to understand. Everybody sees what you appear to be; few make out what you really are. And these few do not dare to oppose the opinion of the many, who have the majesty of the state to confirm their view. In the actions of all men, and especially those of princes, where there is no court to which to appeal, people think of the outcome. A prince needs only to conquer and to maintain his position. The means he has used will always be judged honorable and will be praised by everybody, because the crowd is always caught by appearance and by the outcome of events, and the crowd is all there is in the world; there is no place for the few when the many have room enough. A certain prince of the present day,<sup>2</sup> whom it is not good to name, preaches nothing else than peace and faith, and is wholly opposed to both of them, and both of them, if he had observed them, would many times have taken from him either his reputation or his throne.

1. Pope Rodrigo Borgia (r. 1492–1503), father of Cesare Borgia, was widely considered worldly and corrupt.

From CHAPTER 19

On Avoiding Contempt and Hatred

But because I have spoken of the more important of the qualities above, I wish to cover the others briefly with this generality. To wit, the prince should give his attention, as is in part explained above, to avoiding the things that make him hateful and contemptible. As long as he escapes them, he will have done his duty, and will find no danger in other injuries to his reputation. Hatred, as I have said, comes upon him chiefly from being rapacious and seizing the property and women of his subjects. He ought to abstain from both of these, for the majority of men live in contentment when they are not deprived of property or honor. Hence the prince has to struggle only with the ambition of the few which can be restrained in many ways and with ease. Contempt is his portion if he is held to be variable, volatile, effeminate, cowardly, or irresolute. From these a prince should guard himself as from a rock in the sea. He should strive in all his actions to give evident signs of greatness, spirit, gravity, and fortitude. Also in the private affairs of his subjects he should make it understood that his opinion is irrevocable. In short he should keep up such a reputation that nobody thinks of trying to deceive him or outwit him.

The prince who makes people hold that opinion has prestige enough. And if a prince has a high reputation, men hesitate to conspire against him and hesitate to attack him, simply because he is supposed to be of high ability and respected by his subjects. For a prince must needs have two kinds of fear: one within his state, because of his subjects; the other without, because of foreign rulers. From these dangers he defends himself with good weapons and good friends. And if his weapons are good, he will always have good friends. Conditions within the state, too, will always remain settled when those without are settled, if they have not already been unsettled by some conspiracy. And when things without are in movement, if he has ruled and lived as I have said, and does not fail himself, he will surely repel every attack, as I said Nabis the Spartan did.<sup>3</sup>

But with respect to his subjects, when there is no movement without, he has to fear that they will make a secret conspiracy. From this the prince protects himself adequately if he avoids being hated and despised and keeps the people satisfied with him. The latter necessarily follows the former, as was explained above at length. Indeed one of the most potent remedies the prince can have against conspiracies is not to be hated by the majority of his subjects. The reason for this is that a man who conspires always thinks he will please the people by killing the

2. Ferdinand the Catholic, king of Spain.

3. Last ruler (d. 192 B.C.E.) of independent Sparta, a Greek city-state. A controversial figure, he was known for ably maintaining his power in a time of war, but was also reviled in classical sources for his use of mercenaries and abuse of power.

prince; but when he thinks he will offend them by it, he does not pluck up courage to adopt such a plan, because the difficulties that fall to the portion of conspirators are numerous. Experience shows that there have been many conspiracies and that few have come out well. They fail because the conspirator cannot be alone, and he can get companions only from those who, he thinks, are discontented. But as soon as you have revealed your purpose to a malcontent, you have given him an opportunity to become contented, because he evidently can hope to gain every advantage from his knowledge. Such is his position that, seeing on the one hand certain gain, and on the other gain that is uncertain and full of danger, he must needs be a rare friend, or, at any rate, an obstinate enemy of the prince, if he keeps faith with you. To put the thing briefly, I say that on the part of those who conspire there is nothing but fear, jealousy, and the expectation of punishment, which terrifies them. But on the part of the prince are the majesty of his high office, the laws, the power of his friends and his party that protects him. Evidently when the popular goodwill is joined to all these things, it is impossible that anybody can be so foolhardy as to conspire against him. Ordinarily the conspirator must be afraid before the execution of his evil deed, but in this case he also has reason to fear after his transgression, because he will have the people against him and therefore cannot hope for any escape.

* * *

I conclude, therefore, that a prince need not pay much attention to conspiracies when the people are well disposed to him. But when they are unfriendly and hate him, he must fear everything and everybody. Further, well-organized governments and wise princes have striven with all diligence not to make the upper classes feel desperate, and to satisfy the populace and keep them contented. In fact this is one of the most important matters a prince has to deal with.

Among the kingdoms well organized and well governed in our times is France. In this country there are numerous good institutions on which depend the liberty and security of the king. The first of these is the parliament and its authority. He who organized this kingdom set up the parliament because he knew the ambition of the nobles and their arrogance, and judged it necessary that the nobility should have a bit in its mouth to restrain it. On the other hand, he knew the hatred, founded on fear, of the generality of men for the nobles, and intended to secure the position of the latter. Yet he did not wish this to be the special concern of the king, because he wished to relieve the king from the hatred he would arouse among the great if he favored the people, and among the people if he favored the nobles. Therefore he set up a third party as judge, to be the one who, without bringing hatred on the king, should restrain the nobles and favor the people. This institution could not be better or more prudent, nor could there be a stronger cause for the security of the king and the realm. From this can be deduced another important idea: to wit, princes should have things that will bring them hatred done by their agents, but should do in person those that will give pleasure. Once more I conclude that a prince should esteem the nobles but should not make himself hated by the populace.

* * *

It should here be observed that hate is gained through good deeds as well as bad ones. Therefore, as I said above, if a prince wishes to keep his position, he is often obliged not to be good. For if that large body, whether made up of people or soldiers or grantees, whose support you believe you need to maintain yourself, is corrupt, you must feed its humor in order to satisfy it. In such conditions, good deeds are enemies to you. But let us come to Alexander. He was of such goodness that among the other matters for which he is praised is this, that, in the fourteen years during which he held the empire, no one was ever put to death by him without trial. All the same, since he was thought to be under the influence of women, and a man who allowed his mother to govern him, he came to be despised. Then the army plotted against him and killed him.

* * *

I say that the princes of our times are less troubled than the emperors were by the necessity of making their conduct satisfy the soldiers above all others. It is true that they do have to give their troops some consideration, yet it is quickly settled, because none of these princes have armies already formed that have grown old along with the governments and administrations of the provinces, as did the armies of the Roman Empire. If, therefore, it was then necessary to satisfy the soldiers rather than the people, it was because the soldiers were more powerful than the people. Now it is more necessary to princes, except the Turk and the Soldan,<sup>4</sup> to satisfy the people rather than the soldiers, for the people are the more powerful. I make an exception of the Turk, who always keeps about him twelve thousand infantry and fifteen thousand cavalry, on whom depend his security and the strength of his kingdom. So it is necessary that, giving second place to any other consideration, that lord should keep the friendship of his soldiers. Since the kingly authority of the Soldan is likewise entirely in the hands of the soldiers, it is needful for him to have them as his friends, without regard for the people. You should observe that this government of the Soldan is unlike all other principalities; it is like the Christian papacy, which can be called neither a hereditary principality nor a new one. The sons of the old prince are not heirs and do not carry on a line of princes, but the successor is he who is chosen to that rank by those who have the right to do so. And yet, since this method of government has long been used, it cannot be called a new principality, because it encounters none of the difficulties of new ones. Even if the ruler is new, the institutions of the state are old and arranged to receive him as though he were their hereditary lord.

[The Best Defense]

From CHAPTER 20

Whether Fortresses and Other Things That Princes Employ Every Day Are Useful or Useless

Some princes, in order to hold their positions securely, have disarmed their subjects. Others have kept their subject territories divided. Some have nourished enmities against themselves. Yet others, by a change in policy, have tried to gain to their side those they suspected at the beginnings of their reigns. Some have built fortresses. Some have dismantled and destroyed them. From all these things it is not possible to educe a final decision, without coming to the particulars of those states where matters like these must be decided. Hence I shall speak in the general manner that the material in itself justifies.

4. "Turk": ruler of the Ottoman Empire, supported by a corps of Janissaries (elite infantry troops); Soldan: sultan of Egypt, supported by a corps of Mamluks (slave soldiers).

It has never been true, then, that a new prince has disarmed his subjects. On the contrary, when he has found them disarmed, he has always armed them, because, when you arm them, their arms become your own; those whom you have suspected become faithful; those who were faithful are kept so, and instead of your subjects they become your partisans. It is impossible to arm all your subjects, yet if you benefit those you arm, you can deal much more securely with those who are left unarmed. The very diversity of procedure which the favored ones see applied to them, binds them to you. The others excuse you, holding it necessary that those should have more favor who undergo the most danger and have the greatest obligation. But when you disarm new subjects you get their ill will; for you show that you distrust them either for their worthlessness or their lack of fidelity. Either one of these beliefs rouses hatred against you. And because you are not able to remain unarmed, you are obliged to turn to mercenary soldiers * * *. Even if mercenaries were good, they could not be sufficient to defend you from hostile rulers and untrustworthy subjects. Hence, as I have said, a new prince, in a new principate, has always organized armies there. Histories are full of examples of this.

But when a prince acquires a new state that he joins as a member to his old one, then it is necessary to disarm the new state, except for those who have been your partisans in gaining it. And even these it is necessary to render soft and effeminate as time and opportunity permit; and you must arrange things in such a way that the arms of your whole state are in the hands of your own soldiers, who live in your old state close to you.

* * *

There is no doubt that princes become great when they overcome difficulties and opposition. Therefore Fortune avails herself of this, especially when she wishes to bestow greatness on a new prince, who has more need to acquire reputation than a hereditary one. For she causes enemies to rise up against him, and makes him undertake campaigns against them, that he may have an opportunity to conquer them, and rise high by ascending the ladder provided by his enemies. Hence many think that a wise prince, whenever he has opportunity for it, should craftily nourish some hatreds against himself, in order that by overthrowing them he may increase his greatness.

Princes, and especially new ones, sometimes find more fidelity and helpfulness in those whom they have distrusted at the beginning of their rule, than in those who at first were attached to them. Pandolfo Petrucci,<sup>5</sup> prince of Siena, ruled his state more with those he distrusted than with the others. But of this thing it is not possible to speak in general because it varies according to the individual case. I shall say only this. Those men who are unfriendly in the early days of a reign, and are of such a kind that they have need of support if they are to maintain themselves, are always to be gained by the prince with the greatest ease, and they are obliged to serve him faithfully, in proportion as they know it is needful for them to cancel with their deeds the unfavorable opinion he had of them. Hence the prince always derives more profit from them than from those who feel too secure in his service, and as a result neglect his affairs.

5. Ruler of the Italian Republic of Siena (1452–1512).

And because the subject demands it, I do not wish to omit a reminder to princes who have secured a brand-new state by means of the favor of persons within it. They should consider well what cause moved those who favored the change to do so. If it is not natural affection for the new ruler, but merely discontent with the government as it was, a prince will succeed in keeping them as his friends only with effort and great difficulty, because it is impossible for him to satisfy them. And if he will examine the cause of this, with the aid of examples derived from ancient and modern affairs, he will see that it is much easier to gain the friendship of the men who had been contented with the earlier government, and therefore were his enemies, than to gain that of those who became his friends and favored his occupation merely because they were not contented.

In order to hold their positions more securely, princes have been in the habit of building fortresses, which serve as bridle and bit for those who plan to act against them; princes also wish to have secure places of refuge from sudden assaults. I praise this method, because it has been used from ancient times. Nonetheless, Messer Niccolò Vitelli,<sup>6</sup> in our times, has been seen dismantling two fortresses in Città di Castello, in order to keep that state. Guido Ubaldino,<sup>7</sup> duke of Urbino, when he returned into his dominions after Cesare Borgia had been driven out of them, completely ruined all the fortresses of that province, and believed that without them it would be more difficult for him to lose that territory again. The Bentivogli,<sup>8</sup> when they returned to Bologna, employed similar methods.

Fortresses, then, are useful or not according to the times. If they benefit you in some circumstances, they will damage you in others. This matter can be considered as follows: a prince who has more fear of the people than of foreigners ought to build fortresses; but he who has more fear of foreigners than of his people should leave them out of his plans. The castle of Milan, which Francesco Sforza<sup>9</sup> built there, has done and will do more damage to the house of Sforza than any other cause of trouble in that state. Therefore not to be hated by the people is the best fortress there is. Even if you have fortresses, and the people hate you, you will not be safe, because, when the people have taken arms, foreigners who will assist them are never lacking. * * * Considering all these things, then, I praise him who builds fortresses and him who does not build them. I blame any prince who, trusting in his castles, thinks it of little importance that his people hate him.

6. Military ruler of the Italian city-state of Città di Castello (1414–1486).

7. Ruler of the Italian city-state of Urbino (1472–1508).

8. Ruling family of the Italian city-state of Bologna during the Renaissance.

9. Duke of Milan (1401–1466), founder of the Sforza dynasty that ruled the city-state of Milan from 1450–1535.

[Ferdinand of Spain, Exemplary Prince]

CHAPTER 21

What Is Necessary to a Prince That He May Be Considered Excellent

Nothing gives a prince so much respect as great undertakings and unusual examples of his own ability. In our day we have Ferdinand of Spain. He can be called, as it were, a new king, because, though at the beginning he was weak, he has become the first king of the Christians in fame and glory. If you will consider his actions, you will find them all great and some of them extraordinary. In the beginning of his reign he attacked Granada,<sup>1</sup> and that undertaking was the foundation of his power. In the first place, he carried it on when he was without other occupation and had no fear of being impeded; he used it to occupy the minds of the barons of Castile, who, when they were thinking about that war, did not think of rebelling. By this means he gained reputation and control over them without their realizing it. He was able to support armies with the money of the Church and the people, and, by means of that long war, to lay a foundation for his army, which later did him honor. Besides this, in order to undertake greater enterprises, he availed himself of religion and turned to a pious cruelty, hunting down the Moors and driving them out of his kingdom. Nothing can be more wretched or more unusual than this example of his ability. Cloaked with this same mantle, he attacked Africa; he undertook his enterprise in Italy; and finally he assailed France. And so he has always kept the minds of his subjects in suspense and wonder, and concerned with the outcome of his deeds. And his actions have begun in such a way, one coming from another, that between any two of them, he has never given men time enough to enable them to work quietly against him.

It is also to the profit of a prince to give unusual examples of his ability in internal affairs, like those that are related of Messer Bernabò of Milan.<sup>2</sup> I mean when he has an opportunity because someone does something extraordinary, either good or bad, in ordinary life, and the prince takes a method of rewarding or punishing him that will be widely talked of. And above all, a prince should endeavor in all his actions to show that he deserves fame as a great man and one of high mental capacity.

A prince is also esteemed when he is a true friend or a true enemy; that is, when without any reservation he shows himself favorable to one ruler and against another. This procedure is always more profitable than to remain neutral, because if two potentates, your neighbors, come to grips, they are such that when one of them conquers, you either will have to be afraid of the conqueror, or you will not. In either of these two cases, it will be better for you to make your policy plain and put up a good fight. In the first of them, if you do not adopt an open policy, you will always be the prey of the conqueror, to the pleasure and satisfaction of him who is conquered. You can give no reason why anybody should protect you and receive you, and will find

1. City in southern Spain that was the seat of Nasrid rule in Spain for centuries before it was conquered by Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain in 1492.

2. Bernabò Visconti, ruler of Milan from 1354 to 1385.

nobody to do it. The one who conquers does not wish friends whom he suspects and who will not aid him in adversity, and the loser will not receive you because you have not been willing to share his fortunes with arms in your hands.

When Antiochus<sup>3</sup> led his army into Greece, summoned there by the Aetolians to drive out the Romans, he sent ambassadors to the Achaeans, who were friends of the Romans, to advise them to remain neutral. On the other side, the Romans tried to persuade them to take arms with them. This matter came up for decision in the council of the Achaeans, where the agent of Antiochus advised them to remain neutral. The Roman legate answered: “As to what the others say about not getting yourselves into the war, nothing is less advantageous to you; without thanks, without dignity, you will be the reward of the victor.”

It will always come about that he who is not your friend will ask you to be neutral, and he who is friendly to you will ask you to come out clearly with arms. Princes of irresolute character, in order to escape the perils of the moment, generally take the way of neutrality, and generally go to smash. But when a prince comes out vigorously in favor of one side, if the one you have joined wins, even though he is powerful and you are at his discretion, he is under obligation to you, and has formed a friendship for you. Moreover, men are never so dishonorable that they will give so great an example of ingratitude as to oppress you. And then victories are never so decided that the victor is not subject to qualifications, and especially with regard to justice. But if the one to whom you adhere loses, you are received by him, he aids you as long as he can, and you are the companion of a fortune that may rise again.

In the second case, when those who fight are of such a sort that you do not need to fear whichever one conquers, it is so much the more prudent for you to join your friend, because you go to the ruin of one neighbor with the aid of another who, if he were wise, would protect him. If your ally is victorious he is at your discretion, and it is impossible that with your aid he will not win.

Here it may be observed that a prince should be careful not to join company with one more powerful than himself, in order to attack someone, except when necessity constrains him, in the way mentioned above. If your powerful ally conquers, you remain his prisoner. And princes should avoid, as much as they can, being at the discretion of others. The Venetians joined the King of France against the Duke of Milan, when they were able to avoid making that alliance, and it resulted in their ruin. But when such an alliance cannot be avoided (as happened to the Florentines when the Pope and the King of Spain went with their armies to attack Lombardy), then a prince should join in for the reasons I have given. No state should believe it can always make plans certain of success; it should rather expect to make only doubtful ones. For the course of human events teaches that man never attempts to avoid one disadvantage without running into another. Prudence, therefore, consists in the power to recognize the nature of disadvantages and to take the less disagreeable as good.

A prince should also show himself a lover of excellence by giving preferment to gifted men and honoring those who excel in some art. Besides, he should encourage his citizens by giving them a chance to exercise their functions quietly, in trade and agriculture and every other occupation of man. A citizen should not hesitate to increase his property for fear it will be taken away from him, or to open a new business for fear of taxes. On the contrary the prince should offer rewards to those who undertake to do these things, and to anybody who thinks of improving in any way his city or his dominion. Besides this, at suitable times of the year he should engage the attention of the people with festivals and shows. And because every city is divided into gilds or wards, he should take account of these bodies, meet with them sometimes, and give in person an example of humanity and generosity. At the same time he should always preserve the dignity befitting his rank, for this ought never to be lacking in any circumstances.

3. Antiochus III “the Great” (ca. 241–187 B.C.E.), ruler of the Seleucid Empire in Asia Minor.

[Good Counsel vs. Flattery]

From CHAPTER 23

In What Way Flatterers Are to Be Avoided

I do not wish to omit an important subject and an error from which princes with difficulty protect themselves, if they are not unusually prudent, or if they are not able to choose well. I refer to flatterers, of whom courts are full. Men are generally so well pleased with their own abilities and so greatly deceived about them that they protect themselves with difficulty from this plague, and when they do endeavor to protect themselves, they run the risk of becoming contemptible, for the reason that there is no way of protecting yourself from flattery except to have men understand that they do not offend you by speaking the truth to you; but when anyone can speak the truth to you, you do not receive proper respect. Hence a prudent prince must adopt a third method. He should choose wise men in his state, and to them alone he should give full power to speak the truth freely, but only on the matters he asks about, and on nothing else. Yet he should ask them about everything, and heed their opinions. Then he should make up his mind in private, at his leisure. With these pieces of advice, and with every one of them, he should conduct himself in such a way that each adviser may know that he will be so much the more in favor in proportion as he speaks more freely. But the prince should not consent to listen to anyone except these advisers, should carry out what he decides on, and should be firm in his decisions. He who does otherwise is either ruined by flatterers, or changes often, because of the varied opinions he listens to. As a result, he receives little respect.

* * *

A prince, therefore, should always take advice, but he should do it when he pleases and not when someone else pleases. On the contrary he should not let anyone dare to advise him when he does not ask for advice. But he should be a big asker, and a patient listener to the truth about the things asked. Still further, he should be angry if for any reason anybody should not tell him the truth. Many think that if a prince gives the impression of being prudent, he should be thought so not because of his own natural gifts but because of the good advice he has at hand; but without question they are wrong. For this is a general rule that never fails: a prince who is not wise himself cannot be well advised, unless by chance he gives himself over to one man who entirely directs him, and that man is exceedingly prudent. In this instance the prince surely would be, but such a condition would not last long, because in a short time that tutor of his would take away his throne. As a matter of fact, an unwise prince who asks counsel from more than one man will never receive unified advice, nor will he be able to unify it unaided. Each of the advisers will think about what concerns himself, and the prince will not be able to control them or to understand them. It cannot be otherwise; men are always wicked at bottom, unless they are made good by some compulsion. Hence I conclude that good counsels, whatever their source, necessarily result from the prudence of the ruler, and not the prudence of the ruler from good counsels.

[Why Princes Fail]

CHAPTER 24

Why the Princes of Italy Have Lost Their Authority

The things written above, if they are prudently carried into effect, will make a new prince seem to be an old one, and will immediately make him safer and firmer in his realm than if he had grown old in it. For the actions of a new prince are more closely watched than those of a hereditary one; and when they are seen to show great ability they influence men more and attach them to the prince more closely than ancient blood can, for men are much more impressed with present things than with past ones, and when in the present they find something good, they enjoy it and seek for nothing further. In fact, they will take every means of defending such a prince, if only he does not fail himself in other things. And thus he will secure a double glory: that of having begun a new principedom, and of having enriched and strengthened it with good laws, good arms, and good examples. On the contrary, he is doubly disgraced who, though born a prince, loses his dominion because he is not prudent.

And if those lords are examined who have lost their positions in Italy in our times, such as the King of Naples, the Duke of Milan, and others, they will exhibit first a common defect in their armies, for the reasons that have been discussed at length above. Further, it will be seen that some of them either had the people as enemies, or they had the friendship of the people, but had not been able to secure themselves against the upper classes. For realms without these defects are not lost if the prince has strength enough to keep an army in the field. Philip of Macedon,<sup>4</sup> not the father of Alexander but the one who was conquered by Titus Quintus, did not have a large realm, in comparison with the greatness of the Romans and the Greeks who attacked him. Nevertheless, because he was a warrior, and knew how to deal with his people and to secure himself against the upper classes, he kept up the war for several years. Even though at the end he lost control of some cities, he nevertheless retained his royal authority.

4. Philip V (238–179 B.C.E.), king of Macedonia, defeated in 197 B.C.E. by a Roman army led by Titus Quintus Flaminius.

Therefore these princes of ours who have been many years in their positions should blame for the loss of them not Fortune, but their own worthlessness. In good weather they never thought of change (it is a common defect of men not to reckon on a storm when the sea is calm). Hence when times of adversity came, they thought about running away and not about defending themselves; and they hoped that the people, disgusted by the insolence of the conquerors, would call them back. This plan, when there are no others, is good, but it is a bad thing to abandon other resources for this one. A prince should not be willing to fall, just because he believes he will find somebody to set him up again; that may not come about, or if it does, it cannot bring you security, because such an expedient for defence is base and does not depend on yourself. Only those means of security are good, are certain, are lasting, that depend on yourself and your own vigor.

["Fortune is a woman"]

From CHAPTER 25

The Power of Fortune in Human Affairs, and to What Extent She Should Be Relied On

It is not unknown to me that many have been and still are of the opinion that the affairs of this world are so under the direction of Fortune and of God that man's prudence cannot control them; in fact, that man has no resource against them. For this reason many think there is no use in sweating much over such matters, but that one might as well let Chance take control. This opinion has been the more accepted in our times, because of the great changes in the state of the world that have been and now are seen every day, beyond all human surmise. And I myself, when thinking on these things, have now and then in some measure inclined to their view. Nevertheless, because the freedom of the will should not be wholly annulled, I think it may be true that Fortune is arbiter of half of our actions, but that she still leaves the control of the other half, or about that, to us.

I liken her to one of those raging streams that, when they go mad, flood the plains, ruin the trees and the buildings, and take away the fields from one bank and put them down on the other. Everybody flees before them; everybody yields to their onrush without being able to resist anywhere. And though this is their nature, it does not cease to be true that, in calm weather, men can make some provisions against them with walls and dykes, so that, when the streams swell, their waters will go off through a canal, or their currents will not be so wild and do so much damage. The same is true of Fortune. She shows her power where there is no wise preparation for resisting her, and turns her fury where she knows that no walls and dykes have been made to hold her in. And if you consider Italy—the place where these variations occur and the cause that has set them in motion—you will see that she is a country without dykes and without any wall of defence. If, like Germany, Spain, and France, she had had a sufficient bulwark of military vigor, this flood would not have made the great changes it has, or would not have come at all.

And this, I think, is all I need to say on opposing oneself to Fortune, in general. But limiting myself more to particulars, I say that a prince may be seen prospering today and falling in ruin tomorrow, though it does not appear that he has changed in his nature or any of his qualities. I believe this comes, in the first place, from the causes that have been discussed at length in preceding chapters. That is, if a prince bases himself entirely on Fortune, he will fall when she varies. I also believe that a ruler will be successful who adapts his mode of procedure to the quality of the times, and likewise that he will be unsuccessful if the times are out of accord with his procedure. Because it may be seen that in things leading to the end each has before him, namely glory and riches, men proceed differently. One acts with caution, another rashly; one with violence, another with skill; one with patience, another with its opposite; yet with these different methods each one attains his end. Still further, two cautious men will be seen, of whom one comes to his goal, the other does not. Likewise you will see two who succeed with two different methods, one of them being cautious and the other rash. These results are caused by nothing else than the nature of the times, which is or is not in harmony with the procedure of men. It also accounts for what I have mentioned, namely, that two persons, working differently, chance to arrive at the same result; and that of two who work in the same way, one attains his end, but the other does not.

On the nature of the times also depends the variability of the best method. If a man conducts himself with caution and patience, times and affairs may come around in such a way that his procedure is good, and he goes on successfully. But if times and circumstances change, he is ruined, because he does not change his method of action. There is no man so prudent as to understand how to fit himself to this condition, either because he is unable to deviate from the course to which nature inclines him, or because, having always prospered by walking in one path, he cannot persuade himself to leave it. So the cautious man, when the time comes to go at a reckless pace, does not know how to do it. Hence he comes to ruin. Yet if he could change his nature with the times and with circumstances, his fortune would not be altered.

Pope Julius II proceeded rashly in all his actions, and found the times and circumstances so harmonious with his mode of procedure that he was always so lucky as to succeed. Consider the first enterprise he engaged in, that of Bologna, while Messer Giovanni Bentivogli<sup>5</sup> was still alive. The Venetians were not pleased with it; the King of Spain felt the same way; the Pope was debating such an enterprise with the King of France. Nevertheless, in his courage and rashness Julius personally undertook that expedition. This movement made the King of Spain and the Venetians stand irresolute and motionless, the latter for fear, and the King because of his wish to recover the entire kingdom of Naples. On the other side, the King of France was dragged behind Julius, because the King, seeing that the Pope had moved and wishing to make him a friend in order to put down the Venetians, judged he could not refuse him soldiers without doing him open injury. Julius, then, with his rash movement, attained what no other pontiff, with the utmost human prudence, would have attained. If he had waited to leave Rome until the agreements were fixed and everything arranged, as any other pontiff would have done, he would never have succeeded, for the King of France would have had a thousand excuses, and the others would have raised a thousand fears. I wish to omit his other acts, which are all of the same sort, and all succeeded perfectly. The brevity of his life did not allow him to know anything different. Yet if times had come in which it was necessary to act with caution, they would have ruined him, for he would never have deviated from the methods to which nature inclined him.

5. Of the ruling family Bentivogli. The pope undertook to dislodge him from Bologna in 1506.

I conclude, then, that since Fortune is variable and men are set in their ways, they are successful when they are in harmony with Fortune and unsuccessful when they disagree with her. Yet I am of the opinion that it is better to be rash than over-cautious, because Fortune is a woman and, if you wish to keep her down, you must beat her and pound her. It is evident that she allows herself to be overcome by men who treat her in that way rather than by those who proceed coldly. For that reason, like a woman, she is always the friend of young men, because they are less cautious, and more courageous, and command her with more boldness.

[The Roman Dream]

From CHAPTER 26

An Exhortation to Take Hold of Italy and Restore Her to Liberty from the Barbarians

Having considered all the things discussed above, I have been turning over in my own mind whether at present in Italy the time is ripe for a new prince to win prestige, and whether conditions there give a wise and vigorous ruler occasion to introduce methods that will do him honor, and bring good to the mass of the people of the land. It appears to me that so many things unite for the advantage of a new prince, that I do not know of any time that has ever been more suited for this. And, as I said, if it was necessary to make clear the ability of Moses that the people of Israel should be enslaved in Egypt, and to reveal Cyrus's greatness of mind that the Persians should be oppressed by the Medes, and to demonstrate the excellence of Theseus that the Athenians should be scattered, so at the present time, in order to make known the greatness of an Italian soul, Italy had to be brought down to her present position, to be more a slave than the Hebrews, more a servant than the Persians, more scattered than the Athenians; without head, without government; defeated, plundered, torn asunder, overrun; subject to every sort of disaster.

And though before this, certain persons<sup>6</sup> have showed signs from which it could be inferred that they were chosen by God for the redemption of Italy, nevertheless it has afterwards been seen that in the full current of action they have been cast off by Fortune. So Italy remains without life and awaits the man, whoever he may be, who is to heal her wounds, put an end to the plundering of Lombardy and the tribute laid on Tuscany and the kingdom of

6. Possibly Cesare Borgia and Francesco Sforza, who were discussed earlier in the book.

Naples, and cure her of those sores that have long been suppurating. She may be seen praying God to send some one to redeem her from these cruel and barbarous insults. She is evidently ready and willing to follow a banner, if only some one will raise it. Nor is there at present anyone to be seen in whom she can put more hope than in your illustrious House, because its fortune and vigor, and the favor of God and of the Church, which it now governs,<sup>7</sup> enable it to be the leader in such a redemption. This will not be very difficult, as you will see if you will bring to mind the actions and lives of those I have named above. And though these men were striking exceptions, yet they were men, and each of them had less opportunity than the present gives; their enterprises were not more just than this, nor easier, nor was God their friend more than he is yours. Here justice is complete. "A way is just to those to whom it is necessary, and arms are holy to him who has no hope save in arms."<sup>8</sup> Everything is now fully disposed for the work, and when that is true an undertaking cannot be difficult, if only your House adopts the methods of those I have set forth as examples. Moreover, we have before our eyes extraordinary and unexampled means prepared by God. The sea has been divided. A cloud has guided you on your way. The rock has given forth water. Manna has fallen.<sup>9</sup> Everything has united to make you great. The rest is for you to do. God does not intend to do everything, lest he deprive us of our free will and the share of glory that belongs to us.

It is no wonder if no one of the above-named Italians<sup>1</sup> has been able to do what we hope your illustrious House can. Nor is it strange if in the many revolutions and military enterprises of Italy, the martial vigor of the land always appears to be exhausted. This is because the old military customs were not good, and there has been nobody able to find new ones. Yet nothing brings so much honor to a man who rises to new power, as the new laws and new methods he discovers. These things, when they are well founded and have greatness in them, make him revered and worthy of admiration. And in Italy matter is not lacking on which to impress forms of every sort. There is great vigor in the limbs if only it is not lacking in the heads. You may see that in duels and combats between small numbers, the Italians have been much superior in force, skill, and intelligence. But when it is a matter of armies, Italians cannot be compared with foreigners. All this comes from the weakness of the heads, because those who know are not obeyed, and each man thinks he knows. Nor up to this time has there been a man able to raise himself so high, through both ability and fortune, that the others would yield to him. The result is that for the past twenty years, in all the wars that have been fought when there has been an army entirely Italian, it has always made a bad showing. Proof of this was given first at the Taro, and then at Alessandria, Capua, Genoa, Vailà, Bologna, and Mestri.<sup>2</sup>

If your illustrious House, then, wishes to imitate those excellent men who redeemed their countries, it is necessary, before everything else, to furnish

7. Pope Leo X (1475–1521) was a Medici (Giovanni de' Medici). "House": of Medici. The Prince was first meant for Giuliano de' Medici. After Giuliano's death it was dedicated to his nephew Lorenzo, later duke of Urbino.

8. Livy's History 9.1, para. 10.

9. Another allusion to Moses.

1. Perhaps another reference to Borgia and Sforza.

2. Sites of battles occurring between the end of the 15th century and 1513.

yourself with your own army, as the true foundation of every enterprise. You cannot have more faithful, nor truer, nor better soldiers. And though every individual of these may be good, they become better as a body when they see that they are commanded by their prince, and honored and trusted by him. It is necessary, therefore, that your House should be prepared with such forces, in order that it may be able to defend itself against the foreigners with Italian courage.

And though the Swiss and the Spanish infantry are properly estimated as terribly effective, yet both have defects. Hence a third type would be able not merely to oppose them but to feel sure of overcoming them. The fact is that the Spaniards are not able to resist cavalry, and the Swiss have reason to fear infantry, when they meet any as determined in battle as themselves. For this reason it has been seen and will be seen in experience that the Spaniards are unable to resist the French cavalry, and the Swiss are overthrown by Spanish infantry. And though of this last a clear instance has not been observed, yet an approach to it appeared in the battle of Ravenna,<sup>3</sup> when the Spanish infantry met the German battalions, who use the same methods as the Swiss. There the Spanish, through their ability and the assistance given by their shields, got within the points of the spears from below, and slew their enemies in security, while the Germans could find no means of resistance. If the cavalry had not charged the Spanish, they would have annihilated the Germans. It is possible, then, for one who realizes the defects of these two types, to equip infantry in a new manner, so that it can resist cavalry and not be afraid of foot-soldiers; but to gain this end they must have weapons of the right sorts, and adopt varied methods of combat. These are some of the things which, when they are put into service as novelties, give reputation and greatness to a new ruler.<sup>4</sup>

This opportunity, then, should not be allowed to pass, in order that after so long a time Italy may see her redeemer. I am unable to express with what love he would be received in all the provinces that have suffered from these foreign deluges; with what thirst for vengeance, what firm faith, what piety, what tears! What gates would be shut against him? what peoples would deny him obedience? what envy would oppose itself to him? what Italian would refuse to follow him? This barbarian rule stinks in every nostril. May your illustrious House, then, undertake this charge with the spirit and the hope with which all just enterprises are taken up, in order that, beneath its ensign, our native land may be ennobled, and, under its auspices, that saying of Petrarch may come true: "Manhood<sup>5</sup> will take arms against fury, and the combat will be short, because in Italian hearts the ancient valor is not yet dead."

3. Between Spain and France in April 1512.

4. Machiavelli was subsequently the author of the treatise Art of War (1521).

5. An etymological translation of the original virtù (from the Latin vir, "man"). The quotation is from the canzona "My Italy."

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed
because of permissions issues.

Marguerite de Navarre, From the Heptameron is not displayed because of permissions issues.

MICHEL DE MONTAIGNE

1533–1592

The probing, skeptical essays of Michel Eyquem de Montaigne show a Renaissance mind exploring its own workings. The first writer to ask “Who am I?” and pursue the question with extraordinary honesty and rigor, Montaigne at times appears surprisingly modern in his outlook. He pays unflinching attention to the embarrassing realities of his own body and mind, even as he considers the most abstract questions. His radical break with traditional forms of writing and thinking is particularly striking in that Montaigne was an avid student of the classical even as he also paved the way for the modern form of the essay.

LIFE AND TIMES

Montaigne was born on February 28, 1533, in the castle of Montaigne, to a Catholic father and a Protestant mother of Spanish-Jewish descent. His father, Pierre Eyquem, was for two terms mayor of Bordeaux and had fought in Italy under Francis I. Though no man of learning, Pierre had unconventional ideas of upbringing: Michel was awakened in the morning by the sound of music and was taught Latin as his mother tongue. At six Michel went to the famous Collège de Guienne at Bordeaux; later he studied law; and in 1557 he became a member of the Bordeaux parliament. In 1565 he married Françoise de la Chassaigne, daughter of a man who, as one of Montaigne’s colleagues in the Bordeaux parliament, was a member of the new legal nobility.

Perhaps because of disappointed political ambitions, Montaigne retired from politics in 1570 at the age of thirty-eight: he sold his post as magistrate and retreated to his castle of Montaigne, which he had inherited two years earlier. There he devoted himself to meditation and writing. Although Montaigne spent, as he put it, “most of his days, and most hours of the day” in his library on the third floor of a round tower, the demands of his health and France's tumultuous politics often drew him out of retirement. For the sake of his health (he suffered from gallstones), in 1580 he took a journey through Switzerland, Germany, and Italy. While in Italy he received news that he had been appointed mayor of Bordeaux, an office that he held for two terms (1581–85).

ESSAYS

His greatest political distractions, however, concerned the Catholic and Protestant factions that violently divided the court and France itself. French politics profoundly influenced the attitudes toward warfare, political resistance, and mercy expressed in Montaigne's Essays. When Henry II died in a jousting accident in 1559 and left the fifteen-year-old Francis II to succeed him, the Huguenots (French Reformers in the tradition of John Calvin), recognized the opportunity to influence the weakened royal government. Catherine de Médicis, the queen mother, seized power when Francis II died in 1560 (his successor, Charles IX, was only ten years old). Her policy of limited religious toleration satisfied neither the Catholic nor the Huguenot factions, and from 1562 to 1598 France repeatedly fell into civil war. In the infamous St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre of August 24, 1572, noblemen, municipal authorities, and the Parisian mobs indiscriminately slaughtered the Protestants in Paris. The slaughter was imitated in other French cities, and the civil wars once again broke out.

Throughout his country's political struggles, Montaigne sympathized with the unfanatical Henry of Navarre, leader of the Protestants, but his attitude was neutral and conservative. He expressed his joy when Henry of Navarre became King Henry IV and turned Catholic to do so: "Paris," Henry memorably observed, "is well worth a Mass." Montaigne, who died on September 13, 1592, did not live to see Henry's triumphal entrance into Paris.

Montaigne's Essays, which began as a collection of interesting quotations, observations, and recordings of remarkable events, slowly developed into its final form of three large books. The essays are at once highly personal and outward looking; they present a curious mind investigating history, the complex and changing sociopolitical world, and the mind's own slightly mysterious workings. To essay—from the French essayer, meaning to attempt or try out—is Montaigne's characteristic intellectual operation, as he carefully examines his topics from a variety of possible angles. The literary result of that operation is the essay, the common noun that, in the wake of Montaigne, describes a short piece of highly personal and exploratory writing.

Though fascinated by the complexities of self-understanding, Montaigne explores far more than his own circumstances or thoughts. "I am a man," he says, quoting the Roman playwright Terence, and "I consider nothing human to be alien to me." As an ethnographer and historian, Montaigne studies geographically and historically distant cultures, insisting that cultural norms are relative and should be free from judgment by sixteenth-century European standards. As a psychologist, he is drawn to the stranger thoughts and experiences of himself and his countrymen. His method is not didactic or moralizing, and his criticism, which he reserves for fellow Europeans, emerges largely through subtle ironies that he leaves readers to detect.

When Montaigne looks inward, he does not aggrandize or justify himself but tries to understand how the mind works. Far from prizing his capacity for reason and judgment, for example, he neutrally observes, "My judgment floats, it wanders." Montaigne is, in fact, disarmingly modest: "Reader, I am myself the subject of my book; it is not reasonable to expect you to waste your leisure on a matter so frivolous and empty.” Although massively learned, he emphasizes not what he knows but rather, like his revered model, Plato’s Socrates, the ways that knowledge reveals how little he truly knows.

Although he refuses certainty and mocks vanity, Montaigne’s stance is skeptical, not cynical. Thus when he “essays” or probes the human capacity to act purposefully and coherently, he does not aim to prove that action is futile. Instead, he resists granting the mind a coherence it does not possess; to Montaigne, the Stoic ideal of the “constant man,” unmoved by emotion or circumstance, is an impoverished version of humankind. Instead, he emphasizes the strangeness and instability of the self: “There is as much difference between us and ourselves as between us and others.” This idea became highly influential in Renaissance thinking and shaped such haunting insights as John Donne’s observation that “ourselves are what we know not.” For Renaissance thinkers who embraced Montaigne’s doubt, the difficult philosophical imperative of Socrates, “know thyself,” seemed unattainable.

Montaigne charts the elusive “self” through a wide range of anecdotes, both contemporary and classical. A slippery or indefinable historical character intrigues him far more than a monolithic or single-minded one. The legendary warrior Alexander the Great is rendered frighteningly transparent by his obsession with power and conquest: he wants nothing less than to be a god. Emperor Augustus, on the other hand, rewards study precisely because his character has “escaped” the willful reductions of historians bent on “fashioning a consistent and solid fabric” of his character.

Why was Montaigne so unusually able to suspend the self-interest and bias he considered ingrained in human nature in order to analyze himself, and his culture? As his life in politics indicates, the violent instability of French history taught him tolerance, skepticism about human self-interest, and hatred of dogmatic positions: “It demands a great deal of self-love and presumption, to take one’s own opinions so seriously as to disrupt the peace in order to establish them, introducing so many inevitable evils, and so terrible a corruption of manners as civil wars and political revolutions with them.” His hatred of political radicalism influenced much of what he saw in ancient history and in contemporary accounts of New World discovery and conquest. Alienated from his own political context, Montaigne developed a rich double perspective, both ethnographic (outward-looking and impartial) and self-critical (introspective and moral). As he reflects on the ancient and new worlds, he pays special attention to how human beings respond to adversity, oppression, and physical torture.

In the best known of the selections included here, “Of Cannibals” (which influenced Shakespeare’s reflections in The Tempest on the ideal commonwealth, colonialism, and the nature of savages), Montaigne compares the behavioral codes of Brazilian cannibals and those of “ourselves” (Europeans) and concludes that “each man calls barbarism whatever is not his own practice.” Once he has asserted the relativity of customs, Montaigne is able to praise elements of the savages’ culture that he regards as superior to Europe’s. He admires the savages’ courage, for instance, in which “the honor of valor consists in combating, not in beating.” Moreover, he finds in the positive example of the Brazilian cannibals an implicit criticism of violence by Europeans both at home and in the New World.

As an ethnographer, Montaigne is able to grapple with a distinct and alien culture without passing judgment; but when he reflects on France, he becomes a moralist. Central to “Of Cannibals” is the invocation of the Catholics’ torture and burning of fellow citizens. Montaigne juxtaposes two kinds of savagery: that which appears foreign (cannibalism) and that which has grown too familiar (religious persecution). His own country’s civil strife enables him to transcend smug cultural bias, making him a powerful critic of European culture and allowing him to imagine communities other than his own. Like the world of antiquity, which also riveted his imagination, the idea of America allowed Montaigne to explore alternate worlds for their own sake and for their illumination of his own.

The genre that Montaigne inaugurated quickly made its way into the English tradition, with the Essays of Francis Bacon (1597). Yet its larger influence reached much further: with the advent of the Enlightenment and the rise of periodicals, the essay enabled the intellectual exchange of carefully considered, highly personal opinions in the public realm and thus shapes our own thinking and writing to this day.

FROM ESSAYS<sup>1</sup>

To the Reader

This book was written in good faith, reader. It warns you from the outset that in it I have set myself no goal but a domestic and private one. I have had no thought of serving either you or my own glory. My powers are inadequate for such a purpose. I have dedicated it to the private convenience of my relatives and friends, so that when they have lost me (as soon they must), they may recover here some features of my habits and temperament, and by this means keep the knowledge they have had of me more complete and alive.

If I had written to seek the world’s favor, I should have bedecked myself better, and should present myself in a studied posture. I want to be seen here in my simple, natural, ordinary fashion, without straining or artifice; for it is myself that I portray. My defects will here be read to the life, and also my natural form, as far as respect for the public has allowed. Had I been placed among those nations which are said to live still in the sweet freedom of nature’s first laws, I assure you I should very gladly have portrayed myself here entire and wholly naked.

Thus, reader, I am myself the matter of my book; you would be unreasonable to spend your leisure on so frivolous and vain a subject.

So farewell. Montaigne, this first day of March, fifteen hundred and eighty.

1. Translated by Donald Frame.

Of Cannibals

When King Pyrrhus<sup>2</sup> passed over into Italy, after he had reconnoitered the formation of the army that the Romans were sending to meet him, he said: "I do not know what barbarians these are" (for so the Greeks called all foreign nations), "but the formation of this army that I see is not at all barbarous." The Greeks said as much of the army that Flaminius brought into their country, and so did Philip, seeing from a knoll the order and distribution of the Roman camp, in his kingdom, under Publius Sulpicius Galba.<sup>3</sup> Thus we should beware of clinging to vulgar opinions, and judge things by reason's way, not by popular say.

I had with me for a long time a man who had lived for ten or twelve years in that other world which has been discovered in our century, in the place where Villegaignon landed, and which he called Antarctic France.<sup>4</sup> This discovery of a boundless country seems worthy of consideration. I don't know if I can guarantee that some other such discovery will not be made in the future, so many personages greater than ourselves having been mistaken about this one. I am afraid we have eyes bigger than our stomachs, and more curiosity than capacity. We embrace everything, but we clasp only wind.

Plato brings in Solon,<sup>5</sup> telling how he had learned from the priests of the city of Saïs in Egypt that in days of old, before the Flood, there was a great island named Atlantis, right at the mouth of the Strait of Gibraltar, which contained more land than Africa and Asia put together, and that the kings of that country, who not only possessed that island but had stretched out so far on the mainland that they held the breadth of Africa as far as Egypt, and the length of Europe as far as Tuscany, undertook to step over into Asia and subjugate all the nations that border on the Mediterranean, as far as the Black Sea; and for this purpose crossed the Spains, Gaul, Italy, as far as Greece, where the Athenians checked them; but that some time after, both the Athenians and themselves and their island were swallowed up by the Flood.

It is quite likely that that extreme devastation of waters made amazing changes in the habitations of the earth, as people maintain that the sea cut off Sicily from Italy—

'Tis said an earthquake once asunder tore These lands with dreadful havoc, which before Formed but one land, one coast

VIRGIL<sup>6</sup>

—Cyprus from Syria, the island of Euboea from the mainland of Boeotia; and elsewhere joined lands that were divided, filling the channels between them with sand and mud:

2. King of Epirus (in Greece) who fought the Romans in Italy in 280 B.C.E.

3. Both Titus Quinctius Flaminius and Publius Sulpicius Galba were Roman statesmen and generals who fought Philip V of Macedon in the early years of the 2nd century B.C.E.

4. In Brazil. Villegaignon landed there in 1557.

5. In his Timaeus.

6. Aeneid 3.414–15.

A sterile marsh, long fit for rowing, now
 Feeds neighbor towns, and feels the heavy plow.

HORACE<sup>7</sup>

But there is no great likelihood that that island was the new world which we have just discovered; for it almost touched Spain, and it would be an incredible result of a flood to have forced it away as far as it is, more than twelve hundred leagues; besides, the travels of the moderns have already almost revealed that it is not an island, but a mainland connected with the East Indies on one side, and elsewhere with the lands under the two poles; or, if it is separated from them, it is by so narrow a strait and interval that it does not deserve to be called an island on that account.

It seems that there are movements, some natural, others feverish, in these great bodies, just as in our own. When I consider the inroads that my river, the Dordogne, is making in my lifetime into the right bank in its descent, and that in twenty years it has gained so much ground and stolen away the foundations of several buildings, I clearly see that this is an extraordinary disturbance; for if it had always gone at this rate, or was to do so in the future, the face of the world would be turned topsy-turvy. But rivers are subject to changes: now they overflow in one direction, now in another, now they keep to their course. I am not speaking of the sudden inundations whose causes are manifest. In Médoc, along the seashore, my brother, the sieur d'Arsac, can see an estate of his buried under the sands that the sea spews forth; the tops of some buildings are still visible; his farms and domains have changed into very thin pasturage. The inhabitants say that for some time the sea has been pushing toward them so hard that they have lost four leagues of land. These sands are its harbingers; and we see great dunes of moving sand that march half a league ahead of it and keep conquering land.

The other testimony of antiquity with which some would connect this discovery is in Aristotle, at least if that little book Of Unheard-of Wonders is by him. He there relates that certain Carthaginians, after setting out upon the Atlantic Ocean from the Strait of Gibraltar and sailing a long time, at last discovered a great fertile island, all clothed in woods and watered by great deep rivers, far remote from any mainland; and that they, and others since, attracted by the goodness and fertility of the soil, went there with their wives and children, and began to settle there. The lords of Carthage, seeing that their country was gradually becoming depopulated, expressly forbade anyone to go there any more, on pain of death, and drove out these new inhabitants, fearing, it is said, that in course of time they might come to multiply so greatly as to supplant their former masters and ruin their state. This story of Aristotle does not fit our new lands any better than the other.

This man I had was a simple, crude fellow—a character fit to bear true witness; for clever people observe more things and more curiously, but they interpret them; and to lend weight and conviction to their interpretation, they cannot help altering history a little. They never show you things as they are, but bend and disguise them according to the way they have seen them; and to give credence to their judgment and attract you to it, they are prone to add something to their matter, to stretch it out and amplify it. We need a man either very honest, or so simple that he has not the stuff to build up false inventions and give them plausibility; and wedded to no theory. Such was my man; and besides this, he at various times brought sailors and merchants, whom he had known on that trip, to see me. So I content myself with his information, without inquiring what the cosmographers say about it.

7. Horatius Flaccus (65–8 B.C.E.), great poet of Augustan Rome; Art of Poetry, lines 65–66.

We ought to have topographers who would give us an exact account of the places where they have been. But because they have over us the advantage of having seen Palestine, they want to enjoy the privilege of telling us news about all the rest of the world. I would like everyone to write what he knows, and as much as he knows, not only in this, but in all other subjects; for a man may have some special knowledge and experience of the nature of a river or a fountain, who in other matters knows only what everybody knows. However, to circulate this little scrap of knowledge, he will undertake to write the whole of physics. From this vice spring many great abuses.

Now, to return to my subject, I think there is nothing barbarous and savage in that nation, from what I have been told, except that each man calls barbarism whatever is not his own practice; for indeed it seems we have no other test of truth and reason than the example and pattern of the opinions and customs of the country we live in. There is always the perfect religion, the perfect government, the perfect and accomplished manners in all things. Those people are wild, just as we call wild the fruits that Nature has produced by herself and in her normal course; whereas really it is those that we have changed artificially and led astray from the common order, that we should rather call wild. The former retain alive and vigorous their genuine, their most useful and natural, virtues and properties, which we have debased in the latter in adapting them to gratify our corrupted taste. And yet for all that, the savor and delicacy of some uncultivated fruits of those countries is quite as excellent, even to our taste, as that of our own. It is not reasonable that art should win the place of honor over our great and powerful mother Nature. We have so overloaded the beauty and richness of her works by our inventions that we have quite smothered her. Yet wherever her purity shines forth, she wonderfully puts to shame our vain and frivolous attempts:

Ivy comes readier without our care;
In lonely caves the arbutus grows more fair;
No art with artless bird song can compare.

PROPERTIUS<sup>8</sup>

All our efforts cannot even succeed in reproducing the nest of the tiniest little bird, its contexture, its beauty and convenience; or even the web of the puny spider. All things, says Plato,<sup>9</sup> are produced by nature, by fortune, or by art; the greatest and most beautiful by one or the other of the first two, the least and most imperfect by the last.

These nations, then, seem to me barbarous in this sense, that they have been fashioned very little by the human mind, and are still very close to their original naturalness. The laws of nature still rule them, very little corrupted by ours; and they are in such a state of purity that I am sometimes vexed that they were unknown earlier, in the days when there were men able to judge them better than we. I am sorry that Lycurgus<sup>1</sup> and Plato did not know of them; for it seems to me that what we actually see in these nations surpasses not only all the pictures in which poets have idealized the golden age and all their inventions in imagining a happy state of man, but also the conceptions and the very desire of philosophy. They could not imagine a naturalness so pure and simple as we see by experience; nor could they believe that our society could be maintained with so little artifice and human solder. This is a nation, I should say to Plato, in which there is no sort of traffic, no knowledge of letters, no science of numbers, no name for a magistrate or for political superiority, no custom of servitude, no riches or poverty, no contracts, no successions, no partitions, no occupations but leisure ones, no care for any but common kinship, no clothes, no agriculture, no metal, no use of wine or wheat.<sup>2</sup> The very words that signify lying, treachery, dissimulation, avarice, envy, belittling, pardon—unheard of. How far from this perfection would he find the republic that he imagined: Men fresh sprung from the gods [Seneca].<sup>3</sup>

8. Elegies 1.2.10–12.

9. See his Laws.

These manners nature first ordained.

VIRGIL<sup>4</sup>

For the rest, they live in a country with a very pleasant and temperate climate, so that according to my witnesses it is rare to see a sick man there; and they have assured me that they never saw one palsied, bleary-eyed, toothless, or bent with age. They are settled along the sea and shut in on the land side by great high mountains, with a stretch about a hundred leagues wide in between. They have a great abundance of fish and flesh which bear no resemblance to ours, and they eat them with no other artifice than cooking. The first man who rode a horse there, though he had had dealings with them on several other trips, so horrified them in this posture that they shot him dead with arrows before they could recognize him.

Their buildings are very long, with a capacity of two or three hundred souls; they are covered with the bark of great trees, the strips reaching to the ground at one end and supporting and leaning on one another at the top, in the manner of some of our barns, whose covering hangs down to the ground and acts as a side. They have wood so hard that they cut with it and make of it their swords and grills to cook their food. Their beds are of a cotton weave, hung from the roof like those in our ships, each man having his own; for the wives sleep apart from their husbands.

They get up with the sun, and eat immediately upon rising, to last them through the day; for they take no other meal than that one. Like some other Eastern peoples, of whom Suidas<sup>5</sup> tells us, who drank apart from meals, they do not drink then; but they drink several times a day, and to capacity. Their drink is made of some root, and is of the color of our claret wines. They drink it only lukewarm. This beverage keeps only two or three days; it has a slightly sharp taste, is not at all heady, is good for the stomach, and has a laxative effect upon those who are not used to it; it is a very pleasant drink for anyone who is

1. The half-legendary Spartan lawgiver (9th century B.C.E.).

2. This passage is always compared with Shakespeare's The Tempest 2.1.147 ff.

3. Roman tragedian (ca. 4 B.C.E.–65 C.E.), philosopher, and political leader, Epistles 90.

4. Georgics 2.20.

5. A Byzantine lexicographer.

accustomed to it. In place of bread they use a certain white substance like preserved coriander. I have tried it; it tastes sweet and a little flat.

The whole day is spent in dancing. The younger men go to hunt animals with bows. Some of the women busy themselves meanwhile with warming their drink, which is their chief duty. Some one of the old men, in the morning before they begin to eat, preaches to the whole barnful in common, walking from one end to the other, and repeating one single sentence several times until he has completed the circuit (for the buildings are fully a hundred paces long). He recommends to them only two things: valor against the enemy and love for their wives. And they never fail to point out this obligation, as their refrain, that it is their wives who keep their drink warm and seasoned.

There may be seen in several places, including my own house, specimens of their beds, of their ropes, of their wooden swords and the bracelets with which they cover their wrists in combats, and of the big canes, open at one end, by whose sound they keep time in their dances. They are close shaven all over, and shave themselves much more cleanly than we, with nothing but a wooden or stone razor. They believe that souls are immortal, and that those who have deserved well of the gods are lodged in that part of heaven where the sun rises, and the damned in the west.

They have some sort of priests and prophets, but they rarely appear before the people, having their home in the mountains. On their arrival there is a great feast and solemn assembly of several villages—each barn, as I have described it, makes up a village, and they are about one French league<sup>6</sup> from each other. The prophet speaks to them in public, exhorting them to virtue and their duty; but their whole ethical science contains only these two articles: resoluteness in war and affection for their wives. He prophesies to them things to come and the results they are to expect from their undertakings, and urges them to war or holds them back from it; but this is on the condition that when he fails to prophesy correctly, and if things turn out otherwise than he has predicted, he is cut into a thousand pieces if they catch him, and condemned as a false prophet. For this reason, the prophet who has once been mistaken is never seen again.

Divination is a gift of God; that is why its abuse should be punished as imposture. Among the Scythians, when the soothsayers failed to hit the mark, they were laid, chained hand and foot, on carts full of heather and drawn by oxen, on which they were burned. Those who handle matters subject to the control of human capacity are excusable if they do the best they can. But these others who come and trick us with assurances of an extraordinary faculty that is beyond our ken, should they not be punished for not making good their promise, and for the temerity of their imposture?

They have their wars with the nations beyond the mountains, further inland, to which they go quite naked, with no other arms than bows or wooden swords ending in a sharp point, in the manner of the tongues of our boar spears. It is astonishing what firmness they show in their combats, which never end but in slaughter and bloodshed; for as to routs and terror, they know nothing of either.

Each man brings back his trophy the head of the enemy he has killed, and sets it up at the entrance to his dwelling. After they have treated their prisoners well for a long time with all the hospitality they can think of, each man who has a prisoner calls a great assembly of his acquaintances. He ties a rope to one of the prisoner's arms, by the end of which he holds him, a few steps away, for fear of being hurt, and gives his dearest friend the other arm to hold in the same way; and these two, in the presence of the whole assembly, kill him with their swords. This done, they roast him and eat him in common and send some pieces to their absent friends. This is not, as people think, for nourishment, as of old the Scythians used to do; it is to betoken an extreme revenge. And the proof of this came when they saw the Portuguese, who had joined forces with their adversaries, inflict a different kind of death on them when they took them prisoner, which was to bury them up to the waist, shoot the rest of their body full of arrows, and afterward hang them. They thought that these people from the other world, being men who had sown the knowledge of many vices among their neighbors and were much greater masters than themselves in every sort of wickedness, did not adopt this sort of vengeance without some reason, and that it must be more painful than their own; so they began to give up their old method and to follow this one.

6. About 2.49 miles.

I am not sorry that we notice the barbarous horror of such acts, but I am heartily sorry that, judging their faults rightly, we should be so blind to our own. I think there is more barbarity in eating a man alive than in eating him dead; and in tearing by tortures and the rack a body still full of feeling, in roasting a man bit by bit, in having him bitten and mangled by dogs and swine (as we have not only read but seen within fresh memory, not among ancient enemies, but among neighbors and fellow citizens, and what is worse, on the pretext of piety and religion),<sup>7</sup> than in roasting and eating him after he is dead.

Indeed, Chrysippus and Zeno, heads of the Stoic sect, thought there was nothing wrong in using our carcasses for any purpose in case of need, and getting nourishment from them; just as our ancestors,<sup>8</sup> when besieged by Caesar in the city of Alesia, resolved to relieve their famine by eating old men, women, and other people useless for fighting.

The Gascons once, 'tis said, their life renewed
By eating of such food.

JUVENAL<sup>9</sup>

And physicians do not fear to use human flesh in all sorts of ways for our health, applying it either inwardly or outwardly. But there never was any opinion so disordered as to excuse treachery, disloyalty, tyranny, and cruelty, which are our ordinary vices.

So we may well call these people barbarians, in respect to the rules of reason, but not in respect to ourselves, who surpass them in every kind of barbarity.

Their warfare is wholly noble and generous, and as excusable and beautiful as this human disease can be; its only basis among them is their rivalry in valor. They are not fighting for the conquest of new lands, for they still enjoy that natural abundance that provides them without toil and trouble with all necessary things in such profusion that they have no wish to enlarge their boundaries. They are still in that happy state of desiring only as much as their natural needs demand; anything beyond that is superfluous to them.

They generally call those of the same age, brothers; those who are younger, children; and the old men are fathers to all the others. These leave to their

7. The allusion is to the spectacles of religious warfare that Montaigne himself had witnessed in his time and country.

8. The Gauls.

9. Decimus Junius Juvenal (fl. early 2nd century C.E.), last great Roman satirist; Satires 15.93–94.

heirs in common the full possession of their property, without division or any other title at all than just the one that Nature gives to her creatures in bringing them into the world.

If their neighbors cross the mountains to attack them and win a victory, the gain of the victor is glory, and the advantage of having proved the master in valor and virtue; for apart from this they have no use for the goods of the vanquished, and they return to their own country, where they lack neither anything necessary nor that great thing, the knowledge of how to enjoy their condition happily and be content with it. These men of ours do the same in their turn. They demand of their prisoners no other ransom than that they confess and acknowledge their defeat. But there is not one in a whole century who does not choose to die rather than to relax a single bit, by word or look, from the grandeur of an invincible courage; not one who would not rather be killed and eaten than so much as ask not to be. They treat them very freely, so that life may be all the dearer to them, and usually entertain them with threats of their coming death, of the torments they will have to suffer, the preparations that are being made for the purpose, the cutting up of their limbs, and the feast that will be made at their expense. All this is done for the sole purpose of extorting from their lips some weak or base word, or making them want to flee, so as to gain the advantage of having terrified them and broken down their firmness. For indeed, if you take it the right way, it is in this point alone that true victory lies:

It is no victory
Unless the vanquished foe admits your mastery.
CLAUDIAN<sup>1</sup>

The Hungarians, very bellicose fighters, did not in olden times pursue their advantage beyond putting the enemy at their mercy. For having wrung a confession from him to this effect, they let him go unharmed and unransomed, except, at most, for exacting his promise never again to take up arms against them.

We win enough advantages over our enemies that are borrowed advantages, not really our own. It is the quality of a porter, not of valor, to have sturdier arms and legs; agility is a dead and corporeal quality; it is a stroke of luck to make our enemy stumble, or dazzle his eyes by the sunlight; it is a trick of art and technique, which may be found in a worthless coward, to be an able fencer. The worth and value of a man is in his heart and his will; there lies his real honor. Valor is the strength, not of legs and arms, but of heart and soul; it consists not in the worth of our horse or our weapons, but in our own. He who falls obstinate in his courage, if he has fallen, he fights on his knees [Seneca].<sup>2</sup> He who relaxes none of his assurance, no matter how great the danger of imminent death; who, giving up his soul, still looks firmly and scornfully at his enemy—he is beaten not by us, but by fortune; he is killed, not conquered.

The most valiant are sometimes the most unfortunate. Thus there are triumphant defeats that rival victories. Nor did those four sister victories, the fairest that the sun ever set eyes on—Salamis, Plataea, Mycale, and Sicily<sup>3</sup>—ever dare

1. Of the Sixth Consulate of Honorius, lines 248–49.

2. Of Providence 2.

3. References to the famous Greek victories against the Persians and (at Himera, Sicily) against the Carthaginians in or about 480 B.C.E.

match all their combined glory against the glory of the annihilation of King Leonidas and his men at the pass of Thermopylae.<sup>4</sup>

Who ever hastened with more glorious and ambitious desire to win a battle than Captain Ischolas to lose one? Who ever secured his safety more ingeniously and painstakingly than he did his destruction? He was charged to defend a certain pass in the Peloponnesus against the Arcadians. Finding himself wholly incapable of doing this, in view of the nature of the place and the inequality of the forces, he made up his mind that all who confronted the enemy would necessarily have to remain on the field. On the other hand, deeming it unworthy both of his own virtue and magnanimity and of the Lacedaemonian name to fail in his charge, he took a middle course between these two extremes, in this way. The youngest and fittest of his band he preserved for the defense and service of their country, and sent them home; and with those whose loss was less important, he determined to hold this pass, and by their death to make the enemy buy their entry as dearly as he could. And so it turned out. For he was presently surrounded on all sides by the Arcadians, and after slaughtering a large number of them, he and his men were all put to the sword. Is there a trophy dedicated to victors that would not be more due to these vanquished? The role of true victory is in fighting, not in coming off safely; and the honor of valor consists in combating, not in beating.

To return to our story. These prisoners are so far from giving in, in spite of all that is done to them, that on the contrary, during the two or three months that they are kept, they wear a gay expression; they urge their captors to hurry and put them to the test; they defy them, insult them, reproach them with their cowardice and the number of battles they have lost to the prisoners' own people.

I have a song composed by a prisoner which contains this challenge, that they should all come boldly and gather to dine off him, for they will be eating at the same time their own fathers and grandfathers, who have served to feed and nourish his body. "These muscles," he says, "this flesh and these veins are your own, poor fools that you are. You do not recognize that the substance of your ancestors' limbs is still contained in them. Savor them well; you will find in them the taste of your own flesh." An idea that certainly does not smack of barbarity. Those that paint these people dying, and who show the execution, portray the prisoner spitting in the face of his slayers and scowling at them. Indeed, to the last gasp they never stop braving and defying their enemies by word and look. Truly here are real savages by our standards; for either they must be thoroughly so, or we must be; there is an amazing distance between their character and ours.

The men there have several wives, and the higher their reputation for valor the more wives they have. It is a remarkably beautiful thing about their marriages that the same jealousy our wives have to keep us from the affection and kindness of other women, theirs have to win this for them. Being more concerned for their husbands' honor than for anything else, they strive and scheme to have as many companions as they can, since that is a sign of their husbands' valor.

Our wives will cry "Miracle!" but it is no miracle. It is a properly matrimonial virtue, but one of the highest order. In the Bible, Leah, Rachel, Sarah, and Jacob's wives gave their beautiful handmaids to their husbands; and Livia seconded the appetites of Augustus to her own disadvantage; and Stratonice, the wife of King Deiotarus,<sup>5</sup> not only lent her husband for his use a very beautiful young chambermaid in her service, but carefully brought up her children, and backed them up to succeed to their father's estates.

4. The Spartan king Leonidas's defense here also took place in 480 B.C.E., during the war against the Persians.

And lest it be thought that all this is done through a simple and servile bondage to usage and through the pressure of the authority of their ancient customs, without reasoning or judgment, and because their minds are so stupid that they cannot take any other course, I must cite some examples of their capacity. Besides the warlike song I have just quoted, I have another, a love song, which begins in this vein: "Adder, stay; stay, adder, that from the pattern of your coloring my sister may draw the fashion and the workmanship of a rich girdle that I may give to my love; so may your beauty and your pattern be forever preferred to all other serpents." This first couplet is the refrain of the song. Now I am familiar enough with poetry to be a judge of this: not only is there nothing barbarous in this fancy, but it is altogether Anacreontic.<sup>6</sup> Their language, moreover, is a soft language, with an agreeable sound, somewhat like Greek in its endings.

Three of these men, ignorant of the price they will pay some day, in loss of repose and happiness, for gaining knowledge of the corruptions of this side of the ocean; ignorant also of the fact that of this intercourse will come their ruin (which I suppose is already well advanced: poor wretches, to let themselves be tricked by the desire for new things, and to have left the serenity of their own sky to come and see ours!)—three of these men were at Rouen, at the time the late King Charles IX was there. The king talked to them for a long time; they were shown our ways, our splendor, the aspect of a fine city. After that, someone asked their opinion, and wanted to know what they had found most amazing. They mentioned three things, of which I have forgotten the third, and I am very sorry for it; but I still remember two of them. They said that in the first place they thought it very strange that so many grown men, bearded, strong, and armed, who were around the king (it is likely that they were talking about the Swiss of his guard) should submit to obey a child, and that one of them was not chosen to command instead. Second (they have a way in their language of speaking of men as halves of one another), they had noticed that there were among us men full and gorged with all sorts of good things, and that their other halves were beggars at their doors, emaciated with hunger and poverty; and they thought it strange that these needy halves could endure such an injustice, and did not take the others by the throat, or set fire to their houses.

I had a very long talk with one of them; but I had an interpreter who followed my meaning so badly, and who was so hindered by his stupidity in taking in my ideas, that I could get hardly any satisfaction from the man. When I asked him what profit he gained from his superior position among his people (for he was a captain, and our sailors called him king), he told me that it was to march foremost in war. How many men followed him? He pointed to a piece of ground, to signify as many as such a space could hold; it might have been four or five thousand men. Did all this authority expire with the war? He said that this much remained, that when he visited the villages dependent on him, they made paths for him through the underbrush by which he might pass quite comfortably.

All this is not too bad—but what's the use? They don't wear breeches.

5. Tetrarch of Galatia, in Asia Minor.

6. Worthy of Anacreon (572?–488? B.C.E.), major Greek writer of amatory lyrics.

---

MIGUEL DE CERVANTES

1547–1616

---

Often described as the first novel, Miguel de Cervantes' Don Quixote uses the conventions of fiction to question the accepted truths of his own society. What happens when readers take books at their word, or try to live out ideal versions of the world around them, as does the would-be knight Don Quixote? How does life in early modern Spain fall short of the wishful fictional version? In Don Quixote, the narrative breaks off and leaves the reader hanging, characters reflect on what it means to exist in print, and a complicated cast of antagonistic narrators all quarrel over the real truth, as Cervantes ironically surveys his world while examining the nature of fiction.

LIFE

The author of Don Quixote's extravagant adventures himself had a most unusual and adventurous life. As a student, soldier, captive, and tax collector, he witnessed his contemporaries at their best and at their worst. His skeptical, ironic perspective on both the literary and political pieties of his day is combined in his works with a profound sympathy for human striving. The son of an apothecary, Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra was born in Alcalá de Henares, a university town near Madrid. Almost nothing is known of his childhood and early education. Only in 1569 is he mentioned as a favorite pupil by a Madrid humanist, Juan López. Records indicate that by the end of that year he had left Spain and was living in Rome, for a time in the service of a future cardinal. He enlisted in the Spanish fleet under the command of Don John of Austria and took part in the struggle of the allied forces of Christendom against the Ottomans. He was at the crucial Battle of Lepanto (1571), where in spite of fever he fought valiantly and received three gunshot wounds, one of which permanently impaired the use of his left hand, "for the greater glory of the right." After further military action at Palermo and Naples, he and his brother Rodrigo, bearing testimonials from Don John and from the viceroy of Sicily, began the journey back to Spain, where Miguel hoped to obtain a captaincy. In September 1575 their ship was captured near Marseille by Barbary pirates, and the two brothers were taken as prisoners to Algiers. Cervantes' captors, considering him a person of some consequence because of the letters he carried, held him as a slave for a high ransom. His daring and fortitude as he attempted repeatedly to escape excited the admiration of Hassan Pasha, the viceroy of Algiers, who bought him for five hundred crowns after five years of captivity.

Cervantes was finally ransomed on September 15, 1580, and reached Madrid in December of that year, though his experience of captivity would remain with him throughout his literary career. That career began rather inauspiciously; he wrote some ten to twenty plays, with middling success, and in 1585 published Galatea, a pastoral romance that anticipates the formal experimentation of Don Quixote but ends inconclusively. None of these established his reputation or, more important, allowed him to live from his writing. At about this time he had a daughter with Ana Franca de Rojas, and during the same period married Catalina de Salazar, who was eighteen years his junior. Seeking nonliterary employment, he obtained a position in the navy, requisitioning and collecting supplies for the “Invincible Armada.” Irregularities in his administration, for which he was held responsible if not directly guilty, caused him to spend more time in prison. In 1590 he was denied colonial employment in the New World. Later he served as tax collector in the province of Granada but was dismissed from government service in 1597.

The following years of Cervantes’ life are the most obscure; there is a legend that Don Quixote was first conceived and planned while its author was in prison in Seville. In 1604 he was in Valladolid, then the temporary capital of Spain, living in sordid surroundings with the numerous women of his family (his wife, daughter, niece, and two sisters). It was in Valladolid, in late 1604, that he obtained the official license for the publication of Don Quixote (Part I). The book appeared in 1605 and was a popular success. Cervantes followed the Spanish court when it returned to Madrid, where he continued to live poorly in spite of a popularity with readers that quickly made proverbial figures of his heroes. A false sequel to his book appeared, prompting him to write his own continuation, Don Quixote, Part II, published in 1615. His Exemplary Novellas had appeared in 1613. He died on April 23, 1616. Persiles and Sigismunda, his last novel, was published posthumously in 1617.

TIMES

Cervantes’ Spain was a great empire, with huge possessions in the New World, in Italy, and in Flanders, sustained by an equally enormous army of disciplined soldiers organized in infantry battalions—the famous tercios españoles. It was ruled by Philip II, the devout Habsburg monarch who became known as “the prudent king” for his careful administration. In 1580, Philip annexed the Portuguese crown and its commercial empire in Asia, Africa, and the New World, rendering Spain a truly global power. At the same time, the enormous influx of gold from the Americas led to inflation and widespread poverty, and to the general perception that everything and everyone could be bought. As the vivacious gypsy Preciosa jokes to an impoverished official in one of Cervantes’ novellas, if he only took bribes as everyone expects him to do, he would not be so poor. Both as a tax collector and as a convict, Cervantes had ample experience of a down-and-out, picaresque Spain that held the law in small regard, a world depicted in colorful detail in the earlier episodes of Don Quixote.

Overburdened with military expenses and foreign debt, the Crown experienced repeated bankruptcies despite the heavy taxes it imposed on its subjects. In 1588, it suffered the added indignity of the Armada’s defeat by the English navy, and Spain entered a long period of decline and disillusion. Philip’s death in 1598 signaled the end of an era. Cervantes marked the occasion with a devastating sonnet on the king’s funerary monument. Its greatness, the poem suggests, is but an illusion: as soon as the admiring glances of the impressionable viewers wander, king, reign, and monument are reduced to nothingness.

Meanwhile, the Counter-Reformation led to an increased emphasis on religious orthodoxy, and heightened suspicions of the humanist reform traditions that had shaped Cervantes’ thought. Increasingly, his society scrutinized not only people’s religious practices but also their roots, stigmatizing them for Jewish or Muslim forebears and holding all conversos and Moriscos (converts from Judaism and Islam, respectively) suspect. Cervantes' own fortunes may have been complicated by his origins: we cannot be sure whether he came from a line of conversos, but his family connections to the medical profession, the denial of his request for New World employment, and the refusal of the authorities to reward his heroic military service and captivity with any real preferment all suggest a striking disregard for his services. If he was in fact descended from Jews, Cervantes would have been barred from many honors and privileges in his time, however sincere his own Christian faith. Cervantes mocked the Inquisitorial and popular anxiety about origins in his dramatic interlude The Miracle Show. In this satire of Spanish obsessions with honor, legitimacy, and "blood purity," rascally entertainers trick village notables by convincing them that only those who are legitimate and free of the Jewish "taint" can actually see their marvelous show. In his version of "The Emperor's New Clothes," Cervantes holds up a sly theatrical mirror to his own society's prejudices.

During Cervantes' life, Spain faced challenges to both its political power and its religious orthodoxy. Protestants across Europe and humanist reformers within the Catholic Church constantly defied the strictures of the Counter-Reformation. The Ottoman Empire, which encroached on Italy, the Mediterranean, and North Africa, represented the greatest geopolitical threat to Spain, and also the religious threat of Islam as a competing faith. In its own territories, Spain struggled to incorporate the descendants of its Muslim subjects. Though this population had been forcibly converted to Christianity, their place and that of their descendants within a belligerently Christian nation were increasingly threatened. Their customs and language were forbidden by law, in an attempt to enforce acculturation. Beginning in 1609, the Moriscos, though Christians, were forcibly expelled from Spain, prompting widespread condemnation by Church authorities across Europe. Cervantes comments directly on the situation of the Moriscos in Don Quixote. In "The Captive's Tale" of Part I, he considers how Spanish society might receive a hugely sympathetic young woman, a fresh convert from Islam, who had saved a Spanish captive much like the author himself. In Part II, published after the expulsions, in a section not included in this anthology, Sancho Panza, Don Quixote's earthy sidekick, runs into his Morisco former neighbor, Ricote, now back in Spain disguised as a German pilgrim. They proceed to share a communal meal, with plenty of wine to go around. Thus Cervantes turns again and again to his own experience of captivity and to the Morisco problem within Spain, to explore how a newly unified and forcibly homogenized nation might include those it had led to Christianity.

DON QUIXOTE

The Ingenious Gentleman Don Quixote de la Mancha was a popular success from the time Part I was published in 1605, although it was only later recognized as an important work of literature. This delay was due partly to the fact that in a period of established and well-defined literary genres such as the epic, the tragedy, and the pastoral romance (Cervantes himself had tried his hand at some of these forms), the unconventional combination of elements in Don Quixote resulted in a work of considerable novelty, with the serious aspects hidden under a mocking surface.

The proclaimed purpose of the book was to satirize the romances of chivalry. In those long yarns—based on the Carolingian and Arthurian legends, and full of supernatural deeds of valor, implausible and complicated adventures, duels, and enchantments—the literature that had expressed the medieval spirit of chivalry and romance had become conventional and formulaic (much as, in our day, certain literary conventions have become “pulp” fiction and film melodrama). Up to a point, then, what Cervantes set out to do was to produce a parody, a caricature of a hugely popular literary type. But he did not limit himself to such a relatively simple and direct undertaking. To expose the silliness of the romances of chivalry, he showed to what extraordinary consequences they would lead a man insanely infatuated with them, once this man set out to live “now” according to their patterns of action and belief. While the anachronism of Don Quixote makes him a figure of fun, it also allows Cervantes to examine the realities of his own time: an impoverished Spain full of underemployed noblemen; an overextended empire burdened by too many modern, impersonal wars; widespread anxiety about religious and political conformity, as well as genealogical “purity.”

So what we have is not mere parody or caricature, for there is a great deal of difference between presenting a remote and more or less imaginary world and presenting an individual deciding to live by the standards of that world in a modern and realistic context. The first consequence is a mingling of genres. Don Quixote sees the world through the lens of medieval chivalry as its authors had portrayed it, and often the narrator echoes his vision, albeit in an ironic mode. The chivalric world is continuously jostled by elements of contemporary life evoked by the narrator—the realities of landscape and speech, peasants and nobles, inns and highways. The hero attempting to recreate the world of the romances is not, as we know, a cavalier; he is an impoverished country gentleman who embraces that code in the “modern” world. His squire, the peasant Sancho Panza, is only too happy to point out Don Quixote’s delusions. Nevertheless, he too becomes invested in the quest, in search of material wealth and aggrandizement. The exchanges between Don Quixote and Sancho pit a gentleman against a peasant, yet more often than not the two find common ground in their conviction that they can improve their lot through their own actions.

Don Quixote soon finds that he is not the only one modeling his life after books. Other characters follow their own idealizing genres, such as the pastoral romance to which Don Quixote and his friends will turn at the end. All must make their peace with the reality of the world that surrounds them. That debased world, in turn, produces its own stories, such as the picaresque “life” that the rascally Ginés de Pasamonte has written in prison (Part I, chapter 22), and the mix of recent history and romance that is the “Captive’s Tale,” related by its protagonist at the inn.

Along the way, Cervantes casts doubt on the possibility of reconstructing history from written sources. The facts about Don Quixote are never fully available to the primary narrator, who confesses to the many gaps in his knowledge and keeps losing track of the story. While the prologue describes the text as the author’s “child,” the narrator is not even certain of his protagonist’s name. More spectacularly, the first part of the novel breaks off entirely at the end of chapter 8, leaving both characters and readers in suspense. The problem of finding more text then leads to one of Cervantes’ most interesting narrative games: a second author, Cid Hamete Benengeli, who just happens to be an “Arabic historian,” and whose disheveled account must be translated from a forbidden language by a “Spanish-speaking Moor”—a Morisco. The entire story from this point forth is thus supposedly written by a Moor, the traditional enemy of a Spanish knight, and translated by a marginalized contemporary Morisco. Don Quixote and his narrator both worry about the implications of such authorship for the story on which they are embarked: will the Moorish author distort Don Quixote's adventures, or diminish his greatness? Part I also moves away from Don Quixote and Sancho to present a number of other stories that play with generic conventions—of lovelorn shepherds and the shepherdesses who puncture their illusions, young lovers who fall prey to ignoble lords, friendships undone by sexual jealousy, and captives redeemed by mysterious ladies. The narrative games are fully fleshed out in Part II, when Don Quixote and Sancho, now famous from Part I, must confront their own celebrity and grapple with the selves that the printing press has given them, while the authorial voice of Cide Hamete intervenes more and more frequently to make sure that the reader gets the “right” story.

Generally speaking, the encounters between the ordinary world and Don Quixote confront reality with illusion, and reason with imagination. Among the first adventures are some that have most contributed to the popularity of the Don Quixote legend: he sees windmills and decides they are giants, country inns become castles, and flocks of sheep become armies. Though the conclusions of such episodes often have the ludicrousness of slapstick comedy, there is a powerfully imposing quality about Don Quixote's insanity; his madness always has method, a commanding persistence and coherence. And there is perhaps an inevitable sense of moral grandeur in the spectacle of anyone remaining so unflinchingly faithful to his or her own vision. The world of “reason” may win in point of fact, but we come to wonder whether from a moral point of view Quixote is not the victor.

Yet at the same time the novel explores the deterioration of the chivalric ideals that inspire its protagonist—for instance, the notion of love as devoted “service.” Don Quixote loves a purely fantastic lady, Dulcinea, so remote and unattainable that she does not even exist. Other plots interwoven through the text, and not included in our selection, show lovers struggling with problems of class and religious difference, and pervasive sexual jealousy. Don Quixote also examines the anachronism of individual heroics: new forms of warfare had rendered knights passé in more than the literary sense—battles are now fought with artillery and squadrons of infantry. The episode of the lions (Part II, chapter 17) features the knight, crowned with cottage cheese, seeking a challenge at all costs. That challenge comes in the ironic form of a caged animal being sent to the king, and who has no intention of engaging in battle. Unwilling to confront the futility of the knight in an age of gunpowder, Don Quixote will take what he can get in the form of challenges. The ridiculousness of the situation is counterbalanced by the basic seriousness of Quixote's motives; his notion of courage for its own sake appears, and is recognized, as singularly noble, a sort of generous display of integrity in a world usually ruled by lower standards. Thus the distinction between reason and madness, truth and illusion, becomes, to say the least, ambiguous. The hero's delusions are indeed exposed when they come up against hard facts, but the authority of such facts is seen to be morally questionable. A similar ambiguity colors a later episode where he frees a group of thug-gish galley slaves (Part I, chapter 22). Don Quixote, comically anachronistic, ignores the existence of a centralized state with its own justice system, which has tried the men and found them guilty. Yet his intervention and his determination to hear out the prisoners raises more basic questions of social justice, and insists on the imagination, however anachronistic, as a basic tool for rethinking the status quo.

Don Quixote has been intensely read and reread, since its first publication, for its broad humor and its slippery ironies alike. Both parts of the novel were immediately translated across Europe, giving rise to such rewritings and imitations as the Jacobean comedy The Knight of the Burning Pestle (1607), the early feminist novel The Female Quixote (1752), and, more recently, the Broadway musical Man of la Mancha (1964). In Spain, Don Quixote has long been embraced as the symbol of a kind of national idealism; the philosopher Miguel de Unamuno in his Life of Don Quixote and Sancho (1905) argued that the novel was the true “Spanish Bible,” a degree of respect that might well have amused the more irreverent Cervantes.

From DON QUIXOTE<sup>1</sup>

From Part I

[Prologue]

Idling reader, you may believe me when I tell you that I should have liked this book, which is the child of my brain, to be the fairest, the sprightliest, and the cleverest that could be imagined; but I have not been able to contravene the law of nature which would have it that like begets like. And so, what was to be expected of a sterile and uncultivated wit such as that which I possess if not an offspring that was dried up, shriveled, and eccentric: a story filled with thoughts that never occurred to anyone else, of a sort that might be engendered in a prison where every annoyance has its home and every mournful sound its habitation?<sup>2</sup> Peace and tranquillity, the pleasures of the countryside, the serenity of the heavens, the murmur of fountains, and ease of mind can do much toward causing the most unproductive of muses to become fecund and bring forth progeny that will be the marvel and delight of mankind.

It sometimes happens that a father has an ugly son with no redeeming grace whatever, yet love will draw a veil over the parental eyes which then behold only cleverness and beauty in place of defects, and in speaking to his friends he will make those defects out to be the signs of comeliness and intellect. I, however, who am but Don Quixote’s stepfather, have no desire to go with the current of custom, nor would I, dearest reader, beseech you with tears in my eyes as others do to pardon or overlook the faults you discover in this book; you are neither relative nor friend but may call your soul your own and exercise your free judgment. You are in your own house where you are master as the king is of his taxes, for you are familiar with the saying, “Under my cloak I kill the king.”<sup>3</sup> All

1. Translated by Samuel Putnam.

2. Cervantes was imprisoned in Seville in 1597 and 1602.

3. I.e., the king does not own your body.

of which exempts and frees you from any kind of respect or obligation; you may say of this story whatever you choose without fear of being slandered for an ill opinion any more than you will be rewarded for a good one.

I should like to bring you the tale unadulterated and unadorned, stripped of the usual prologue and the endless string of sonnets, epigrams, and eulogies such as are commonly found at the beginning of books. For I may tell you that, although I expended no little labor upon the work itself, I have found no task more difficult than the composition of this preface which you are now reading. Many times I took up my pen and many times I laid it down again, not knowing what to write. On one occasion when I was thus in suspense, paper before me, pen over my ear, elbow on the table, and chin in hand, a very clever friend of mine came in. Seeing me lost in thought, he inquired as to the reason, and I made no effort to conceal from him the fact that my mind was on the preface which I had to write for the story of Don Quixote, and that it was giving me so much trouble that I had about decided not to write any at all and to abandon entirely the idea of publishing the exploits of so noble a knight.

"How," I said to him, "can you expect me not to be concerned over what that venerable legislator, the Public, will say when it sees me, at my age, after all these years of silent slumber, coming out with a tale that is as dried as a rush, a stranger to invention, paltry in style, impoverished in content, and wholly lacking in learning and wisdom, without marginal citations or notes at the end of the book when other works of this sort, even though they be fabulous and profane, are so packed with maxims from Aristotle and Plato and the whole crowd of philosophers as to fill the reader with admiration and lead him to regard the author as a well read, learned, and eloquent individual? Not to speak of the citations from Holy Writ! You would think they were at the very least so many St. Thomases<sup>4</sup> and other doctors of the Church; for they are so adroit at maintaining a solemn face that, having portrayed in one line a distracted lover, in the next they will give you a nice little Christian sermon that is a joy and a privilege to hear and read.

"All this my book will lack, for I have no citations for the margins, no notes for the end. To tell the truth, I do not even know who the authors are to whom I am indebted, and so am unable to follow the example of all the others by listing them alphabetically at the beginning, starting with Aristotle and closing with Xenophon, or, perhaps, with Zoilus or Zeuxis, notwithstanding the fact that the former was a snarling critic, the latter a painter. This work will also be found lacking in prefatory sonnets by dukes, marquises, counts, bishops, ladies, and poets of great renown; although if I were to ask two or three colleagues of mine, they would supply the deficiency by furnishing me with productions that could not be equaled by the authors of most repute in all Spain.

"In short, my friend," I went on, "I am resolved that Señor Don Quixote shall remain buried in the archives of La Mancha until Heaven shall provide him with someone to deck him out with all the ornaments that he lacks; for I find myself incapable of remedying the situation, being possessed of little learning or aptitude, and I am, moreover, extremely lazy when it comes to hunting up authors who will say for me what I am unable to say for myself. And if I am in a state of suspense and my thoughts are woolgathering, you will find a sufficient explanation in what I have just told you.”

4. Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274), Italian philosopher and theologian, venerated by Roman Catholics as a "Doctor of the Church."

Hearing this, my friend struck his forehead with the palm of his hand and burst into a loud laugh.

“In the name of God, brother,” he said, “you have just deprived me of an illusion. I have known you for a long time, and I have always taken you to be clever and prudent in all your actions; but I now perceive that you are as far from all that as Heaven from the earth. How is it that things of so little moment and so easily remedied can worry and perplex a mind as mature as yours and ordinarily so well adapted to break down and trample underfoot far greater obstacles? I give you my word, this does not come from any lack of cleverness on your part, but rather from excessive indolence and a lack of experience. Do you ask for proof of what I say? Then pay attention closely and in the blink of an eye you shall see how I am going to solve all your difficulties and supply all those things the want of which, so you tell me, is keeping you in suspense, as a result of which you hesitate to publish the history of that famous Don Quixote of yours, the light and mirror of all knight-errantry.”

“Tell me, then,” I replied, “how you propose to go about curing my diffidence and bringing clarity out of the chaos and confusion of my mind?”

“Take that first matter,” he continued, “of the sonnets, epigrams, or eulogies, which should bear the names of grave and titled personages: you can remedy that by taking a little trouble and composing the pieces yourself, and afterward you can baptize them with any name you see fit, fathering them on Prester John of the Indies or the Emperor of Trebizond, for I have heard tell that they were famous poets; and supposing they were not and that a few pedants and bachelors of arts should go around muttering behind your back that it is not so, you should not give so much as a pair of maravedis<sup>5</sup> for all their carping, since even though they make you out to be a liar, they are not going to cut off the hand that put these things on paper.

“As for marginal citations and authors in whom you may find maxims and sayings that you may put in your story, you have but to make use of those scraps of Latin that you know by heart or can look up without too much bother. Thus, when you come to treat of liberty and slavery, jot down:

Non bene pro toto libertas venditur auro.<sup>6</sup>

And then in the margin you will cite Horace or whoever it was that said it. If the subject is death, come up with:

*Pallida mors aequo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas
Regumque turres.*<sup>7</sup>

If it is friendship or the love that God commands us to show our enemies, then is the time to fall back on the Scriptures, which you can do by putting yourself out very little; you have but to quote the words of God himself:

5. Coin worth a thirty-fourth of a real; that is, even two maravedies were worth very little. “Prester John”: in medieval and early modern European folklore, the priest-monarch of a lost Christian kingdom in Asia or Africa. “Trebizond”: successor state to the Byzantine Empire in modern-day Turkey; it flourished from the 13th to the 15th century.

6. Freedom is not bought by gold (Latin); from the anonymous Aesopian Fables 3.14.

7. Pale death knocks at the cottages of the poor and the palaces of kings with equal foot (Latin); from Horace, Odes 1.4.13–14.

Ego autem dico vobis: diligite inimicos vestros.<sup>8</sup>

If it is evil thoughts, lose no time in turning to the Gospels:

De corde exeunt cogitationes malae.<sup>9</sup>

If it is the instability of friends, here is Cato for you with a distich:

*Donec eris felix multos numerabis amicos;
Tempora si fuerint nubila, solus eris.*<sup>1</sup>

With these odds and ends of Latin and others of the same sort, you can cause yourself to be taken for a grammarian, although I must say that is no great honor or advantage these days.

“So far as notes at the end of the book are concerned, you may safely go about it in this manner: let us suppose that you mention some giant, Goliath let us say; with this one allusion which costs you little or nothing, you have a fine note which you may set down as follows: The giant Goliath or Goliath. This was a Philistine whom the shepherd David slew with a mighty cast from his sling-shot in the valley of Terebinth, according to what we read in the Book of Kings, chapter so-and-so where you find it written.<sup>2</sup>

“In addition to this, by way of showing that you are a learned humanist and a cosmographer, contrive to bring into your story the name of the River Tagus, and there you are with another great little note: The River Tagus was so called after a king of Spain; it rises in such and such a place and empties into the ocean, washing the walls of the famous city of Lisbon; it is supposed to have golden sands, etc. If it is robbers, I will let you have the story of Cacus,<sup>3</sup> which I know by heart. If it is loose women, there is the Bishop of Mondoñedo,<sup>4</sup> who will lend you Lamia, Laïs, and Flora, an allusion that will do you great credit. If the subject is cruelty, Ovid will supply you with Medea; or if it is enchantresses and witches, Homer has Calypso and Vergil Circe. If it is valorous captains, Julius Caesar will lend you himself, in his Commentaries, and Plutarch will furnish a thousand Alexanders. If it is loves, with the ounce or two of Tuscan that you know you may make the acquaintance of Leon the Hebrew,<sup>5</sup> who will satisfy you to your heart’s content. And in case you do not care to go abroad, here in your own house you have Fonseca’s Of the Love of God,<sup>6</sup> where you will encounter in condensed form all that the most imaginative person could wish upon this subject. The short of the matter is, you have but to allude to these names or touch upon those stories that I have mentioned and leave to me the business of the notes and citations; I will guarantee you enough to fill the margins and four whole sheets at the back.

“And now we come to the list of authors cited, such as other works contain but in which your own is lacking. Here again the remedy is an easy one; you

8. But I say unto you, love your enemies (Latin); Matthew 5.44.

9. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts (Latin); Matthew 15.19.

1. As long as you are happy, you will count many friends, but if times become clouded, you will be alone (Latin); not from Cato but instead Ovid, Sorrows 1.9.5–6.

2. 1 Samuel 17.48–49.

3. Gigantic thief defeated by Hercules in Virgil’s Aeneid 8.

4. Father Antonio de Guevara (ca. 1481–1545).

5. Judah Leon Abravanel, known as León Hebreo (ca. 1465–ca. 1523), Neoplatonic author of the Dialogues of Love (1535).

6. Cristóbal de Fonseca, Treatise of the Love of God (1592).

have but to look up some book that has them all, from A to Z as you were saying, and transfer the entire list as it stands. What if the imposition is plain for all to see? You have little need to refer to them, and so it does not matter; and some may be so simple-minded as to believe that you have drawn upon them all in your simple unpretentious little story. If it serves no other purpose, this imposing list of authors will at least give your book an unlooked-for air of authority. What is more, no one is going to put himself to the trouble of verifying your references to see whether or not you have followed all these authors, since it will not be worth his pains to do so.

"This is especially true in view of the fact that your book stands in no need of all these things whose absence you lament; for the entire work is an attack upon the books of chivalry of which Aristotle never dreamed, of which St. Basil has nothing to say, and of which Cicero had no knowledge; nor do the fine points of truth or the observations of astrology have anything to do with its fanciful absurdities; geometrical measurements, likewise, and rhetorical argumentations serve for nothing here; you have no sermon to preach to anyone by mingling the human with the divine, a kind of motley in which no Christian intellect should be willing to clothe itself.

"All that you have to do is to make proper use of imitation in what you write, and the more perfect the imitation the better will your writing be. Inasmuch as you have no other object in view than that of overthrowing the authority and prestige which books of chivalry enjoy in the world at large and among the vulgar, there is no reason why you should go begging maxims of the philosophers, counsels of Holy Writ, fables of the poets, orations of the rhetoricians, or miracles of the saints; see to it, rather, that your style flows along smoothly, pleasingly, and sonorously, and that your words are the proper ones, meaningful and well placed, expressive of your intention in setting them down and of what you wish to say, without any intricacy or obscurity.

"Let it be your aim that, by reading your story, the melancholy may be moved to laughter and the cheerful man made merrier still; let the simple not be bored, but may the clever admire your originality; let the grave ones not despise you, but let the prudent praise you. And keep in mind, above all, your purpose, which is that of undermining the ill-founded edifice that is constituted by those books of chivalry, so abhorred by many but admired by many more; if you succeed in attaining it, you will have accomplished no little."

Listening in profound silence to what my friend had to say, I was so impressed by his reasoning that, with no thought of questioning them, I decided to make use of his arguments in composing this prologue. Here, gentle reader, you will perceive my friend's cleverness, my own good fortune in coming upon such a counselor at a time when I needed him so badly, and the profit which you yourselves are to have in finding so sincere and straightforward an account of the famous Don Quixote de la Mancha, who is held by the inhabitants of the Campo de Montiel region to have been the most chaste lover and the most valiant knight that had been seen in those parts for many a year. I have no desire to enlarge upon the service I am rendering you in bringing you the story of so notable and honored a gentleman; I merely would have you thank me for having made you acquainted with the famous Sancho Panza, his squire, in whom, to my mind, is to be found an epitome of all the squires and their drolleries scattered here and there throughout the pages of those vain and empty books of chivalry. And with this, may God give you health, and may He be not unmindful of me as well. VALE.<sup>7</sup>

["I Know Who I Am, and Who I May Be, If I Choose"]

CHAPTER I

Which treats of the station in life and the pursuits of the famous gentleman, Don Quixote de la Mancha.

In a village of La Mancha<sup>1</sup> the name of which I have no desire to recall, there lived not so long ago one of those gentlemen who always have a lance in the rack, an ancient buckler, a skinny nag, and a greyhound for the chase. A stew with more beef than mutton in it, chopped meat for his evening meal, scraps for a Saturday, lentils on Friday, and a young pigeon as a special delicacy for Sunday, went to account for three-quarters of his income. The rest of it he laid out on a broadcloth greatcoat and velvet stockings for feast days, with slippers to match, while the other days of the week he cut a figure in a suit of the finest homespun. Living with him were a housekeeper in her forties, a niece who was not yet twenty, and a lad of the field and marketplace who saddled his horse for him and wielded the pruning knife.

This gentleman of ours was close on to fifty, of a robust constitution but with little flesh on his bones and a face that was lean and gaunt. He was noted for his early rising, being very fond of the hunt. They will try to tell you that his surname was Quijada or Quesada—there is some difference of opinion among those who have written on the subject—but according to the most likely conjectures we are to understand that it was really Quejana. But all this means very little so far as our story is concerned, providing that in the telling of it we do not depart one iota from the truth.

You may know, then, that the aforesaid gentleman, on those occasions when he was at leisure, which was most of the year around, was in the habit of reading books of chivalry with such pleasure and devotion as to lead him almost wholly to forget the life of a hunter and even the administration of his estate. So great was his curiosity and infatuation in this regard that he even sold many acres of tillable land in order to be able to buy and read the books that he loved, and he would carry home with him as many of them as he could obtain.

Of all those that he thus devoured none pleased him so well as the ones that had been composed by the famous Feliciano de Silva,<sup>2</sup> whose lucid prose style and involved conceits were as precious to him as pearls; especially when he came to read those tales of love and amorous challenges that are to be met with in many places, such a passage as the following, for example: "The reason of the unreason that afflicts my reason, in such a manner weakens my reason that I with reason lament me of your comeliness." And he was similarly affected when his eyes fell upon such lines as these: ". . . the high Heaven of your divin-

7. Farewell (Latin).

1. Efforts at identifying the village have proved inconclusive. La Mancha is a region of central Spain south of the capital, Madrid.

2. Author of romances (16th century); the lines that follow are from his Don Florisel de Nigueva.

ity divinely fortifies you with the stars and renders you deserving of that desert your greatness doth deserve.”

The poor fellow used to lie awake nights in an effort to disentangle the meaning and make sense out of passages such as these, although Aristotle himself would not have been able to understand them, even if he had been resurrected for that sole purpose. He was not at ease in his mind over those wounds that Don Belianís<sup>3</sup> gave and received; for no matter how great the surgeons who treated him, the poor fellow must have been left with his face and his entire body covered with marks and scars. Nevertheless, he was grateful to the author for closing the book with the promise of an interminable adventure to come; many a time he was tempted to take up his pen and literally finish the tale as had been promised, and he undoubtedly would have done so, and would have succeeded at it very well, if his thoughts had not been constantly occupied with other things of greater moment.

He often talked it over with the village curate, who was a learned man, a graduate of Sigüenza,<sup>4</sup> and they would hold long discussions as to who had been the better knight, Palmerin of England or Amadis of Gaul; but Master Nicholas, the barber of the same village, was in the habit of saying that no one could come up to the Knight of Phoebus,<sup>5</sup> and that if anyone could compare with him it was Don Galaor, brother of Amadis of Gaul, for Galaor was ready for anything—he was none of your finical knights, who went around whimpering as his brother did, and in point of valor he did not lag behind him.

In short, our gentleman became so immersed in his reading that he spent whole nights from sundown to sunup and his days from dawn to dusk in poring over his books, until, finally, from so little sleeping and so much reading, his brain dried up and he went completely out of his mind. He had filled his imagination with everything that he had read, with enchantments, knightly encounters, battles, challenges, wounds, with tales of love and its torments, and all sorts of impossible things, and as a result had come to believe that all these fictitious happenings were true; they were more real to him than anything else in the world. He would remark that the Cid Ruy Díaz had been a very good knight, but there was no comparison between him and the Knight of the Flaming Sword, who with a single backward stroke had cut in half two fierce and monstrous giants. He preferred Bernardo del Carpio, who at Roncesvalles had slain Roland despite the charm the latter bore, availing himself of the stratagem which Hercules employed when he strangled Antaeus,<sup>6</sup> the son of Earth, in his arms.

He had much good to say for Morgante<sup>7</sup> who, though he belonged to the haughty, overbearing race of giants, was of an affable disposition and well brought up. But, above all, he cherished an admiration for Rinaldo of Montalbán,<sup>8</sup> espe-

3. The allusion is to a romance by Jerónimo Fernández.

4. Ironic, for Sigüenza was the seat of a minor and discredited university.

5. Or Knight of the Sun. Heroes of romances customarily adopted emblematic names and also changed them according to circumstances. “Palmerin . . . Amadis”: each a hero of a very famous chivalric romance, as are those mentioned in the following paragraphs.

6. The mythological Antaeus was invulnerable as long as he maintained contact with his mother, Earth. Hercules killed him while holding him raised in his arms. “Charm”: the magic gift of invulnerability.

7. In Pulci’s Morgante Maggiore (1483), a comic-epic poem of the Italian Renaissance.

8. Roland’s cousin in Boiardo’s Roland in Love (Orlando Innamorato) and Ariosto’s Roland Mad (Orlando Furioso), romantic and comic-epic poems of the Italian Renaissance. Roland (or Orlando) was a military leader under the Frankish king Charlemagne in the 8th century; in legend he became the hero of many popular romances.

cially as he beheld him sallying forth from his castle to rob all those that crossed his path, or when he thought of him overseas stealing the image of Mohammed which, so the story has it, was all of gold. And he would have liked very well to have had his fill of kicking that traitor Galalón,<sup>9</sup> a privilege for which he would have given his housekeeper with his niece thrown into the bargain.

At last, when his wits were gone beyond repair, he came to conceive the strangest idea that ever occurred to any madman in this world. It now appeared to him fitting and necessary, in order to win a greater amount of honor for himself and serve his country at the same time, to become a knight-errant and roam the world on horseback, in a suit of armor; he would go in quest of adventures, by way of putting into practice all that he had read in his books; he would right every manner of wrong, placing himself in situations of the greatest peril such as would redound to the eternal glory of his name. As a reward for his valor and the might of his arm, the poor fellow could already see himself crowned Emperor of Trebizond at the very least; and so, carried away by the strange pleasure that he found in such thoughts as these, he at once set about putting his plan into effect.

The first thing he did was to burnish up some old pieces of armor, left him by his great-grandfather, which for ages had lain in a corner, moldering and forgotten. He polished and adjusted them as best he could, and then he noticed that one very important thing was lacking: there was no closed helmet, but only a morion, or visorless headpiece, with turned-up brim of the kind foot soldiers wore. His ingenuity, however, enabled him to remedy this, and he proceeded to fashion out of cardboard a kind of half-helmet, which, when attached to the morion, gave the appearance of a whole one. True, when he went to see if it was strong enough to withstand a good slashing blow, he was somewhat disappointed; for when he drew his sword and gave it a couple of thrusts, he succeeded only in undoing a whole week's labor. The ease with which he had hewed it to bits disturbed him no little, and he decided to make it over. This time he placed a few strips of iron on the inside, and then, convinced that it was strong enough, refrained from putting it to any further test; instead, he adopted it then and there as the finest helmet ever made.

After this, he went out to have a look at his nag; and although the animal had more cuartos, or cracks, in its hoof than there are quarters in a real,<sup>1</sup> and more blemishes than Gonela's steed which tantum pellis et ossa fuit,<sup>2</sup> it nonetheless looked to its master like a far better horse than Alexander's Bucephalus or the Babieca of the Cid.<sup>3</sup> He spent all of four days in trying to think up a name for his mount; for—so he told himself—seeing that it belonged to so famous and worthy a knight, there was no reason why it should not have a name of equal renown. The kind of name he wanted was one that would at once indicate what the nag had been before it came to belong to a knight-errant and what its present status was; for it stood to reason that, when the master's worldly condition changed, his

9. Ganelón, the villain in the Charlemagne legend who betrayed the French at Roncesvalles.

1. A silver coin worth about $16 in today's US currency. "Cuarto": copper coin worth four maravedies.

2. Was so much skin and bones (Latin, from Plautus, Andalucia 3.6). "Gonela": legendary fool in the 15th-century court of Ferrara.

3. The Chief (Spanish)—that is, Ruy Díaz, celebrated hero of Poema del Cid (12th century). "Bucephalus": the horse of Alexander the Great.

horse also ought to have a famous, high-sounding appellation, one suited to the new order of things and the new profession that it was to follow.

After he in his memory and imagination had made up, struck out, and discarded many names, now adding to and now subtracting from the list, he finally hit upon “Rocinante,” a name that impressed him as being sonorous and at the same time indicative of what the steed had been when it was but a hack,<sup>4</sup> whereas now it was nothing other than the first and foremost of all the hacks in the world.

Having found a name for his horse that pleased his fancy, he then desired to do as much for himself, and this required another week, and by the end of that period he had made up his mind that he was henceforth to be known as Don Quixote, which, as has been stated, has led the authors of this veracious history to assume that his real name must undoubtedly have been Quijada, and not Quesada as others would have it. But remembering that the valiant Amadis was not content to call himself that and nothing more, but added the name of his kingdom and fatherland that he might make it famous also, and thus came to take the name Amadis of Gaul, so our good knight chose to add his place of origin and become “Don Quixote de la Mancha”; for by this means, as he saw it, he was making very plain his lineage and was conferring honor upon his country by taking its name as his own.

And so, having polished up his armor and made the morion over into a closed helmet, and having given himself and his horse a name, he naturally found but one thing lacking still: he must seek out a lady of whom he could become enamored; for a knight-errant without a ladylove was like a tree without leaves or fruit, a body without a soul.

“If,” he said to himself, “as a punishment for my sins or by a stroke of fortune I should come upon some giant hereabouts, a thing that very commonly happens to knights-errant, and if I should slay him in a hand-to-hand encounter or perhaps cut him in two, or, finally, if I should vanquish and subdue him, would it not be well to have someone to whom I may send him as a present, in order that he, if he is living, may come in, fall upon his knees in front of my sweet lady, and say in a humble and submissive tone of voice, ‘I, lady, am the giant Caraculiambro, lord of the island Malindrania, who has been overcome in single combat by that knight who never can be praised enough, Don Quixote de la Mancha, the same who sent me to present myself before your Grace that your Highness may dispose of me as you see fit’?”

Oh, how our good knight reveled in this speech, and more than ever when he came to think of the name that he should give his lady! As the story goes, there was a very good-looking farm girl who lived near by, with whom he had once been smitten, although it is generally believed that she never knew or suspected it. Her name was Aldonza Lorenzo, and it seemed to him that she was the one upon whom he should bestow the title of mistress of his thoughts. For her he wished a name that should not be incongruous with his own and that would convey the suggestion of a princess or a great lady; and, accordingly, he resolved to call her “Dulcinea del Toboso,” she being a native of that place. A musical name to his ears, out of the ordinary and significant, like the others he had chosen for himself and his appurtenances.

4. In Spanish, rocín. The suffix “ante” is comically taken for “antes” (Spanish, before).

CHAPTER II

Which treats of the first sally that the ingenious Don Quixote made from his native heath.

Having, then, made all these preparations, he did not wish to lose any time in putting his plan into effect, for he could not but blame himself for what the world was losing by his delay, so many were the wrongs that were to be righted, the grievances to be redressed, the abuses to be done away with, and the duties to be performed. Accordingly, without informing anyone of his intention and without letting anyone see him, he set out one morning before daybreak on one of those very hot days in July. Donning all his armor, mounting Rocinante, adjusting his ill-contrived helmet, bracing his shield on his arm, and taking up his lance, he sallied forth by the back gate of his stable yard into the open countryside. It was with great contentment and joy that he saw how easily he had made a beginning toward the fulfillment of his desire.

No sooner was he out on the plain, however, than a terrible thought assailed him, one that all but caused him to abandon the enterprise he had undertaken. This occurred when he suddenly remembered that he had never formally been dubbed a knight, and so, in accordance with the law of knighthood, was not permitted to bear arms against one who had a right to that title. And even if he had been, as a novice knight he would have had to wear white armor, without any device on his shield, until he should have earned one by his exploits. These thoughts led him to waver in his purpose, but, madness prevailing over reason, he resolved to have himself knighted by the first person he met, as many others had done if what he had read in those books that he had at home was true. And so far as white armor was concerned, he would scour his own the first chance that offered until it shone whiter than any ermine. With this he became more tranquil and continued on his way, letting his horse take whatever path it chose, for he believed that therein lay the very essence of adventures.

And so we find our newly fledged adventurer jogging along and talking to himself. "Undoubtedly," he is saying, "in the days to come, when the true history of my famous deeds is published, the learned chronicler who records them, when he comes to describe my first sally so early in the morning, will put down something like this: 'No sooner had the rubicund Apollo spread over the face of the broad and spacious earth the gilded filaments of his beauteous locks, and no sooner had the little singing birds of painted plumage greeted with their sweet and mellifluous harmony the coming of the Dawn, who, leaving the soft couch of her jealous spouse, now showed herself to mortals at all the doors and balconies of the horizon that bounds La Mancha—no sooner had this happened than the famous knight, Don Quixote de la Mancha, forsaking his own downy bed and mounting his famous steed, Rocinante, fared forth and began riding over the ancient and famous Campo de Montiel.'"<sup>5</sup>

And this was the truth, for he was indeed riding over that stretch of plain.

"O happy age and happy century," he went on, "in which my famous exploits shall be published, exploits worthy of being engraved in bronze, sculptured in marble, and depicted in paintings for the benefit of posterity. O wise magician,

5. The scene of a battle in 1369.

whoever you be, to whom shall fall the task of chronicling this extraordinary history of mine! I beg of you not to forget my good Rocinante, eternal companion of my wayfarings and my wanderings.”

Then, as though he really had been in love: “O Princess Dulcinea, lady of this captive heart! Much wrong have you done me in thus sending me forth with your reproaches and sternly commanding me not to appear in your beauteous presence. O lady, deign to be mindful of this your subject who endures so many woes for the love of you.”

And so he went on, stringing together absurdities, all of a kind that his books had taught him, imitating insofar as he was able the language of their authors. He rode slowly, and the sun came up so swiftly and with so much heat that it would have been sufficient to melt his brains if he had had any. He had been on the road almost the entire day without anything happening that is worthy of being set down here; and he was on the verge of despair, for he wished to meet someone at once with whom he might try the valor of his good right arm. Certain authors say that his first adventure was that of Puerto Lápice, while others state that it was that of the windmills; but in this particular instance I am in a position to affirm what I have read in the annals of La Mancha; and that is to the effect that he went all that day until nightfall, when he and his hack found themselves tired to death and famished. Gazing all around him to see if he could discover some castle or shepherd's hut where he might take shelter and attend to his pressing needs, he caught sight of an inn not far off the road along which they were traveling, and this to him was like a star guiding him not merely to the gates, but rather, let us say, to the palace of redemption. Quickening his pace, he came up to it just as night was falling.

By chance there stood in the doorway two lasses of the sort known as “of the district”; they were on their way to Seville in the company of some mule drivers who were spending the night in the inn. Now, everything that this adventurer of ours thought, saw, or imagined seemed to him to be directly out of one of the storybooks he had read, and so, when he caught sight of the inn, it at once became a castle with its four turrets and its pinnacles of gleaming silver, not to speak of the drawbridge and moat and all the other things that are commonly supposed to go with a castle. As he rode up to it, he accordingly reined in Rocinante and sat there waiting for a dwarf to appear upon the battlements and blow his trumpet by way of announcing the arrival of a knight. The dwarf, however, was slow in coming, and as Rocinante was anxious to reach the stable, Don Quixote drew up to the door of the hostelry and surveyed the two merry maidens, who to him were a pair of beauteous damsels or gracious ladies taking their ease at the castle gate.

And then a swineherd came along, engaged in rounding up his drove of hogs—for, without any apology, that is what they were. He gave a blast on his horn to bring them together, and this at once became for Don Quixote just what he wished it to be: some dwarf who was heralding his coming; and so it was with a vast deal of satisfaction that he presented himself before the ladies in question, who, upon beholding a man in full armor like this, with lance and buckler, were filled with fright and made as if to flee indoors. Realizing that they were afraid, Don Quixote raised his pasteboard visor and revealed his withered, dust-covered face.

“Do not flee, your Ladyships,” he said to them in a courteous manner and gentle voice. “You need not fear that any wrong will be done you, for it is not in accordance with the order of knighthood which I profess to wrong anyone, much less such highborn damsels as your appearance shows you to be.”

The girls looked at him, endeavoring to scan his face, which was half hidden by his ill-made visor. Never having heard women of their profession called damsels before, they were unable to restrain their laughter, at which Don Quixote took offense.

“Modesty,” he observed, “well becomes those with the dower of beauty, and, moreover, laughter that has not good cause is a very foolish thing. But I do not say this to be discourteous or to hurt your feelings; my only desire is to serve you.”

The ladies did not understand what he was talking about, but felt more than ever like laughing at our knight’s unprepossessing figure. This increased his annoyance, and there is no telling what would have happened if at that moment the innkeeper had not come out. He was very fat and very peaceably inclined; but upon sighting this grotesque personage clad in bits of armor that were quite as oddly matched as were his bridle, lance, buckler, and corselet, mine host was not at all indisposed to join the lasses in their merriment. He was suspicious, however, of all this paraphernalia and decided that it would be better to keep a civil tongue in his head.

“If, Sir Knight,” he said, “your Grace desires a lodging, aside from a bed—for there is none to be had in this inn—you will find all else that you may want in great abundance.”

When Don Quixote saw how humble the governor of the castle was—for he took the innkeeper and his inn to be no less than that—he replied, “For me, Sir Castellan,<sup>6</sup> anything will do, since

*Arms are my only ornament,
My only rest the fight, etc.”*

The landlord thought that the knight had called him a castellan because he took him for one of those worthies of Castile, whereas the truth was, he was an Andalusian from the beach of Sanlúcar, no less a thief than Cacus<sup>7</sup> himself, and as full of tricks as a student or a page boy.

“In that case,” he said,

*“Your bed will be the solid rock,
Your sleep: to watch all night.*

This being so, you may be assured of finding beneath this roof enough to keep you awake for a whole year, to say nothing of a single night.”

With this, he went up to hold the stirrup for Don Quixote, who encountered much difficulty in dismounting, not having broken his fast all day long. The knight then directed his host to take good care of the steed, as it was the best piece of horseflesh in all the world. The innkeeper looked it over, and it did not impress him as being half as good as Don Quixote had said it was. Having stabled the animal, he came back to see what his guest would have and found the latter

6. The Spanish castellano means both “castellan” and “Castilian” (i.e., a native of Castile, or, more generally, of Spain).

7. In Roman mythology, Cacus stole some of Hercules’ cattle, concealing the theft by having them walk backward into his cave; he was finally discovered and slain.

being relieved of his armor by the damsels, who by now had made their peace with the new arrival. They had already removed his breastplate and backpiece but had no idea how they were going to open his gorget or get his improvised helmet off. That piece of armor had been tied on with green ribbons which it would be necessary to cut, since the knots could not be undone, but he would not hear of this, and so spent all the rest of that night with his headpiece in place, which gave him the weirdest, most laughable appearance that could be imagined.

Don Quixote fancied that these wenches who were assisting him must surely be the chatelaine and other ladies of the castle, and so proceeded to address them very gracefully and with much wit:

*"Never was knight so served
By any noble dame
As was Don Quixote
When from his village he came,
With damsels to wait on his every need While princesses cared for his hack . . ."*

"By hack," he explained, "is meant my steed Rocinante, for that is his name, and mine is Don Quixote de la Mancha. I had no intention of revealing my identity until my exploits done in your service should have made me known to you; but the necessity of adapting to present circumstances that old ballad of Lancelot has led to your becoming acquainted with it prematurely. However, the time will come when your Ladyships shall command and I will obey and with the valor of my good right arm show you how eager I am to serve you."

The young women were not used to listening to speeches like this and had not a word to say, but merely asked him if he desired to eat anything.

"I could eat a bite of something, yes," replied Don Quixote. "Indeed, I feel that a little food would go very nicely just now."

He thereupon learned that, since it was Friday, there was nothing to be had in all the inn except a few portions of codfish, which in Castile is called abadejo, in Andalusia bacalao, in some places curadillo, and elsewhere truchuella or small trout. Would his Grace, then, have some small trout, seeing that was all there was that they could offer him?

"If there are enough of them," said Don Quixote, "they will take the place of a trout, for it is all one to me whether I am given in change eight reales or one piece of eight. What is more, those small trout may be like veal, which is better than beef, or like kid, which is better than goat. But however that may be, bring them on at once, for the weight and burden of arms is not to be borne without inner sustenance."

Placing the table at the door of the hostelry, in the open air, they brought the guest a portion of badly soaked and worse cooked codfish and a piece of bread as black and moldy as the suit of armor that he wore. It was a mirth-provoking sight to see him eat, for he still had his helmet on with his visor fastened, which made it impossible for him to put anything into his mouth with his hands, and so it was necessary for one of the girls to feed him. As for giving him anything to drink, that would have been out of the question if the inn-keeper had not hollowed out a reed, placing one end in Don Quixote's mouth while through the other end he poured the wine. All this the knight bore very patiently rather than have them cut the ribbons of his helmet.

At this point a gelder of pigs approached the inn, announcing his arrival with four or five blasts on his horn, all of which confirmed Don Quixote in the belief that this was indeed a famous castle, for what was this if not music that they were playing for him? The fish was trout, the bread was of the finest, the wenches were ladies, and the innkeeper was the castellan. He was convinced that he had been right in his resolve to sally forth and roam the world at large, but there was one thing that still distressed him greatly, and that was the fact that he had not as yet been dubbed a knight; as he saw it, he could not legitimately engage in any adventure until he had received the order of knighthood.

CHAPTER III

Of the amusing manner in which Don Quixote had himself dubbed a knight.

Wearied of his thoughts, Don Quixote lost no time over the scanty repast which the inn afforded him. When he had finished, he summoned the landlord and, taking him out to the stable, closed the doors and fell on his knees in front of him.

"Never, valiant knight," he said, "shall I arise from here until you have courteously granted me the boon I seek, one which will redound to your praise and to the good of the human race."

Seeing his guest at his feet and hearing him utter such words as these, the innkeeper could only stare at him in bewilderment, not knowing what to say or do. It was in vain that he entreated him to rise, for Don Quixote refused to do so until his request had been granted.

"I expected nothing less of your great magnificence, my lord," the latter then continued, "and so I may tell you that the boon I asked and which you have so generously conceded me is that tomorrow morning you dub me a knight. Until that time, in the chapel of this your castle, I will watch over my armor, and when morning comes, as I have said, that which I so desire shall then be done, in order that I may lawfully go to the four corners of the earth in quest of adventures and to succor the needy, which is the chivalrous duty of all knights-errant such as I who long to engage in deeds of high emprise."

The innkeeper, as we have said, was a sharp fellow. He already had a suspicion that his guest was not quite right in the head, and he was now convinced of it as he listened to such remarks as these. However, just for the sport of it, he determined to humor him; and so he went on to assure Don Quixote that he was fully justified in his request and that such a desire and purpose was only natural on the part of so distinguished a knight as his gallant bearing plainly showed him to be.

He himself, the landlord added, when he was a young man, had followed the same honorable calling. He had gone through various parts of the world seeking adventures, among the places he had visited being the Percheles of Málaga, the Isles of Riarán, the District of Seville, the Little Market Place of Segovia, the Olivera of Valencia, the Rondilla of Granada, the beach of Sanlúcar, the Horse Fountain of Cordova, the Small Taverns of Toledo,<sup>8</sup> and numerous other localities where his nimble feet and light fingers had found much exercise. He had done many wrongs, cheated many widows, ruined many maidens, and swindled not a few minors until he had finally come to be known in almost all the courts and tribunals that are to be found in the whole of Spain.

8. All reputed to be haunts of robbers and rogues.

At last he had retired to his castle here, where he lived upon his own income and the property of others; and here it was that he received all knights-errant of whatever quality and condition, simply out of the great affection that he bore them and that they might share with him their possessions in payment of his good will. Unfortunately, in this castle there was no chapel where Don Quixote might keep watch over his arms, for the old chapel had been torn down to make way for a new one; but in case of necessity, he felt quite sure that such a vigil could be maintained anywhere, and for the present occasion the courtyard of the castle would do; and then in the morning, please God, the requisite ceremony could be performed and his guest be duly dubbed a knight, as much a knight as anyone ever was.

He then inquired if Don Quixote had any money on his person, and the latter replied that he had not a cent, for in all the storybooks he had never read of knights-errant carrying any. But the innkeeper told him he was mistaken on this point: supposing the authors of those stories had not set down the fact in black and white, that was because they did not deem it necessary to speak of things as indispensable as money and a clean shirt, and one was not to assume for that reason that those knights-errant of whom the books were so full did not have any. He looked upon it as an absolute certainty that they all had well-stuffed purses, that they might be prepared for any emergency; and they also carried shirts and a little box of ointment for healing the wounds that they received.

For when they had been wounded in combat on the plains and in desert places, there was not always someone at hand to treat them, unless they had some skilled enchanter for a friend who then would succor them, bringing to them through the air, upon a cloud, some damsel or dwarf bearing a vial of water of such virtue that one had but to taste a drop of it and at once his wounds were healed and he was as sound as if he had never received any.

But even if this was not the case, knights in times past saw to it that their squires were well provided with money and other necessities, such as lint and ointment for healing purposes; and if they had no squires—which happened very rarely—they themselves carried these objects in a pair of saddlebags very cleverly attached to their horses' croups in such a manner as to be scarcely noticeable, as if they held something of greater importance than that, for among the knights-errant saddlebags as a rule were not favored. Accordingly, he would advise the novice before him, and inasmuch as the latter was soon to be his godson, he might even command him, that henceforth he should not go without money and a supply of those things that have been mentioned, as he would find that they came in useful at a time when he least expected it.

Don Quixote promised to follow his host's advice punctiliously; and so it was arranged that he should watch his armor in a large barnyard at one side of the inn. He gathered up all the pieces, placed them in a horse trough that stood near the well, and, bracing his shield on his arm, took up his lance and with stately demeanor began pacing up and down in front of the trough even as night was closing in.

The innkeeper informed his other guests of what was going on, of Don Quixote's vigil and his expectation of being dubbed a knight; and, marveling greatly at so extraordinary a variety of madness, they all went out to see for themselves and stood there watching from a distance. For a while the knight-to-be, with tranquil mien, would merely walk up and down; then, leaning on his lance, he would pause to survey his armor, gazing fixedly at it for a considerable length of time. As has been said, it was night now, but the brightness of the moon, which well might rival that of Him who lent it, was such that everything the novice knight did was plainly visible to all.

At this point one of the mule drivers who were stopping at the inn came out to water his drove, and in order to do this it was necessary to remove the armor from the trough.

As he saw the man approaching, Don Quixote cried out to him, "O bold knight, whoever you may be, who thus would dare to lay hands upon the accouterments of the most valiant man of arms that ever girded on a sword, look well what you do and desist if you do not wish to pay with your life for your insolence!"

The muleteer gave no heed to these words—it would have been better for his own sake had he done so—but, taking it up by the straps, tossed the armor some distance from him. When he beheld this, Don Quixote rolled his eyes heavenward and with his thoughts apparently upon his Dulcinea exclaimed, "Succor, O lady mine, this vassal heart in this my first encounter; let not your favor and protection fail me in the peril in which for the first time I now find myself."

With these and other similar words, he loosed his buckler, grasped his lance in both his hands, and let the mule driver have such a blow on the head that the man fell to the ground stunned; and had it been followed by another one, he would have had no need of a surgeon to treat him. Having done this, Don Quixote gathered up his armor and resumed his pacing up and down with the same calm manner as before. Not long afterward, without knowing what had happened—for the first muleteer was still lying there unconscious—another came out with the same intention of watering his mules, and he too was about to remove the armor from the trough when the knight, without saying a word or asking favor of anyone, once more adjusted his buckler and raised his lance, and if he did not break the second mule driver's head to bits, he made more than three pieces of it by dividing it into quarters. At the sound of the fracas everybody in the inn came running out, among them the innkeeper; whereupon Don Quixote again lifted his buckler and laid his hand on his sword.

"O lady of beauty," he said, "strength and vigor of this fainting heart of mine! Now is the time to turn the eyes of your greatness upon this captive knight of yours who must face so formidable an adventure."

By this time he had worked himself up to such a pitch of anger that if all the mule drivers in the world had attacked him he would not have taken one step backward. The comrades of the wounded men, seeing the plight those two were in, now began showering stones on Don Quixote, who shielded himself as best he could with his buckler, although he did not dare stir from the trough for fear of leaving his armor unprotected. The landlord, meanwhile, kept calling to them to stop, for he had told them that this was a madman who would be sure to go free even though he killed them all. The knight was shouting louder than ever, calling them knaves and traitors. As for the lord of the castle, who allowed knights-errant to be treated in this fashion, he was a lowborn villain, and if he, Don Quixote, had but received the order of knighthood, he would make him pay for his treachery.

"As for you others, vile and filthy rabble, I take no account of you; you may stone me or come forward and attack me all you like; you shall see what the reward of your folly and insolence will be."

He spoke so vigorously and was so undaunted in bearing as to strike terror in those who would assail him; and for this reason, and owing also to the persuasions of the innkeeper, they ceased stoning him. He then permitted them to carry away the wounded, and went back to watching his armor with the same tranquil, unconcerned air that he had previously displayed.

The landlord was none too well pleased with these mad pranks on the part of his guest and determined to confer upon him that accursed order of knighthood before something else happened. Going up to him, he begged Don Quixote's pardon for the insolence which, without his knowledge, had been shown the knight by those of low degree. They, however, had been well punished for their impudence. As he had said, there was no chapel in this castle, but for that which remained to be done there was no need of any. According to what he had read of the ceremonial of the order, there was nothing to this business of being dubbed a knight except a slap on the neck and one across the shoulder, and that could be performed in the middle of a field as well as anywhere else. All that was required was for the knight-to-be to keep watch over his armor for a couple of hours, and Don Quixote had been at it more than four. The latter believed all this and announced that he was ready to obey and get the matter over with as speedily as possible. Once dubbed a knight, if he were attacked one more time, he did not think that he would leave a single person in the castle alive, save such as he might command be spared, at the bidding of his host and out of respect to him.

Thus warned, and fearful that it might occur, the castellan brought out the book in which he had jotted down the hay and barley for which the mule drivers owed him, and, accompanied by a lad bearing the butt of a candle and the two aforesaid damsels, he came up to where Don Quixote stood and commanded him to kneel. Reading from the account book—as if he had been saying a prayer—he raised his hand and, with the knight's own sword, gave him a good thwack upon the neck and another lusty one upon the shoulder, muttering all the while between his teeth. He then directed one of the ladies to gird on Don Quixote's sword, which she did with much gravity and composure; for it was all they could do to keep from laughing at every point of the ceremony, but the thought of the knight's prowess which they had already witnessed was sufficient to restrain their mirth.

"May God give your Grace much good fortune," said the worthy lady as she attached the blade, "and prosper you in battle."

Don Quixote thereupon inquired her name, for he desired to know to whom it was he was indebted for the favor he had just received, that he might share with her some of the honor which his strong right arm was sure to bring him. She replied very humbly that her name was Tolosa and that she was the daughter of a shoemaker, a native of Toledo who lived in the stalls of Sancho Bienaya.<sup>9</sup> To this the knight replied that she would do him a very great favor if from then on she would call herself Doña Tolosa, and she promised to do so. The other girl then helped him on with his spurs, and practically the same conversation was repeated. When asked her name, she stated that it was La Molinera and added that she was the daughter of a respectable miller of Antequera. Don Quixote likewise requested her to assume the “don” and become Doña Molinera and offered to render her further services and favors.

9. An old square in Toledo.

These unheard-of ceremonies having been dispatched in great haste, Don Quixote could scarcely wait to be astride his horse and sally forth on his quest for adventures. Saddling and mounting Rocinante, he embraced his host, thanking him for the favor of having dubbed him a knight and saying such strange things that it would be quite impossible to record them here. The innkeeper, who was only too glad to be rid of him, answered with a speech that was no less flowery, though somewhat shorter, and he did not so much as ask him for the price of a lodging, so glad was he to see him go.

CHAPTER IV

Of what happened to our knight when he sallied forth from the inn.

Day was dawning when Don Quixote left the inn, so well satisfied with himself, so gay, so exhilarated, that the very girths of his steed all but burst with joy. But remembering the advice which his host had given him concerning the stock of necessary provisions that he should carry with him, especially money and shirts, he decided to turn back home and supply himself with whatever he needed, and with a squire as well; he had in mind a farmer who was a neighbor of his, a poor man and the father of a family but very well suited to fulfill the duties of squire to a man of arms. With this thought in mind he guided Rocinante toward the village once more, and that animal, realizing that he was homeward bound, began stepping out at so lively a gait that it seemed as if his feet barely touched the ground.

The knight had not gone far when from a hedge on his right hand he heard the sound of faint moans as of someone in distress.

“Thanks be to Heaven,” he at once exclaimed, “for the favor it has shown me by providing me so soon with an opportunity to fulfill the obligations that I owe to my profession, a chance to pluck the fruit of my worthy desires. Those, undoubtedly, are the cries of someone in distress, who stands in need of my favor and assistance.”

Turning Rocinante’s head, he rode back to the place from which the cries appeared to be coming. Entering the wood, he had gone but a few paces when he saw a mare attached to an oak, while bound to another tree was a lad of fifteen or thereabouts, naked from the waist up. It was he who was uttering the cries, and not without reason, for there in front of him was a lusty farmer with a girdle who was giving him many lashes, each one accompanied by a reproof and a command, “Hold your tongue and keep your eyes open”; and the lad was saying, “I won’t do it again, sir; by God’s Passion, I won’t do it again. I promise you that after this I’ll take better care of the flock.”

When he saw what was going on, Don Quixote was very angry. “Discourteous knight,” he said, “it ill becomes you to strike one who is powerless to defend himself. Mount your steed and take your lance in hand”—for there was a lance leaning against the oak to which the mare was tied—“and I will show you what a coward you are.”

The farmer, seeing before him this figure all clad in armor and brandishing a lance, decided that he was as good as done for. “Sir Knight,” he said, speaking very mildly, “this lad that I am punishing here is my servant; he tends a flock of sheep which I have in these parts and he is so careless that every day one of them shows up missing. And when I punish him for his carelessness or his roguery, he says it is just because I am a miser and do not want to pay him the wages that I owe him, but I swear to God and upon my soul that he lies.”

“It is you who lie, base lout,” said Don Quixote, “and in my presence; and by the sun that gives us light, I am minded to run you through with this lance. Pay him and say no more about it, or else, by the God who rules us, I will make an end of you and annihilate you here and now. Release him at once.”

The farmer hung his head and without a word untied his servant. Don Quixote then asked the boy how much his master owed him. For nine months’ work, the lad told him, at seven reales the month. The knight did a little reckoning and found that this came to sixty-three reales; whereupon he ordered the farmer to pay over the money immediately, as he valued his life. The cowardly bumpkin replied that, facing death as he was and by the oath that he had sworn—he had not sworn any oath as yet—it did not amount to as much as that; for there were three pairs of shoes which he had given the lad that were to be deducted and taken into account, and a real for two blood-lettings when his servant was ill.

“That,” said Don Quixote, “is all very well; but let the shoes and the blood-lettings go for the undeserved lashes which you have given him; if he has worn out the leather of the shoes that you paid for, you have taken the hide off his body, and if the barber let a little blood for him when he was sick,<sup>1</sup> you have done the same when he was well; and so far as that goes, he owes you nothing.”

“But the trouble is, Sir Knight, that I have no money with me. Come along home with me, Andrés, and I will pay you real for real.”

“I go home with him!” cried the lad. “Never in the world! No, sir, I would not even think of it; for once he has me alone he’ll flay me like a St. Bartholomew.”

“He will do nothing of the sort,” said Don Quixote. “It is sufficient for me to command, and he out of respect will obey. Since he has sworn to me by the order of knighthood which he has received, I shall let him go free and I will guarantee that you will be paid.”

“But look, your Grace,” the lad remonstrated, “my master is no knight; he has never received any order of knighthood whatsoever. He is Juan Haldudo, a rich man and a resident of Quintanar.”

“That makes little difference,” declared Don Quixote, “for there may well be knights among the Haldudos, all the more so in view of the fact that every man is the son of his works.”

“That is true enough,” said Andrés, “but this master of mine—of what works is he the son, seeing that he refuses me the pay for my sweat and labor?”

“I do not refuse you, brother Andrés,” said the farmer. “Do me the favor of coming with me, and I swear to you by all the orders of knighthood that there are in this world to pay you, as I have said, real for real, and perfumed at that.”

1. Barbers were also surgeons.

"You can dispense with the perfume," said Don Quixote; "just give him the reales and I shall be satisfied. And see to it that you keep your oath, or by the one that I myself have sworn I shall return to seek you out and chastise you, and I shall find you though you be as well hidden as a lizard. In case you would like to know who it is that is giving you this command in order that you may feel the more obliged to comply with it, I may tell you that I am the valorous Don Quixote de la Mancha, righter of wrongs and injustices; and so, God be with you, and do not fail to do as you have promised, under that penalty that I have pronounced."

As he said this, he put spurs to Rocinante and was off. The farmer watched him go, and when he saw that Don Quixote was out of the wood and out of sight, he turned to his servant, Andrés.

"Come here, my son," he said. "I want to pay you what I owe you as that righter of wrongs has commanded me."

"Take my word for it," replied Andrés, "your Grace would do well to observe the command of that good knight—may he live a thousand years; for as he is valorous and a righteous judge, if you don't pay me then, by Roque,<sup>2</sup> he will come back and do just what he said!"

"And I will give you my word as well," said the farmer; "but seeing that I am so fond of you, I wish to increase the debt, that I may owe you all the more." And with this he seized the lad's arm and bound him to the tree again and flogged him within an inch of his life. "There, Master Andrés, you may call on that righter of wrongs if you like and you will see whether or not he rights this one. I do not think I have quite finished with you yet, for I have a good mind to flay you alive as you feared."

Finally, however, he unbound him and told him he might go look for that judge of his to carry out the sentence that had been pronounced. Andrés left, rather down in the mouth, swearing that he would indeed go look for the brave Don Quixote de la Mancha; he would relate to him everything that had happened, point by point, and the farmer would have to pay for it seven times over. But for all that, he went away weeping, and his master stood laughing at him.

Such was the manner in which the valorous knight righted this particular wrong. Don Quixote was quite content with the way everything had turned out; it seemed to him that he had made a very fortunate and noble beginning with his deeds of chivalry, and he was very well satisfied with himself as he jogged along in the direction of his native village, talking to himself in a low voice all the while.

"Well may'st thou call thyself fortunate today, above all other women on earth, O fairest of the fair, Dulcinea del Toboso! Seeing that it has fallen to thy lot to hold subject and submissive to thine every wish and pleasure so valiant and renowned a knight as Don Quixote de la Mancha is and shall be, who, as everyone knows, yesterday received the order of knighthood and this day has righted the greatest wrong and grievance that injustice ever conceived or cruelty ever perpetrated, by snatching the lash from the hand of the merciless foeman who was so unreasonably flogging that tender child."

At this point he came to a road that forked off in four directions, and at once he thought of those crossroads where knights-errant would pause to consider which path they should take. By way of imitating them, he halted there for a while; and when he had given the subject much thought, he slackened Rocinante's rein and let the hack follow its inclination. The animal's first impulse was to make straight for its own stable. After they had gone a couple of miles or so Don Quixote caught sight of what appeared to be a great throng of people, who, as was afterward learned, were certain merchants of Toledo on their way to purchase silk at Murcia. There were six of them altogether with their sunshades, accompanied by four attendants on horseback and three mule drivers on foot.

2. The origin of this oath is unknown.

No sooner had he sighted them than Don Quixote imagined that he was on the brink of some fresh adventure. He was eager to imitate those passages at arms of which he had read in his books, and here, so it seemed to him, was one made to order. And so, with bold and knightly bearing, he settled himself firmly in the stirrups, couched his lance, covered himself with his shield, and took up a position in the middle of the road, where he paused to wait for those other knights-errant (for such he took them to be) to come up to him. When they were near enough to see and hear plainly, Don Quixote raised his voice and made a haughty gesture.

"Let everyone," he cried, "stand where he is, unless everyone will confess that there is not in all the world a more beauteous damsel than the Empress of La Mancha, the peerless Dulcinea del Toboso."

Upon hearing these words and beholding the weird figure who uttered them, the merchants stopped short. From the knight's appearance and his speech they knew at once that they had to deal with a madman; but they were curious to know what was meant by that confession that was demanded of them, and one of their number who was somewhat of a jester and a very clever fellow raised his voice.

"Sir Knight," he said, "we do not know who this beauteous lady is of whom you speak. Show her to us, and if she is as beautiful as you say, then we will right willingly and without any compulsion confess the truth as you have asked of us."

"If I were to show her to you," replied Don Quixote, "what merit would there be in your confessing a truth so self-evident? The important thing is for you, without seeing her, to believe, confess, affirm, swear, and defend that truth. Otherwise, monstrous and arrogant creatures that you are, you shall do battle with me. Come on, then, one by one, as the order of knighthood prescribes; or all of you together, if you will have it so, as is the sorry custom with those of your breed. Come on, and I will await you here, for I am confident that my cause is just."

"Sir Knight," responded the merchant, "I beg your Grace, in the name of all the princes here present, in order that we may not have upon our consciences the burden of confessing a thing which we have never seen nor heard, and one, moreover, so prejudicial to the empresses and queens of Alcarria and Estremadura,<sup>3</sup> that your Grace will show us some portrait of this lady, even though it be no larger than a grain of wheat, for by the thread one comes to the ball of yarn; and with this we shall remain satisfied and assured, and your Grace will likewise be content and satisfied. The truth is, I believe that we are already so much of your way of thinking that though it should show her to be blind of one eye and distilling vermilion and brimstone from the other, nevertheless, to please your Grace, we would say in her behalf all that you desire."

"She distills nothing of the sort, infamous rabble!" shouted Don Quixote, for his wrath was kindling now. "I tell you, she does not distill what you say at all,

3. Ironic, because both were known as particularly backward regions.

but amber and civet<sup>4</sup> wrapped in cotton; and she is neither one-eyed nor hunch-backed but straighter than a spindle that comes from Guadarrama. You shall pay for the great blasphemy which you have uttered against such a beauty as is my lady!"

Saying this, he came on with lowered lance against the one who had spoken, charging with such wrath and fury that if fortune had not caused Rocinante to stumble and fall in mid-career, things would have gone badly with the merchant and he would have paid for his insolent gibe. As it was, Don Quixote went rolling over the plain for some little distance, and when he tried to get to his feet, found that he was unable to do so, being too encumbered with his lance, shield, spurs, helmet, and the weight of that ancient suit of armor.

"Do not flee, cowardly ones," he cried even as he struggled to rise. "Stay, cravens, for it is not my fault but that of my steed that I am stretched out here."

One of the muleteers, who must have been an ill-natured lad, upon hearing the poor fallen knight speak so arrogantly, could not refrain from giving him an answer in the ribs. Going up to him, he took the knight's lance and broke it into bits, and then with a companion proceeded to belabor him so mercilessly that in spite of his armor they milled him like a hopper<sup>5</sup> of wheat. The merchants called to them not to lay on so hard, saying that was enough and they should desist, but the mule driver by this time had warmed up to the sport and would not stop until he had vented his wrath, and, snatching up the broken pieces of the lance, he began hurling them at the wretched victim as he lay there on the ground. And through all this tempest of sticks that rained upon him Don Quixote never once closed his mouth nor ceased threatening Heaven and earth and these ruffians, for such he took them to be, who were thus mishandling him.

Finally the lad grew tired, and the merchants went their way with a good story to tell about the poor fellow who had had such a cudgeling. Finding himself alone, the knight endeavored to see if he could rise; but if this was a feat that he could not accomplish when he was sound and whole, how was he to achieve it when he had been thrashed and pounded to a pulp? Yet nonetheless he considered himself fortunate; for as he saw it, misfortunes such as this were common to knights-errant, and he put all the blame upon his horse; and if he was unable to rise, that was because his body was so bruised and battered all over.

CHAPTER V

In which is continued the narrative of the misfortune that befell our knight.

Seeing, then, that he was indeed unable to stir, he decided to fall back upon a favorite remedy of his, which was to think of some passage or other in his books; and as it happened, the one that he in his madness now recalled was the story of Baldwin and the Marquis of Mantua, when Carloto left the former wounded upon the mountainside,<sup>6</sup> a tale that is known to children, not unknown to young men, celebrated and believed in by the old, and, for all of that, not any truer than the miracles of Mohammed. Moreover, it impressed

4. A musky substance used in perfume, imported from Africa in cotton packings.

5. Funnel-shaped container for grain.

6. The allusion is to an old ballad about Charlemagne's son Charlot (Carloto) wounding Baldwin, nephew of the Marquis of Mantua.

him as being especially suited to the straits in which he found himself; and, accordingly, with a great show of feeling, he began rolling and tossing on the ground as he feebly gasped out the lines which the wounded knight of the wood is supposed to have uttered:

*"Where art thou, lady mine,
That thou dost not grieve for my woe?
Either thou art disloyal,
Or my grief thou dost not know."*

He went on reciting the old ballad until he came to the following verses:

"O noble Marquis of Mantua, My uncle and liege lord true!"

He had reached this point when down the road came a farmer of the same village, a neighbor of his, who had been to the mill with a load of wheat. Seeing a man lying there stretched out like that, he went up to him and inquired who he was and what was the trouble that caused him to utter such mournful complaints. Thinking that this must undoubtedly be his uncle, the Marquis of Mantua, Don Quixote did not answer but went on with his recitation of the ballad, giving an account of the Marquis' misfortunes and the amours of his wife and the emperor's son, exactly as the ballad has it.

The farmer was astounded at hearing all these absurdities, and after removing the knight's visor which had been battered to pieces by the blows it had received, the good man bathed the victim's face, only to discover, once the dust was off, that he knew him very well.

"Señor Quijana," he said (for such must have been Don Quixote's real name when he was in his right senses and before he had given up the life of a quiet country gentleman to become a knight-errant), "who is responsible for your Grace's being in such a plight as this?"

But the knight merely went on with his ballad in response to all the questions asked of him. Perceiving that it was impossible to obtain any information from him, the farmer as best he could relieved him of his breastplate and backpiece to see if he had any wounds, but there was no blood and no mark of any sort. He then tried to lift him from the ground, and with a great deal of effort finally managed to get him astride the ass, which appeared to be the easier mount for him. Gathering up the armor, including even the splinters from the lance, he made a bundle and tied it on Rocinante's back, and, taking the horse by the reins and the ass by the halter, he started out for the village. He was worried in his mind at hearing all the foolish things that Don Quixote said, and that individual himself was far from being at ease. Unable by reason of his bruises and his soreness to sit upright on the donkey, our knight-errant kept sighing to Heaven, which led the farmer to ask him once more what it was that ailed him.

It must have been the devil himself who caused him to remember those tales that seemed to fit his own case; for at this point he forgot all about Baldwin and recalled Abindarráez, and how the governor of Antequera, Rodrigo de Narváez, had taken him prisoner and carried him off captive to his castle. Accordingly, when the countryman turned to inquire how he was and what was troubling him, Don Quixote replied with the very same words and phrases that the captive Abindarráez used in answering Rodrigo, just as he had read in the story Diana of Jorge de Montemayor,<sup>7</sup> where it is all written down, applying them very aptly to the present circumstances as the farmer went along cursing his luck for having to listen to such a lot of nonsense. Realizing that his neighbor was quite mad, he made haste to reach the village that he might not have to be annoyed any longer by Don Quixote's tiresome harangue.

"Señor Don Rodrigo de Narváez," the knight was saying, "I may inform your Grace that this beautiful Jarifa of whom I speak is not the lovely Dulcinea del Toboso, in whose behalf I have done, am doing, and shall do the most famous deeds of chivalry that ever have been or will be seen in all the world."

"But, sir," replied the farmer, "sinner that I am, cannot your Grace see that I am not Don Rodrigo de Narváez nor the Marquis of Mantua, but Pedro Alonso, your neighbor? And your Grace is neither Baldwin nor Abindarráez but a respectable gentleman by the name of Señor Quijana."

"I know who I am," said Don Quixote, "and who I may be, if I choose: not only those I have mentioned but all the Twelve Peers of France and the Nine Worthies<sup>8</sup> as well; for the exploits of all of them together, or separately, cannot compare with mine."

With such talk as this they reached their destination just as night was falling; but the farmer decided to wait until it was a little darker in order that the badly battered gentleman might not be seen arriving in such a condition and mounted on an ass. When he thought the proper time had come, they entered the village and proceeded to Don Quixote's house, where they found everything in confusion. The curate and the barber were there, for they were great friends of the knight, and the housekeeper was speaking to them.

"Señor Licentiate Pero Pérez," she was saying, for that was the manner in which she addressed the curate, "what does your Grace think could have happened to my master? Three days now, and not a word of him, nor the hack, nor the buckler, nor the lance, nor the suit of armor. Ah, poor me! I am as certain as I am that I was born to die that it is those cursed books of chivalry he is always reading that have turned his head; for now that I recall, I have often heard him muttering to himself that he must become a knight-errant and go through the world in search of adventures. May such books as those be consigned to Satan and Barabbas,<sup>9</sup> for they have sent to perdition the finest mind in all La Mancha."

The niece was of the same opinion. "I may tell you, Señor Master Nicholas," she said, for that was the barber's name, "that many times my uncle would sit reading those impious tales of misadventure for two whole days and nights at a stretch; and when he was through, he would toss the book aside, lay his hand on his sword, and begin slashing at the walls. When he was completely exhausted, he would tell us that he had just killed four giants as big as castle towers, while the sweat that poured off him was blood from the wounds that he

7. The reference is to The Abencerraje, the tale of the love of Abindarráez, a captive Moor, for the beautiful Jarifa.

8. In a tradition originating in France, the Nine Worthies consisted of three biblical, three classical, and three Christian figures (David, Hector, Alexander, Charlemagne, and so on). In French medieval epics, the Twelve Peers (Roland, Oliver, and so on) were warriors all equal in rank, forming a kind of guard of honor around Charlemagne.

9. The thief whose release, rather than that of Jesus, the crowd requested when Pilate, conforming to Passover custom, was ready to have one prisoner set free.

had received in battle. He would then drink a big jug of cold water, after which he would be very calm and peaceful, saying that the water was the most precious liquid which the wise Esquife, a great magician and his friend, had brought to him. But I blame myself for everything. I should have advised your Worships of my uncle's nonsensical actions so that you could have done something about it by burning those damnable books of his before things came to such a pass; for he has many that ought to be burned as if they were heretics."

"I agree with you," said the curate, "and before tomorrow's sun has set there shall be a public auto de fe,<sup>1</sup> and those works shall be condemned to the flames that they may not lead some other who reads them to follow the example of my good friend."

Don Quixote and the farmer overheard all this, and it was then that the latter came to understand the nature of his neighbor's affliction.

"Open the door, your Worships," the good man cried. "Open for Sir Baldwin and the Marquis of Mantua, who comes badly wounded, and for Señor Abindarráz the Moor whom the valiant Rodrigo de Narváez, governor of Antequera, brings captive."

At the sound of his voice they all ran out, recognizing at once friend, master, and uncle, who as yet was unable to get down off the donkey's back. They all ran up to embrace him.

"Wait, all of you," said Don Quixote, "for I am sorely wounded through fault of my steed. Bear me to my couch and summon, if it be possible, the wise Urganda to treat and care for my wounds."

"There!" exclaimed the housekeeper. "Plague take it! Did not my heart tell me right as to which foot my master limped on? To bed with your Grace at once, and we will take care of you without sending for that Urganda of yours. A curse, I say, and a hundred other curses, on those books of chivalry that have brought your Grace to this."

And so they carried him off to bed, but when they went to look for his wounds, they found none at all. He told them it was all the result of a great fall he had taken with Rocinante, his horse, while engaged in combating ten giants, the hugest and most insolent that were ever heard of in all the world.

"Tut, tut," said the curate. "So there are giants in the dance now, are there? Then, by the sign of the cross, I'll have them burned before nightfall tomorrow."

They had a thousand questions to put to Don Quixote, but his only answer was that they should give him something to eat and let him sleep, for that was the most important thing of all; so they humored him in this. The curate then interrogated the farmer at great length concerning the conversation he had had with his neighbor. The peasant told him everything, all the absurd things their friend had said when he found him lying there and afterward on the way home, all of which made the licentiate more anxious than ever to do what he did the following day,<sup>2</sup> when he summoned Master Nicholas and went with him to Don Quixote's house.

1. Literally, "act of faith" (Portuguese); the act of publicly burning a heretic at the stake by the Spanish Inquisition.

2. He and the barber burned most of Don Quixote's library.

[Fighting the Windmills and a Cholerick Biscayan]

From CHAPTER VII

*Of the second sally of our good knight,
Don Quixote de la Mancha.*

* * *

After that he remained at home very tranquilly for a couple of weeks, without giving sign of any desire to repeat his former madness. During that time he had the most pleasant conversations with his two old friends, the curate and the barber, on the point he had raised to the effect that what the world needed most was knights-errant and a revival of chivalry. The curate would occasionally contradict him and again would give in, for it was only by means of this artifice that he could carry on a conversation with him at all.

In the meanwhile Don Quixote was bringing his powers of persuasion to bear upon a farmer who lived near by, a good man—if this title may be applied to one who is poor—but with very few wits in his head. The short of it is, by pleas and promises, he got the hapless rustic to agree to ride forth with him and serve him as his squire. Among other things, Don Quixote told him that he ought to be more than willing to go, because no telling what adventure might occur which would win them an island, and then he (the farmer) would be left to be the governor of it. As a result of these and other similar assurances, Sancho Panza forsook his wife and children and consented to take upon himself the duties of squire to his neighbor.

Next, Don Quixote set out to raise some money, and by selling this thing and pawning that and getting the worst of the bargain always, he finally scraped together a reasonable amount. He also asked a friend of his for the loan of a buckler and patched up his broken helmet as well as he could. He advised his squire, Sancho, of the day and hour when they were to take the road and told him to see to laying in a supply of those things that were most necessary, and, above all, not to forget the saddlebags. Sancho replied that he would see to all this and added that he was also thinking of taking along with him a very good ass that he had, as he was not much used to going on foot.

With regard to the ass, Don Quixote had to do a little thinking, trying to recall if any knight-errant had ever had a squire thus asininely mounted. He could not think of any, but nevertheless he decided to take Sancho with the intention of providing him with a nobler steed as soon as occasion offered; he had but to appropriate the horse of the first discourteous knight he met. Having furnished himself with shirts and all the other things that the innkeeper had recommended, he and Panza rode forth one night unseen by anyone and without taking leave of wife and children, housekeeper or niece. They went so far that by the time morning came they were safe from discovery had a hunt been started for them.

Mounted on his ass, Sancho Panza rode along like a patriarch, with saddlebags and flask, his mind set upon becoming governor of that island that his master had promised him. Don Quixote determined to take the same route and road over the Campo de Montiel that he had followed on his first journey; but he was not so uncomfortable this time, for it was early morning and the sun's rays fell upon them slantingly and accordingly did not tire them too much.

"Look, Sir Knight-errant," said Sancho, "your Grace should not forget that island you promised me; for no matter how big it is, I'll be able to govern it right enough."

"I would have you know, friend Sancho Panza," replied Don Quixote, "that among the knights-errant of old it was a very common custom to make their squires governors of the islands or the kingdoms that they won, and I am resolved that in my case so pleasing a usage shall not fall into desuetude. I even mean to go them one better; for they very often, perhaps most of the time, waited until their squires were old men who had had their fill of serving their masters during bad days and worse nights, whereupon they would give them the tide of count, or marquis at most, of some valley or province more or less. But if you live and I live, it well may be that within a week I shall win some kingdom with others dependent upon it, and it will be the easiest thing in the world to crown you king of one of them. You need not marvel at this, for all sorts of unforeseen things happen to knights like me, and I may readily be able to give you even more than I have promised."

"In that case," said Sancho Panza, "if by one of those miracles of which your Grace was speaking I should become king, I would certainly send for Juana Gutiérrez, my old lady, to come and be my queen, and the young ones could be infants."

"There is no doubt about it," Don Quixote assured him.

"Well, I doubt it," said Sancho, "for I think that even if God were to rain kingdoms upon the earth, no crown would sit well on the head of Mari Gutiérrez,<sup>3</sup> for I am telling you, sir, as a queen she is not worth two maravedis. She would do better as a countess, God help her."

"Leave everything to God, Sancho," said Don Quixote, "and he will give you whatever is most fitting; but I trust you will not be so pusillanimous as to be content with anything less than the title of viceroy."

"That I will not," said Sancho Panza, "especially seeing that I have in your Grace so illustrious a master who can give me all that is suitable to me and all that I can manage."

CHAPTER VIII

Of the good fortune which the valorous Don Quixote had in the terrifying and never-before-imagined adventure of the windmills, along with other events that deserve to be suitably recorded.

At this point they caught sight of thirty or forty windmills which were standing on the plain there, and no sooner had Don Quixote laid eyes upon them than he turned to his squire and said, "Fortune is guiding our affairs better than we could have wished; for you see there before you, friend Sancho Panza, some thirty or more lawless giants with whom I mean to do battle. I shall deprive them of their lives, and with the spoils from this encounter we shall begin to enrich ourselves; for this is righteous warfare, and it is a great service to God to remove so accursed a breed from the face of the earth."

"What giants?" said Sancho Panza.

"Those that you see there," replied his master, "those with the long arms some of which are as much as two leagues in length."

3. Sancho's wife, Juana Gutiérrez.

"But look, your Grace, those are not giants but windmills, and what appear to be arms are their wings which, when whirled in the breeze, cause the millstone to go."

"It is plain to be seen," said Don Quixote, "that you have had little experience in this matter of adventures. If you are afraid, go off to one side and say your prayers while I am engaging them in fierce, unequal combat."

Saying this, he gave spurs to his steed Rocinante, without paying any heed to Sancho's warning that these were truly windmills and not giants that he was riding forth to attack. Nor even when he was close upon them did he perceive what they really were, but shouted at the top of his lungs, "Do not seek to flee, cowards and vile creatures that you are, for it is but a single knight with whom you have to deal!"

At that moment a little wind came up and the big wings began turning.

"Though you flourish as many arms as did the giant Briareus,"<sup>4</sup> said Don Quixote when he perceived this, "you still shall have to answer to me."

He thereupon commended himself with all his heart to his lady Dulcinea, beseeching her to succor him in this peril; and, being well covered with his shield and with his lance at rest, he bore down upon them at a full gallop and fell upon the first mill that stood in his way, giving a thrust at the wing, which was whirling at such a speed that his lance was broken into bits and both horse and horseman went rolling over the plain, very much battered indeed. Sancho upon his donkey came hurrying to his master's assistance as fast as he could, but when he reached the spot, the knight was unable to move, so great was the shock with which he and Rocinante had hit the ground.

"God help us!" exclaimed Sancho, "did I not tell your Grace to look well, that those were nothing but windmills, a fact which no one could fail to see unless he had other mills of the same sort in his head?"

"Be quiet, friend Sancho," said Don Quixote. "Such are the fortunes of war, which more than any other are subject to constant change. What is more, when I come to think of it, I am sure that this must be the work of that magician Frestón, the one who robbed me of my study and my books,<sup>5</sup> and who has thus changed the giants into windmills in order to deprive me of the glory of overcoming them, so great is the enmity that he bears me; but in the end his evil arts shall not prevail against this trusty sword of mine."

"May God's will be done," was Sancho Panza's response. And with the aid of his squire the knight was once more mounted on Rocinante, who stood there with one shoulder half out of joint. And so, speaking of the adventure that had just befallen them, they continued along the Puerto Lápice highway; for there, Don Quixote said, they could not fail to find many and varied adventures, this being a much traveled thoroughfare. The only thing was, the knight was exceedingly downcast over the loss of his lance.

"I remember," he said to his squire, "having read of a Spanish knight by the name of Diego Pérez de Vargas, who, having broken his sword in battle, tore from an oak a heavy bough or branch and with it did such feats of valor that day, and pounded so many Moors, that he came to be known as Machuca,<sup>6</sup> and he and his descendants from that day forth have been called Vargas y Machuca.

4. In Greek mythology, a giant with a hundred arms.

5. Don Quixote had promptly attributed the ruin of his library to magical intervention (see p. 1564, n. 2).

6. "The Crusher," the hero of a folk ballad.

I tell you this because I too intend to provide myself with just such a bough as the one he wielded, and with it I propose to do such exploits that you shall deem yourself fortunate to have been found worthy to come with me and behold and witness things that are almost beyond belief."

"God's will be done," said Sancho. "I believe everything that your Grace says; but straighten yourself up in the saddle a little, for you seem to be slipping down on one side, owing, no doubt, to the shaking-up that you received in your fall."

"Ah, that is the truth," replied Don Quixote, "and if I do not speak of my sufferings, it is for the reason that it is not permitted knights-errant to complain of any wound whatsoever, even though their bowels may be dropping out."

"If that is the way it is," said Sancho, "I have nothing more to say; but, God knows, it would suit me better if your Grace did complain when something hurts him. I can assure you that I mean to do so, over the least little thing that ails me—that is, unless the same rule applies to squires as well."

Don Quixote laughed long and heartily over Sancho's simplicity, telling him that he might complain as much as he liked and where and when he liked, whether he had good cause or not; for he had read nothing to the contrary in the ordinances of chivalry. Sancho then called his master's attention to the fact that it was time to eat. The knight replied that he himself had no need of food at the moment, but his squire might eat whenever he chose. Having been granted this permission, Sancho seated himself as best he could upon his beast, and, taking out from his saddlebags the provisions that he had stored there, he rode along leisurely behind his master, munching his victuals and taking a good, hearty swig now and then at the leather flask in a manner that might well have caused the biggest-bellied tavernkeeper of Málaga to envy him. Between draughts he gave not so much as a thought to any promise that his master might have made him, nor did he look upon it as any hardship, but rather as good sport, to go in quest of adventures however hazardous they might be.

The short of the matter is, they spent the night under some trees, from one of which Don Quixote tore off a withered bough to serve him as a lance, placing it in the lance head from which he had removed the broken one. He did not sleep all night long for thinking of his lady Dulcinea; for this was in accordance with what he had read in his books, of men of arms in the forest or desert places who kept a wakeful vigil, sustained by the memory of their ladies fair. Not so with Sancho, whose stomach was full, and not with chicory water. He fell into a dreamless slumber, and had not his master called him, he would not have been awakened either by the rays of the sun in his face or by the many birds who greeted the coming of the new day with their merry song.

Upon arising, he had another go at the flask, finding it somewhat more flaccid than it had been the night before, a circumstance which grieved his heart, for he could not see that they were on the way to remedying the deficiency within any very short space of time. Don Quixote did not wish any breakfast; for, as has been said, he was in the habit of nourishing himself on savorous memories. They then set out once more along the road to Puerto Lápice, and around three in the afternoon they came in sight of the pass that bears that name.

"There," said Don Quixote as his eyes fell upon it, "we may plunge our arms up to the elbow in what are known as adventures. But I must warn you that even though you see me in the greatest peril in the world, you are not to lay hand upon your sword to defend me, unless it be that those who attack me are rabble and men of low degree, in which case you may very well come to my aid; but if they be gentlemen, it is in no wise permitted by the laws of chivalry that you should assist me until you yourself shall have been dubbed a knight."

"Most certainly, sir," replied Sancho, "your Grace shall be very well obeyed in this; all the more so for the reason that I myself am of a peaceful disposition and not fond of meddling in the quarrels and feuds of others. However, when it comes to protecting my own person, I shall not take account of those laws of which you speak, seeing that all laws, human and divine, permit each one to defend himself whenever he is attacked."

"I am willing to grant you that," assented Don Quixote, "but in this matter of defending me against gentlemen you must restrain your natural impulses."

"I promise you I shall do so," said Sancho. "I will observe this precept as I would the Sabbath day."

As they were conversing in this manner, there appeared in the road in front of them two friars of the Order of St. Benedict, mounted upon dromedaries—for the she-mules they rode were certainly no smaller than that. The friars wore travelers' spectacles and carried sunshades, and behind them came a coach accompanied by four or five men on horseback and a couple of muleteers on foot. In the coach, as was afterwards learned, was a lady of Biscay,<sup>7</sup> on her way to Seville to bid farewell to her husband, who had been appointed to some high post in the Indies. The religious were not of her company although they were going by the same road.

The instant Don Quixote laid eyes upon them he turned to his squire. "Either I am mistaken or this is going to be the most famous adventure that ever was seen; for those black-clad figures that you behold must be, and without any doubt are, certain enchanters who are bearing with them a captive princess in that coach, and I must do all I can to right this wrong."

"It will be worse than the windmills," declared Sancho. "Look you, sir, those are Benedictine friars and the coach must be that of some travelers. Mark well what I say and what you do, lest the devil lead you astray."

"I have already told you, Sancho," replied Don Quixote, "that you know little where the subject of adventures is concerned. What I am saying to you is the truth, as you shall now see."

With this, he rode forward and took up a position in the middle of the road along which the friars were coming, and as soon as they appeared to be within earshot he cried out to them in a loud voice, "O devilish and monstrous beings, set free at once the highborn princesses whom you bear captive in that coach, or else prepare at once to meet your death as the just punishment of your evil deeds."

The friars drew rein and sat there in astonishment, marveling as much at Don Quixote's appearance as at the words he spoke. "Sir Knight," they answered him, "we are neither devilish nor monstrous but religious of the Order of St. Benedict who are merely going our way. We know nothing of those who are in that coach, nor of any captive princesses either."

"Soft words," said Don Quixote, "have no effect on me. I know you for what you are, lying rabble!" And without waiting for any further parley he gave spur to Rocinante and, with lowered lance, bore down upon the first friar with such fury and intrepidity that, had not the fellow tumbled from his mule of his own accord, he would have been hurled to the ground and either killed or badly wounded. The second religious, seeing how his companion had been treated, dug his legs into his she-mule's flanks and scurried away over the countryside faster than the wind.

7. The Basque region in northern Spain and southwestern France.

Seeing the friar upon the ground, Sancho Panza slipped lightly from his mount and, falling upon him, began stripping him of his habit. The two mule drivers accompanying the religious thereupon came running up and asked Sancho why he was doing this. The latter replied that the friar's garments belonged to him as legitimate spoils of the battle that his master Don Quixote had just won. The muleteers, however, were lads with no sense of humor, nor did they know what all this talk of spoils and battles was about; but, perceiving that Don Quixote had ridden off to one side to converse with those inside the coach, they pounced upon Sancho, threw him to the ground, and proceeded to pull out the hair of his beard and kick him to a pulp, after which they went off and left him stretched out there, bereft at once of breath and sense.

Without losing any time, they then assisted the friar to remount. The good brother was trembling all over from fright, and there was not a speck of color in his face, but when he found himself in the saddle once more, he quickly spurred his beast to where his companion, at some little distance, sat watching and waiting to see what the result of the encounter would be. Having no curiosity as to the final outcome of the fray, the two of them now resumed their journey, making more signs of the cross than the devil would be able to carry upon his back.

Meanwhile Don Quixote, as we have said, was speaking to the lady in the coach.

"Your beauty, my lady, may now dispose of your person as best may please you, for the arrogance of your abductors lies upon the ground, overthrown by this good arm of mine; and in order that you may not pine to know the name of your liberator, I may inform you that I am Don Quixote de la Mancha, knight-errant and adventurer and captive of the peerless and beauteous Doña Dulcinea del Toboso. In payment of the favor which you have received from me, I ask nothing other than that you return to El Toboso and on my behalf pay your respects to this lady, telling her that it was I who set you free."

One of the squires accompanying those in the coach, a Biscayan, was listening to Don Quixote's words, and when he saw that the knight did not propose to let the coach proceed upon its way but was bent upon having it turn back to El Toboso, he promptly went up to him, seized his lance, and said to him in bad Castilian and worse Biscayan,<sup>8</sup> "Go, caballero, and bad luck go with you; for by the God that created me, if you do not let this coach pass, me kill you or me no Biscayan."

Don Quixote heard him attentively enough and answered him very mildly, "If you were a caballero,<sup>9</sup> which you are not, I should already have chastised you, wretched creature, for your foolhardiness and your impudence."

"Me no caballero?" cried the Biscayan. "Me swear to God, you lie like a Christian. If you will but lay aside your lance and unsheath your sword, you will soon

8. Castilian is the language of Castile; Biscayan is the Basque language.

9. Knight, gentleman (Spanish).

see that you are carrying water to the cat!<sup>1</sup> Biscayan on land, gentleman at sea, but a gentleman in spite of the devil, and you lie if you say otherwise.”

““You shall see as to that presently,” said Agraes,”<sup>2</sup> Don Quixote quoted. He cast his lance to the earth, drew his sword, and, taking his buckler on his arm, attacked the Biscayan with intent to slay him. The latter, when he saw his adversary approaching, would have liked to dismount from his mule, for she was one of the worthless sort that are let for hire and he had no confidence in her; but there was no time for this, and so he had no choice but to draw his own sword in turn and make the best of it. However, he was near enough to the coach to be able to snatch a cushion from it to serve him as a shield; and then they fell upon each other as though they were mortal enemies. The rest of those present sought to make peace between them but did not succeed, for the Biscayan with his disjointed phrases kept muttering that if they did not let him finish the battle then he himself would have to kill his mistress and anyone else who tried to stop him.

The lady inside the carriage, amazed by it all and trembling at what she saw, directed her coachman to drive on a little way; and there from a distance she watched the deadly combat, in the course of which the Biscayan came down with a great blow on Don Quixote's shoulder, over the top of the latter's shield, and had not the knight been clad in armor, it would have split him to the waist.

Feeling the weight of this blow, Don Quixote cried out, “O lady of my soul, Dulcinea, flower of beauty, succor this your champion who out of gratitude for your many favors finds himself in so perilous a plight!” To utter these words, lay hold of his sword, cover himself with his buckler, and attack the Biscayan was but the work of a moment; for he was now resolved to risk everything upon a single stroke.

As he saw Don Quixote approaching with so dauntless a bearing, the Biscayan was well aware of his adversary's courage and forthwith determined to imitate the example thus set him. He kept himself protected with his cushion, but he was unable to get his she-mule to budge to one side or the other, for the beast, out of sheer exhaustion and being, moreover, unused to such childish play, was incapable of taking a single step. And so, then, as has been stated, Don Quixote was approaching the wary Biscayan, his sword raised on high and with the firm resolve of cleaving his enemy in two; and the Biscayan was awaiting the knight in the same posture, cushion in front of him and with uplifted sword. All the bystanders were trembling with suspense at what would happen as a result of the terrible blows that were threatened, and the lady in the coach and her maids were making a thousand vows and offerings to all the images and shrines in Spain, praying that God would save them all and the lady's squire from this great peril that confronted them.

But the unfortunate part of the matter is that at this very point the author of the history breaks off and leaves the battle pending, excusing himself upon the ground that he has been unable to find anything else in writing concerning the exploits of Don Quixote beyond those already set forth.<sup>3</sup> It is true, on the other hand, that the second author of this work could not bring himself to believe that so unusual a chronicle would have been consigned to oblivion, nor that the learned ones of La Mancha were possessed of so little curiosity as not to be able to discover in their archives or registry offices certain papers that have to do with this famous knight. Being convinced of this, he did not despair of coming upon the end of this pleasing story and Heaven favoring him, he did find it, as shall be related in the second part.

1. An inversion of a proverbial phrase: “carrying the cat to the water.”

2. A violent character in the romance Amadís de Gaula. His challenging phrase is the conventional opener of a fight.

3. “The author” is Cervantes himself, adopting here—with tongue in cheek—a device used in the romances of chivalry to create suspense.

CHAPTER IX

In which is concluded and brought to an end the stupendous battle between the gallant Biscayan and the valiant Knight of La Mancha.

In the first part of this history we left the valorous Biscayan and the famous Don Quixote with swords unsheathed and raised aloft, about to let fall furious slashing blows which, had they been delivered fairly and squarely, would at the very least have split them in two and laid them wide open from top to bottom like a pomegranate; and it was at this doubtful point that the pleasing chronicle came to a halt and broke off, without the author's informing us as to where the rest of it might be found.

I was deeply grieved by such a circumstance, and the pleasure I had had in reading so slight a portion was turned into annoyance as I thought of how difficult it would be to come upon the greater part which it seemed to me must still be missing. It appeared impossible and contrary to all good precedent that so worthy a knight should not have had some scribe to take upon himself the task of writing an account of these unheard-of exploits; for that was something that had happened to none of the knights-errant who, as the saying has it, had gone forth in quest of adventures, seeing that each of them had one or two chroniclers, as if ready at hand, who not only had set down their deeds, but had depicted their most trivial thoughts and amiable weaknesses, however well concealed they might be. The good knight of La Mancha surely could not have been so unfortunate as to have lacked what Platir and others like him had in abundance. And so I could not bring myself to believe that this gallant history could have remained thus lopped off and mutilated, and I could not but lay the blame upon the malignity of time, that devourer and consumer of all things, which must either have consumed it or kept it hidden.

On the other hand, I reflected that inasmuch as among the knight's books had been found such modern works as The Disenchantments of Jealousy and The Nymphs and Shepherds of Henares, his story likewise must be modern, and that even though it might not have been written down, it must remain in the memory of the good folk of his village and the surrounding ones. This thought left me somewhat confused and more than ever desirous of knowing the real and true story, the whole story, of the life and wondrous deeds of our famous Spaniard, Don Quixote, light and mirror of the chivalry of La Mancha, the first in our age and in these calamitous times to devote himself to the hardships and exercises of knight-errantry and to go about righting wrongs, succoring widows, and protecting damsels—damsels such as those who, mounted upon their palfreys and with riding-whip in hand, in full possession of their virginity, were in the habit of going from mountain to mountain and from valley to valley; for unless there were some villain, some rustic with an ax and hood, or some monstrous giant to force them, there were in times past maiden ladies who at the end of eighty years, during all which time they had not slept for a single day beneath a roof, would go to their graves as virginal as when their mothers had borne them.

If I speak of these things, it is for the reason that in this and in all other respects our gallant Quixote is deserving of constant memory and praise, and even I am not to be denied my share of it for my diligence and the labor to which I put myself in searching out the conclusion of this agreeable narrative; although if heaven, luck, and circumstance had not aided me, the world would have had to do without the pleasure and the pastime which anyone may enjoy who will read this work attentively for an hour or two. The manner in which it came about was as follows:

I was standing one day in the Alcaná, or market place, of Toledo when a lad came up to sell some old notebooks and other papers to a silk weaver who was there. As I am extremely fond of reading anything, even though it be but the scraps of paper in the streets, I followed my natural inclination and took one of the books, whereupon I at once perceived that it was written in characters which I recognized as Arabic. I recognized them, but reading them was another thing; and so I began looking around to see if there was any Spanish-speaking Moor near by who would be able to read them for me. It was not very hard to find such an interpreter, nor would it have been even if the tongue in question had been an older and a better one.<sup>4</sup> To make a long story short, chance brought a fellow my way; and when I told him what it was I wished and placed the book in his hands, he opened it in the middle and began reading and at once fell to laughing. When I asked him what the cause of his laughter was, he replied that it was a note which had been written in the margin.

I besought him to tell me the content of the note, and he, laughing still, went on, "As I told you, it is something in the margin here: 'This Dulcinea del Toboso, so often referred to, is said to have been the best hand at salting pigs of any woman in all La Mancha.'"

No sooner had I heard the name Dulcinea del Toboso than I was astonished and held in suspense, for at once the thought occurred to me that those notebooks must contain the history of Don Quixote. With this in mind I urged him to read me the title, and he proceeded to do so, turning the Arabic into Castilian upon the spot: History of Don Quixote de la Mancha, Written by Cid Hamete Benengeli,<sup>5</sup> Arabic Historian. It was all I could do to conceal my satisfaction and, snatching them from the silk weaver, I bought from the lad all the papers and notebooks that he had for half a real; but if he had known or suspected how very much I wanted them, he might well have had more than six reales for them.

The Moor and I then betook ourselves to the cathedral cloister, where I requested him to translate for me into the Castilian tongue all the books that had to do with Don Quixote, adding nothing and subtracting nothing; and I offered him whatever payment he desired. He was content with two arrobas of raisins and two fanegas<sup>6</sup> of wheat and promised to translate them well and faithfully and

4. I.e., Hebrew.

5. Citing some ancient chronicle as the author's source and authority is very much in the tradition of the romances. "Benengeli": eggplant (Arabic).

6. About fifty pounds. "Two arrobas": three bushels.

with all dispatch. However, in order to facilitate matters, and also because I did not wish to let such a find as this out of my hands, I took the fellow home with me, where in a little more than a month and a half he translated the whole of the work just as you will find it set down here.

In the first of the books there was a very lifelike picture of the battle between Don Quixote and the Biscayan, the two being in precisely the same posture as described in the history, their swords upraised, the one covered by his buckler, the other with his cushion. As for the Biscayan's mule, you could see at the distance of a crossbow shot that it was one for hire. Beneath the Biscayan there was a rubric which read: "Don Sancho de Azpeitia," which must undoubtedly have been his name; while beneath the feet of Rocinante was another inscription: "Don Quixote." Rocinante was marvelously portrayed: so long and lank, so lean and flabby, so extremely consumptive-looking that one could well understand the justness and propriety with which the name of "hack" had been bestowed upon him.

Alongside Rocinante stood Sancho Panza, holding the halter of his ass, and below was the legend: "Sancho Zancas." The picture showed him with a big belly, a short body, and long shanks, and that must have been where he got the names of Panza y Zancas<sup>7</sup> by which he is a number of times called in the course of the history. There are other small details that might be mentioned, but they are of little importance and have nothing to do with the truth of the story—and no story is bad so long as it is true.

If there is any objection to be raised against the veracity of the present one, it can be only that the author was an Arab, and that nation is known for its lying propensities; but even though they be our enemies, it may readily be understood that they would more likely have detracted from, rather than added to, the chronicle. So it seems to me, at any rate; for whenever he might and should deploy the resources of his pen in praise of so worthy a knight, the author appears to take pains to pass over the matter in silence; all of which in my opinion is ill done and ill conceived, for it should be the duty of historians to be exact, truthful, and dispassionate, and neither interest nor fear nor rancor nor affection should swerve them from the path of truth, whose mother is history, rival of time, depository of deeds, witness of the past, exemplar and adviser to the present, and the future's counselor. In this work, I am sure, will be found all that could be desired in the way of pleasant reading; and if it is lacking in any way, I maintain that this is the fault of that hound of an author rather than of the subject.

But to come to the point, the second part, according to the translation, began as follows:

As the two valorous and enraged combatants stood there, swords upraised and poised on high, it seemed from their bold mien as if they must surely be threatening heaven, earth, and hell itself. The first to let fall a blow was the choleric Biscayan, and he came down with such force and fury that, had not his sword been deflected in mid-air, that single stroke would have sufficed to put an end to this fearful combat and to all our knight's adventures at the same time; but fortune, which was reserving him for greater things, turned aside his adversary's blade in such a manner that, even though it fell upon his left shoulder, it did him no other damage than to strip him completely of his armor on that side, carrying with it a good part of his helmet along with half an ear, the headpiece clattering to the ground with a dreadful din, leaving its wearer in a sorry state.

7. Paunch and Shanks (Spanish).

Heaven help me! Who could properly describe the rage that now entered the heart of our hero of La Mancha as he saw himself treated in this fashion? It may merely be said that he once more reared himself in the stirrups, laid hold of his sword with both hands, and dealt the Biscayan such a blow, over the cushion and upon the head, that, even so good a defense proving useless, it was as if a mountain had fallen upon his enemy. The latter now began bleeding through the mouth, nose, and ears; he seemed about to fall from his mule, and would have fallen, no doubt, if he had not grasped the beast about the neck, but at that moment his feet slipped from the stirrups and his arms let go, and the mule, frightened by the terrible blow, began running across the plain, hurling its rider to the earth with a few quick plunges.

Don Quixote stood watching all this very calmly. When he saw his enemy fall, he leaped from his horse, ran over very nimbly, and thrust the point of his sword into the Biscayan's eyes, calling upon him at the same time to surrender or otherwise he would cut off his head. The Biscayan was so bewildered that he was unable to utter a single word in reply, and things would have gone badly with him, so blind was Don Quixote in his rage, if the ladies of the coach, who up to then had watched the struggle in dismay, had not come up to him at this point and begged him with many blandishments to do them the very great favor of sparing their squire's life.

To which Don Quixote replied with much haughtiness and dignity, "Most certainly, lovely ladies, I shall be very happy to do that which you ask of me, but upon one condition and understanding, and that is that this knight promise me that he will go to El Toboso and present himself in my behalf before Doña Dulcinea, in order that she may do with him as she may see fit."

Trembling and disconsolate, the ladies did not pause to discuss Don Quixote's request, but without so much as inquiring who Dulcinea might be they promised him that the squire would fulfill that which was commanded of him.

"Very well, then, trusting in your word, I will do him no further harm, even though he has well deserved it."

CHAPTER X

Of the pleasing conversation that took place between Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, his squire.

By this time Sancho Panza had got to his feet, somewhat the worse for wear as the result of the treatment he had received from the friars' lads. He had been watching the battle attentively and praying God in his heart to give the victory to his master, Don Quixote, in order that he, Sancho, might gain some island where he could go to be governor as had been promised him. Seeing now that the combat was over and the knight was returning to mount Rocinante once more, he went up to hold the stirrup for him; but first he fell on his knees in front of him and, taking his hand, kissed it and said, "May your Grace be pleased, Señor Don Quixote, to grant me the governorship of that island which you have won in this deadly affray; for however large it may be, I feel that I am indeed capable of governing it as well as any man in this world has ever done."

To which Don Quixote replied, "Be advised, brother Sancho, that this adventure and other similar ones have nothing to do with islands; they are affairs of the crossroads in which one gains nothing more than a broken head or an ear the less. Be patient, for there will be others which will not only make you a governor, but more than that."

Sancho thanked him very much and, kissing his hand again and the skirt of his cuirass, he assisted him up on Rocinante's back, after which the squire bestraddled his own mount and started jogging along behind his master, who was now going at a good clip. Without pausing for any further converse with those in the coach, the knight made for a nearby wood, with Sancho following as fast as his beast could trot; but Rocinante was making such speed that the ass and its rider were left behind, and it was necessary to call out to Don Quixote to pull up and wait for them. He did so, reining in Rocinante until the weary Sancho had drawn abreast of him.

"It strikes me, sir," said the squire as he reached his master's side, "that it would be better for us to take refuge in some church; for in view of the way you have treated that one with whom you were fighting, it would be small wonder if they did not lay the matter before the Holy Brotherhood<sup>8</sup> and have us arrested; and faith, if they do that, we shall have to sweat a-plenty before we come out of jail."

"Be quiet," said Don Quixote. "And where have you ever seen, or read of, a knight being brought to justice no matter how many homicides he might have committed?"

"I know nothing about omecils,"<sup>9</sup> replied Sancho, "nor ever in my life did I bear one to anybody; all I know is that the Holy Brotherhood has something to say about those who go around fighting on the highway, and I want nothing of it."

"Do not let it worry you," said Don Quixote, "for I will rescue you from the hands of the Chaldeans, not to speak of the Brotherhood. But answer me upon your life: have you ever seen a more valorous knight than I on all the known face of the earth? Have you ever read in the histories of any other who had more mettle in the attack, more perseverance in sustaining it, more dexterity in wounding his enemy, or more skill in overthrowing him?"

"The truth is," said Sancho, "I have never read any history whatsoever, for I do not know how to read or write; but what I would wager is that in all the days of my life I have never served a more courageous master than your Grace; I only hope your courage is not paid for in the place that I have mentioned. What I would suggest is that your Grace allow me to do something for that ear, for there is much blood coming from it, and I have here in my saddlebags some lint and a little white ointment."

"We could well dispense with all that," said Don Quixote, "if only I had remembered to bring along a vial of Fierabrás's<sup>1</sup> balm, a single drop of which saves time and medicines."

"What vial and what balm is that?" inquired Sancho Panza.

"It is a balm the recipe for which I know by heart; with it one need have no fear of death nor think of dying from any wound. I shall make some of it and

8. A tribunal instituted by Ferdinand and Isabella at the end of the 15th century to punish highway robbers.

9. In Spanish, a wordplay on homocidios (homicides) / omecillos (grudges). In English, omecils appears only in this passage of Don Quixote.

1. A giant Saracen healer in the medieval epics of the Twelve Peers (see p. 1563, n. 7).

give it to you; and thereafter, whenever in any battle you see my body cut in two—as very often happens—all that is necessary is for you to take the part that lies on the ground, before the blood has congealed, and fit it very neatly and with great nicety upon the other part that remains in the saddle, taking care to adjust it evenly and exactly. Then you will give me but a couple of swallows of the balm of which I have told you, and you will see me sounder than an apple in no time at all.”

“If that is so,” said Panza, “I herewith renounce the governorship of the island you promised me and ask nothing other in payment of my many and faithful services than that your Grace give me the recipe for this wonderful potion, for I am sure that it would be worth more than two reales the ounce anywhere, and that is all I need for a life of ease and honor. But may I be so bold as to ask how much it costs to make it?”

“For less than three reales you can make something like six quarts,” Don Quixote told him.

“Sinner that I am!” exclaimed Sancho. “Then why does your Grace not make some at once and teach me also?”

“Hush, my friend,” said the knight, “I mean to teach you greater secrets than that and do you greater favors; but, for the present, let us look after this ear of mine, for it is hurting me more than I like.”

Sancho thereupon took the lint and the ointment from his saddlebags; but when Don Quixote caught a glimpse of his helmet, he almost went out of his mind and, laying his hand upon his sword and lifting his eyes heavenward, he cried, “I make a vow to the Creator of all things and to the four holy Gospels in all their fullness of meaning that I will lead from now on the life that the great Marquis of Mantua did after he had sworn to avenge the death of his nephew Baldwin: not to eat bread off a tablecloth, not to embrace his wife, and other things which, although I am unable to recall them, we will look upon as understood—all this until I shall have wreaked an utter vengeance upon the one who has perpetrated such an outrage upon me.”

“But let me remind your Grace,” said Sancho when he heard these words, “that if the knight fulfills that which was commanded of him, by going to present himself before my lady Dulcinea del Toboso, then he will have paid his debt to you and merits no further punishment at your hands, unless it be for some fresh offense.”

“You have spoken very well and to the point,” said Don Quixote, “and so I annul the vow I have just made insofar as it has to do with any further vengeance, but I make it and confirm it anew so far as leading the life of which I have spoken is concerned, until such time as I shall have obtained by force of arms from some other knight another headpiece as good as this. And do not think, Sancho, that I am making smoke out of straw; there is one whom I well may imitate in this matter, for the same thing happened in all literalness in the case of Mambrino’s helmet<sup>2</sup> which cost Sacripante so dear.”

“I wish,” said Sancho, “that your Grace would send all such oaths to the devil, for they are very bad for the health and harmful for the conscience as well. Tell me, please: supposing that for many days to come we meet no man

2. The enchanted helmet of Mambrino, a Moorish king, is stolen by Dardinel (not Sacripante, as Don Quixote mistakenly recalls) in Boiardo’s Roland in Love.

wearing a helmet, then what are we to do? Must you still keep your vow in spite of all the inconveniences and discomforts, such as sleeping with your clothes on, not sleeping in any town, and a thousand other penances contained in the oath of that old madman of a Marquis of Mantua, an oath which you would now revive? Mark you, sir, along all these roads you meet no men of arms but only muleteers and carters, who not only do not wear helmets but quite likely have never heard tell of them in all their livelong days."

"In that you are wrong," said Don Quixote, "for we shall not be at these crossroads for the space of two hours before we shall see more men of arms than came to Albraca to win the fair Angélica."<sup>3</sup>

"Very well, then," said Sancho, "so be it, and pray God that all turns out for the best so that I may at last win that island that is costing me so dearly, and then let me die."

"I have already told you, Sancho, that you are to give no thought to that; should the island fail, there is the kingdom of Denmark or that of Sobradisa, which would fit you like a ring on your finger, and you ought, moreover, to be happy to be on terra firma.<sup>4</sup> But let us leave all this for some other time, while you look and see if you have something in those saddlebags for us to eat, after which we will go in search of some castle where we may lodge for the night and prepare that balm of which I was telling you, for I swear to God that my ear is paining me greatly."

"I have here an onion, a little cheese, and a few crusts of bread," said Sancho, "but they are not victuals fit for a valiant knight like your Grace."

"How little you know about it!" replied Don Quixote. "I would inform you, Sancho, that it is a point of honor with knights-errant to go for a month at a time without eating, and when they do eat, it is whatever may be at hand. You would certainly know that if you had read the histories as I have. There are many of them, and in none have I found any mention of knights eating unless it was by chance or at some sumptuous banquet that was tendered them; on other days they fasted. And even though it is well understood that, being men like us, they could not go without food entirely, any more than they could fail to satisfy the other necessities of nature, nevertheless, since they spent the greater part of their lives in forests and desert places without any cook to prepare their meals, their diet ordinarily consisted of rustic viands such as those that you now offer me. And so, Sancho my friend, do not be grieved at that which pleases me, nor seek to make the world over, nor to unhinge the institution of knight-errantry."

"Pardon me, your Grace," said Sancho, "but seeing that, as I have told you, I do not know how to read or write, I am consequently not familiar with the rules of the knightly calling. Hereafter, I will stuff my saddlebags with all manner of dried fruit for your Grace, but inasmuch as I am not a knight, I shall lay in for myself a stock of fowls and other more substantial fare."

"I am not saying, Sancho, that it is incumbent upon knights-errant to eat only those fruits of which you speak; what I am saying is that their ordinary sustenance should consist of fruit and a few herbs such as are to be found in the fields and with which they are well acquainted, as am I myself."

3. Another allusion to Roland in Love.

4. Solid earth (Latin, literal trans.), here referring to Firm Island, a legendary final destinuation for the squires of knights-errant. "Sobradisa": an imaginary realm.

"It is a good thing," said Sancho, "to know those herbs, for, so far as I can see, we are going to have need of that knowledge one of these days."

With this, he brought out the articles he had mentioned, and the two of them ate in peace, and most companionably. Being desirous, however, of seeking a lodging for the night, they did not tarry long over their humble and unsavory repast. They then mounted and made what haste they could that they might arrive at a shelter before nightfall; but the sun failed them, and with it went the hope of attaining their wish. As the day ended they found themselves beside some goatherds' huts, and they accordingly decided to spend the night there. Sancho was as much disappointed at their not having reached a town as his master was content with sleeping under the open sky; for it seemed to Don Quixote that every time this happened it merely provided him with yet another opportunity to establish his claim to the title of knight-errant.

[Of Goatherds, Roaming Shepherdesses, and Unrequited Loves]

CHAPTER XI

Of what happened to Don Quixote in the company of certain goatherds.

He was received by the herders with good grace, and Sancho having looked after Rocinante and the ass to the best of his ability, the knight, drawn by the aroma, went up to where some pieces of goat's meat were simmering in a pot over the fire. He would have liked then and there to see if they were done well enough to be transferred from pot to stomach, but he refrained in view of the fact that his hosts were already taking them off the fire. Spreading a few sheepskins on the ground, they hastily laid their rustic board and invited the strangers to share what there was of it. There were six of them altogether who belonged to that fold, and after they had urged Don Quixote, with rude politeness, to seat himself upon a small trough which they had turned upside down for the purpose, they took their own places upon the sheep hides round about. While his master sat there, Sancho remained standing to serve him the cup, which was made of horn. When the knight perceived this, he addressed his squire as follows:

"In order, Sancho, that you may see the good that there is in knight-errantry and how speedily those who follow the profession, no matter what the nature of their service may be, come to be honored and esteemed in the eyes of the world, I would have you here in the company of these good folk seat yourself at my side, that you may be even as I who am your master and natural lord, and eat from my plate and drink from where I drink; for of knight-errantry one may say the same as of love: that it makes all things equal."

"Many thanks!" said Sancho, "but if it is all the same to your Grace, providing there is enough to go around, I can eat just as well, or better, standing up and alone as I can seated beside an emperor. And if the truth must be told, I enjoy much more that which I eat in my own corner without any bowings and scrapings, even though it be only bread and onions, than I do a meal of roast turkey where I have to chew slowly, drink little, be always wiping my mouth, and can neither sneeze nor cough if I feel like it, nor do any of those other things that you can when you are free and alone."

"And so, my master," he went on, "these honors that your Grace would confer upon me as your servant and a follower of knight-errantry—which I am, being your Grace's squire—I would have you convert, if you will, into other things that will be of more profit and advantage to me; for though I hereby acknowledge them as duly received, I renounce them from this time forth to the end of the world."

"But for all that," said Don Quixote, "you must sit down; for whosoever humbleth himself, him God will exalt."<sup>5</sup> And, laying hold of his squire's arm, he compelled him to take a seat beside him.

The goatherds did not understand all this jargon about squires and knights-errant; they did nothing but eat, keep silent, and study their guests, who very dexterously and with much appetite were stowing away chunks of meat as big as your fist. When the meat course was finished, they laid out upon the sheepskins a great quantity of dried acorns and half a cheese, which was harder than if it had been made of mortar. The drinking horn all this while was not idle but went the rounds so often—now full, now empty, like the bucket of a water wheel—that they soon drained one of the two wine bags that were on hand. After Don Quixote had well satisfied his stomach, he took up a handful of acorns and, gazing at them attentively, fell into a soliloquy.

"Happy the age and happy those centuries to which the ancients gave the name of golden, and not because gold, which is so esteemed in this iron age of ours, was then to be had without toil, but because those who lived in that time did not know the meaning of the words 'thine' and 'mine.' In that blessed era all things were held in common, and to gain his daily sustenance no labor was required of any man save to reach forth his hand and take it from the sturdy oaks that stood liberally inviting him with their sweet and seasoned fruit. The clear-running fountains and rivers in magnificent abundance offered him palatable and transparent water for his thirst; while in the clefts of the rocks and the hollows of the trees the wise and busy honey-makers set up their republic so that any hand whatever might avail itself, fully and freely, of the fertile harvest which their fragrant toil had produced. The vigorous cork trees of their own free will and grace, without the asking, shed their broad, light bark with which men began to cover their dwellings, erected upon rude stakes merely as a protection against the inclemency of the heavens.

"All then was peace, all was concord and friendship; the crooked plowshare had not as yet grievously laid open and pried into the merciful bowels of our first mother, who without any forcing on man's part yielded her spacious fertile bosom on every hand for the satisfaction, sustenance, and delight of her first sons. Then it was that lovely and unspoiled young shepherdesses, with locks that were sometimes braided, sometimes flowing, went roaming from valley to valley and hillock to hillock with no more garments than were needed to cover decently that which modesty requires and always has required should remain covered. Nor were their adornments such as those in use today—of Tyrian purple and silk worked up in tortured patterns; a few green leaves of burdock or of ivy, and they were as splendidly and as becomingly clad as our ladies of the court with all the rare and exotic tricks of fashion that idle curiosity has taught them.

"Thoughts of love, also, in those days were set forth as simply as the simple hearts that conceived them, without any roundabout and artificial play of words by way of ornament. Fraud, deceit, and malice had not yet come to mingle with truth and plain-speaking. Justice kept its own domain, where favor and self-interest dared not trespass, dared not impair her rights, becloud, and persecute her as they now do. There was no such thing then as arbitrary judgments, for the reason that there was no one to judge or be judged. Maidens in all their modesty, as I have said, went where they would and unattended; whereas in this hateful age of ours none is safe, even though she go to hide and shut herself up in some new labyrinth like that of Crete; for in spite of all her seclusion, through chinks and crevices or borne upon the air, the amorous plague with all its cursed importunities will find her out and lead her to her ruin.

"It was for the safety of such as these, as time went on and depravity increased, that the order of knights-errant was instituted, for the protection of damsels, the aid of widows and orphans, and the succoring of the needy. It is to this order that I belong, my brothers, and I thank you for the welcome and the kindly treatment that you have accorded to me and my squire. By natural law, all living men are obliged to show favor to knights-errant, yet without being aware of this you have received and entertained me; and so it is with all possible good will that I acknowledge your own good will to me."

This long harangue on the part of our knight—it might very well have been dispensed with—was all due to the acorns they had given him, which had brought back to memory the age of gold; whereupon the whim had seized him to indulge in this futile harangue with the goatherds as his auditors. They listened in open-mouthed wonderment, saying not a word, and Sancho himself kept quiet and went on munching acorns, taking occasion very frequently to pay a visit to the second wine bag, which they had suspended from a cork tree to keep it cool.

It took Don Quixote much longer to finish his speech than it did to put away his supper; and when he was through, one of the goatherds addressed him.

"In order that your Grace may say with more truth that we have received you with readiness and good will, we desire to give you solace and contentment by having one of our comrades, who will be here soon, sing for you. He is a very bright young fellow and deeply in love, and what is more, you could not ask for anything better than to hear him play the three-stringed lute."

Scarcely had he done saying this when the sound of a rebec<sup>6</sup> was heard, and shortly afterward the one who played it appeared. He was a good-looking youth, around twenty-two years of age. His companions asked him if he had had his supper, and when he replied that he had, the one who had spoken to Don Quixote said to him, "Well, then, Antonio, you can give us the pleasure of hearing you sing, in order that this gentleman whom we have as our guest may see that we of the woods and mountains also know something about music. We have been telling him how clever you are, and now we want you to show him that we were speaking the truth. And so I beg you by all means to sit down and sing us that love-song of yours that your uncle the prebendary composed for you and which the villagers liked so well.

"With great pleasure," the lad replied, and without any urging he seated himself on the stump of an oak that had been felled and, tuning up his rebec, soon began singing, very prettily, the following ballad:

6. Three-stringed instrument played with a bow.

THE BALLAD THAT ANTONIO SANG

*I know well that thou dost love me,
My Olalla, even though
Eyes of thine have never spoken—
Love's mute tongues—to tell me so.*

*Since I know thou knowest my passion,
Of thy love I am more sure;
No love ever was unhappy
When it was both frank and pure.*

*True it is, Olalla, sometimes Thou a heart of bronze hast shown,
And it seemed to me that bosom,
White and fair, was made of stone.*

*Yet in spite of all repulses
And a chastity so cold,
It appeared that I Hope's garment
By the hem did clutch and hold.*

*For my faith I ever cherished;
It would rise to meet the bait;
Spurned, it never did diminish;
Favored, it preferred to wait.*

*Love, they say, hath gentle manners:
Thus it is it shows its face;
Then may I take hope, Olalla, Trust to win a longed-for grace.*

*If devotion hath the power
Hearts to move and make them kind,
Let the loyalty I've shown thee
Plead my cause, be kept in mind.*

*For if thou didst note my costume,
More than once thou must have seen,
Worn upon a simple Monday
Sunday's garb so bright and clean.*

*Love and brightness go together.
Dost thou ask the reason why
I thus deck myself on Monday?
It is but to catch thine eye.*

*I say nothing of the dances
I have danced for thy sweet sake;
Nor the serenades I've sung thee
Till the first cock did awake.*

*Nor will I repeat my praises
Of that beauty all can see;
True my words but oft unwelcome—
Certain lasses bated me.*

*One girl there is, I well remember—
She's Teresa on the hill—
Said, "You think you love an angel,
But she is a monkey still.*

*"Thanks to all her many trinkets
And her artificial hair*

And her many aids to beauty, Love's own self she would ensnare."
*She was lying, I was angry,
 And her cousin, very bold,
 Challenged me upon my honor;
 What ensued need not be told.*
*Highflown words do not become me;
 I'm a plain and simple man.
 Pure the love that I would offer,
 Serving thee as best I can.*
*Silken are the bonds of marriage,
 When two hearts do intertwine;
 Mother Church the yoke will fasten;
 Bow your neck and I'll bow mine.*
*Or if not, my word I'll give thee,
 From these mountains I'll come down—
 Saint most holy be my witness—
 Wearing a Capuchin<sup>7</sup> gown.*

With this the goatherd brought his song to a close, and although Don Quixote begged him to sing some more, Sancho Panza would not hear to this as he was too sleepy for any more ballads.

"Your Grace," he said to his master, "would do well to find out at once where his bed is to be, for the labor that these good men have to perform all day long does not permit them to stay up all night singing."

"I understand, Sancho," replied Don Quixote. "I perceive that those visits to the wine bag call for sleep rather than music as a recompense."

"It tastes well enough to all of us, God be praised," said Sancho.

"I am not denying that," said his master; "but go ahead and settle yourself down wherever you like. As for men of my profession, they prefer to keep vigil. But all the same, Sancho, perhaps you had better look after this ear, for it is paining me more than I like."

Sancho started to do as he was commanded, but one of the goatherds, when he saw the wound, told him not to bother, that he would place a remedy upon it that would heal it in no time. Taking a few leaves of rosemary, of which there was a great deal growing thereabouts, he mashed them in his mouth and, mixing them with a little salt, laid them on the ear, with the assurance that no other medicine was needed; and this proved to be the truth.

CHAPTER XII

Of the story that one of the goatherds told to Don Quixote and the others.

Just then, another lad came up, one of those who brought the goatherds their provisions from the village.

"Do you know what's happening down there, my friends?" he said.

"How should we know?" one of the men answered him.

7. An austere order of Franciscan friars.

"In that case," the lad went on, "I must tell you that the famous student and shepherd known as Grisóstomo died this morning, muttering that the cause of his death was the love he had for that bewitched lass of a Marcela, daughter of the wealthy Guillermo—you know, the one who's been going around in these parts dressed like a shepherdess."

"For love of Marcela, you say?" one of the herders spoke up.

"That is what I'm telling you," replied the other lad. "And the best part of it is that he left directions in his will that he was to be buried in the field, as if he were a Moor, and that his grave was to be at the foot of the cliff where the Cork Tree Spring is; for, according to report, and he is supposed to have said so himself, that is the place where he saw her for the first time. There were other provisions, which the clergy of the village say cannot be carried out, nor would it be proper to fulfill them, seeing that they savor of heathen practices. But Grisóstomo's good friend, the student Ambrosio, who also dresses like a shepherd, insists that everything must be done to the letter, and as a result there is great excitement in the village."

"Nevertheless, from all I can hear, they will end by doing as Ambrosio and Grisóstomo's other friends desire, and tomorrow they will bury him with great ceremony in the place that I have mentioned. I believe it is going to be something worth seeing; at any rate, I mean to see it, even though it is too far for me to be able to return to the village before nightfall."

"We will all do the same," said the other goatherds. "We will cast lots to see who stays to watch the goats."

"That is right, Pedro," said one of their number, "but it will not be necessary to go to the trouble of casting lots. I will take care of the flocks for all of us; and do not think that I am being generous or that I am not as curious as the rest of you; it is simply that I cannot walk on account of the splinter I picked up in this foot the other day."

"Well, we thank you just the same," said Pedro.

Don Quixote then asked Pedro to tell him more about the dead man and the shepherd lass; to which the latter replied that all he knew was that Grisóstomo was a rich gentleman who had lived in a near-by village. He had been a student for many years at Salamanca<sup>8</sup> and then had returned to his birthplace with the reputation of being very learned and well read; he was especially noted for his knowledge of the science of the stars and what the sun and moon were doing up there in the heavens, "for he would promptly tell us when their clips was to come."

"Eclipse, my friend, not clips," said Don Quixote, "is the name applied to the darkening-over of those major luminaries."

But Pedro, not pausing for any trifles, went on with his story. "He could also tell when the year was going to be plentiful or estil—"

"Sterile, you mean to say, friend—"

"Sterile or estil," said Pedro, "it all comes out the same in the end. But I can tell you one thing, that his father and his friends, who believed in him, did just as he advised them and they became rich; for he would say to them, 'This year, sow barley and not wheat'; and again, 'Sow chickpeas and not barley'; or, 'This season there will be a good crop of oil,'<sup>9</sup> but the three following ones you will not get a drop."

8. Town west of Madrid that is home to Spain's oldest university, founded in 1134.

9. I.e., olive oil.

"That science," Don Quixote explained, "is known as astrology."

"I don't know what it's called," said Pedro, "but he knew all this and more yet. Finally, not many months after he returned from Salamanca, he appeared one day dressed like a shepherd with crook and sheepskin jacket; for he had resolved to lay aside the long gown that he wore as a scholar, and in this he was joined by Ambrosio, a dear friend of his and the companion of his studies. I forgot to tell you that Grisóstomo was a great one for composing verses; he even wrote the carols for Christmas Eve and the plays that were performed at Corpus Christi by the lads of our village, and everyone said that they were the best ever.

"When the villagers saw the two scholars coming out dressed like shepherds, they were amazed and could not imagine what was the reason for such strange conduct on their part. It was about that time that Grisóstomo's father died and left him the heir to a large fortune, consisting of land and chattels, no small quantity of cattle, and a considerable sum of money, of all of which the young man was absolute master; and, to tell the truth, he deserved it, for he was very sociable and charitably inclined, a friend to all worthy folk, and he had a face that was like a benediction. Afterward it was learned that if he had changed his garments like this, it was only that he might be able to wander over the wastelands on the trail of that shepherdess Marcela of whom our friend was speaking, for the poor fellow had fallen in love with her. And now I should like to tell you, for it is well that you should know, just who this lass is; for it may be—indeed, there is no maybe about it—you will never hear the like in all the days of your life, though you live to be older than Sarna."

"You should say Sarah," Don Quixote corrected him; for he could not bear hearing the goatherd using the wrong words all the time.<sup>1</sup>

"The itch," said Pedro, "lives long enough; and if, sir, you go on interrupting me at every word, we'll never be through in a year."

"Pardon me, friend," said Don Quixote, "it was only because there is so great a difference between Sarna and Sarah that I pointed it out to you; but you have given me a very good answer, for the itch does live longer than Sarah; and so go on with your story, and I will not contradict you anymore."

"I was about to say, then, my dear sir," the goatherd went on, "that in our village there was a farmer who was richer still than Grisóstomo's father. His name was Guillermo, and, over and above his great wealth, God gave him a daughter whose mother, the most highly respected woman in these parts, died in bearing her. It seems to me I can see the good lady now, with that face that rivaled the sun and moon; and I remember, above all, what a friend she was to the poor, for which reason I believe that her soul at this very moment must be enjoying God's presence in the other world.

"Grieving for the loss of so excellent a wife, Guillermo himself died, leaving his daughter Marcela, now a rich young woman, in the custody of one of her uncles, a priest who holds a benefice in our village. The girl grew up with such beauty as to remind us of her mother, beautiful as that lady had been. By the time she was fourteen or fifteen no one looked at her without giving thanks to God who had created such comeliness, and almost all were hopelessly in love with her. Her uncle kept her very closely shut up, but, for all of that, word of her great beauty spread to such an extent that by reason of it, as much as on account of the girl's wealth, her uncle found himself besought and importuned not only by the young men of our village, but by those for leagues around who desired to have her for a wife.

1. Actually in this case the goatherd is not really wrong, for sarna means "itch" and "older than the itch" was a proverbial expression. ("Sarah" is a reference to the wife of Abraham in the Old Testament.)

"But he, an upright Christian, although he wished to marry her off as soon as she was of age, had no desire to do so without her consent, not that he had any eye to the gain and profit which the custody of his niece's property brought him while her marriage was deferred. Indeed, this much was said in praise of the good priest in more than one circle of the village; for I would have you know, Sir Knight, that in these little places everything is discussed and becomes a subject of gossip; and you may rest assured, as I am for my part, that a priest must be more than ordinarily good if his parishioners feel bound to speak well of him, especially in the small towns."

"That is true," said Don Quixote, "but go on. I like your story very much, and you, good Pedro, tell it with very good grace."

"May the Lord's grace never fail me, for that is what counts. But to go on: Although the uncle set forth to his niece the qualities of each one in particular of the many who sought her hand, begging her to choose and marry whichever one she pleased, she never gave him any answer other than this: that she did not wish to marry at all, since being but a young girl she did not feel that she was equal to bearing the burdens of matrimony. As her reasons appeared to be proper and just, the uncle did not insist but thought he would wait until she was a little older, when she would be capable of selecting someone to her taste. For, he said, and quite right he was, parents ought not to impose a way of life upon their children against the latter's will. And then, one fine day, lo and behold, there was the finical Marcela turned shepherdess; and without paying any attention to her uncle or all those of the village who advised against it, she set out to wander through the fields with the other lasses, guarding flocks as they did.

"Well, the moment she appeared in public and her beauty was uncovered for all to see, I really cannot tell you how many rich young bachelors, gentlemen, and farmers proceeded to don a shepherd's garb and go to make love to her in the meadows. One of her suitors, as I have told you, was our deceased friend, and it is said that he did not love but adored her. But you must not think that because Marcela chose so free and easy a life, and one that offers little or no privacy, that she was thereby giving the faintest semblance of encouragement to those who would disparage her modesty and prudence; rather, so great was the vigilance with which she looked after her honor that of all those who waited upon her and solicited her favors, none could truly say that she had given him the slightest hope of attaining his desire.

"For although she does not flee nor shun the company and conversation of the shepherds, treating them in courteous and friendly fashion, the moment she discovers any intentions on their part, even though it be the just and holy one of matrimony, she hurls them from her like a catapult. As a result, she is doing more damage in this land than if a plague had fallen upon it; for her beauty and graciousness win the hearts of all who would serve her, but her disdain and the disillusionment it brings lead them in the end to despair, and then they can only call her cruel and ungrateful, along with other similar epithets that reveal all too plainly the state of mind that prompts them. If you were to stay here some time, sir, you would hear these uplands and valleys echo with the laments of those who have followed her only to be deceived.

"Not far from here is a place where there are a couple of dozen tall beeches, and there is not a one of them on whose smooth bark Marcela's name has not been engraved; and above some of these inscriptions you will find a crown, as if by this her lover meant to indicate that she deserved to wear the garland of beauty above all the women on the earth. Here a shepherd sighs and there another voices his lament. Now are to be heard amorous ballads, and again despairing ditties. One will spend all the hours of the night seated at the foot of some oak or rock without once closing his tearful eyes, and the morning sun will find him there, stupefied and lost in thought. Another, without giving truce or respite to his sighs, will lie stretched upon the burning sands in the full heat of the most exhausting summer noontide, sending up his complaint to merciful Heaven.

"And, meanwhile, over this one and that one, over one and all, the beauteous Marcela triumphs and goes her own way, free and unconcerned. All those of us who know her are waiting to see how far her pride will carry her, and who will be the fortunate man who will succeed in taming this terrible creature and thus come into possession of a beauty so matchless as hers. Knowing all this that I have told you to be undoubtedly true, I can readily believe this lad's story about the cause of Grisóstomo's death. And so I advise you, sir, not to fail to be present tomorrow at his burial; it will be well worth seeing, for he has many friends, and the place is not half a league from here."

"I will make a point of it," said Don Quixote, "and I thank you for the pleasure you have given me by telling me so delightful a tale."

"Oh," said the goatherd, "I do not know the half of the things that have happened to Marcela's lovers; but it is possible that tomorrow we may meet along the way some shepherd who will tell us more. And now it would be well for you to go and sleep under cover, for the night air may not be good for your wound, though with the remedy that has been put on it there is not much to fear."

Sancho Panza, who had been sending the goatherd to the devil for talking so much, now put in a word with his master, urging him to come and sleep in Pedro's hut. Don Quixote did so; and all the rest of the night was spent by him in thinking of his lady Dulcinea, in imitation of Marcela's lovers. As for Sancho, he made himself comfortable between Rocinante and the ass and at once dropped off to sleep, not like a lovelorn swain but, rather, like a man who has had a sound kicking that day.

CHAPTER XIII

In which is brought to a close the story of the shepherdess Marcela, along with other events.

Day had barely begun to appear upon the balconies of the east when five or six goatherds arose and went to awaken Don Quixote and tell him that if he was still of a mind to go see Grisóstomo's famous burial they would keep him company. The knight, desiring nothing better, ordered Sancho to saddle at once, which was done with much dispatch, and then they all set out forthwith.

They had not gone more than a quarter of a league when, upon crossing a footpath, they saw coming toward them six shepherds clad in black sheepskins and with garlands of cypress and bitter rosebay on their heads. Each of them carried a thick staff made of the wood of the holly, and with them came two gentlemen on horseback in handsome traveling attire, accompanied by three lads on foot. As the two parties met they greeted each other courteously, each inquiring as to the other's destination, whereupon they learned that they were all going to the burial, and so continued to ride along together.

Speaking to his companion, one of them said, "I think, Señor Vivaldo, that we are going to be well repaid for the delay it will cost us to see this famous funeral; for famous it must surely be, judging by the strange things that these shepherds have told us of the dead man and the homicidal shepherdess."

"I think so too," agreed Vivaldo. "I should be willing to delay our journey not one day, but four, for the sake of seeing it."

Don Quixote then asked them what it was they had heard of Marcela and Grisóstomo. The traveler replied that on that very morning they had fallen in with those shepherds and, seeing them so mournfully trigged out, had asked them what the occasion for it was. One of the fellows had then told them of the beauty and strange demeanor of a shepherdess by the name of Marcela, her many suitors, and the death of this Grisóstomo, to whose funeral they were bound. He related, in short, the entire story as Don Quixote had heard it from Pedro.

Changing the subject, the gentleman called Vivaldo inquired of Don Quixote what it was that led him to go armed in that manner in a land that was so peaceful.

"The calling that I profess," replied Don Quixote, "does not permit me to do otherwise. An easy pace, pleasure, and repose—those things were invented for delicate courtiers; but toil, anxiety, and arms—they are for those whom the world knows as knights-errant, of whom I, though unworthy, am the very least."

No sooner had they heard this than all of them immediately took him for a madman. By way of assuring himself further and seeing what kind of madness it was of which Don Quixote was possessed, Vivaldo now asked him what was meant by the term knights-errant.

"Have not your Worships read the annals and the histories of England that treat of the famous exploits of King Arthur, who in our Castilian balladry is always called King Artús? According to a very old tradition that is common throughout the entire realm of Great Britain, this king did not die, but by an act of enchantment was changed into a raven; and in due course of time he is to return and reign once more, recovering his kingdom and his scepter; for which reason, from that day to this, no Englishman is known to have killed one of those birds. It was, moreover, in the time of that good king that the famous order of the Knights of the Round Table was instituted; and as for the love of Sir Lancelot of the Lake and Queen Guinevere, everything took place exactly as the story has it, their confidante and go-between being the honored matron Quintañona; whence comes that charming ballad that is such a favorite with us Spaniards:

*Never was there a knight
So served by maid and dame
As the one they call Sir Lancelot When from Britain he came—* to carry on the gentle, pleasing course of his loves and noble deeds.

"From that time forth, the order of chivalry was passed on and propagated from one individual to another until it had spread through many and various parts of the world. Among those famed for their exploits was the valiant Amadis of Gaul, with all his sons and grandsons to the fifth generation; and there was also the brave Felixmarte of Hircania, and the never sufficiently praised Tirant lo Blanch; and in view of the fact that he lived in our own day, almost, we came near to seeing, hearing, and conversing with that other courageous knight, Don Belianís of Greece.<sup>2</sup>

"And that, gentlemen, is what it means to be a knight-errant, and what I have been telling you of is the order of chivalry which such a knight professes, an order to which, as I have already informed you, I, although a sinner, have the honor of belonging; for I have made the same profession as have those other knights. That is why it is you find me in these wild and lonely places, riding in quest of adventure, being resolved to offer my arm and my person in the most dangerous undertaking fate may have in store for me, that I may be of aid to the weak and needy."

Listening to this speech, the travelers had some while since come to the conclusion that Don Quixote was out of his mind, and were likewise able to perceive the peculiar nature of his madness, and they wondered at it quite as much as did all those who encountered it for the first time. Being endowed with a ready wit and a merry disposition and thinking to pass the time until they reached the end of the short journey which, so he was told, awaited them before they should arrive at the mountain where the burial was to take place, Vivaldo decided to give him a further opportunity of displaying his absurdities.

"It strikes me, Sir Knight-errant," he said, "that your Grace has espoused one of the most austere professions to be found anywhere on earth—even more austere, if I am not mistaken, than that of the Carthusian monks."

"Theirs may be as austere as ours," Don Quixote replied, "but that it is as necessary I am very much inclined to doubt. For if the truth be told, the soldier who carries out his captain's order does no less than the captain who gives the order. By that I mean to say that the religious, in all peace and tranquility, pray to Heaven for earth's good, but we soldiers and knights put their prayers into execution by defending with the might of our good right arms and at the edge of the sword those things for which they pray; and we do this not under cover of a roof but under the open sky, beneath the insufferable rays of the summer sun and the biting cold of winter. Thus we become the ministers of God on earth, and our arms the means by which He executes His decrees. And just as war and all the things that have to do with it are impossible without toil, sweat, and anxiety, it follows that those who have taken upon themselves such a profession must unquestionably labor harder than do those who in peace and tranquility and at their ease pray God to favor the ones who can do little in their own behalf.

"I do not mean to say—I should not think of saying—that the state of knight-errant is as holy as that of the cloistered monk; I merely would imply, from what I myself endure, that ours is beyond a doubt the more laborious and arduous calling, more beset by hunger and thirst, more wretched, ragged, and ridden with lice. It is an absolute certainty that the knights-errant of old experienced much misfortune in the course of their lives; and if some by their might and valor came to be emperors, you may take my word for it, it cost them dearly in blood and sweat, and if those who rose to such a rank had lacked enchanters and magicians to aid them, they surely would have been cheated of their desires, deceived in their hopes and expectations."

2. Each of the knights praised here is the fictitious hero of a romance popular in Cervantes' time.

"I agree with you on that," said the traveler, "but there is one thing among others that gives me a very bad impression of the knights-errant, and that is the fact that when they are about to enter upon some great and perilous adventure in which they are in danger of losing their lives, they never at that moment think of commending themselves to God as every good Christian is obliged to do under similar circumstances, but, rather, commend themselves to their ladies with as much fervor and devotion as if their mistresses were God himself; all of which to me smacks somewhat of paganism."

"Sir," Don Quixote answered him, "it could not by any means be otherwise; the knight-errant who did not do so would fall into disgrace, for it is the usage and custom of chivalry that the knight, before engaging in some great feat of arms, shall behold his lady in front of him and shall turn his eyes toward her, gently and lovingly, as if beseeching her favor and protection in the hazardous encounter that awaits him, and even though no one hears him, he is obliged to utter certain words between his teeth, commending himself to her with all his heart; and of this we have numerous examples in the histories. Nor is it to be assumed that he does not commend himself to God also, but the time and place for that is in the course of the undertaking."

"All the same," said the traveler, "I am not wholly clear in this matter; for I have often read of two knights-errant exchanging words until, one word leading to another, their wrath is kindled; whereupon, turning their steeds and taking a good run up the field, they whirl about and bear down upon each other at full speed, commending themselves to their ladies in the midst of it all. What commonly happens then is that one of the two topples from his horse's flanks and is run through and through with the other's lance; and his adversary would also fall to the ground if he did not cling to his horse's mane. What I do not understand is how the dead man would have had time to commend himself to God in the course of this accelerated combat. It would be better if the words he wasted in calling upon his lady as he ran toward the other knight had been spent in paying the debt that he owed as a Christian. Moreover, it is my personal opinion that not all knights-errant have ladies to whom to commend themselves, for not all of them are in love."

"That," said Don Quixote, "is impossible. I assert there can be no knight-errant without a lady; for it is as natural and proper for them to be in love as it is for the heavens to have stars, and I am quite sure that no one ever read a story in which a loveless man of arms was to be met with, for the simple reason that such a one would not be looked upon as a legitimate knight but as a bastard one who had entered the fortress of chivalry not by the main gate, but over the walls, like a robber and a thief."

"Nevertheless," said the traveler, "if my memory serves me right, I have read that Don Galaor, brother of the valorous Amadis of Gaul, never had a special lady to whom he prayed, yet he was not held in any the less esteem for that but was a very brave and famous knight."

Once again, our Don Quixote had an answer. "Sir, one swallow does not make a summer. And in any event, I happen to know that this knight was secretly very much in love. As for his habit of paying court to all the ladies that caught his fancy, that was a natural propensity on his part and one that he was unable to resist. There was, however, one particular lady whom he had made the mistress of his will and to whom he did commend himself very frequently and privately; for he prided himself upon being a reticent knight."

"Well, then," said the traveler, "if it is essential that every knight-errant be in love, it is to be presumed that your Grace is also, since you are of the profession. And unless it be that you pride yourself upon your reticence as much as did Don Galaor, then I truly, on my own behalf and in the name of all this company, beseech your Grace to tell us your lady's name, the name of the country where she resides, what her rank is, and something of the beauty of her person, that she may esteem herself fortunate in having all the world know that she is loved and served by such a knight as your Grace appears to me to be."

At this, Don Quixote heaved a deep sigh. "I cannot say," he began, "as to whether or not my sweet enemy would be pleased that all the world should know I serve her. I can only tell you, in response to the question which you have so politely put to me, that her name is Dulcinea, her place of residence El Toboso, a village of La Mancha. As to her rank, she should be at the very least a princess, seeing that she is my lady and my queen. Her beauty is superhuman, for in it are realized all the impossible and chimerical attributes that poets are accustomed to give their fair ones. Her locks are golden, her brow the Elysian Fields, her eyebrows rainbows, her eyes suns, her cheeks roses, her lips coral, her teeth pearls, her neck alabaster, her bosom marble, her hands ivory, her complexion snow-white. As for those parts which modesty keeps covered from the human sight, it is my opinion that, discreetly considered, they are only to be extolled and not compared to any other."

"We should like," said Vivaldo, "to know something as well of her lineage, her race and ancestry."

"She is not," said Don Quixote, "of the ancient Roman Curtii, Caii, or Scipios, nor of the modern Colonnas and Orsini, nor of the Moncadas and Requesenses of Catalonia, nor is she of the Rebellas and Villanovas of Valencia, or the Palafoxes, Nuzas, Rocabertis, Corellas, Lunas, Alagones, Urreas, or Gurreas of Aragon, the Cerdas, Manriques, Mendozas, or Guzmanes of Castile, the Alencastros, Pallas, or Menezes of Portugal; but she is of the Tobosos of La Mancha, and although the line is a modern one, it well may give rise to the most illustrious families of the centuries to come. And let none dispute this with me, unless it be under the conditions which Zerbino has set forth in the inscription beneath Orlando's arms:

*These let none move
Who dares not with Orlando his valor prove.*"<sup>3</sup>

"Although my own line," replied the traveler, "is that of the Gachupins of Laredo, I should not venture to compare it with the Tobosos of La Mancha, in view of the fact that, to tell you the truth, I have never heard the name before."

3. From Ludovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, 24.57.

"How does it come that you have never heard it!" exclaimed Don Quixote.

The others were listening most attentively to the conversation of these two, and even the goatherds and shepherds were by now aware that our knight of La Mancha was more than a little insane. Sancho Panza alone thought that all his master said was the truth, for he was well acquainted with him, having known him since birth. The only doubt in his mind had to do with the beautiful Dulcinea del Toboso, for he knew of no such princess and the name was strange to his ears, although he lived not far from that place.

They were continuing on their way, conversing in this manner, when they caught sight of some twenty shepherds coming through the gap between two high mountains, all of them clad in black woolen garments and with wreaths on their heads, some of the garlands, as was afterward learned, being of cypress, others of yew. Six of them were carrying a bier covered with a great variety of flowers and boughs.

"There they come with Grisóstomo's body," said one of the goatherds, "and the foot of the mountain yonder is where he wished to be buried."

They accordingly quickened their pace and arrived just as those carrying the bier had set it down on the ground. Four of the shepherds with sharpened picks were engaged in digging a grave alongside the barren rock. After a courteous exchange of greetings, Don Quixote and his companions turned to look at the bier. Upon it lay a corpse covered with flowers, the body of a man dressed like a shepherd and around thirty years of age. Even in death it could be seen that he had had a handsome face and had been of a jovial disposition. Round about him upon the bier were a number of books and many papers, open and folded.

Meanwhile, those who stood gazing at the dead man and those who were digging the grave—everyone present, in fact—preserved an awed silence, until one of the pallbearers said to another, "Look well, Ambrosio, and make sure that this is the place that Grisóstomo had in mind, since you are bent upon carrying out to the letter the provisions of his will."

"This is it," replied Ambrosio; "for many times my unfortunate friend told me the story of his misadventure. He told me that it was here that he first laid eyes upon that mortal enemy of the human race, and it was here, also, that he first revealed to her his passion, for he was as honorable as he was lovelorn; and it was here, finally, at their last meeting, that she shattered his illusions and showed him her disdain, thus bringing to an end the tragedy of his wretched life. And here, in memory of his great misfortune, he wished to be laid in the bowels of eternal oblivion."

Then, turning to Don Quixote and the travelers, he went on, "This body, gentlemen, on which you now look with pitying eyes was the depository of a soul which heaven had endowed with a vast share of its riches. This is the body of Grisóstomo, who was unrivaled in wit, unequalled in courtesy, supreme in gentleness of bearing, a model of friendship, generous without stint, grave without conceit, merry without being vulgar—in short, first in all that is good and second to none in the matter of misfortunes. He loved well and was hated, he adored and was disdained; he wooed a wild beast, importuned a piece of marble, ran after the wind, cried out to loneliness, waited upon ingratitude, and his reward was to be the spoils of death midway in his life's course—a life that was brought to an end by a shepherdess whom he sought to immortalize that she might live on in the memory of mankind, as those papers that you see there would very plainly show if he had not commanded me to consign them to the flames even as his body is given to the earth.”

“You,” said Vivaldo, “would treat them with greater harshness and cruelty than their owner himself, for it is neither just nor fitting to carry out the will of one who commands what is contrary to all reason. It would not have been a good thing for Augustus Caesar to consent to have them execute the behests of the divine Mantuan in his last testament.<sup>4</sup> And so, Señor Ambrosio, while you may give the body of your friend to the earth, you ought not to give his writings to oblivion. If out of bitterness he left such an order, that does not mean that you are to obey it without using your own discretion. Rather, by granting life to these papers, you permit Marcela’s cruelheartedness to live forever and serve as an example to the others in the days that are to come in order that they may flee and avoid such pitfalls as these.

“I and those that have come with me know the story of this lovesick and despairing friend of yours; we know the affection that was between you, and what the occasion of his death was, and the things that he commanded be done as his life drew to a close. And from this lamentable tale anyone may see how great was Marcela’s cruelty; they may behold Grisóstomo’s love, the loyalty that lay in your friendship, and the end that awaits those who run headlong, with unbridled passion, down the path that doting love opens before their gaze. Last night we heard of your friend’s death and learned that he was to be buried here, and out of pity and curiosity we turned aside from our journey and resolved to come see with our own eyes that which had aroused so much compassion when it was told to us. And in requital of that compassion, and the desire that has been born in us to prevent if we can a recurrence of such tragic circumstances, we beg you, O prudent Ambrosio!—or, at least, I for my part implore you—to give up your intention of burning these papers and let me carry some of them away with me.”

Without waiting for the shepherd to reply he put out his hand and took a few of those that were nearest him.

“Out of courtesy, sir,” said Ambrosio when he saw this, “I will consent for you to keep those that you have taken; but it is vain to think that I will refrain from burning the others.”

Vivaldo, who was anxious to find out what was in the papers, opened one of them and perceived that it bore the title “Song of Despair.”

Hearing this, Ambrosio said, “That is the last thing the poor fellow wrote; and in order, sir, that you may see the end to which his misfortunes brought him, read it aloud if you will, for we shall have time for it while they are digging the grave.”

“That I will very willingly do,” said Vivaldo.

And since all the bystanders had the same desire, they gathered around as he in a loud clear voice read the following poem.

4. Virgil (born near Mantua in 70 B.C.E.) had left instructions that his Roman epic, the Aeneid, should be burned.

CHAPTER XIV

In which are set down the despairing verses of the deceased shepherd, with other unlooked-for happenings.

Grisóstomo's Song

Since thou desirest that thy cruelty
Be spread from tongue to tongue and land to land,
The unrelenting sternness of thy heart
Shall turn my bosom's hell to minstrelsy
That all men everywhere may understand
The nature of my grief and what thou art.
And as I seek my sorrows to import,
Telling of all the things that thou hast done,
My very entrails shall speak out to brand
Thy heartlessness, thy soul to reprimand,
Where no compassion ever have I won.
Then listen well, lend an attentive ear;
This ballad that thou art about to hear
Is not contrived by art; 'tis a simple song
Such as shepherds sing each day throughout the year—
Surcease of pain for me, for thee a prong.

Then let the roar of lion, fierce wolf's cry,
The horrid hissing of the scaly snake,
The terrifying sound of monsters strange,
Ill-omened call of crow against the sky,
The howling of the wind as it doth shake
The tossing sea where all is constant change,
Bellow of vanquished bull that cannot range
As it was wont to do, the piteous sob
Of the widowed dove as if its heart would break,
Hoot of the envied owl,<sup>5</sup> ever awake,
From hell's own choir the deep and mournful throb—
Let all these sounds come forth and mingle now.
For if I'm to tell my woes, why then, I vow,
I must new measures find, new modes invent,
With sound confusing sense, I may somehow Portray the inferno where my days are spent.

The mournful echoes of my murmurous plaint
Father Tagus shall not hear as he rolls his sand, Nor olive-bordered Betis;<sup>6</sup> my lament shall be
To the tall and barren rock as I acquaint
The caves with my sorrow; the far and lonely strand
No human foot has trod shall hear from me
The story of thine inhumanity
As told with lifeless tongue but living word.
I'll tell it to the valleys near at hand
Where never shines the sun upon the land;

5. Envied by other birds as the only one that witnessed the Crucifixion.

6. The river Guadalquivir. "Father Tagus": the river Tagus, the Iberian Peninsula's longest river.

By venomous serpents shall my tale be heard
 On the low-lying, marshy river plain.
 And yet, the telling will not be in vain;
 For the reverberations of my plight,
 Thy matchless austerity and this my pain,
 Through the wide world shall go, thee to indict.

Disdain may kill; suspicion false or true
 May slay all patience; deadliest of all
 Is jealousy; while absence renders life
 Worse than a void; Hope lends no roseate hue Against forgetfulness or the dread call
 Of death inevitable, the end of strife.
 Yet—unheard miracle!—with sorrows rife,
 My own existence somehow still goes on;
 The flame of life with me doth rise and fall.
 Jealous I am, disdained; I know the gall
 Of those suspicions that will not be gone,
 Which leave me not the shadow of a hope,
 And, desperate, I will not even grope
 But rather will endure until the end,
 And with despair eternally I'll cope,
 Knowing that things for me will never mend.

Can one both hope and fear at the same season?
 Would it be well to do so in any case,
 Seeing that fear, by far, hath the better excuse?
 Confronting jealousy, is there any reason
 For me to close my eyes to its stern face,
 Pretend to see it not? What is the use,
 When its dread presence I can still deduce
 From countless gaping wounds deep in my heart?
 When suspicion—bitter change!—to truth gives place,
 And truth itself, losing its virgin grace,
 Becomes a lie, is it not wisdom's part
 To open wide the door to frank mistrust?
 When disdain's unveiled, to doubt is only just.
 O ye fierce tyrants of Love's empery!
 Shackle these hands with stout cord, if ye must.
 My pain shall drown your triumph—woe is me!

I die, in short, and since nor life nor death
 Yields any hope, to my fancy will I cling.
 That man is freest who is Love's bond slave:
 I'll say this with my living-dying breath,
 And the ancient tyrant's praises I will sing.
 Love is the greatest blessing Heaven e'er gave.
 What greater beauty could a lover crave
 Than that which my fair enemy doth show
 In soul and body and in everything?
 E'en her forgetfulness of me doth spring
 From my own lack of grace, that I well know.
 In spite of all the wrongs that he has wrought,
 Love rules his empire justly as he ought.

*Throw all to the winds and speed life's wretched span
By feeding on his self-deluding thought.
No blessing holds the future that I scan.*

*Thou whose unreasonableness reason doth give
For putting an end to this tired life of mine,
From the deep heart wounds which thou mayest plainly see,
Judge if the better course be to die or live.
Gladly did I surrender my will to thine,
Gladly I suffered all thou didst to me;
And now that I'm dying, should it seem to thee
My death is worth a tear from thy bright eyes,
Pray hold it back, fair one, do not repine,
For I would have from thee no faintest sign
Of penitence, e'en though my soul thy prize.
Rather, I'd have thee laugh, be very gay,
And let my funeral be a festive day—
But I am very simple! knowing full well
That thou art bound to go thy blithesome way,
And my untimely end thy fame shall swell.*

*Come, thirsting Tantalus from out Hell's pit;
Come, Sisyphus with the terrifying weight
Of that stone thou rollest; Tityus, bring Thy vulture and thine anguish infinite;
Ixion<sup>7</sup> with thy wheel, be thou not late;
Come, too, ye sisters ever laboring;<sup>8</sup>
Come all, your griefs into my bosom fling,
And then, with lowered voices, intone a dirge,
If dirge be fitting for one so desperate,
A body without a shroud, unhappy fate!
And Hell's three-headed gatemanager,<sup>9</sup> do thou emerge
With a myriad other phantoms, monstrous swarm,
Beings infernal of fantastic form,
Raising their voices for the uncomforted
In a counterpoint of grief, harmonious storm.
What better burial for a lover dead?*

*Despairing song of mine, do not complain,
Nor let our parting cause thee any pain,
For my misfortune is not wholly bad,
Seeing her fortune's bettered by my demise.
Then, even in the grave, be thou not sad.*

Those who had listened to Grisóstomo's poem liked it well enough, but the one who read it remarked that it did not appear to him to conform to what had been told him of Marcela's modesty and virtue, seeing that in it the author

7. In Greek myth, all four are proverbial images of mortals punished by the Gods with different forms of torture: Tantalus, craving water and fruit which he always fails to reach; Sisyphus, forever vainly trying to roll a stone upward to the top of a hill; Tityus, having his liver devoured by a vulture; and Ixion, being bound to a revolving wheel.

8. In classical mythology, the three Fates (Moerae to the Greeks, Parcae to the Romans), spinners of man's destiny.

9. Cerberus, a doglike three-headed monster, the mythological guardian of Hell.

complaints of jealousy, suspicion, and absence, all to the prejudice of her good name. To this Ambrosio, as one who had known his friend's most deeply hidden thoughts, replied as follows:

"By way of satisfying, sir, the doubt that you entertain, it is well for you to know that when the unfortunate man wrote that poem, he was by his own volition absent from Marcela, to see if this would work a cure; but when the enamored one is away from his love, there is nothing that does not inspire in him fear and torment, and such was the case with Grisóstomo, for whom jealous imaginings, fears, and suspicions became a seeming reality. And so, in this respect, Marcela's reputation for virtue remains unimpaired; beyond being cruel and somewhat arrogant, and exceedingly disdainful, she could not be accused by the most envious of any other fault."

"Yes, that is so," said Vivaldo.

He was about to read another of the papers he had saved from the fire when he was stopped by a marvelous vision—for such it appeared—that suddenly met his sight; for there atop the rock beside which the grave was being hollowed out stood the shepherdess Marcela herself, more beautiful even than she was reputed to be. Those who up to then had never seen her looked on in silent admiration, while those who were accustomed to beholding her were held in as great a suspense as the ones who were gazing upon her for the first time.

No sooner had Ambrosio glimpsed her than, with a show of indignation, he called out to her, "So, fierce basilisk<sup>1</sup> of these mountains, have you perchance come to see if in your presence blood will flow from the wounds of this poor wretch whom you by your cruelty have deprived of life?<sup>2</sup> Have you come to gloat over your inhuman exploits, or would you from that height look down like another pitiless Nero upon your Rome in flames and ashes?<sup>3</sup> Or perhaps you would arrogantly tread under foot this poor corpse, as an ungrateful daughter did that of her father Tarquinius?<sup>4</sup> Tell us quickly why you have come and what it is that you want most; for I know that Grisóstomo's thoughts never failed to obey you in life, and though he is dead now, I will see that all those who call themselves his friends obey you likewise."

"I do not come, O Ambrosio, for any of the reasons that you have mentioned," replied Marcela. "I come to defend myself and to demonstrate how unreasonable all those persons are who blame me for their sufferings and for Grisóstomo's death. I therefore ask all present to hear me attentively. It will not take long and I shall not have to spend many words in persuading those of you who are sensible that I speak the truth.

"Heaven made me beautiful, you say, so beautiful that you are compelled to love me whether you will or no; and in return for the love that you show me, you would have it that I am obliged to love you in return. I know, with that natural understanding that God has given me, that everything beautiful is lov-

1. A mythical lizardlike creature whose gaze and breath were supposed to be lethal.

2. According to folklore, the corpse of a murdered person was supposed to bleed in the presence of the murderer.

3. In tale and proverb, the Roman emperor Nero is supposed to have been singing while from a tower he observed the burning of Rome in 64 C.E.

4. The inaccurate allusion is to Tullia, actually the wife of the last of the legendary kings of early Rome, Tarquinius; she let the wheel of her carriage trample over the body of her father—the previous king, Servius Tullius—whom her husband Tarquinius had liquidated.

able; but I cannot see that it follows that the object that is loved for its beauty must love the one who loves it. Let us suppose that the lover of the beautiful were ugly and, being ugly, deserved to be shunned; it would then be highly absurd for him to say, 'I love you because you are beautiful; you must love me because I am ugly.'

"But assuming that two individuals are equally beautiful, it does not mean that their desires are the same; for not all beauty inspires love, but may sometimes merely delight the eye and leave the will intact. If it were otherwise, no one would know what he wanted, but all would wander vaguely and aimlessly with nothing upon which to settle their affections; for the number of beautiful objects being infinite, desires similarly would be boundless. I have heard it said that true love knows no division and must be voluntary and not forced. This being so, as I believe it is, then why would you compel me to surrender my will for no other reason than that you say you love me? But tell me: supposing that Heaven which made me beautiful had made me ugly instead, should I have any right to complain because you did not love me? You must remember, moreover, that I did not choose this beauty that is mine; such as it is, Heaven gave it to me of its grace, without any choice or asking on my part. As the viper is not to be blamed for the deadly poison that it bears, since that is a gift of nature, so I do not deserve to be reprehended for my comeliness of form.

"Beauty in a modest woman is like a distant fire or a sharp-edged sword: the one does not burn, the other does not cut, those who do not come near it. Honor and virtue are the adornments of the soul, without which the body is not beautiful though it may appear to be. If modesty is one of the virtues that most adorn and beautify body and soul, why should she who is loved for her beauty part with that virtue merely to satisfy the whim of one who solely for his own pleasure strives with all his force and energy to cause her to lose it? I was born a free being, and in order to live freely I chose the solitude of the fields; these mountain trees are my company, the clear-running waters in these brooks are my mirror, and to the trees and waters I communicate my thoughts and lend them of my beauty.

"In short, I am that distant fire, that sharp-edged sword, that does not burn or cut. Those who have been enamored by the sight of me I have disillusioned with my words; and if desire is sustained by hope, I gave none to Grisóstomo or any other, and of none of them can it be said that I killed them with my cruelty, for it was rather their own obstinacy that was to blame. And if you reproach me with the fact that his intentions were honorable and that I ought for that reason to have complied with them, I will tell you that when, on this very spot where his grave is now being dug, he revealed them to me, I replied that it was my own intention to live in perpetual solitude and that only the earth should enjoy the fruit of my retirement and the spoils of my beauty; and if he with all this plain-speaking was still stubbornly bent upon hoping against hope and sailing against the wind, is it to be wondered at if he drowned in the gulf of his own folly?

"Had I led him on, it would have been falsely; had I gratified his passion, it would have been against my own best judgment and intentions; but, though I had disillusioned him, he persisted, and though I did not hate him, he was driven to despair. Ask yourselves, then, if it is reasonable to blame me for his woes! Let him who has been truly deceived complain; let him despair who has been cheated of his promised hopes; if I have enticed any, let him speak up; if I have accepted the attentions of any, let him boast of it; but let not him to whom I have promised nothing, whom I have neither enticed nor accepted, apply to me such terms as cruel and homicidal. It has not as yet been Heaven's will to destine me to love any man, and there is no use expecting me to love of my own free choice.

"Let what I am saying now apply to each and every one of those who would have me for their own, and let it be understood from now on that if any die on account of me, he is not to be regarded as an unfortunate victim of jealousy, since she that cares for none can give to none the occasion for being jealous; nor is my plain-speaking to be taken as disdain. He who calls me a wild beast and a basilisk, let him leave me alone as something that is evil and harmful; let him who calls me ungrateful cease to wait upon me; let him who finds me strange shun my acquaintance; if I am cruel, do not run after me; in which case this wild beast, this basilisk, this strange, cruel, ungrateful creature will not run after them, seek them out, wait upon them, nor endeavor to know them in any way.

"The thing that killed Grisóstomo was his impatience and the impetuosity of his desire; so why blame my modest conduct and retiring life? If I choose to preserve my purity here in the company of the trees, how can he complain of my unwillingness to lose it who would have me keep it with other men? I, as you know, have a worldly fortune of my own and do not covet that of others. My life is a free one, and I do not wish to be subject to another in any way. I neither love nor hate anyone; I do not repel this one and allure that one; I do not play fast and loose with any. The modest conversation of these village lasses and the care of my goats is sufficient to occupy me. Those mountains there represent the bounds of my desire, and should my wishes go beyond them, it is but to contemplate the beauty of the heavens, that pathway by which the soul travels to its first dwelling place."

Saying this and without waiting for any reply, she turned her back and entered the thickest part of a nearby wood, leaving all present lost in admiration of her wit as well as her beauty. A few—those who had felt the powerful dart of her glances and bore the wounds inflicted by her lovely eyes—were of a mind to follow her, taking no heed of the plainly worded warning they had just had from her lips; whereupon Don Quixote, seeing this and thinking to himself that here was an opportunity to display his chivalry by succoring a damsel in distress, laid his hand upon the hilt of his sword and cried out, loudly and distinctly, "Let no person of whatever state or condition he may be dare to follow the beauteous Marcela under pain of incurring my furious wrath. She has shown with clear and sufficient reasons that little or no blame for Grisóstomo's death is to be attached to her; she has likewise shown how far she is from acceding to the desires of any of her suitors, and it is accordingly only just that in place of being hounded and persecuted she should be honored and esteemed by all good people in this world as the only woman in it who lives with such modesty and good intentions."

Whether it was due to Don Quixote's threats or because Ambrosio now told them that they should finish doing the things which his good friend had desired should be done, no one stirred from the spot until the burial was over and Grisóstomo's papers had been burned. As the body was laid in the grave, many tears were shed by the bystanders. Then they placed a heavy stone upon it until the slab which Ambrosio was thinking of having made should be ready, with an epitaph that was to read:

*Here lies a shepherd by love betrayed,
His body cold in death,
Who with his last and faltering breath
Spoke of a faithless maid.
He died by the cruel, heartless hand
Of a coy and lovely lass,
Who by bringing men to so sorry a pass
Love's tyranny doth expand.*

They then scattered many flowers and boughs over the top of the grave, and, expressing their condolences to the dead man's friend, Ambrosio, they all took their leave, including Vivaldo and his companions. Don Quixote now said goodbye to the travelers as well, although they urged him to come with them to Seville, assuring him that he would find in every street and at every corner of that city more adventures than are to be met with anywhere else. He thanked them for the invitation and the courtesy they had shown him in offering it, but added that for the present he had no desire to visit Seville, not until he should have rid these mountains of the robbers and bandits of which they were said to be full.

Seeing that his mind was made up, the travelers did not urge him further but, bidding him another farewell, left him and continued on their way; and the reader may be sure that in the course of their journey they did not fail to discuss the story of Marcela and Grisóstomo as well as Don Quixote's madness. As for the good knight himself, he was resolved to go seek the shepherdess and offer her any service that lay in his power; but things did not turn out the way he expected. * * *

[Fighting the Sheep]

From CHAPTER XVIII

In which is set forth the conversation that Sancho Panza had with his master, Don Quixote, along with other adventures deserving of record.

* * *

Don Quixote caught sight down the road of a large cloud of dust that was drawing nearer.

"This, O Sancho," he said, turning to his squire, "is the day when you shall see the boon that fate has in store for me; this, I repeat, is the day when, as well as on any other, shall be displayed the valor of my good right arm. On this day I shall perform deeds that will be written down in the book of fame for all centuries to come. Do you see that dust cloud rising there, Sancho? That is the dust stirred up by a vast army marching in this direction and composed of many nations."

"At that rate," said Sancho, "there must be two of them, for there is another one just like it on the other side."

Don Quixote turned to look and saw that this was so. He was overjoyed by the thought that these were indeed two armies about to meet and clash in the middle of the broad plain; for at every hour and every moment his imagination was filled with battles, enchantments, nonsensical adventures, tales of love, amorous challenges, and the like, such as he had read of in the books of chivalry, and every word he uttered, every thought that crossed his mind, every act he performed, had to do with such things as these. The dust clouds he had sighted were raised by two large droves of sheep coming along the road in opposite directions, which by reason of the dust were not visible until they were close at hand, but Don Quixote insisted so earnestly that they were armies that Sancho came to believe it.

"Sir," he said, "what are we to do?"

"What are we to do?" echoed his master. "Favor and aid the weak and needy. I would inform you, Sancho, that the one coming toward us is led and commanded by the great emperor Alifanfarón, lord of the great isle of Trapobana. This other one at my back is that of his enemy, the king of the Garamantas, Pentapolín of the Rolled-up Sleeve, for he always goes into battle with his right arm bare."

"But why are they such enemies?" Sancho asked.

"Because," said Don Quixote, "this Alifanfarón is a terrible pagan and in love with Pentapolín's daughter, who is a very beautiful and gracious lady and a Christian, for which reason her father does not wish to give her to the pagan king unless the latter first abjures the law of the false prophet, Mohammed, and adopts the faith that is Pentapolín's own."

"Then, by my beard," said Sancho, "if Pentapolín isn't right, and I am going to aid him all I can."

"In that," said Don Quixote, "you will only be doing your duty; for to engage in battles of this sort you need not have been dubbed a knight."

"I can understand that," said Sancho, "but where are we going to put this ass so that we will be certain of finding him after the fray is over? As for going into battle on such a mount, I do not think that has been done up to now."

"That is true enough," said Don Quixote. "What you had best do with him is to turn him loose and run the risk of losing him; for after we emerge the victors we shall have so many horses that even Rocinante will be in danger of being exchanged for another. But listen closely to what I am about to tell you, for I wish to give you an account of the principal knights that are accompanying these two armies; and in order that you may be the better able to see and take note of them, let us retire to that hillock over there which will afford us a very good view."

They then stationed themselves upon a slight elevation from which they would have been able to see very well the two droves of sheep that Don Quixote took to be armies if it had not been for the blinding clouds of dust. In spite of this, however, the worthy gentleman contrived to behold in his imagination what he did not see and what did not exist in reality.

Raising his voice, he went on to explain, "That knight in the gilded armor that you see there, bearing upon his shield a crowned lion crouched at the feet of a damsel, is the valiant Laurcalco, lord of the Silver Bridge; the other with the golden flowers on his armor, and on his shield three crowns argent on an azure field, is the dread Micocolembó, grand duke of Quirocia. And that one on Micocolembó's right hand, with the limbs of a giant, is the ever undaunted Brandabarbarán de Boliche, lord of the three Arabias. He goes armored in a serpent's skin and has for shield a door which, so report has it, is one of those from the temple that Samson pulled down, that time when he avenged himself on his enemies with his own death.

"But turn your eyes in this direction, and you will behold at the head of the other army the ever victorious, never vanquished Timonel de Carcajona, prince of New Biscay, who comes with quartered arms—azure, vert, argent, and or<sup>5</sup>—and who has upon his shield a cat or on a field tawny, with the inscription Miau, which is the beginning of his lady's name; for she, so it is said, is the peerless Miulina, daughter of Alfeñiquén, duke of Algarve. And that one over there, who weights down and presses the loins of that powerful charger, in a suit of snow-white armor with a white shield that bears no device whatever—he is a novice knight of the French nation, called Pierres Papin, lord of the baronies of Utrique. As for him you see digging his iron spurs into the flanks of that fleet-footed zebra courser and whose arms are vairs azure, he is the mighty duke of Nervia, Espartafileardo of the Wood, who has for device upon his shield an asparagus plant with a motto in Castilian that says 'Rastrea mi suerte.'"<sup>6</sup>

In this manner he went on naming any number of imaginary knights on either side, describing on the spur of the moment their arms, colors, devices, and mottoes; for he was completely carried away by his imagination and by this unheard-of madness that had laid hold of him.

Without pausing, he went on, "This squadron in front of us is composed of men of various nations. There are those who drink the sweet waters of the famous Xanthus; woodsmen who tread the Massilian plain; those that sift the fine gold nuggets of Arabia Felix; those that are so fortunate as to dwell on the banks of the clear-running Thermodon, famed for their coolness; those who in many and diverse ways drain the golden Pactolus; Numidians, whose word is never to be trusted; Persians, with their famous bows and arrows; Medes and Parthians, who fight as they flee; Scythians, as cruel as they are fair of skin; Ethiopians, with their pierced lips; and an infinite number of other nationalities whose visages I see and recognize although I cannot recall their names.

"In this other squadron come those that drink from the crystal currents of the olive-bearing Betis; those that smooth and polish their faces with the liquid of the ever rich and gilded Tagus; those that enjoy the beneficial waters of the divine Genil; those that roam the Tartessian plains with their abundant pasturage; those that disport themselves in the Elysian meadows of Jerez; the men of La Mancha, rich and crowned with golden ears of corn; others clad in iron garments, ancient relics of the Gothic race; those that bathe in the Pisuerga, noted for the mildness of its current; those that feed their herds in the wide-spreading pasture lands along the banks of the winding Guadiana, celebrated for its underground course;<sup>7</sup> those that shiver from the cold of the wooded Pyrenees or dwell amid the white peaks of the lofty Apennines—in short, all those whom Europe holds within its girth."

So help me God! How many provinces, how many nations did he not mention by name, giving to each one with marvelous readiness its proper attributes; for he was wholly absorbed and filled to the brim with what he had read in those lying books of his! Sancho Panza hung on his words, saying nothing, merely turning his head from time to time to have a look at those knights and

5. Heraldic terms for, respectively, blue, green, silver, and gold.

6. Probably a pun on rastrear (Spanish for "to track" or "to drag"). The meaning of the motto may be either "On Fortune's track" or "My Fortune creeps." "Arms": i.e. coat of arms, heraldic device.

7. The Guadiana does run underground part of the way through La Mancha.

giants that his master was pointing out to him; but he was unable to discover any of them.

"Sir," he said, "may I go to the devil if I see a single man, giant, or knight of all those that your Grace is talking about. Who knows? Maybe it is another spell, like last night."<sup>8</sup>

"How can you say that?" replied Don Quixote. "Can you not hear the neighing of the horses, the sound of trumpets, the roll of drums?"

"I hear nothing," said Sancho, "except the bleating of sheep."

And this, of course, was the truth; for the flocks were drawing near.

"The trouble is, Sancho," said Don Quixote, "you are so afraid that you cannot see or hear properly; for one of the effects of fear is to disturb the senses and cause things to appear other than what they are. If you are so craven as all that, go off to one side and leave me alone, and I without your help will assure the victory to that side to which I lend my aid."

Saying this, he put spurs to Rocinante and, with his lance at rest, darted down the hillside like a flash of lightning.

As he did so, Sancho called after him, "Come back, your Grace, Señor Don Quixote; I vow to God those are sheep that you are charging. Come back! O wretched father that bore me! What madness is this? Look you, there are no giants, nor knights, nor cats, nor shields either quartered or whole, nor vairs azure or bedeviled. What is this you are doing, O sinner that I am in God's sight?"

But all this did not cause Don Quixote to turn back. Instead, he rode on, crying out at the top of his voice, "Ho, knights, those of you who follow and fight under the banners of the valiant Pentapolín of the Rolled-up Sleeve; follow me, all of you, and you shall see how easily I give you revenge on your enemy, Alifanfarón of Trapobana."

With these words he charged into the middle of the flock of sheep and began spearing at them with as much courage and boldness as if they had been his mortal enemies. The shepherds and herdsmen who were with the animals called to him to stop; but seeing it was no use, they unloosed their slings and saluted his ears with stones as big as your fist.

Don Quixote paid no attention to the missiles and, dashing about here and there, kept crying, "Where are you, haughty Alifanfarón? Come out to me; for here is a solitary knight who desires in single combat to test your strength and deprive you of your life, as a punishment for that which you have done to the valorous Pentapolín Garamanta."

At that instant a pebble from the brook struck him in the side and buried a couple of ribs in his body. Believing himself dead or badly wounded, and remembering his potion, he took out his vial, placed it to his mouth, and began to swallow the balm; but before he had had what he thought was enough, there came another almond, which struck him in the hand, crushing the tin vial and carrying away with it a couple of grinders from his mouth, as well as badly mashing two of his fingers. As a result of these blows the poor knight tumbled from his horse. Believing that they had killed him, the shepherds hastily collected their flock and, picking up the dead beasts, of which there were more than seven, they went off down the road without more ado.

8. The inn where they had spent the previous night had been pronounced by Don Quixote to be an enchanted castle.

Sancho all this time was standing on the slope observing the insane things that his master was doing; and as he plucked savagely at his beard he cursed the hour and minute when luck had brought them together. But when he saw him lying there on the ground and perceived that the shepherds were gone, he went down the hill and came up to him, finding him in very bad shape though not unconscious.

“Didn’t I tell you, Señor Don Quixote,” he said, “that you should come back, that those were not armies you were charging but flocks of sheep?”

“This,” said Don Quixote, “is the work of that thieving magician, my enemy, who thus counterfeits things and causes them to disappear. You must know, Sancho, that it is very easy for them to make us assume any appearance that they choose; and so it is that malign one who persecutes me, envious of the glory he saw me about to achieve in this battle, changed the squadrons of the foe into flocks of sheep. If you do not believe me, I beseech you on my life to do one thing for me, that you may be undeceived and discover for yourself that what I say is true. Mount your ass and follow them quietly, and when you have gone a short way from here, you will see them become their former selves once more; they will no longer be sheep but men exactly as I described them to you in the first place. But do not go now, for I need your kind assistance; come over here and have a look and tell me how many grinders are missing, for it feels as if I did not have a single one left.”

* * *

[“To Right Wrongs and Come to the Aid of the Wretched”]

CHAPTER XXII

Of how Don Quixote freed many unfortunate ones who, much against their will, were being taken where they did not wish to go.

Cid Hamete Benengeli, the Arabic and Manchegan<sup>9</sup> author, in the course of this most grave, high-sounding, minute, delightful, and imaginative history, informs us that, following the remarks that were exchanged between Don Quixote de la Mancha and Sancho Panza, his squire, as related at the end of Chapter xxi, the knight looked up and saw coming toward them down the road which they were following a dozen or so men on foot, strung together by their necks like beads on an iron chain and all of them wearing handcuffs. They were accompanied by two men on horseback and two on foot, the former carrying wheel-lock muskets while the other two were armed with swords and javelins.

“That,” said Sancho as soon as he saw them, “is a chain of galley slaves, people on their way to the galleys where by order of the king they are forced to labor.”

“What do you mean by ‘forced’?” asked Don Quixote. “Is it possible that the king uses force on anyone?”

“I did not say that,” replied Sancho. “What I did say was that these are folks who have been condemned for their crimes to forced labor in the galleys for his Majesty the King.”

9. Of La Mancha.

"The short of it is," said the knight, "whichever way you put it, these people are being taken there by force and not of their own free will."

"That is the way it is," said Sancho.

"Well, in that case," said his master, "now is the time for me to fulfill the duties of my calling, which is to right wrongs and come to the aid of the wretched."

"But take note, your Grace," said Sancho, "that justice, that is to say, the king himself, is not using any force upon, or doing any wrong to, people like these, but is merely punishing them for the crimes they have committed."

The chain of galley slaves had come up to them by this time, whereupon Don Quixote very courteously requested the guards to inform him of the reason or reasons why they were conducting these people in such a manner as this. One of the men on horseback then replied that the men were prisoners who had been condemned by his Majesty to serve in the galleys, whither they were bound, and that was all there was to be said about it and all that he, Don Quixote, need know.

"Nevertheless," said the latter, "I should like to inquire of each one of them, individually, the cause of his misfortune." And he went on speaking so very politely in an effort to persuade them to tell him what he wanted to know that the other mounted guard finally said, "Although we have here the record and certificate of sentence of each one of these wretches, we have not the time to get them out and read them to you; and so your Grace may come over and ask the prisoners themselves, and they will tell you if they choose, and you may be sure that they will, for these fellows take a delight in their knavish exploits and in boasting of them afterward."

With this permission, even though he would have done so if it had not been granted him, Don Quixote went up to the chain of prisoners and asked the first whom he encountered what sins had brought him to so sorry a plight. The man replied that it was for being a lover that he found himself in that line.

"For that and nothing more?" said Don Quixote. "And do they, then, send lovers to the galleys? If so, I should have been rowing there long ago."

"But it was not the kind of love that your Grace has in mind," the prisoner went on. "I loved a wash basket full of white linen so well and hugged it so tightly that, if they had not taken it away from me by force, I would never of my own choice have let go of it to this very minute. I was caught in the act, there was no need to torture me, the case was soon disposed of, and they supplied me with a hundred lashes across the shoulders and, in addition, a three-year stretch in the gurapas, and that's all there is to tell."

"What are gurapas?" asked Don Quixote.

"Gurapas are the galleys," replied the prisoner. He was a lad of around twenty-four and stated that he was a native of Piedrahita.

The knight then put the same question to a second man, who appeared to be very downcast and melancholy and did not have a word to say. The first man answered for him.

"This one, sir," he said, "is going as a canary—I mean, as a musician and singer."

"How is that?" Don Quixote wanted to know. "Do musicians and singers go to the galleys too?"

"Yes, sir; and there is nothing worse than singing when you're in trouble."

"On the contrary," said Don Quixote, "I have heard it said that he who sings frightens away his sorrows."

"It is just the opposite," said the prisoner; "for he who sings once weeps all his life long."

"I do not understand," said the knight.

One of the guards then explained. "Sir Knight, with this non sancta<sup>1</sup> tribe, to sing when you're in trouble means to confess under torture. This sinner was put to the torture and confessed his crime, which was that of being a cuatrero, or cattle thief, and as a result of his confession he was condemned to six years in the galleys in addition to two hundred lashes which he took on his shoulders; and so it is he is always downcast and moody, for the other thieves, those back where he came from and the ones here, mistreat, snub, ridicule, and despise him for having confessed and for not having had the courage to deny his guilt. They are in the habit of saying that the word no has the same number of letters as the word sí, and that a culprit is in luck when his life or death depends on his own tongue and not that of witnesses or upon evidence; and, in my opinion, they are not very far wrong."

"And I," said Don Quixote, "feel the same way about it." He then went on to a third prisoner and repeated his question.

The fellow answered at once, quite unconcernedly. "I'm going to my ladies, the gurapas, for five years, for the lack of five ducats."<sup>2</sup>

"I would gladly give twenty," said Don Quixote, "to get you out of this."

"That," said the prisoner, "reminds me of the man in the middle of the ocean who has money and is dying of hunger because there is no place to buy what he needs. I say this for the reason that if I had had, at the right time, those twenty ducats your Grace is now offering me, I'd have greased the notary's quill and freshened up the attorney's wit with them, and I'd now be living in the middle of Zocodover Square in Toledo instead of being here on this highway coupled like a greyhound. But God is great; patience, and that's enough of it."

Don Quixote went on to a fourth prisoner, a venerable-looking old fellow with a white beard that fell over his bosom. When asked how he came to be there, this one began weeping and made no reply, but a fifth comrade spoke up in his behalf.

"This worthy man," he said, "is on his way to the galleys after having made the usual rounds clad in a robe of state and on horseback."<sup>3</sup>

"That means, I take it," said Sancho, "that he has been put to shame in public."

"That is it," said the prisoner, "and the offense for which he is being punished is that of having been an ear broker, or, better, a body broker. By that I mean to say, in short, that the gentleman is a pimp, and besides, he has his points as a sorcerer."

"If that point had not been thrown in," said Don Quixote, "he would not deserve, for merely being a pimp, to have to row in the galleys, but rather should be the general and give orders there. For the office of pimp is not an indifferent one; it is a function to be performed by persons of discretion and is most necessary in a well-ordered state; it is a profession that should be followed only by the wellborn, and there should, moreover, be a supervisor or examiner as in the case of other offices, and the number of practitioners should be fixed by law as is done

1. Unholy (Latin).

2. Gold or silver coins minted in Spain and elsewhere in Europe to facilitate trade.

3. I.e., after having been flogged in public, with all the ceremony that accompanied that punishment.

with brokers on the exchange. In that way many evils would be averted that arise when this office is filled and this calling practiced by stupid folk and those with little sense, such as silly women and pages or mountebanks with few years and less experience to their credit, who, on the most pressing occasions, when it is necessary to use one's wits, let the crumbs freeze between their hand and their mouth and do not know which is their right hand and which is the left.

"I would go on and give reasons why it is fitting to choose carefully those who are to fulfill so necessary a state function, but this is not the place for it. One of these days I will speak of the matter to someone who is able to do something about it. I will say here only that the pain I felt at seeing those white hairs and this venerable countenance in such a plight, and all for his having been a pimp, has been offset for me by the additional information you have given me, to the effect that he is a sorcerer as well; for I am convinced that there are no sorcerers in the world who can move and compel the will, as some simple-minded persons think, but that our will is free and no herb or charm can force it.<sup>4</sup> All that certain foolish women and cunning tricksters do is to compound a few mixtures and poisons with which they deprive men of their senses while pretending that they have the power to make them loved, although, as I have just said, one cannot affect another's will in that manner."

"That is so," said the worthy old man; "but the truth is, sir, I am not guilty on the sorcery charge. As for being a pimp, that is something I cannot deny. I never thought there was any harm in it, however, my only desire being that everyone should enjoy himself and live in peace and quiet, without any quarrels or troubles. But these good intentions on my part cannot prevent me from going where I do not want to go, to a place from which I do not expect to return; for my years are heavy upon me and an affection of the urine that I have will not give me a moment's rest."

With this, he began weeping once more, and Sancho was so touched by it that he took a four-real piece from his bosom and gave it to him as an act of charity.

Don Quixote then went on and asked another what his offense was. The fellow answered him, not with less, but with much more, briskness than the preceding one had shown.

"I am here," he said, "for the reason that I carried a joke too far with a couple of cousins-german<sup>5</sup> of mine and a couple of others who were not mine, and I ended by jesting with all of them to such an extent that the devil himself would never be able to straighten out the relationship. They proved everything on me, there was no one to show me favor, I had no money, I came near swinging for it, they sentenced me to the galleys for six years, and I accepted the sentence as the punishment that was due me. I am young yet, and if I live long enough, everything will come out all right. If, Sir Knight, your Grace has anything with which to aid these poor creatures that you see before you, God will reward you in Heaven, and we here on earth will make it a point to ask God in our prayers to grant you long life and good health, as long and as good as your amiable presence deserves."

4. Here Don Quixote despises charms and love potions, although often elsewhere, in his own vision of himself as a knight-errant, he accepts enchantments and spells as part of his world of fantasy.

5. First cousins.

This man was dressed as a student, and one of the guards told Don Quixote that he was a great talker and a very fine Latinist.

Back of these came a man around thirty years of age and of very good appearance, except that when he looked at you his eyes were seen to be a little crossed. He was shackled in a different manner from the others, for he dragged behind him a chain so huge that it was wrapped all around his body, with two rings at the throat, one of which was attached to the chain while the other was fastened to what is known as a keep-friend or friend's foot, from which two irons hung down to his waist, ending in handcuffs secured by a heavy padlock in such a manner that he could neither raise his hands to his mouth nor lower his head to reach his hands.

When Don Quixote asked why this man was so much more heavily chained than the others, the guard replied that it was because he had more crimes against him than all the others put together, and he was so bold and cunning that, even though they had him chained like this, they were by no means sure of him but feared that he might escape from them.

"What crimes could he have committed," asked the knight, "if he has merited a punishment no greater than that of being sent to the galleys?"

"He is being sent there for ten years," replied the guard, "and that is equivalent to civil death. I need tell you no more than that this good man is the famous Ginés de Pasamonte, otherwise known as Ginesillo de Parapilla."

"Señor Commissary," spoke up the prisoner at this point, "go easy there and let us not be so free with names and surnames. My just name is Ginés and not Ginesillo; and Pasamonte, not Parapilla as you make it out to be, is my family name. Let each one mind his own affairs and he will have his hands full."

"Speak a little more respectfully, you big thief, you," said the commissary, "unless you want me to make you be quiet in a way you won't like."

"Man goes as God pleases, that is plain to be seen," replied the galley slave, "but someday someone will know whether my name is Ginesillo de Parapilla or not."

"But, you liar, isn't that what they call you?"

"Yes," said Ginés, "they do call me that; but I'll put a stop to it, or else I'll skin their you-know-what. And you, sir, if you have anything to give us, give it and may God go with you, for I am tired of all this prying into other people's lives. If you want to know anything about my life, know that I am Ginés de Pasamonte whose life story has been written down by these fingers that you see here."

"He speaks the truth," said the commissary, "for he has himself written his story, as big as you please, and has left the book in the prison, having pawned it for two hundred reales."

"And I mean to redeem it," said Ginés, "even if it costs me two hundred ducats."

"Is it as good as that?" inquired Don Quixote.

"It is so good," replied Ginés, "that it will cast into the shade Lazarillo de Tormes<sup>6</sup> and all others of that sort that have been or will be written. What I would tell you is that it deals with facts, and facts so interesting and amusing that no lies could equal them.”

6. A picaresque or rogue novel, published anonymously about the middle of the 16th century.

“And what is the title of the book?” asked Don Quixote.

“The Life of Ginés de Pasamonte.”

“Is it finished?”

“How could it be finished,” said Ginés, “when my life is not finished as yet? What I have written thus far is an account of what happened to me from the time I was born up to the last time that they sent me to the galleys.”

“Then you have been there before?”

“In the service of God and the king I was there four years, and I know what the biscuit and the cowhide are like. I don’t mind going very much, for there I will have a chance to finish my book. I still have many things to say, and in the Spanish galleys I shall have all the leisure that I need, though I don’t need much, since I know by heart what it is I want to write.”

“You seem to be a clever fellow,” said Don Quixote.

“And an unfortunate one,” said Ginés; “for misfortunes always pursue men of genius.”

“They pursue rogues,” said the commissary.

“I have told you to go easy, Señor Commissary,” said Pasamonte, “for their Lordships did not give you that staff in order that you might mistreat us poor devils with it, but they intended that you should guide and conduct us in accordance with his Majesty’s command. Otherwise, by the life of—But enough. It may be that someday the stains made in the inn will come out in the wash. Meanwhile, let everyone hold his tongue, behave well, and speak better, and let us be on our way. We’ve had enough of this foolishness.”

At this point the commissary raised his staff as if to let Pasamonte have it in answer to his threats, but Don Quixote placed himself between them and begged the officer not to abuse the man; for it was not to be wondered at if one who had his hands so bound should be a trifle free with his tongue. With this, he turned and addressed them all.

“From all that you have told me, my dearest brothers,” he said, “one thing stands out clearly for me, and that is the fact that, even though it is a punishment for offenses which you have committed, the penalty you are about to pay is not greatly to your liking and you are going to the galleys very much against your own will and desire. It may be that the lack of spirit which one of you displayed under torture, the lack of money on the part of another, the lack of influential friends, or, finally, warped judgment on the part of the magistrate, was the thing that led to your downfall; and, as a result, justice was not done you. All of which presents itself to my mind in such a fashion that I am at this moment engaged in trying to persuade and even force myself to show you what the purpose was for which Heaven sent me into this world, why it was it led me to adopt the calling of knighthood which I profess and take the knightly vow to favor the needy and aid those who are oppressed by the powerful.

“However, knowing as I do that it is not the part of prudence to do by foul means what can be accomplished by fair ones, I propose to ask these gentlemen, your guards, and the commissary to be so good as to unshackle you and permit you to go in peace. There will be no dearth of others to serve his Majesty under more propitious circumstances; and it does not appear to me to be just to make slaves of those whom God created as free men. What is more, gentlemen of the guard, these poor fellows have committed no offense against you. Up there, each of us will have to answer for his own sins; for God in Heaven will not fail to punish the evil and reward the good; and it is not good for self-respecting men to be executioners of their fellow-men in something that does not concern them. And so, I ask this of you, gently and quietly, in order that, if you comply with my request, I shall have reason to thank you; and if you do not do so of your own accord, then this lance and this sword and the valor of my arm shall compel you to do it by force.”

“A fine lot of foolishness!” exclaimed the commissary. “So he comes out at last with this nonsense! He would have us let the prisoners of the king go free, as if we had any authority to do so or he any right to command it! Be on your way, sir, at once; straighten that basin that you have on your head, and do not go looking for three feet on a cat.”<sup>7</sup>

“You,” replied Don Quixote, “are the cat and the rat and the rascal!” And, saying this, he charged the commissary so quickly that the latter had no chance to defend himself but fell to the ground badly wounded by the lance blow. The other guards were astounded by this unexpected occurrence; but, recovering their self-possession, those on horseback drew their swords, those on foot leveled their javelins, and all bore down on Don Quixote, who stood waiting for them very calmly. Things undoubtedly would have gone badly for him if the galley slaves, seeing an opportunity to gain their freedom, had not succeeded in breaking the chain that linked them together. Such was the confusion that the guards, now running to fall upon the prisoners and now attacking Don Quixote, who in turn was attacking them, accomplished nothing that was of any use.

Sancho for his part aided Ginés de Pasamonte to free himself, and that individual was the first to drop his chains and leap out onto the field, where, attacking the fallen commissary, he took away that officer’s sword and musket; and as he stood there, aiming first at one and then at another, though without firing, the plain was soon cleared of guards, for they had taken to their heels, fleeing at once Pasamonte’s weapon and the stones which the galley slaves, freed now, were hurling at them. Sancho, meanwhile, was very much disturbed over this unfortunate event, as he felt sure that the fugitives would report the matter to the Holy Brotherhood, which, to the ringing of the alarm bell, would come out to search for the guilty parties. He said as much to his master, telling him that they should leave at once and go into hiding in the nearby mountains.

“That is all very well,” said Don Quixote, “but I know what had best be done now.” He then summoned all the prisoners, who, running riot, had by this time despoiled the commissary of everything that he had, down to his skin, and as they gathered around to hear what he had to say, he addressed them as follows:

“It is fitting that those who are wellborn should give thanks for the benefits they have received, and one of the sins with which God is most offended is that of ingratitude. I say this, gentlemen, for the reason that you have seen and had manifest proof of what you owe to me; and now that you are free of the yoke which I have removed from about your necks, it is my will and desire that you should set out and proceed to the city of El Toboso and there present yourselves before the lady Dulcinea del Toboso and say to her that her champion,

7. I.e., looking for the impossible (“five feet” is the more usual form of the proverb).

the Knight of the Mournful Countenance, has sent you; and then you will relate to her, point by point, the whole of this famous adventure which has won you your longed-for freedom. Having done that, you may go where you like, and may good luck go with you."

To this Ginés de Pasamonte replied in behalf of all of them, "It is absolutely impossible, your Grace, our liberator, for us to do what you have commanded. We cannot go down the highway all together but must separate and go singly, each in his own direction, endeavoring to hide ourselves in the bowels of the earth in order not to be found by the Holy Brotherhood, which undoubtedly will come out to search for us. What your Grace can do, and it is right that you should do so, is to change this service and toll that you require of us in connection with the lady Dulcinea del Toboso into a certain number of Credos and Hail Marys which we will say for your Grace's intention, as this is something that can be accomplished by day or night, fleeing or resting, in peace or in war. To imagine, on the other hand, that we are going to return to the fleshpots of Egypt, by which I mean, take up our chains again by setting out along the highway for El Toboso, is to believe that it is night now instead of ten o'clock in the morning and is to ask of us something that is the same as asking pears of the elm tree."

"Then by all that's holy!" exclaimed Don Quixote, whose wrath was now aroused, "you, Don Son of a Whore, Don Ginesillo de Parapilla, or whatever your name is, you shall go alone, your tail between your legs and the whole chain on your back."

Pasamonte, who was by no means a long-suffering individual, was by this time convinced that Don Quixote was not quite right in the head, seeing that he had been guilty of such a folly as that of desiring to free them; and so, when he heard himself insulted in this manner, he merely gave the wink to his companions and, going off to one side, began raining so many stones upon the knight that the latter was wholly unable to protect himself with his buckler, while poor Rocinante paid no more attention to the spur than if he had been made of brass. As for Sancho, he took refuge behind his donkey as a protection against the cloud and shower of rocks that was falling on both of them, but Don Quixote was not able to shield himself so well, and there is no telling how many struck his body, with such force as to unhorse and bring him to the ground.

No sooner had he fallen than the student was upon him. Seizing the basin from the knight's head, he struck him three or four blows with it across the shoulders and banged it against the ground an equal number of times until it was fairly shattered to bits. They then stripped Don Quixote of the doublet which he wore over his armor, and would have taken his hose as well, if his greaves had not prevented them from doing so, and made off with Sancho's greatcoat, leaving him naked; after which, dividing the rest of the battle spoils amongst themselves, each of them went his own way, being a good deal more concerned with eluding the dreaded Holy Brotherhood than they were with burdening themselves with a chain or going to present themselves before the lady Dulcinea del Toboso.

They were left alone now—the ass and Rocinante, Sancho and Don Quixote: the ass, crestfallen and pensive, wagging its ears now and then, being under the impression that the hurricane of stones that had raged about them was not yet over; Rocinante, stretched alongside his master, for the hack also had been felled by a stone; Sancho, naked and fearful of the Holy Brotherhood; and Don Quixote, making wry faces at seeing himself so mishandled by those to whom he had done so much good.

[A Story of Captivity in North Africa, Told to Don Quixote at the Inn]

From CHAPTER XXXIX

In which the captive narrates the events of his life.<sup>8</sup>

“It was in a village in the mountains of León<sup>9</sup> that the line of which I come had its beginnings, a family more favored by nature than by fortune, although amid the poverty that prevailed in that region my father had the reputation of being a rich man and indeed might have been one, had he displayed the same skill in conserving his property that he did in squandering it. His inclination to liberal spending came from his having been a soldier in his youth, for that is a school in which the miser becomes generous and the generous becomes prodigal; if there are some soldiers that are parsimonious, they may be said to be freaks such as are rarely to be met with.

“My father went beyond the bounds of liberality and came close to prodigality, which is not a profitable thing for a married man with children to bring up who are to succeed him and carry on his name. He had three of them, all of them males and of an age to decide upon their calling in life. Accordingly, when he saw that, as he put it, there was no use in his trying to overcome his natural propensity, he made up his mind to rid himself of the instrument and cause of his lavish spending; in other words, he would get rid of his property, for without his fortune Alexander himself would have appeared in straitened circumstances. And so, calling the three of us together one day and closing himself alone with us, he proceeded to address us somewhat in the following manner:

“My sons, there is no need of my telling you that I have your welfare at heart; it is enough to know and state that you are my sons. On the other hand, the fact that I am unable to control myself when it comes to preserving your estate may well give you a contrary impression. For this reason, in order that you may be assured from now on that I love you as a father should and have no desire to ruin you as a stepfather might, I have decided to do for you something that I have long had in mind and to which I have given the most mature consideration. You are of an age to enter upon your professions in life, or at least to choose the ones which, when you are older, will bring you profit and honor.

“What I have thought of doing is to divide my estate into four parts, three of which I will turn over to you so that each has that which is his by right, while the fourth part I will retain for my own livelihood and support for the rest of

8. Chapters 39–41 show Don Quixote once again listening to other characters’ interpolated stories, in this case, that of a former captive who had arrived at the inn with a mysterious veiled woman. Cervantes himself spent five years as a captive in North Africa, and the captive’s marvelous narrative is full of precise details about piracy in the Mediterranean, life in captivity, and the complicated connections across the Christian–Muslim divide.

9. A region in northern Spain, associated with Christian resistance to the Muslim invasion of the peninsula.

the time that Heaven shall be pleased to grant me. But after each of you has had his due share of the property, I would have you follow one of the courses that I shall indicate. We have here in Spain a proverb which to my mind is a very true one, as indeed they all are, being wise maxims drawn from long experience. This one runs, "The Church, the sea, or the Royal Household," which in plainer language is equivalent to saying, "He who would make the most of himself and become a rich man, let him become a churchman, or go to sea and be a merchant, or enter the service of kings in their palaces." For there is another saying, "Better a king's crumb than a lord's favor."

"I tell you this because it is my wish that one of you follow the profession of letters, that another go into trade, and that the third serve his king as a soldier, seeing that it is a difficult thing to obtain service in his household; for if the military life does not bring much wealth, it does confer fame and high esteem. Within a week, I will give you your shares in money, without defrauding you of a single penny, as you shall see in due course. Tell me, then, if you feel inclined to follow my advice and precepts in relation to what I have suggested.'

"He then called upon me as the eldest to answer; and after having told him that he ought not to rid himself of his property in that manner but should spend as much of it as he wished, since we were young and able to make our own way, I ended by assuring him that I would do as he desired, my own choice being to follow the profession of arms and thus serve God and my king. My second brother, having made a similar declaration, announced his intention of going to the Indies and investing his share in commerce. The youngest one, and in my opinion the wisest, said that he preferred to enter the Church or to go to Salamanca<sup>1</sup> to complete the course of study that he had already begun.

"When we had made our choice of callings, my father embraced us all, and within the brief space of time mentioned he carried out his promise by giving each of us his share, which as I remember amounted to three thousand ducats in currency; for an uncle of ours had purchased the estate and paid for it in cash in order to keep it in the family. On that same day the three of us took leave of our goodhearted father; but inasmuch as it seemed to me an inhuman thing for him to be left with so little money in his old age, I prevailed upon him to take two of my three thousand ducats, since the remainder would be sufficient to meet my wants as a soldier. Moved by my example, my two brothers each gave him a thousand, so that he had in all four thousand, plus the three thousand which, as it appeared, his share of the estate was worth; for he did not care to dispose of his portion but preferred to keep it in land.

"And so, then, as I was saying, we took our leave of him and of our uncle, not without much feeling and many tears on the part of all. They charged us to let them know, whenever it was possible for us to do so, as to how we were faring and whether we were meeting with prosperity or adversity, and we promised them that we would. When he had embraced us and given us his benediction, we all departed, one setting out for Salamanca, another for Seville,<sup>2</sup> while I made for Alicante, where I had heard there was a Genoese craft taking on a cargo of wool for that city.

1. Site of the oldest and most prestigious university in Spain.

2. Seville was the port city for trade and travel to the New World; Alicante was a port for Mediterranean trade.

"It is now twenty-two years since I left my father's house, and although in the course of that time I have written a number of letters, I have had no word either of him or of my brothers. As to my own experiences during those years, I shall relate them for you briefly. Embarking at Alicante, I had a fair voyage to Genoa, and from there I went on to Milan, where I fitted myself out with arms and a few accessories. For it was my intention to take service in the Piedmont, and I was already on my way to Alessandria dell Paglia when I heard that the great Duke of Alva was starting for Flanders. I then changed my plan and, joining his army, served with him in the three campaigns that he waged. I was present at the deaths of the Counts of Egmont and Hoorne and rose to the rank of ensign under a famous captain of Guadalajara, Diego de Urbina by name. After I had been in Flanders for some while, news came of the league which his Holiness, Pope Pius V of blessed memory, had formed with Venice and Spain against the common enemy, the Turk, who about that time had taken, with his fleet, the famous island of Cyprus, which was then under the rule of the Venetians.<sup>3</sup> This was a serious loss and one truly to be deplored.

"It was known for a fact that the commanding general of this league was to be his Most Serene Highness, John of Austria, brother of our good King Philip, and there was much talk of the great and warlike preparations that he was making. I was deeply stirred by all this and felt a desire to take part in the coming campaign; and although I had prospects and almost certain promises of being promoted to captain where I then served, on the first occasion that offered, I chose to leave all this and return to Italy. And as it happened, John of Austria had just arrived in Genoa on his way to Naples to join the Venetian fleet, as he afterward did at Messina.

"In short, I may tell you that I was soon taking part in that most fortunate campaign,<sup>4</sup> having already been made a captain of infantry, an honor that I owed to my good fortune rather than to my merits. And on that day that was so happy a one for all Christendom, since it revealed to all the nations of the world the error under which they had been laboring in believing that the Turks were invincible at sea—on that day, I repeat, in which the haughty Ottoman pride was shattered, among all the happy ones that were there (and those Christians that died were even happier than those that remained alive and victorious), I alone was wretched; for in place of a naval crown<sup>5</sup> such as I might have hoped for had it been in Roman times, I found myself on the night that followed that famous day with chains on my feet and manacles on my hands.

"The way in which it came about was this: El Uchali,<sup>6</sup> King of Algiers, a bold and successful corsair, had attacked and captured the flagship of Malta, on which only three knights were left alive and those three badly wounded; where-

3. All the figures mentioned here are historical. The Captive fights for Habsburg Spain on various fronts: in Flanders, where the Spanish general Fernando Alvarez de Toledo, Duke of Alba (1507–1582) was charged with putting down the revolt of the Northern Provinces, and in the Mediterranean, where Spain joined in a "Holy League" with the papacy and Venice to combat the Ottoman Empire ("the Turk"). "Counts of Egmont and Hoorne": Belgian nobles executed for their rebellion in 1568. "Diego de Urbina":

Cervantes served under this captain at the naval battle of Lepanto, where the Ottomans were defeated.

4. I.e., the battle of Lepanto, fought in the Ionian Sea near Corinth, Greece.

5. Awarded to the first man to board the enemy ship during battle.

6. Uluch Ali (1519–1587), viceroy of Algiers (an Ottoman protectorate) and commander of the Ottoman fleet, defeated the Maltese flagship at Lepanto.

upon the ship of Giovanni Andrea<sup>7</sup> on which I and my company were stationed, came to its assistance. Doing what was customary under the circumstances, I leaped aboard the enemy galley, which, by veering off from the attacking vessel, prevented my men from following me. Thus I was alone among the enemy, who so greatly outnumbered me that any hope of resistance was vain; and the short of it is, after I had been badly wounded, they captured me. As you know, gentlemen, El Uchali and all his fleet made their escape, so that I was left a prisoner in his hands; and that is the reason why it was that only I was miserable among so many who were happy, and a captive among so many who were free. For there were fifteen thousand Christians slaving at the oars in the Turkish fleet who that day obtained their liberty.<sup>8</sup>

"They took me to Constantinople, where the Grand Turk Selim<sup>9</sup> made my master commander at sea for having done his duty in battle so well and displayed his bravery by carrying off the standard of the Order of Malta.<sup>1</sup> The following year, which was '72, I was in Navarino, rowing in the flagship with the three lanterns, and there I saw and noted how the opportunity was lost for capturing the entire Turkish fleet in the harbor; for all the sailors and Janizaries<sup>2</sup> were convinced that they would be attacked while in port and had their clothing and their passamaques, or shoes, in readiness in order that they might be able to flee overland without waiting to give combat, so great was the fear that our fleet inspired in them. But Heaven ordained otherwise, not because of any fault or carelessness on the part of our commander, but as a punishment for the sins of Christendom, since it is God's will that we should have with us always the agents of his wrath.

"The upshot of it was, El Uchali withdrew to Modon, which is an island near Navarino, and there, disembarking his men, he proceeded to fortify the mouth of the harbor, after which he waited quietly until John retired. On this voyage one of the galleys, called the Prize, whose captain was a son of the famous corsair Barbarossa, was captured by the Neapolitan craft known as the She-Wolf, commanded by that thunderbolt of war, that father to his men, the fortunate and never-vanquished captain, Don Alvaro de Bazán, Marquis of Santa Cruz.

"I must not omit telling you what took place in connection with this capture. Barbarossa's son was so cruel and treated his captives so badly that the moment the rowers saw the She-Wolf bearing down and gaining upon them, they all at one and the same time dropped their oars and seized the captain, who was standing upon the gangway platform, urging them to row faster. Laying hold of him, they passed him on from bench to bench and from poop to prow, and so bit and chewed him that before he had gone much farther than the ship's mast his soul had already gone to Hell. Such, as I have said, was the cruelty with which he treated them and the hatred that they had for him.

"We then returned to Constantinople, and the next year, which was '73, we learned how John had captured Tunis, driven the Turks out of that kingdom,

7. The Genoese admiral Giovanni Andrea Doria (1539–1606), who led the forces of the Holy League at Lepanto.

8. Captives on either side of the Habsburg–Ottoman conflict were primarily put to work as oarsmen in Mediterranean galleys.

9. Selim II (1524–1574, r. 1566–74), sultan of the Ottoman Empire.

1. I.e., the flag of the militant Christian religious order based on the island of Malta, in the Mediterranean, from where they attacked North African ships.

2. Ottoman soldiers; originally an elite corps made up of captured Christian boys.

and placed Muley Hamet on the throne, thus cutting short the hopes that Muley Hamida,<sup>3</sup> bravest and crudest Moor in all the world, had of returning to rule there. The Great Turk felt this loss very keenly and, having resort to the cunning which all those of his line possess, he made peace with the Venetians, who desired it much more than he did; and the following year, in '74, he attacked the Goleta<sup>4</sup> and the Fort near Tunis which John had left in a state of semi-completion.

"During all this time I was at the oar, with no hope whatever of gaining my freedom. At least I had no hope of ransom, for I was determined not to write the news of my misfortune to my father. Both the Goleta and the Fort finally fell, for in front of them were massed seventy-five thousand Turkish regulars, while the number of Moors and Arabs from all over Africa was in excess of four hundred thousand; and this enormous force was equipped with so many munitions and engines of war and accompanied by so many sappers that the latter might readily have buried both their objectives under handfuls of earth.

"The Goleta, which had previously been looked upon as inexpugnable, was the first to succumb; and if it was lost, this was not the fault of its defenders, who did all that they should and could have done. It was rather due to the fact that, as experience showed, it was easy to throw up entrenchments in the desert sand; for water was commonly found there at a depth of two palms, but the Turks went down for a depth of two varas<sup>5</sup> without striking any, and as a result, piling their sandbags one on top of another, they were able to raise ramparts so high that they could command the walls of the fort and fire upon them as from a bastion, so that it was impossible to make a stand or put up a defense.

* * *

From CHAPTER XL

In which the captive's story is continued.

* * *

"Well, then, the Goleta and the Fort having fallen, the Turks ordered the former stronghold dismantled, there being nothing left of the Fort to raze; and in order to accomplish the task more speedily and with less labor, they mined three-quarters of it, but by no device could they succeed in blowing up what appeared to be the weakest part, namely the old walls. On the other hand, all that remained of the new fortifications that the Little Friar<sup>6</sup> had built was brought to the ground with the greatest of ease.

"Finally, the victorious fleet returned in triumph to Constantinople, and a few months afterward my master, El Uchali, died, the one who was known as 'Uchali Fartax,' which in the Turkish tongue means 'scurvy renegade'; for that is what he was, and it is the custom of the Turks to bestow names that signify some fault or virtue. This is for the reason that they have only four surnames

3. Muley Hamet (Muley Mohammed) became ruler of Tunis in 1573, but was captured by the Ottomans the following year. His brother Muley Hamida (Ahmed Sultan) had joined the attack on Tunis by John of Austria.

4. Fortress at the mouth of Tunis's harbor.

5. One vara is a measure equivalent to about 2.8 feet.

6. Nickname for the Italian architect Giacomo Paleazzo, who served Philip II.

altogether, which apply to those descended from the Ottoman line, the others, as I started to say, take their names and surnames from bodily defects or moral characteristics. And this Scurvy One, being a slave of the Grand Seignior's, had slaved at the oar for fourteen years, being then more than thirty-four years of age when he turned renegade. The way it came about was this: as he was rowing one day a Turk had dealt him a blow, and in order to be revenged on the fellow he renounced his faith. After that, his valor proved to be so outstanding that he did not have to resort to the usual underhanded ways and means by which the Great Turk's favorites rise at court, but was made king of Algiers and later commander at sea, which is the office that is third in rank in that seigniory.

"El Uchali was a Calabrian by birth and a man of moral principle who treated his captives with great humanity. He came to have three thousand of them, and after his death they were divided in accordance with the provisions of his will between the Grand Seignior (who is heir to all who die and who shares with the offspring left by the deceased) and his renegades. I fell to a Venetian renegade who, as a cabin boy aboard a ship, had been captured by Uchali. His master grew so fond of him that the youth became his prime favorite, and he also came to be the cruelest one of his kind that was ever seen. His name was Hassan Aga,<sup>7</sup> and, amassing great wealth, he rose to be king of Algiers. I accompanied him there from Constantinople and was somewhat pleased at being so near to Spain. Not that I intended to write to anyone there concerning my misfortunes; but I wished to see if fortune would be more favorable to me here than it had been in Turkey, where I had unsuccessfully essayed a thousand different means of escape. In Algiers I thought to find other ways of attaining what I desired; for never once did the hope leave me of achieving my freedom; and when my plottings and schemings did not come up to expectations and my attempts were unsuccessful, I did not at once abandon myself to despair but began to look for or invent some fresh hope to sustain me, however faint and weak it might be.

"In this way I managed to keep myself alive, shut up in a prison or house which the Turks call a bagnio, in which they confine their Christian captives, both those of the king and those belonging to certain private individuals, and also those that are referred to as being del Almacén, that is to say, captives that belong to the Council and serve the city in public works and other employment. It is very difficult for these last to obtain their freedom, for inasmuch as they are held in common and have no individual for a master, there is no one with whom to treat regarding their ransom even where they have the means for purchasing their liberation. In these bagnios, as I have said, they are accustomed to place captives belonging to certain private citizens of the town, chiefly the ones that are to be ransomed, since there they may keep them in safety and leisure. For the king's captives do not go out to labor with the rest of the galley crew, unless their ransom be late in coming, in which case, by way of inducing them to write for it more urgently, they put them to work and send them to gather wood with the others, which is no small task.

"I, then, was one of this group; for when they discovered that I was a captain, although I told them that I had no fortune and few prospects, they nevertheless insisted upon placing me among those gentlemen and others who were waiting for ransom. They put a chain upon me, but more as a mark of my status than in order to keep me from escaping; and thus I spent my days in that bagnio along with many important personages who had been designated and were being held for the purpose I have mentioned. And although we were at times harassed by hunger and the want of clothing, nothing distressed us so much as what we almost constantly saw and heard of the cruelties, such as never before were heard of or seen, which my master practiced upon the Christians. Each day he hanged his man, impaled one, cut off the ear of another; and all this with so little excuse, or with none at all, that the Turks had to admit he did it simply to be doing it, inasmuch as their natural bent toward the entire human race is a homicidal one.

7. Hasan Aga, or Hasan the Venetian, was captured at a young age and converted to Islam. A protégé of Uluch Ali, he ruled Algiers from 1577 to 1578.

"The only person who made out well with him was a Spanish soldier by the name of Saavedra,<sup>8</sup> for although this man had done things which will remain in the memory of that people for years to come, and all by way of obtaining his liberty, yet the Moor never dealt him a blow nor ordered him flogged; as a matter of fact, he never even gave him so much as a harsh word. And for the least of the many things that Saavedra did, we were all afraid that he would be impaled, and he himself feared it more than once. If time permitted, which unfortunately it does not, I could tell you here and now something of that soldier's exploits which would interest and amaze you much more than my own story.

"To continue: Overlooking the courtyard of our prison were the windows of a wealthy Moor of high rank. These, as is usually the case, more nearly resembled peepholes and were, moreover, covered with very thick and tightly drawn blinds. It happened, then, that one day I and three companions were on the prison terrace, amusing ourselves by seeing how far we could leap with our chains on; and, since we were alone, all the rest of the Christians having gone out to labor, I chanced to raise my eyes, when through one of those closed windows I saw a reed appear with a piece of linen cloth attached to the end of it, and it was moving and waving as if signaling for us to come and take it. As we stood gazing up at it, one of those who was with me went over and placed himself directly beneath the reed to see if it would be released or what would happen; but the moment he did so, it was raised and moved from side to side as if someone were saying no by shaking the head. The Christian then came back, and at once it was lowered again and the person above began making exactly the same motions with it as before. Another of my companions repeated the performance, and the same thing happened with him. And a third man had a similar experience.

"Seeing this, I could not resist the temptation to try my luck, and as soon as I was beneath the reed, it was dropped. It fell at my feet there in the bagnio, and I immediately hastened to untie the linen cloth, whereupon I found knotted in it ten cianis, which are gold coins of base alloy in use among the Moors, each being worth ten reales in our money. I need not tell you how happy I was over this windfall, and my happiness was equaled by my wonder as to how it had come to us, and to me in particular, since the unwillingness of the donor to release the reed to anyone other than me showed clearly that I was the one for whom the favor was intended. Taking the welcome money, I broke the reed and went back to the terrace, where I once more gazed up at the window. Then it was I saw a very white hand emerge, which opened and closed very quickly; and by this we understood or were led to imagine that it was some woman who lived in that house who had shown us this act of kindness. By way of thanking her, we salaamed after the fashion of the Moors, which is done by bowing the head, bending the body at the waist, and crossing the arms upon the bosom.

8. Cervantes refers to himself here; his full name was Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra.

"Shortly afterward, through the same window, there came a little cross made of reeds, only to be at once withdrawn. This strengthened us in the belief that some Christian woman must be a captive in that house, and that it was she who had done us the favor; but the whiteness of the hand and the Moorish bracelets of which we had caught a glimpse inclined us to think otherwise, although we fancied that it might be some fair renegade, for such women are commonly taken as lawful wives by their masters, who are glad to do this, since they esteem them more highly than those of their own race.

"In all our discussions about the matter, however, we were very far from the truth; but from that time forth we were solely concerned with looking up at that window from which the reed had appeared, as if it had been our north star. Two weeks went by in which we had no further sight of it, nor of the hand, nor any signal whatsoever. And although during that time we did our best to find out who lived in the house and if there was any renegade Christian woman in it, we found no one who could tell us any more about the matter than that the house belonged to a rich and prominent Moor by the name of Hadji Morato, a former alcaide of La Pata, which is a very important office with them.<sup>9</sup>

"But just as we had given up hope of a second rain of cianis, we unexpectedly saw the reed appear again with another knotted cloth on the end of it, a thicker one this time. This happened at an hour when the bagnio was all but deserted, as it had been on the previous occasion, and we made the same test, each of the others in turn going to stand beneath the window before I did, but it was only when I came up that the reed was released and dropped. I undid the knot and found forty Spanish gold crowns and a message written in Arabic with the sign of the cross beneath it. I kissed the cross, took the crowns, and returned to the terrace, where we all again salaamed. Then the hand appeared once more, and I made signs that we would read the message, after which the window was closed. We were at once pleased and bewildered by what had occurred, and as none of us understood Arabic, great was our curiosity to know what the message contained, and greater still our difficulty in finding someone who could read it for us.

"Finally, I decided to take a certain renegade into my confidence. He was a native of Murcia who professed to be a good friend of mine and who had promised to keep any secret that I might entrust to him; for it is the custom of some renegades, when they intend to return to Christian territory, to carry about with them testimonials of one sort or another from important captives to the effect that So-and-So is a good man, has always shown kindness to Christians, and is anxious to flee at the first opportunity that offers. There are those who procure these certificates with a proper object in mind, and there are others who cunningly misemploy them in case of need. The latter, when they go to commit depredations on Christian soil, if perchance they are lost or captured, will produce their affidavits as evidence of the purpose for which they came: namely, that of remaining in a Christian land; and they will assert that it was for this reason they joined the Turks. In such a manner they escape the immediate consequences of their act and are reconciled with the Church before it can punish them; and then, as soon as they are able to do so, they return to Barbary to become what they were before. But, as has been said, there are others who make honest use of these certificates and actually do remain with their coreligionists.

9. Hajji Murad, a Slavonian who converted to Islam and became a powerful official in Algiers. "Alcaide": commander of a fortress or garrison, in this case the city of al-Batha.

"It was one of these renegades who was my friend. He had testimonials from all of us in which we expressed our confidence in him as forcefully as we could, and if the Moors had found him with these papers on his person, they would have burned him alive. He was known to be well versed in Arabic, being able not only to speak it but to write it as well. And so, before I unbosomed myself to him, I asked him to read the message for me, telling him that I had accidentally come upon it in a hole in my cell. He opened it and studied it for some little time, muttering to himself all the while. I asked him if he understood it, and he assured me that he did, very well, and that if I wished him to give it to me word for word, I should provide him with pen and ink, as he could do it better that way. We gave him what he asked for, and he translated the message little by little. When he had finished he said, 'You will find set down here in Spanish absolutely everything that is written on this paper; and you are to remember that where it says Lela Marien, that means Our Lady the Virgin Mary.'

"Following is the message as he had transcribed it:

"When I was young, my father had a slave girl who taught me the Christian zala<sup>1</sup> in my language, and she also told me many things about Lela Marien. The Christian woman died, and I know that she did not go to the fire but is with Allah, for twice afterward I saw her and she told me to make my way to the land of the Christians to see Lela Marien, who loved me a great deal. I do not know how to do so. I have seen many Christians from this window, and only you have seemed to me to be a gentleman. I am very young and beautiful and have much money to take with me. See if you can arrange for us to go, and there you may be my husband if you wish. If you do not wish it so, it will not matter to me, for Lela Marien will provide someone to marry me. I myself have written this; have a care as to whom you give it to read; do not trust any Moor, for they are all treacherous. I am deeply concerned lest you show this to someone, for if my father knew of it, he would cast me into a well and cover me with stones. On the reed I shall put a thread. Attach your reply to it, and in case you have no one who can write Arabic for you, tell me by means of signs and Lela Marien will make me understand. May She and Allah and this cross protect you. The cross I kiss many times, as the Christian slave woman bade me.

"You can imagine, gentle folk, how astonished and pleased we were by the contents of this message. Indeed, we showed our feelings so openly that the renegade realized it was not by chance that this paper had been found but that it was in reality addressed to one of our number. He accordingly now asked us if his suspicions were true, telling us that we should confide everything to him, as he would be willing to risk his life for our freedom. Saying this, he brought forth from his bosom a metal crucifix and with many tears swore by the God whom that image represented and in whom he, though a wicked sinner, still fully and faithfully believed, that he would loyally guard all the secrets we might see fit to reveal to him; for he felt—indeed, he was almost certain—that through the one who had written that message he and all of us would be able to gain our freedom and it would be possible for him to fulfill his dearest wish, that of returning to the bosom of Holy Mother Church, from which like a rotten limb he had been severed and separated through ignorance and sin.

1. Salaam, here with the sense of prayer or ceremony.

“So many tears did the renegade shed, and so many signs of repentance did he show, that we all of us unanimously consented and agreed to tell him the truth of the matter; and so we proceeded to give him an account of everything, keeping nothing hidden. We pointed out to him the little window through which the reed had appeared, and he then and there made note of the house and announced his intention of taking special pains to find out who lived in it. We also decided that it would be well to reply to the Moorish damsel’s note, and, seeing that we had someone there who was capable of doing this, the renegade at once wrote out the words that I dictated to him, which were exactly as I shall give them to you; for nothing of any importance that happened to me in the course of this adventure has slipped my memory, nor shall it escape me as long as I live. This was the reply that we sent to the Moorish lady:

“May the true Allah protect you, my lady, and that blessed Mary who is the true Mother of God and who has put it in your heart to go to the land of the Christians, because she loves you well. Pray to her to show you how you may carry out her command, for she is well disposed and will assuredly do so. Do not fail to write and advise me of your plans, and I will always let you have an answer. The great Allah has given us a Christian captive who knows how to read and write your language, as you can plainly see from this message. Thus, with nothing to fear, we shall be able to know your wishes. You say that if you go to the land of the Christians, you will be my wife, and I as a good Christian promise you that you shall be, and you know that Christians keep their promises better than Moors. May Allah and Mary His Mother watch over you, my lady.

“Having written and sealed this message, I waited two days until the bagnio was deserted as usual, and then I went out to my accustomed place on the terrace to see if the reed would appear, which it did very shortly. As soon as I caught sight of it, although I could not see who was letting it down, I held up the paper as a sign the person above should attach the thread. This had already been done, however, and I now fastened the paper to it, and shortly thereafter our star once more made its appearance with the white banner of peace in the form of a little bundle. It fell at my feet, and, upon picking it up, I found in the cloth all sorts of gold and silver coins, more than fifty crowns, which more than fifty times doubled our happiness and strengthened our hope of obtaining our liberty.

“That same night our renegade came back and told us what he had learned. The one who lived in that house was the same Moor whose name, Hadji Morato, had been mentioned to us. He was enormously rich and had one daughter, the only heir to all his wealth; and it was the general opinion in the city that she was the most beautiful woman in Barbary. Many of the viceroys who came there had sought her hand in marriage, but she had been unwilling to wed; and it was also known that she had had a female slave who was a Christian and who was now dead. All of which bore out what was said in the note. We then took counsel with the renegade as to what we should do in order to rescue the Moorish damsel and make our escape to the land of Christians, and it was finally agreed that we should wait until we had further word from Zoraida, which was the name of the one who now wishes to be known as Maria.<sup>2</sup> For we saw plainly enough that she and no other would be able to provide a way out of all these difficulties. When we had reached this decision, the renegade told us not to worry, that he would set us at liberty or lose his life in the attempt.

"For four days the bagnio was full of people, and as a result the reed did not appear, but at the end of that period, when the place was once more empty, the bundle was again let down, so pregnant-looking as to promise a very happy birth. The reed and the cloth descended to me, and I found in the latter a message and a hundred gold crowns, with no other money whatsoever. The renegade being present, we gave him the note to read inside our cell, and he translated it for us as follows:

"Sir, I do not know how to arrange for us to go to Spain, nor has Lela Marien told me, although I have asked it of her. The thing that can be done is for me to give you for this venture much money in gold. Ransom yourself and your friends with it, and let one of you go ahead to the land of the Christians, purchase a boat there, and return for the others. He will find me in my father's garden, which is at the Babazón gate<sup>3</sup> near the seashore. I expect to be there all this summer with my father and my servants. You will be able to take me away from there by night and carry me to the boat with nothing to fear. And remember that you are to be my husband, or I shall ask Mary to punish you. If you can trust no one to go for the boat, ransom yourself and go; for I know that you are more trustworthy than any other, being a gentleman and a Christian. Make it a point to become familiar with the garden; and, meanwhile, when I see you out for a stroll, I shall know that the bagnio is empty and will give you much money. Allah protect you, my lord.

"Such were the contents of the second note; and when all had heard it read, each offered to be the ransomed one, promising to go and return with all haste; and I myself made the same offer. But the renegade opposed all this, saying he would by no means consent for anyone to go free until we all went together; for experience had taught him that men when freed were lax about keeping the word they had given in captivity. He added that many times certain important captives had had recourse to this expedient and had ransomed one of their number to go to Valencia or Majorca, providing him with sufficient money to fit out a boat and return for them, but he had never come back. For, the renegade observed, liberty recovered and the dread of losing it again would erase from their memories all the obligations that there are. By way of showing us the truth of this statement, he briefly related for us what had recently happened to some Christian gentlemen, one of the strangest cases that had ever been heard of in those parts where the most astonishing and terrifying things are all the time occurring.

"In short, he told us that what we could and should do was to give him the ransom money intended for one of us Christians, and he would buy a boat

2. Zoraida is based on a historical figure. Hajji Murad had a daughter named Zahara, who married first Abd al-Malik, future sultan of Morocco, and then, after his death, Hasan Pasha, with whom she moved to Constantinople.

3. Bab Azoun, gate to the city of Algiers.

there in Algiers under pretext of turning merchant and trading with Tetuan and along the coast in that region. Being a ship's master, it would be easy for him to hit upon a way of rescuing us from the bagnio and putting us all aboard, especially if the Moorish lady, as she said, was to provide the money for ransoming the entire lot of us. As free men, it would be the easiest thing in the world to embark, even at midday. The greatest obstacle lay in the fact that the Moors would not permit any renegade to buy or own a boat, unless it was a vessel to go on pillaging expeditions; for they feared that if he purchased a small one, especially if he was a Spaniard, he merely wanted it for the purpose of escaping to Christian territory. He, our friend, could readily overcome this difficulty, however, by taking a Tagarin Moor<sup>4</sup> into partnership with him in the purchase of the boat and the profits to be derived from it, and under cover of this arrangement he could become master of the craft; and with that he regarded the rest of it as something already accomplished.

"Although it seemed to me and to my comrades that it would have been better to send to Majorca for the boat as the Moorish lady had suggested, we did not dare oppose him, being fearful that if we did not do as he said he would reveal our plans and put us in danger of losing our lives when our dealings with Zoraida were discovered, for whose life we would all have given our own. We accordingly determined to leave the matter in the hands of God and in those of the renegade, and we therewith replied to Zoraida that we would do all that she had counseled us, since the advice she had given us was as good as if it had come from Lela Marien herself, adding that it remained for her to decide as to whether the project was to be postponed or put into execution at once. I also, once more, made an offer to marry her. And so it came about that the next day, when there was no one in the bagnio, she on various occasions by means of the reed and the cloth conveyed to us two thousand gold crowns and a message in which she informed us that on the next Jumá, that is to say, Friday, she was leaving for her father's summer place and that before she left she would give us more money. In case this was not enough, we were to let her know and we might have anything we asked for; for her father had so much that he would never miss it, and, what was more, she held the keys to everything.

"We at once gave the renegade fifteen hundred crowns with which to buy the boat, while I took eight hundred to procure my own ransom, giving the money to a merchant of Valencia who was in Algiers at the time and who had the king release me on the promise that, when the next boat arrived from home, he would pay the ransom fee; for if he were to pay it at once, the king might suspect that the funds had been in Algiers for some time and that the merchant for his own profit had kept the matter secret. Moreover, my master was so capitious that I on no account dared pay him immediately. And so, on the Thursday before the Friday that the beauteous Zoraida had fixed as the day for going to her father's summer place, she gave us another thousand crowns, at the same time advising us of her departure and requesting me, in case I was ransomed, to make myself acquainted with the site or, in any event, to seek to procure an opportunity for going there to see her. I replied in a few words that

4. Term used in North Africa for a Muslim who had lived among Christians, particularly in the kingdom of Aragon.

I would do this, urging her to be sure and commend us to Lela Marien by making use of all those prayers that the slave woman had taught her.

"When this had been done, it was arranged that my three companions likewise should be ransomed, so that they would be able to leave the bagnio; since if they saw me set at liberty while they remained behind, despite the fact that there was sufficient money to ransom them, they might create a disturbance and the devil might put it into their heads to do something that would injure Zoraida. It was true that, in view of their rank, I could feel reasonably safe in this regard, but, nevertheless, I did not wish to imperil the undertaking, and so I had them released at the same time as myself, paying over all the money to the merchant in order that he might with confidence and security pledge his word, although we never once divulged to him our secret plan, as there would have been too much danger in doing so."

CHAPTER XLI

In which the captive's story is still further continued.

"A fortnight had not gone by before our renegade had bought a boat capable of carrying more than thirty persons; and by way of rendering the project safer and allaying suspicion, he made a voyage, as he had suggested, to a place called Shershel which is thirty leagues from Algiers in the direction of Oran and which does a large trade in dried figs. Two or three times he did this in the company of the Tagarin Moor I have mentioned; for Tagarinos is the name given in Barbary to the Moors of Aragon, while those of Granada are called Mudéjares; but in the kingdom of Fez the Mudéjares are termed Elches, and they are the ones whom that king chiefly employs in war.

"To go on with my story, then: Each time that he passed with his boat he anchored in a cove that was not two crossbow shots from the house where Zoraida was waiting, and there, with the two little Moors that served him as oarsmen, he would deliberately station himself, either to say his prayers or by way of acting out the part he was later to perform in earnest. Thus, he would go to Zoraida's garden and beg fruit, and her father would give it to him without recognizing him. As he told me afterward, he would have liked to have a word with Zoraida herself so he could tell her he was there on my orders to bear her off to the land of the Christians and at the same time urge her to feel safe and happy.

"This, however, was impossible, for Moorish ladies do not permit themselves to be seen by any of their own race or by any Turk unless their husband or father so commands them. With Christian captives, on the other hand, they are allowed to converse and have dealings to a rather surprising extent. For my part, I was just as glad that he had not spoken to her, for she might have been disturbed to find her plan being discussed by renegades.

"But God in any case had ordained otherwise, and our renegade did not have an opportunity of gratifying his laudable desire. Seeing how safely he was able to go to Shershel and return and anchor where he chose, and perceiving that the Tagarin, his companion, was wholly compliant with his wishes and that all that was needed now was a few Christians to man the oars, he told me to look about for some that I might take with me in addition to those that were being ransomed and to engage them for the following Friday, which was the date he had set for our departure. I accordingly spoke to a dozen Spaniards, all of them powerful rowers. They were chosen from among those that were best in a position to leave the city, and it was no small task finding so many of them at that particular moment, since there were then twenty ships at sea and they had taken all the available oarsmen.

"I should not have been able to find them if it had not been that their master that summer was not going on a cruise but was occupied with completing the construction of a galiot which he had on the stocks. All that I told these men was that the next Friday afternoon they should steal out one by one and wait for me in the vicinity of Hadji Morato's garden. I gave these directions to each one separately, instructing them that if they saw any other Christians in the neighborhood, all they were to say to them was that I had ordered them to stay there until I came.

"Having attended to this, I had something else to do that was still more important, and that was to let Zoraida know how far our plans had progressed in order that she might be forewarned and not be caught off guard if we suddenly decided to abduct her before, as she would think, the Christian's boat would have had time to return. I therefore resolved to go to the garden and see if I could speak with her; so on a day before my departure I went there under pretense of gathering a few herbs, and the first person I encountered was her father, who addressed me in the language that throughout Barbary and even in Constantinople is in use between captives and Moors, and which is neither Moorish nor Castilian nor the tongue of any other nation, but a mixture of all of them by means of which we manage to understand one another. It was in this language that he asked me who I was and what I was doing in his garden. I replied that I was Arnaut Mami's<sup>5</sup> slave—because I knew for a certainty that Arnaut Mami was a very great friend of his—and that I was looking for herbs to make him a salad. He then inquired as to whether I was a ransomed man or not and what price my master wanted for me.

"As I was thus engaged in answering his questionings, the lovely Zoraida came out of the garden house. She had caught sight of me some while before; and since Moorish women, as I have said, are not at all prudish about showing themselves to Christians and do not avoid their company, she thought nothing of coming up to where her father stood conversing with me. In fact, when her father saw her slowly approaching, he called to her to come. It would be too much for me to undertake to describe for you now the great beauty, the air of gentle breeding, the rich and elegant attire with which my beloved Zoraida presented herself to my gaze. I shall merely tell you that more pearls hung from her comely throat, her ears, her hair than she has hairs on her head. On her feet, which, as is the custom, were bare, she wore two carcajes—for that is what they call bracelets for the ankles in the Moorish tongue—made of purest gold and set with many diamonds whose value, as she told me afterward, her father estimated at ten thousand doblas,<sup>6</sup> while those upon her wrist were worth fully as much as the others.

"The pearls also were numerous, for the way that Moorish women have of displaying their magnificence is by decking themselves out in this manner. And

5. The corsair captain who captured Cervantes himself in 1575.

6. Gold coin worth six reales.

so it is you find more pearls of one kind or another among the Moors than all the other nations combined have to show, and Zoraida's father was reputed to have an abundance of them and the best that there were in Algiers. In addition, he had more than two hundred thousand Spanish crowns, and the fair one I now call mine was mistress of all this wealth.

"If you would form an idea of how beautiful she was in her prosperous days and when so adorned, you have but to observe how much of beauty is left her now after all that she has suffered. For it is a well-known fact that the beauty of some women has its day and season and is diminished or heightened by accidental causes. It is, moreover, a natural thing that the passions of the mind should add to or detract from it, and most often they destroy it utterly. What I am trying to say is that, as she came toward me that day, she impressed me as being, both in herself and in her adornments, the most dazzling creature that I had ever seen, and when I thought of all that I owed to her, it seemed to me that I had before me a goddess from Heaven who had come to earth for my delight and comfort.

"As she came up, her father told her in their language that I was the captive of his friend, Arnaut Mami, and that I had come to look for a salad. She gave me her hand and, in that admixture of tongues that I have described, asked me if I was a gentleman and why it was I had not been ransomed. I replied that I already had been, and that from the price paid she could see the esteem in which my master held me, for the sum of one thousand five hundred soltanis<sup>7</sup> had been put up for me. To which she answered, 'In truth, had you been my father's slave, I would not have permitted him to let you go for twice as much, for you Christians always lie in everything you say and make yourselves out to be poor in order to cheat the Moors.'

"That may be, lady,' I said, 'but I dealt truthfully with my master, as I do and shall do with everybody in this world.'

"And when are you going?' Zoraida asked.

"Tomorrow, I expect; for there is a vessel here from France that sets sail then and I intend to go on it.'

"Would it not be better,' said Zoraida, 'to wait for one from Spain, seeing that the French are not your friends?'

"No,' I told her, 'although if I were certain that a ship from Spain was on the way, I would wait for it. It is more likely, however, that I shall go tomorrow, for the desire I have to see my native land and my loved ones is such that I cannot bear to wait for another opportunity, even though a better one, if it be late in coming.'

"You no doubt have a wife in your own country,' she said, 'and I suppose you are anxious to see her.'

"No,' I assured her, 'I am not married, but I have promised to wed as soon as I return.'

"And is the lady to whom you have given this promise beautiful?'

"She is so beautiful,' I replied, 'that by way of praising her and telling the simple truth, I will say that she very much resembles you.'

"Her father laughed heartily at this. 'In Allah's name, Christian,' he said, 'she must be beautiful indeed if she is like my daughter, who is the most beautiful in all this realm. If you do not believe me, look at her well and tell me if I do not speak the truth.'

7. Ottoman coin worth seventeen reales.

"Throughout the greater part of this conversation, Zoraida's father acted as our interpreter, being the more adept at languages; for while she spoke the bastard tongue that, as I have said, is in use there, she expressed her meaning by signs rather than by words.

"As we were discussing these and other subjects, a Moor came running up, crying in a loud voice that four Turks had leaped the garden railing or wall and were picking the fruit although it was not yet ripe. Both the old man and Zoraida were alarmed at this; for the fear that the Moors have of the Turks is a common and, so to speak, an instinctive thing. They are especially afraid of Turkish soldiers, who treat their Moorish subjects more haughtily, insolently, and cruelly than if the latter were their slaves.

"Zoraida's father then said to her, 'Daughter, retire to the house and shut yourself in while I speak to these dogs. As for you, Christian, gather your herbs and go in peace, and may Allah bring you safely to your own country.'

"I bowed, and he went away to look for the Turks, leaving me alone with Zoraida, who made as if to go back into the house as her father had commanded her. He had no sooner disappeared among the garden trees, however, than she, her eyes brimming with tears, turned to me and said, 'Tamejí, Christian, tamejí?' Which means, 'Are you going, Christian, are you going?'

"And I answered her, 'Yes, lady, but under no condition without you. Wait for me next Jumá, and do not be frightened when you see us, for we are surely going to the land of the Christians.'

"I said this in such a way that she understood everything very well; and, throwing her arm about my neck, she began with faltering step to walk toward the house. But as luck would have it—and it would have been very unlucky indeed for us if Heaven had not ordered it otherwise—as we were going along in this manner, her father, who was coming back from his encounter with the Turks, caught sight of us, and we knew that he had seen us and had seen her arm about me. But Zoraida, cleverly on her guard, did not remove her arm; instead, she clung to me more than ever and laid her head upon my bosom, swaying at the knees a little and giving every evidence of having fainted, while I pretended to be supporting her against my will. The old man ran up to us and, seeing his daughter in this condition, asked her what the matter was.

"'Undoubtedly,' he said, when he received no reply, 'it was those dogs coming into the garden that did this to her.' And, taking her off my bosom, he pressed her to his own, as she, her eyes not yet dry from her tears, sighed deeply and said, 'Amejí, Christian, amejí!'<sup>8</sup>

"'It is not necessary, my daughter, for the Christian to go,' her father said. 'He has done you no harm, and the Turks have left. There is no cause for you to be frightened, for nothing is going to hurt you, since the Turks at my request have gone back to where they belong.'

"'It is true, sir, as you have said,' I told him, 'that they have given her a fright; but since she says for me to go, I would not cause her any annoyance; and so, peace be with you, and with your permission I will return to this garden for herbs, if I find it necessary, for my master says there are no better ones for salad than those that grow here.'

8. "Go, Christian, go."

“‘Come back for all that you need,’ replied Hadji Morato. ‘My daughter does not say this because you or any of the other Christians annoy her. She either meant that the Turks should go, not you, or else that it was time you were looking for your herbs.’

“With this, I at once took my leave of both of them, and Zoraida, who appeared to be suffering deeply, went away with her father, while I, under pretense of gathering my salad, was able to roam the garden at will. I carefully noted the entrances and exits, the means they used to secure the house, and everything that might facilitate our plan; after which, I went to give an account of what had happened to the renegade and my companions. In the meanwhile, I looked forward to the time when I should be able to enjoy undisturbed the boon which fate had bestowed upon me in the person of the beauteous and charming Zoraida.

“Time went by, and at length the day came that meant so much to us. With all of us following the plan which, after many long discussions and the most careful consideration, we had decided upon, we met with the success that we longed for. On the next Friday after the day on which I had spoken to Zoraida in the garden, our renegade at nightfall anchored his boat almost directly opposite the house where she was, the Christians who were to man the oars having been notified in advance that they might hide themselves in various places round about. As they waited for me, they were all of them anxious and elated, eager to board the vessel on which their gaze was fixed; for they were unaware of the arrangement with the renegade and thought that they would have to gain their freedom by force of arms, through slaying the Moors who were on the boat.

“Accordingly, as soon as I and my companions showed ourselves, those who were in hiding sighted us and came up. This was at an hour when the gates of the city were closed, and in the whole of the countryside not a soul was to be seen. When we were all together, we discussed the question as to whether it would be better to go first for Zoraida or to make prisoners of the Moorish oarsmen. Before we had reached a decision, our renegade arrived and asked us what was the cause of our delay, for it was now time, all the Moors being off guard and most of them asleep. I told him why we were hesitating, and he replied that the most important thing was to capture the vessel first of all, which could be done very easily and with no danger whatever, and after that we could go for Zoraida. We all agreed with him, and so, without waiting any longer and with him as our guide, we went to the vessel, where he was the first to leap aboard. Laying a hand on his cutlass, he cried in the Moorish tongue, ‘None of you stir from here or it will cost you your lives!’

“By this time nearly all the Christians were aboard; and the Moors, who were possessed of little courage, upon hearing their captain address them in this manner, were thoroughly terrified. None of them dared reach for his weapons, and for that matter, they had few if any; and so, without saying a word, they let themselves be shackled by the Christians, who accomplished this very quickly, threatening them that if they raised any kind of outcry they would all die by the knife.

“When this had been achieved, with half our number remaining behind to guard the prisoners, the rest of us, again with the renegade as our guide, made our way to Hadji Morato’s garden; and it was our good fortune that, as we went to try the gate, it swung open as readily as if it had not been locked. We then, very quietly and saying nothing, went on to the house without our presence being discovered by anyone. Zoraida, fairest of the fair, was waiting for us at a window, and as soon as she heard the sound of people below, she asked in a low voice if we were Nizarani, that is to say, Christians. I answered in the affirmative, saying that she should come down. Recognizing me, she did not hesitate for a moment, but without a word she came down instantly and, opening the door, appeared there in the sight of all, so beautiful and so richly clad that I cannot possibly tell you how she looked.

"As soon as I saw her, I took one of her hands and began kissing it, and the renegade and my two comrades did the same, while the others, being unacquainted with the circumstances, followed our example, since it seemed to them that we were merely recognizing and thanking her as the lady who was responsible for our going free. The renegade asked in Moorish if her father was in the house, and she replied that he was sleeping.

"Then it will be necessary to wake him,' he said, 'for we must take him with us and everything of value that there is in this beautiful summer place.'

"No,' she answered, 'you must by no means lay hands on my father. In this house there is nothing for you save that which I bring with me, and it is enough to make you all rich and happy. Wait a moment and you will see.'

"She then went back into the house, saying she would return at once and bidding us meanwhile not to make any noise. I took this opportunity of asking the renegade what had passed between them, and when he told me, I made it clear to him that under no condition was he to go beyond Zoraida's wishes. She now reappeared with a small trunk filled with gold crowns, so heavy that she could hardly carry it. At that instant, unfortunately, her father awoke and, hearing a noise in the garden, came to the window and looked out. Recognizing us all as Christians, he began bawling at the top of his lungs in Arabic, 'Christians! Christians! Thieves! Thieves!' This frightened us very much and threw us into confusion; but the renegade, perceiving the danger we were in and how important it was to go through with our undertaking before being detected, ran up as fast as he could to where Hadji Morato was, being accompanied by some of the rest of us. As for myself I did not dare leave Zoraida unprotected, for she, half fainting, had fallen in my arms.

"In brief, those who went up handled the matter so expeditiously that in a moment they were back, bringing with them Hadji Morato, his hands bound and with a napkin over his mouth so that he could not speak a word—and they threatened him that if he tried to speak it would cost him his life. When his daughter saw him, she put her hands over her eyes, and her father in turn was horrified at sight of her, not knowing that she had placed herself in our hands of her own free will. But it was essential now for us to be on our way, and so we hastily but with due care boarded the ship, where those that we had left behind were waiting for us, fearful that some untoward accident had befallen us.

"It was a little after two in the morning by the time we were all on the vessel. They then untied Hadji Morato's hands and removed the napkin from his mouth, but the renegade again warned him not to say anything or they would kill him. As the old man looked at his daughter, he began sighing mournfully, especially when he saw her held tightly in my embrace, and when he observed that she did not struggle, protest, or attempt to escape me; but he nonetheless remained silent lest they carry out the renegade's threat.

"Finding herself on the boat now and perceiving that we were about to row away while her father and the other Moors remained bound, Zoraida spoke to the renegade, requesting him to do her the favor of releasing the prisoners, particularly her father, as she would rather cast herself into the sea than have a parent who loved her so dearly carried away captive in front of her eyes and through her fault. The renegade repeated to me what she had said, and, for my part, I was quite willing. He, however, replied that this was not the wise thing to do, for the reason that, if they were left behind, they would alarm the entire city and countryside, whereupon some fast-sailing craft would put out in pursuit of us and so comb the sea and land that there would be no possibility of our escaping. What we might do, he added, was to give them their freedom as soon as we set foot on Christian soil. We all agreed to this, and when the matter was explained to Zoraida, along with the reasons why we could not comply with her wishes, she also was satisfied. And then, gladly and silently, cheerfully and with alacrity, each one of our powerful rowers took up his oar, as, commending ourselves with all our hearts to God, we set out on our voyage to the island of Majorca, which is the nearest Christian territory.

"However, inasmuch as the tramontane wind<sup>9</sup> was blowing a little and the sea was a bit rough, it was impossible for us to follow the route to Majorca, and we were compelled to hug the coast in the direction of Oran. This worried us considerably, for we feared that we would be discovered from the town of Shershel, which is about seventy miles from Algiers. And we also were afraid that we might encounter in those waters one of the galiots that commonly ply the coast with merchandise of Tetuán, although each of us secretly felt that if we did meet with a merchant vessel of that sort, providing it was not a cruiser, we not only should not be captured but, rather, should be able to come into possession of a craft in which we could more safely complete our voyage. In the meantime, as we were sailing along, Zoraida buried her face in my hands in order not to see her father, and I could hear her calling on Lela Marien to come to our aid.

"We must have gone a good thirty miles when dawn came, and we found ourselves at a distance of something like three musket shots off land. The shore was deserted, and we saw no one who might descry us, but, nevertheless, by rowing as hard as we could we put out a little more to the open sea, which was now somewhat calmer. When we were about two leagues from the coast, the order was given to row by turns so that we could have a bite to eat, the ship being well stocked with food; but those at the oars said it was not yet time for them to take a rest—the others might eat, but they themselves did not wish on any account to relax their efforts. We were starting to do as they had suggested when a strong wind came up, which obliged us to leave off rowing and set sail at once for Oran, that being the only course left us. All this was done very quickly, and with the sail we made more than eight miles an hour, with no fear other than that of falling in with a vessel that was out cruising.

"We gave the Moorish rowers some food, and the renegade consoled them by telling them they were not captives but would be given their freedom at the first opportunity. He said the same to Zoraida's father, who replied, 'If you promised me anything else, O Christian, I might believe it and hope for it by reason of the generous treatment you have accorded me, but when it comes to setting me free, do not think that I am so simple-minded as to put any credence in that; for you would never have incurred the risk of depriving me of my liberty only to restore it to me so freely, especially since you know who I am and the profit you may derive from releasing me. Indeed, if you wish to name the sum, I hereby offer you whatever you ask for me and for this unfortunate daughter of mine, or for her alone, for she is the greater and better part of my soul.'

9. I.e., wind from beyond the mountains (in this case the Alps), hence north wind.

"As he said this, he began weeping so bitterly that we were all moved to compassion, and Zoraida could not resist stealing a glance at him. When she saw him weeping, she was so touched that she rose from my feet and went over to embrace him, and as she laid her cheek against his the two of them shed so many tears that a number of us could not but join them in their weeping. But when her father perceived that she was in festive attire and decked out in all her jewels, he spoke to her in their own language.

"How does it come, my daughter,' he said, 'that last night, at dusk, before this terrible thing happened to us, I saw you clad in ordinary household garb; and now, without your having had time to dress, and without my having brought you any good news to celebrate by thus adorning and bedecking your person, I nonetheless behold you wearing the best garments with which I was able to provide you when fortune smiled upon us? Answer me this, for I am even more astonished and bewildered by it than I am by this misfortune that has come to us.'

"The renegade informed us of all that the Moor had said to his daughter, who did not utter a word in reply. And when the old man saw, over at one side of the boat, the small trunk in which she was in the habit of keeping her jewels, he was more bewildered than ever; for he knew very well that he had not brought it to the summer place but had left it in Algiers. He thereupon asked her how the trunk had come into our hands and what was inside it; and then the renegade, without giving Zoraida time to answer, spoke up.

"You need not trouble, sir, to ask your daughter Zoraida so many questions, for I can give you one answer that will serve for all. I would have you know that she is a Christian, and that it is she who has filed our chains for us and set us free from our captivity. She goes of her own free will and, I fancy, is as happy about it as one who emerges from darkness into light, from death into life, or from the pains of hell into glory everlasting.'

"Is it true, my daughter, what this man says?' asked the Moor.

"It is,' said Zoraida.

"So you are a Christian,' said the old man, 'and it is you who have placed your father in the hands of his enemies?'

"As to my being a Christian,' she told him, 'that is true enough, but it is not true that I am responsible for your being in this situation; for I never had any desire to leave you or to do you harm, but only to do good to myself.'

"And what good have you done yourself, daughter?'

"Put that question,' she said, 'to Lela Marien, for she can tell you better than I.'

"No sooner had he heard this than the Moor, with an incredibly swift movement, hurled himself head foremost into the sea; and he would undoubtedly have drowned if the long and cumbersome robe that he wore had not tended to bear him up. Zoraida screamed for someone to rescue him, whereupon we all ran forward and, seizing him by his robe, hauled him in, half drowned and unconscious, at which his daughter was so distressed that she wept over him as bitterly and mournfully as if he were already dead. We turned him face downward and he disgorged much water, and after a couple of hours he was himself once more.

"Meanwhile, the wind had changed and we had to make for land, exerting all our strength at the oars in order not to be driven ashore. Luck was with us, and we were able to put into a cove alongside a promontory or cape which the Moors call Cava Rumia, signifying in our language 'the wicked Christian woman'; for it is a tradition among them that La Cava, through whom Spain was lost, is buried in that spot, 'cava' in their tongue meaning 'bad woman,' while 'rumia' is 'Christian.'<sup>1</sup> They regard it as bad luck to be compelled to drop anchor there, and they never do so unless it is absolutely necessary. But for us it was not the 'bad woman's' shelter; rather, it was a haven in distress, as the sea was now raging.

"Stationing our sentinels on land and never once relinquishing the oars, we ate what the renegade had provided and prayed to God and Our Lady with all our hearts that they would favor and aid us in order that we might bring to a happy conclusion an undertaking that had begun so propitiously. Upon Zoraida's request, the order was given to set her father and all the other Moors ashore, for her tender heart could not bear to see her father thus bound and her fellow countrymen held prisoners in front of her very eyes. We promised her that this should be done as soon as it came time for us to depart; for we ran no risk by leaving them in this deserted place. Our prayers were not in vain; for, Heaven favoring us, the wind changed and the sea grew calm, inviting us to resume with cheerful hearts the voyage that we had begun.

"We then unbound the Moors and, one by one, set them on land, at which they were greatly astonished; but when it came to disembarking Zoraida's father, who had by now completely recovered his senses, he gave us a piece of his mind.

"'Why do you think, Christians,' he said, 'that this wicked female is happy at your giving me my liberty? Do you imagine that it is out of filial affection? Assuredly not. It is only because my presence is an impediment to the carrying out of her base designs. And do not think that what has led her to change her religion is a belief that yours is better than ours; it is because she knows that in your country immodesty is more freely practiced than in ours.'

"As her father spoke, another Christian and I held Zoraida's arms that she might not be tempted to some foolish act. The old man now turned upon her.

"'O infamous and ill-advised maiden! Where do you think you are going, so blindly and foolishly, with these dogs, our natural enemies? Cursed be the hour in which I begot you, and cursed all the luxury in which I have reared you!'

"Seeing that he was likely to go on in this way for some while, I hastened to put him ashore; and from there he kept on shouting at us, pursuing us with his curses and lamentations as he implored Mohammed to pray to Allah that we be destroyed, confounded, and brought to an end. And when, having set sail, we could no longer hear his words, we could still see his gestures, could see him plucking out his beard, tearing his hair, and rolling on the ground. At one point he raised his voice to such a pitch that we could make out what he said.

"'Return, my beloved daughter, return to land, and I will forgive you everything. Give those men the money that is yours and come back to comfort your brokenhearted father, who, if you leave him now, will leave his bones on these deserted sands.'

1. Legend had it that Rodrigo, the last Visigothic king of Iberia, seduced Florinda ("La Cava"), the daughter of Count Julián. Her father took revenge on Rodrigo by betraying Spain to the invading Moors in 711.

"Zoraida heard all this and was deeply grieved by it. Weeping, she could only say to him in reply, 'O my father, may it please Allah that Lela Marien, who has been the cause of my turning Christian, console you in your sorrow! Allah well knows that I could have done nothing other than what I did. These Christians are in no wise to blame, for even had I not wished to come with them, even had I chosen to remain at home, it would have been impossible, so eagerly did my soul urge me to do that which to me seems as good, my dear father, as it seems evil to you.'

"When she said this, her father could no longer hear her, for we had lost him from view; and so, while I comforted Zoraida, we all of us turned our attention to the voyage, as we now had a wind so favorable that we firmly expected to be off the coast of Spain by dawn the next day.

"Blessings, however, are almost never unmixed with some evil that, without our having foreseen it, comes to disturb them. It may have been simply our misfortune, or it may have been those curses that the Moor had heaped upon his daughter (for a curse of that kind is always to be dreaded, whatever the father may be like), but, in any event, our luck now changed. We were on the high seas, and the night was a little more than three hours gone. We were proceeding at full sail with the oars lashed, since the wind had relieved us of the necessity of using them, when by the light of the moon, which was shining brightly, we sighted alongside us a square-rigged vessel with all sails set that was luffing a little and standing across our course. It was so close upon us that we had to strike sail in order not to run foul of her, while they swung their prow about to give us room to pass.

"They now came to the ship's rail to ask us who we were, from where we came, and where we were going. When these questions were put to us in French, our renegade said, 'Let no one answer, for they are undoubtedly French pirates who plunder everything in sight.' As a result of this warning, no one said a word in reply. We were a little ahead, and the other vessel was lying to leeward, when suddenly they fired two pieces of artillery, both of them, as it seemed, loaded with chain-shot; for with one they cut our mast in half and brought both mast and sail down into the sea, while the other cannon, discharged at the same moment, sent a shot into the middle of our craft, laying it wide open but doing no further damage to it. As we saw ourselves sinking, we began crying out for help, imploring those on the other ship to come to our aid as we were filling with water. They then struck their own sails, and, lowering a skiff or boat, as many as a dozen Frenchmen, all well armed, with matchlocks and matches lighted, came alongside us. When they saw how few we were and how our craft was going down, they took us in, telling us that this had come about through our discourtesy in not answering them.

"Our renegade, then, without anyone's seeing what he did, took the trunk containing Zoraida's wealth and dumped it into the sea. To make a long story short, we all went aboard with the Frenchmen, who, after they had learned everything they wished to know about us, proceeded to despoil us of all that we possessed as if we had been their deadly enemies. They even took Zoraida's anklets, but this did not grieve me as much as it did her. What I feared more was that, having deprived her of her exceedingly rich and precious gems, they would go on to steal that jewel that was worth more than all the others and which she most esteemed. Their desires, however, did not go beyond money, in which regard they were insatiable in their covetousness. They would even have taken the garments their captives wore if these had been of any use to them. Some of them were for wrapping us all in a sail and tossing us into the sea; for it was their intention, by passing themselves off as Bretons, to put in at certain Spanish ports, and if they brought us in alive they would be punished when the theft was discovered.

"But the captain, who was the one who had despoiled my beloved Zoraida, said that he was content with the prize that he had and did not wish to stop at any port in Spain. Instead, he preferred to slip through the Strait of Gibraltar at night, or any way he could, and go on to La Rochelle, the port from which he had put out. Accordingly, they agreed to let us take their small boat and all that we needed for the brief voyage that remained for us. This they did the next day, within sight of the Spanish coast, a sight that caused us wholly to forget all our sufferings and hardships, which were as if they had never been, so great is the joy that comes from recovering one's lost freedom.

"It may have been around midday when they put us in the boat, giving us two kegs of water and some biscuit. And as the lovely Zoraida went to embark, the captain, moved by some sympathetic impulse or other, gave her as many as twenty gold crowns and would not permit his men to take from her those same garments that she is now wearing. As we entered the small boat, we thanked them for their kindness, our manner being one of gratitude rather than indignation, and they then put out to sea, making for the Strait, while we, needing no other compass than the land that lay ahead of us, bent to the oars so lustily that by sundown we were, as we thought, near enough to be able to reach it before the night was far gone.

"But as there was no moon and the sky was darkened over and we were ignorant of our exact whereabouts, it did not seem wise to attempt a landing, although many of us thought that we should do so, saying that it would be better to run ashore even if it were on some rocks, far from any inhabited place, since in that way we would assure ourselves against the very likely danger of Tetuán corsairs, who at night are in Barbary and by morning off the coast of Spain, where they commonly take some prize and then return to sleep in their own houses. There were a number of conflicting suggestions, but the one that was finally adopted was that we should gradually draw near the shore and, if the sea was calm enough to permit it, land wherever we were able.

"This was the plan followed, and shortly before midnight we came to the foot of an enormous and very high mountain that was not so near the sea but that it afforded a convenient space for a landing. We ran up on the sand and leaped ashore, kissing the ground on which we stood and shedding many joyful tears as we gave thanks to God, Our Lord, for the incomparable blessing that He had conferred upon us. Removing the provisions from the boat, we drew it ashore and then went a long way up the mountain; for even here we could not feel in our hearts or bring ourselves to believe that the land beneath our feet was Christian soil. The sun, it seemed to me, came up more slowly than we could have wished, and in the meanwhile we had climbed the entire mountainside in an effort to see if we could discover any village or even a few shepherds' huts; but however much we strained our eyes, we were able to descry no village, no human being, no path, no road.

"Nevertheless, we determined to keep on and go farther inland, since surely we could not fail to come upon someone who could give us our bearings. What distressed me more than anything else was seeing Zoraida go on foot over this rough country; for though I once tried carrying her on my shoulders, my weariness wearied her more than she was rested by her repose, and so she would not again consent to my making the exertion but went along very cheerfully and patiently, her hand in mine. We had gone, I imagine, a little less than a quarter of a league when there reached our ears the sound of a little bell, which showed plainly that we must be near some flock or herd, and as we all gazed about us attentively to see if we could discern any, we saw at the foot of a cork tree a young shepherd who very calmly and unconcernedly was engaged in whittling a stick with his knife.

"We called to him, and he, raising his head, got to his feet very nimbly. As we afterward learned, the first persons that he caught sight of among us were the renegade and Zoraida, and seeing them in Moorish costume, he thought that all Barbary must have descended upon him. Dashing with amazing swiftness into a nearby wood, he began raising a terrible din as he shouted, 'Moors! Moors! The Moors have landed! Moors! Moors! To arms! To arms!'

"We were quite perplexed by all this, not knowing what to do; but, reflecting that the shepherd's cries would arouse the countryside and that the mounted coast guard would soon be along to find out what the trouble was, we decided that the renegade should take off his Turkish clothes and put on a captive's jacket, which one of us now gave him though he himself was left with only his shirt. And then, commending ourselves to God, we proceeded along the same path that the shepherd had taken, expecting that the guard would be upon us at any moment. In this we were not wrong, for two hours had not gone by when, as we were coming out of a thicket onto a plain, we caught sight of all of fifty horsemen coming toward us at top speed.

"As soon as we saw them, we stopped and watched them, and they, when they came up and found, in place of the Moors they were seeking, a handful of poor Christians, were very much surprised. One of them asked if it was we who had caused the shepherd to sound the call to arms. 'Yes,' I replied, and was about to go on and tell him our story, who we were and from whence we came, when one of our number happened to recognize the horseman who had put the question and, without giving me a chance to reply, spoke up and said, 'Thanks be to God, sirs, for having brought us into such good hands; for unless I am mistaken, this region where we now are is in the neighborhood of Vélez Málaga—unless all the years of my captivity have so deprived me of my memory that I cannot recall that you, sir, who have just asked us our names, are Pedro de Bustamente, my uncle.'

"The Christian captive had no sooner said this than the horseman dismounted and came up to embrace the young fellow. 'My dearest nephew!' he cried. 'I recognize you now. I and my sister—your mother—and all your relatives who are still alive have wept for you as dead, and now it appears that God has been pleased to prolong their lives that they might have the pleasure of seeing you again. We had heard that you were in Algiers, but from the look of your garments and those of all this company I realize that you have been miraculously liberated.'

"That,' replied the young man, 'is the truth, and there will be time to tell you all about it.'

"As soon as the guardsmen realized that we were Christian captives, they dismounted, and each then offered us his own horse to carry us to the city of Vélez Málaga, which was a league and a half from there. We told them where we had left the boat, and some of them went back to get it and take it to the town. Others mounted behind us on the cruppers, Zoraida going with the young man's uncle.

"The entire town came out to receive us, for someone had ridden ahead and told them of our coming. They were not the kind of folk to be astonished at seeing captives free or Moors held prisoner, being quite accustomed to such a sight. What they rather marveled at was Zoraida's beauty. Despite the fact that she was weary from the journey, she looked her loveliest at that moment, so joyful was she at finding herself on Christian soil with nothing to fear any longer. Happiness had put so much color into her face that—unless it can be that my love for her deceived me—I shall venture to say that there never was a more beautiful creature in all this world, none that I have ever seen, at any rate.

"We went directly to the church to thank God for his mercy; and as soon as Zoraida entered the portals, she remarked that there were faces there that resembled that of Lela Marien. We informed her that these were images of the Virgin, and the renegade to the best of his ability then went on to explain what their meaning was and how she might worship them as if each were the same Lela Marien who had spoken to her. Being possessed of a good, clear mind, she understood all this very readily. After that, they took us to various houses in the town, and the Christian who had come with us brought the renegade, Zoraida, and me to the home of his parents, who were people in moderately comfortable circumstances and who entertained us with as great a show of affection as they did their own son.

"We were in Vélez for six days, at the end of which time the renegade, having ascertained what he had to do, departed for Granada in order that, through the mediation of the Holy Inquisition, he might be restored to the sacred bosom of the Church. Each of the other liberated Christians went his own way, Zoraida and I being left with no other means than the crowns which the French captain had courteously given her. With them I purchased the beast on which she now rides; and with me serving her up to now as father and squire, not as husband, we are at present on our way to see if my own father is still alive or if one of my brothers has prospered to a greater extent than I.

"Seeing that Heaven has seen fit to give her to me as my companion, I can imagine no other fortune, however good, that might come to me which I should hold to be of greater worth. The patience with which she endures the hardships that poverty brings with it, and her desire to become a Christian, are such as to fill me with admiration and induce me to serve her all my life long. My happiness, however, at knowing that I am hers and she is mine is marred by the fact that I am at a loss where to find a nook in my own country in which to shelter her. For it may be that time and death have wrought such changes in the life and fortunes of my father and my brothers that, if they should not be there, I shall hardly find anyone who is acquainted with me.

"Gentle folk, that is all there is to my story. As to whether it be a pleasing and a curious one, that is for you in your good judgment to decide. For my own part, I may say that I should like to have told it more briefly, although, as it is, the fear of tiring you has led me to omit a number of incidents."

[“Set Free at Once That Lovely Lady”]

CHAPTER LII

Of the quarrel that Don Quixote had with the goatherd, together with the rare adventure of the penitents, which the knight by the sweat of his brow brought to a happy conclusion.<sup>2</sup>

* * *

The goatherd stared at Don Quixote, observing in some astonishment the knight's unprepossessing appearance.

“Sir, he said, turning to the barber who sat beside him, “who is this man who looks so strange and talks in this way?”

“Who should it be,” the barber replied, “if not the famous Don Quixote de la Mancha, righter of wrongs, avenger of injustices, protector of damsels, terror of giants, and champion of battles?”

“That,” said the goatherd, “sounds to me like the sort of thing you read of in books of chivalry, where they do all those things that your Grace has mentioned in connection with this man. But if you ask me, either your Grace is joking or this worthy gentleman must have a number of rooms to let inside his head.”

“You are the greatest villain that ever was!” cried Don Quixote when he heard this. “It is you who are the empty one; I am fuller than the bitch that bore you ever was.” Saying this, he snatched up a loaf of bread that was lying beside him and hurled it straight in the goatherd's face with such force as to flatten the man's nose. Upon finding himself thus mistreated in earnest, Eugenio, who did not understand this kind of joke, forgot all about the carpet, the tablecloth, and the other diners and leaped upon Don Quixote. Seizing him by the throat with both hands, he would no doubt have strangled him if Sancho Panza, who now came running up, had not grasped him by the shoulders and flung him backward over the table, smashing plates and cups and spilling and scattering all the food and drink that was there. Thus freed of his assailant, Don Quixote then threw himself upon the shepherd, who, with bleeding face and very much battered by Sancho's feet, was creeping about on his hands and knees in search of a table knife with which to exact a sanguinary vengeance, a purpose which the canon and the curate prevented him from carrying out. The barber, however, so contrived it that the goatherd came down on top of his opponent, upon whom he now showered so many blows that the poor knight's countenance was soon as bloody as his own.

As all this went on, the canon and the curate were laughing fit to burst, the troopers<sup>3</sup> were dancing with glee, and they all hissed on the pair as men do at a dog fight. Sancho Panza alone was in despair, being unable to free himself of one of the canon's servants who held him back from going to his master's aid. And then, just as they were all enjoying themselves hugely, with the exception

2. Last chapter of Part I. Through various devices, including the use of Don Quixote's own belief in enchantments and spells, the curate and the barber have persuaded the knight to let himself be taken home in an oxcart.

3. A canon from Toledo who has joined Don Quixote and his guardians on the way; conversing about chivalry with the knight, he has had cause to be “astonished at Don Quixote's well-reasoned nonsense.” Eugenio, a very literate goatherd they have met on the way, has just told them the story of his unhappy love for Leandra. The girl, instead of choosing one of her local suitors, had eloped with a flashy and crooked soldier; robbed and abandoned by him, she had been put by her father in a convent.

of the two who were mauling each other, the note of a trumpet fell upon their ears, a sound so mournful that it caused them all to turn their heads in the direction from which it came. The one who was most excited by it was Don Quixote; who, very much against his will and more than a little bruised, was lying pinned beneath the goatherd.

"Brother Demon," he now said to the shepherd, "for you could not possibly be anything but a demon, seeing that you have shown a strength and valor greater than mine, I request you to call a truce for no more than an hour; for the doleful sound of that trumpet that we hear seems to me to be some new adventure that is calling me."

Tired of mauling and being mauled, the goatherd let him up at once. As he rose to his feet and turned his head in the direction of the sound, Don Quixote then saw, coming down the slope of a hill, a large number of persons clad in white after the fashion of penitents; for, as it happened, the clouds that year had denied their moisture to the earth, and in all the villages of that district processions for prayer and penance were being organized with the purpose of beseeching God to have mercy and send rain. With this object in view, the good folk from a nearby town were making a pilgrimage to a devout hermit who dwelt on these slopes. Upon beholding the strange costumes that the penitents wore, without pausing to think how many times he had seen them before, Don Quixote imagined that this must be some adventure or other, and that it was for him alone as a knight-errant to undertake it. He was strengthened in this belief by the sight of a covered image that they bore, as it seemed to him this must be some highborn lady whom these scoundrelly and discourteous brigands were forcibly carrying off; and no sooner did this idea occur to him than he made for Rocinante, who was grazing not far away.

Taking the bridle and his buckler from off the saddletree, he had the bridle adjusted in no time, and then, asking Sancho for his sword, he climbed into the saddle, braced his shield upon his arm, and cried out to those present, "And now, valorous company, you shall see how important it is to have in the world those who follow the profession of knight-errantry. You have but to watch how I shall set at liberty that worthy lady who there goes captive, and then you may tell me whether or not such knights are to be esteemed."

As he said this, he dug his legs into Rocinante's flanks, since he had no spurs, and at a fast trot (for nowhere in this veracious history are we ever told that the hack ran full speed) he bore down on the penitents in spite of all that the canon, the curate, and the barber could do to restrain him—their efforts were as vain as were the pleadings of his squire.

"Where are you bound for, Señor Don Quixote?" Sancho called after him. "What evil spirits in your bosom spur you on to go against our Catholic faith? Plague take me, can't you see that's a procession of penitents and that lady they're carrying on the litter is the most blessed image of the Immaculate Virgin? Look well what you're doing, my master, for this time it may be said that you really do not know."

His exertions were in vain, however, for his master was so bent upon having it out with the sheeted figures and freeing the lady clad in mourning that he did not hear a word, nor would he have turned back if he had, though the king himself might have commanded it. Having reached the procession, he reined in Rocinante, who by this time was wanting a little rest, and in a hoarse, excited voice he shouted, "You who go there with your faces covered, out of shame, it may be, listen well to what I have to say to you."

The first to come to a halt were those who carried the image; and then one of the four clerics who were intoning the litanies, upon beholding Don Quixote's weird figure, his bony nag, and other amusing appurtenances, spoke up in reply.

"Brother, if you have something to say to us, say it quickly, for these brethren are engaged in macerating their flesh, and we cannot stop to hear anything, nor is it fitting that we should, unless it is capable of being said in a couple of words."

"I will say it to you in one word," Don Quixote answered, "and that word is the following: 'Set free at once that lovely lady whose tears and mournful countenance show plainly that you are carrying her away against her will and that you have done her some shameful wrong. I will not consent to your going one step farther until you shall have given her the freedom that should be hers.'"

Hearing these words, they all thought that Don Quixote must be some madman or other and began laughing heartily; but their laughter proved to be gunpowder to his wrath, and without saying another word he drew his sword and fell upon the litter. One of those who bore the image, leaving his share of the burden to his companions, then sallied forth to meet the knight, flourishing a forked stick that he used to support the Virgin while he was resting; and upon this stick he now received a mighty slash that Don Quixote dealt him, one that shattered it in two, but with the piece about a third long that remained in his hand he came down on the shoulder of his opponent's sword arm, left unprotected by the buckler, with so much force that the poor fellow sank to the ground sorely battered and bruised.

Sancho Panza, who was puffing along close behind his master, upon seeing him fall cried out to the attacker not to deal another blow, as this was an unfortunate knight who was under a magic spell but who had never in all the days of his life done any harm to anyone. But the thing that stopped the rustic was not Sancho's words; it was, rather, the sight of Don Quixote lying there without moving hand or foot. And so, thinking that he had killed him, he hastily girded up his tunic and took to his heels across the countryside like a deer.

By this time all of Don Quixote's companions had come running up to where he lay; and the penitents, when they observed this, and especially when they caught sight of the officers of the Brotherhood with their crossbows, at once rallied around the image, where they raised their hoods and grasped their whips as the priests raised their tapers aloft in expectation of an assault; for they were resolved to defend themselves and even, if possible, to take the offensive against their assailants, but, as luck would have it, things turned out better than they had hoped. Sancho, meanwhile, believing Don Quixote to be dead, had flung himself across his master's body and was weeping and wailing in the most lugubrious and, at the same time, the most laughable fashion that could be imagined; and the curate had discovered among those who marched in the procession another curate whom he knew, their recognition of each other serving to allay the fears of all parties concerned. The first curate then gave the second a very brief account of who Don Quixote was, whereupon all the penitents came up to see if the poor knight was dead. And as they did so, they heard Sancho Panza speaking with tears in his eyes.

"O flower of chivalry,"<sup>4</sup> he was saying, "the course of whose well-spent years has been brought to an end by a single blow of a club! O honor of your line, honor and glory of all La Mancha and of all the world, which, with you absent from it, will be full of evildoers who will not fear being punished for their deeds! O master more generous than all the Alexanders, who after only eight months of service presented me with the best island that the sea washes and surrounds! Humble with the proud, haughty with the humble, brave in facing dangers, long-suffering under outrages, in love without reason, imitator of the good, scourge of the wicked, enemy of the mean—in a word, a knight-errant, which is all there is to say.”

4. Note how Sancho has absorbed some of his master's speech mannerisms.

At the sound of Sancho’s cries and moans, Don Quixote revived, and the first thing he said was, “He who lives apart from thee, O fairest Dulcinea, is subject to greater woes than those I now endure. Friend Sancho, help me onto that enchanted cart, as I am in no condition to sit in Rocinante’s saddle with this shoulder of mine knocked to pieces the way it is.”

“That I will gladly do, my master,” replied Sancho, “and we will go back to my village in the company of these gentlemen who are concerned for your welfare, and there we will arrange for another sally and one, let us hope, that will bring us more profit and fame than this one has.”

“Well spoken, Sancho,” said Don Quixote, “for it will be an act of great prudence to wait until the present evil influence of the stars has passed.”

The canon, the curate, and the barber all assured him that he would be wise in doing this; and so, much amused by Sancho Panza’s simplicity, they placed Don Quixote upon the cart as before, while the procession of penitents re-formed and continued on its way. The goatherd took leave of all of them, and the curate paid the troopers what was coming to them, since they did not wish to go any farther. The canon requested the priest to inform him of the outcome of Don Quixote’s madness, as to whether it yielded to treatment or not; and with this he begged permission to resume his journey. In short, the party broke up and separated, leaving only the curate and the barber, Don Quixote and Panza, and the good Rocinante, who looked upon everything that he had seen with the same resignation as his master. Yoking his oxen, the carter made the knight comfortable upon a bale of hay, and then at his customary slow pace proceeded to follow the road that the curate directed him to take. At the end of six days they reached Don Quixote’s village, making their entrance at noon of a Sunday, when the square was filled with a crowd of people through which the cart had to pass.

They all came running to see who it was, and when they recognized their townsman, they were vastly astonished. One lad sped to bring the news to the knight’s housekeeper and his niece, telling them that their master had returned lean and jaundiced and lying stretched out upon a bale of hay on an oxcart. It was pitiful to hear the good ladies’ screams, to behold the way in which they beat their breasts, and to listen to the curses which they once more heaped upon those damnable books of chivalry, and this demonstration increased as they saw Don Quixote coming through the doorway.

At news of the knight’s return, Sancho Panza’s wife had hurried to the scene, for she had some while since learned that her husband had accompanied him as his squire; and now, as soon as she laid eyes upon her man, the first question she asked was if all was well with the ass, to which Sancho replied that the beast was better off than his master.

“Thank God,” she exclaimed, “for all his blessings! But tell me now, my dear, what have you brought me from all your squirings? A new cloak to wear? Or shoes for the young ones?”

"I've brought you nothing of the sort, good wife," said Sancho, "but other things of greater value and importance."

"I'm glad to hear that," she replied. "Show me those things of greater value and importance, my dear. I'd like a sight of them just to cheer this heart of mine which has been so sad and unhappy all the centuries that you've been gone."

"I will show them to you at home, wife," said Sancho. "For the present, be satisfied that if, God willing, we set out on another journey in search of adventures, you will see me in no time a count or the governor of an island, and not one of those around here, but the best that is to be had."

"I hope to Heaven it's true, my husband, for we certainly need it. But tell me, what is all this about islands? I don't understand."

"Honey," replied Sancho, "is not for the mouth of an ass. You will find out in good time, woman; and you're going to be surprised to hear yourself called 'my Ladyship' by all your vassals."

"What's this you are saying, Sancho, about ladyships, islands, and vassals?" Juana Panza insisted on knowing—for such was the name of Sancho's wife, although they were not blood relatives, it being the custom in La Mancha for wives to take their husbands' surnames.

"Do not be in such a hurry to know all this, Juana," he said. "It is enough that I am telling you the truth. Sew up your mouth, then; for all I will say, in passing, is that there is nothing in the world that is more pleasant than being a respected man, squire to a knight-errant who goes in search of adventures. It is true that most of the adventures you meet with do not come out the way you'd like them to, for ninety-nine out of a hundred will prove to be all twisted and crosswise. I know that from experience, for I've come out of some of them blanketed and out of others beaten to a pulp. But, all the same, it's a fine thing to go along waiting for what will happen next, crossing mountains, making your way through woods, climbing over cliffs, visiting castles, and putting up at inns free of charge, and the devil take the maravedi that is to pay."

Such was the conversation that took place between Sancho Panza and Juana Panza, his wife, as Don Quixote's housekeeper and niece were taking him in, stripping him, and stretching him out on his old-time bed. He gazed at them blankly, being unable to make out where he was. The curate charged the niece to take great care to see that her uncle was comfortable and to keep close watch over him so that he would not slip away from them another time. He then told them of what it had been necessary to do in order to get him home, at which they once more screamed to Heaven and began cursing the books of chivalry all over again, praying God to plunge the authors of such lying nonsense into the center of the bottomless pit. In short, they scarcely knew what to do, for they were very much afraid that their master and uncle would give them the slip once more, the moment he was a little better, and it turned out just the way they feared it might.

From Part II

[Prologue]

To the Reader

God bless me, gentle or, it may be, plebeian reader, how eagerly you must be awaiting this prologue, thinking to find in it vengeful scoldings and vituperations directed against the author of the second Don Quixote—I mean the one who, so it is said, was begotten in Tordesillas and born in Tarragona.<sup>1</sup> The truth is, however, that I am not going to be able to satisfy you in this regard; for granting that injuries are capable of awakening wrath in the humblest of bosoms, my own must be an exception to the rule. You would, perhaps, have me call him an ass, a crackbrain, and an upstart, but it is not my intention so to chastise him for his sin. Let him eat it with his bread and have done with it.

What I cannot but resent is the fact that he describes me as being old and one-handed, as if it were in my power to make time stand still for me, or as if I had lost my hand in some tavern instead of upon the greatest occasion that the past or present has ever known or the future may ever hope to see.<sup>2</sup> If my wounds are not resplendent in the eyes of the chance beholder, they are at least highly thought of by those who know where they were received. The soldier who lies dead in battle has a more impressive mien than the one who by flight attains his liberty. So strongly do I feel about this that even if it were possible to work a miracle in my case, I still would rather have taken part in that prodigious battle than be today free of my wounds without having been there. The scars that the soldier has to show on face and breast are stars that guide others to the Heaven of honor, inspiring them with a longing for well-merited praise. What is more, it may be noted that one does not write with gray hairs but with his understanding, which usually grows better with the years.

I likewise resent his calling me envious; and as though I were some ignorant person, he goes on to explain to me what is meant by envy; when the truth of the matter is that of the two kinds, I am acquainted only with that which is holy, noble, and right-intentioned.<sup>3</sup> And this being so, as indeed it is, it is not likely that I should attack any priest, above all, one that is a familiar of the Holy Office.<sup>4</sup> If he made this statement, as it appears that he did, on behalf of a certain person, then he is utterly mistaken; for the person in question is one whose genius I hold in veneration and whose works I admire, as well as his constant industry and powers of application. But when all is said, I wish to thank this gentlemanly author for observing that my Novels<sup>5</sup> are more satirical than exemplary, while admitting at the same time that they are good; for they could not be good unless they had in them a little of everything.

1. A continuation of Don Quixote was published by a writer who gave himself the name of Avellaneda and claimed to come from Tordesillas. The mood of the second prologue is grim in comparison to the optimistic and witty prologue to Part I.

2. Cervantes received three gunshot wounds in the battle of Lepanto (1571); one of them cost him the use of his left hand.

3. Jealousy and zealousness are etymologically related.

4. An allusion to the Spanish playwright Lope de Vega (1562–1635), who had been made a priest and appointed an official of the Spanish Inquisition. Avellaneda accused Cervantes of envying Lope's enormous popularity.

5. Exemplary Novels (1613).

You will likely tell me that I am being too restrained and overmodest, but it is my belief that affliction is not to be heaped upon the afflicted, and this gentleman must be suffering greatly, seeing that he does not dare to come out into the open and show himself by the light of day, but must conceal his name and dissemble his place of origin, as if he had been guilty of some treason or act of lese majesty. If you by chance should come to know him, tell him on my behalf that I do not hold it against him; for I know what temptations the devil has to offer, one of the greatest of which consists in putting it into a man's head that he can write a book and have it printed and thereby achieve as much fame as he does money and acquire as much money as he does fame; in confirmation of which I would have you, in your own witty and charming manner, tell him this tale.

There was in Seville a certain madman whose madness assumed one of the drollest forms that ever was seen in this world. Taking a hollow reed sharpened at one end, he would catch a dog in the street or somewhere else; and, holding one of the animal's legs with his foot and raising the other with his hand, he would fix his reed as best he could in a certain part, after which he would blow the dog up, round as a ball. When he had it in this condition he would give it a couple of slaps on the belly and let it go, remarking to the bystanders, of whom there were always plenty, "Do your Worships think, then, that it is so easy a thing to inflate a dog?" So you might ask, "Does your Grace think that it is so easy a thing to write a book?" And if this story does not set well with him, here is another one, dear reader, that you may tell him. This one, also, is about a madman and a dog.

The madman in this instance lived in Cordova. He was in the habit of carrying on his head a marble slab or stone of considerable weight, and when he met some stray cur he would go up alongside it and drop the weight full upon it, and the dog in a rage, barking and howling, would then scurry off down three whole streets without stopping. Now, it happened that among the dogs that he treated in this fashion was one belonging to a capmaker, who was very fond of the beast. Going up to it as usual, the madman let the stone fall on its head, whereupon the animal set up a great yowling, and its owner, hearing its moans and seeing what had been done to it, promptly snatched up a measuring rod and fell upon the dog's assailant, flaying him until there was not a sound bone left in the fellow's body; and with each blow that he gave him he cried, "You dog! You thief! Treat my greyhound like that, would you? You brute, couldn't you see it was a greyhound?" And repeating the word "greyhound" over and over, he sent the madman away beaten to a pulp.

Profiting by the lesson that had been taught him, the fellow disappeared and was not seen in public for more than a month, at the end of which time he returned, up to his old tricks and with a heavier stone than ever on his head. He would go up to a dog and stare at it, long and hard, and without daring to drop his stone, would say, "This is a greyhound; beware." And so with all the dogs that he encountered: whether they were mastiffs or curs, he would assert that they were greyhounds and let them go unharmed.

The same thing possibly may happen to our historian; it may be that he will not again venture to let fall the weight of his wit in the form of books which, being bad ones, are harder than rocks.

As for the threat he has made to the effect that through his book he will deprive me of the profits on my own,<sup>6</sup> you may tell him that I do not give a rap.

6. Avellaneda asserted that his second part would earn the profits Cervantes might have expected from a continuation of his own.

Quoting from the famous interlude, La Perendenga,<sup>7</sup> I will say to him in reply, “Long live my master, the Four-and-twenty,<sup>8</sup> and Christ be with us all.” Long live the great Count of Lemos, whose Christian spirit and well-known liberality have kept me on my feet despite all the blows an unkind fate has dealt me. Long life to his Eminence of Toledo, the supremely charitable Don Bernardo de Sandoval y Rojas.<sup>9</sup> Even though there were no printing presses in all the world, or such as there are should print more books directed against me than there are letters in the verses of Mingo Revulgo,<sup>1</sup> what would it matter to me? These two princes, without any cringing flattery or adulation on my part but solely out of their own goodness of heart, have taken it upon themselves to grant me their favor and protection, in which respect I consider myself richer and more fortunate than if by ordinary means I had attained the peak of prosperity. The poor man may keep his honor, but not the vicious one. Poverty may cast a cloud over nobility but cannot wholly obscure it. Virtue of itself gives off a certain light, even though it be through the chinks and crevices and despite the obstacles of adversity, and so comes to be esteemed and as a consequence favored by high and noble minds.

Tell him no more than this, nor do I have anything more to say to you, except to ask you to bear in mind that this Second Part of Don Quixote, which I herewith present to you, is cut from the same cloth and by the same craftsman as Part I. In this book I give you Don Quixote continued and, finally, dead and buried, in order that no one may dare testify any further concerning him, for there has been quite enough evidence as it is. It is sufficient that a reputable individual should have chronicled these ingenious acts of madness once and for all without going into the matter again; for an abundance even of good things causes them to be little esteemed, while scarcity may lend a certain worth to those that are bad.

I almost forgot to tell you that you may look forward to the Persiles on which I am now putting the finishing touches, as well as Part Second of the Galatea.<sup>2</sup>

["Put into a Book"]

CHAPTER III

Of the laughable conversation that took place between Don Quixote, Sancho Panza, and the bachelor Sansón Carrasco.

Don Quixote remained in a thoughtful mood as he waited for the bachelor Carrasco,<sup>3</sup> from whom he hoped to hear the news as to how he had been put into a book, as Sancho had said. He could not bring himself to believe that any such

7. No interlude by this name has survived.

8. Municipal authorities of Seville, Cordova, and Granada.

9. Archbishop of Toledo, uncle of the duke of Lerma, and patron of Cervantes.

1. Long verse satire, well known in Cervantes' time; it is alluded to again in Part II, chapter LXXIII (see p. 1685).

2. The Trials of Persiles and Sigismunda was published in 1617, two years after Part II of Don Quixote. A second part of The Galatea was never published.

3. I.e., the bachelor of arts Sansón Carrasco, an important new character who appears at the beginning of Part II and will play a considerable role in the story with his attempts at "curing" Don Quixote. In the preceding chapter he has been telling Sancho about a book relating the adventures of Don Quixote and his squire, by which the two have been made famous; the book is, of course, Don Quixote, Part I.

history existed, since the blood of the enemies he had slain was not yet dry on the blade of his sword; and here they were trying to tell him that his high deeds of chivalry were already circulating in printed form. But, for that matter, he imagined that some sage, either friend or enemy, must have seen to the printing of them through the art of magic. If the chronicler was a friend, he must have undertaken the task in order to magnify and exalt Don Quixote's exploits above the most notable ones achieved by knights-errant of old. If an enemy, his purpose would have been to make them out as nothing at all, by debasing them below the meanest acts ever recorded of any mean squire. The only thing was, the knight reflected, the exploits of squires never were set down in writing. If it was true that such a history existed, being about a knight-errant, then it must be eloquent and lofty in tone, a splendid and distinguished piece of work and veracious in its details.

This consoled him somewhat, although he was a bit put out at the thought that the author was a Moor, if the appellation "Cid" was to be taken as an indication,<sup>4</sup> and from the Moors you could never hope for any word of truth, seeing that they are all of them cheats, forgers, and schemers. He feared lest his love should not have been treated with becoming modesty but rather in a way that would reflect upon the virtue of his lady Dulcinea del Toboso. He hoped that his fidelity had been made clear, and the respect he had always shown her, and that something had been said as to how he had spurned queens, empresses, and damsels of every rank while keeping a rein upon those impulses that are natural to a man. He was still wrapped up in these and many other similar thoughts when Sancho returned with Carrasco.

Don Quixote received the bachelor very amiably. The latter, although his name was Sansón, or Samson, was not very big so far as bodily size went, but he was a great joker, with a sallow complexion and a ready wit. He was going on twenty-four and had a round face, a snub nose, and a large mouth, all of which showed him to be of a mischievous disposition and fond of jests and witticisms. This became apparent when, as soon as he saw Don Quixote, he fell upon his knees and addressed the knight as follows:

"O mighty Don Quixote de la Mancha, give me your hands; for by the habit of St. Peter that I wear<sup>5</sup>—though I have received but the first four orders—your Grace is one of the most famous knights-errant that ever have been or ever will be anywhere on this earth. Blessings upon Cid Hamete Benengeli who wrote down the history of your great achievements, and upon that curious-minded one who was at pains to have it translated from the Arabic into our Castilian vulgate for the universal entertainment of the people."

Don Quixote bade him rise. "Is it true, then," he asked, "that there is a book about me and that it was some Moorish sage who composed it?"

"By way of showing you how true it is," replied Sansón, "I may tell you that it is my belief that there are in existence today more than twelve thousand copies of that history. If you do not believe me, you have but to make inquiries in Portugal, Barcelona, and Valencia, where editions have been brought out, and there is even a report to the effect that one edition was printed at Antwerp. In short, I feel certain that there will soon not be a nation that does not know it or a language into which it has not been translated."

4. The allusion is to Cid Hamete Benengeli derivation.
(see p. 1573, n. 5). The word cid is of Arabic

5. The dress of one of the minor clerical orders.

"One of the things," remarked Don Quixote, "that should give most satisfaction to a virtuous and eminent man is to see his good name spread abroad during his own lifetime, by means of the printing press, through translations into the languages of the various peoples. I have said 'good name,' for if he has any other kind, his fate is worse than death."

"If it is a matter of good name and good reputation," said the bachelor, "your Grace bears off the palm from all the knights-errant in the world; for the Moor in his tongue and the Christian in his have most vividly depicted your Grace's gallantry, your courage in facing dangers, your patience in adversity and suffering, whether the suffering be due to wounds or to misfortunes of another sort, and your virtue and continence in love, in connection with that platonic relationship that exists between your Grace and my lady Doña Dulcinea del Toboso."

At this point Sancho spoke up. "Never in my life," he said, "have I heard my lady Dulcinea called 'Doña,' but only 'la Señora Dulcinea del Toboso'; so on that point, already, the history is wrong."

"That is not important," said Carrasco.

"No, certainly not," Don Quixote agreed. "But tell me, Señor Bachelor, what adventures of mine as set down in this book have made the deepest impression?"

"As to that," the bachelor answered, "opinions differ, for it is a matter of individual taste. There are some who are very fond of the adventure of the windmills—those windmills which to your Grace appeared to be so many Briareuses and giants. Others like the episode at the fulling mill. One relishes the story of the two armies which took on the appearance of droves of sheep, while another fancies the tale of the dead man whom they were taking to Segovia for burial. One will assert that the freeing of the galley slaves is the best of all, and yet another will maintain that nothing can come up to the Benedictine giants and the encounter with the valiant Biscayan."

Again Sancho interrupted him. "Tell me, Señor Bachelor," he said, "does the book say anything about the adventure with the Yanguesans, that time our good Rocinante took it into his head to go looking for tidbits in the sea?"

"The sage," replied Sansón, "has left nothing in the inkwell. He has told everything and to the point, even to the capers which the worthy Sancho cut as they tossed him in the blanket."

"I cut no capers in the blanket," objected Sancho, "but I did in the air, and more than I liked."

"I imagine," said Don Quixote, "that there is no history in the world, dealing with humankind, that does not have its ups and downs, and this is particularly true of those that have to do with deeds of chivalry, for they can never be filled with happy incidents alone."

"Nevertheless," the bachelor went on, "there are some who have read the book who say that they would have been glad if the authors had forgotten a few of the innumerable cudgelings which Señor Don Quixote received in the course of his various encounters."

"But that is where the truth of the story comes in," Sancho protested.

"For all of that," observed Don Quixote, "they might well have said nothing about them; for there is no need of recording those events that do not alter the veracity of the chronicle, when they tend only to lessen the reader's respect for the hero. You may be sure that Aeneas was not as pious as Vergil would have us believe, nor was Ulysses as wise as Homer depicts him.”

“That is true enough,” replied Sansón, “but it is one thing to write as a poet and another as a historian. The former may narrate or sing of things not as they were but as they should have been; the latter must describe them not as they should have been but as they were, without adding to or detracting from the truth in any degree whatsoever.”

“Well,” said Sancho, “if this Moorish gentleman is bent upon telling the truth, I have no doubt that among my master’s thrashings my own will be found; for they never took the measure of his Grace’s shoulders without measuring my whole body. But I don’t wonder at that; for as my master himself says, when there’s an ache in the head the members have to share it.”

“You are a sly fox, Sancho,” said Don Quixote. “My word, but you can remember things well enough when you choose to do so!”

“Even if I wanted to forget the whacks they gave me,” Sancho answered him, “the welts on my ribs wouldn’t let me, for they are still fresh.”

“Be quiet, Sancho,” his master admonished him, “and do not interrupt the bachelor. I beg him to go on and tell me what is said of me in this book.”

“And what it says about me, too,” put in Sancho, “for I have heard that I am one of the main presonages in it—”

“Personages, not presonages, Sancho my friend,” said Sansón.

“So we have another one who catches you up on everything you say,” was Sancho’s retort. “If we go on at this rate, we’ll never be through in a lifetime.”

“May God put a curse on my life,” the bachelor told him, “if you are not the second most important person in the story; and there are some who would rather listen to you talk than to anyone else in the book. It is true, there are those who say that you are too gullible in believing it to be the truth that you could become the governor of that island that was offered you by Señor Don Quixote, here present.”

“There is still sun on the top of the wall,” said Don Quixote, “and when Sancho is a little older, with the experience that the years bring, he will be wiser and better fitted to be a governor than he is at the present time.”

“By God, master,” said Sancho, “the island that I couldn’t govern right now I’d never be able to govern if I lived to be as old as Methuselah.<sup>6</sup> The trouble is, I don’t know where that island we are talking about is located; it is not due to any lack of noddle on my part.”

“Leave it to God, Sancho,” was Don Quixote’s advice, “and everything will come out all right, perhaps even better than you think; for not a leaf on the tree stirs except by His will.”

“Yes,” said Sansón, “if it be God’s will, Sancho will not lack a thousand islands to govern, not to speak of one island alone.”

“I have seen governors around here,” said Sancho, “that are not to be compared to the sole of my shoe, and yet they call them ‘your Lordship’ and serve them on silver plate.”

“Those are not the same kind of governors,” Sansón informed him. “Their task is a good deal easier. The ones that govern islands must at least know grammar.”

6. In the Bible’s Book of Genesis, a man who lived 969 years.

"I could make out well enough with the gram," replied Sancho, "but with the mar I want nothing to do, for I don't understand it at all. But leaving this business of the governorship in God's hands—for He will send me wherever I can best serve Him—I will tell you, Señor Bachelor Sansón Carrasco, that I am very much pleased that the author of the history should have spoken of me in such a way as does not offend me; for, upon the word of a faithful squire, if he had said anything about me that was not becoming to an old Christian, the deaf would have heard of it."

"That would be to work miracles," said Sansón.

"Miracles or no miracles," was the answer, "let everyone take care as to what he says or writes about people and not be setting down the first thing that pops into his head."

"One of the faults that is found with the book," continued the bachelor, "is that the author has inserted in it a story entitled The One Who Was Too Curious for His Own Good. It is not that the story in itself is a bad one or badly written; it is simply that it is out of place there, having nothing to do with the story of his Grace, Señor Don Quixote."<sup>7</sup>

"I will bet you," said Sancho, "that the son of a dog has mixed the cabbages with the baskets."<sup>8</sup>

"And I will say right now," declared Don Quixote, "that the author of this book was not a sage but some ignorant prattler who at haphazard and without any method set about the writing of it, being content to let things turn out as they might. In the same manner, Orbaneja,<sup>9</sup> the painter of Ubeda, when asked what he was painting would reply, 'Whatever it turns out to be.' Sometimes it would be a cock, in which case he would have to write alongside it, in Gothic letters, 'This is a cock.' And so it must be with my story, which will need a commentary to make it understandable."

"No," replied Sansón, "that it will not; for it is so clearly written that none can fail to understand it. Little children leaf through it, young people read it, adults appreciate it, and the aged sing its praises. In short, it is so thumbled and read and so well known to persons of every walk in life that no sooner do folks see some skinny nag than they at once cry, 'There goes Rocinante!' Those that like it best of all are the pages; for there is no lord's antechamber where a Don Quixote is not to be found. If one lays it down, another will pick it up; one will pounce upon it, and another will beg for it. It affords the pleasantest and least harmful reading of any book that has been published up to now. In the whole of it there is not to be found an indecent word or a thought that is other than Catholic."

"To write in any other manner," observed Don Quixote, "would be to write lies and not the truth. Those historians who make use of falsehoods ought to be burned like the makers of counterfeit money. I do not know what could have led the author to introduce stories and episodes that are foreign to the subject matter when he had so much to write about in describing my adventures. He must, undoubtedly, have been inspired by the old saying, 'With straw or with hay . . .'<sup>1</sup> For, in truth, all he had to do was to record my thoughts, my

7. The story, a tragic tale about a jealousy-ridden husband, occupies several chapters of Part I. Here, as elsewhere in this chapter, Cervantes echoes criticism currently aimed at his book.

8. I.e., has jumbled together things of different kinds.

9. This painter, possibly Cervantes' invention, has never been identified.

1. The proverb concludes either "the mattress is filled" or "I fill my belly."

sighs, my tears, my lofty purposes, and my undertakings, and he would have had a volume bigger or at least as big as that which the works of El Tostado<sup>2</sup> would make. To sum the matter up, Señor Bachelor, it is my opinion that, in composing histories or books of any sort, a great deal of judgment and ripe understanding is called for. To say and write witty and amusing things is the mark of great genius. The cleverest character in a comedy is the clown, since he who would make himself out to be a simpleton cannot be one. History is a near-sacred thing, for it must be true, and where the truth is, there is God. And yet there are those who compose books and toss them out into the world as if they were no more than fritters.”

“There is no book so bad,” opined the bachelor, “that there is not some good in it.”

“Doubtless that is so,” replied Don Quixote, “but it very often happens that those who have won in advance a great and well-deserved reputation for their writings, lose it in whole or in part when they give their works to the printer.”

“The reason for it,” said Sansón, “is that, printed works being read at leisure, their faults are the more readily apparent, and the greater the reputation of the author the more closely are they scrutinized. Men famous for their genius, great poets, illustrious historians, are almost always envied by those who take a special delight in criticizing the writings of others without having produced anything of their own.”

“That is not to be wondered at,” said Don Quixote, “for there are many theologians who are not good enough for the pulpit but who are very good indeed when it comes to detecting the faults or excesses of those who preach.”

“All of this is very true, Señor Don Quixote,” replied Carrasco, “but, all the same, I could wish that these self-appointed censors were a bit more forbearing and less hypercritical; I wish they would pay a little less attention to the spots on the bright sun of the work that occasions their fault-finding. For if aliquando bonus dormitat Homerus,<sup>3</sup> let them consider how much of his time he spent awake, shedding the light of his genius with a minimum of shade. It well may be that what to them seems a flaw is but one of those moles which sometimes add to the beauty of a face. In any event, I insist that he who has a book printed runs a very great risk, inasmuch as it is an utter impossibility to write it in such a manner that it will please all who read it.”

“This book about me must have pleased very few,” remarked Don Quixote.

“Quite the contrary,” said Sansón, “for just as stultorum infinitus est numerus,<sup>4</sup> so the number of those who have enjoyed this history is likewise infinite. Some, to be sure, have complained of the author’s forgetfulness, seeing that he neglected to make it plain who the thief was who stole Sancho’s gray;<sup>5</sup> for it is not stated there, but merely implied, that the ass was stolen; and, a little further on, we find the knight mounted on the same beast, although it has not made its reappearance in the story. They also say that the author forgot to tell us what Sancho did with those hundred crowns that he found in the valise on the Sierra Morena, as nothing more is said of them and there are

2. Alonso de Madrigal (ca. 1400–1455), bishop of Ávila, a prolific author of devotional works.

3. Good Homer sometimes nods too (Latin)—

Horace, Art of Poetry, l. 359.

4. Infinite is the number of fools (Latin).

5. In Part I, chapter 23.

many who would like to know how he disposed of the money or how he spent it. This is one of the serious omissions to be found in the work.”

To this Sancho replied, “I, Señor Sansón, do not feel like giving any account or accounting just now; for I feel a little weak in my stomach, and if I don’t do something about it by taking a few swigs of the old stuff, I’ll be sitting on St. Lucy’s thorn.<sup>6</sup> I have some of it at home, and my old woman is waiting for me. After I’ve had my dinner, I’ll come back and answer any questions your Grace or anybody else wants to ask me, whether it’s about the loss of the ass or the spending of the hundred crowns.”

And without waiting for a reply or saying another word, he went on home. Don Quixote urged the bachelor to stay and take potluck with him, and Sansón accepted the invitation and remained. In addition to the knight’s ordinary fare, they had a couple of pigeons, and at table their talk was of chivalry and feats of arms. Carrasco was careful to humor his host, and when the meal was over they took their siesta.

[A Victorious Duel]

CHAPTER XII

Of the strange adventure that befell the valiant Don Quixote with the fearless Knight of the Mirrors.<sup>7</sup>

The night following the encounter with Death was spent by Don Quixote and his squire beneath some tall and shady trees,<sup>8</sup> the knight having been persuaded to eat a little from the stock of provisions carried by the gray.

“Sir,” said Sancho, in the course of their repast, “how foolish I’d have been if I had chosen the spoils from your Grace’s first adventure rather than the foals from the three mares.<sup>9</sup> Truly, truly, a sparrow in the hand is worth more than a vulture on the wing.”<sup>1</sup>

“And yet, Sancho,” replied Don Quixote, “if you had but let me attack them as I wished to do, you would at least have had as spoils the Empress’s gold crown and Cupid’s painted wings;<sup>2</sup> for I should have taken them whether or no and placed them in your hands.”

“The crowns and scepters of stage emperors,” remarked Sancho, “were never known to be of pure gold; they are always of tinsel or tinplate.”

6. I.e., I shall be weak and exhausted (proverbial).

7. Until he earns this title (in chapter 15), he will be referred to as the Knight of the Wood.

8. Don Quixote and his squire are now in the woody region around El Toboso, Dulcinea’s hometown. Sancho has been sent to look for his knight’s lady and has saved the day by pretending to see the beautiful damsel in a “village wench, and not a pretty one at that, for she was round-faced and snub-nosed.” But by his imaginative lie he has succeeded, as he had planned, in setting in motion Don Quixote’s belief in spells and enchantments: enemy magicians, envious of him, have hidden his lady’s splendor only from his sight. While the knight was still under the shock of this experience, farther along their way he and his squire have met a group of itinerant players dressed in their proper costumes for a religious play, The Parliament of Death.

9. Don Quixote has promised them to Sancho as a reward for bringing news of Dulcinea.

1. I.e., a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.

2. The Empress and Cupid are characters in The Parliament of Death.

"That is the truth," said Don Quixote, "for it is only right that the accessories of a drama should be fictitious and not real, like the play itself. Speaking of that, Sancho, I would have you look kindly upon the art of the theater and, as a consequence, upon those who write the pieces and perform in them, for they all render a service of great value to the State by holding up a mirror for us at each step that we take, wherein we may observe, vividly depicted, all the varied aspects of human life; and I may add that there is nothing that shows us more clearly, by similitude, what we are and what we ought to be than do plays and players.

"Tell me, have you not seen some comedy in which kings, emperors, pontiffs, knights, ladies, and numerous other characters are introduced? One plays the ruffian, another the cheat, this one a merchant and that one a soldier, while yet another is the fool who is not so foolish as he appears, and still another the one of whom love has made a fool. Yet when the play is over and they have taken off their players' garments, all the actors are once more equal."

"Yes," replied Sancho, "I have seen all that."

"Well," continued Don Quixote, "the same thing happens in the comedy that we call life, where some play the part of emperors, others that of pontiffs—in short, all the characters that a drama may have—but when it is all over, that is to say, when life is done, death takes from each the garb that differentiates him, and all at last are equal in the grave."

"It is a fine comparison," Sancho admitted, "though not so new but that I have heard it many times before. It reminds me of that other one, about the game of chess. So long as the game lasts, each piece has its special qualities, but when it is over they are all mixed and jumbled together and put into a bag, which is to the chess pieces what the grave is to life."

"Every day, Sancho," said Don Quixote, "you are becoming less stupid and more sensible."

"It must be that some of your Grace's good sense is sticking to me," was Sancho's answer. "I am like a piece of land that of itself is dry and barren, but if you scatter manure over it and cultivate it, it will bear good fruit. By this I mean to say that your Grace's conversation is the manure that has been cast upon the barren land of my dry wit; the time that I spend in your service, associating with you, does the cultivating; and as a result of it all, I hope to bring forth blessed fruits by not departing, slipping, or sliding, from those paths of good breeding which your Grace has marked out for me in my parched understanding."

Don Quixote had to laugh at this affected speech of Sancho's, but he could not help perceiving that what the squire had said about his improvement was true enough; for every now and then the servant would speak in a manner that astonished his master. It must be admitted, however, that most of the time when he tried to use fine language, he would tumble from the mountain of his simple-mindedness into the abyss of his ignorance. It was when he was quoting old saws and sayings, whether or not they had anything to do with the subject under discussion, that he was at his best, displaying upon such occasions a prodigious memory, as will already have been seen and noted in the course of this history.

With such talk as this they spent a good part of the night. Then Sancho felt a desire to draw down the curtains of his eyes, as he was in the habit of saying when he wished to sleep, and, unsaddling his mount, he turned him loose to graze at will on the abundant grass. If he did not remove Rocinante's saddle, this was due to his master's express command; for when they had taken the field and were not sleeping under a roof, the hack was under no circumstances to be stripped. This was in accordance with an old and established custom which knights-errant faithfully observed: the bridle and saddlebow might be removed, but beware of touching the saddle itself! Guided by this precept, Sancho now gave Rocinante the same freedom that the ass enjoyed.

The close friendship that existed between the two animals was a most unusual one, so remarkable indeed that it has become a tradition handed down from father to son, and the author of this veracious chronicle even wrote a number of special chapters on the subject, although, in order to preserve the decency and decorum that are fitting in so heroic an account, he chose to omit them in the final version. But he forgets himself once in a while and goes on to tell us how the two beasts when they were together would hasten to scratch each other, and how, when they were tired and their bellies were full, Rocinante would lay his long neck over that of the ass—it extended more than half a yard on the other side—and the pair would then stand there gazing pensively at the ground for as much as three whole days at a time, or at least until someone came for them or hunger compelled them to seek nourishment.

I may tell you that I have heard it said that the author of this history, in one of his writings, has compared the friendship of Rocinante and the gray to that of Nisus and Euryalus and that of Pylades and Orestes;<sup>3</sup> and if this be true, it shows for the edification of all what great friends these two peace-loving animals were, and should be enough to make men ashamed, who are so inept at preserving friendship with one another. For this reason it has been said:

*There is no friend for friend,
Reeds to lances turn . . .*<sup>4</sup>

And there was the other poet who sang:

Between friend and friend the bug . . .<sup>5</sup>

Let no one think that the author has gone out of his way in comparing the friendship of animals with that of men; for human beings have received valuable lessons from the beasts and have learned many important things from them. From the stork they have learned the use of clysters; the dog has taught them the salutary effects of vomiting as well as a lesson in gratitude; the cranes have taught them vigilance, the ants foresight, the elephants modesty, and the horse loyalty.<sup>6</sup>

Sancho had at last fallen asleep at the foot of a cork tree, while Don Quixote was slumbering beneath a sturdy oak. Very little time had passed when the knight was awakened by a noise behind him, and, starting up, he began looking about him and listening to see if he could make out where it came from. Then he caught sight of two men on horseback, one of whom, slipping down from the saddle, said to the other, "Dismount, my friend, and unbridle the horses; for there seems to be plenty of grass around here for them and sufficient silence and solitude for my amorous thoughts."

Saying this, he stretched himself out on the ground, and as he flung himself down the armor that he wore made such a noise that Don Quixote knew at once,

3. Famous examples of friendship in Virgil's Aeneid and in Greek tradition and drama.

4. From a popular ballad.

5. The Spanish expression "a bug in the eye" implies keeping a watchful eye on somebody.

6. All folkloristic beliefs about the virtues of animals. "Clysters": enemas.

for a certainty, that he must be a knight-errant. Going over to Sancho, who was still sleeping, he shook him by the arm and with no little effort managed to get him awake.

"Brother Sancho," he said to him in a low voice, "we have an adventure on our hands."

"God give us a good one," said Sancho. "And where, my master, may her Ladyship, Mistress Adventure, be?"

"Where, Sancho?" replied Don Quixote. "Turn your eyes and look, and you will see stretched out over there a knight-errant who, so far as I can make out, is not any too happy; for I saw him fling himself from his horse to the ground with a certain show of despondency, and as he fell his armor rattled."

"Well," said Sancho, "and how does your Grace make this out to be an adventure?"

"I would not say," the knight answered him, "that this is an adventure in itself, but rather the beginning of one, for that is the way they start. But listen; he seems to be tuning a lute or guitar, and from the way he is spitting and clearing his throat he must be getting ready to sing something."

"Faith, so he is," said Sancho. "He must be some lovesick knight."

"There are no knights-errant that are not lovesick," Don Quixote informed him. "Let us listen to him, and the thread of his song will lead us to the yarn-ball of his thoughts; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

Sancho would have liked to reply to his master, but the voice of the Knight of the Wood, which was neither very good nor very bad, kept him from it; and as the two of them listened attentively, they heard the following:

SONNET

*Show me, O lady, the pattern of thy will,
That mine may take that very form and shape;
For my will in thine own I fain would drape,
Each slightest wish of thine I would fulfill.
If thou wouldst have me silence this dread ill
Of which I'm dying now, prepare the crape!
Or if I must another manner ape,
Then let Love's self display his rhyming skill.
Of opposites I am made, that's manifest:
In part soft wax, in part hard-diamond fire;
Yet to Love's laws my heart I do adjust,
And, hard or soft, I offer thee this breast:
Print or engrave there what thou may'st desire,
And I'll preserve it in eternal trust.*

With an Ay! that appeared to be wrung from the very depths of his heart, the Knight of the Wood brought his song to a close, and then after a brief pause began speaking in a grief-stricken voice that was piteous to hear.

"O most beautiful and most ungrateful woman in all the world!" he cried, "how is it possible, O most serene Casildea de Vandalia,<sup>7</sup> for you to permit this captive knight of yours to waste away and perish in constant wanderings, amid rude toils and bitter hardships? Is it not enough that I have compelled all the knights of Navarre, all those of León, all the Tartessians and Castilians, and, finally, all those of La Mancha, to confess that there is no beauty anywhere that can rival yours?"

7. The Knight of the Wood's counterpart to Don Quixote's Dulcinea del Toboso.

"That is not so!" cried Don Quixote at this point. "I am of La Mancha, and I have never confessed, I never could nor would confess a thing so prejudicial to the beauty of my lady. The knight whom you see there, Sancho, is raving; but let us listen and perhaps he will tell us more."

"That he will," replied Sancho, "for at the rate he is carrying on, he is good for a month at a stretch."

This did not prove to be the case, however; for when the Knight of the Wood heard voices near him, he cut short his lamentations and rose to his feet.

"Who goes there?" he called in a loud but courteous tone. "What kind of people are you? Are you, perchance, numbered among the happy or among the afflicted?"

"Among the afflicted," was Don Quixote's response.

"Then come to me," said the one of the Wood, "and, in doing so, know that you come to sorrow's self and the very essence of affliction."

Upon receiving so gentle and courteous an answer, Don Quixote and Sancho as well went over to him, whereupon the sorrowing one took the Manchegan's arm.

"Sit down here, Sir Knight," he continued, "for in order to know that you are one of those who follow the profession of knight-errantry, it is enough for me to have found you in this place where solitude and serenity keep you company, such a spot being the natural bed and proper dwelling of wandering men of arms."

"A knight I am," replied Don Quixote, "and of the profession that you mention; and though sorrows, troubles, and misfortunes have made my heart their abode, this does not mean that compassion for the woes of others has been banished from it. From your song a while ago I gather that your misfortunes are due to love—the love you bear that ungrateful fair one whom you named in your lamentations."

As they conversed in this manner, they sat together upon the hard earth, very peaceably and companionably, as if at daybreak they were not going to break each other's heads.

"Sir Knight," inquired the one of the Wood, "are you by any chance in love?"

"By mischance I am," said Don Quixote, "although the ills that come from well-placed affection should be looked upon as favors rather than as misfortunes."

"That is the truth," the Knight of the Wood agreed, "if it were not that the loved one's scorn disturbs our reason and understanding; for when it is excessive scorn appears as vengeance."

"I was never scorned by my lady," said Don Quixote.

"No, certainly not," said Sancho, who was standing near by, "for my lady is gentle as a ewe lamb and soft as butter."

"Is he your squire?" asked the one of the Wood.

"He is," replied Don Quixote.

"I never saw a squire," said the one of the Wood, "who dared to speak while his master was talking. At least, there is mine over there; he is as big as your father, and it cannot be proved that he has ever opened his lips while I was conversing.”

“Well, upon my word,” said Sancho, “I have spoken, and I will speak in front of any other as good—but never mind; it only makes it worse to stir it.”

The Knight of the Wood’s squire now seized Sancho’s arm. “Come along,” he said, “let the two of us go where we can talk all we like, squire fashion, and leave these gentlemen our masters to come to lance blows as they tell each other the story of their loves; for you may rest assured, daybreak will find them still at it.”

“Let us, by all means,” said Sancho, “and I will tell your Grace who I am, so that you may be able to see for yourself whether or not I am to be numbered among the dozen most talkative squires.”

With this, the pair went off to one side, and there then took place between them a conversation that was as droll as the one between their masters was solemn.

CHAPTER XIII

In which is continued the adventure of the Knight of the Wood, together with the shrewd, highly original, and amicable conversation that took place between the two squires.

The knights and the squires had now separated, the latter to tell their life stories, the former to talk of their loves; but the history first relates the conversation of the servants and then goes on to report that of the masters. We are told that, after they had gone some little distance from where the others were, the one who served the Knight of the Wood began speaking to Sancho as follows:

“It is a hard life that we lead and live, Señor mio, those of us who are squires to knights-errant. It is certainly true that we eat our bread in the sweat of our faces, which is one of the curses that God put upon our first parents.”<sup>8</sup>

“It might also be said,” added Sancho, “that we eat it in the chill of our bodies, for who endures more heat and cold than we wretched ones who wait upon these wandering men of arms? It would not be so bad if we did eat once in a while, for troubles are less where there is bread; but as it is, we sometimes go for a day or two without breaking our fast, unless we feed on the wind that blows.”

“But all this,” said the other, “may very well be put up with, by reason of the hope we have of being rewarded; for if a knight is not too unlucky, his squire after a little while will find himself the governor of some fine island or prosperous earldom.”

“I,” replied Sancho, “have told my master that I would be satisfied with the governorship of an island, and he is so noble and so generous that he has promised it to me on many different occasions.”

“In return for my services,” said the Squire of the Wood, “I’d be content with a canonry. My master has already appointed me to one—and what a canonry!”

“Then he must be a churchly knight,” said Sancho, “and in a position to grant favors of that sort to his faithful squire; but mine is a layman, pure and simple, although, as I recall, certain shrewd and, as I see it, scheming persons

8. Cf. Genesis 3.19: “In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground.”

did advise him to try to become an archbishop. However, he did not want to be anything but an emperor. And there I was, all the time trembling for fear he would take it into his head to enter the Church, since I was not educated enough to hold any benefices. For I may as well tell your Grace that, though I look like a man, I am no more than a beast where holy orders are concerned.”

“That is where you are making a mistake,” the Squire of the Wood assured him. “Not all island governments are desirable. Some of them are misshapen bits of land, some are poor, others are gloomy, and, in short, the best of them lays a heavy burden of care and trouble upon the shoulders of the unfortunate one to whose lot it falls. It would be far better if we who follow this cursed trade were to go back to our homes and there engage in pleasanter occupations, such as hunting or fishing, for example; for where is there in this world a squire so poor that he does not have a hack, a couple of greyhounds, and a fishing rod to provide him with sport in his own village?”

“I don’t lack any of those,” replied Sancho. “It is true, I have no hack, but I do have an ass that is worth twice as much as my master’s horse. God send me a bad Easter, and let it be the next one that comes, if I would make a trade, even though he gave me four fanegas<sup>9</sup> of barley to boot. Your Grace will laugh at the price I put on my gray—for that is the color of the beast. As to greyhounds, I shan’t want for them, as there are plenty and to spare in my village. And, anyway, there is more pleasure in hunting when someone else pays for it.”

“Really and truly, Sir Squire,” said the one of the Wood, “I have made up my mind and resolved to have no more to do with the mad whims of these knights; I intend to retire to my village and bring up my little ones—I have three of them, and they are like oriental pearls.”

“I have two of them,” said Sancho, “that might be presented to the Pope in person, especially one of my girls that I am bringing up to be a countess, God willing, in spite of what her mother says.”

“And how old is this young lady that is destined to be a countess?”

“Fifteen,” replied Sancho, “or a couple of years more or less. But she is tall as a lance, fresh as an April morning, and strong as a porter.”

“Those,” remarked the one of the Wood, “are qualifications that fit her to be not merely a countess but a nymph of the verdant wildwood. O whore’s daughter of a whore! What strength the she-roguess must have!”

Sancho was a bit put out by this. “She is not a whore,” he said, “nor was her mother before her, nor will either of them ever be, please God, so long as I live. And you might speak more courteously. For one who has been brought up among knights-errant, who are the soul of courtesy, those words are not very becoming.”

“Oh, how little your Grace knows about compliments, Sir Squire!” the one of the Wood exclaimed. “Are you not aware that when some knight gives a good lance thrust to the bull in the plaza, or when a person does anything remarkably well, it is the custom for the crowd to cry out, ‘Well done, whoreson rascal!’ and that what appears to be vituperation in such a case is in reality high praise? Sir, I would bid you disown those sons or daughters who do nothing to cause such praise to be bestowed upon their parents.”

9. One fanega is about 1.6 bushels, or 56 liters.

"I would indeed disown them if they didn't," replied Sancho, "and so your Grace may go ahead and call me, my children, and my wife all the whores in the world if you like, for everything that they say and do deserves the very highest praise. And in order that I may see them all again, I pray God to deliver me from mortal sin, or, what amounts to the same thing, from this dangerous calling of squire, seeing that I have fallen into it a second time, decoyed and deceived by a purse of a hundred ducats that I found one day in the heart of the Sierra Morena.<sup>1</sup> The devil is always holding up a bag full of doubloons in front of my eyes, here, there—no, not here, but there—everywhere, until it seems to me at every step I take that I am touching it with my hand, hugging it, carrying it off home with me, investing it, drawing an income from it, and living on it like a prince. And while I am thinking such thoughts, all the hardships I have to put up with serving this crackbrained master of mine, who is more of a madman than a knight, seem to me light and easy to bear."

"That," observed the Squire of the Wood, "is why it is they say that avarice bursts the bag. But, speaking of madmen, there is no greater one in all this world than my master; for he is one of those of whom it is said, 'The cares of others kill the ass.' Because another knight has lost his senses, he has to play mad too<sup>2</sup> and go hunting for that which, when he finds it, may fly up in his snout."

"Is he in love, maybe?"

"Yes, with a certain Casildea de Vandalia, the rawest<sup>3</sup> and best-roasted lady to be found anywhere on earth; but her rawness is not the foot he limps on, for he has other and greater schemes rumbling in his bowels, as you will hear tell before many hours have gone by."

"There is no road so smooth," said Sancho, "that it does not have some hole or rut to make you stumble. In other houses they cook horse beans, in mine they boil them by the kettleful.<sup>4</sup> Madness has more companions and attendants than good sense does. But if it is true what they say, that company in trouble brings relief, I may take comfort from your Grace, since you serve a master as foolish as my own."

"Foolish but brave," the one of the Wood corrected him, "and more of a rogue than anything else."

"That is not true of my master," replied Sancho. "I can assure you there is nothing of the rogue about him; he is as open and aboveboard as a wine pitcher and would not harm anyone but does good to all. There is no malice in his makeup, and a child could make him believe it was night at midday. For that very reason I love him with all my heart and cannot bring myself to leave him, no matter how many foolish things he does."

"But, nevertheless, good sir and brother," said the Squire of the Wood, "with the blind leading the blind, both are in danger of falling into the pit. It would be better for us to get out of all this as quickly as we can and return to our old haunts; for those that go seeking adventures do not always find good ones."

Sancho kept clearing his throat from time to time, and his saliva seemed rather viscous and dry; seeing which, the woodland squire said to him, "It looks

1. When Don Quixote retired there in Part I, chapter 23.

2. In the Sierra Morena, Don Quixote had decided to imitate Amadis de Gaula and Ariosto's Roland "by playing the part of a desperate and raving madman" as a consequence of love.

3. The Spanish has a pun on crudo, meaning both "raw" and "cruel."

4. Meaning that his misfortunes always come in large quantities.

to me as if we have been talking so much that our tongues are cleaving to our palates, but I have a loosener over there, hanging from the bow of my saddle, and a pretty good one it is." With this, he got up and went over to his horse and came back a moment later with a big flask of wine and a meat pie half a yard in diameter. This is no exaggeration, for the pasty in question was made of a hutch-rabbit of such a size that Sancho took it to be a goat, or at the very least a kid.

"And are you in the habit of carrying this with you, Señor?" he asked.

"What do you think?" replied the other. "Am I by any chance one of your wool-and-water<sup>5</sup> squires? I carry better rations on the flanks of my horse than a general does when he takes the field."

Sancho ate without any urging, gulping down mouthfuls that were like the knots on a tether, as they sat there in the dark.

"You are a squire of the right sort," he said, "loyal and true, and you live in grand style as shown by this feast, which I would almost say was produced by magic. You are not like me, poor wretch, who have in my saddlebags only a morsel of cheese so hard you could crack a giant's skull with it, three or four dozen carob beans, and a few nuts. For this I have my master to thank, who believes in observing the rule that knights-errant should nourish and sustain themselves on nothing but dried fruits and the herbs of the field."

"Upon my word, brother," said the other squire, "my stomach was not made for thistles, wild pears, and woodland herbs. Let our masters observe those knightly laws and traditions and eat what their rules prescribe; I carry a hamper of food and a flask on my saddlebow, whether they like it or not. And speaking of that flask, how I love it! There is scarcely a minute in the day that I'm not hugging and kissing it, over and over again."

As he said this, he placed the wine bag in Sancho's hands, who put it to his mouth, threw his head back, and sat there gazing up at the stars for a quarter of an hour. Then, when he had finished drinking, he let his head loll on one side and heaved a deep sigh.

"The whoreson rascal!" he exclaimed, "that's a fine vintage for you!"

"There!" cried the Squire of the Wood, as he heard the epithet Sancho had used, "do you see how you have praised this wine by calling it 'whoreson'?"

"I grant you," replied Sancho, "that it is no insult to call anyone a son of a whore so long as you really do mean to praise him. But tell me, sir, in the name of what you love most, is this the wine of Ciudad Real?"<sup>6</sup>

"What a winetaster you are! It comes from nowhere else, and it's a few years old, at that."

"Leave it to me," said Sancho, "and never fear, I'll show you how much I know about it. Would you believe me, Sir Squire, I have such a great natural instinct in this matter of wines that I have but to smell a vintage and I will tell you the country where it was grown, from what kind of grapes, what it tastes like, and how good it is, and everything that has to do with it. There is nothing so unusual about this, however, seeing that on my father's side were two of the best winetasters La Mancha has known in many a year, in proof of which, listen to the story of what happened to them.

5. I.e., lowly or paltry.

6. The main town in La Mancha and the center of a wine-producing region.

"The two were given a sample of wine from a certain vat and asked to state its condition and quality and determine whether it was good or bad. One of them tasted it with the tip of his tongue while the other merely brought it up to his nose. The first man said that it tasted of iron, the second that it smelled of Cordovan leather. The owner insisted that the vat was clean and that there could be nothing in the wine to give it a flavor of leather or of iron, but, nevertheless, the two famous wine-tasters stood their ground. Time went by, and when they came to clean out the vat they found in it a small key attached to a leather strap. And so your Grace may see for yourself whether or not one who comes of that kind of stock has a right to give his opinion in such cases."

"And for that very reason," said the Squire of the Wood, "I maintain that we ought to stop going about in search of adventures. Seeing that we have loaves, let us not go looking for cakes, but return to our cottages, for God will find us there if He so wills."

"I mean to stay with my master," Sancho replied, "until he reaches Saragossa, but after that we will come to an understanding."

The short of the matter is, the two worthy squires talked so much and drank so much that sleep had to tie their tongues and moderate their thirst, since to quench the latter was impossible. Clinging to the wine flask, which was almost empty by now, and with half-chewed morsels of food in their mouths, they both slept peacefully; and we shall leave them there as we go on to relate what took place between the Knight of the Wood and the Knight of the Mournful Countenance.

CHAPTER XIV

Wherein is continued the adventure of the Knight of the Wood.

In the course of the long conversation that took place between Don Quixote and the Knight of the Wood, the history informs us that the latter addressed the following remarks to the Manchegan:

"In short, Sir Knight, I would have you know that my destiny, or, more properly speaking, my own free choice, has led me to fall in love with the peerless Casildea de Vandalia. I call her peerless for the reason that she has no equal as regards either her bodily proportions or her very great beauty. This Casildea, then, of whom I am telling you, repaid my worthy affections and honorable intentions by forcing me, as Hercules<sup>7</sup> was forced by his stepmother, to incur many and diverse perils; and each time as I overcame one of them she would promise me that with the next one I should have that which I desired; but instead my labors have continued, forming a chain whose links I am no longer able to count, nor can I say which will be the last one, that shall mark the beginning of the realization of my hopes.

"One time she sent me forth to challenge that famous giantess of Seville, known as La Giralda,<sup>8</sup> who is as strong and brave as if made of brass, and who without moving from the spot where she stands is the most changeable and fickle woman in the world. I came, I saw, I conquered her. I made her stand still

7. In Greek mythology, the hero son of Zeus and Alcmena; he was persecuted by Zeus's wife, Hera.

8. Actually the bell tower of the cathedral of Seville, originally built as a minaret.

and point in one direction only, and for more than a week nothing but north winds blew. Then, there was that other time when Casildea sent me to lift those ancient stones, the mighty Bulls of Guisando,<sup>9</sup> an enterprise that had better have been entrusted to porters than to knights. On another occasion she commanded me to hurl myself down into the Cabra chasm<sup>1</sup>—an unheard-of and terribly dangerous undertaking—and bring her back a detailed account of what lay concealed in that deep and gloomy pit. I rendered La Giralda motionless, I lifted the Bulls of Guisando, and I threw myself into the abyss and brought to light what was hidden in its depths; yet my hopes are dead—how dead!—while her commands and her scorn are as lively as can be.

“Finally, she commanded me to ride through all the provinces of Spain and compel all the knights-errant whom I met with to confess that she is the most beautiful woman now living and that I am the most enamored man of arms that is to be found anywhere in the world. In fulfillment of this behest I have already traveled over the greater part of these realms and have vanquished many knights who have dared to contradict me. But the one whom I am proudest to have overcome in single combat is that famous gentleman, Don Quixote de la Mancha; for I made him confess that my Casildea is more beautiful than his Dulcinea, and by achieving such a conquest I reckon that I have conquered all the others on the face of the earth, seeing that this same Don Quixote had himself routed them. Accordingly, when I vanquished him, his fame, glory, and honor passed over and were transferred to my person.

*The brighter is the conquered one's lost crown,
The greater is the conqueror's renown.<sup>2</sup>*

Thus, the innumerable exploits of the said Don Quixote are now set down to my account and are indeed my own.”

Don Quixote was astounded as he listened to the Knight of the Wood, and was about to tell him any number of times that he lied; the words were on the tip of his tongue, but he held them back as best he could, thinking that he would bring the other to confess with his own lips that what he had said was a lie. And so it was quite calmly that he now replied to him.

“Sir Knight,” he began, “as to the assertion that your Grace has conquered most of the knights-errant in Spain and even in all the world, I have nothing to say, but that you have vanquished Don Quixote de la Mancha, I am inclined to doubt. It may be that it was someone else who resembled him, although there are very few that do.”

“What do you mean?” replied the one of the Wood. “I swear by the heavens above that I did fight with Don Quixote and that I overcame him and forced him to yield. He is a tall man, with a dried-up face, long, lean legs, graying hair, an eagle-like nose somewhat hooked, and a big, black, drooping mustache. He takes the field under the name of the Knight of the Mournful Countenance, he has for squire a peasant named Sancho Panza, and he rides a famous steed called Rocinante. Lastly, the lady of his heart is a certain Dulcinea del Toboso, once upon a time known as Aldonza Lorenzo, just as my own lady, whose name

9. Statues representing animals and supposedly marking a place where Caesar defeated Pompey.

1. Possibly an ancient mine in the Sierra de

Cabra near Cordova.

2. From Alonso de Ercilla y Zúñiga's Araucana, a poem about the Spanish struggle against the Araucanian Indians of Chile.

is Casildea and who is an Andalusian by birth, is called by me Casildea de Vandalia. If all this is not sufficient to show that I speak the truth, here is my sword which shall make incredulity itself believe."

"Calm yourself, Sir Knight," replied Don Quixote, "and listen to what I have to say to you. You must know that this Don Quixote of whom you speak is the best friend that I have in the world, so great a friend that I may say that I feel toward him as I do toward my own self; and from all that you have told me, the very definite and accurate details that you have given me, I cannot doubt that he is the one whom you have conquered. On the other hand, the sight of my eyes and the touch of my hands assure me that he could not possibly be the one, unless some enchanter who is his enemy—for he has many, and one in particular who delights in persecuting him—may have assumed the knight's form and then permitted himself to be routed, by way of defrauding Don Quixote of the fame which his high deeds of chivalry have earned for him throughout the known world. To show you how true this may be, I will inform you that not more than a couple of days ago those same enemy magicians transformed the figure and person of the beauteous Dulcinea del Toboso into a low and mean village lass, and it is possible that they have done something of the same sort to the knight who is her lover. And if all this does not suffice to convince you of the truth of what I say, here is Don Quixote himself who will maintain it by force of arms, on foot or on horseback, or in any way you like."

Saying this, he rose and laid hold of his sword, and waited to see what the Knight of the Wood's decision would be. That worthy now replied in a voice as calm as the one Don Quixote had used.

"Pledges," he said, "do not distress one who is sure of his ability to pay. He who was able to overcome you when you were transformed, Señor Don Quixote, may hope to bring you to your knees when you are your own proper self. But inasmuch as it is not fitting that knights should perform their feats of arms in the darkness, like ruffians and highway-men, let us wait until it is day in order that the sun may behold what we do. And the condition governing our encounter shall be that the one who is vanquished must submit to the will of his conqueror and perform all those things that are commanded of him, provided they are such as are in keeping with the state of knighthood."

"With that condition and understanding," said Don Quixote, "I shall be satisfied."

With this, they went off to where their squires were, only to find them snoring away as hard as when sleep had first overtaken them. Awakening the pair, they ordered them to look to the horses; for as soon as the sun was up the two knights meant to stage an arduous and bloody single-handed combat. At this news Sancho was astonished and terrified, since, as a result of what the other squire had told him of the Knight of the Wood's prowess, he was led to fear for his master's safety. Nevertheless, he and his friend now went to seek the mounts without saying a word, and they found the animals all together, for by this time the two horses and the ass had smelled one another out. On the way the Squire of the Wood turned to Sancho and addressed him as follows:

"I must inform you, brother, that it is the custom of the fighters of Andalusia, when they are godfathers in any combat, not to remain idly by, with folded hands, while their godsons fight it out. I tell you this by way of warning you that while our masters are settling matters, we, too, shall have to come to blows and hack each other to bits.”

“That custom, Sir Squire,” replied Sancho, “may be all very well among the fighters and ruffians that you mention, but with the squires of knights-errant it is not to be thought of. At least, I have never heard my master speak of any such custom, and he knows all the laws of chivalry by heart. But granting that it is true and that there is a law which states in so many words that squires must fight while their masters do, I have no intention of obeying it but rather will pay whatever penalty is laid on peaceable-minded ones like myself, for I am sure it cannot be more than a couple of pounds of wax,<sup>3</sup> and that would be less expensive than the lint which it would take to heal my head—I can already see it split in two. What’s more, it’s out of the question for me to fight since I have no sword nor did I ever in my life carry one.”

“That,” said the one of the Wood, “is something that is easily remedied. I have here two linen bags of the same size. You take one and I’ll take the other and we will fight that way, on equal terms.”

“So be it, by all means,” said Sancho, “for that will simply knock the dust out of us without wounding us.”

“But that’s not the way it’s to be,” said the other squire. “Inside the bags, to keep the wind from blowing them away, we will put a half-dozen nice smooth pebbles of the same weight, and so we’ll be able to give each other a good pounding without doing ourselves any real harm or damage.”

“Body of my father!” cried Sancho, “just look, will you, at the marten and sable and wads of carded cotton that he’s stuffing into those bags so that we won’t get our heads cracked or our bones crushed to a pulp. But I am telling you, Señor mio, that even though you fill them with silken pellets, I don’t mean to fight. Let our masters fight and make the best of it, but as for us, let us drink and live; for time will see to ending our lives without any help on our part by way of bringing them to a close before they have reached their proper season and fall from ripeness.”

“Nevertheless,” replied the Squire of the Wood, “fight we must, if only for half an hour.”

“No,” Sancho insisted, “that I will not do. I will not be so impolite or so ungrateful as to pick any quarrel however slight with one whose food and drink I’ve shared. And, moreover, who in the devil could bring himself to fight in cold blood, when he’s not angry or vexed in any way?”

“I can take care of that, right enough,” said the one of the Wood. “Before we begin, I will come up to your Grace as nicely as you please and give you three or four punches that will stretch you out at my feet; and that will surely be enough to awaken your anger, even though it’s sleeping sounder than a dormouse.”

“And I,” said Sancho, “have another idea that’s every bit as good as yours. I will take a big club, and before your Grace has had a chance to awaken my anger I will put yours to sleep with such mighty whacks that if it wakes at all it will be in the other world; for it is known there that I am not the man to let my face be mussed by anyone, and let each look out for the arrow.<sup>4</sup> But the best thing to do

3. In some confraternities, penalties for being absent were paid in wax, presumably to make church candles.

4. A proverbial expression from archery: let each one take care of his or her own arrow. Other obviously proverbial expressions follow, as is typical of Sancho’s speech.

would be to leave each one's anger to its slumbers, for no one knows the heart of any other, he who comes for wool may go back shorn, and God bless peace and curse all strife. If a hunted cat when surrounded and cornered turns into a lion, God knows what I who am a man might not become. And so from this time forth I am warning you, Sir Squire, that all the harm and damage that may result from our quarrel will be upon your head."

"Very well," the one of the Wood replied, "God will send the dawn and we shall make out somehow."

At that moment gay-colored birds of all sorts began warbling in the trees and with their merry and varied songs appeared to be greeting and welcoming the fresh-dawning day, which already at the gates and on the balconies of the east was revealing its beautiful face as it shook out from its hair an infinite number of liquid pearls. Bathed in this gentle moisture, the grass seemed to shed a pearly spray, the willows distilled a savory manna, the fountains laughed, the brooks murmured, the woods were glad, and the meadows put on their finest raiment. The first thing that Sancho Panza beheld, as soon as it was light enough to tell one object from another, was the Squire of the Wood's nose, which was so big as to cast into the shade all the rest of his body. In addition to being of enormous size, it is said to have been hooked in the middle and all covered with warts of a mulberry hue, like eggplant; it hung down for a couple of inches below his mouth, and the size, color, warts, and shape of this organ gave his face so ugly an appearance that Sancho began trembling hand and foot like a child with convulsions and made up his mind then and there that he would take a couple of hundred punches before he would let his anger be awakened to the point where he would fight with this monster.

Don Quixote in the meanwhile was surveying his opponent, who had already adjusted and closed his helmet so that it was impossible to make out what he looked like. It was apparent, however, that he was not very tall and was stockily built. Over his armor he wore a coat of some kind or other made of what appeared to be the finest cloth of gold, all bespangled with glittering mirrors that resembled little moons and that gave him a most gallant and festive air, while above his helmet were a large number of waving plumes, green, white, and yellow in color. His lance, which was leaning against a tree, was very long and stout and had a steel point of more than a palm in length. Don Quixote took all this in, and from what he observed concluded that his opponent must be of tremendous strength, but he was not for this reason filled with fear as Sancho Panza was. Rather, he proceeded to address the Knight of the Mirrors, quite boldly and in a highbred manner.

"Sir Knight," he said, "if in your eagerness to fight you have not lost your courtesy, I would beg you to be so good as to raise your visor a little in order that I may see if your face is as handsome as your trappings."

"Whether you come out of this emprise the victor or the vanquished, Sir Knight," he of the Mirrors replied, "there will be ample time and opportunity for you to have a sight of me. If I do not now gratify your desire, it is because it seems to me that I should be doing a very great wrong to the beauteous Casildea de Vandalia by wasting the time it would take me to raise my visor before having forced you to confess that I am right in my contention, with which you are well acquainted."

"Well, then," said Don Quixote, "while we are mounting our steeds you might at least inform me if I am that knight of La Mancha whom you say you conquered."

"To that our<sup>5</sup> answer," said he of the Mirrors, "is that you are as like the knight I overcame as one egg is like another; but since you assert that you are persecuted by enchanters, I should not venture to state positively that you are the one in question."

"All of which," said Don Quixote, "is sufficient to convince me that you are laboring under a misapprehension; but in order to relieve you of it once and for all, let them bring our steeds, and in less time than you would spend in lifting your visor, if God, my lady, and my arm give me strength, I will see your face and you shall see that I am not the vanquished knight you take me to be."

With this, they cut short their conversation and mounted, and, turning Rocinante around, Don Quixote began measuring off the proper length of field for a run against his opponent as he of the Mirrors did the same. But the Knight of La Mancha had not gone twenty paces when he heard his adversary calling to him, whereupon each of them turned halfway and he of the Mirrors spoke.

"I must remind you, Sir Knight," he said, "of the condition under which we fight, which is that the vanquished, as I have said before, shall place himself wholly at the disposition of the victor."

"I am aware of that," replied Don Quixote, "not forgetting the provision that the behest laid upon the vanquished shall not exceed the bounds of chivalry."

"Agreed," said the Knight of the Mirrors.

At that moment Don Quixote caught sight of the other squire's weird nose and was as greatly astonished by it as Sancho had been. Indeed, he took the fellow for some monster, or some new kind of human being wholly unlike those that people this world. As he saw his master riding away down the field preparatory to the tilt, Sancho was alarmed; for he did not like to be left alone with the big-nosed individual, fearing that one powerful swipe of that protuberance against his own nose would end the battle so far as he was concerned and he would be lying stretched out on the ground, from fear if not from the force of the blow.

He accordingly ran after the knight, clinging to one of Rocinante's stirrup straps, and when he thought it was time for Don Quixote to whirl about and bear down upon his opponent, he called to him and said, "Señor mio, I beg your Grace, before you turn for the charge, to help me up into that cork tree yonder where I can watch the encounter which your Grace is going to have with this knight better than I can from the ground and in a way that is much more to my liking."

"I rather think, Sancho," said Don Quixote, "that what you wish to do is to mount a platform where you can see the bulls without any danger to yourself."

"The truth of the matter is," Sancho admitted, "the monstrous nose on that squire has given me such a fright that I don't dare stay near him."

"It is indeed of such a sort," his master assured him, "that if I were not the person I am, I myself should be frightened. And so, come, I will help you up."

While Don Quixote tarried to see Sancho ensconced in the cork tree, the Knight of the Mirrors measured as much ground as seemed to him necessary and then, assuming that his adversary had done the same, without waiting for sound of trumpet or any other signal, he wheeled his horse, which was no swifter nor any more impressive-looking than Rocinante, and bore down upon his enemy at a mild trot; but when he saw that the Manchegan was busy helping his squire, he reined in his mount and came to a stop midway in his course, for which his horse was extremely grateful, being no longer able to stir a single step. To Don Quixote, on the other hand, it seemed as if his enemy was flying, and digging his spurs with all his might into Rocinante's lean flanks he caused that animal to run a bit for the first and only time, according to the history, for on all other occasions a simple trot had represented his utmost speed. And so it was that, with an unheard-of fury, the Knight of the Mournful Countenance came down upon the Knight of the Mirrors as the latter sat there sinking his spurs all the way up to the buttons without being able to persuade his horse to budge a single inch from the spot where he had come to a sudden standstill.

5. Note the dignified, "majestic" plural form.

It was at this fortunate moment, while his adversary was in such a predicament, that Don Quixote fell upon him, quite unmindful of the fact that the other knight was having trouble with his mount and either was unable or did not have time to put his lance at rest. The upshot of it was, he encountered him with such force that, much against his will, the Knight of the Mirrors went rolling over his horse's flanks and tumbled to the ground, where as a result of his terrific fall he lay as if dead, without moving hand or foot.

No sooner did Sancho perceive what had happened than he slipped down from the cork tree and ran up as fast as he could to where his master was. Dismounting from Rocinante, Don Quixote now stood over the Knight of the Mirrors, and undoing the helmet straps to see if the man was dead, or to give him air in case he was alive, he beheld—who can say what he beheld without creating astonishment, wonder, and amazement in those who hear the tale? The history tells us that it was the very countenance, form, aspect, physiognomy, effigy, and image of the bachelor Sansón Carrasco!

"Come, Sancho," he cried in a loud voice, "and see what is to be seen but is not to be believed. Hasten, my son, and learn what magic can do and how great is the power of wizards and enchanters."

Sancho came, and the moment his eyes fell on the bachelor Carrasco's face he began crossing and blessing himself a countless number of times. Meanwhile, the overthrown knight gave no signs of life.

"If you ask me, master," said Sancho, "I would say that the best thing for your Grace to do is to run his sword down the mouth of this one who appears to be the bachelor Carrasco; maybe by so doing you would be killing one of your enemies, the enchanters."

"That is not a bad idea," replied Don Quixote, "for the fewer enemies the better." And, drawing his sword, he was about to act upon Sancho's advice and counsel when the Knight of the Mirrors' squire came up to them, now minus the nose which had made him so ugly.

"Look well what you are doing, Don Quixote!" he cried. "The one who lies there at your feet is your Grace's friend, the bachelor Sansón Carrasco, and I am his squire."

"And where is your nose?" inquired Sancho, who was surprised to see him without that deformity.

"Here in my pocket," was the reply. And, thrusting his hand into his coat, he drew out a nose of varnished pasteboard of the make that has been described. Studying him more and more closely, Sancho finally exclaimed, in a voice that was filled with amazement, “Holy Mary preserve me! And is this not my neighbor and crony, Tomé Cecial?”

“That is who I am!” replied the de-nosed squire, “your good friend Tomé Cecial, Sancho Panza. I will tell you presently of the means and snares and falsehoods that brought me here. But, for the present, I beg and entreat your master not to lay hands on, mistreat, wound, or slay the Knight of the Mirrors whom he now has at his feet; for without any doubt it is the rash and ill-advised bachelor Sansón Carrasco, our fellow villager.”

The Knight of the Mirrors now recovered consciousness, and, seeing this, Don Quixote at once placed the naked point of his sword above the face of the vanquished one.

“Dead you are, knight,” he said, “unless you confess that the peerless Dulcinea del Toboso is more beautiful than your Casildea de Vandalia. And what is more, you will have to promise that, should you survive this encounter and the fall you have had, you will go to the city of El Toboso and present yourself to her in my behalf, that she may do with you as she may see fit. And in case she leaves you free to follow your own will, you are to return to seek me out—the trail of my exploits will serve as a guide to bring you wherever I may be—and tell me all that has taken place between you and her. These conditions are in conformity with those that we arranged before our combat and they do not go beyond the bounds of knight-errantry.”

“I confess,” said the fallen knight, “that the tattered and filthy shoe of the lady Dulcinea del Toboso is of greater worth than the badly combed if clean beard of Casildea, and I promise to go to her presence and return to yours and to give you a complete and detailed account concerning anything you may wish to know.”

“Another thing,” added Don Quixote, “that you will have to confess and believe is that the knight you conquered was not and could not have been Don Quixote de la Mancha, but was some other that resembled him, just as I am convinced that you, though you appear to be the bachelor Sansón Carrasco, are another person in his form and likeness who has been put here by my enemies to induce me to restrain and moderate the impetuosity of my wrath and make a gentle use of my glorious victory.”

“I confess, think, and feel as you feel, think, and believe,” replied the lamed knight. “Permit me to rise, I beg of you, if the jolt I received in my fall will let me do so, for I am in very bad shape.”

Don Quixote and Tomé Cecial the squire now helped him to his feet. As for Sancho, he could not take his eyes off Tomé but kept asking him one question after another, and although the answers he received afforded clear enough proof that the man was really his fellow townsman, the fear that had been aroused in him by his master’s words—about the enchanters’ having transformed the Knight of the Mirrors into the bachelor Sansón Carrasco—prevented him from believing the truth that was apparent to his eyes. The short of it is, both master and servant were left with this delusion as the other ill-errant knight and his squire, in no pleasant state of mind, took their departure with the object of looking for some village where they might be able to apply poultices and splints to the bachelor’s battered ribs.

Don Quixote and Sancho then resumed their journey along the road to Saragossa, and here for the time being the history leaves them in order to give an account of who the Knight of the Mirrors and his long-nosed squire really were.

CHAPTER XV

Wherein is told and revealed who the Knight of the Mirrors and his squire were.

Don Quixote went off very happy, self-satisfied, and vainglorious at having achieved a victory over so valiant a knight as he imagined the one of the Mirrors to be, from whose knightly word he hoped to learn whether or not the spell which had been put upon his lady was still in effect; for, unless he chose to forfeit his honor, the vanquished contender must of necessity return and give an account of what had happened in the course of his interview with her. But Don Quixote was of one mind, the Knight of the Mirrors of another, for, as has been stated, the latter's only thought at the moment was to find some village where plasters were available.

The history goes on to state that when the bachelor Sansón Carrasco advised Don Quixote to resume his feats of chivalry, after having desisted from them for a while, this action was taken as the result of a conference which he had held with the curate and the barber as to the means to be adopted in persuading the knight to remain quietly at home and cease agitating himself over his unfortunate adventures. It had been Carrasco's suggestion, to which they had unanimously agreed, that they let Don Quixote sally forth, since it appeared to be impossible to prevent his doing so, and that Sansón should then take to the road as a knight-errant and pick a quarrel and do battle with him. There would be no difficulty about finding a pretext, and then the bachelor knight would overcome him (which was looked upon as easy of accomplishment), having first entered into a pact to the effect that the vanquished should remain at the mercy and bidding of his conqueror. The behest in this case was to be that the fallen one should return to his village and home and not leave it for the space of two years or until further orders were given him, it being a certainty that, once having been overcome, Don Quixote would fulfill the agreement, in order not to contravene or fail to obey the laws of chivalry. And it was possible that in the course of his seclusion he would forget his fancies, or they would at least have an opportunity to seek some suitable cure for his madness.

Sansón agreed to undertake this, and Tomé Cecial, Sancho's friend and neighbor, a merry but featherbrained chap, offered to go along as squire. Sansón then proceeded to arm himself in the manner that has been described, while Tomé disguised his nose with the aforementioned mask so that his crony would not recognize him when they met. Thus equipped, they followed the same route as Don Quixote and had almost caught up with him by the time he had the adventure with the Cart of Death. They finally overtook him in the wood, where those events occurred with which the attentive reader is already familiar; and if it had not been for the knight's extraordinary fancies, which led him to believe that the bachelor was not the bachelor, the said bachelor might have been prevented from ever attaining his degree of licentiate, as a result of having found no nests where he thought to find birds.

Seeing how ill they had succeeded in their undertaking and what an end they had reached, Tomé Cecial now addressed his master.

"Surely, Señor Sansón Carrasco," he said, "we have had our deserts. It is easy enough to plan and embark upon an enterprise, but most of the time it's hard to get out of it. Don Quixote is a madman and we are sane, yet he goes away sound and laughing while your Grace is left here, battered and sorrowful. I wish you would tell me now who is the crazier: the one who is so because he cannot help it, or he who turns crazy of his own free will?"

"The difference between the two," replied Sansón, "lies in this: that the one who cannot help being crazy will be so always, whereas the one who is a madman by choice can leave off being one whenever he so desires."

"Well," said Tomé Cecial, "since that is the way it is, and since I chose to be crazy when I became your Grace's squire, by the same reasoning I now choose to stop being insane and to return to my home."

"That is your affair," said Sansón, "but to imagine that I am going back before I have given Don Quixote a good thrashing is senseless; and what will urge me on now is not any desire to see him recover his wits, but rather a thirst for vengeance; for with the terrible pain that I have in my ribs, you can't expect me to feel very charitable."

Conversing in this manner they kept on until they reached a village where it was their luck to find a bonesetter to take care of poor Sansón. Tomé Cecial then left him and returned home, while the bachelor meditated plans for revenge. The history has more to say of him in due time, but for the present it goes on to make merry with Don Quixote.

CHAPTER XVI

Of what happened to Don Quixote upon his meeting with a prudent gentleman of La Mancha.

With that feeling of happiness and vainglorious self-satisfaction that has been mentioned, Don Quixote continued on his way, imagining himself to be, as a result of the victory he had just achieved, the most valiant knight-errant of the age. Whatever adventures might befall him from then on he regarded as already accomplished and brought to a fortunate conclusion. He thought little now of enchanters and enchantments and was unmindful of the innumerable beatings he had received in the course of his knightly wanderings, of the volley of pebbles that had knocked out half his teeth, of the ungratefulness of the galley slaves and the audacity of the Yanguesans whose poles had fallen upon his body like rain. In short, he told himself, if he could but find the means, manner, or way of freeing his lady Dulcinea of the spell that had been put upon her, he would not envy the greatest good fortune that the most fortunate of knights-errant in ages past had ever by any possibility attained.

He was still wholly wrapped up in these thoughts when Sancho spoke to him.

"Isn't it strange, sir, that I can still see in front of my eyes the huge and monstrous nose of my old crony, Tomé Cecial?"

"And do you by any chance believe, Sancho, that the Knight of the Mirrors was the bachelor Sansón Carrasco and that his squire was your friend Tomé?"

"I don't know what to say to that," replied Sancho. "All I know is that the things he told me about my home, my wife and young ones, could not have come from anybody else; and the face, too, once you took the nose away, was the same as Tomé Cecial's, which I have seen many times in our village, right next door to my own house, and the tone of voice was the same also."

"Let us reason the matter out, Sancho," said Don Quixote. "Look at it this way: how can it be thought that the bachelor Sansón Carrasco would come as a knight-errant, equipped with offensive and defensive armor, to contend with me? Am I, perchance, his enemy? Have I given him any occasion to cherish a grudge against me? Am I a rival of his? Or can it be jealousy of the fame I have acquired that has led him to take up the profession of arms?"

"Well, then, sir," Sancho answered him, "how are we to explain the fact that the knight was so like the bachelor and his squire like my friend? And if this was a magic spell, as your Grace has said, was there no other pair in the world whose likeness they might have taken?"

"It is all a scheme and a plot," replied Don Quixote, "on the part of those wicked magicians who are persecuting me and who, foreseeing that I would be the victor in the combat, saw to it that the conquered knight should display the face of my friend the bachelor, so that the affection which I bear him would come between my fallen enemy and the edge of my sword and might of my arm, to temper the righteous indignation of my heart. In that way, he who had sought by falsehood and deceits to take my life, would be left to go on living. As proof of all this, Sancho, experience, which neither lies nor deceives, has already taught you how easy it is for enchanters to change one countenance into another, making the beautiful ugly and the ugly beautiful. It was not two days ago that you beheld the peerless Dulcinea's beauty and elegance in its entirety and natural form, while I saw only the repulsive features of a low and ignorant peasant girl with cataracts over her eyes and a foul smell in her mouth. And if the perverse enchanter was bold enough to effect so vile a transformation as this, there is certainly no cause for wonderment at what he has done in the case of Sansón Carrasco and your friend, all by way of snatching my glorious victory out of my hands. But in spite of it all, I find consolation in the fact that, whatever the shape he may have chosen to assume, I have laid my enemy low."

"God knows what the truth of it all may be," was Sancho's comment. Knowing as he did that Dulcinea's transformation had been due to his own scheming and plotting, he was not taken in by his master's delusions. He was at a loss for a reply, however, lest he say something that would reveal his own trickery.

As they were carrying on this conversation, they were overtaken by a man who, following the same road, was coming along behind them. He was mounted on a handsome flea-bitten mare and wore a hooded great-coat of fine green cloth trimmed in tawny velvet and a cap of the same material, while the trappings of his steed, which was accoutered for the field, were green and mulberry in hue, his saddle being of the jineta<sup>6</sup> mode. From his broad green and gold shoulder strap there dangled a Moorish cutlass, and his half-boots were of the same make as the baldric. His spurs were not gilded but were covered with highly polished green lacquer, so that, harmonizing as they did with the rest of his apparel, they seemed more appropriate than if they had been of purest gold. As he came up, he greeted the pair courteously and, spurring his mare, was about to ride on past when Don Quixote called to him.

"Gallant sir," he said, "if your Grace is going our way and is not in a hurry, it would be a favor to us if we might travel together."

6. I.e., it has a high pommel and short stirrups.

"The truth is," replied the stranger, "I should not have ridden past you if I had not been afraid that the company of my mare would excite your horse."

"In that case, sir," Sancho spoke up, "you may as well rein in, for this horse of ours is the most virtuous and well mannered of any that there is. Never on such an occasion has he done anything that was not right—the only time he did misbehave, my master and I suffered for it aplenty. And so, I say again, your Grace may slow up if you like; for even if you offered him your mare on a couple of platters, he'd never try to mount her."

With this, the other traveler drew rein, being greatly astonished at Don Quixote's face and figure. For the knight was now riding along without his helmet, which was carried by Sancho like a piece of luggage on the back of his gray, in front of the packsaddle. If the green-clad gentleman stared hard at his new-found companion, the latter returned his gaze with an even greater intensity. He impressed Don Quixote as being a man of good judgment, around fifty years of age, with hair that was slightly graying and an aquiline nose, while the expression of his countenance was half humorous, half serious. In short, both his person and his accouterments indicated that he was an individual of some worth.

As for the man in green's impression of Don Quixote de la Mancha, he was thinking that he had never before seen any human being that resembled this one. He could not but marvel at the knight's long neck, his tall frame, and the leanness and the sallowness of his face, as well as his armor and his grave bearing, the whole constituting a sight such as had not been seen for many a day in those parts. Don Quixote in turn was quite conscious of the attentiveness with which the traveler was studying him and could tell from the man's astonished look how curious he was; and so, being very courteous and fond of pleasing everyone, he proceeded to anticipate any questions that might be asked him.

"I am aware," he said, "that my appearance must strike your Grace as being very strange and out of the ordinary, and for that reason I am not surprised at your wonderment. But your Grace will cease to wonder when I tell you, as I am telling you now, that I am a knight, one of those

*Of whom it is folks say,
They to adventures go.<sup>7</sup>*

I have left my native heath, mortgaged my estate, given up my comfortable life, and cast myself into fortune's arms for her to do with me what she will. It has been my desire to revive a knight-errantry that is now dead, and for some time past, stumbling here and falling there, now throwing myself down headlong and then rising up once more, I have been able in good part to carry out my design by succoring widows, protecting damsels, and aiding the fallen, the orphans, and the young, all of which is the proper and natural duty of knights-errant. As a result, owing to my many valiant and Christian exploits, I have been deemed worthy of visiting in printed form nearly all the nations of the world. Thirty thousand copies of my history have been published, and, unless Heaven forbid, they will print thirty million of them.

"In short, to put it all into a few words, or even one, I will tell you that I am Don Quixote de la Mancha, otherwise known as the Knight of the Mournful Countenance. Granted that self-praise is degrading, there still are times when I must praise myself, that is to say, when there is no one else present to speak in my behalf. And so, good sir, neither this steed nor this lance nor this buckler nor this squire of mine, nor all the armor that I wear and arms I carry, nor the sallowness of my complexion, nor my leanness and gauntness, should any longer astonish you, now that you know who I am and what the profession is that I follow.”

7. These two verses, which recall medieval popular romance ballads, appear in a Spanish translation of Petrarch's allegorical poem, the Triumphs, although they are not in the original.

Having thus spoken, Don Quixote fell silent, and the man in green was so slow in replying that it seemed as if he was at a loss for words. Finally, however, after a considerable while, he brought himself to the point of speaking.

“You were correct, Sir Knight,” he said, “about my astonishment and my curiosity, but you have not succeeded in removing the wonderment that the sight of you has aroused in me. You say that, knowing who you are, I should not wonder any more, but such is not the case, for I am now more amazed than ever. How can it be that there are knights-errant in the world today and that histories of them are actually printed? I find it hard to convince myself that at the present time there is anyone on earth who goes about aiding widows, protecting damsels, defending the honor of wives, and succoring orphans, and I should never have believed it had I not beheld your Grace with my own eyes. Thank Heaven for that book that your Grace tells me has been published concerning your true and exalted deeds of chivalry, as it should cast into oblivion all the innumerable stories of fictitious knights-errant with which the world is filled, greatly to the detriment of good morals and the prejudice and discredit of legitimate histories.”

“As to whether the stories of knights-errant are fictitious or not,” observed Don Quixote, “there is much that remains to be said.”

“Why,” replied the gentleman in green, “is there anyone who can doubt that such tales are false?”

“I doubt it,” was the knight’s answer, “but let the matter rest there. If our journey lasts long enough, I trust with God’s help to be able to show your Grace that you are wrong in going along with those who hold it to be a certainty that they are not true.”

From this last remark the traveler was led to suspect that Don Quixote must be some kind of crackbrain, and he was waiting for him to confirm the impression by further observations of the same sort; but before they could get off on another subject, the knight, seeing that he had given an account of his own station in life, turned to the stranger and politely inquired who his companion might be.

“I, Sir Knight of the Mournful Countenance,” replied the one in the green-colored greatcoat, “am a gentleman, and a native of the village where, please God, we are going to dine today. I am more than moderately rich, and my name is Don Diego de Miranda. I spend my life with my wife and children and with my friends. My occupations are hunting and fishing, though I keep neither falcon nor hounds but only a tame partridge<sup>8</sup> and a bold ferret or two. I am the owner of about six dozen books, some of them in Spanish, others in Latin, including both histories and devotional works. As for books of chivalry, they have not as yet crossed the threshold of my door. My own preference is for profane<sup>9</sup> rather than devotional writings, such as afford an innocent amusement, charming us by their style and arousing and holding our interest by their inventiveness, although I must say there are very few of that sort to be found in Spain.

8. Used as a decoy.

9. I.e., secular, nonreligious.

"Sometimes," the man in green continued, "I dine with my friends and neighbors, and I often invite them to my house. My meals are wholesome and well prepared and there is always plenty to eat. I do not care for gossip, nor will I permit it in my presence. I am not lynx-eyed and do not pry into the lives and doings of others. I hear mass every day and share my substance with the poor, but make no parade of my good works lest hypocrisy and vainglory, those enemies that so imperceptibly take possession of the most modest heart, should find their way into mine. I try to make peace between those who are at strife. I am the devoted servant of Our Lady,<sup>1</sup> and my trust is in the infinite mercy of God Our Savior."

Sancho had listened most attentively to the gentleman's account of his mode of life, and inasmuch as it seemed to him that this was a good and holy way to live and that the one who followed such a pattern ought to be able to work miracles, he now jumped down from his gray's back and, running over to seize the stranger's right stirrup, began kissing the feet of the man in green with a show of devotion that bordered on tears.

"Why are you doing that, brother?" the gentleman asked him. "What is the meaning of these kisses?"

"Let me kiss your feet," Sancho insisted, "for if I am not mistaken, your Grace is the first saint riding jineta fashion that I have seen in all the days of my life."

"I am not a saint," the gentleman assured him, "but a great sinner. It is you, brother, who are the saint; for you must be a good man, judging by the simplicity of heart that you show."

Sancho then went back to his packsaddle, having evoked a laugh from the depths of his master's melancholy and given Don Diego fresh cause for astonishment.

Don Quixote thereupon inquired of the newcomer how many children he had, remarking as he did so that the ancient philosophers, who were without a true knowledge of God, believed that mankind's greatest good lay in the gifts of nature, in those of fortune, and in having many friends and many and worthy sons.

"I, Señor Don Quixote," replied the gentleman, "have a son without whom I should, perhaps, be happier than I am. It is not that he is bad, but rather that he is not as good as I should like him to be. He is eighteen years old, and for six of those years he has been at Salamanca studying the Greek and Latin languages. When I desired him to pass on to other branches of learning, I found him so immersed in the science of Poetry (if it can be called such) that it was not possible to interest him in the Law, which I wanted him to study, nor in Theology, the queen of them all. My wish was that he might be an honor to his family; for in this age in which we are living our monarchs are in the habit of highly rewarding those forms of learning that are good and virtuous, since learning without virtue is like pearls on a dunghill. But he spends the whole day trying to decide whether such and such a verse of Homer's Iliad is well conceived or not, whether or not Martial is immodest in a certain epigram, whether certain lines of Vergil are to be understood in this way or in that. In short, he spends all his time with the books written by those poets whom I have mentioned and with those of Horace, Persius, Juvenal, and Tibullus. As for our own moderns, he sets little store by them, and yet, for all his disdain of Spanish poetry, he is at this moment racking his brains in an effort to compose a gloss on a quatrain that was sent him from Salamanca and which, I fancy, is for some literary tournament.”

1. The Virgin Mary, mother of Jesus.

To all this Don Quixote made the following answer:

“Children, sir, are out of their parents’ bowels and so are to be loved whether they be good or bad, just as we love those that gave us life. It is for parents to bring up their offspring, from the time they are infants, in the paths of virtue, good breeding, proper conduct, and Christian morality, in order that, when they are grown, they may be a staff to the old age of the ones that bore them and an honor to their own posterity. As to compelling them to study a particular branch of learning, I am not so sure as to that, though there may be no harm in trying to persuade them to do so. But where there is no need to study pane lucrando<sup>2</sup>—where Heaven has provided them with parents that can supply their daily bread—I should be in favor of permitting them to follow that course to which they are most inclined; and although poetry may be more pleasurable than useful, it is not one of those pursuits that bring dishonor upon those who engage in them.

“Poetry in my opinion, my dear sir,” he went on, “is a young and tender maid of surpassing beauty, who has many other damsels (that is to say, the other disciplines) whose duty it is to bedeck, embellish, and adorn her. She may call upon all of them for service, and all of them in turn depend upon her nod. She is not one to be rudely handled, nor dragged through the streets, nor exposed at street corners, in the market place, or in the private nooks of palaces. She is fashioned through an alchemy of such power that he who knows how to make use of it will be able to convert her into the purest gold of inestimable price. Possessing her, he must keep her within bounds and not permit her to run wild in bawdy satires or soulless sonnets. She is not to be put up for sale in any manner, unless it be in the form of heroic poems, pity-inspiring tragedies, or pleasing and ingenious comedies. Let mountebanks keep hands off her, and the ignorant mob as well, which is incapable of recognizing or appreciating the treasures that are locked within her. And do not think, sir, that I apply that term ‘mob’ solely to plebeians and those of low estate; for anyone who is ignorant, whether he be lord or prince, may, and should, be included in the vulgar herd.

“But,” Don Quixote continued, “he who possesses the gift of poetry and who makes the use of it that I have indicated, shall become famous and his name shall be honored among all the civilized nations of the world. You have stated, sir, that your son does not greatly care for poetry written in our Spanish tongue, and in that I am inclined to think he is somewhat mistaken. My reason for saying so is this: the great Homer did not write in Latin, for the reason that he was a Greek, and Vergil did not write in Greek since he was a Latin. In a word, all the poets of antiquity wrote in the language which they had imbibed with their mother’s milk and did not go searching after foreign ones to express their loftiest conceptions. This being so, it would be well if the same custom were to be adopted by all nations, the German poet being no longer looked down upon because he writes in German, nor the Castilian or the Basque for employing his native speech.

2. Earning one’s bread (Latin).

“As for your son, I fancy, sir, that his quarrel is not so much with Spanish poetry as with those poets who have no other tongue or discipline at their command such as would help to awaken their natural gift; and yet, here, too, he may be wrong. There is an opinion, and a true one, to the effect that ‘the poet is born,’ that is to say, it is as a poet that he comes forth from his mother’s womb, and with the propensity that has been bestowed upon him by Heaven, without study or artifice, he produces those compositions that attest the truth of the line: ‘Est deus in nobis,’ etc.<sup>3</sup> I further maintain that the born poet who is aided by art will have a great advantage over the one who by art alone would become a poet, the reason being that art does not go beyond, but merely perfects, nature; and so it is that, by combining nature with art and art with nature, the finished poet is produced.

“In conclusion, then, my dear sir, my advice to you would be to let your son go where his star beckons him; for being a good student as he must be, and having already successfully mounted the first step on the stairway of learning, which is that of languages, he will be able to continue of his own accord to the very peak of humane letters, an accomplishment that is altogether becoming in a gentleman, one that adorns, honors, and distinguishes him as much as the miter does the bishop or his flowing robe the learned jurisconsult. Your Grace well may reprove your son, should he compose satires that reflect upon the honor of other persons; in that case, punish him and tear them up. But should he compose discourses in the manner of Horace, in which he reprehends vice in general as that poet so elegantly does, then praise him by all means; for it is permitted the poet to write verses in which he inveighs against envy and the other vices as well, and to lash out at the vicious without, however, designating any particular individual. On the other hand, there are poets who for the sake of uttering something malicious would run the risk of being banished to the shores of Pontus.<sup>4</sup>

“If the poet be chaste where his own manners are concerned, he will likewise be modest in his verses, for the pen is the tongue of the mind, and whatever thoughts are engendered there are bound to appear in his writings. When kings and princes behold the marvelous art of poetry as practiced by prudent, virtuous, and serious-minded subjects of their realm, they honor, esteem, and reward those persons and crown them with the leaves of the tree that is never struck by lightning<sup>5</sup>—as if to show that those who are crowned and adorned with such wreaths are not to be assailed by anyone.”

The gentleman in the green-colored greatcoat was vastly astonished by this speech of Don Quixote’s and was rapidly altering the opinion he had previously held, to the effect that his companion was but a crackbrain. In the middle of the long discourse, which was not greatly to his liking, Sancho had left the highway to go seek a little milk from some shepherds who were draining the udders of their ewes near by. Extremely well pleased with the knight’s sound sense and excellent reasoning, the gentleman was about to resume the conversation when,

3. There is a god in us (Latin); Ovid’s Fasti 6.5.

4. As the poet Ovid was by the Roman emperor Augustus in 8 C.E.

5. An ancient folk belief about the laurel.

raising his head, Don Quixote caught sight of a cart flying royal flags that was coming toward them down the road and, thinking it must be a fresh adventure, began calling to Sancho in a loud voice to bring him his helmet. Whereupon Sancho hastily left the shepherds and spurred his gray until he was once more alongside his master, who was now about to encounter a dreadful and bewildering ordeal.

["For I Well Know the Meaning of Valor"]

CHAPTER XVII

Wherein Don Quixote's unimaginable courage reaches its highest point, together with the adventure of the lions and its happy ending.

The history relates that, when Don Quixote called to Sancho to bring him his helmet, the squire was busy buying some curds from the shepherds and, flustered by his master's great haste, did not know what to do with them or how to carry them. Having already paid for the curds, he did not care to lose them, and so he decided to put them into the headpiece, and, acting upon this happy inspiration, he returned to see what was wanted of him.

"Give me that helmet," said the knight; "for either I know little about adventures or here is one where I am going to need my armor."

Upon hearing this, the gentleman in the green-colored greatcoat looked around in all directions but could see nothing except the cart that was approaching them, decked out with two or three flags which indicated that the vehicle in question must be conveying his Majesty's property. He remarked as much to Don Quixote, but the latter paid no attention, for he was always convinced that whatever happened to him meant adventures and more adventures.

"Forewarned is forearmed," he said. "I lose nothing by being prepared, knowing as I do that I have enemies both visible and invisible and cannot tell when or where or in what form they will attack me."

Turning to Sancho, he asked for his helmet again, and as there was no time to shake out the curds, the squire had to hand it to him as it was. Don Quixote took it and, without noticing what was in it, hastily clapped it on his head; and forthwith, as a result of the pressure on the curds, the whey began running down all over his face and beard, at which he was very much startled.

"What is this, Sancho?" he cried. "I think my head must be softening or my brains melting, or else I am sweating from head to foot. If sweat it be, I assure you it is not from fear, though I can well believe that the adventure which now awaits me is a terrible one indeed. Give me something with which to wipe my face, if you have anything, for this perspiration is so abundant that it blinds me."

Sancho said nothing but gave him a cloth and at the same time gave thanks to God that his master had not discovered what the trouble was. Don Quixote wiped his face and then took off his helmet to see what it was that made his head feel so cool. Catching sight of that watery white mass, he lifted it to his nose and smelled it.

"By the life of my lady Dulcinea del Toboso!" he exclaimed. "Those are curds that you have put there, you treacherous, brazen, ill-mannered squire!"

To this Sancho replied, very calmly and with a straight face, "If they are curds, give them to me, your Grace, so that I can eat them. But no, let the devil eat them, for he must be the one who did it. Do you think I would be so bold as to soil your Grace's helmet? Upon my word, master, by the understanding that God has given me, I, too, must have enchanters who are persecuting me as your Grace's creature and one of his members, and they are the ones who put that filthy mess there to make you lose your patience and your temper and cause you to whack my ribs as you are in the habit of doing. Well, this time, I must say, they have missed the mark; for I trust my master's good sense to tell him that I have neither curds nor milk nor anything of the kind, and if I did have, I'd put it in my stomach and not in that helmet."

"That may very well be," said Don Quixote.

Don Diego was observing all this and was more astonished than ever, especially when, after he had wiped his head, face, beard, and helmet, Don Quixote once more donned the piece of armor and, settling himself in the stirrups, proceeded to adjust his sword and fix his lance.

"Come what may, here I stand, ready to take on Satan himself in person!" shouted the knight.

The cart with the flags had come up to them by this time, accompanied only by a driver riding one of the mules and a man seated up in front.

"Where are you going, brothers?" Don Quixote called out as he placed himself in the path of the cart. "What conveyance is this, what do you carry in it, and what is the meaning of those flags?"

"The cart is mine," replied the driver, "and in it are two fierce lions in cages which the governor of Oran is sending to court as a present for his Majesty. The flags are those of our lord the King, as a sign that his property goes here."

"And are the lions large?" inquired Don Quixote.

It was the man sitting at the door of the cage who answered him. "The largest," he said, "that ever were sent from Africa to Spain. I am the lionkeeper and I have brought back others, but never any like these. They are male and female. The male is in this first cage, the female in the one behind. They are hungry right now, for they have had nothing to eat today; and so we'd be obliged if your Grace would get out of the way, for we must hasten on to the place where we are to feed them."

"Lion whelps against me?" said Don Quixote with a slight smile. "Lion whelps against me? And at such an hour? Then, by God, those gentlemen who sent them shall see whether I am the man to be frightened by lions. Get down, my good fellow, and since you are the lionkeeper, open the cages and turn those beasts out for me; and in the middle of this plain I will teach them who Don Quixote de la Mancha is, notwithstanding and in spite of the enchanters who are responsible for their being here."

"So," said the gentleman to himself as he heard this, "our worthy knight has revealed himself. It must indeed be true that the curds have softened his skull and mellowed his brains."

At this point Sancho approached him. "For God's sake, sir," he said, "do something to keep my master from fighting those lions. For if he does, they're going to tear us all to bits."

"Is your master, then, so insane," the gentleman asked, "that you fear and believe he means to tackle those fierce animals?"

"It is not that he is insane," replied Sancho, "but, rather, foolhardy."

"Very well," said the gentleman, "I will put a stop to it." And going up to Don Quixote, who was still urging the lionkeeper to open the cages, he said, "Sir Knight, knights-errant should undertake only those adventures that afford some hope of a successful outcome, not those that are utterly hopeless to begin with; for valor when it turns to temerity has in it more of madness than of bravery. Moreover, these lions have no thought of attacking your Grace but are a present to his Majesty, and it would not be well to detain them or interfere with their journey."

"My dear sir," answered Don Quixote, "you had best go mind your tame partridge and that bold ferret of yours and let each one attend to his own business. This is my affair, and I know whether these gentlemen, the lions, have come to attack me or not." He then turned to the lionkeeper. "I swear, Sir Rascal, if you do not open those cages at once, I'll pin you to the cart with this lance!"

Perceiving how determined the armed phantom was, the driver now spoke up. "Good sir," he said, "will your Grace please be so kind as to let me unhitch the mules and take them to a safe place before you turn those lions loose? For if they kill them for me, I am ruined for life, since the mules and cart are all the property I own."

"O man of little faith!" said Don Quixote. "Get down and unhitch your mules if you like, but you will soon see that it was quite unnecessary and that you might have spared yourself the trouble."

The driver did so, in great haste, as the lionkeeper began shouting, "I want you all to witness that I am being compelled against my will to open the cages and turn the lions out, and I further warn this gentleman that he will be responsible for all the harm and damage the beasts may do, plus my wages and my fees. You other gentlemen take cover before I open the doors; I am sure they will not do any harm to me."

Once more Don Diego sought to persuade his companion not to commit such an act of madness, as it was tempting God to undertake anything so foolish as that; but Don Quixote's only answer was that he knew what he was doing. And when the gentleman in green insisted that he was sure the knight was laboring under a delusion and ought to consider the matter well, the latter cut him short.

"Well, then, sir," he said, "if your Grace does not care to be a spectator at what you believe is going to turn out to be a tragedy, all you have to do is to spur your flea-bitten mare and seek safety."

Hearing this, Sancho with tears in his eyes again begged him to give up the undertaking, in comparison with which the adventure of the windmills and the dreadful one at the fulling mills—indeed, all the exploits his master had ever in the course of his life undertaken—were but bread and cakes.

"Look, sir," Sancho went on, "there is no enchantment here nor anything of the sort. Through the bars and chinks of that cage I have seen a real lion's claw, and judging by the size of it, the lion that it belongs to is bigger than a mountain."

"Fear, at any rate," said Don Quixote, "will make him look bigger to you than half the world. Retire, Sancho, and leave me, and if I die here, you know our ancient pact: you are to repair to Dulcinea—I say no more."

To this he added other remarks that took away any hope they had that he might not go through with his insane plan. The gentleman in the green-colored greatcoat was of a mind to resist him but saw that he was no match for the knight in the matter of arms. Then, too, it did not seem to him the part of wisdom to fight it out with a madman; for Don Quixote now impressed him as being quite mad in every way. Accordingly, while the knight was repeating his threats to the lionkeeper, Don Diego spurred his mare, Sancho his gray, and the driver his mules, all of them seeking to put as great a distance as possible between themselves and the cart before the lions broke loose.

Sancho already was bewailing his master's death, which he was convinced was bound to come from the lions' claws, and at the same time he cursed his fate and called it an unlucky hour in which he had taken it into his head to serve such a one. But despite his tears and lamentations, he did not leave off thrashing his gray in an effort to leave the cart behind them. When the lionkeeper saw that those who had fled were a good distance away, he once more entreated and warned Don Quixote as he had warned and entreated him before, but the answer he received was that he might save his breath as it would do him no good and he had best hurry and obey. In the space of time that it took the keeper to open the first cage, Don Quixote considered the question as to whether it would be well to give battle on foot or on horseback. He finally decided that he would do better on foot, as he feared that Rocinante would become frightened at sight of the lions; and so, leaping down from his horse, he fixed his lance, braced his buckler, and drew his sword, and then advanced with marvelous daring and great resoluteness until he stood directly in front of the cart, meanwhile commending himself to God with all his heart and then to his lady Dulcinea.

Upon reaching this point, the reader should know, the author of our veracious history indulges in the following exclamatory passage:

"O great-souled Don Quixote de la Mancha, thou whose courage is beyond all praise, mirror wherein all the valiant of the world may behold themselves, a new and second Don Manuel de León,<sup>6</sup> once the glory and the honor of Spanish knighthood! With what words shall I relate thy terrifying exploit, how render it credible to the ages that are to come? What eulogies do not belong to thee of right, even though they consist of hyperbole piled upon hyperbole? On foot and singlehanded, intrepid and with greathearted valor, armed but with a sword, and not one of the keen-edged Little Dog make,<sup>7</sup> and with a shield that was not of gleaming and polished steel, thou didst stand and wait for the two fiercest lions that ever the African forests bred! Thy deeds shall be thy praise, O valorous Manchegan; I leave them to speak for thee, since words fail me with which to extol them."

Here the author leaves off his exclamations and resumes the thread of the story.

Seeing Don Quixote posed there before him and perceiving that, unless he wished to incur the bold knight's indignation there was nothing for him to do but release the male lion, the keeper now opened the first cage, and it could be seen at once how extraordinarily big and horribly ugly the beast was. The first thing the recumbent animal did was to turn round, put out a claw, and stretch himself all over. Then he opened his mouth and yawned very slowly, after which he put out a tongue that was nearly two palms in length and with it licked the dust out of his eyes and washed his face. Having done this, he stuck his head outside the cage and gazed about him in all directions. His eyes were now like live coals and his appearance and demeanor were such as to strike terror in temerity itself. But Don Quixote merely stared at him attentively, waiting for him to descend from the cart so that they could come to grips, for the knight was determined to hack the brute to pieces, such was the extent of his unheard-of madness.

6. Don Manuel Ponce de León, a paragon of gallantry and knightly courtesy, from the time of Ferdinand and Isabella.

7. The trademark of a famous armorer of Toledo and Saragossa.

The lion, however, proved to be courteous rather than arrogant and was in no mood for childish bravado. After having gazed first in one direction and then in another, as has been said, he turned his back and presented his hind parts to Don Quixote and then very calmly and peaceably lay down and stretched himself out once more in his cage. At this, Don Quixote ordered the keeper to stir him up with a stick in order to irritate him and drive him out.

"That I will not do," the keeper replied, "for if I stir him, I will be the first one he will tear to bits. Be satisfied with what you have already accomplished, Sir Knight, which leaves nothing more to be said on the score of valor, and do not go tempting your fortune a second time. The door was open and the lion could have gone out if he had chosen; since he has not done so up to now, that means he will stay where he is all day long. Your Grace's stoutheartedness has been well established; for no brave fighter, as I see it, is obliged to do more than challenge his enemy and wait for him in the field; his adversary, if he does not come, is the one who is disgraced and the one who awaits him gains the crown of victory."

"That is the truth," said Don Quixote. "Shut the door, my friend, and bear me witness as best you can with regard to what you have seen me do here. I would have you certify: that you opened the door for the lion, that I waited for him and he did not come out, that I continued to wait and still he stayed there, and finally went back and lay down. I am under no further obligation. Away with enchantments, and God uphold the right, the truth, and true chivalry! So close the door, as I have told you, while I signal to the fugitives in order that they who were not present may hear of this exploit from your lips."

The keeper did as he was commanded, and Don Quixote, taking the cloth with which he had dried his face after the rain of curds, fastened it to the point of his lance and began summoning the runaways, who, all in a body with the gentleman in green bringing up the rear were still fleeing and turning around to look back at every step. Sancho was the first to see the white cloth.

"May they slay me," he said, "if my master hasn't conquered those fierce beasts, for he's calling to us."

They all stopped and made sure that the one who was doing the signaling was indeed Don Quixote, and then, losing some of their fear, they little by little made their way back to a point where they could distinctly hear what the knight was saying. At last they returned to the cart, and as they drew near Don Quixote spoke to the driver.

"You may come back, brother, hitch your mules, and continue your journey. And you, Sancho, may give each of them two gold crowns to recompense them for the delay they have suffered on my account."

"That I will, right enough," said Sancho. "But what has become of the lions? Are they dead or alive?"

The keeper thereupon, in leisurely fashion and in full detail, proceeded to tell them how the encounter had ended, taking pains to stress to the best of his ability the valor displayed by Don Quixote, at sight of whom the lion had been so cowed that he was unwilling to leave his cage, though the door had been left open quite a while. The fellow went on to state that the knight had wanted him to stir the lion up and force him out, but had finally been convinced that this would be tempting God and so, much to his displeasure and against his will, had permitted the door to be closed.

"What do you think of that, Sancho?" asked Don Quixote. "Are there any spells that can withstand true gallantry? The enchanters may take my luck away, but to deprive me of my strength and courage is an impossibility."

Sancho then bestowed the crowns, the driver hitched his mules, and the lionkeeper kissed Don Quixote's hands for the favor received, promising that, when he reached the court, he would relate this brave exploit to the king himself.

"In that case," replied Don Quixote, "if his Majesty by any chance should inquire who it was that performed it, you are to say that it was the Knight of the Lions; for that is the name by which I wish to be known from now on, thus changing, exchanging, altering, and converting the one I have previously borne, that of Knight of the Mournful Countenance; in which respect I am but following the old custom of knights-errant, who changed their names whenever they liked or found it convenient to do so."

With this, the cart continued on its way, and Don Quixote, Sancho, and the gentleman in the green-colored greatcoat likewise resumed their journey. During all this time Don Diego de Miranda had not uttered a word but was wholly taken up with observing what Don Quixote did and listening to what he had to say. The knight impressed him as being a crazy sane man and an insane one on the verge of sanity. The gentleman did not happen to be familiar with the first part of our history, but if he had read it he would have ceased to wonder at such talk and conduct, for he would then have known what kind of madness this was. Remaining as he did in ignorance of his companion's malady, he took him now for a sensible individual and now for a madman, since what Don Quixote said was coherent, elegantly phrased, and to the point, whereas his actions were nonsensical, foolhardy, and downright silly. What greater madness could there be, Don Diego asked himself, than to don a helmet filled with curds and then persuade oneself that enchanters were softening one's cranium? What could be more rashly absurd than to wish to fight lions by sheer strength alone? He was roused from these thoughts, this inward soliloquy, by the sound of Don Quixote's voice.

"Undoubtedly, Señor Don Diego de Miranda, your Grace must take me for a fool and a madman, am I not right? And it would be small wonder if such were the case, seeing that my deeds give evidence of nothing else. But, nevertheless, I would advise your Grace that I am neither so mad nor so lacking in wit as I must appear to you to be. A gaily caparisoned knight giving a fortunate lance thrust to a fierce bull in the middle of a great square makes a pleasing appearance in the eyes of his king. The same is true of a knight clad in shining armor as he paces the lists in front of the ladies in some joyous tournament. It is true of all those knights who, by means of military exercises or what appear to be such, divert and entertain and, if one may say so, honor the courts of princes. But the best showing of all is made by a knight-errant who, traversing deserts and solitudes, crossroads, forests, and mountains, goes seeking dangerous adventures with the intention of bringing them to a happy and successful conclusion, and solely for the purpose of winning a glorious and enduring renown.

"More impressive, I repeat, is the knight-errant succoring a widow in some unpopulated place than a courtly man of arms making love to a damsel in the city. All knights have their special callings: let the courtier wait upon the ladies and lend luster by his liveries to his sovereign's palace; let him nourish impoverished gentlemen with the splendid fare of his table; let him give tourneys and show himself truly great, generous, and magnificent and a good Christian above all, thus fulfilling his particular obligations. But the knight-errant's case is different.

"Let the latter seek out the nooks and corners of the world; let him enter into the most intricate of labyrinths; let him attempt the impossible at every step; let him endure on desolate highlands the burning rays of the midsummer sun and in winter the harsh inclemencies of wind and frost; let no lions inspire him with fear, no monsters frighten him, no dragons terrify him, for to seek them out, attack them, and conquer them all is his chief and legitimate occupation. Accordingly, I whose lot it is to be numbered among the knights-errant cannot fail to attempt anything that appears to me to fall within the scope of my duties, just as I attacked those lions a while ago even though I knew it to be an exceedingly rash thing to do, for that was a matter that directly concerned me.

"For I well know the meaning of valor: namely, a virtue that lies between the two extremes of cowardice on the one hand and temerity on the other. It is, nonetheless, better for the brave man to carry his bravery to the point of rashness than for him to sink into cowardice. Even as it is easier for the prodigal to become a generous man than it is for the miser, so is it easier for the foolhardy to become truly brave than it is for the coward to attain valor. And in this matter of adventures, you may believe me, Señor Don Diego, it is better to lose by a card too many than a card too few, and 'Such and such a knight is temerarious and overbold' sounds better to the ear than 'That knight is timid and a coward.'"

"I must assure you, Señor Don Quixote," replied Don Diego, "that everything your Grace has said and done will stand the test of reason; and it is my opinion that if the laws and ordinances of knight-errantry were to be lost, they would be found again in your Grace's bosom, which is their depository and storehouse. But it is growing late; let us hasten to my village and my home, where your Grace shall rest from your recent exertions; for if the body is not tired the spirit may be, and that sometimes results in bodily fatigue."

"I accept your offer as a great favor and an honor, Señor Don Diego," was the knight's reply. And, by spurring their mounts more than they had up to then, they arrived at the village around two in the afternoon and came to the house that was occupied by Don Diego, whom Don Quixote had dubbed the Knight of the Green-colored Greatcoat.

[Last Duel]

CHAPTER LXIV

Which treats of the adventure that caused Don Quixote the most sorrow of all those that have thus far befallen him.<sup>8</sup>

* * *

One morning, as Don Quixote went for a ride along the beach, clad in full armor—for, as he was fond of saying, that was his only ornament, his only rest the fight and, accordingly, he was never without it for a moment—he saw approaching him a horseman similarly arrayed from head to foot and with a brightly shining moon blazoned upon his shield.

As soon as he had come within earshot the stranger cried out to Don Quixote in a loud voice, “O illustrious knight, the never to be sufficiently praised Don Quixote de la Mancha, I am the Knight of the White Moon, whose incomparable exploits you will perhaps recall. I come to contend with you and try the might of my arm, with the purpose of having you acknowledge and confess that my lady, whoever she may be, is beyond comparison more beautiful than your own Dulcinea del Toboso. If you will admit the truth of this fully and freely, you will escape death and I shall be spared the trouble of inflicting it upon you. On the other hand, if you choose to fight and I should overcome you, I ask no other satisfaction than that, laying down your arms and seeking no further adventures, you retire to your own village for the space of a year, during which time you are not to lay hand to sword but are to dwell peacefully and tranquilly, enjoying a beneficial rest that shall redound to the betterment of your worldly fortunes and the salvation of your soul. But if you are the victor, then my head shall be at your disposal, my arms and steed shall be the spoils, and the fame of my exploits shall go to increase your own renown. Consider well which is the better course and let me have your answer at once, for today is all the time I have for the dispatching of this business.”

Don Quixote was amazed at the knight’s arrogance as well as at the nature of the challenge, but it was with a calm and stern demeanor that he replied to him.

“Knight of the White Moon,” he said, “of whose exploits up to now I have never heard, I will venture to take an oath that you have not once laid eyes upon the illustrious Dulcinea; for I am quite certain that if you had beheld her you would not be staking your all upon such an issue, since the sight of her would have convinced you that there never has been, and never can be, any beauty to compare with hers. I do not say that you lie, I simply say that you are mistaken; and so I accept your challenge with the conditions you have laid down, and at once, before this day you have fixed upon shall have ended. The only exception I make is with regard to the fame of your deeds being added to my renown, since I do not know what the character of your exploits has been and am quite content

8. Don Quixote and Sancho, after a great many encounters and experiences (of which the most prominent have been Don Quixote’s descent into the cave of Montesinos and their residence at the castle of the playful ducal couple who give Sancho the “governorship of an island” for ten days), are now in Barcelona. Famous as they are, they meet the viceroy and the nobles; their host is Don Antonio Moreno, “a gentleman of wealth and discernment who was fond of amusing himself in an innocent and kindly way.”

with my own, such as they are. Take, then, whichever side of the field you like, and I will take up my position, and may St. Peter bless what God may give.”

Now, as it happened, the Knight of the White Moon was seen by some of the townspeople, who informed the viceroy that he was there, talking to Don Quixote de la Mancha. Believing this to be a new adventure arranged by Don Antonio Moreno or some other gentleman of the place, the viceroy at once hastened down to the beach, accompanied by a large retinue, including Don Antonio, and they arrived just as Don Quixote was wheeling Rocinante to measure off the necessary stretch of field. When the viceroy perceived that they were about to engage in combat, he at once interposed and inquired of them what it was that impelled them thus to do battle all of a sudden.

The Knight of the White Moon replied that it was a matter of beauty and precedence and briefly repeated what he had said to Don Quixote, explaining the terms to which both parties had agreed. The viceroy then went up to Don Antonio and asked him if he knew any such knight as this or if it was some joke that they were playing, but the answer that he received left him more puzzled than ever; for Don Antonio did not know who the knight was, nor could he say as to whether this was a real encounter or not. The viceroy, accordingly, was doubtful about letting them proceed, but inasmuch as he could not bring himself to believe that it was anything more than a jest, he withdrew to one side, saying, “Sir Knights, if there is nothing for it but to confess or die, and if Señor Don Quixote’s mind is made up and your Grace, the Knight of the White Moon, is even more firmly resolved, then fall to it in the name of God and may He bestow the victory.”

The Knight of the White Moon thanked the viceroy most courteously and in well-chosen words for the permission which had been granted them, and Don Quixote did the same, whereupon the latter, commending himself with all his heart to Heaven and to his lady Dulcinea, as was his custom at the beginning of a fray, fell back a little farther down the field as he saw his adversary doing the same. And then, without blare of trumpet or other warlike instrument to give them the signal for the attack, both at the same instant wheeled their steeds about and returned for the charge. Being mounted upon the swifter horse, the Knight of the White Moon met Don Quixote two-thirds of the way and with such tremendous force that, without touching his opponent with his lance (which, it seemed, he deliberately held aloft) he brought both Rocinante and his rider to the ground in an exceedingly perilous fall. At once the victor leaped down and placed his lance at Don Quixote’s visor.

“You are vanquished, O knight! Nay, more, you are dead unless you make confession in accordance with the conditions governing our encounter.”

Stunned and battered, Don Quixote did not so much as raise his visor but in a faint, wan voice, as if speaking from the grave, he said, “Dulcinea del Toboso is the most beautiful woman in the world and I the most unhappy knight upon the face of this earth. It is not right that my weakness should serve to defraud the truth. Drive home your lance, O knight, and take my life since you already have deprived me of my honor.”

“That I most certainly shall not do,” said the one of the White Moon. “Let the fame of my lady Dulcinea del Toboso’s beauty live on undiminished. As for me, I shall be content if the great Don Quixote will retire to his village for a year or until such a time as I may specify, as was agreed upon between us before joining battle.”

The viceroy, Don Antonio, and all the many others who were present heard this, and they also heard Don Quixote's response, which was to the effect that, seeing nothing was asked of him that was prejudicial to Dulcinea, he would fulfill all the other conditions like a true and punctilious knight. The one of the White Moon thereupon turned and with a bow to the viceroy rode back to the city at a mild canter. The viceroy promptly dispatched Don Antonio to follow him and make every effort to find out who he was; and, in the meanwhile, they lifted Don Quixote up and uncovered his face, which held no sign of color and was bathed in perspiration. Rocinante, however, was in so sorry a state that he was unable to stir for the present.

Brokenhearted over the turn that events had taken, Sancho did not know what to say or do. It seemed to him that all this was something that was happening in a dream and that everything was the result of magic. He saw his master surrender, heard him consent not to take up arms again for a year to come as the light of his glorious exploits faded into darkness. At the same time his own hopes, based upon the fresh promises that had been made him, were whirled away like smoke before the wind. He feared that Rocinante was maimed for life, his master's bones permanently dislocated—it would have been a bit of luck if his madness also had been jolted out of him.<sup>9</sup>

Finally, in a hand litter which the viceroy had them bring, they bore the knight back to town. The viceroy himself then returned, for he was very anxious to ascertain who the Knight of the White Moon was who had left Don Quixote in so lamentable a condition.

From CHAPTER LXV

Wherein is revealed who the Knight of the White Moon was, with the freeing of Don Gregorio and other events.

The Knight of the White Moon was followed not only by Don Antonio Moreno, but by a throng of small boys as well, who kept after him until the doors of one of the city's hostelrys had closed behind him. A squire came out to meet him and remove his armor, for which purpose the victor proceeded to shut himself up in a lower room, in the company of Don Antonio, who had also entered the inn and whose bread would not bake until he had learned the knight's identity. Perceiving that the gentleman had no intention of leaving him, he of the White Moon then spoke.

"Sir," he said, "I am well aware that you have come to find out who I am; and, seeing that there is no denying you the information that you seek, while my servant here is removing my armor I will tell you the exact truth of the matter. I would have you know, sir, that I am the bachelor Sansón Carrasco from the same village as Don Quixote de la Mancha, whose madness and absurdities inspire pity in all of us who know him and in none more than me. And so, being convinced that his salvation lay in his returning home for a period of rest in his own house, I formed a plan for bringing him back.

"It was three months ago that I took to the road as a knight-errant, calling myself the Knight of the Mirrors, with the object of fighting and overcoming him without doing him any harm, intending first to lay down the condition that the vanquished was to yield to the victor's will. What I meant to ask of him—for I looked upon him as conquered from the start—was that he should return to his village and not leave it for a whole year, in the course of which time he might be cured. Fate, however, ordained things otherwise; for he was the one who conquered me and overthrew me from my horse, and thus my plan came to naught. He continued on his wanderings, and I went home, defeated, humiliated, and bruised from my fall, which was quite a dangerous one. But I did not for this reason give up the idea of hunting him up once more and vanquishing him as you have seen me do today.

9. The original Spanish has an untranslatable pun on deslocado, which means "out of joint" ("dislocated") and also "cured of madness" (from loco, "mad").

"Since he is the soul of honor when it comes to observing the ordinances of knight-errantry, there is not the slightest doubt that he will keep the promise he has given me and fulfill his obligations. And that, sir, is all that I need to tell you concerning what has happened. I beg you not to disclose my secret or reveal my identity to Don Quixote, in order that my well-intentioned scheme may be carried out and a man of excellent judgment be brought back to his senses—for a sensible man he would be, once rid of the follies of chivalry."

"My dear sir," exclaimed Don Antonio, "may God forgive you for the wrong you have done the world by seeking to deprive it of its most charming madman! Do you not see that the benefit accomplished by restoring Don Quixote to his senses can never equal the pleasure which others derive from his vagaries? But it is my opinion that all the trouble to which the Señor Bachelor has put himself will not suffice to cure a man who is so hopelessly insane; and if it were not uncharitable, I would say let Don Quixote never be cured, since with his return to health we lose not only his own drolleries but also those of his squire, Sancho Panza, for either of the two is capable of turning melancholy itself into joy and merriment. Nevertheless, I will keep silent and tell him nothing, that I may see whether or not I am right in my suspicion that Señor Carrasco's efforts will prove to have been of no avail."

The bachelor replied that, all in all, things looked very favorable and he hoped for a fortunate outcome. With this, he took his leave of Don Antonio, after offering to render him any service that he could; and, having had his armor tied up and placed upon a mule's back, he rode out of the city that same day on the same horse on which he had gone into battle, returning to his native province without anything happening to him that is worthy of being set down in this veracious chronicle.

* * *

[Homecoming and Death]

CHAPTER LXXIII

Of the omens that Don Quixote encountered upon entering his village, with other incidents that embellish and lend credence to this great history.

As they entered the village, Cid Hamete informs us, Don Quixote caught sight of two lads on the communal threshing floor who were engaged in a dispute.

"Don't let it worry you, Periquillo," one of them was saying to the other; "you'll never lay eyes on it again as long as you live."

Hearing this, Don Quixote turned to Sancho. “Did you mark what that boy said, my friend?” he asked. “You’ll never lay eyes on it<sup>1</sup> again . . .”

“Well,” replied Sancho, “what difference does it make what he said?”

“What difference?” said Don Quixote. “Don’t you see that, applied to the one I love, it means I shall never again see Dulcinea.”

Sancho was about to answer him when his attention was distracted by a hare that came flying across the fields pursued by a large number of hunters with their greyhounds. The frightened animal took refuge by huddling down beneath the donkey, whereupon Sancho reached out his hand and caught it and presented it to his master.

“Malum signum, malum signum,”<sup>2</sup> the knight was muttering to himself. “A hare flees, the hounds pursue it, Dulcinea appears not.”

“It is very strange to hear your Grace talk like that,” said Sancho. “Let us suppose that this hare is Dulcinea del Toboso and the hounds pursuing it are those wicked enchanters that transformed her into a peasant lass; she flees, I catch her and turn her over to your Grace, you hold her in your arms and caress her. Is that a bad sign? What ill omen can you find in it?”

The two lads who had been quarreling now came up to have a look at the hare, and Sancho asked them what their dispute was about. To this the one who had uttered the words “You’ll never lay eyes on it again as long as you live,” replied that he had taken a cricket cage from the other boy and had no intention of returning it ever. Sancho then brought out from his pocket four cuartos and gave them to the lad in exchange for the cage, which he placed in Don Quixote’s hands.

“There, master,” he said, “these omens are broken and destroyed, and to my way of thinking, even though I may be a dunce, they have no more to do with what is going to happen to us than the clouds of yesteryear. If I am not mistaken, I have heard our curate say that sensible persons of the Christian faith should pay no heed to such foolish things, and you yourself in the past have given me to understand that all those Christians who are guided by omens are fools. But there is no need to waste a lot of words on the subject; come, let us go on and enter our village.”

The hunters at this point came up and asked for the hare, and Don Quixote gave it to them. Continuing on their way, the returning pair encountered the curate and the bachelor Carrasco, who were strolling in a small meadow on the outskirts of the town as they read their breviaries. And here it should be mentioned that Sancho Panza, by way of sumpter cloth, had thrown over his gray and the bundle of armor it bore the flame-covered buckram robe in which they had dressed the squire at the duke’s castle, on the night that witnessed Altisidora’s<sup>3</sup> resurrection; and he had also fitted the miter over the donkey’s head, the result being the weirdest transformation and the most bizarrely appareled ass that ever were seen in this world. The curate and the bachelor

1. The pronoun it is the same as her in the Spanish, because the boy’s reference is to a cricket cage, which is a feminine noun. (In Spanish, all nouns are either masculine or feminine.) Hence Don Quixote’s inference that the boys are discussing Dulcinea.

2. An ill omen (Latin)—that is, meeting a hare is considered a bad sign.

3. A girl in the duke’s castle, where Don Quixote and Sancho were guests for a time. She dramatically pretended to be in love with Don Quixote. “Sumpter cloth”: decorative or protective covering for a pack animal.

recognized the pair at once and came forward to receive them with open arms. Don Quixote dismounted and gave them both a warm embrace; meanwhile, the small boys (boys are like lynxes in that nothing escapes them), having spied the ass's miter, ran up for a closer view.

"Come, lads," they cried, "and see Sancho Panza's ass trigged out finer than Mingo,<sup>4</sup> and Don Quixote's beast is skinnier than ever!"

Finally, surrounded by the urchins and accompanied by the curate and the bachelor, they entered the village and made their way to Don Quixote's house, where they found the housekeeper and the niece standing in the doorway, for the news of their return had preceded them. Teresa Panza, Sancho's wife, had also heard of it, and, half naked and disheveled, dragging her daughter Sanchica by the hand, she hastened to greet her husband and was disappointed when she saw him, for he did not look to her as well fitted out as a governor ought to be.

"How does it come, my husband," she said, "that you return like this, tramping and footsore? You look more like a vagabond than you do like a governor."

"Be quiet, Teresa,"<sup>5</sup> Sancho admonished her, "for very often there are stakes where there is no bacon. Come on home with me and you will hear marvels. I am bringing money with me, which is the thing that matters, money earned by my own efforts and without harm to anyone."

"You just bring along the money, my good husband," said Teresa, "and whether you got it here or there, or by whatever means, you will not be introducing any new custom into the world."

Sanchica then embraced her father and asked him if he had brought her anything, for she had been looking forward to his coming as to the showers in May. And so, with his wife holding him by the hand while his daughter kept one arm about his waist and at the same time led the gray, Sancho went home, leaving Don Quixote under his own roof in the company of niece and housekeeper, the curate and the barber.

Without regard to time or season, the knight at once drew his guests to one side and in a few words informed them of how he had been overcome in battle and had given his promise not to leave his village for a year, a promise that he meant to observe most scrupulously, without violating it in the slightest degree, as every knight-errant was obliged to do by the laws of chivalry. He accordingly meant to spend that year as a shepherd,<sup>6</sup> he said, amid the solitude of the fields, where he might give free rein to his amorous fancies as he practiced the virtues of the pastoral life; and he further begged them, if they were not too greatly occupied and more urgent matters did not prevent their doing so, to consent to be his companions. He would purchase a flock sufficiently large to justify their calling themselves shepherds; and, moreover, he would have them know, the most important thing of all had been taken care of, for he had hit upon names that would suit them marvelously well. When the curate asked him what these names were, Don Quixote replied that he himself would be known as "the

4. The allusion is to the opening lines of Mingo Revulgo (15th century), a satire: "Hey! Mingo Revulgo, hey! What have you done with your blue cloth doublet? Do you not wear it on Sundays?"

5. Sancho's wife, here referred to as Teresa, is earlier named Juana.

6. Because the knight-errant's life has been forbidden him by his defeat, Don Quixote for a time plans to live according to another and no less "literary" code, that of the pastoral. The following paragraphs, especially through the bachelor Carrasco, refer humorously to some of the conventions of pastoral literature.

shepherd Quixotiz," the bachelor as "the shepherd Carrascón," the curate as "the shepherd Curiambro," and Sancho Panza as "the shepherd Pancino."

Both his listeners were dismayed at the new form which his madness had assumed. However, in order that he might not go faring forth from the village on another of his expeditions (for they hoped that in the course of the year he would be cured), they decided to fall in with his new plan and approve it as being a wise one, and they even agreed to be his companions in the calling he proposed to adopt.

"What's more," remarked Sansón Carrasco, "I am a very famous poet, as everyone knows, and at every turn I will be composing pastoral or courtly verses or whatever may come to mind, by way of a diversion for us as we wander in those lonely places; but what is most necessary of all, my dear sirs, is that each one of us should choose the name of the shepherd lass to whom he means to dedicate his songs, so that we may not leave a tree, however hard its bark may be, where their names are not inscribed and engraved as is the custom with lovelorn shepherds."

"That is exactly what we should do," replied Don Quixote, "although, for my part, I am relieved of the necessity of looking for an imaginary shepherdess, seeing that I have the peerless Dulcinea del Toboso, glory of these brookside regions, adornment of these meadows, beauty's mainstay, cream of the Graces—in short, one to whom all praise is well becoming however hyperbolic it may be."

"That is right," said the curate, "but we will seek out some shepherd maids that are easily handled, who if they do not square with us will fit in the corners."

"And," added Sansón Carrasco, "if we run out of names we will give them those that we find printed in books the world over: such as Fílida, Amarilis, Diana, Flérída, Galatea, and Belisarda; for since these are for sale in the market place, we can buy them and make them our own. If my lady, or, rather, my shepherdess, should by chance be called Ana, I will celebrate her charms under the name of Anarda; if she is Francisca, she will become Francenia; if Lucía, Luscinda; for it all amounts to the same thing. And Sancho Panza, if he enters this confraternity, may compose verses to his wife, Teresa Panza, under the name of Teresaina."

Don Quixote had to laugh at this, and the curate then went on to heap extravagant praise upon him for his noble resolution which did him so much credit, and once again he offered to keep the knight company whenever he could spare the time from the duties of his office. With this, they took their leave of him, advising and beseeching him to take care of his health and to eat plentifully of the proper food.

As fate would have it, the niece and the housekeeper had overheard the conversation of the three men, and as soon as the visitors had left they both descended upon Don Quixote.

"What is the meaning of this, my uncle? Here we were thinking your Grace had come home to lead a quiet and respectable life, and do you mean to tell us you are going to get yourself involved in fresh complications—

*Young shepherd, thou who comest here,
Young shepherd, thou who goest there . . .*<sup>7</sup>

7. From a pastoral ballad.

For, to tell the truth, the barley is too hard now to make shepherds' pipes of it."<sup>8</sup>

"And how," said the housekeeper, "is your Grace going to stand the midday heat in summer, the winter cold, the howling of the wolves out there in the fields? You certainly cannot endure it. That is an occupation for robust men, cut out and bred for such a calling almost from their swaddling clothes. Setting one evil over against another, it is better to be a knight-errant than a shepherd. Look, sir, take my advice, for I am not stuffed with bread and wine when I give it to you but am fasting and am going on fifty years of age: stay at home, attend to your affairs, go often to confession, be charitable to the poor, and let it be upon my soul if any harm comes to you as a result of it."

"Be quiet, daughters," said Don Quixote. "I know very well what I must do. Take me up to bed, for I do not feel very well; and you may be sure of one thing: whether I am a knight-errant now or a shepherd to be, I never will fail to look after your needs as you will see when the time comes."

And good daughters that they unquestionably were, the housekeeper and the niece helped him up to bed, where they gave him something to eat and made him as comfortable as they could.

From CHAPTER LXXIV

*Of how Don Quixote fell sick, of the will that he made,
and of the manner of his death.*

Inasmuch as nothing that is human is eternal but is ever declining from its beginning to its close, this being especially true of the lives of men, and since Don Quixote was not endowed by Heaven with the privilege of staying the downward course of things, his own end came when he was least expecting it. Whether it was owing to melancholy occasioned by the defeat he had suffered, or was, simply, the will of Heaven which had so ordained it, he was taken with a fever that kept him in bed for a week, during which time his friends, the curate, the bachelor, and the barber, visited him frequently, while Sancho Panza, his faithful squire, never left his bedside.

Believing that the knight's condition was due to sorrow over his downfall and disappointment at not having been able to accomplish the disenchantment and liberation of Dulcinea, Sancho and the others endeavored to cheer him up in every possible way. The bachelor urged him to take heart and get up from bed that he might begin his pastoral life, adding that he himself had already composed an eclogue that would cast in the shade all that Sannazaro<sup>9</sup> had ever written, and had purchased with his own money from a herdsman of Quintanar two fine dogs to guard the flock, one of them named Barcino and the other Butrón. All this, however, did not serve to relieve Don Quixote's sadness; whereupon his friends called in the doctor, who took his pulse and was not very well satisfied with it. In any case, the physician told them, they should attend to the health of his soul as that of his body was in grave danger.

Don Quixote received this news calmly enough, but not so his housekeeper, niece, and squire, who began weeping bitterly, as if he were already lying dead

8. A proverb.

9. Jacopo Sannazaro (1456–1530), Italian poet whose Arcadia is one of the milestones in the pastoral tradition.

in front of them. It was the doctor's opinion that melancholy and depression were putting an end to his patient's life. The knight then requested them to leave him alone as he wished to sleep a little, and they complied. He slept for more than six hours at a stretch, as the saying is, and so soundly that the housekeeper and niece thought he would never wake.

At last he did, however, and at once cried out in a loud voice, "Blessed be Almighty God who has given me so many blessings! Truly His mercy is boundless and is not limited or restrained by the sins of men."

The niece listened carefully to what her uncle said, and it seemed to her that he was speaking more rationally than was his wont, at least during his illness.

"Sir," she said to him, "what does your Grace mean? Has something occurred that we know nothing about? What is this talk of mercy and sins?"

"The mercy that I speak of," replied Don Quixote, "is that which God is showing me at this moment—in spite of my sins, as I have said. My mind now is clear, unencumbered by those misty shadows of ignorance that were cast over it by my bitter and continual reading of those hateful books of chivalry. I see through all the nonsense and fraud contained in them, and my only regret is that my disillusionment has come so late, leaving me no time to make any sort of amends by reading those that are the light of the soul. I find myself, niece, at the point of death, and I would die in such a way as not to leave the impression of a life so bad that I shall be remembered as a madman; for even though I have been one, I do not wish to confirm it on my deathbed. And so, my dear, call in my good friends: the curate, the bachelor Sansón Carrasco, and Master Nicholas the barber; for I want to confess my sins and make my last will and testament."

The niece, however, was relieved of this errand, for the three of them came in just then.

"I have good news for you, kind sirs," said Don Quixote the moment he saw them. "I am no longer Don Quixote de la Mancha but Alonso Quijano, whose mode of life won for him the name of 'Good.' I am the enemy of Amadis of Gaul and all his innumerable progeny; for those profane stories dealing with knight-errantry are odious to me, and I realize how foolish I was and the danger I courted in reading them; but I am in my right senses now and I abominate them."

Hearing this, they all three were convinced that some new kind of madness must have laid hold of him.

"Why, Señor Don Quixote!" exclaimed Sansón. "What makes you talk like that, just when we have received news that my lady Dulcinea is disenchanted? And just when we are on the verge of becoming shepherds so that we may spend the rest of our lives in singing like a lot of princes, why does your Grace choose to turn hermit? Say no more, in Heaven's name, but be sensible and forget these idle tales."

"Tales of that kind," said Don Quixote, "have been the truth for me in the past, and to my detriment, but with Heaven's aid I trust to turn them to my profit now that I am dying. For I feel, gentlemen, that death is very near; so, leave all jesting aside and bring me a confessor for my sins and a notary to draw up my will. In such straits as these a man cannot trifle with his soul. Accordingly, while the Señor Curate is hearing my confession, let the notary be summoned."

Amazed at his words, they gazed at one another in some perplexity, yet they could not but believe him. One of the signs that led them to think he was dying was this quick return from madness to sanity and all the additional things he had to say, so well reasoned and well put and so becoming in a Christian that none of them could any longer doubt that he was in full possession of his faculties. Sending the others out of the room, the curate stayed behind to confess him, and before long the bachelor returned with the notary and Sancho Panza, who had been informed of his master's condition, and who, finding the housekeeper and the niece in tears, began weeping with them. When the confession was over, the curate came out.

"It is true enough," he said, "that Alonso Quijano the Good is dying, and it is also true that he is a sane man. It would be well for us to go in now while he makes his will."

At this news the housekeeper, niece, and the good squire Sancho Panza were so overcome with emotion that the tears burst forth from their eyes and their bosoms heaved with sobs; for, as has been stated more than once, whether Don Quixote was plain Alonso Quijano the Good or Don Quixote de la Mancha, he was always of a kindly and pleasant disposition and for this reason was beloved not only by the members of his household but by all who knew him.

The notary had entered along with the others, and as soon as the preamble had been attended to and the dying man had commended his soul to his Maker with all those Christian formalities that are called for in such a case, they came to the matter of bequests, with Don Quixote dictating as follows:

"ITEM. With regard to Sancho Panza, whom, in my madness, I appointed to be my squire, and who has in his possession a certain sum of money belonging to me: inasmuch as there has been a standing account between us, of debits and credits, it is my will that he shall not be asked to give any accounting whatsoever of this sum, but if any be left over after he has had payment for what I owe him, the balance, which will amount to very little, shall be his, and much good may it do him. If when I was mad I was responsible for his being given the governorship of an island, now that I am of sound mind I would present him with a kingdom if it were in my power, for his simplicity of mind and loyal conduct merit no less."

At this point he turned to Sancho. "Forgive me, my friend," he said, "for having caused you to appear as mad as I by leading you to fall into the same error, that of believing that there are still knights-errant in the world."

"Ah, master," cried Sancho through his tears, "don't die, your Grace, but take my advice and go on living for many years to come; for the greatest madness that a man can be guilty of in this life is to die without good reason, without anyone's killing him, slain only by the hands of melancholy. Look you, don't be lazy but get up from this bed and let us go out into the fields clad as shepherds as we agreed to do. Who knows but behind some bush we may come upon the lady Dulcinea, as disenchanted as you could wish. If it is because of worry over your defeat that you are dying, put the blame on me by saying that the reason for your being overthrown was that I had not properly fastened Rocinante's girth. For the matter of that, your Grace knows from reading your books of chivalry that it is a common thing for certain knights to overthrow others, and he who is vanquished today will be the victor tomorrow."

"That is right," said Sansón, "the worthy Sancho speaks the truth."

"Not so fast, gentlemen," said Don Quixote. "In last year's nests there are no birds this year. I was mad and now I am sane; I was Don Quixote de la Mancha, and now I am, as I have said, Alonso Quijano the Good. May my repentance and the truth I now speak restore to me the place I once held in your esteem. And now, let the notary proceed:

"ITEM. I bequeath my entire estate, without reservation, to my niece Antonia Quijana, here present, after the necessary deductions shall have been made from the most available portion of it to satisfy the bequests that I have stipulated. The first payment shall be to my housekeeper for the wages due her, with twenty ducats over to buy her a dress. And I hereby appoint the Señor Curate and the Señor Bachelor Sansón Carrasco to be my executors.

"ITEM. It is my will that if my niece Antonia Quijana should see fit to marry, it shall be to a man who does not know what books of chivalry are; and if it shall be established that he is acquainted with such books and my niece still insists on marrying him, then she shall lose all that I have bequeathed her and my executors shall apply her portion to works of charity as they may see fit.

"ITEM. I entreat the aforementioned gentlemen, my executors, if by good fortune they should come to know the author who is said to have composed a history now going the rounds under the title of Second Part of the Exploits of Don Quixote de la Mancha, to beg his forgiveness in my behalf, as earnestly as they can, since it was I who unthinkingly led him to set down so many and such great absurdities as are to be found in it; for I leave this life with a feeling of remorse at having provided him with the occasion for putting them into writing."

The will ended here, and Don Quixote, stretching himself at length in the bed, fainted away. They all were alarmed at this and hastened to aid him. The same thing happened very frequently in the course of the three days of life that remained to him after he had made his will. The household was in a state of excitement, but with it all the niece continued to eat her meals, the housekeeper had her drink, and Sancho Panza was in good spirits; for this business of inheriting property effaces or mitigates the sorrow which the heir ought to feel and causes him to forget.

Death came at last for Don Quixote, after he had received all the sacraments and once more, with many forceful arguments, had expressed his abomination of books of chivalry. The notary who was present remarked that in none of those books had he read of any knight-errant dying in his own bed so peacefully and in so Christian a manner. And thus, amid the tears and lamentations of those present, he gave up the ghost; that is to say, he died. Perceiving that their friend was no more, the curate asked the notary to be a witness to the fact that Alonso Quijano the Good, commonly known as Don Quixote, was truly dead, this being necessary in order that some author other than Cid Hamete Benengeli might not have the opportunity of falsely resurrecting him and writing endless histories of his exploits.

Such was the end of the Ingenious Gentleman of La Mancha, whose birthplace Cid Hamete was unwilling to designate exactly in order that all the towns and villages of La Mancha might contend among themselves for the right to adopt him and claim him as their own, just as the seven cities of Greece did in the case of Homer. The lamentations of Sancho and those of Don Quixote's niece and his housekeeper, as well as the original epitaphs that were composed for his tomb, will not be recorded here, but mention may be made of the verses by Sansón Carrasco:

*Here lies a gentleman bold
 Who was so very brave
 He went to lengths untold,
 And on the brink of the grave
 Death had on him no hold.
 By the world he set small store—
 He frightened it to the core—
 Yet somehow, by Fate's plan,
 Though he'd lived a crazy man,
 When he died he was sane once more.*

* * *

---

POPOL VUH

transcribed 1554–58

---

A compendium of stories cherished by the ancient, the colonial, and even the modern Quiché Maya people of Guatemala, the sixteenth-century Popol Vuh has been compared to the Odyssey of the Greeks and the Mahābhārata of India. Woven together, its stories form an epic narrative that leads from the creation of the world and of humankind to the time of the text's writing, amid the violence of the Spanish Conquest. Inevitably, following the conquest of Mexico in 1521, Spanish imperialism cast its eye toward Guatemala, and in 1524, after a brief struggle, Quiché fell to Spanish and Mexican troops under the command of Pedro de Alvarado (called “the sun” by native people). By the 1530s, Quiché scribes, presumably including the Popol Vuh author, were being trained to use alphabetic writing. The book thus represents the cultural and intellectual mix born of the encounter: it is written in the Quiché language but in the Roman alphabet, and translates into book form what may have been an earlier text. In the narrative itself the anonymous author hints at the existence of a certain “council book” (popol vuh), presumably a pre-Columbian screen-fold that served him as a source. The Maya were the only civilization in the New World to have developed a full writing system, based on an elaborate system of glyphs.

The sixteenth-century Quiché were well acquainted with “council books,” some dating from the classic period of Maya culture (100–900 C.E.), which saw the rise of such imposing centers as Tikal, Copán, and Palenque. By the time of European contact those important sites, abandoned in the mysterious collapse of Maya civilization ca. 900 C.E., lay in ruins. But Maya learning survived in southern Guatemala among the Quiché and their neighbors, and in the northern part of the Yucatán peninsula. Mayanists conclude that although the Popol Vuh is not an actual transcription of ancient screen-folds, it no doubt borrows from them. The modern text survives thanks to a copy made by a Dominican friar in the early eighteenth century, but it may have lost accompanying illustrations or hieroglyphs, which were standard for Mayan writings.

Stylistically, the text is fascinated by numbers, as evidenced in the pairing, tripling, and quadrupling of phrases. Major characters and deities also are paired, occasionally tripled, with a strong suggestion that they are the same. The work has a repeating structure, fitted to a traditional pattern of four successive worlds, or creations: the first three are said to have ended in failure; our own is the fourth. Yet against the background of this formal pattern, the hero-gods appear as light-hearted boys, even as tricksters. Their adventures, which are sometimes quite bawdy, have a playful, anecdotal quality.

As the author plainly states in the preamble that begins part 1, “We shall write about this now amid the preaching of God, in Christendom now.” Admittedly, then, the Popol Vuh is written after the conquest, but the question of how much of it was influenced by Christian missionaries is not easy to settle. Most critics have assumed that the account of the Earth’s creation that immediately follows the preamble owes something to the Book of Genesis. If so, the material has been thoroughly assimilated to the Maya pantheon and to the Native American concept of primordial water. The text may be as easily compared to Aztec accounts of creation, in which the gods deliberate, then place the Earth on the surface of a preexisting sea, as to Genesis.

Part 1 continues with a description of the first three efforts at creating humans, in line with a widespread pattern shared by Aztec and other Mesoamerican traditions. As part 1 ends, the narrative moves on to the exploits of the divine heroes Hunahpu and Xbalanque. The work of these two heroes may be said to prepare the world for society and for the well-being of individuals within society when they bring low the overproud Seven Macaw, while part 3, the most celebrated portion of the Popol Vuh, confronts the scourge of death.

In the cycle of tales that comprises part 3, Hunahpu and Xbalanque vanquish the lords of the Maya underworld, called Xibalba (a term of obscure etymology, provisionally translated “place of fright”). This material is quintessentially Mayan: scenes from the story are preserved on painted vases of the classic period, recovered by archaeologists from Maya burial chambers. The story told here must have aided the Maya in their journey through the realms of death somewhat as the Book of the Dead comforted the ancient Egyptians. Parts 4 and 5 complete the vast epic, relating the connected stories of the origin of humans, the discovery of corn, the birth of the sun, and the history of the Quiché tribes and their royal lineages down to the time of the Spanish Conquest and, subsequently, to the 1550s.

Old as the stories are, they are also new. Narratives of the origin and destruction of early humans can still be heard in traditional Maya storytelling sessions. The tale of the discovery of corn continues to be widely told; and the exploits of the trickster Zipacna and the hero twins also persist in shorter versions. Beyond the native community, knowledge of the Popol Vuh among Central Americans is not only widespread but taken for granted. For the Salvadoran novelist Manlio Argueta (Cuzcatlán, 1986) the story of the origin of humans from corn as told in the Popol Vuh is a reminder, in Argueta’s words, that “the species will not perish.” The theme appears also in the 1949 novel Men of Maize by the Guatemalan Nobel laureate Miguel Ángel Asturias, inspired by the same source.

In the translation printed here, wherever the text solidifies into a string of three or more couplets, the passage is set apart as though it were a poem. This is a device of the translator. It is not meant to imply that the lines were chanted but rather to show off the more pronounced moments of formalism in a prose that borders on oratory.

Popol Vuh<sup>1</sup>

FROM PART I

[Prologue, Creation]

THIS IS THE BEGINNING OF THE ANCIENT WORD, here in this place called Quiché. Here we shall inscribe, we shall implant the Ancient Word, the potential and source for everything done in the citadel of Quiché, in the nation of Quiché people.

And here we shall take up the demonstration, revelation, and account of how things were put in shadow and brought to light by the Maker, Modeler, named Bearer, Begetter, Hunahpu Possum, Hunahpu Coyote, Great White Peccary,

Sovereign Plumed Serpent,
Heart of the Lake, Heart of the Sea,
plate shaper,
bowl shaper,<sup>2</sup> as they are called,
also named, also described as the midwife, matchmaker named Xpiyacoc, Xmucane, defender, protector,<sup>3</sup> twice a midwife, twice a matchmaker, as is said in the words of Quiché. They accounted for everything—and did it, too—as enlightened beings, in enlightened words. We shall write about this now amid the preaching of God, in Christendom now. We shall bring it out because there is no longer a place to see it, a Council Book, a place to see “The Light That Came from Beside the Sea,”

the account of “Our Place in the Shadows,” a place to see “The Dawn of Life,” as it is called. There is the original book and ancient writing, but the one who reads and assesses it has a hidden identity.<sup>4</sup> It takes a long performance and account to complete the lighting of all the sky-earth:

the fourfold siding, fourfold cornering, measuring, fourfold staking, halving the cord, stretching the cord

1. Translated by Dennis Tedlock.

2. All thirteen names refer to the Creator or to a company of creators, a designation applicable clearly to the first four names and Sovereign Plumed Serpent. Heart of the Lake and Heart of the Sea also apply, since the creators will later be described as “in the water,” and somewhat obscurely, so does the last pair of names (plate and bowl may be read as “earth” and “sky,” respectively). Hunahpu Pos- sum, Hunahpu Coyote, Great White Peccary, and Coati refer specifically to the grandparents of the gods, usually called Xpiyacoc and Xmucane.

3. Four names for Xpiyacoc and Xmucane.

4. The hieroglyphic source (Council Book) was suppressed by missionaries; it was said to have been brought to Quiché in ancient times from the far side of a lagoon (Sea). The reader hides his identity to avoid the missionaries.

in the sky, on the earth, the four sides, the four corners,<sup>5</sup>
 by the Maker, Modeler, mother-father of life, of humankind,
 giver of breath, giver of heart, bearer, upbringer in the light that lasts of those born in the light, begotten in the light;
 worrier, knower of everything, whatever there is:
 sky-earth, lake-sea.

THIS IS THE ACCOUNT, here it is:

Now it still ripples, now it still murmurs, ripples, it still sighs, still hums, and it is empty under the sky.

Here follow the first words, the first eloquence:

There is not yet one person, one animal, bird, fish, crab, tree, rock, hollow, canyon, meadow, forest. Only the sky alone is there; the face of the earth is not clear. Only the sea alone is pooled under all the sky; there is nothing whatever gathered together. It is at rest; not a single thing stirs. It is held back, kept at rest under the sky.

Whatever there is that might be is simply not there: only the pooled water, only the calm sea, only it alone is pooled.

Whatever might be is simply not there: only murmurs, ripples, in the dark, in the night. Only the Maker, Modeler alone, Sovereign Plumed Serpent, the Bearers, Begetters are in the water, a glittering light. They are there, they are enclosed in quetzal feathers, in blue-green.

Thus the name, "Plumed Serpent." They are great knowers, great thinkers in their very being.

And of course there is the sky, and there is also the Heart of Sky. This is the name of the god, as it is spoken.

And then came his word, he came here to the Sovereign Plumed Serpent, here in the blackness, in the early dawn. He spoke with the Sovereign Plumed Serpent, and they talked, then they thought, then they worried. They agreed with each other, they joined their words, their thoughts. Then it was clear, then they reached accord in the light, and then humanity was clear, when they conceived the growth, the generation of trees, of bushes, and the growth of life, of humankind, in the blackness, in the early dawn, all because of the Heart of Sky, named Hurricane. Thunderbolt Hurricane comes first, the second is Newborn Thunderbolt, and the third is Sudden Thunderbolt.<sup>6</sup>

So there were three of them, as Heart of Sky, who came to the Sovereign Plumed Serpent, when the dawn of life was conceived:

"How should the sowing be, and the dawning? Who is to be the provider, nurturer?"<sup>7</sup>

"Let it be this way, think about it: this water should be removed, emptied out for the formation of the earth's own plate and platform, then should come the

5. As though a farmer were measuring and staking a cornfield.

6. Alternate names for Heart of Sky, the deity who cooperates with Sovereign Plumed Serpent. The triple naming adapts the Christian trinity to native theology, perhaps more in the spirit of defiant preemption than of conciliation.

7. That is, humanity, which alone is capable of nurturing the gods with sacrifices.

sowing, the dawning of the sky-earth. But there will be no high days and no bright praise for our work, our design, until the rise of the human work, the human design," they said.

And then the earth arose because of them, it was simply their word that brought it forth. For the forming of the earth they said "Earth." It arose suddenly, just like a cloud, like a mist, now forming, unfolding. Then the mountains were separated from the water, all at once the great mountains came forth. By their genius alone, by their cutting edge<sup>8</sup> alone they carried out the conception of the mountain-plain, whose face grew instant groves of cypress and pine.

And the Plumed Serpent was pleased with this:

"It was good that you came, Heart of Sky, Hurricane, and Newborn Thunderbolt, Sudden Thunderbolt. Our work, our design will turn out well," they said.

And the earth was formed first, the mountain-plain. The channels of water were separated; their branches wound their ways among the mountains. The waters were divided when the great mountains appeared.

Such was the formation of the earth when it was brought forth by the Heart of Sky, Heart of Earth, as they are called, since they were the first to think of it. The sky was set apart, and the earth was set apart in the midst of the waters.

Such was their plan when they thought, when they worried about the completion of their work.<sup>9</sup>

FROM PART 2

[The Twins Defeat Seven Macaw]

HERE IS THE BEGINNING OF THE DEFEAT AND DESTRUCTION OF THE DAY OF SEVEN MACAW by the two boys, the first named Hunahpu and the second named Xbalanque.<sup>1</sup> Being gods, the two of them saw evil in his attempt at self-magnification before the Heart of Sky.

* * *

This is the great tree of Seven Macaw, a nance,<sup>2</sup> and this is the food of Seven Macaw. In order to eat the fruit of the nance he goes up the tree every day. Since Hunahpu and Xbalanque have seen where he feeds, they are now hiding beneath the tree of Seven Macaw, they are keeping quiet here, the two boys are in the leaves of the tree.

And when Seven Macaw arrived, perching over his meal, the nance, it was then that he was shot by Hunahpu. The blowgun shot went right to his jaw, breaking his mouth. Then he went up over the tree and fell flat on the ground. Suddenly Hunahpu appeared, running. He set out to grab him, but actually it was the arm

8. ...Refers to the cutting of flesh with a knife.... In the present context, it implies that "the mountains were separated from the water" through an act resembling the extraction of the heart (or other organs) from a sacrifice [translator's note].

9. That is, the creation of humans; an account of the first three, unsuccessful, attempts at creating humans occupies the remainder of part 1.

1. First mention of the twin hero gods (their origin is recounted in part 3). Here they confront the false god Seven Macaw, who has arisen during the time of primordial darkness, boasting, "My eyes are of metal; my teeth just glitter with jewels, and turquoise as well.... I am like the sun and the moon." Note that all the characters in parts 1, 2, and 3 are supernatural; humans are not created until part 4.

2. A pickle tree (Byrsonima crassifolia).

of Hunahpu that was seized by Seven Macaw. He yanked it straight back, he bent it back at the shoulder. Then Seven Macaw tore it right out of Hunahpu. Even so, the boys did well: the first round was not their defeat by Seven Macaw.

And when Seven Macaw had taken the arm of Hunahpu, he went home. Holding his jaw very carefully, he arrived:

“What have you got there?” said Chimalmat, the wife of Seven Macaw.

“What is it but those two tricksters! They’ve shot me, they’ve dislocated my jaw.<sup>3</sup> All my teeth are just loose, now they ache. But once what I’ve got is over the fire—hanging there, dangling over the fire—then they can just come and get it. They’re real tricksters!” said Seven Macaw, then he hung up the arm of Hunahpu.

Meanwhile Hunahpu and Xbalanque were thinking. And then they invoked a grandfather, a truly white-haired grandfather, and a grandmother, a truly humble grandmother—just bent-over, elderly people. Great White Peccary is the name of the grandfather, and Great White Coati is the name of the grandmother.<sup>4</sup> The boys said to the grandmother and grandfather:

“Please travel with us when we go to get our arm from Seven Macaw; we’ll just follow right behind you. You’ll tell him:

‘Do forgive us our grandchildren, who travel with us. Their mother and father are dead, and so they follow along there, behind us. Perhaps we should give them away, since all we do is pull worms out of teeth.’ So we’ll seem like children to Seven Macaw, even though we’re giving you the instructions,” the two boys told them.

“Very well,” they replied.

After that they approached the place where Seven Macaw was in front of his home. When the grandmother and grandfather passed by, the two boys were romping along behind them. When they passed below the lord’s house, Seven Macaw was yelling his mouth off because of his teeth. And when Seven Macaw saw the grandfather and grandmother traveling with them:

“Where are you headed, our grandfather?” said the lord.

“We’re just making our living, your lordship,” they replied.

“Why are you working for a living? Aren’t those your children traveling with you?”

“No, they’re not, your lordship. They’re our grandchildren, our descendants, but it is nevertheless we who take pity on them. The bit of food they get is the portion we give them, your lordship,” replied the grandmother and grandfather. Since the lord is getting done in by the pain in his teeth, it is only with great effort that he speaks again:

“I implore you, please take pity on me! What sweets can you make, what poisons<sup>5</sup> can you cure?” said the lord.

“We just pull the worms out of teeth, and we just cure eyes. We just set bones, your lordship,” they replied.

“Very well, please cure my teeth. They really ache, every day. It’s insufferable! I get no sleep because of them—and my eyes. They just shot me, those two tricksters! Ever since it started I haven’t eaten because of it. Therefore take pity on me! Perhaps it’s because my teeth are loose now.”

3. This is the origin of the way a macaw’s beak looks, with a huge upper mandible and a small, retreating lower one [translator’s note].

4. Animal names of the divine grandparents,

Xpiyacoc and Xmucane, who are also the twins’ genealogical grandparents.

5. Play on words as qui is translated as both “sweet” and “poison.”

"Very well, your lordship. It's a worm, gnawing at the bone.<sup>6</sup> It's merely a matter of putting in a replacement and taking the teeth out, sir."

"But perhaps it's not good for my teeth to come out—since I am, after all, a lord. My finery is in my teeth—and my eyes."

"But then we'll put in a replacement. Ground bone will be put back in." And this is the "ground bone": it's only white corn.

"Very well. Yank them out! Give me some help here!" he replied.

And when the teeth of Seven Macaw came out, it was only white corn that went in as a replacement for his teeth—just a coating shining white, that corn in his mouth. His face fell at once, he no longer looked like a lord. The last of his teeth came out, the jewels that had stood out blue from his mouth.

And when the eyes of Seven Macaw were cured, he was plucked around the eyes, the last of his metal came off.<sup>7</sup> Still he felt no pain; he just looked on while the last of his greatness left him. It was just as Hunahpu and Xbalanque had intended.

And when Seven Macaw died, Hunahpu got back his arm. And Chimalmat, the wife of Seven Macaw, also died.

Such was the loss of the riches of Seven Macaw: only the doctors got the jewels and gems that had made him arrogant, here on the face of the earth. The genius of the grandmother, the genius of the grandfather did its work when they took back their arm: it was implanted and the break got well again. Just as they had wished the death of Seven Macaw, so they brought it about. They had seen evil in his self-magnification.

After this the two boys went on again. What they did was simply the word of the Heart of Sky.

FROM PART 3

[Victory over the Underworld]

AND NOW WE SHALL NAME THE NAME OF THE FATHER OF HUNAHPU AND XBALANQUE. Let's drink to him, and let's just drink to the telling and accounting of the begetting of Hunahpu and Xbalanque. We shall tell just half of it, just a part of the account of their father. Here follows the account.

These are the names: One Hunahpu and Seven Hunahpu,<sup>8</sup> as they are called.

* * *

AND ONE AND SEVEN HUNAHPU WENT INSIDE DARK HOUSE.<sup>9</sup>

And then their torch was brought, only one torch, already lit, sent by One and Seven Death, along with a cigar for each of them, also already lit, sent by the lords. When these were brought to One and Seven Hunahpu they were

6. The present-day Quiché retain the notion that a toothache is caused by a worm gnawing at the bone [translator's note].

7. This is clearly meant to be the origin of the large white and completely featherless eye patches and very small eyes of the scarlet macaw [translator's note].

8. Twin sons of Xpiyacoc and Xmucane; the elder of these twins, One Hunahpu, will become the father of Hunahpu and Xbalanque. "As for Seven Hunahpu," according to the text, "he has no wife. He's just a partner and just secondary; he just remains a boy."

9. The first of the "test" houses in Xibalba (the underworld) to which One and Seven Hunahpu, avid ballplayers, have been lured by the underworld lords, One and Seven Death; the lords have promised them a challenging ball game. The Mesoamerican ball game, remotely comparable to both basketball and soccer, was played on a rectangular court, using a ball of native rubber.

cowering, here in the dark. When the bearer of their torch and cigars arrived, the torch was bright as it entered; their torch and both of their cigars were burning. The bearer spoke:

“They must be sure to return them in the morning—not finished, but just as they look now. They must return them intact,’ the lords say to you,” they were told, and they were defeated. They finished the torch and they finished the cigars that had been brought to them.

And Xibalba is packed with tests, heaps and piles of tests.

This is the first one: the Dark House, with darkness alone inside.

And the second is named Rattling House, heavy with cold inside, whistling with drafts, clattering with hail. A deep chill comes inside here.

And the third is named Jaguar House, with jaguars alone inside, jostling one another, crowding together, with gnashing teeth. They’re scratching around; these jaguars are shut inside the house.

Bat House is the name of the fourth test, with bats alone inside the house, squeaking, shrieking, darting through the house. The bats are shut inside; they can’t get out.

And the fifth is named Razor House, with blades alone inside. The blades are moving back and forth, ripping, slashing through the house.

These are the first tests of Xibalba, but One and Seven Hunahpu never entered into them, except for the one named earlier, the specified test house.

And when One and Seven Hunahpu went back before One and Seven Death, they were asked:

“Where are my cigars? What of my torch? They were brought to you last night!”

“We finished them, your lordship.”

“Very well. This very day, your day is finished, you will die, you will disappear, and we shall break you off. Here you will hide your faces: you are to be sacrificed!” said One and Seven Death.

And then they were sacrificed and buried. They were buried at the Place of Ball Game Sacrifice,<sup>1</sup> as it is called. The head of One Hunahpu was cut off; only his body was buried with his younger brother.

“Put his head in the fork of the tree that stands by the road,” said One and Seven Death.

And when his head was put in the fork of the tree, the tree bore fruit. It would not have had any fruit, had not the head of One Hunahpu been put in the fork of the tree.

This is the calabash tree, as we call it today, or “the skull of One Hunahpu,” as it is said.

And then One and Seven Death were amazed at the fruit of the tree. The fruit grows out everywhere, and it isn’t clear where the head of One Hunahpu is; now it looks just the way the calabashes look. All the Xibalbans see this, when they come to look.

The state of the tree loomed large in their thoughts, because it came about at the same time the head of One Hunahpu was put in the fork. The Xibalbans said among themselves:

1. Probably not a place name, but rather a name for the altar where losing ball players were sacrificed [translator’s note].

“No one is to pick the fruit, nor is anyone to go beneath the tree,” they said. They restricted themselves; all of Xibalba held back.

It isn’t clear which is the head of One Hunahpu; now it’s exactly the same as the fruit of the tree. Calabash came to be its name, and much was said about it. A maiden heard about it, and here we shall tell of her arrival.

AND HERE IS THE ACCOUNT OF A MAIDEN, the daughter of a lord named Blood Gatherer.<sup>2</sup>

And this is when a maiden heard of it, the daughter of a lord. Blood Gatherer is the name of her father, and Blood Moon is the name of the maiden.

And when he heard the account of the fruit of the tree, her father retold it. And she was amazed at the account:

“I’m not acquainted with that tree they talk about. “‘Its fruit is truly sweet!’” they say,’ I hear,” she said.

Next, she went all alone and arrived where the tree stood. It stood at the Place of Ball Game Sacrifice:

“What? Well! What’s the fruit of this tree? Shouldn’t this tree bear something sweet? They shouldn’t die, they shouldn’t be wasted. Should I pick one?” said the maiden.

And then the bone spoke; it was here in the fork of the tree:

“Why do you want a mere bone, a round thing in the branches of a tree?” said the head of One Hunahpu when it spoke to the maiden. “You don’t want it,” she was told.

“I do want it,” said the maiden.

“Very well. Stretch out your right hand here, so I can see it,” said the bone.

“Yes,” said the maiden. She stretched out her right hand, up there in front of the bone.

And then the bone spit out its saliva, which landed squarely in the hand of the maiden.

And then she looked in her hand, she inspected it right away, but the bone’s saliva wasn’t in her hand.

“It is just a sign I have given you, my saliva, my spittle. This, my head, has nothing on it—just bone, nothing of meat. It’s just the same with the head of a great lord: it’s just the flesh that makes his face look good. And when he dies, people get frightened by his bones. After that, his son is like his saliva, his spittle, in his being, whether it be the son of a lord or the son of a craftsman, an orator. The father does not disappear, but goes on being fulfilled. Neither dimmed nor destroyed is the face of a lord, a warrior, craftsman, orator. Rather, he will leave his daughters and sons. So it is that I have done likewise through you. Now go up there on the face of the earth; you will not die. Keep the word. So be it,” said the head of One and Seven Hunahpu—they were of one mind when they did it.

This was the word Hurricane, Newborn Thunderbolt, Sudden Thunderbolt had given them. In the same way, by the time the maiden returned to her home, she had been given many instructions. Right away something was generated in her belly, from the saliva alone, and this was the generation of Hunahpu and Xbalanque.

2. Fourth-ranking lord of Xibalba, whose commission is to draw blood from people.

And when the maiden got home and six months had passed, she was found out by her father. Blood Gatherer is the name of her father.

* * *

AND THEY CAME TO THE LORDS.<sup>3</sup> Feigning great humility, they bowed their heads all the way to the ground when they arrived. They brought themselves low, doubled over, flattened out, down to the rags, to the tatters. They really looked like vagabonds when they arrived.

So then they were asked what their mountain<sup>4</sup> and tribe were, and they were also asked about their mother and father:

"Where do you come from?" they were asked.

"We've never known, lord. We don't know the identity of our mother and father. We must've been small when they died," was all they said. They didn't give any names.

"Very well. Please entertain us, then. What do you want us to give you in payment?" they were asked.

"Well, we don't want anything. To tell the truth, we're afraid," they told the lord.

"Don't be afraid. Don't be ashamed. Just dance this way: first you'll dance to sacrifice yourselves, you'll set fire to my house after that, you'll act out all the things you know. We want to be entertained. This is our heart's desire, the reason you had to be sent for, dear vagabonds. We'll give you payment," they were told.

So then they began their songs and dances, and then all the Xibalbans arrived, the spectators crowded the floor, and they danced everything; they danced the Weasel, they danced the Poorwill,<sup>5</sup> they danced the Armadillo. Then the lord said to them:

"Sacrifice my dog, then bring him back to life again," they were told.

"Yes," they said.

When they sacrificed the dog
he then came back to life.
And that dog was really happy
when he came back to life.
Back and forth he wagged his tail
when he came back to life.

And the lord said to them:

"Well, you have yet to set my home on fire," they were told next, so then they set fire to the home of the lord. The house was packed with all the lords, but they were not burned. They quickly fixed it back again, lest the house of One Death be consumed all at once, and all the lords were amazed, and they went on dancing this way. They were overjoyed.

And then they were asked by the lord:

"You have yet to kill a person! Make a sacrifice without death!" they were told.

"Very well," they said.

And then they took hold of a human sacrifice.

3. Forced to flee the underworld the maiden (Blood Moon) finds refuge on earth with Xmucane. There she gives birth to the twins, who, like their father and uncle, become ballplayers and are enticed to the underworld. Surviving the Dark House and other tests, they disguise themselves as vagabonds and earn a reputation as clever entertainers among the denizens of Xibalba; as such they are summoned to entertain the high lords.

4. A metonym for almost any settlement, but especially a fortified town or citadel, located on a defensible elevation [translator's note].

5. The goatsucker. The dances apparently were imitations of these animals and birds.

And they held up a human heart on high.
And they showed its roundness to the lords.

And now One and Seven Death admired it, and now that person was brought right back to life. His heart was overjoyed when he came back to life, and the lords were amazed:

“Sacrifice yet again, even do it to yourselves! Let’s see it! At heart, that’s the dance we really want from you,” the lords said now.

“Very well, lord,” they replied, and then they sacrificed themselves.

AND THIS IS THE SACRIFICE OF HUNAHPU BY XBALANQUE. One by one his legs, his arms were spread wide. His head came off, rolled far away outside. His heart, dug out, was smothered in a leaf,<sup>6</sup> and all the Xibalbans went crazy at the sight.

So now, only one of them was dancing there: Xbalanque.

“Get up!” he said, and Hunahpu came back to life. The two of them were overjoyed at this—and likewise the lords rejoiced, as if they were doing it themselves. One and Seven Death were as glad at heart as if they themselves were actually doing the dance.

And then the hearts of the lords were filled with longing, with yearning for the dance of little Hunahpu and Xbalanque, so then came these words from One and Seven Death:

“Do it to us! Sacrifice us!” they said. “Sacrifice both of us!” said One and Seven Death to Hunahpu and Xbalanque.

“Very well. You ought to come back to life. What is death to you?<sup>7</sup> And aren’t we making you happy, along with the vassals of your domain?” they told the lords.

And this one was the first to be sacrificed: the lord at the very top, the one whose name is One Death, the ruler of Xibalba.

And with One Death dead, the next to be taken was Seven Death. They did not come back to life.

And then the Xibalbans were getting up to leave, those who had seen the lords die. They underwent heart sacrifice there, and the heart sacrifice was performed on the two lords only for the purpose of destroying them.

As soon as they had killed the one lord without bringing him back to life, the other lord had been meek and tearful before the dancers. He didn’t consent, he didn’t accept it:

“Take pity on me!” he said when he realized. All their vassals took the road to the great canyon, in one single mass they filled up the deep abyss. So they piled up there and gathered together, countless ants, tumbling down into the canyon, as if they were being herded there. And when they arrived, they all bent low in surrender, they arrived meek and tearful.

Such was the defeat of the rulers of Xibalba. The boys accomplished it only through wonders, only through self-transformation.

* * *

Such was the beginning of their disappearance and the denial of their worship.

6. As a tamale is wrapped. In the typical Mesoamerican heart sacrifice, the victim’s arms and legs were stretched wide and the heart was excised and offered to a deity.

7. Evident sarcasm.

Their ancient day was not a great one,
 these ancient people only wanted conflict,
 their ancient names are not really divine,
 but fearful is the ancient evil of their faces.

They are makers of enemies, users of owls,<sup>8</sup>
 they are inciters to wrongs and violence, they are masters of hidden intentions as well,
 they are black and white,<sup>9</sup> masters of stupidity, masters of perplexity, as it is said. By putting on appearances they cause dismay.

Such was the loss of their greatness and brilliance. Their domain did not return to greatness. This was accomplished by little Hunahpu and Xbalanque.

FROM PART 4

[Origin of Humanity, First Dawn]

AND HERE IS THE BEGINNING OF THE CONCEPTION OF HUMANS, and of the search for the ingredients of the human body. So they spoke, the Bearer, Begetter, the Makers, Modelers named Sovereign Plumed Serpent:

“The dawn has approached, preparations have been made, and morning has come for the provider, nurturer, born in the light, begotten in the light. Morning has come for humankind, for the people of the face of the earth,” they said. It all came together as they went on thinking in the darkness, in the night, as they searched and they sifted, they thought and they wondered.

And here their thoughts came out in clear light. They sought and discovered what was needed for human flesh. It was only a short while before the sun, moon, and stars were to appear above the Makers and Modelers. Split Place, Bitter Water Place is the name: the yellow corn, white corn came from there.

And these are the names of the animals who brought the food: fox, coyote, parrot, crow. There were four animals who brought the news of the ears of yellow corn and white corn. They were coming from over there at Split Place, they showed the way to the split.<sup>1</sup>

And this was when they found the staple foods.

And these were the ingredients for the flesh of the human work, the human design, and the water was for the blood. It became human blood, and corn was also used by the Bearer, Begetter.

And so they were happy over the provisions of the good mountain, filled with sweet things, thick with yellow corn, white corn, and thick with pataxte and cacao, countless zapotes, anonas, jocotes, nances, matasanos,<sup>2</sup> sweets—the rich foods filling up the citadel named Split Place, Bitter Water Place. All the edible fruits were there: small staples, great staples, small plants, great plants. The way was shown by the animals.

8. The lords had used owls as messengers to lure the ballplayers to Xibalba.

9. Contradictory, duplicitous.

1. In the widespread Mesoamerican story of the discovery of corn, one or more animals reveal that corn and other foods are hidden within a rock or a mountain, accessible through a cleft; in some versions the mountain is split apart by lightning.

2. Quincelike fruits of the tree Casimiroa edulis. Pataxte (Theobroma bicolor) is a species of cacao that is inferior to cacao proper (T. cacao). Zapotes are fruits of the sapota tree (Lucuma mammosa). Anonas are custard apples (genus Anona). Jocotes are yellow plumlike fruits of the tree Spondias purpurea.

And then the yellow corn and white corn were ground, and Xmucane did the grinding nine times. Corn was used, along with the water she rinsed her hands with, for the creation of grease; it became human fat when it was worked by the Bearer, Begetter, Sovereign Plumed Serpent, as they are called.

After that, they put it into words:

the making, the modeling of our first mother-father,
with yellow corn, white corn alone for the flesh,
food alone for the human legs and arms,
for our first fathers, the four human works.

It was staples alone that made up their flesh.

THESE ARE THE NAMES OF THE FIRST PEOPLE WHO WERE MADE AND MODELED.

This is the first person: Jaguar Quitze.
And now the second: Jaguar Night.
And now the third: Not Right Now.
And the fourth: Dark Jaguar.<sup>3</sup>

And these are the names of our first mother-fathers.<sup>4</sup> They were simply made and modeled, it is said; they had no mother and no father. We have named the men by themselves. No woman gave birth to them, nor were they begotten by the builder, sculptor, Bearer, Begetter. By sacrifice alone, by genius alone they were made, they were modeled by the Maker, Modeler, Bearer, Begetter, Sovereign Plumed Serpent. And when they came to fruition, they came out human:

They talked and they made words.
They looked and they listened.
They walked, they worked.

They were good people, handsome, with looks of the male kind. Thoughts came into existence and they gazed; their vision came all at once. Perfectly they saw, perfectly they knew everything under the sky, whenever they looked. The moment they turned around and looked around in the sky, on the earth, everything was seen without any obstruction. They didn't have to walk around before they could see what was under the sky; they just stayed where they were.

As they looked, their knowledge became intense. Their sight passed through trees, through rocks, through lakes, through seas, through mountains, through plains. Jaguar Quitze, Jaguar Night, Not Right Now, and Dark Jaguar were truly gifted people.

And then they were asked by the builder and mason:

"What do you know about your being? Don't you look, don't you listen? Isn't your speech good, and your walk? So you must look, to see out under the sky. Don't you see the mountain-plain clearly? So try it," they were told.

And then they saw everything under the sky perfectly. After that, they thanked the Maker, Modeler:

"Truly now,
double thanks, triple thanks that we've been formed, we've been given our mouths, our faces,

3. The four original Quiché males.

4. That is, parents, although only the first three founded lineages; Dark Jaguar had no son.

we speak, we listen,
 we wonder, we move,
 our knowledge is good, we've understood what is far and near,
 and we've seen what is great and small
 under the sky, on the earth.
 Thanks to you we've been formed,
 we've come to be made and modeled,
 our grandmother, our grandfather,"

they said when they gave thanks for having been made and modeled. They understood everything perfectly, they sighted the four sides, the four corners in the sky, on the earth, and this didn't sound good to the builder and sculptor:

"What our works and designs have said is no good:

'We have understood everything, great and small,' they say." And so the Bearer, Begetter took back their knowledge:

"What should we do with them now? Their vision should at least reach nearby, they should see at least a small part of the face of the earth, but what they're saying isn't good. Aren't they merely 'works' and 'designs' in their very names? Yet they'll become as great as gods, unless they procreate, proliferate at the sowing, the dawning, unless they increase."

"Let it be this way: now we'll take them apart just a little, that's what we need. What we've found out isn't good. Their deeds would become equal to ours, just because their knowledge reaches so far. They see everything," so said the Heart of Sky, Hurricane, Newborn Thunderbolt, Sudden Thunderbolt,

 Sovereign Plumed Serpent,
 Bearer, Begetter,
 Xpiyacoc, Xmucane,
 Maker, Modeler,

as they are called. And when they changed the nature of their works, their designs, it was enough that the eyes be marred by the Heart of Sky. They were blinded as the face of a mirror is breathed upon. Their vision flickered. Now it was only from close up that they could see what was there with any clarity.

And such was the loss of the means of understanding, along with the means of knowing everything, by the four humans. The root was implanted.

And such was the making, modeling of our first grandfather, our father, by the Heart of Sky, Heart of Earth.

AND THEN THEIR WIVES AND WOMEN CAME INTO BEING. Again, the same gods thought of it. It was as if they were asleep when they received them, truly beautiful women were there with Jaguar Quitze, Jaguar Night, Not Right Now, and Dark Jaguar. With their women there they really came alive. Right away they were happy at heart again, because of their wives.

Red Sea Turtle is the name of the wife of Jaguar Quitze.

Prawn House is the name of the wife of Jaguar Night.

Water Hummingbird is the name of the wife of Not Right Now.

Macaw House is the name of the wife of Dark Jaguar.

So these are the names of their wives, who became ladies of rank, giving birth to the people of the tribes, small and great.

* * *

AND HERE IS THE DAWNING AND SHOWING OF THE SUN, MOON, AND STARS. And Jaguar Quitze, Jaguar Night, Not Right Now, and Dark Jaguar were overjoyed when they saw the sun carrier.<sup>5</sup> It came up first. It looked brilliant when it came up, since it was ahead of the sun.

After that they unwrapped their copal<sup>6</sup> incense, which came from the east, and there was triumph in their hearts when they unwrapped it. They gave their heartfelt thanks with three kinds at once:

Mixtam Copal is the name of the copal brought by Jaguar Quitze.

Cauiztan Copal, next, is the name of the copal brought by Jaguar Night.

Godly Copal, as the next one is called, was brought by Not Right Now.

The three of them had their copal, and this is what they burned as they incensed the direction of the rising sun. They were crying sweetly as they shook their burning copal,<sup>7</sup> the precious copal.

After that they cried because they had yet to see and yet to witness the birth of the sun.

And then, when the sun came up, the animals, small and great, were happy. They all came up from the rivers and canyons; they waited on all the mountain peaks. Together they looked toward the place where the sun came out.

So then the puma and jaguar cried out, but the first to cry out was a bird, the parrot by name. All the animals were truly happy. The eagle, the white vulture, small birds, great birds spread their wings, and the penitents and sacrificers knelt down.

FROM PART 5

[Prayer for Future Generations]

AND THIS IS THE CRY OF THEIR HEARTS, HERE IT IS:

“Wait! On this blessed day, thou Hurricane, thou Heart of the Sky-Earth, thou giver of ripeness and freshness,
 and thou giver of daughters and sons, spread thy stain, spill thy drops of green and yellow;<sup>8</sup> give life and beginning to those I bear and beget, that they might multiply and grow, nurturing and providing for thee,
 calling to thee along the roads and paths,
 on rivers, in canyons,
 beneath the trees and bushes;
 give them their daughters and sons.

“May there be no blame, obstacle, want or misery;
 let no deceiver come behind or before them,
 may they neither be snared nor wounded,
 nor seduced, nor burned,

5. The morning star.

6. Resin used as incense.

7. Note that the Mesoamerican pottery censers must be shaken or swayed back and forth to keep the incense burning.

8. The imagery, denoting human offspring, alludes to semen and plant growth.

nor diverted below the road nor above it;
 may they neither fall over backward nor stumble;
 keep them on the Green Road, the Green Path.

“May there be no blame or barrier for them through any secrets or sorcery of thine;
 may thy nurturers and providers be good before thy mouth and thy face, thou, Heart of Sky; thou, Heart of Earth;
 thou, Bundle of Flames;<sup>9</sup> and thou, Tohil, Auilix, Hacauitz,<sup>1</sup>
 under the sky, on the earth,
 the four sides, the four corners;
 may there be only light, only continuity within,
 before thy mouth and thy face, thou god.”

9. A sacred relic left to the Quiché lords by Jaguar Quitze; like the sacred bundles of the North American peoples, a cloth-wrapped ark with mysterious contents [translator's note].

1. Patron deities of the Quiché lineages.

---

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

1564–1616

---

Hamlet portrays the doubts and fears of a conflicted prince whose dead father places on him the most burdensome of obligations: to avenge the king's murder by none other than his brother, Hamlet's uncle Claudius, who has married the recently widowed queen, Gertrude. Hamlet's personal tragedy is also that of Denmark, a state left rudderless by the domestic and familial conflicts of the play. Rich though it may be in plot, the most striking thing about Hamlet is its representation of the main character's interiority. Balancing the public and the private, Shakespeare gives the audience intimate access to the prince's mind, by transforming his thoughts into powerful dialogue and unprecedented soliloquies. Using older dramatic forms such as revenge tragedy, Shakespeare forged an entirely new type of play that depicts the inner doubts and hesitations of his quintessential protagonist.

LIFE AND TIMES

William Shakespeare was born in the rural community of Stratford-upon-Avon in Warwickshire. His father, John Shakespeare, was a glover and, when William was born, prominent in the town's government. Little is known of Shakespeare's early life, although it is likely that he received an education at the good local grammar school. He married Anne Hathaway, about seven years his senior, when he was eighteen. The couple had three children, Susanna (1583) and the twins Judith and Hamnet (1585).

Shakespeare lived in a period of great nationalist fervor. Under Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603, ruled 1558–1603), a successful and much beloved ruler, England solidified its sense of itself as a small but heroic Protestant nation valiantly resisting the encroachment of Spain and other enemies. In 1587, fearing a Catholic conspiracy, Elizabeth put to death her cousin, Mary Queen of Scots, who had sought refuge in England in 1568. Even after a powerful storm scattered the Spanish Armada, the fleet sent to invade England in 1588, the nation continued to fear Spanish invasion and Catholic plots against Elizabeth. The sense of a state under siege in Hamlet would thus have echoed powerfully for the English, just as they would have recognized the public tragedy of a nation undone by its rulers' outsized appetites for power. The play's reliance on the truth spoken by a ghost trapped in Purgatory—Catholic notions rejected by Protestantism—is also striking in a period that saw both the strong official repudiation of Catholicism and an enduring popular attachment to its rituals.

After a youth spent in the provinces, by 1592 Shakespeare had made his way to the burgeoning city of London. There he rapidly became the "greatest shake-scene" around, in the irritated words of a rival who envied Shakespeare's ability to impress audiences despite his lack of a university education. Shakespeare soon became a shareholder in a prominent players' company that claimed the Lord Chamberlain as patron and the tragic actor Richard Burbage and the comedian Will Kempe as members. Shakespeare's company originally performed at the theatre, north of the city of London, where its actor-owner, James Burbage, faced steady opposition from puritanical city officials who sought to close the theaters, which they considered to be hotbeds of immorality. Burbage conceived of a means to escape civic legislation against theatrical performances, and secretly moved the boards of his playhouse across the river Thames to the south bank; with these planks he constructed the Globe, the theater most often associated with Shakespeare's name.

The Globe was open to all social classes: anyone who wished could enter the theater by paying a penny, and at the cost of another, get a bench, cushion, and protection (in the boxes) from inclement weather. This mixing of social classes in his audience was echoed in Shakespeare's plays: rather than submitting to the stricter forms of classical drama, Shakespeare mixed comic routines with tragic soliloquies, the speech of common soldiers and bawds with the elegant language of the court. The Globe used almost no scenery and few stage props, so Shakespeare had to evoke the scene through language and deploy stage props sparingly. Only the costumes were lavish and constituted one of the most valuable possessions of the company. Shakespeare knew the theater inside out and his plays used its resources to the fullest, including sudden entrances and concealed eavesdroppers, brutal swordfights and touching love scenes, and witty asides and striking double entendres.

Although he began his career as a player, Shakespeare found his calling as a playwright and his fortune as a shareholder in his company. His financial successes enabled him to purchase the title of gentleman for his father, a purchase that made Shakespeare himself officially a "gentleman born," and a fine house in Stratford to which he eventually retired. Despite the unparalleled success of his plays, Shakespeare seems to have valued them only in performance, and never sought to have them printed. Early versions of the plays were often published in unauthorized versions, in some cases on the basis of actors' recollections of their lines. After Shakespeare's death in 1616, his friends published most of his plays in the collection we know as the “First Folio” (1623), the basis for most later editions.

HAMLET

Shakespeare’s plays constitute the most important body of dramatic work in the modern world, and no character in literature is more familiar to audiences around the globe than Hamlet. Beyond the impact of the protagonist, Hamlet has commanded a leading place in our literary heritage for juxtaposing political obligation and human limitations, idealized virtue and actual experience. Though it is a drama about characters of superior station and the conflicts and problems associated with men and women of high degree, it reveals these problems in a particular family, but presents the domestic conflict within the larger world of politics—like the plays of antiquity that deal with the Theban myth, such as Oedipus the King or Antigone. Shakespeare underscores the humanity and frailty of rulers, providing a window into their interiority, whether it be the portrayal of a villainous king in Richard III or of a frail and diminished one in King Lear. The vulnerability of Hamlet, the disproportion between the heroism demanded of him and the response he can muster, and his acute awareness of how he fails all make him a singularly compelling figure. Leavened with odd moments of black humor, the portrayal of Hamlet’s exquisitely self-conscious dilemma amid the increasingly dangerous and opaque machinations of his uncle’s court is gripping and casts doubt on dynastic rule itself.

Based on a medieval Scandinavian legend, Shakespeare’s play brings the figure of the hero who feigns madness much closer to his own time. In spite of the Danish locale and the relatively remote period of the action, the setting of Hamlet is plainly a Renaissance court.

There is a ruler holding power, and much of the action is related to questions concerning the nature of that power—the way in which he had acquired it and the ways in which it can be preserved. Around the king are several courtiers, among whom Hamlet, the heir apparent, is only the most prominent. The sense of outside dangers and internal disruption everywhere frames the personal story of Hamlet, of his revenge, and of Claudius’s crime. These individual stories are signs of a general societal breakdown. The play charts a kingdom and a society going to pieces, and the realization by its most privileged subjects that it has already crumbled. Lurking behind it all is a sense of the vanity of those forms of human endeavor and power of which the kingdom and the court are symbols.

The tone Shakespeare wants to establish is evident from the opening scenes: the night air is full of premonitions; sentinels turn their eyes toward the threatening outside world; meanwhile, the Ghost has already made his appearance, a sinister omen. The kingdom is presented in terms that are an almost point-by-point reversal of the ideal. Claudius, whether we believe the Ghost’s indictment or not (Hamlet does not necessarily, and some of his famous indecision has been attributed to his seeking evidence of the Ghost’s truthfulness before acting), has by marrying the queen committed an act that by Elizabethan standards is incestuous. There is an overwhelming sense of disintegration in the body of the state, evident in the first court assembly and in all subsequent ones. Instead of supporting the throne, the two most promising courtiers, Hamlet and Laertes, are restless presences, contemplating departure from a troubled scene.

Decadent and overwrought, the court is marked by semblance instead of substance. Thus Polonius, who after Hamlet is the major figure in the king’s retinue, is presented satirically in his empty formalities and conventional behavior. Often, as with the minor figure of Osric, manners are replaced by mannerisms. Courtly life as depicted in the play suggests always the hollow, the fractured, and the crooked. The traditional forms and institutions of gentle living and all the pomp and solemnity of the court are marred by corruption and distortion. Courtship and love are reduced to Hamlet's mockery of Ophelia, and all but undone by the punning undercurrents of bawdiness. In the famous play-within-the-play, the theater, a traditional institution of court life, is used by the hero as a device to expose the king's crime. There are elements of macabre caricature in Shakespeare's treatment of the solemn theme of death, as in the black comedy of Polonius's death, or the clownish talk of the gravediggers. Finally, the arms tournament, the typical occasion for the display of courtiers' gallantry in front of their king, is here turned by the scheming of the king himself into an almost farcical scene of carnage.

This sense of corruption and decadence dominates the temper of the play and situates Hamlet, his indecision, and his sense of vanity and disenchantment with the world in which he must live. In Hamlet the relationship between thought and deed, intent and realization, is confused, while all around him the norms and institutions that regulate a well-ordered court have been replaced by duplicity and dissimulation. He and the king are "mighty opposites," and it can be argued that against Hamlet's indecision and negativism the king presents a more positive scheme of action, at least in the purely Machiavellian sense, at the level of practical power politics. On various occasions the king shows a high and competent conception of his office: a culminating instance is the courageous and cunning way in which he confronts and handles

Laertes' wrath. Since his life is obviously threatened by Hamlet (who was seeking to kill him when by mistake he killed Polonius instead), one might argue that the king acts within a legitimate pattern of politics in wanting to have Hamlet liquidated. Yet this argument cannot be carried so far as to demonstrate that he represents a fully positive attitude toward life and the world, even in the strictly amoral terms of political technique. For in fact his action is corroded by the vexations of his own conscience. Despite his energy and his extrovert qualities, he too becomes part of the negative picture of disruption and lacks concentration of purpose. The images of decay and putrescence that characterize his court extend to his own speech: his "offense," in his own words, "smells to heaven."

Hamlet as a Renaissance tragedy presents a world particularly "out of joint," a world that, having long ago lost the sense of a grand timeless design that was so important in medieval times (to Hamlet the thought of the afterlife is even more puzzling and dark than that of this life), looks with an even greater sense of disenchantment at the temporal world symbolized by the kingdom and the court. They could have given individual action a purposeful meaning. Yet now their order has been destroyed, and ideals that once had power and freshness have lost their vigor under the impact of satiety, doubt, and melancholy.

Because communal values are so degraded, it is natural to ask in the end whether some alternative attempt at a settlement could be imagined, with Hamlet—like other Renaissance heroes—adopting an individual code of conduct, however extravagant. On the whole, Hamlet seems too steeped in his own hopelessness and in the courtly mechanism to which he inevitably belongs to be able to find personal intellectual and moral compromise or his own version of escape. Still, the tone of his brooding and often moralizing speech, his melancholy and dissatisfaction, his very desire for revenge imply a nostalgia for a world—associated with his father—of loyal allegiances and ideals of honor. Yet in Hamlet the political world turns out to offer no protection for the values—friendship, loyalty, and honesty—that Hamlet himself most cherishes. This is perhaps the reason why Hamlet has struck many later readers as a representative modern, someone forced to make his way in a world no longer ordered by traditional institutions.

The influence of Shakespeare's plays on the course of English literature is matched only by the King James translation of the Bible. In his time, Shakespeare garnered the interest of two British monarchs (Elizabeth I and James I), the love of popular audiences, and the respect of such tough critics as the poet and playwright Ben Jonson, who saw him as "the Soule of the Age" yet recognized that he was "Not of an age, but for all time!" Hamlet has always been one of Shakespeare's best loved and most widely produced plays. A tantalizing window into an inscrutable interiority, the play has fascinated thinkers and writers from Sigmund Freud, who offered it as an example of the Oedipal complex, to Tom Stoppard, who portrayed the absurdity of the minor characters with great humor in his Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead (1966).

Hamlet, Prince of Denmark

CHARACTERS

Claudius, KING of Denmark HAMLET, son to the late, and nephew to the present king
 POLONIUS, lord chamberlain
 HORATIO, friend to Hamlet
 LAERTES, son of Polonius PRIEST SERVANT
 MARCELLUS, } officers
 BERNARDO, }
 FRANCISCO, a soldier
 REYNALDO, servant to Polonius PLAYERS
 TWO CLOWNS, grave-diggers
 FORTINBRAS, prince of Norway
 CAPTAIN

VOLTIMAND, }
 CORNELIUS, } courtiers
 ROSENCRANTZ, }
 GUILDENSTERN, }
 OSRIC, } GENTLEMEN, }
 ENGLISH AMBASSADORS Gertrude, QUEEN of Denmark, and mother to Hamlet
 OPHELIA, daughter of Polonius LORDS, Ladies, Officers, Soldiers, SAIORS, MESSENGERS, and
     Other Attendants
 GHOST of Hamlet's father
 DANES

[SCENE: Denmark.]

Act I

SCENE I

[SCENE: Elsinore. A platform before the castle.]

[FRANCISCO at his post. Enter to him BERNARDO.]

BERNARDO Who's there?

FRANCISCO Nay, answer me: stand, and unfold yourself.

BERNARDO Long live the king!
 FRANCISCO Bernardo?
 BERNARDO He. 5
 FRANCISCO You come most carefully upon your hour.
 BERNARDO 'Tis now struck twelve; get thee to bed, Francisco.
 FRANCISCO For this relief much thanks: 'tis bitter cold,
 And I am sick at heart.
 BERNARDO Have you had quiet guard?
 FRANCISCO Not a mouse stirring. 10
 BERNARDO Well, good night.
 If you do meet Horatio and Marcellus,
 The rivals<sup>1</sup> of my watch, bid them make haste.
 FRANCISCO I think I hear them. Stand, ho! Who is there?
 [Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.]
 HORATIO Friends to this ground.
 MARCELLUS And liegemen to the Dane.<sup>2</sup> 15
 FRANCISCO Give you good night.
 MARCELLUS O, farewell, honest soldier:
 Who hath relieved you?
 FRANCISCO Bernardo hath my place.
 Give you good night.
 [Exit.]
 MARCELLUS Holla! Bernardo!
 BERNARDO Say,
 What, is Horatio there?
 HORATIO A piece of him.
 BERNARDO Welcome, Horatio; welcome, good Marcellus. 20
 MARCELLUS What, has this thing appeared again to-night?
 BERNARDO I have seen nothing.
 MARCELLUS Horatio says 'tis but our fantasy,
 And will not let belief take hold of him
 Touching this dreaded sight, twice seen of us: 25
 Therefore I have entreated him along
 With us to watch the minutes of this night,
 That if again this apparition come,
 He may approve our eyes<sup>3</sup> and speak to it.
 HORATIO Tush, tush, 'twill not appear.
 BERNARDO Sit down a while; 30
 And let us once again assail your ears,
 That are so fortified against our story,
 What we have two nights seen.
 HORATIO Well, sit we down,
 And let us hear Bernardo speak of this.
 BERNARDO Last night of all, 35
 When yond same star that's westward from the pole
 Had made his course to illume that part of heaven

1. Partners.

2. The king of Denmark.

3. Confirm what we saw.

Where now it burns, Marcellus and myself,
The bell then beating one,—

[Enter GHOST.]

MARCELLUS Peace, break thee off; look, where it comes again! 40

BERNARDO In the same figure, like the king that's dead.

MARCELLUS Thou art a scholar; speak to it, Horatio.

BERNARDO Looks it not like the king? mark it, Horatio.

HORATIO Most like it: it harrows me with fear and wonder.

BERNARDO It would be spoke to.

MARCELLUS Question it, Horatio. 45

HORATIO What art thou, that usurp'st this time of night,

Together with that fair and warlike form

In which the majesty of buried Denmark

Did sometimes<sup>4</sup> march? by heaven I charge thee, speak!

MARCELLUS It is offended.

BERNARDO See, it stalks away! 50

HORATIO Stay! speak, speak! I charge thee, speak!

[Exit GHOST.]

MARCELLUS 'Tis gone, and will not answer.

BERNARDO How now, Horatio! you tremble and look pale:

Is not this something more than fantasy?

What think you on 't? 55

HORATIO Before my God, I might not this believe

Without the sensible and true avouch

Of mine own eyes.

MARCELLUS Is it not like the king?

HORATIO As thou art to thyself:

Such was the very armor he had on 60

When he the ambitious Norway<sup>5</sup> combated;

So frown'd he once, when, in an angry parle,

He smote the sledded<sup>6</sup> Polacks on the ice.

'Tis strange.

MARCELLUS Thus twice before, and jump<sup>7</sup> at this dead hour, 65

With martial stalk hath he gone by our watch.

HORATIO In what particular thought to work I know not;

But, in the gross and scope of my opinion,<sup>8</sup>

This bodes some strange eruption to our state.

MARCELLUS Good now, sit down, and tell me, he that knows, 70

Why this same strict and most observant watch

So nightly toils the subject<sup>9</sup> of the land,

And why such daily cast of brazen cannon,

And foreign mart for implements of war;

Why such impress of shipwrights! whose sore task 75

Does not divide the Sunday from the week;

4. Formerly, "Denmark": the king of Denmark.

5. The king of Norway (the elder Fortinbras).

6. They travel in sledges. "Parle": parley.

7. Just.

8. Taking a general view.

9. The people.

1. Ship carpenters. "Mart": trading. "Impress": pressing into service.

Upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands,<sup>1</sup>
 Was sick almost to doomsday with eclipse: 120
 And even the like precurse<sup>2</sup> of fierce events,
 As harbingers preceding still the fates
 And prologue to the omen coming on,
 Have heaven and earth together demonstrated Unto our climatures<sup>3</sup> and countrymen. 125
 [Re-enter GHOST.]
 But soft, behold! lo, where it comes again!
 I'll cross it, though it blast me. Stay, illusion!
 If thou hast any sound, or use of voice,
 Speak to me:
 If there be any good thing to be done, 130
 That may to thee do ease and grace to me,
 Speak to me:
 If thou art privy to thy country's fate,
 Which, happily, foreknowing may avoid,
 O, speak! 135
 Or if thou hast uphoarded in thy life
 Extorted treasure in the womb of earth,
 For which, they say, you spirits oft walk in death,
 Speak of it: stay, and speak! [The cock crows.] Stop it, Marcellus.
 MARCELLUS Shall I strike at it with my partisan? 140
 HORATIO Do, if it will not stand.
 BERNARDO 'Tis here!
 HORATIO 'Tis here!
 [Exit GHOST.]
 MARCELLUS 'Tis gone!
 We do it wrong, being so majestic,
 To offer it the show of violence;
 For it is, as the air, invulnerable, 145
 And our vain blows malicious mockery.
 BERNARDO It was about to speak, when the cock crew.
 HORATIO And then it started like a guilty thing
 Upon a fearful summons. I have heard
 The cock, that is the trumpet to the morn,
 Doth with his lofty and shrill-sounding throat 150
 Awake the god of day, and at his warning,
 Whether in sea or fire, in earth or air,
 The extravagant<sup>4</sup> and erring spirit hies
 To his confine: and of the truth herein 155
 This present object made probation.<sup>5</sup>
 MARCELLUS It faded on the crowing of the cock.
 Some say that ever 'gainst<sup>6</sup> that season comes

1. The moon (moist star) regulates the sea's tides. "Disasters": ill omens.

2. Foreboding.

3. Regions.

4. Wandering out of its confines.

5. Gave proof.

6. Just before.

Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
 The bird of dawning singeth all night long: 160
 And then, they say, no spirit dare stir abroad,
 The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,
 No fairy takes nor witch hath power to charm,
 So hallowed and so gracious<sup>7</sup> is the time.
 HORATIO So have I heard and do in part believe it. 165
 But look, the morn, in russet mantle clad,
 Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastward hill:
 Break we our watch up; and by my advice,
 Let us impart what we have seen to-night
 Unto young Hamlet; for, upon my life, 170
 This spirit, dumb to us, will speak to him:
 Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,
 As needful in our loves, fitting our duty?
 MARCELLUS Let's do 't, I pray; and I this morning know
 Where we shall find him most conveniently. 175
 [Exeunt.]

SCENE 2

[SCENE: A room of state in the castle.]

[Flourish. Enter the KING, QUEEN, HAMLET, POLONIUS, LAERTES, VOLTIMAND, CORNELIUS, LORDS, and attendants.]

KING Though yet of Hamlet our dear brother's death
 The memory be green, and that it us befitted
 To bear our hearts in grief and our whole kingdom
 To be contracted in one brow of woe,
 Yet so far hath discretion<sup>8</sup> fought with nature 5
 That we with wisest sorrow think on him,
 Together with remembrance of ourselves.
 Therefore our sometime sister, now our queen,
 The imperial jointress to this warlike state,
 Have we, as 'twere with a defeated joy,— 10
 With an auspicious and a dropping eye,
 With mirth in funeral and with dirge in marriage,
 In equal scale weighing delight and dole,—
 Taken to wife: nor have we herein barr'd<sup>9</sup>
 Your better wisdoms, which have freely gone 15
 With this affair along. For all, our thanks.
 Now follows, that<sup>1</sup> you know, young Fortinbras,
 Holding a weak supposal of our worth,
 Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
 Our state to be disjoint and out of frame, 20
 Colleague'd with this dream<sup>2</sup> of his advantage,

7. Full of blessing. "Strike": exercise evil influence (compare moonstruck). "Fairy takes": bewitches.
 8. Restraint (on grief).

9. Ignored. "Dole": grief.

1. What.

2. Combined with this fantastic notion.

HAMLET [Aside.] A little more than kin, and less than kind. 65
 KING How is it that the clouds still hang on you?
 HAMLET Not so, my lord; I am too much i' the sun.<sup>6</sup>
 QUEEN Good Hamlet, cast thy nighted color off,
 And let thine eye look like a friend on Denmark.
 Do not for ever with thy vailèd<sup>7</sup> lids 70
 Seek for thy noble father in the dust:
 Thou know'st 'tis common; all that lives must die,
 Passing through nature to eternity.
 HAMLET Aye, madam, it is common.
 QUEEN If it be, 75
 Why seems it so particular with thee?
 HAMLET Seems, madam! nay, it is; I know not "seems."
 'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,
 Nor customary suits of solemn black,
 Nor windy suspiration of forced breath,
 No, nor the fruitful river in the eye, 80
 Nor the dejected havior of the visage,
 Together with all forms, moods, shapes of grief,
 That can denote me truly: these indeed seem,
 For they are actions that a man might play:
 But I have that within which passeth show; 85
 These but the trappings and the suits of woe.
 KING 'Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet,
 To give these mourning duties to your father:
 But, you must know, your father lost a father,
 That father lost, lost his, and the survivor bound 90
 In filial obligation for some term
 To do obsequious<sup>8</sup> sorrow: but to persevere
 In obstinate condolement is a course
 Of impious stubbornness; 'tis unmanly grief:
 It shows a will most incorrect<sup>9</sup> to heaven, 95
 A heart unfortified, a mind impatient,
 An understanding simple and unschool'd:
 For what we know must be and is as common
 As any the most vulgar thing to sense,
 Why should we in our peevish opposition 100
 Take it to heart? Fie! 'tis a fault to heaven,
 A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
 To reason most absurd, whose common theme
 Is death of fathers, and who still hath cried,
 From the first corse till he that died to-day, 105
 "This must be so." We pray you, throw to earth
 This unprevailing<sup>1</sup> woe, and think of us

6. The cue to Hamlet's irony is given by the King's "my cousin . . . my son" (line 64). Hamlet is punning on son.
 7. Downcast.

8. Dutiful, especially concerning funeral rites (obsequies).
 9. Not subdued.
 1. Useless.

As of a father: for let the world take note,
 You are the most immediate to our throne,
 And with no less nobility of love 110
 Than that which dearest father bears his son
 Do I impart toward you. For your intent
 In going back to school in Wittenberg,
 It is most retrograde<sup>2</sup> to our desire:
 And we beseech you, bend you to remain 115
 Here in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
 Our chiefest courtier, cousin and our son.
 QUEEN Let not thy mother lose her prayers, Hamlet:
 I pray thee, stay with us; go not to Wittenberg.
 HAMLET I shall in all my best obey you, madam. 120
 KING Why, 'tis a loving and a fair reply:
 Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come;
 This gentle and unforced accord of Hamlet
 Sits smiling to my heart: in grace whereof,
 No jocund health that Denmark drinks to-day, 125
 But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,
 And the king's rouse the heaven shall bruit<sup>3</sup> again,
 Re-speaking earthly thunder. Come away.
 [Flourish. Exeunt all but HAMLET.]
 HAMLET O, that this too too sullied flesh would melt,
 Thaw and resolve itself into a dew! 130
 Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
 His canon<sup>4</sup> 'gainst self-slaughter! O God! God!
 How weary, stale, flat and unprofitable
 Seem to me all the uses of this world!
 Fie on 't! ah fie! 'tis an unweeded garden, 135
 That grows to seed; things rank and gross in nature Possess it merely. That it should come to this!
 But two months dead! nay, not so much, not two:
 So excellent a king; that was, to this,
 Hyperion to a satyr: so loving to my mother, 140
 That he might not beteem<sup>5</sup> the winds of heaven
 Visit her face too roughly. Heaven and earth!
 Must I remember? why, she would hang on him,
 As if increase of appetite had grown
 By what it fed on: and yet, within a month— 145
 Let me not think on't—Frailty, thy name is woman!—
 A little month, or ere those shoes were old
 With which she followed my poor father's body,
 Like Niobe,<sup>6</sup> all tears:—why she, even she,—

2. Opposed. "Wittenberg": the seat of a university; at the peak of fame in Shakespeare's time because of its connection with Martin Luther.

3. Proclaim, echo. "Rouse": carousal, revel.

4. Law.

5. Allow. "Hyperion": the sun god.

6. A proud mother who boasted of having more children than Leto; her seven sons and seven daughters were slain by Apollo and Artemis, children of Leto. The grieving Niobe was changed by Zeus into a continually weeping stone.

- O God! a beast that wants discourse<sup>7</sup> of reason
 Would have mourned longer,—married with my uncle,
 My father's brother, but no more like my father
 Than I to Hercules: within a month;
 Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
 Had left the flushing in her gallèd<sup>8</sup> eyes,
 She married. O, most wicked speed, to post
 With such dexterity to incestuous sheets!<sup>9</sup>
 It is not, nor it cannot come to good:
 But break, my heart, for I must hold my tongue!
 [Enter HORATIO, MARCELLUS, and BERNARDO.]
- HORATIO Hail to your lordship!
- HAMLET I am glad to see you well:
 Horatio,—or I do forget myself.
- HORATIO The same, my lord, and your poor servant ever.
- HAMLET Sir, my good friend; I'll change<sup>1</sup> that name with you:
 And what make you from Wittenberg, Horatio?
 Marcellus?
- MARCELLUS My good lord?
- HAMLET I am very glad to see you. [To BERNARDO.] Good even, sir.
 But what, in faith, make you from Wittenberg?
- HORATIO A truant disposition, good my lord.
- HAMLET I would not hear your enemy say so,
 Nor shall you do my ear that violence,
 To make it truster of your own report
 Against yourself: I know you are no truant.
 But what is your affair in Elsinore?
 We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart.
- HORATIO My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.
- HAMLET I pray thee, do not mock me, fellow-student;
 I think it was to see my mother's wedding.
- HORATIO Indeed, my lord, it followed hard upon.
- HAMLET Thrift, thrift, Horatio! the funeral baked-meats
 Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.
 Would I had met my dearest<sup>2</sup> foe in heaven
 Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio!
 My father!—methinks I see my father.
- HORATIO O where, my lord?
- HAMLET In my mind's eye, Horatio.
- HORATIO I saw him once; he was a goodly king.
- HAMLET He was a man, take him for all in all,
 I shall not look upon his like again.
- HORATIO My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.
- HAMLET Saw? who?

7. Lacks the faculty.

8. Inflamed.

9. According to principles that Hamlet accepts, marrying one's brother's widow is incest.

1. Exchange.

2. Bitterest.

HORATIO My lord, the king your father.

HAMLET The king my father!

HORATIO Season your admiration<sup>3</sup> for a while

With an attent ear, till I may deliver,
Upon the witness of these gentlemen,
This marvel to you.

HAMLET For God's love, let me hear. 195

HORATIO Two nights together had these gentlemen,

Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch,

In the dead vast and middle of the night,

Been thus encountered. A figure like your father,

Armed at point exactly, cap-a-pe,<sup>4</sup> 200

Appears before them, and with solemn march

Goes slow and stately by them: thrice he walked

By their oppressed and fear-surprisèd eyes,

Within his truncheon's length; whilst they, distilled

Almost to jelly with the act of fear, 205

Stand dumb, and speak not to him. This to me

In dreadful secrecy impart they did;

And I with them the third night kept the watch:

Where, as they had delivered, both in time,

Form of the thing, each word made true and good, 210

The apparition comes: I knew your father;

These hands were not more like.

HAMLET But where was this?

MARCELLUS My lord, upon the platform where we watched.

HAMLET Did you not speak to it?

HORATIO My lord, I did.

But answer made it none: yet once methought 215

It lifted up its head and did address

Itself to motion, like as it would speak:

But even then the morning cock crew loud,

And at the sound it shrunk in haste away

And vanished from our sight.

HAMLET 'Tis very strange. 220

HORATIO As I do live, my honored lord, 'tis true,

And we did think it writ down in our duty

To let you know of it.

HAMLET Indeed, indeed, sirs, but this troubles me.

Hold you the watch to-night?

MARCELLUS } We do, my lord. 225

BERNARDO }

HAMLET Armed, say you?

MARCELLUS } Armed, my lord.

BERNARDO }

3. Restrain your astonishment.

4. From head to foot. "At point": completely.

HAMLET From top to toe?

MARCELLUS }
BERNARDO } My lord, from head to foot.

HAMLET Then saw you not his face?

HORATIO O, yes, my lord; he wore his beaver<sup>5</sup> up.

HAMLET What, looked he frowningly? 230

HORATIO A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.

HAMLET Pale, or red?

HORATIO Nay, very pale.

HAMLET And fixed his eyes upon you?

HORATIO Most constantly.

HAMLET I would I had been there.

HORATIO It would have much amazed you. 235

HAMLET Very like, very like. Stayed it long?

HORATIO While one with moderate haste might tell<sup>6</sup> a hundred.

MARCELLUS }
BERNARDO } Longer, longer.

HORATIO Not when I saw 't.

HAMLET His beard was grizzled?<sup>7</sup> no?

HORATIO It was, as I have seen it in his life, 240
A sable silvered.<sup>8</sup>

HAMLET I will watch to-night;
Perchance 'twill walk again.

HORATIO I warrant it will.

HAMLET If it assume my noble father's person,
I'll speak to it, though hell itself should gape
And bid me hold my peace. I pray you all, 245
If you have hitherto concealed this sight,
Let it be tenable in your silence still,<sup>9</sup>
And whatsoever else shall hap to-night,
Give it an understanding, but no tongue:
I will requite your loves. So fare you well: 250
Upon the platform, 'twixt eleven and twelve,
I'll visit you.

ALL Our duty to your honor.

HAMLET Your loves, as mine to you: farewell.

[Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

My father's spirit in arms! all is not well;
I doubt<sup>1</sup> some foul play: would the night were come!
Till then sit still, my soul: foul deeds will rise, 255
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes.
[Exit.]

5. Visor.

6. Count.

7. Gray.

8. Black and white.

9. Consider it still a secret.

1. Suspect.

SCENE 3

[SCENE: A room in Polonius's house.]

[Enter LAERTES and OPHELIA.]

LAERTES My necessities are embarked: farewell:

And, sister, as the winds give benefit
And convoy<sup>2</sup> is assistant, do not sleep,
But let me hear from you.

OPHELIA Do you doubt that?

LAERTES For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favor, 5

Hold it a fashion, and a toy in blood,
A violet in the youth of primy nature,
Forward,<sup>3</sup> not permanent, sweet, not lasting,
The perfume and suppliance of a minute;
No more. 10

OPHELIA No more but so?

LAERTES Think it no more:

For nature crescent does not grow alone
In thews and bulk; but, as this temple<sup>4</sup> waxes,
The inward service of the mind and soul 15
Grows wide withal. Perhaps he loves you now;
And now no soil nor cautel<sup>5</sup> doth besmirch
The virtue of his will: but you must fear,
His greatness weighed,<sup>6</sup> his will is not his own;
For he himself is subject to his birth: 20
He may not, as unvalued persons do,
Carve for himself, for on his choice depends
The safety and health of this whole state,
And therefore must his choice be circumscribed
Unto the voice and yielding<sup>7</sup> of that body 25
Whereof he is the head. Then if he says he loves you,
It fits your wisdom so far to believe it
As he in his particular act and place
May give his saying deed; which is no further Than the main voice of Denmark goes withal.<sup>8</sup> 30
Then weigh what loss your honor may sustain,
If with too credent ear you list his songs,
Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open
To his unmastered importunity.
Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister, 35
And keep you in the rear of your affection,
Out of the shot and danger of desire.
The chariest maid is prodigal enough

2. Conveyance, means of transport.

3. Early. "Fashion": passing mood. "Primy": early, young.

4. The body. "Crescent": growing.

5. No foul or deceitful thoughts.

6. When you consider his rank. "Will": desire.

7. Assent.

8. Goes along with, agrees. "Main": powerful.

If she unmask her beauty to the moon:
 Virtue itself 'scapes not calumnious strokes: 40
 The canker galls the infants of the spring
 Too oft before their buttons be disclosed,
 And in the morn and liquid dew of youth
 Contagious blastments<sup>9</sup> are most imminent.
 Be wary then; best safety lies in fear: 45
 Youth to itself<sup>1</sup> rebels, though none else near.
 OPHELIA I shall the effect of this good lesson keep,
 As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
 Do not, as some ungracious pastors do,
 Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven, 50
 Whilst, like a puffed and reckless libertine,
 Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads
 And recks not his own rede.<sup>2</sup>
 LAERTES O, fear me not.
 I stay too long; but here my father comes.
 [Enter POLONIUS.]
 A double blessing is a double grace; 55
 Occasion smiles upon a second leave.
 POLONIUS Yet here, Laertes! Aboard, aboard, for shame!
 The wind sits in the shoulder of your sail,
 And you are stayed for. There; my blessing with thee!
 And these few precepts in thy memory 60
 See thou character.<sup>3</sup> Give thy thoughts no tongue, Nor any unproportioned<sup>4</sup> thought his act.
 Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.
 Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
 Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel, 65
 But do not dull thy palm<sup>5</sup> with entertainment
 Of each new-hatched unfledged comrade. Beware
 Of entrance to a quarrel; but being in,
 Bear 't, that the opposèd may beware of thee.
 Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice: 70
 Take each man's censure,<sup>6</sup> but reserve thy judgment.
 Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
 But not expressed in fancy; rich, not gaudy:
 For the apparel oft proclaims the man;
 And they in France of the best rank and station 75
 Are of a most select and generous chief<sup>7</sup> in that.
 Neither a borrower nor a lender be:
 For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
 And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.<sup>8</sup>
 This above all: to thine own self be true, 80

9. Blights.

1. Against its better self.

2. Does not follow his own advice.

3. Engrave in your memory.

4. Unsuitable.

5. Make the palm of your hand callous (by the indiscriminate shaking of hands).

6. Opinion.

7. Preeminence.

8. Thriftiness.

And it must follow, as the night the day,
 Thou canst not then be false to any man.
 Farewell: my blessing season<sup>9</sup> this in thee!

LAERTES Most humbly do I take my leave, my lord.

POLONIUS The time invites you; go, your servants tend!<sup>1</sup> 85

LAERTES Farewell, Ophelia, and remember well
 What I have said to you.

OPHELIA 'Tis in my memory locked,
 And you yourself shall keep the key of it.

LAERTES Farewell.
 [Exit.]

POLONIUS What is 't, Ophelia, he hath said to you?

OPHELIA So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet. 90

POLONIUS Marry, well bethought:
 'Tis told me, he hath very oft of late Given private time to you, and you yourself
 Have of your audience been most free and bounteous:
 If it be so—as so 'tis put on me, 95
 And that in way of caution—I must tell you,
 You do not understand yourself so clearly
 As it behoves my daughter and your honor.
 What is between you? give me up the truth.

OPHELIA He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders 100
 Of his affection to me.

POLONIUS Affection! pooh! you speak like a green girl, Unsifted<sup>2</sup> in such perilous circumstance.
 Do you believe his tenders, as you call them?

OPHELIA I do not know, my lord, what I should think. 105

POLONIUS Marry, I'll teach you: think yourself a baby,
 That you have ta'en these tenders for true pay,
 Which are not sterling. Tender<sup>3</sup> yourself more dearly;
 Or—not to crack the wind of the poor phrase,
 Running it thus—you'll tender me a fool.<sup>4</sup> 110

OPHELIA My lord, he hath importuned me with love
 In honorable fashion.

POLONIUS Aye, fashion you may call it; go to, go to.

OPHELIA And hath given countenance<sup>5</sup> to his speech, my lord,
 With almost all the holy vows of heaven. 115

POLONIUS Aye, springes to catch woodcocks. I do know,
 When the blood burns, how prodigal the soul
 Lends the tongue vows: these blazes, daughter,
 Giving more light than heat, extinct in both,
 Even in their promise, as it is a-making, 120
 You must not take for fire. From this time
 Be something scanter of your maiden presence;

9. Ripen.

1. Wait.

2. Untested.

3. Regard.

4. You'll furnish me with a fool (a foolish daughter).

5. Authority.

Set your entreatments<sup>6</sup> at a higher rate
 Than a command to parley. For Lord Hamlet, Believe so much in him, that he is young, 125
 And with a larger tether may he walk
 Than may be given you: in few, Ophelia,
 Do not believe his vows; for they are brokers,
 Not of that dye which their investments<sup>7</sup> show,
 But mere implorators of unholy suits, 130
 Breathing like sanctified and pious bawds,
 The better to beguile. This is for all:
 I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth,
 Have you so slander any moment<sup>8</sup> leisure,
 As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet. 135
 Look to 't, I charge you: come your ways.
 OPHELIA I shall obey, my lord.
 [Exeunt.]

SCENE 4

[SCENE: The platform.]

[Enter HAMLET, HORATIO, and MARCELLUS.]

HAMLET The air bites shrewdly; it is very cold.
 HORATIO It is a nipping and an eager<sup>9</sup> air.
 HAMLET What hour now?
 HORATIO I think it lacks of twelve.
 MARCELLUS No, it is struck.
 HORATIO Indeed? I heard it not: it then draws near the season 5
 Wherein the spirit held his wont to walk.
 [A flourish of trumpets, and ordnance shot off within.]
 What doth this mean, my lord?
 HAMLET The king doth wake to-night, and takes his rouse,
 Keeps wassail, and the swaggering up-spring reels;
 And as he drains his draughts of Rhenish<sup>1</sup> down, 10
 The kettle-drum and trumpet thus bray out
 The triumph of his pledge.<sup>2</sup>
 HORATIO Is it a custom?
 HAMLET Aye, marry, is 't:
 But to my mind, though I am native here
 And to the manner born, it is a custom 15
 More honored<sup>3</sup> in the breach than the observance.
 This heavy-headed revel east and west
 Makes us traduced and taxed of other nations:
 They clepe us drunkards, and with swinish phrase
 Soil our addition;<sup>4</sup> and indeed it takes 20

6. Conversation, company.

7. Clothes. "Brokers": procurers, panders.

8. Use badly any momentary.

9. Sharp.

1. Rhine wine. "Up-spring reels": wild dances.

2. In downing the cup in one draught.

3. Honorable.

4. Reputation. "Taxed": blamed. "Clepe": call.

From our achievements, though performed at height,<sup>5</sup>
 The pith and marrow of our attribute.<sup>6</sup>
 So, oft it chances in particular men,
 That for some vicious mole of nature in them,
 As, in their birth,—wherein they are not guilty, 25
 Since nature cannot choose his origin,—
 By the o'ergrowth of some complexion,<sup>7</sup>
 Oft breaking down the pales and forts of reason,
 Or by some habit that too much o'er-leavens<sup>8</sup>
 The form of plausible<sup>9</sup> manners, that these men,— 30
 Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect,
 Being nature's livery, or fortune's star,—
 Their virtues else<sup>1</sup>—be they as pure as grace,
 As infinite as man may undergo—
 Shall in the general censure take corruption 35
 From that particular fault: the dram of evil
 Doth all the noble substance often dout
 To his own scandal.<sup>2</sup>

[Enter GHOST.]

HORATIO                    Look, my lord it comes!
 HAMLET    Angels and ministers of grace defend us!
           Be thou a spirit of health or goblin damned, 40
           Bring with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell,
           Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
           Thou comest in such a questionable shape
           That I will speak to thee: I'll call thee Hamlet,
           King, father, royal Dane: O, answer me! 45
           Let me not burst in ignorance; but tell
           Why thy canonized bones, hearsed in death,
           Have burst their cerements; why the sepulchre,
           Wherein we saw thee quietly inurned,
           Hath oped his ponderous and marble jaws, 50
           To cast thee up again. What may this mean,
           That thou, dead corse, again, in complete steel,
           Revisit'st thus the glimpses of the moon,
           Making night hideous; and we fools of nature
           So horridly to shake our disposition 55
           With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?
           Say, why is this? Wherefore? what should we do?

[GHOST beckons HAMLET.]

HORATIO    It beckons you to go away with it,
           As if it some impartment did desire
           To you alone. 60

MARCELLUS    Look, with what courteous action
           It waves you to a more removed ground:

5. Done in the best possible manner.

6. Reputation.

7. Excess in one side of their temperament.

8. Modifies, as yeast changes dough.

9. Agreeable.

1. The rest of their qualities.

2. To its own harm. "Dout": extinguish, nullify.

But do not go with it.
 HORATIO                      No, by no means.
 HAMLET    It will not speak; then I will follow it.
 HORATIO    Do not, my lord.
 HAMLET                      Why, what should be the fear? 65
     I do not set my life at a pin's fee;
     And for my soul, what can it do to that,
     Being a thing immortal as itself?
     It waves me forth again: I'll follow it.
 HORATIO    What if it tempt you toward the flood, my lord, 70
     Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
     That beetles o'er<sup>3</sup> his base into the sea,
     And there assume some other horrible form,
     Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason
     And draw you into madness? think of it: 75
     The very place puts toys<sup>4</sup> of desperation,
     Without more motive, into every brain
     That looks so many fathoms to the sea
     And hears it roar beneath.
 HAMLET                      It waves me still.
     Go on; I'll follow thee. 80
 MARCELLUS    You shall not go, my lord.
 HAMLET                      Hold off your hands.
 HORATIO    Be ruled; you shall not go.
 HAMLET                      My fate cries out,
     And makes each petty artery in this body
     As hardy as the Nemean lion's nerve.<sup>5</sup>
     Still am I called, unhand me, gentlemen; 85
     By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets<sup>6</sup> me:
     I say, away! Go on; I'll follow thee.
     [Exeunt GHOST and HAMLET.]
 HORATIO    He waxes desperate with imagination.
 MARCELLUS    Let's follow; 'tis not fit thus to obey him.
 HORATIO    Have after. To what issue will this come? 90
 MARCELLUS    Something is rotten in the state of Denmark.
 HORATIO    Heaven will direct it.
 MARCELLUS                      Nay, let's follow him.
     [Exeunt.]

SCENE 5

[SCENE: Another part of the platform.]

[Enter GHOST and HAMLET.]

HAMLET    Whither wilt thou lead me? speak; I'll go no further.
 GHOST    Mark me.
 HAMLET                      I will.

3. Juts over.

4. Fancies.

5. Sinew, muscle. "Nemean lion": slain by Hercules as one of his twelve labors.

6. Hinders.

GHOST	My hour is almost come, When I to sulphurous and tormenting flames <sup>7</sup> Must render up myself.
HAMLET	Alas, poor ghost!
GHOST	Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing To what I shall unfold.	5
HAMLET	Speak; I am bound to hear.
GHOST	So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear.
HAMLET	What?
GHOST	I am thy father's spirit; Doomed for a certain term to walk the night, And for the day confined to fast in fires, Till the foul crimes done in my days of nature Are burnt and purged away. But that I am forbid To tell the secrets of my prison-house, I could a tale unfold whose lightest word Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood, Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres, <sup>8</sup> Thy knotted and combinèd locks to part And each particular hair to stand on end, Like quills upon the fretful porpentine: But this eternal blazon <sup>9</sup> must not be To ears of flesh and blood. List, list, O, list! If thou didst ever thy dear father love—	10 15 20
HAMLET	O God!
GHOST	Revenge his foul and most unnatural murder.	25
HAMLET	Murder!
GHOST	Murder most foul, as in the best it is, But this most foul, strange, and unnatural.
HAMLET	Haste me to know 't, that I, with wings as swift As meditation or the thoughts of love, May sweep to my revenge.	30
GHOST	I find thee apt; And duller shouldst thou be than the fat weed That roots itself in ease on Lethe <sup>1</sup> wharf, Wouldst thou not stir in this. Now, Hamlet, hear: 'Tis given out that, sleeping in my orchard, A serpent stung me; so the whole ear of Denmark Is by a forged process of my death Rankly abused: but know, thou noble youth, The serpent that did sting thy father's life Now wears his crown.	35 40
HAMLET	O my prophetic soul! My uncle!	40

7. Of purgatory.

8. Transparent revolving shells in each of which, according to Ptolemaic astronomy, a planet or other heavenly body was placed.

9. Publication of the secrets of the other world (of eternity). "Porpentine": porcupine.

1. The river of forgetfulness in Hades.

GHOST Aye, that incestuous, that adulterate beast,
 With witchcraft of his wit, with traitorous gifts,—
 O wicked wit and gifts, that have the power
 So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust 45
 The will of my most seeming-virtuous queen:
 O Hamlet, what a falling-off was there!
 From me, whose love was of that dignity
 That it went hand in hand even with the vow
 I made to her in marriage; and to decline 50
 Upon a wretch, whose natural gifts were poor
 To those of mine!
 But virtue, as it never will be moved,
 Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,<sup>2</sup>
 So lust, though to a radiant angel linked, 55
 Will sate itself in a celestial bed
 And prey on garbage.
 But, soft! methinks I scent the morning air;
 Brief let me be. Sleeping within my orchard,
 My custom always of the afternoon. 60
 Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole,
 With juice of cursed hebenon<sup>3</sup> in a vial,
 And in the porches of my ears did pour
 The leperous distilment; whose effect
 Holds such an enmity with blood of man 65
 That swift as quicksilver it courses through
 The natural gates and alleys of the body;
 And with a sudden vigor it doth posset
 And curd, like eager<sup>4</sup> droppings into milk,
 The thin and wholesome blood: so did it mine;
 And a most instant tetter barked about,<sup>5</sup> 70
 Most lazar-like,<sup>6</sup> with vile and loathsome crust,
 All my smooth body.
 Thus was I, sleeping, by a brother's hand
 Of life, of crown, of queen, at once dispatched: 75
 Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
 Unhouseled, disappointed, unaneled;<sup>7</sup>
 No reckoning made, but sent to my account
 With all my imperfections on my head:
 O, horrible! O, horrible! most horrible! 80
 If thou hast nature in thee, bear it not;
 Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
 A couch for luxury and damned incest.
 But, howsoever thou pursuest this act,
 Taint not thy mind, nor let thy soul contrive 85

2. A heavenly, angelic form.

3. Henbane, a poisonous herb.

4. Sour. "Posset": coagulate.

5. The skin immediately became thick like the bark of a tree.

6. Leper-like (from the beggar Lazarus, "full of sores," in Luke 16.20).

7. Without sacrament, unprepared, without extreme unction.

Against thy mother aught: leave her to heaven,
 And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge,
 To prick and sting her. Fare thee well at once!
 The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
 And 'gins to pale his uneffectual fire: 90
 Adieu, adieu, adieu! remember me.

[Exit.]

HAMLET O all you host of heaven! O earth! what else?
 And shall I couple hell? O, fie! Hold, hold, my heart;
 And you, my sinews, grow not instant old,
 But bear me stiffly up. Remember thee! 95
 Aye, thou poor ghost, while memory holds a seat
 In this distracted globe. Remember thee!
 Yea, from the table<sup>8</sup> of my memory
 I'll wipe away all trivial fond records,
 All saws of books, all forms, all pressures past, 100
 That youth and observation copied there:
 And thy commandment all alone shall live
 Within the book and volume of my brain,
 Unmixed with baser matter: yes, by heaven!
 O most pernicious woman! 105
 O villain, villain, smiling, damnèd villain!
 My tables,—meet it is I set it down,
 That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain;
 At least I'm sure it may be so in Denmark.

[Writing.]

So, uncle, there you are. Now to my word;
 It is "Adieu, adieu! remember me." 110
 I have sworn 't.

HORATIO }
 MARCELLUS } [Within.] My lord, my lord!

[Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.]

MARCELLUS

Lord Hamlet!

HORATIO

Heaven secure him!

HAMLET So be it!

MARCELLUS Illo,<sup>9</sup> ho, ho, my lord! 115

HAMLET Hillo, ho, ho, boy! come, bird, come.

MARCELLUS How is't, my noble lord?

HORATIO What news, my lord?

HAMLET O, wonderful!

HORATIO Good my lord, tell it.

HAMLET No; you will reveal it.

HORATIO Not I, my lord, by heaven.

8. Writing tablet; used in the same sense in line 107. "Globe": head. 9. A falconer's call.

HAMLET Never to speak of this that you have seen,
Swear by my sword.

GHOST [Beneath.] Swear.

HAMLET Hic et ubique?<sup>4</sup> then we'll shift our ground.
Come hither, gentlemen, 155
And lay your hands again upon my sword:
Never to speak of this that you have heard,
Swear by my sword.

GHOST [Beneath.] Swear.

HAMLET Well said, old mole! canst work i' the earth so fast? 160
A worthy pioner!<sup>5</sup> Once more remove, good friends.

HORATIO O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!

HAMLET And therefore as a stranger give it welcome.
There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy. 165
But come;
Here, as before, never, so help you mercy,
How strange or odd soe'er I bear myself,
As I perchance hereafter shall think meet
To put an antic<sup>6</sup> disposition on, 170
That you, at such times seeing me, never shall,
With arms encumbered<sup>7</sup> thus, or this head-shake,
Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase,
As "Well, well, we know," or "We could, an if we would,"
Or "If we list to speak," or "There be, an if they might," 175
Or such ambiguous giving out, to note
That you know aught of me: this not to do,
So grace and mercy at your most need help you, Swear.

GHOST [Beneath.] Swear. 180

HAMLET Rest, rest, perturbèd spirit!
[They swear.]
So, gentlemen,
With all my love I do commend<sup>8</sup> me to you:
And what so poor a man as Hamlet is
May do, to express his love and friending to you, 185
God willing, shall not lack. Let us go in together;
And still your fingers on your lips, I pray,
The time is out of joint: O cursèd spite,
That ever I was born to set it right!
Nay, come, let's go together. 190
[Exeunt.]

4. Here and everywhere (Latin).

5. Miner.

6. Odd, fantastic.

7. Folded.

8. Entrust.

Act 2

SCENE I

[SCENE: A room in Polonius's house.]

[Enter POLONIUS and REYNALDO.]

POLONIUS Give him this money and these notes, Reynaldo.

REYNALDO I will, my lord.

POLONIUS You shall do marvelous wisely, good Reynaldo,
Before you visit him, to make inquire
Of his behavior.

REYNALDO My lord, I did intend it. 5

POLONIUS Marry, well said, very well said. Look you, sir, Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris,
And how, and who, what means, and where they keep,<sup>9</sup>
What company, at what expense, and finding
By this encompassment<sup>1</sup> and drift of question 10
That they do know my son, come you more nearer Than your particular demands will touch it:
Take you, as 'twere, some distant knowledge of him,
As thus, "I know his father and his friends,
And in part him": do you mark this, Reynaldo?

REYNALDO Aye, very well, my lord. 15

POLONIUS "And in part him; but," you may say, "not well:
But if 't be he I mean, he's very wild,
Addicted so and so"; and there put on him
What forgeries you please; marry, none so rank 20
As may dishonor him; take heed of that;
But, sir, such wanton, wild and usual slips
As are companions noted and most known
To youth and liberty.

REYNALDO As gaming, my lord.

POLONIUS Aye, or drinking, fencing, swearing, quarreling, 25
Drabbing;<sup>2</sup> you may go so far.

REYNALDO My lord, that would dishonor him.

POLONIUS Faith, no; as you may season it in the charge.<sup>3</sup>

You must not put another scandal on him,
That he is open to incontinency; 30
That's not my meaning: but breathe his faults so quaintly<sup>4</sup>
That they may seem the taints of liberty,
The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
A savageness in unreclaimèd blood,
Of general assault.<sup>5</sup>

REYNALDO But, my good lord,— 35

9. Dwell. "Dankers": Danes.

1. Roundabout way.

2. Whoring.

3. Qualify it in making the accusation.

4. Delicately, skillfully. "Incontinency": extreme sensuality.

5. Assailing all. "Unreclaimèd": untamed.

POLONIUS Wherefore should you do this?

REYNALDO Aye, my lord,

I would know that.

POLONIUS Marry, sir, here's my drift,

And I believe it is a fetch of warrant:<sup>6</sup>

You laying these slight sullies on my son,

As 'twere a thing a little soiled i' the working,

Mark you,

Your party in converse, him you would sound,

Having ever seen in the prenominate<sup>7</sup> crimes

The youth you breathe of guilty, be assured

He closes with you in this consequence;<sup>8</sup>

"Good sir," or so, or "friend," or "gentleman,"

According to the phrase or the addition<sup>9</sup>

Of man and country.

REYNALDO Very good, my lord.

POLONIUS And then, sir, does he this—he does—what was I about to say? By the mass, I was about to say something: where did I leave?

REYNALDO At "closes in the consequence," at "friend or so," and "gentleman."

POLONIUS At "closes in the consequence," aye, marry;

He closes with you thus: "I know the gentleman;

I saw him yesterday, or t' other day,

Or then, or then, with such, or such, and, as you say,

There was a' gaming, there o'ertook in 's rouse,<sup>1</sup>

There falling out at tennis": or perchance,

"I saw him enter such a house of sale,"

Videlicet,<sup>2</sup> a brothel, or so forth.

See you now;

Your bait of falsehood takes this carp of truth:

And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,<sup>3</sup>

With windlasses and with assays of bias,<sup>4</sup>

By indirections find directions out:

So, by my former lecture and advice,

Shall you my son. You have me, have you not?

REYNALDO My lord, I have.

POLONIUS God be wi' ye; fare ye well.

REYNALDO Good my lord!

POLONIUS Observe his inclination in yourself.<sup>5</sup>

REYNALDO I shall, my lord.

POLONIUS And let him ply his music.

REYNALDO Well, my lord.

6. Allowable stratagem.

7. Aforementioned. "Having ever": if he has ever.

8. You may be sure he will agree in this conclusion.

9. Title.

1. Intoxicated in his reveling.

2. Namely.

3. Wise and far-sighted.

4. Sending the ball indirectly (in bowling), devious attacks. "Windlasses": winding ways, round-about courses.

5. Ways of procedure by yourself.

POLONIUS Farewell!

[Exit REYNALDO. — Enter OPHELIA.]

How now, Ophelia! what's the matter?

OPHELIA O, my lord, I have been so affrighted!

75

POLONIUS With what, i' the name of God?

OPHELIA My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,

Lord Hamlet, with his doublet<sup>6</sup> all unbraced,

No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,

Ungartered and down-gyvèd<sup>7</sup> to his ankle;

80

Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,

And with a look so piteous in purport

As if he had been loosèd out of hell

To speak of horrors, he comes before me.

POLONIUS Mad for thy love?

OPHELIA My lord, I do not know,

85

But truly I do fear it.

POLONIUS What said he?

OPHELIA He took me by the wrist and held me hard;

Then goes he to the length of all his arm,

And with his other hand thus o'er his brow,

He falls to such perusal of my face

90

As he would draw it. Long stayed he so;

At last, a little shaking of mine arm,

And thrice his head thus waving up and down,

He raised a sigh so piteous and profound

As it did seem to shatter all his bulk

95

And end his being; that done, he lets me go:

And with his head over his shoulder turned,

He seemed to find his way without his eyes;

For out o' doors he went without their help,

And to the last bended their light on me.

100

POLONIUS Come, go with me: I will go seek the king.

This is the very ecstasy of love;

Whose violent property fordoes itself<sup>8</sup>

And leads the will to desperate undertakings

As oft as any passion under heaven

105

That does afflict our natures. I am sorry.

What, have you given him any hard words of late?

OPHELIA No, my good lord, but, as you did command,

I did repel his letters and denied

His access to me.

POLONIUS That hath made him mad.

110

I am sorry that with better heed and judgment

I had not quoted him: I fear'd he did but trifle

And meant to wreck thee; but beshrew my jealousy!<sup>9</sup>

6. Jacket. "Closet": private room.

7. Pulled down like fetters on a prisoner's leg.

8. Which, when violent, destroys itself. "Ecstasy":

madness.

9. Curse my suspicion. "Quoted": noted.

By heaven, it is as proper to our age
 To cast beyond ourselves<sup>1</sup> in our opinions 115
 As it is common for the younger sort
 To lack discretion. Come, go we to the king:
 This must be known; which, being kept close, might move
 More grief to hide than hate to utter love.<sup>2</sup>
 Come. 120
 [Exeunt.]

SCENE 2

[SCENE: A room in the castle.]

[Flourish. Enter KING, QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and attendants.]

KING Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guildenstern!
 Moreover that we much did long to see you,
 The need we have to use you did provoke
 Our hasty sending. Something have you heard
 Of Hamlet's transformation; so call it, 5
 Sith<sup>3</sup> nor the exterior nor the inward man Resembles that it was. What it should be,
 More than his father's death, that thus hath put him
 So much from the understanding of himself,
 I cannot dream of: I entreat you both, 10
 That, being of so young days brought up with him
 And sith so neighbored to his youth and behavior,
 That you vouchsafe your rest<sup>4</sup> here in our court
 Some little time: so by your companies
 To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather 15
 So much as from occasion you may glean,
 Whether aught to us unknown afflicts him thus,
 That opened<sup>5</sup> lies within our remedy.

QUEEN Good gentlemen, he hath much talked of you,
 And sure I am two men there are not living 20
 To whom he more adheres.<sup>6</sup> If it will please you
 To show us so much gentry<sup>7</sup> and good will
 As to expend your time with us awhile
 For the supply and profit of our hope,
 Your visitation shall receive such thanks 25
 As fits a king's remembrance.

ROSENCRANTZ Both your majesties
 Might, by the sovereign power you have of us,
 Put your dread pleasures more into<sup>8</sup> command

1. Overshoot, go too far.

2. If Hamlet's love is revealed. "To hide": if kept hidden.

3. Since.

4. Consent to stay.

5. Once revealed.

6. Is more attached.

7. Courtesies.

8. Give your sovereign wishes the form of.

Than to entreaty.
 GUILDENSTERN But we both obey,
 And here give up ourselves, in the full bent<sup>9</sup> 30
 To lay our service freely at your feet,
 To be commanded.
 KING Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guildenstern.
 QUEEN Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz:
 And I beseech you instantly to visit 35
 My too much changèd son. Go, some of you,
 And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.
 GUILDENSTERN Heavens make our presence and our practices
 Pleasant and helpful to him!
 QUEEN Aye, amen!
 [Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and some attendants. —Enter POLONIUS.]
 POLONIUS The ambassadors from Norway, my good lord, 40
 Are joyfully returned.
 KING Thou still<sup>1</sup> hast been the father of good news.
 POLONIUS Have I, my lord? I assure my good liege,
 I hold my duty as I hold my soul,
 Both to my God and to my gracious king: 45
 And I do think, or else this brain of mine
 Hunts not the trail of policy so sure
 As it hath used to do, that I have found
 The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.
 KING O, speak of that; that do I long to hear. 50
 POLONIUS Give first admittance to the ambassadors;
 My news shall be the fruit to that great feast.
 KING Thyself do grace<sup>2</sup> to them, and bring them in.
 [Exit POLONIUS.]
 He tells me, my dear Gertrude, he hath found
 The head and source of all your son's distemper. 55
 QUEEN I doubt it is no other but the main;
 His father's death and our o'erhasty marriage.
 KING Well, we shall sift him.
 [Re-enter POLONIUS, with VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS.]
 Welcome, my good friends!
 Say, Voltimand, what from our brother Norway?
 VOLTIMAND Most fair return of greetings and desires. 60
 Upon our first,<sup>3</sup> he sent out to suppress
 His nephew's levies, which to him appeared
 To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack,
 But better looked into, he truly found
 It was against your highness: whereat grieved, 65
 That so his sickness, age and impotence

9. Bent (as a bow) to the limit.
 1. Always.

2. Honor. "Fruit": dessert.
 3. As soon as we made the request.

Was falsely borne in hand,<sup>4</sup> sends out arrests
 On Fortinbras; which he, in brief, obeys, Receives rebuke from Norway, and in fine<sup>5</sup>
 Makes vow before his uncle never more 70
 To give the assay<sup>6</sup> of arms against your majesty.
 Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy,
 Gives him three thousand crowns in annual fee
 And his commission to employ those soldiers,
 So levied as before, against the Polack: 75
 With an entreaty, herein further shown,
     [Giving a paper.]
 That it might please you to give quiet pass
 Through your dominions for this enterprise,
 On such regards of safety and allowance
 As therein are set down.

KING                               It likes us well, 80
 And at our more considered time we'll read,
 Answer, and think upon this business.
 Meantime we thank you for your well-took labor:
 Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together:
 Most welcome home!

                    [Exeunt VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS.]

POLONIUS                       This business is well ended. 85
 My liege, and madam, to expostulate
 What majesty should be, what duty is,
 Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
 Were nothing but to waste night, day and time.
 Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit 90
 And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,
 I will be brief. Your noble son is mad:
 Mad call I it; for, to define true madness,
 What is 't but to be nothing else but mad?
 But let that go.

QUEEN                       More matter, with less art. 95

POLONIUS   Madam, I swear I use no art at all.
 That he is mad, 'tis true: 'tis true 'tis pity,
 And pity 'tis 'tis true: a foolish figure;<sup>7</sup>
 But farewell it, for I will use no art.
 Mad let us grant him then: and now remains 100
 That we find out the cause of this effect,
 Or rather say, the cause of this defect,
 For this effect defective comes by cause:
 Thus it remains and the remainder thus.
 Perpend.<sup>8</sup> 105
 I have a daughter,—have while she is mine,—

4. Deceived, deluded.

5. Finally.

6. Test.

7. Of speech.

8. Consider.

Who in her duty and obedience, mark,
 Hath given me this: now gather and surmise.
[Reads.] “To the celestial, and my soul’s idol, the most beautified Ophelia,”—That’s an ill phrase, a vile phrase; “beautified” is a vile phrase; but you shall hear. Thus: 110

[Reads.] “In her excellent white bosom, these,” &c.

QUEEN Came this from Hamlet to her?

POLONIUS Good madam, stay awhile; I will be faithful.

[Reads.] “Doubt thou the stars are fire; 115
 Doubt that the sun doth move;
 Doubt truth to be a liar;
 But never doubt I love.

“O dear Ophelia, I am ill at these numbers;<sup>9</sup> I have not art to reckon my groans: but that I love thee best, O most best, believe it. Adieu. 120 “Thine evermore, most dear lady, whilst this machine is to him,<sup>1</sup> HAMLET.”

This in obedience hath my daughter shown me;
 And more above,<sup>2</sup> hath his solicitings,
 As they fell out by time, by means and place, 125
 All given to mine ear.

KING But how hath she Received his love?

POLONIUS What do you think of me?

KING As of a man faithful and honorable.

POLONIUS I would fain prove so. But what might you think,
 When I had seen this hot love on the wing,— 130
 As I perceived it, I must tell you that,
 Before my daughter told me,—what might you,
 Or my dear majesty your queen here, think,
 If I had played the desk or table-book,<sup>3</sup>
 Or given my heart a winking,<sup>4</sup> mute and dumb, 135
 Or looked upon this love with idle sight;
 What might you think? No, I went round<sup>5</sup> to work,
 And my young mistress thus I did bespeak:
 “Lord Hamlet is a prince, out of thy star;<sup>6</sup>
 This must not be”: and then I prescripts gave her, 140
 That she should lock herself from his resort,
 Admit no messengers, receive no tokens.
 Which done, she took the fruits of my advice;
 And he repulsed, a short tale to make,
 Fell into a sadness, then into a fast, 145
 Thence to a watch, thence into a weakness,
 Thence to a lightness,<sup>7</sup> and by this declension
 Into the madness wherein now he raves

9. Verses.

1. Body is attached.

2. Moreover.

3. If I had acted as a desk or notebook (in keeping the matter secret).

4. Shut my heart’s eye.

5. Straight.

6. Sphere.

7. Light-headedness. “Watch”: insomnia.

And all we mourn for.
 KING Do you think this?
 QUEEN It may be, very like. 150
 POLONIUS Hath there been such a time, I'd fain know that,
 That I have positively said "'tis so,"
 When it proved otherwise?
 KING Not that I know.
 POLONIUS [Pointing to his head and shoulder.] Take this, from this,
 if this be otherwise: 155
 If circumstances lead me, I will find
 Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
 Within the center.<sup>8</sup>
 KING How may we try it further?
 POLONIUS You know, sometimes he walks for hours together
 Here in the lobby.
 QUEEN So he does, indeed. 160
 POLONIUS At such a time I'll loose my daughter to him:
 Be you and I behind an arras then;
 Mark the encounter: if he love her not,
 And be not from his reason fall'n thereon,<sup>9</sup>
 Let me be no assistant for a state, 165
 But keep a farm and carters.
 KING We will try it.
 QUEEN But look where sadly the poor wretch comes reading.
 POLONIUS Away, I do beseech you, both away:
 I'll board him presently.<sup>1</sup>
 [Exeunt KING, QUEEN, and attendants. —Enter HAMLET, reading.]
 O, give me leave: how does my good Lord Hamlet? 170
 HAMLET Well, God-a-mercy.
 POLONIUS Do you know me, my lord?
 HAMLET Excellent well; you are a fishmonger.<sup>2</sup>
 POLONIUS Not I, my lord.
 HAMLET Then I would you were so honest a man. 175
 POLONIUS: Honest, my lord!
 HAMLET Aye, sir; to be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.
 POLONIUS That's very true, my lord.
 HAMLET For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a good 180 kissing carrion<sup>3</sup>—Have you a daughter?
 POLONIUS I have, my lord.
 HAMLET Let her not walk i' the sun: conception is a blessing; but as your daughter may conceive,—friend, look to 't.
 POLONIUS [Aside.] How say you by that? Still harping on my daughter: 185 yet he knew me not at first; he said I was a fishmonger: he is far gone: and truly in my youth I suffered much extremity for love; very

8. Of the earth.

9. For that reason.

1. Approach him at once.

2. Fish seller, but also slang for procurer.

3. Good bit of flesh for kissing.

near this. I'll speak to him again.—What do you read, my lord?

HAMLET Words, words, words.

POLONIUS What is the matter,<sup>4</sup> my lord?

190

HAMLET Between who?

POLONIUS I mean, the matter that you read, my lord.

HAMLET Slanders, sir: for the satirical rogue says here that old men have gray beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging thick amber and plum-tree gum, and that they have a plentiful lack of wit, together with most weak hams: all which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty to have it thus set down; for yourself, sir, shall grow old as I am, if like a crab you could go backward.

195

POLONIUS [Aside.] Though this be madness, yet there is method in 't.—Will you walk out of the air, my lord?

200

HAMLET Into my grave.

POLONIUS Indeed, that's out of the air.

[Aside.]

How pregnant sometimes his replies are! a happiness<sup>5</sup> that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously be delivered of. I will leave him, and suddenly contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honorable lord, I will most humbly take my leave of you.

205

HAMLET You cannot, sir, take from me any thing that I will more willingly part withal: except my life, except my life, except my life.

210

POLONIUS Fare you well, my lord.

HAMLET These tedious old fools.

[Re-enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

POLONIUS You go to seek the Lord Hamlet; there he is.

ROSENCRANTZ [To POLONIUS.] God save you, sir!

[Exit POLONIUS.]

GUILDENSTERN My honored lord!

215

ROSENCRANTZ My most dear lord!

HAMLET My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern? Ah, Rosencrantz! Good lads, how do you both?

ROSENCRANTZ As the indifferent<sup>6</sup> children of the earth.

GUILDENSTERN Happy, in that we are not over-happy;

220

On Fortune's cap we are not the very button.<sup>7</sup>

HAMLET Nor the soles of her shoe?

ROSENCRANTZ Neither, my lord.

HAMLET Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favors?

225

GUILDENSTERN Faith, her privates<sup>8</sup> we.

HAMLET In the secret parts of Fortune? O, most true; she is a strumpet. What's the news?

4. The subject matter of the book. Hamlet responds as if he referred to the subject of a quarrel.

5. Aptness of expression.

6. Average.

7. Top.

8. Ordinary men (with obvious play on the sexual term private parts).

- ROSENCRANTZ None, my lord, but that the world's grown honest.
- HAMLET Then is doomsday near: but your news is not true. Let me question more in particular: what have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune, that she sends you to prison hither? 230
- GUILDENSTERN Prison, my lord!
- HAMLET Denmark's a prison. 235
- ROSENCRANTZ Then is the world one.
- HAMLET A goodly one; in which there are many confines, wards<sup>9</sup> and dungeons, Denmark being one o' the worst.
- ROSENCRANTZ We think not so, my lord.
- HAMLET Why, then, 'tis none to you; for there is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so: to me it is a prison. 240
- ROSENCRANTZ Why, then your ambition makes it one; 'tis too narrow for your mind.
- HAMLET O God, I could be bounded in a nut-shell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams. 245
- GUILDENSTERN Which dreams indeed are ambition; for the very substance of the ambitious is merely the shadow of a dream.
- HAMLET A dream itself is but a shadow.
- ROSENCRANTZ Truly, and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow. 250
- HAMLET Then are our beggars bodies, and our monarchs and outstretched heroes the beggars' shadows. Shall we to the court? for,
by my fay, I cannot reason.
- ROSENCRANTZ }
GUILDENSTERN } We'll wait upon you.
- HAMLET No such matter: I will not sort you<sup>1</sup> with the rest of my servants; for, to speak to you like an honest man, I am most dreadfully attended. But, in the beaten way of friendship, what make you at Elsinore? 255
- ROSENCRANTZ To visit you, my lord; no other occasion.
- HAMLET Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks; but I thank you:
and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a halfpenny.<sup>2</sup> Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free visitation?
Come, deal justly<sup>3</sup> with me: come, come; nay, speak. 260
- GUILDENSTERN What should we say, my lord?
- HAMLET Why, any thing, but to the purpose. You were sent for; and there is a kind of confession in your looks, which your modesties have not craft enough to color: I know the good king and queen have sent for you. 265
- ROSENCRANTZ To what end, my lord?
- HAMLET That you must teach me. But let me conjure you, by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth, by the obligation of our ever-preserved love, and by what more dear 270

9. Cells. "Confines": places of confinement.
1. Put you together.

2. If priced at a halfpenny.
3. Honestly.

a better proposer<sup>4</sup> could charge you withal, be even and direct with me, whether you were sent for, or no.

ROSENCRANTZ [Aside to GUILDENSTERN.] What say you? 275

HAMLET [Aside.] Nay then, I have an eye of<sup>5</sup> you.—If you love me, hold not off.

GUILDENSTERN My lord, we were sent for.

HAMLET I will tell you why; so shall my anticipation prevent your discovery,<sup>6</sup> and your secrecy to the king and queen moult no feather. 280

I have of late—but wherefore I know not—lost all my mirth, forgone all custom of exercises; and indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory; this most excellent canopy, the air, look you, this brave o’erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted<sup>7</sup> with golden fire, 285 why, it appears no other thing to me than a foul and pestilent congregation of vapors. What a piece of work is a man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express<sup>8</sup> and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet, to me, 290 what is this quintessence of dust? man delights not me; no, nor woman an neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

ROSENCRANTZ My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts.

HAMLET Why did you laugh then, when I said “man delights not me”?

ROSENCRANTZ To think, my lord, if you delight not in man, what 295 lenten entertainment the players shall receive from you: we coted<sup>9</sup> them on the way; and hither are they coming, to offer you service.

HAMLET He that plays the king shall be welcome; his majesty shall have tribute of me; the adventurous knight shall use his foil and target; the lover shall not sigh gratis; the humorous<sup>1</sup> man shall end 300 his part in peace; the clown shall make those laugh whose lungs are tickle o’ the sere,<sup>2</sup> and the lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt for ’t. What players are they?

ROSENCRANTZ Even those you were wont to take such delight in, the tragedians of the city. 305

HAMLET How chances it they travel? their residence, both in reputation and profit, was better both ways.

ROSENCRANTZ I think their inhibition comes by means of the late innovation.<sup>3</sup>

HAMLET Do they hold the same estimation they did when I was in the city? are they so followed? 310

ROSENCRANTZ No, indeed, are they not.

HAMLET How comes it? do they grow rusty?

ROSENCRANTZ Nay, their endeavor keeps in the wonted pace: but

4. Speaker.

5. On.

6. Precede your disclosure.

7. Adorned.

8. Precise.

9. Overtook.

1. Eccentric, whimsical.

2. Ready to shoot off at a touch.

3. The introduction of the children (line 315), as Rosencrantz explains in his subsequent replies to Hamlet. “Inhibition”: prohibition.

- there is, sir, an eyrie of children, little eyases,<sup>4</sup> that cry out on the top of question<sup>5</sup> and are most tyrannically clapped for 't: these are now the fashion, and so berattle<sup>6</sup> the common stages—so they call them—that many wearing rapiers are afraid of goose-quills,<sup>7</sup> and dare scarce come thither. 315
- HAMLET What, are they children? who maintains 'em? how are they escoted? Will they pursue the quality<sup>8</sup> no longer than they can sing? will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to common players—as it is most like, if their means are no better,—their writers do them wrong, to make them exclaim against their own succession?<sup>9</sup> 320 325
- ROSENCRANTZ Faith, there has been much to-do on both sides, and the nation holds it no sin to tarre<sup>1</sup> them to controversy: there was for a while no money bid for argument unless the poet and the player went to cuffs in the question.<sup>2</sup>
- HAMLET Is 't possible? 330
- GUILDENSTERN O, there has been much throwing about of brains.
- HAMLET Do the boys carry it away?<sup>3</sup>
- ROSENCRANTZ Aye, that they do, my lord; Hercules and his load too.<sup>4</sup>
- HAMLET It is not very strange; for my uncle is king of Denmark, and those that would make mows<sup>5</sup> at him while my father lived, give twenty, forty, fifty, a hundred ducats a-piece, for his picture in little. 'Sblood, there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy could find it out. 335
- [Flourish of trumpets within.]
- GUILDENSTERN There are the players.
- HAMLET Gentlemen, you are welcome to Elsinore. Your hands, come then: the appurtenance of welcome is fashion and ceremony: let me comply with you in this garb, lest my extent<sup>6</sup> to the players, which, I tell you, must show fairly outwards, should more appear like entertainment<sup>7</sup> than yours. You are welcome: but my uncle-father and aunt-mother are deceived. 340 345
- GUILDENSTERN In what, my dear lord?
- HAMLET I am but mad north-north-west: when the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw.<sup>8</sup>
- [Re-enter POLONIUS.]
- POLONIUS Well be with you, gentlemen!
- HAMLET Hark you, Guildenstern; and you too: at each ear a hearer: 350

4. Nestling hawks. "Eyrie": nest.

5. Above others on matter of dispute.

6. Berate.

7. Gentlemen are afraid of pens (that is, of poets satirizing the "common stages").

8. Profession of acting. "Escoted": financially supported.

9. Recite satiric pieces against what they are themselves likely to become, common players.

1. Incite.

2. No offer to buy a plot for a play if it did not contain a quarrel between poet and player on that subject.

3. Win out.

4. The sign in front of the Globe Theater showed Hercules bearing the world on his shoulders.

5. Faces, grimaces.

6. Welcoming behavior. "Garb": style.

7. Welcome.

8. A hawk from a heron as well as a kind of ax from a handsaw.

that great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling clouts.<sup>9</sup> ROSENCRANTZ Happily he's the second time come to them; for they say an old man is twice a child.
 HAMLET I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players; mark it.
 You say right, sir: o' Monday morning; 'twas so, indeed.<sup>1</sup> 355
 POLONIUS My lord, I have news to tell you.
 HAMLET My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius<sup>2</sup> was an actor in Rome,—
 POLONIUS The actors are come hither, my lord.
 HAMLET Buz, buz!<sup>3</sup> 360
 POLONIUS Upon my honor,— HAMLET Then came each actor on his ass,— POLONIUS The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragicalhistorical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, 365 or poem unlimited:<sup>4</sup> Seneca cannot be too heavy, nor Plautus too light. For the law of writ and the liberty,<sup>5</sup> these are the only men.
 HAMLET O Jephthah,<sup>6</sup> judge of Israel, what a treasure hadst thou!
 POLONIUS What a treasure had he, my lord?
 HAMLET Why, 370
 "One fair daughter, and no more,
 The which he lovèd passing well."<sup>7</sup>
 POLONIUS [Aside.] Still on my daughter.
 HAMLET Am I not i' the right, old Jephthah?
 POLONIUS If you call me Jephthah, my lord, I have a daughter that I 375 love passing well.
 HAMLET Nay, that follows not.
 POLONIUS What follows, then, my lord?
 HAMLET Why,
 "As by lot, God wot."
 and then you know, 380
 "It came to pass, as most like it was,"— the first row of the pious chanson will show you more; for look, where my abridgment<sup>8</sup> comes.
 [Enter four or five PLAYERS.]
 You are welcome, masters; welcome, all. I am glad to see thee well.
 Welcome, good friends. O, my old friend! Why thy face is valanced<sup>9</sup> 385 since I saw thee last; comest thou to beard me in Denmark? What, my young lady and mistress! By'r lady, your ladyship is nearer to 9. Clothes.

1. Hamlet, for Polonius's sake, pretends he is deep in talk with Rosencrantz.

2. A famous Roman comic actor (ca. 126–62 B.C.E.).

3. An expression used to stop the teller of a stale story.

4. For plays governed and those not governed by classical rules.

5. Possibly, for both written and extemporized plays. Seneca (after 4 B.C.E.–65 C.E.) was a Roman who wrote tragedies. Plautus (ca. 254–184 B.C.E.) was a Roman who wrote comedies.

6. Who was compelled to sacrifice a dearly beloved daughter (2 Judges).

7. From an old ballad about Jephthah.

8. That is, the players interrupting him. "Row": stanza. "Chanson": song.

9. Draped (with a beard).

heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine. Pray God, your voice, like a piece of uncurrent gold, be not cracked within the ring.<sup>1</sup> Masters, you are all welcome. We'll e'en to 't like French falconers, fly at any thing we see: we'll have a speech straight: come, give us a taste of your quality; come, a passionate speech.

FIRST PLAYER What speech, my good lord?

HAMLET I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was never acted; or, if it was, not above once; for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviare to the general;<sup>2</sup> but it was—as I received it, and others, whose judgments in such matters cried in the top of mine<sup>3</sup>—an excellent play, well digested in the scenes, set down with as much modesty as cunning. I remember, one said there were no sallets in the lines to make the matter savory, nor no matter in the phrase that might indict the author of affection;<sup>4</sup> but called it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome than fine.<sup>5</sup> One speech in it I chiefly loved: 'twas Aeneas' tale to Dido; and thereabout of it especially, where he speaks of Priam's slaughter:<sup>6</sup> it live in your memory, begin at this line; let me see, let me see;

"The rugged Pyrrhus, like th' Hyrcanian beast,"<sup>7</sup>—

It is not so: it begins with "Pyrrhus."

"The rugged Pyrrhus, he whose sable arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble
When he lay couchèd in the ominous horse,<sup>8</sup>
Hath now this dread and black complexion smeared
With heraldry more dismal: head to foot
Now is he total gules; horridly tricked<sup>9</sup>
With the blood of fathers, mothers, daughters, sons,
Baked and impasted with the parching streets,
That lend a tyrannous<sup>1</sup> and a damnèd light
To their lord's murder: roasted in wrath and fire,
And thus o'er-sized<sup>2</sup> with coagulate gore,
With eyes like carbuncles, the hellish Pyrrhus Old grandsire Priam seeks."

So, proceed you.

POLONIUS 'Fore God, my lord, well spoken, with good accent and good discretion.

FIRST PLAYER 'Anon he finds him

Striking too short at Greeks; his antique sword, Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls,

1. A pun on the ring of the voice and the ring around the king's head on a coin. "Chopine": a thick-soled shoe. "Uncurrent": unfit for currency.

2. A delicacy wasted on the general public.

3. Were louder (more authoritative than) mine.

4. Affectation. "Sallets": salads (that is, relish, spicy passages).

5. More elegant than showy.

6. The story of the fall of Troy, told by Aeneas to Queen Dido. Priam was the king of Troy.

7. Tiger. "Pyrrhus": Achilles' son (also called Neoptolemus).

8. The wooden horse in which Greek warriors were smuggled into Troy.

9. Adorned. "Gules": heraldic term for red.

1. Savage.

2. Glued over.

Repugnant to command: unequal matched,
 Pyrrhus at Priam drives; in rage strikes wide;
 But with the whiff and wind of his fell sword
 The unnervèd father falls. Then senseless Ilium,<sup>3</sup>

Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top
 Stoops to his base, and with a hideous crash
 Takes prisoner Pyrrhus's ear: for, lo! his sword,
 Which was declining on the milky<sup>4</sup> head
 Of reverend Priam seemed i' the air to stick:
 So, as a painted tyrant, Pyrrhus stood,
 And like a neutral to his will and matter,
 Did nothing.

But as we often see, against some storm,
 A silence in the heavens, the rack<sup>5</sup> stand still,
 The bold winds speechless and the orb below
 As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder
 Doth rend the region, so after Pyrrhus's pause Aroused vengeance sets him new a-work;
 And never did the Cyclops<sup>6</sup> hammers fall
 On Mars's armor, forged for proof<sup>7</sup> eterne,
 With less remorse than Pyrrhus's bleeding sword
 Now falls on Priam.

Out, thou strumpet, Fortune! All you gods,
 In general synod take away her power,
 Break all the spokes and fellies from her wheel,
 And bowl the round nave<sup>8</sup> down the hill of heaven
 As low as to the fiends!

POLONIUS This is too long. 455

HAMLET It shall to the barber's, with your beard. Prithee, say on: he's for a jig<sup>9</sup> or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps: say on: come to Hecuba.

FIRST PLAYER "But who, O, who had seen the mobled<sup>1</sup> queen—"

HAMLET "The mobled queen?"

POLONIUS That's good; "mobled queen" is good. 460

FIRST PLAYER "Run barefoot up and down, threatening the flames

With bisson rheum; a clout<sup>2</sup> upon that head
 Where late the diadem stood; and for a robe,
 About her lank and all o'er-teemèd loins,<sup>3</sup>
 A blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up:

Who this had seen, with tongue in venom steeped
 'Gainst Fortune's state<sup>4</sup> would treason have pronounced:
 But if the gods themselves did see her then,
 When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport

3. Troy's citadel.

4. White-haired.

5. Clouds. "Against": just before.

6. The gigantic workmen of Hephaestus (Vulcan), god of blacksmiths and fire.

7. Protection.

8. Hub. "Fellies": rims.

9. Ludicrous sung dialogue, short farce.

1. Muffled.

2. Cloth. "Bisson rheum": blinding moisture, tears.

3. Worn out by childbearing.

4. Government.

- In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs,
 The instant burst of clamor that she made,
 Unless things mortal move them<sup>5</sup> not at all,
 Would have made milch the burning eyes of heaven<sup>6</sup>
 And passion in the gods." 470
- POLONIUS Look, whether he has not turned his color and has tears in
 's eyes. Prithee, no more. 475
- HAMLET 'Tis well; I'll have thee speak out the rest of this soon. Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?<sup>7</sup> Do you hear, let them be well used, for they are the abstracts and brief chronicles of the time: after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than 480 their ill report while you live.
- POLONIUS My lord, I will use them according to their desert.
- HAMLET God's bodykins,<sup>8</sup> man, much better: use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honor and dignity: the less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in. 485
- POLONIUS Come, sirs.
- HAMLET Follow him, friends: we'll hear a play to-morrow. [Exit POLONIUS with all the PLAYERS but the first.] Dost thou hear me, old friend; can you play the Murder of Gonzago? 490
- FIRST PLAYER Aye, my lord.
- HAMLET We'll ha 't to-morrow night. You could, for a need, study a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines, which I would set down and insert in 't, could you not?
- FIRST PLAYER Aye, my lord. 495
- HAMLET Very well. Follow that lord; and look you mock him not.
 [Exit FIRST PLAYER.] My good friends, I'll leave you till night: you are welcome to Elsinore.
- ROSENCRANTZ Good my lord!
- HAMLET Aye, so, God be wi' ye! [Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUIL-
DENSTERN.] Now I am alone. 500
 O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!
 Is it not monstrous that this player here,
 But in a fiction, in a dream of passion,
 Could force his soul so to his own conceit 505
 That from her<sup>9</sup> working all his visage wanned;
 Tears in his eyes, distraction in 's aspect,
 A broken voice, and his whole function<sup>1</sup> suiting
 With forms to his conceit? and all for nothing!
 For Hecuba!<sup>2</sup> 510
 What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
 That he should weep for her? What would he do,

5. The gods.

6. The stars. "Milch": moist (milk-giving).

7. Taken care of, lodged.

8. By God's little body.

9. His soul's.

1. Bodily action.

2. Queen of Troy, Priam's wife. "Conceit": imagination, conception of the role played.

Had he the motive and the cue for passion
 That I have? He would drown the stage with tears
 And cleave the general air with horrid speech,
 Make mad the guilty and appal the free,
 Confound the ignorant, and amaze indeed
 The very faculties of eyes and ears.
 Yet I,
 A dull and muddy-mettled rascal, peak,<sup>3</sup>
 Like John-a-dreams, unpregnant of my cause,<sup>4</sup>
 And can say nothing; no, not for a king,
 Upon whose property and most dear life
 A damn'd defeat was made. Am I a coward?
 Who calls me villain? breaks my pate across?
 Plucks off my beard, and blows it in my face?
 Tweaks me by the nose? gives me the lie i' the throat,
 As deep as to the lungs? who does me this?
 Ha!
 'Swounds, I should take it: for it cannot be
 But I am pigeon-livered and lack gall
 To make oppression bitter, or ere this
 I should have fatted all the region kites<sup>5</sup>
 With this slave's offal: bloody, bawdy villain!
 Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless<sup>6</sup> villain!
 O, vengeance!
 Why, what an ass am I! This is most brave,
 That I, the son of a dear father murdered,
 Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,
 Must, like a whore, unpack my heart with words,
 And fall a-cursing, like a very drab,
 A scullion!
 Fie upon 't! About,<sup>7</sup> my brain! Hum, I have heard
 That guilty creatures, sitting at a play,
 Have by the very cunning of the scene
 Been struck so to the soul that presently
 They have proclaimed their malefactions;
 For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
 With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players Play something like the murder of my father
 Before mine uncle: I'll observe his looks;
 I'll tent him to the quick: if he but blench,<sup>8</sup>
 I know my course. The spirit that I have seen
 May be the devil; and the devil hath power

3. Mope. "Muddy mettled": of poor metal (spirit, temper), dull-spirited.

4. Not really conscious of my cause, unquickened by it. "John-a-dreams": a dreamy, absent-minded character.

5. Kites (hawks) of the air.

6. Unnatural.

7. To work!

8. Flinch. "Tent": probe.

To assume a pleasing shape; yea, and perhaps 555
 Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
 As he is very potent with such spirits,
 Abuses me to damn me. I'll have grounds
 More relative<sup>9</sup> than this. The play's the thing Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king. 560
 [Exit.]

Act 3

SCENE I

[SCENE: A room in the castle.]

[Enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.]

KING And can you, by no drift of circumstance,<sup>1</sup>
 Get from him why he puts on this confusion,
 Grating so harshly all his days of quiet
 With turbulent and dangerous lunacy?
 ROSENCRANTZ He does confess he feels himself distracted, 5
 But from what cause he will by no means speak.
 GUILDENSTERN Nor do we find him forward to be sounded;
 But, with a crafty madness, keeps aloof,
 When we would bring him on to some confession
 Of his true state.
 QUEEN Did he receive you well? 10
 ROSENCRANTZ Most like a gentleman.
 GUILDENSTERN But with much forcing of his disposition.
 ROSENCRANTZ Niggard of question, but of our demands
 Most free in his reply.
 QUEEN Did you assay<sup>2</sup> him 15
 To any pastime?
 ROSENCRANTZ Madam, it so fell out that certain players
 We o'er-raught<sup>3</sup> on the way: of these we told him,
 And there did seem in him a kind of joy
 To hear of it: they are about the court,
 And, as I think, they have already order 20
 This night to play before him.
 POLONIUS 'Tis most true:
 And he beseeched me to entreat your majesties
 To hear and see the matter.
 KING With all my heart; and it doth much content me
 To hear him so inclined. 25
 Good gentlemen, give him a further edge,<sup>4</sup>
 And drive his purpose on to these delights.

9. Relevant.

1. Turn of talk, or roundabout way.

2. Try to attract him.

3. Overtook.

4. Incitement.

ROSENCRANTZ We shall, my lord.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

KING Sweet Gertrude, leave us too;

For we have closely<sup>5</sup> sent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here
Affront Ophelia: 30

Her father and myself, lawful espials,
Will so bestow<sup>6</sup> ourselves that, seeing unseen,
We may of their encounter frankly judge,
And gather by him, as he is behaved, 35
If't be the affliction of his love or no
That thus he suffers for.

QUEEN I shall obey you:

And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish
That your good beauties be the happy cause
Of Hamlet's wildness: so shall I hope your virtues 40
Will bring him to his wonted way again,
To both your honors.

OPHELIA Madam, I wish it may.

[Exit QUEEN.]

POLONIUS Ophelia, walk you here. Gracious, so please you,
We will bestow ourselves. [To OPHELIA.] Read on this book;
That show of such an exercise may color<sup>7</sup> 45
Your loneliness. We are oft to blame in this,—
'Tis too much proved—that with devotion's visage
And pious action we do sugar o'er
The devil himself.

KING [Aside.] O, 'tis too true!

How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience! 50
The harlot's cheek, beautied with plastering art,
Is not more ugly to the thing that helps it
Than is my deed to my most painted word:
O heavy burthen!

POLONIUS I hear him coming: let's withdraw, my lord. 55

[Exeunt KING and POLONIUS.—Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET To be, or not to be: that is the question:

Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
And by opposing end them. To die: to sleep; 60
No more; and by a sleep to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to, 'tis a consummation<sup>8</sup>
Devoutly to be wished. To die, to sleep;
To sleep: perchance to dream: aye, there's the rub;<sup>9</sup> 65

5. Privately.

6. Place. "Affront": confront. "Espials": spies.

7. Excuse.

8. Final settlement.

9. The impediment (a bowling term).

For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
 When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,<sup>1</sup>
 Must give us pause: there's the respect
 That makes calamity of so long life;<sup>2</sup>
 For who would bear the whips and scorns of time, 70
 The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
 The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
 The insolence of office, and the spurns
 That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
 When he himself might his quietus make 75
 With a bare bodkin? who would fardels<sup>3</sup> bear,
 To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
 But that the dread of something after death,
 The undiscovered country from whose bourn<sup>4</sup>
 No traveler returns, puzzles the will, 80
 And makes us rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of?
 Thus conscience does make cowards of us all,
 And thus the native hue of resolution
 Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought, 85
 And enterprises of great pitch<sup>5</sup> and moment
 With this regard their currents turn awry
 And lose the name of action. Soft you now!
 The fair Ophelia! Nymph, in thy orisons<sup>6</sup>
 Be all my sins remembered.

OPHELIA                                      Good my lord, 90
 How does your honor for this many a day?
 HAMLET    I humbly thank you: well, well, well.
 OPHELIA    My lord, I have remembrances of yours,
               That I have longed to re-deliver;
               I pray you, now receive them.

HAMLET                                      No, not I; 95
 I never gave you aught.
 OPHELIA    My honored lord, you know right well you did;
               And with them words of so sweet breath composed
               As made the things more rich: their perfume lost,
               Take these again; for to the noble mind 100
               Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.
               There, my lord.

HAMLET    Ha, ha! are you honest?
 OPHELIA    My lord?
 HAMLET    Are you fair? 105
 OPHELIA    What means your lordship?
 HAMLET    That if you be honest and fair, your honesty should admit no discourse to your beauty.

1. Have rid ourselves of the turmoil of mortal life.

2. So long-lived. "Respect": consideration.

3. Burdens. "Bodkin": poniard, dagger.

4. Boundary.

5. Height.

6. Prayers.

- OPHELIA Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce<sup>7</sup> than with honesty? 110
- HAMLET Aye, truly; for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his<sup>8</sup> likeness: this was sometime a paradox, but now the time gives it proof.<sup>9</sup> I did love you once.
- OPHELIA Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so. 115
- HAMLET You should not have believed me; for virtue cannot so inoculate our old stock, but we shall relish<sup>1</sup> of it: I loved you not.
- OPHELIA I was the more deceived.
- HAMLET Get thee to a nunnery: why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners? I am myself indifferent honest; but yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me: I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious; with more offenses at my beck than I have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between heaven and earth! We are arrant knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery. Where's your father? 120
- OPHELIA At home, my lord.
- HAMLET Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool no where but in 's own house. Farewell.
- OPHELIA O, help him, you sweet heavens! 130
- HAMLET If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny. Get thee to a nunnery, go: farewell. Or, if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool; for wise men know well enough what monsters<sup>2</sup> you make of them. To a nunnery, go; and quickly too. Farewell. 135
- OPHELIA O heavenly powers, restore him!
- HAMLET I have heard of your paintings too, well enough; God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another: you jig, you amble, and you lisp, and nick-name God's creatures, and make your wantonness your ignorance.<sup>3</sup> Go to, I'll no more on 't; it hath made me mad. I say, we will have no more marriages: those that are married already, all but one, shall live; the rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go. 140
- [Exit.]
- OPHELIA O, what a noble mind is here o'erthrown!
The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword; 145
The expectancy and rose of the fair state,
The glass of fashion and the mould of form.<sup>4</sup>
The observed of all observers, quite, quite down!
And I, of ladies most deject and wretched,
That sucked the honey of his music vows, 150

7. Intercourse.

8. Its.

9. In his mother's adultery.

1. Retain the flavor of. "Inoculate": graft itself onto.

2. Cuckolds bear imaginary horns and "a horned man's a monster" (Othello 4.1).

3. Misname (out of affectation) the most natural things, and pretend that this is due to ignorance instead of affectation.

4. The mirror of fashion and the model of behavior.

Now see that noble and most sovereign reason,
 Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh;
 That unmatched form and feature of blown<sup>5</sup> youth
 Blasted with ecstasy: O, woe is me,
 To have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

155

[Re-enter KING and POLONIUS.]

KING Love! his affections do not that way tend;
 Nor what he spake, though it lacked form a little,
 Was not like madness. There's something in his soul
 O'er which his melancholy sits on brood,
 And I do doubt<sup>6</sup> the hatch and the disclose
 Will be some danger: which for to prevent,
 I have in quick determination
 Thus set it down:—he shall with speed to England,
 For the demand of our neglected tribute:
 Haply the seas and countries different
 With variable objects shall expel
 This something-settled matter in his heart, Whereon his brains still beating puts him thus
 From fashion of himself.<sup>7</sup> What think you on 't?

160

165

POLONIUS It shall do well: but yet do I believe
 The origin and commencement of his grief
 Sprung from neglected love. How now, Ophelia!
 You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said;
 We heard it all. My lord, do as you please;
 But, if you hold it fit, after the play,
 Let his queen mother all alone entreat him
 To show his grief: let her be round<sup>8</sup> with him;
 And I'll be placed, so please you, in the ear
 Of all their conference. If she find him not,
 To England send him, or confine him where Your wisdom best shall think.

170

175

180

KING It shall be so:
 Madness in great ones must not unwatched go.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE 2

[SCENE: A hall in the castle.]

[Enter HAMLET and PLAYERS.]

HAMLET Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue: but if you mouth it, as many of your players do, I had as lief the town-crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus; but use all gently: for in the very torrent, tempest, and, as I may say, whirlwind of your passion,

5

5. In full bloom.

6. Fear.

7. Makes him behave unusually.

8. Direct.

you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious periwig-pated fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings,<sup>9</sup> who, for the most part, are capable of nothing but inexplicable dumb-shows and noise: I would have such a fellow 10 whipped for o'er doing Termagant;<sup>1</sup> it out-herods Herod: pray you, avoid it.

FIRST PLAYER I warrant your honor.

HAMLET Be not too tame neither, but let your own discretion be your tutor: suit the action to the word, the word to the action; with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty<sup>2</sup> of nature: for anything so overdone is from the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first and now, was and is, to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure.<sup>3</sup> Now this 20 overdone or come tardy off, though it make the unskillful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve; the censure of the which one must in your allowance o'erweigh a whole theater of others. O, there be players that I have seen play, and heard others praise, and that highly, not to speak it profanely,<sup>4</sup> that neither having the accent of 25 Christians nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man, have so strutted and bellowed, that I have thought some of nature's journeymen had made men, and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.

FIRST PLAYER I hope we have reformed that indifferently<sup>5</sup> with us, sir. 30

HAMLET O, reform it altogether. And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them: for there be of them that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren<sup>6</sup> spectators to laugh too, though in the mean time some necessary question of the play be then to be considered: that's villainous, and shows a most 35 pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go, make you ready.

[Exeunt PLAYERS. —Enter POLONIUS, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.]

How now, my lord! will the king hear this piece of work?

POLONIUS And the queen too, and that presently.

HAMLET Bid the players make haste.

[Exit POLONIUS.]

Will you two help to hasten them? 40

ROSENCRANTZ } We will, my lord.
GUILDENSTERN }

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

HAMLET What ho! Horatio!

[Enter HORATIO.]

HORATIO Here, sweet lord, at your service.

9. Spectators in the pit, where admission was cheapest.

1. God of the Muslims in old romances and morality plays; he was portrayed as being noisy and excitable.

2. Moderation.

3. Impress, shape. "Feature": form. "His": its.

4. Hamlet apologizes for the profane implication that there could be men not of God's making.

5. Pretty well.

6. Silly.

HAMLET Horatio, thou art e'en as just a man

As e'er my conversation coped withal.<sup>7</sup>

45

HORATIO O, my dear lord,—

HAMLET Nay, do not think I flatter;

For what advancement may I hope from thee,

That no revenue hast but thy good spirits,

To feed and clothe thee? Why should the poor be flattered?

No, let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,

50

And crook the pregnant hinges of the knee

Where thrift may follow fawning.<sup>8</sup> Dost thou hear?

Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice,

And could of men distinguish, her election

Hath sealed thee for herself: for thou hast been 55

As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing;

A man that fortune's buffets and rewards

Hast ta'en with equal thanks: and blest are those Whose blood and judgment<sup>9</sup> are so well commingled

That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger

60

To sound what stop she please.<sup>1</sup> Give me that man

That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him

In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,

As I do thee. Something too much of this.

There is a play to-night before the king;

65

One scene of it comes near the circumstance

Which I have told thee of my father's death:

I prithee, when thou sees that act a-foot,

Even with the very comment of thy soul<sup>2</sup>

Observe my uncle: if his occulted guilt

70

Do not itself unkennel in one speech

It is a damned ghost that we have seen,

And my imaginations are as foul

As Vulcan's stithy.<sup>3</sup> Give him heedful note;

For I mine eyes will rivet to his face,

75

And after we will both our judgments join

In censure of his seeming.<sup>4</sup>

HORATIO Well, my lord:

If he steal aught the whilst this play is playing,

And 'scape detecting, I will pay the theft.

HAMLET They are coming to the play: I must be idle:<sup>5</sup>

80

Get you a place.

[Danish march. A flourish. Enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and other LORDS attendant, with the guard carrying torches.]

7. As I ever associated with.

8. Material profit may be derived from cringing. "Pregnant hinges": supple joints.

9. Passion and reason.

1. For Fortune to put her finger on any wind-hole of the pipe she wants.

2. With all your powers of observation.

3. Smithy.

4. To judge his behavior.

5. Crazy.

KING How fares our cousin Hamlet?

HAMLET Excellent, i' faith; of the chameleon's dish: I eat the air;<sup>6</sup> promise-crammed: you cannot feed capons so.

KING I have nothing with this answer, Hamlet; these words are not mine.<sup>7</sup> 85

HAMLET No, nor mine now. [To POLONIUS.] My lord, you played once i' the university, you say?

POLONIUS That did I, my lord, and was accounted a good actor.

HAMLET What did you enact? 90

POLONIUS I did enact Julius Caesar: I was killed i' the Capitol; Brutus killed me.

HAMLET It was a brute part of him to kill so capital a calf there. Be the players ready?

ROSENCRANTZ Aye, my lord: they stay upon your patience. 95

QUEEN Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me.

HAMLET No, good mother, here's metal more attractive.

POLONIUS [To the KING.] O, ho! do you mark that?

HAMLET Lady, shall I lie in your lap? [Lying down at OPHELIA's feet.]

OPHELIA No, my lord. 100

HAMLET I mean, my head upon your lap?

OPHELIA Aye, my lord.

HAMLET Do you think I meant country matters?

OPHELIA I think nothing, my lord.

HAMLET That's a fair thought to lie between maids' legs. 105

OPHELIA What is, my lord?

HAMLET Nothing.<sup>8</sup>

OPHELIA You are merry, my lord.

HAMLET Who, I?

OPHELIA Aye, my lord. 110

HAMLET O God, your only jig-maker.<sup>9</sup> What should a man do but be merry? for, look you, how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within 's two hours.

OPHELIA Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

HAMLET So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.<sup>1</sup> O heavens! die two months ago, and not forgotten yet? Then there's hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year: but, by 'r lady, he must build churches then; or else shall he suffer not thinking on, with the hobby-horse,<sup>2</sup> whose epitaph is,
"For, O, for, O, the hobby-horse is forgot." 120

[Hautboys play. The dumb-show enters. —Enter a King and a Queen very lovingly; the Queen embracing him and he her. She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him. He takes her up, and declines his head upon her neck; lays him down upon a bank of flowers: she, seeing him asleep,

6. The chameleon was supposed to feed on air.

7. Have nothing to do with my question.

8. A sexual pun: no thing.

9. Maker of comic songs.

1. Hamlet notes sarcastically the lack of mourning for his father in the fancy dress of court and king.

2. A figure in the old May Day games and Morris dances.

leaves him. Anon comes in a fellow, takes off his crown, kisses it, and pours poison in the King's ears, and exits. The Queen returns; finds the King dead, and makes passionate action. The Poisoner, with some two or three Mutes comes in again, seeming to lament with her. The dead body is carried away. The Poisoner woos the Queen with gifts: she seems loath and unwilling awhile, but in the end accepts his love. —Exeunt.]

OPHELIA What means this, my lord?

HAMLET Marry, this is miching mallecho;<sup>3</sup> it means mischief.

OPHELIA Belike this show imports the argument of the play.

[Enter PROLOGUE.]

HAMLET We shall know by this fellow: the players cannot keep counsel;<sup>4</sup> they'll tell all.

125

OPHELIA Will he tell us what this show meant?

HAMLET Aye, or any show that you'll show him: be not you ashamed to show, he'll not shame to tell you what it means.

OPHELIA You are naught,<sup>5</sup> you are naught: I'll mark the play.

PROLOGUE For us, and for our tragedy,
Here stooping to your clemency,
We beg your hearing patiently.

130

HAMLET Is this a prologue, or the posy<sup>6</sup> of a ring?

OPHELIA 'Tis brief, my lord.

HAMLET As woman's love.

135

[Enter two PLAYERS, KING and QUEEN.]

PLAYER KING Full thirty times hath Phœbus's cart<sup>7</sup> gone round Neptune's salt wash and Tellus's orbed ground,
And thirty dozen moons with borrowed sheen
About the world have times twelve thirties been,
Since love our hearts and Hymen did our hands
Unite commutual in most sacred bands.

140

PLAYER QUEEN So many journeys may the sun and moon
Make us again count o'er ere love be done!
But, woe is me, you are so sick of late,
So far from cheer and from your former state,
That I distrust you.<sup>8</sup> Yet, though I distrust, Discomfort you, my lord, it nothing must:
For women's fear and love holds quantity,<sup>9</sup>
In neither aught, or in extremity.

145

Now, what my love is, proof hath made you know,
And as my love is sized, my fear is so:

150

Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear,
Where little fears grow great, great love grows there.

PLAYER KING Faith, I must leave thee, love, and shortly too;
My operant powers their functions leave<sup>1</sup> to do:
And thou shalt live in this fair world behind,

155

3. Sneaking misdeed.

4. A secret.

5. Naughty, improper.

6. Motto, inscription.

7. The chariot of the sun.

8. I am worried about you.

9. Maintain mutual balance.

1. Cease.

Honored, beloved; and haply one as kind
For husband shalt thou—

PLAYER QUEEN O, confound the rest!

Such love must needs be treason in my breast:
In second husband let me be accurst!

160

None wed the second but who killed the first.

HAMLET [Aside.] Wormwood, wormwood.

PLAYER QUEEN The instances that second marriage move
Are base respects of thrift,<sup>2</sup> but none of love:

A second time I kill my husband dead,
When second husband kisses me in bed.

165

PLAYER KING I do believe you think what now you speak,
But what we do determine oft we break.

Purpose is but the slave to memory,

Of violent birth but poor validity:

170

Which now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree,

But fall unshaken when they mellow be.

Most necessary 'tis that we forget

To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt:

What to ourselves in passion we propose,

175

The passion ending, both the purpose lose.

The violence of either grief or joy

Their own enactures<sup>3</sup> with themselves destroy:

Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;

Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.

180

This world is not for aye, nor 'tis not strange

That even our loves should with our fortunes change,

For 'tis a question left us yet to prove,

Whether love lead fortune or else fortune love.

The great man down, you mark his favorite flies;

185

The poor advanced makes friends of enemies:

And hitherto doth love on fortune tend;

For who not needs shall never lack a friend,

And who in want a hollow friend doth try

Directly seasons<sup>4</sup> him his enemy.

190

But, orderly to end where I begun,

Our wills and fates do so contrary run,

That our devices still are overthrown,

Our thoughts are ours, their ends none of our own:

So think thou wilt no second husband wed,

195

But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.

PLAYER QUEEN Nor earth to me give food nor heaven light!

Sport and repose lock from me day and night!

To desperation turn my trust and hope!

An anchor's cheer in prison be my scope!

200

Each opposite, that blanks<sup>5</sup> the face of joy,

2. Considerations of material profit. "Instances": motives.

3. Their own fulfillment in action.

4. Matures.

5. Makes pale. "Anchor's cheer": hermit's, or anchorite's, fare.

Meet what I would have well and it destroy!
 Both here and hence pursue me lasting strife,
 If, once a widow, ever I be wife!

HAMLET If she should break it now! 205

PLAYER KING 'Tis deeply sworn. Sweet, leave me here a while;
 My spirits grow dull, and fain I would beguile
 The tedious day with sleep.
 [Sleeps.]

PLAYER QUEEN Sleep rock thy brain;
 And never come mischance between us twain!
 [Exit.]

HAMLET Madam, how like you this play? 210

QUEEN The lady doth protest<sup>6</sup> too much, methinks.

HAMLET O, but she'll keep her word.

KING Have you heard the argument?<sup>7</sup> Is there no offense in 't?

HAMLET No, no, they do but jest, poison in jest; no offense i' the world. 215

KING What do you call the play?

HAMLET The Mouse-Trap. Marry, how? Tropically.<sup>8</sup> This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna: Gonzago is the duke's name; his wife, Baptista: you shall see anon; 'tis a knavish piece of work; but what o' that? your majesty, and we that have free souls, it touches us not: let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung.<sup>9</sup> 220 [Enter LUCIANUS.]

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the king.

OPHELIA You are as good as a chorus, my lord.

HAMLET I could interpret<sup>1</sup> between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying. 225

OPHELIA You are keen,<sup>2</sup> my lord, you are keen.

HAMLET It would cost you a groaning to take off my edge.

OPHELIA Still better and worse.

HAMLET So you must take<sup>3</sup> your husbands. Begin, murderer; pox, leave thy damnable faces, and begin. Come: the croaking raven doth bellow for revenge. 230

LUCIANUS Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time agreeing;
 Confederate season, else no creature seeing;
 Thou mixture rank, of midnight weeds collected,
 With Hecate's ban<sup>4</sup> thrice blasted, thrice infected, 235
 Thy natural magic and dire property,
 On wholesome life usurp immediately.
 [Pours the poison into the sleeper's ear.]

HAMLET He poisons him i' the garden for his estate. His name's

6. Promise.

7. Plot of the play in outline.

8. By a trope, figuratively.

9. Not wrenched. "Galled jade": injured horse.

"Withers": the area between a horse's shoulders.

1. Act as interpreter (regular feature in puppet shows).

2. Bitter, but Hamlet chooses to take the word sexually.

3. That is, for better or for worse, as in the marriage service—but in fact you "mis-take," deceive them.

4. Goddess of witchcraft's curse. "Confederate": favorable.

Gonzago: the story is extant, and written in very choice Italian: you shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of Gonzago's wife. 240

OPHELIA The king rises.

HAMLET What, frightened with false fire!<sup>5</sup>

QUEEN How fares my lord?

POLONIUS Give o'er the play.

KING Give me some light. Away! 245

POLONIUS Lights, lights, lights!

[Exeunt all but HAMLET and HORATIO.]

HAMLET Why, let the stricken deer go weep,
The hart ungallèd play;
For some must watch, while some must sleep:
Thus runs the world away. 250

Would not this, sir, and a forest of feathers—if the rest of my fortunes turn Turk with me—with two Provincial roses on my razed shoes, get me a fellowship in a cry<sup>6</sup> of players, sir?

HORATIO Half a share.

HAMLET A whole one, I. 255

For thou dost know, O Damon dear,
This realm dismantled was
Of Jove himself; and now reigns here
A very, very—pajock.

HORATIO You might have rhymed.<sup>7</sup> 260

HAMLET O good Horatio, I'll take the ghost's word for a thousand pound. Didst perceive?

HORATIO Very well, my lord.

HAMLET Upon the talk of the poisoning?

HORATIO I did very well note him. 265

HAMLET Ah, ha! Come, some music! come, the recorders!
For if the king like not the comedy,
Why then, belike, he likes it not, perdy.<sup>8</sup>
Come, some music!

[Re-enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

GUILDENSTERN Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you. 270

HAMLET Sir, a whole history.

GUILDENSTERN The king, sir—

HAMLET Aye, sir, what of him?

GUILDENSTERN Is in his retirement marvelous distempered.

HAMLET With drink, sir? 275

GUILDENSTERN No, my lord, rather with choler.<sup>9</sup>

HAMLET Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to the doctor; for, for me to put him to his purgation would perhaps plunge him into far more choler.

GUILDENSTERN Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame, 280 and start not so wildly from my affair.

5. Blank shot.

6. Company; a term generally used with hounds. "Turk with": betray. "Razed shoes": sometimes worn by actors.

7. Ass would have rhymed. "Pajock": peacock.

8. By God (per Dieu).

9. Bile, anger.

HAMLET I am tame, sir: pronounce.

GUILDENSTERN The queen, your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you.

HAMLET You are welcome. 285

GUILDENSTERN Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed. If it shall please you to make me a wholesome<sup>1</sup> answer, I will do your mother's commandment: if not, your pardon and my return shall be the end of my business.

HAMLET Sir, I cannot. 290

GUILDENSTERN What, my lord?

HAMLET Make you a wholesome answer; my wit's diseased: but, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command; or rather, as you say, my mother: therefore no more, but to the matter: my mother, you say,— 295

ROSENCRANTZ Then thus she says; your behavior hath struck her into amazement and admiration.<sup>2</sup>

HAMLET O wonderful son, that can so astonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of this mother's admiration? Impart.

ROSENCRANTZ She desires to speak with you in her closet, ere you go to bed. 300

HAMLET We shall obey, were she ten times our mother. Have you any further trade with us?

ROSENCRANTZ My lord, you once did love me.

HAMLET So I do still, by these pickers and stealers.<sup>3</sup> 305

ROSENCRANTZ Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? you do surely bar the door upon your own liberty, if you deny your griefs to your friend.

HAMLET Sir, I lack advancement.<sup>4</sup>

ROSENCRANTZ How can that be, when you have the voice of the king himself for your succession in Denmark? 310

HAMLET Aye, sir, but "while the grass grows,"<sup>5</sup>—the proverb is something musty.

[Re-enter PLAYERS with recorders.]

O, the recorders! let me see one. To withdraw with you:—why do you go about to recover the wind of me, as if you would drive me into a toil?<sup>6</sup> 315

GUILDENSTERN O, my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.

HAMLET I do not well understand that. Will you play upon this pipe?

GUILDENSTERN My lord, I cannot. 320

HAMLET I pray you.

GUILDENSTERN Believe me, I cannot.

HAMLET I do beseech you.

1. Sensible.

2. Confusion and surprise.

3. The hands.

4. Hamlet pretends that the cause of his "distemper" is frustrated ambition.

5. The proverb ends: "oft starves the silly steed."

6. Snare. "Withdraw": retire, talk in private. "Recover the wind of": get to the windward.

GUILDENSTERN I know no touch of it, my lord.

HAMLET It is as easy as lying: govern these ventages<sup>7</sup> with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops. 325

GUILDENSTERN But these cannot I command to any utterance of harmony; I have not the skill.

HAMLET Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! 330
You would play upon me; you would seem to know my stops; you would pluck out the heart of my mystery; you would sound me from my lowest note to the top of my compass: and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ; yet cannot you make it speak. 'Sblood, do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call 335 me what instrument you will, though you can fret<sup>8</sup> me, yet you cannot play upon me.

[Re-enter POLONIUS.]

God bless you, sir!

POLONIUS My lord, the queen would speak with you, and presently.

HAMLET Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel? 340

POLONIUS By the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed.

HAMLET Methinks it is like a weasel.

POLONIUS It is backed like a weasel.

HAMLET Or like a whale?

POLONIUS Very like a whale. 345

HAMLET Then I will come to my mother by and by. They fool me to the top of my bent. I will come by and by.

POLONIUS I will say so.

[Exit POLONIUS.]

HAMLET "By and by" is easily said. Leave me, friends.

[Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

'Tis now the very witching time of night, 350
When churchyards yawn, and hell itself breathes out
Contagion to this world: now could I drink hot blood,
And do such bitter business as the day
Would quake to look on. Soft! now to my mother.

O heart, lose not thy nature; let not ever 355
The soul of Nero<sup>9</sup> enter this firm bosom:
Let me be cruel, not unnatural:
I will speak daggers to her, but use none;
My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites;
How in my words soever she be shent, 360
To give them seals<sup>1</sup> never, my soul, consent!

[Exit.]

7. Windholes.

8. Vex, with a pun on frets, the ridges placed across the finger board of a guitar to regulate the fingering.

9. A Roman emperor (37–68 C.E.) who murdered his mother.

1. Ratify them by action. "Shent": reproached.

SCENE 3

[SCENE: A room in the castle.]

[Enter KING, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.]

KING I like him not, nor stands it safe with us

To let his madness range. Therefore prepare you;

I your commission will forthwith dispatch,

And he to England shall along with you:

The terms of our estate<sup>2</sup> may not endure

5

Hazard so near us as doth hourly grow

Out of his lunacies.

GUILDENSTERN We will ourselves provide:

Most holy and religious fear it is

To keep those many many bodies safe

That live and feed upon your majesty.

10

ROSENCRANTZ The single and peculiar<sup>3</sup> life is bound

With all the strength and armor of the mind

To keep itself from noyance; but much more

That spirit upon whose weal depends and rests

The lives of many. The cease<sup>4</sup> of majesty

15

Dies not alone, but like a gulf doth draw

What 's near it with it; it is a massy wheel,

Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,

To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things

Are mortised<sup>5</sup> and adjoined; which, when it falls, 20

Each small annexment, petty consequence,

Attends the boisterous ruin. Never alone

Did the king sigh, but with a general groan.

KING Arm you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage,

For we will fetters put about this fear,

25

Which now goes too free-footed.

ROSENCRANTZ } We will haste us.
GUILDENSTERN }

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN. —Enter POLONIUS.]

POLONIUS My lord, he's going to his mother's closet:

Behind the arras I'll convey myself,

To hear the process: I'll warrant she'll tax him home:<sup>6</sup>

30

And, as you said, and wisely was it said

'Tis meet that some more audience than a mother,

Since nature makes them partial, should o'erhear

The speech, of vantage.<sup>7</sup> Fare you well, my liege:

I'll call upon you ere you go to bed, 35

And tell you what I know.

KING Thanks, dear my lord.

[Exit POLONIUS.]

O, my offense is rank, it smells to heaven;

2. My position as king.

3. Individual.

4. Decease, extinction.

5. Fastened.

6. Take him to task thoroughly.

7. From a vantage point.

It hath the primal eldest curse<sup>8</sup> upon 't,
 A brother's murder. Pray can I not,
 Though inclination be as sharp as will: 40
 My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent,
 And like a man to double business bound,
 I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
 And both neglect. What if this cursed hand
 Were thicker than itself with brother's blood, 45
 Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens
 To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy
 But to confront the visage of offense?<sup>9</sup>
 And what's in prayer but this twofold force,
 To be forestalled ere we come to fall, 50
 Or pardoned being down? Then I'll look up;
 My fault is past. But O, what form of prayer
 Can serve my turn? "Forgive me my foul murder?"
 That cannot be, since I am still possessed
 Of those effects for which I did the murder, 55
 My crown, mine own ambition and my queen.
 May one be pardoned and retain the offense?<sup>1</sup>
 In the corrupted currents of this world
 Offense's gilded hand may shove by justice,
 And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize itself 60
 Buys out the law:<sup>2</sup> but 'tis not so above;
 There is no shuffling, there the action lies
 In his<sup>3</sup> true nature, and we ourselves compelled
 Even to the teeth and forehead of our faults
 To give in evidence. What then? what rests?<sup>4</sup> 65
 Try what repentance can: what can it not?
 Yet what can it when one can not repent?
 O wretched state! O bosom black as death!
 O limèd soul, that struggling to be free
 Art more engaged! Help, angels! make assay!<sup>5</sup> 70
 Bow, stubborn knees, and, heart with strings of steel,
 Be soft as sinews of the new-born babe!
 All may be well.

[Retires and kneels. —Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET Now might I do it pat,<sup>6</sup> now he is praying
 And now I'll do 't: and so he goes to heaven: 75
 And so am I revenged. That would be scanned;<sup>7</sup>
 A villain kills my father; and for that,
 I, his sole son, do this same villain send
 To heaven.

8. The curse of Cain.

9. Guilt.

1. The things obtained through the offense.

2. The wealth unduly acquired is used for bribery.

3. Its.

4. What remains?

5. Make the attempt! "Limèd": caught as with birdlime.

6. Conveniently.

7. Would have to be considered carefully.

O, this is hire and salary, not revenge. 80
 He took my father grossly, full of bread,
 With all his crimes broad blown, as flush as May;
 And how his audit<sup>8</sup> stands who knows save heaven?
 But in our circumstance and course of thought,
 'Tis heavy with him: and am I then revenged, 85
 To take him in the purging of his soul,
 When he is fit and seasoned<sup>9</sup> for his passage?
 No.
 Up, sword, and know thou a more horrid hent:<sup>1</sup>
 When he is drunk asleep, or in his rage, 90
 Or, in the incestuous pleasure of his bed;
 At game, a-swearing, or about some act
 That has no relish of salvation in 't;
 Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven
 And that his soul may be as damned and black 95
 As hell, whereto it goes. My mother stays:
 This physic but prolongs thy sickly days.
 [Exit.]
 KING [Rising.] My words fly up, my thoughts remain below:
 Words without thoughts never to heaven go.
 [Exit.]

SCENE 4

[SCENE: The Queen's closet.]

[Enter QUEEN and POLONIUS.]

POLONIUS He will come straight. Look you lay home to him:
 Tell him his pranks have been too broad<sup>2</sup> to bear with,
 And that your grace hath screen'd and stood between Much heat and him. I'll sconce me even here.
 Pray you, be round<sup>3</sup> with him.

HAMLET [Within.] Mother, mother, mother! 5
 QUEEN I'll warrant you; fear me not. Withdraw,
 I hear him coming.

[POLONIUS hides behind the arras. —Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET Now, mother, what's the matter?
 QUEEN Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended.
 HAMLET Mother, you have my father much offended. 10
 QUEEN Come, come, you answer with an idle tongue.
 HAMLET Go, go, you question with a wicked tongue.
 QUEEN Why, how now, Hamlet!
 HAMLET What's the matter now?
 QUEEN Have you forgot me?
 HAMLET No, by the rood,<sup>4</sup> not so:
 You are the queen, your husband's brother's wife; 15

8. Account. "Broad blown": in full bloom.

lesson.

9. Ripe, ready.

3. Straightforward.

1. Grip.

4. Cross.

2. Unrestrained. "Lay home": give him a stern

- And—would it were not so!—you are my mother.
 QUEEN Nay, then, I'll set those to you that can speak.
 HAMLET Come, come, and sit you down; you shall not budge:
 You go not till I set you up a glass<sup>5</sup>
 Where you may see the inmost part of you. 20
 QUEEN What wilt thou do? thou wilt not murder me?
 Help, help, ho!
 POLONIUS [Behind.] What, ho! help, help, help!
 HAMLET [Drawing.] How now! a rat? Dead, for a ducat, dead!
 [Makes a pass through the arras.]
 POLONIUS [Behind.] O, I am slain!
 [Falls and dies.]
 QUEEN O me, what hast thou done? 25
 HAMLET Nay, I know not: is it the king?
 QUEEN O, what a rash and bloody deed is this!
 HAMLET A bloody deed! almost as bad, good mother,
 As kill a king, and marry with his brother.
 QUEEN As kill a king!
 HAMLET Aye, lady, 'twas my word. 30
 [Lifts up the arras and discovers POLONIUS.]
 Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell!
 I took thee for thy better: take thy fortune;
 Thou find'st to be too busy<sup>6</sup> is some danger.
 Leave wringing of your hands: peace! sit you down,
 And let me wring your heart: for so I shall, 35
 If it be made of penetrable stuff;
 If damned custom have not brassed it so,
 That it be proof and bulwark against sense.<sup>7</sup>
 QUEEN What have I done, that thou dar'est wag thy tongue
 In noise so rude against me?
 HAMLET Such an act 40
 That blurs the grace and blush of modesty,
 Calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose
 From the fair forehead of an innocent love,
 And sets a blister there; makes marriage vows
 As false as dicers' oaths: O, such a deed 45
 As from the body of contraction<sup>8</sup> plucks
 The very soul, and sweet religion makes
 A rhapsody of words: heaven's face doth glow;<sup>9</sup>
 Yea, this solidity and compound mass,
 With tristful visage, as against the doom,<sup>1</sup> 50
 Is thought-sick at the act.
 QUEEN Aye me, what act,
 That roars so loud and thunders in the index?<sup>2</sup>
 HAMLET Look here, upon this picture, and on this,
 The counterfeit presentment<sup>3</sup> of two brothers. 55

5. Mirror.

6. Too much of a busybody.

7. Feeling.

8. Duty to the marriage contract.

9. Blush with shame.

1. Doomsday. "Tristful": sad.

2. Prologue, table of contents.

3. Portrait.

See what a grace was seated on this brow;
 Hyperion's curls, the front of Jove himself,
 An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;
 A station<sup>4</sup> like the herald Mercury
 New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill; 60
 A combination and a form indeed,
 Where every god did seem to set his seal
 To give the world assurance of a man:
 This was your husband. Look you now, what follows:
 Here is your husband; like a mildewed ear,<sup>5</sup> 65
 Blasting his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?
 Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed,
 And batten<sup>6</sup> on this moor? Ha! have you eyes?
 You cannot call it love, for at your age
 The hey-day in the blood is tame, it's humble, 70
 And waits upon<sup>7</sup> the judgment: and what judgment
 Would step from this to this? Sense sure you have,
 Else could you not have motion: but sure that sense
 Is apoplexed: for madness would not err,
 Nor sense to ecstasy was ne'er so thrall'd 75
 But it reserved some quantity of choice,
 To serve in such a difference. What devil was 't
 That thus hath cozened you at hoodman-blind?<sup>8</sup>
 Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,
 Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans<sup>9</sup> all, 80
 Or but a sickly part of one true sense
 Could not so mope.<sup>1</sup>
 O shame! where is thy blush? Rebellious hell,
 If thou canst mutine in a matron's bones,
 To flaming youth let virtue be as wax 85
 And melt in her own fire: proclaim no shame
 When the compulsive ardor gives the charge,<sup>2</sup>
 Since frost itself as actively doth burn,
 And reason panders<sup>3</sup> will.
 QUEEN O Hamlet, speak no more:
 Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul, 90
 And there I see such black and grained spots
 As will not leave their tinct.<sup>4</sup>
 HAMLET Nay, but to live
 In the rank sweat of an enseamed<sup>5</sup> bed, Stew'd in corruption, honeying and making love
 Over the nasty sty,—
 QUEEN O, speak to me no more; 95
 These words like daggers enter in my ears;

4. Posture.

5. Of corn.

6. Gorge, fatten. "Leave": cease.

7. Is subordinated to.

8. Blindman's buff. "Cozened": tricked.

9. Without.

1. Be stupid.

2. Attack.

3. Becomes subservient to.

4. Lose their color. "Grained": dyed in.

5. Greasy.

No more, sweet Hamlet!

HAMLET                   A murderer and a villain;
A slave that is not twentieth part the tithe<sup>6</sup>
Of your précèdent lord; a vice of kings;
A cutpurse<sup>7</sup> of the empire and the rule,
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole
And put it in his pocket!

100

QUEEN                   No more!

HAMLET   A king of shreds and patches—
[Enter GHOST.]

Save me, and hover o'er me with your wings,
You heavenly guards! What would your gracious figure?

105

QUEEN   Alas, he's mad!

HAMLET   Do you not come your tardy son to chide,
That, lapsed in time and passion, lets go by
The important acting of your dread command?
O, say!

GHOST   Do not forget: this visitation

110

Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.
But look, amazement on thy mother sits:
O, step between her and her fighting soul:
Conceit<sup>8</sup> in weakest bodies strongest works:
Speak to her, Hamlet.

HAMLET                   How is it with you, lady?

115

QUEEN   Alas, how is 't with you,
That you do bend your eye on vacancy
And with the incorporal air do hold discourse?
Forth at your eyes your spirits wildly peep;
And, as the sleeping soldiers in the alarm,
Your bedded hairs, like life in excrements,<sup>9</sup>
Start up and stand on end. O gentle son,
Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper
Sprinkle cool patience. Whereon do you look?

120

HAMLET   On him, on him! Look you how pale he glares!
His form and cause conjoined, preaching to stones,
Would make them capable.<sup>1</sup> Do not look upon me,
Lest with this piteous action you convert
My stern effects:<sup>2</sup> then what I have to do
Will want true color; tears perchance for<sup>3</sup> blood.

125

130

QUEEN   To whom do you speak this?

HAMLET                   Do you see nothing there?

QUEEN   Nothing at all; yet all that is I see.

HAMLET   Nor did you nothing hear?

QUEEN                   No, nothing but ourselves.

HAMLET   Why, look you there! look, how it steals away!

6. Tenth.

7. Pickpocket. "Vice": clown, from the custom in the old morality plays of having a buffoon take the part of Vice or of a particular vice.

8. Imagination.

9. Outgrowths. "Alarm": call to arms.

1. Of feeling.

2. You make me change my purpose.

3. Instead of.

My father, in his habit as he lived!
 Look, where he goes, even now, out at the portal!
 [Exit GHOST.]

QUEEN This is the very coinage of your brain:
 This bodiless creation ecstasy
 Is very cunning in.

HAMLET Ecstasy!
 My pulse, as yours, doth temperately keep time,
 And makes as healthful music: it is not madness
 That I have uttered: bring me to the test,
 And I the matter will re-word, which madness
 Would gambol from. Mother, for love of grace,
 Lay not that flattering unction to your soul,
 That not your trespass but my madness speaks:
 It will but skin and film the ulcerous place,
 Whiles rank corruption, mining all within,
 Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven;
 Repent what's past, avoid what is to come,
 And do not spread the compost on the weeds,
 To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue,
 For in the fatness of these pursy<sup>4</sup> times
 Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg.
 Yea, curb<sup>5</sup> and woo for leave to do him good.

QUEEN O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain.

HAMLET O, throw away the worser part of it,
 And live the purer with the other half.
 Good night: but go not to my uncle's bed;
 Assume a virtue, if you have it not.
 That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,
 Of habits devil, is angel yet in this,
 That to the use of actions fair and good
 He likewise gives a frock or livery,
 That aptly is put on.<sup>6</sup> Refrain to-night,
 And that shall lend a kind of easiness
 To the next abstinence; the next more easy;
 For use almost can change the stamp<sup>7</sup> of nature,
 And either curb the devil, or throw him out
 With wondrous potency. Once more, good night:
 And when you are desirous to be blest,
 I'll blessing beg of you. For this same lord,
 [Pointing to POLONIUS.]
 I do repent: but heaven hath pleased it so,
 To punish me with this, and this with me,
 That I must be their scourge and minister.
 I will bestow<sup>8</sup> him, and will answer well
 The death I gave him. So, again, good night.

4. Swollen from pampering.

5. Bow.

6. I.e., habit, although like a devil in establishing evil ways in us, is like an angel in doing the same for virtues. "Aptly": easily.

7. Cast, form. "Use": habit.

8. Stow away. "Minister": agent of punishment.

I must be cruel, only to be kind:
 Thus bad begins, and worse remains behind.
 One word more, good lady.

QUEEN What shall I do? 180

HAMLET Not this, by no means, that I bid you do:
 Let the bloat<sup>9</sup> king tempt you again to bed;
 Pinch wanton on your cheek, call you his mouse;
 And let him, for a pair of reechy<sup>1</sup> kisses,
 Or paddling in your neck with his damned fingers, 185
 Make you to ravel all this matter out,
 That I essentially am not in madness,
 But mad in craft.<sup>2</sup> 'Twere good you let him know;
 For who, that's but a queen, fair, sober, wise,
 Would from a paddock, from a bat, a gib, 190
 Such dear concernings<sup>3</sup> hide? who would do so?
 No, in despite of sense and secrecy,
 Unpeg the basket on the house's top,
 Let the birds fly, and like the famous ape,<sup>4</sup>
 To try conclusions, in the basket creep 195
 And break your own neck down.

QUEEN Be thou assured, if words be made of breath
 And breath of life, I have no life to breathe
 What thou hast said to me.

HAMLET I must to England; you know that?

QUEEN Alack, 200
 I had forgot: 'tis so concluded on.

HAMLET There's letters sealed: and my two schoolfellows,
 Whom I will trust as I will adders fanged,
 They bear the mandate; they must sweep my way,
 And marshal me to knavery. Let it work; 205
 For 'tis the sport to have the engineer Hoist with his own petar;<sup>5</sup> and 't shall go hard
 But I will delve one yard below their mines,
 And blow them at the moon: I, 'tis most sweet
 When in one line two crafts directly meet. 210
 This man shall set me packing:
 I'll lug the guts into the neighbor room.
 Mother, good night. Indeed this councillor
 Is now most still, most secret and most grave,<sup>6</sup>
 Who was in life a foolish prating knave. 215
 Come, sir, to draw toward an end with you.
 Good night, mother.

[Exeunt severally; HAMLET dragging in POLONIUS.]

9. Bloated with drink.

1. Fetid.

2. Simulation.

3. Matters with which one is closely concerned. "Paddock": toad. "Gib": tomcat.

4. The ape in the unidentified animal fable to which Hamlet alludes; apparently the animal saw birds fly out of a basket and drew the conclusion that by placing himself in a basket he could fly, too.

5. Petard, a variety of bomb. "Marshal": lead. "Engineer": military engineer. "Hoist": blow up.

6. Hamlet is punning on the word.

Act 4

SCENE I

[SCENE: A room in the castle.]

[Enter KING, QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.]

KING There's matter in these sighs, these profound heaves:

You must translate: 'tis fit we understand them.

Where is your son?

QUEEN Bestow this place on us<sup>7</sup> a little while.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Ah, mine own lord, what have I seen to-night!

5

KING What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?

QUEEN Mad as the sea and wind, when both contend

Which is the mightier: in his lawless fit,

Behind the arras hearing something stir,

Whips out his rapier, cries "A rat, a rat!"

10

And in this brainish apprehension<sup>8</sup> kills

The unseen good old man.

KING O heavy deed!

It had been so with us, had we been there:

His liberty is full of threats to all,

To you yourself, to us, to every one.

15

Alas, how shall this bloody deed be answered?

It will be laid to us, whose providence

Should have kept short,<sup>9</sup> restrained and out of haunt,

This mad young man: but so much was our love,

We would not understand what was most fit,

20

But, like the owner of a foul disease,

To keep it from divulging, let it feed

Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?

QUEEN To draw apart the body he hath killed:

O'er whom his very madness, like some ore

25

Among a mineral<sup>1</sup> of metals base,

Shows itself pure; he weeps for what is done.

KING O Gertrude, come away!

The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch,

But we will ship him hence: and this vile deed

30

We must, with all our majesty and skill,

Both countenance<sup>2</sup> and excuse. Ho, Guildenstern!

[Re-enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Friends both, go join you with some further aid:

Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,

And from his mother's closet hath he dragged him:

35

Go seek him out; speak fair, and bring the body

Into the chapel. I pray you, haste in this.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

7. Leave us alone.

1. Mine. "Ore": gold.

8. Imaginary notion.

2. Recognize.

9. Under close watch.

Come, Gertrude, we'll call up our wisest friends;
 And let them know, both what we mean to do,
 And what's untimely done. . . .<sup>3</sup> 40
 Whose whisper o'er the world's diameter
 As level as the cannon to his blank<sup>4</sup>
 Transports his poisoned shot, may miss our name
 And hit the woundless air. O, come away!
 My soul is full of discord and dismay. 45
 [Exeunt.]

SCENE 2

[SCENE: Another room in the castle.]

[Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET Safely stowed.

ROSENCRANTZ } [Within.] Hamlet! Lord Hamlet!
 GUILDENSTERN }

HAMLET But soft, what noise? who calls on Hamlet?
 O, here they come.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

ROSENCRANTZ What have you done, my lord, with the dead body? 5

HAMLET Compounded<sup>5</sup> it with dust, whereto 'tis kin.

ROSENCRANTZ Tell us where 'tis, that we may take it thence
 And bear it to the chapel.

HAMLET Do not believe it.

ROSENCRANTZ Believe what? 10

HAMLET That I can keep your counsel and not mine own. Besides, to be demanded of a sponge! what replication<sup>6</sup> should be made by the son of a king?

ROSENCRANTZ Take you me for a sponge, my lord?

HAMLET Aye, sir; that soaks up the king's countenance,<sup>7</sup> his rewards, 15 his authorities. But such officers do the king best service in the end:
 he keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed: when he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and sponge, you shall be dry again.

ROSENCRANTZ I understand you not, my lord. 20

HAMLET I am glad of it: a knavish speech sleeps in a foolish ear.

ROSENCRANTZ My lord, you must tell us where the body is, and go with us to the king.

HAMLET The body is with the king, but the king is not with the body.
 The king is a thing— 25

GUILDENSTERN A thing, my lord?

HAMLET Of nothing; bring me to him. Hide fox, and all after.<sup>8</sup>
 [Exeunt.]

3. This gap in the text has been guessingly filled in with "So envious slander."

4. His target.

5. Mixed.

6. Formal reply. "Demanded": questioned by.

7. Favor.

8. A children's game.

SCENE 3

[SCENE: Another room in the castle.]

[Enter KING, attended.]

KING I have sent to seek him, and to find the body.

How dangerous is it that this man goes loose!

Yet must not we put the strong law on him:

He's loved of the distracted multitude,

Who like not in their judgment, but their eyes;

And where 'tis so, the offender's scourge is weighed,

But never the offense. To bear<sup>9</sup> all smooth and even,

This sudden sending away must seem

Deliberate pause: diseases desperate grown

By desperate appliance<sup>1</sup> are relieved,

Or not at all.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ.]

How now! what hath befall'n?

ROSENCRANTZ Where the dead body is bestowed, my lord,

We cannot get from him.

KING But where is he?

ROSENCRANTZ Without, my lord; guarded, to know your pleasure.

KING Bring him before us.

ROSENCRANTZ Ho, Guildenstern! bring in my lord.

[Enter HAMLET and GUILDENSTERN.]

KING Now, Hamlet, where's Polonius?

HAMLET At supper.

KING At supper! where?

HAMLET Not where he eats, but where he is eaten: a certain convocation of public worms are e'en at him. Your worm is your only emperor for diet;<sup>2</sup> we fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots: your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service,<sup>3</sup> two dishes, but to one table: that's the end.

KING Alas, alas!

HAMLET A man may fish with the worm that hath eat of a king, and eat of the fish that hath fed of that worm.

KING What dost thou mean by this?

HAMLET Nothing but to show you how a king may go a progress<sup>4</sup> through the guts of a beggar.

KING Where is Polonius?

HAMLET In heaven; send thither to see: if your messenger find him not there, seek him i' the other place yourself. But indeed, if you find him not within this month, you shall nose<sup>5</sup> him as you go up the stairs into the lobby.

KING [To some attendants.] Go seek him there.

HAMLET He will stay till you come.

9. Conduct. "Scourge": punishment.

1. Treatment. "Deliberate pause": the result of careful argument.

2. Possibly a punning reference to the Diet

(assembly) of the Holy Roman Empire at Worms.

3. That is, the service varies, not the food.

4. Royal state journey.

5. Smell.

[Exeunt attendants.]

KING Hamlet, this deed, for thine especial safety,
Which we do tender,<sup>6</sup> as we dearly grieve
For that which thou hast done, must send thee hence 40
With fiery quickness: therefore prepare thyself;
The bark is ready and the wind at help,
The associates tend, and every thing is bent
For England.

HAMLET For England?

KING Aye, Hamlet.

HAMLET Good.

KING So is it, if thou knew'st our purposes. 45

HAMLET I see a cherub that sees them. But, come; for England!

Farewell, dear mother.

KING Thy loving father, Hamlet.

HAMLET My mother: father and mother is man and wife; man and wife is one flesh, and so, my mother. Come, for England! 50

[Exit.]

KING Follow him at foot;<sup>7</sup> tempt him with speed aboard;

Delay it not; I'll have him hence to-night:

Away! for every thing is sealed and done

That else leans on<sup>8</sup> the affair: pray you, make haste.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

And, England,<sup>9</sup> if my love thou hold'st at aught— 55

As my great power thereof may give thee sense,

Since yet thy cicatrice looks raw and red

After the Danish sword, and thy free awe

Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set<sup>1</sup>

Our sovereign process; which imports at full, 60

By letters conjuring<sup>2</sup> to that effect,

The present death of Hamlet. Do it, England;

For like the hectic<sup>3</sup> in my blood he rages,

And thou must cure me; till I know 'tis done,

Howe'er my haps, my joys were ne'er begun. 65

[Exit.]

SCENE 4

[SCENE: A plain in Denmark.]

[Enter FORTINBRAS, a CAPTAIN, and soldiers, marching.]

FORTINBRAS Go, captain, from me greet the Danish king;

Tell him that by his license Fortinbras

Craves the conveyance<sup>4</sup> of a promised march

Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.

If that his majesty would aught with us, 5

6. Care for.

7. At his heels.

8. Pertains to.

9. The king of England.

1. Regard with indifference.

2. Enjoining.

3. Fever.

4. Convoy.

We shall express our duty in his eye;<sup>5</sup>
And let him know so.

CAPTAIN I will do 't, my lord.

FORTINBRAS Go softly on.

[Exeunt FORTINBRAS and soldiers. —Enter HAMLET, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and others.]

HAMLET Good sir, whose powers<sup>6</sup> are these?

CAPTAIN They are of Norway, sir. 10

HAMLET How purposed, sir, I pray you?

CAPTAIN Against some part of Poland.

HAMLET Who commands them, sir?

CAPTAIN The nephew to Old Norway, Fortinbras.

HAMLET Goes it against the main<sup>7</sup> of Poland, sir, 15

Or for some frontier?

CAPTAIN Truly to speak, and with no addition,

We go to gain a little patch of ground

That hath in it no profit but the name.

To pay five ducats, five, I would not farm it; 20

Nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole

A ranker rate, should it be sold in fee.<sup>8</sup>

HAMLET Why, then the Polack never will defend it.

CAPTAIN Yes, it is already garrisoned.

HAMLET Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats 25

Will not debate the question of this straw!

This is the imposthume<sup>9</sup> of much wealth and peace,

That inward breaks, and shows no cause without

Why the man dies. I humbly thank you, sir.

CAPTAIN God be wi' you, sir.

[Exit.]

ROSENCRANTZ Will 't please you go, my lord? 30

HAMLET I'll be with you straight. Go a little before.

[Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

How all occasions do inform against<sup>1</sup> me,

And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,

If his chief good and market<sup>2</sup> of his time

Be but to sleep and feed? a beast, no more. 35

Sure, he that made us with such large discourse,<sup>3</sup>

Looking before and after, gave us not

That capability and god-like reason

To fust<sup>4</sup> in us unused. Now, whether it be

Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple 40

Of thinking too precisely on the event,<sup>5</sup>—

A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom

And ever three parts coward,—I do not know

Why yet I live to say “this thing's to do,”

5. Presence.

6. Armed forces.

7. The whole of.

8. For absolute possession. “Ranker”: higher.

9. Ulcer.

1. Denounce.

2. Payment for, reward.

3. Reasoning power.

4. Become moldy, taste of the cask.

5. Outcome.

Sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means, 45
 To do 't. Examples gross as earth exhort me:
 Witness this army, of such mass and charge,<sup>6</sup>
 Led by a delicate and tender prince,
 Whose spirit with divine ambition puffed
 Makes mouths<sup>7</sup> at the invisible event, 50
 Exposing what is mortal and unsure
 To all that fortune, death, and danger dare, Even for an egg-shell. Rightly to be great
 Is not to stir without great argument,
 But greatly to find quarrel in a straw 55
 When honor's at the stake. How stand I then,
 That have a father killed, a mother stained,
 Excitements of my reason and my blood,
 And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
 The imminent death of twenty thousand men, 60
 That for a fantasy and trick<sup>8</sup> of fame
 Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
 Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,<sup>9</sup>
 Which is not tomb enough and continent<sup>1</sup>
 To hide the slain? O, from this time forth, 65
 My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth!
 [Exit.]

SCENE 5

[SCENE: Elsinore. A room in the castle.]

[Enter QUEEN, HORATIO, and a GENTLEMAN.]

QUEEN I will not speak with her.

GENTLEMAN She is importunate, indeed distract:
 Her mood will needs be pitied.

QUEEN What would she have?

GENTLEMAN She speaks much of her father, says she hears
 There's tricks i' the world, and hems and beats her heart, 5
 Spurns enviously at straws;<sup>2</sup> speaks things in doubt,
 That carry but half sense: her speech is nothing,
 Yet the unshapèd use of it doth move
 The hearers to collection; they aim<sup>3</sup> at it,
 And botch<sup>4</sup> the words up fit to their own thoughts; 10
 Which, as her winks and nods and gestures yield them,
 Indeed would make one think there might be thought,
 Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.

HORATIO 'Twere good she were spoken with, for she may strew Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding minds.<sup>5</sup> 15

6. Cost.

7. Laughs at.

8. Trifle.

9. So small that it cannot hold the men who fight for it.

1. Container.

2. Gets angry at trifles.

3. Guess. "Collection": gathering up her words and trying to make sense of them.

4. Patch.

5. Minds breeding evil thoughts.

QUEEN Let her come in.

[Exit GENTLEMAN.]

[Aside.] To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,
Each toy seems prologue to some great amiss:
So full of artless jealousy<sup>6</sup> is guilt,
It spills itself in fearing to be spilt.

20

[Re-enter GENTLEMAN, with OPHELIA.]

OPHELIA Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?

QUEEN How now, Ophelia!

OPHELIA [Sings.] How should I your true love know
From another one?

By his cockle hat and staff      25
And his sandal shoon.<sup>7</sup>

QUEEN Alas, sweet lady, what imports this song?

OPHELIA Say you? nay, pray you, mark.

[Sings.] He is dead and gone, lady,

He is dead and gone;

30

At his head a grass-green turf,

At his heels a stone.

Oh, oh!

QUEEN Nay, but Ophelia,—

OPHELIA Pray you, mark.

[Sings.] White his shroud as the mountain snow,— 35

[Enter KING.]

QUEEN Alas, look here, my lord.

OPHELIA [Sings.] Larded<sup>8</sup> with sweet flowers;
Which bewept to the grave did—not—go
With true-love showers.

KING How do you, pretty lady?

40

OPHELIA Well, God 'ild<sup>9</sup> you! They say the owl was a baker's daughter.
Lord, we know what we are, but know not what we may be.<sup>1</sup> God be at your table!

KING Conceit upon her father.

OPHELIA Pray you, let's have no words of this; but when they ask you what it means, say you this:      45

[Sings.] To-morrow is Saint Valentine's day

All in the morning betime,

And I a maid at your window,

To be your Valentine.

50

Then up he rose, and donned his clothes,

And dupped<sup>2</sup> the chamber-door;

Let in the maid, that out a maid

Never departed more.

6. Uncontrolled suspicion. "Toy": trifle.
"Amis": misfortune.

7. Shoes. These are all typical signs of pilgrims traveling to places of devotion.

8. Garnished.

9. Yield—that is, repay.

1. An allusion to a folk tale about a baker's daughter changed into an owl for having shown no charity to those in need.

2. Opened.

KING Pretty Ophelia!

55

OPHELIA Indeed, la, without an oath, I'll make an end on 't:

[Sings.] By Gis<sup>3</sup> and by Saint Charity,

Alack, and fie for shame!

Young men will do 't, if they come to 't;

By Cock,<sup>4</sup> they are to blame.

60

Quoth she, before you tumbled me,

You promised me to wed.

He answers:

So would I ha' done, by yonder sun,

An thou hadst not come to my bed.

65

KING How long hath she been thus?

OPHELIA I hope all will be well. We must be patient: but I cannot choose but weep, to think they should lay him i' the cold ground.

My brother shall know of it: and so I thank you for your good counsel.

Come, my coach! Good night, ladies; good night, sweet ladies; good night, good night.

70

[Exit.]

KING Follow her close; give her good watch, I pray you.

[Exit HORATIO.]

O, this is the poison of deep grief; it springs

All from her father's death. O Gertrude, Gertrude,

When sorrows come, they come not single spies,

75

But in battalions! First, her father slain:

Next, your son gone; and he most violent author

Of his own just remove: the people muddied,<sup>5</sup>

Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers,

For good Polonius' death; and we have done but greenly

80

In hugger-mugger<sup>6</sup> to inter him: poor Ophelia

Divided from herself and her fair judgment,

Without the which we are pictures, or mere beasts:

Last, and as much containing as all these,

Her brother is in secret come from France,

85

Feeds on his wonder,<sup>7</sup> keeps himself in clouds,

And wants not buzzers<sup>8</sup> to infect his ear

With pestilent speeches of his father's death;

Wherein necessity, of matter beggared,<sup>9</sup>

Will nothing stick our person to arraign<sup>1</sup>

90

In ear and ear. O my dear Gertrude, this,

Like to a murdering-piece,<sup>2</sup> in many places

Gives me superfluous death.

3. By Jesus.

4. Corruption of God, but with a sexual undermeaning.

5. Confused, their thoughts made turbid (as water by mud).

6. Hasty secrecy. "Greenly": foolishly.

7. Broods, keeps wondering.

8. Lacks not tale-bearers.

9. The necessity to build up a story without the materials for doing so.

1. Will not hesitate to accuse me.

2. A variety of cannon that scattered its shot in many directions.

[A noise within.]

QUEEN Alack, what noise is this?

KING Where are my Switzers?<sup>3</sup> Let them guard the door.

[Enter another GENTLEMAN.]

What is the matter?

GENTLEMAN Save yourself, my lord:

95

The ocean, overpeering of his list,<sup>4</sup>

Eats not the flats with more impetuous haste

Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,<sup>5</sup>

O'erbears your officers. The rabble call him lord;

And, as the world were now but to begin,

100

Antiquity forgot, custom not known,

The ratifiers and props of every word,

They cry "Choose we; Laertes shall be king!"

Caps, hands and tongues applaud it to the clouds,

"Laertes shall be king, Laertes king!"

105

QUEEN How cheerfully on the false trail they cry!

O, this is counter,<sup>6</sup> you false Danish dogs!

[Noise within.]

KING The doors are broke.

[Enter LAERTES, armed; DANES following.]

LAERTES Where is this king? Sirs, stand you all without.

DANES No, let's come in.

LAERTES I pray you, give me leave.

110

DANES We will, we will.

[They retire without the door.]

LAERTES I thank you: keep the door. O thou vile king,

Give me my father!

QUEEN Calmly, good Laertes.

LAERTES That drop of blood that's calm proclaims me bastard;

Cries cuckold to my father; brands the harlot

115

Even here, between the chaste unsmirch'd brows

Of my true mother.

KING What is the cause, Laertes,

That thy rebellion looks so giant-like?

Let him go, Gertrude; do not fear<sup>7</sup> our person

There's such divinity doth hedge a king,

120

That treason can but peep to what it would,<sup>8</sup>

Acts little of his<sup>9</sup> will. Tell me, Laertes,

Why thou art thus incensed: let him go, Gertrude Speak, man.

LAERTES Where is my father?

KING Dead.

QUEEN But not by him.

125

KING Let him demand his fill.

3. Swiss guards.

4. Overflowing above the high-water mark.

5. Group of rebels.

6. Following the scent in the wrong direction.

7. Fear for.

8. Look from a distance at what it desires.

9. Its.

LAERTES How came he dead? I'll not be juggled with
 To hell, allegiance! vows, to the blackest devil!
 Conscience and grace, to the profoundest pit
 I dare damnation: to this point I stand, 130
 That both the worlds I give to negligence,<sup>1</sup>
 Let come what comes; only I'll be revenged
 Most thoroughly for my father.

KING Who shall stay you?

LAERTES My will, not all the world
 And for my means, I'll husband them so well, 135
 They shall go far with little.

KING Good Laertes,
 If you desire to know the certainty
 Of your dear father's death, is 't writ in your revenge
 That, swoopstake,<sup>2</sup> you will draw both friend and foe, Winner and loser? 140

LAERTES None but his enemies.

KING Will you know them then?

LAERTES To his good friends thus wide I'll ope my arms;
 And, like the kind life-rendering pelican,<sup>3</sup>
 Repast them with my blood.

KING Why, now you speak
 Like a good child and a true gentleman. 145
 That I am guiltless of your father's death,
 And am most sensibly in grief for it,
 It shall as level to your judgment pierce
 As day does to your eye.

DANES [Within.] Let her come in.

LAERTES How now! what noise is that? 150
 [Re-enter OPHELIA.]
 O heat, dry up my brains! tears seven times salt,
 Burn out the sense and virtue<sup>4</sup> of mine eye!
 By heaven, thy madness shall be paid with weight,
 Till our scale turn the beam. O rose of May!
 Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia! 155
 O heavens! is 't possible a young maid's wits
 Should be as mortal as an old man's life?
 Nature is fine in love, and where 'tis fine
 It sends some precious instance<sup>5</sup> of itself
 After the thing it loves. 160

OPHELIA [Sings.] They bore him barefaced on the bier
 Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny
 And in his grave rained many a tear,—
 Fare you well, my dove!

1. I don't care what may happen to me in either this world or the next.
 2. Without making any distinction, as the winner takes the whole stake in a card game.

3. In myth, the pelican is supposed to feed its young with its own blood.
 4. Power, faculty.
 5. Sample, token. "Fine": refined.

LAERTES Hadst thou thy wits, and didst persuade revenge, 165
 It could not move thus.

OPHELIA [Sings.] You must sing down a-down,
 An you call him a-down-a.
 O, how the wheel becomes it! It is the false steward,<sup>6</sup> that stole his master's daughter. 170

LAERTES This nothing's more than matter.<sup>7</sup>

OPHELIA There's rosemary, that's for remembrance: pray you, love, remember: and there is pansies, that's for thoughts.

LAERTES A document<sup>8</sup> in madness; thoughts and remembrance fitted.

OPHELIA There's fennel for you, and columbines: there's rue for you: 175 and here's some for me: we may call it herbs of grace o' Sundays: O, you must wear your rue with a difference. There's a daisy: I would give you some violets,<sup>9</sup> but they withered all when my father died:
 they say he made a good end,— [Sings.] For bonnie sweet Robin is all my joy. 180

LAERTES Thought and affliction, passion, hell itself,
 She turns to favor<sup>1</sup> and to prettiness.

OPHELIA [Sings.] And will he not come again?
 And will he not come again?
 No, no, he is dead, 185
 Go to thy death-bed,
 He never will come again.
 His beard was as white as snow,
 All flaxen was his poll
 He is gone, he is gone, 190
 And we cast away moan
 God ha' mercy on his soul!

And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God be wi' you.
 [Exit.]

LAERTES Do you see this, O God?

KING Laertes, I must commune with your grief, 195
 Or you deny me right. Go but apart,
 Make choice of whom your wisest friends you will.
 And they shall hear and judge 'twixt you and me:
 If by direct or by collateral hand
 They find us touched,<sup>2</sup> we will our kingdom give, 200
 Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours,
 To you in satisfaction; but if not,
 Be you content to lend your patience to us,
 And we shall jointly labor with your soul
 To give it due content.

6. An allusion (probably to a lost ballad) further expressing Ophelia's preoccupation with betrayal, lost love, and death. "How the wheel becomes it": that is, how well the refrain fits.

7. This nonsense is more indicative than sane speech.

8. Lesson. Traditionally, flowers and herbs have symbolic meanings. Here rosemary is the symbol for remembrance and pansies symbolize thoughts.

9. Violets symbolize faithfulness. Fennel stands for flattery, columbines for cuckoldom, and rue for sorrow and repentance (compare the verb rue).

1. Charm.

2. Involved (in the murder). "Collateral": indirect.

SCENE 7

[SCENE: Another room in the castle.]

[Enter KING and LAERTES.]

KING Now must your conscience my acquittance seal,
And you must put me in your heart for friend,
Sith you have heard, and with a knowing ear,
That he which hath your noble father slain
Pursued my life.

LAERTES It well appears: but tell me 5
Why you proceeded not against these feats,
So crimeful and so capital in nature,
As by your safety, wisdom, all things else,
You mainly<sup>7</sup> were stirred up.

KING O, for two special reasons, 10
Which may to you perhaps seem much unsinewed,<sup>8</sup>
But yet to me they're strong. The queen his mother Lives almost by his looks; and for myself—
My virtue or my plague, be it either which—
She's so conjunctive<sup>9</sup> to my life and soul,
That, as the star moves not but in his sphere, 15
I could not but by her. The other motive,
Why to a public count I might not go,
Is the great love the general gender<sup>1</sup> bear him;
Who, dipping all his faults in their affection,
Would, like the spring that turneth wood to stone, 20
Convert his gyves<sup>2</sup> to graces; so that my arrows,
Too slightly timber'd for so loud a wind,
Would have reverted to my bow again
And not where I had aim'd them.

LAERTES And so have I a noble father lost; 25
A sister driven into desperate terms,
Whose worth, if praises may go back again,
Stood challenger on mount of<sup>3</sup> all the age
For her perfections: but my revenge will come.

KING Break not your sleeps for that: you must not think 30
That we are made of stuff so flat and dull
That we can let our beard be shook with danger
And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more:
I loved your father, and we love ourself;
And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine— 35

[Enter a MESSENGER, with letters.]

How now! what news?

MESSENGER Letters, my lord, from Hamlet:
This to your majesty; this to the queen.

KING From Hamlet! who brought them?

7. Powerfully.

8. Weak.

9. Closely joined.

1. Common people. "Count": accounting, trial.

2. Leg irons (shames).

3. Above. "Go back": to what she was before her madness.

MESSSENGER Sailors, my lord, they say; I saw them not:
 They were given me by Claudio; he received them 40
 Of him that brought them.

KING Laertes, you shall hear them.
 Leave us.

[Exit MESSENGER.]

[Reads.] "High and mighty, you shall know I am set naked on your kingdom. To-morrow shall I beg leave to see your kingly eyes: when 45
 I shall, first asking your pardon thereunto, recount the occasion of my sudden and more strange return. HAMLET."

What should this mean? Are all the rest come back?
 Or is it some abuse, and no such thing?<sup>4</sup>

LAERTES Know you the hand?

KING 'Tis Hamlet's character.<sup>5</sup> "Naked!" 50
 And in a postscript here, he says "alone."
 Can you advise me?

LAERTES I'm lost in it, my lord. But let him come;
 It warms the very sickness in my heart,
 That I shall live and tell him to his teeth, 55
 "Thus diddest thou."

KING If it be so, Laertes,—
 As how should it be so? how otherwise?—
 Will you be ruled by me?

LAERTES Aye, my lord;
 So you will not o'errule me to a peace.

KING To thine own peace. If he be now returned, 60
 As checking<sup>6</sup> at his voyage, and that he means
 No more to undertake it, I will work him
 To an exploit now ripe in my device,
 Under the which he shall not choose but fall:
 And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe; 65
 But even his mother shall uncharge the practice,<sup>7</sup> call it accident.

LAERTES My lord, I will be ruled;
 The rather, if you could devise it so
 That I might be the organ.<sup>8</sup>

KING It falls right. 70
 You have been talked of since your travel much,
 And that in Hamlet's hearing, for a quality
 Wherein, they say, you shine; your sum of parts<sup>9</sup>
 Did not together pluck such envy from him,
 As did that one, and that in my regard
 Of the unworthiest siege.<sup>1</sup>

LAERTES What part is that, my lord? 75

KING A very riband in the cap of youth,

4. A delusion, not a reality.

5. Handwriting.

6. Changing the course of, refusing to continue.

7. Not recognize it as a plot.

8. Instrument.

9. The sum of your gifts.

1. Seat, that is, rank.

Yet needful too; for youth no less becomes<sup>2</sup>
The light and careless livery that it wears
Than settled age his sables and his weeds,<sup>3</sup>
Importing health and graveness. Two months since Here was a gentleman of Normandy:—
I've seen myself, and served against, the French,
And they can well on horseback: but this gallant
Had witchcraft in 't; he grew unto his seat,
And to such wondrous doing brought his horse
As had he been incorpsed and demi-natured<sup>4</sup>
With the brave beast: so far he topped my thought
That I, in forgery of shapes and tricks,<sup>5</sup>
Come short of what he did.

LAERTES                                A Norman was 't?

KING    A Norman. 90

LAERTES    Upon my life, Lamord.

KING The very same.

LAERTES I know him well: he is the brooch<sup>6</sup> indeed
And gem of all the nation.

KING    He made confession of you,
           And gave you such a masterly report,
           For art and exercise in your defense,<sup>7</sup>
           And for your rapier most especial,
           That he cried out, 'twould be a sight indeed
           If one could match you: the scrimers<sup>8</sup> of their nation,
           He swore, had neither motion, guard, nor eye,
           If you opposed them. Sir, this report of his Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy
           That he could nothing do but wish and beg
           Your sudden coming o'er, to play with him.
           Now, out of this—

LAERTES                      What out of this, my lord?                      105

KING    Laertes, was your father dear to you?
Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,
A face without a heart?

LAERTES                      Why ask you this?

KING Not that I think you did not love your father,
But that I know love is begun by time,
And that I see, in passages of proof,<sup>9</sup>
Time qualifies<sup>1</sup> the spark and fire of it.
There lives within the very flame of love
A kind of wick or snuff<sup>2</sup> that will abate it;

2. Is the appropriate age for. "Riband": ribbon, ornament.

3. Furs (also meaning "blacks," dark colors) and robes.

4. Incorporated and split his nature in two.

5. In imagining methods and skills of horsemanship.

6. Ornament.

7. Report of your mastery in the theory and practice of fencing.

8. Fencers.

9. Instances that prove it.

1. Weakens.

2. Charred part of the wick.

And nothing is at a like goodness still, 115
 For goodness, growing to a plurisy,<sup>3</sup>
 Dies in his own too much: that we would do
 We should do when we would; for this “would” changes
 And hath abatements and delays as many
 As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents, 120
 And then this “should” is like a spendthrift sigh,
 That hurts by easing.<sup>4</sup> But, to the quick o’ the ulcer:
 Hamlet comes back: what would you undertake,
 To show yourself your father’s son in deed
 More than in words?

LAERTES To cut his throat i’ the church. 125

KING No place indeed should murder sanctuarize;
 Revenge should have no bounds. But, good Laertes,
 Will you do this, keep close within your chamber.
 Hamlet returned shall know you are come home:
 We’ll put on<sup>5</sup> those shall praise your excellence 130
 And set a double varnish on the fame
 The Frenchman gave you; bring you in fine together
 And wager on your heads: he, being remiss,<sup>6</sup>
 Most generous and free from all contriving,
 Will not peruse<sup>7</sup> the foils, so that with ease, 135
 Or with a little shuffling, you may choose
 A sword unbated, and in a pass of practice<sup>8</sup>
 Requite him for your father.

LAERTES I will do ’t;
 And for that purpose I’ll anoint my sword.
 I bought an unction of a mountebank,<sup>9</sup> 140
 So mortal that but dip a knife in it,
 Where it draws blood no cataplasm so rare,
 Collected from all simples<sup>1</sup> that have virtue
 Under the moon, can save the thing from death
 That is but scratched withal: I’ll touch my point 145
 With this contagion, that, if I gall<sup>2</sup> him slightly,
 It may be death.

KING Let’s further think of this;
 Weigh what convenience both of time and means
 May fit us to our shape: if this should fail,
 And that our drift look through<sup>3</sup> our bad performance, 150
 ’Twere better not assayed: therefore this project
 Should have a back or second, that might hold
 If this did blast in proof.<sup>4</sup> Soft! let me see:

3. Excess. “Still”: constantly.

4. A sigh that gives relief but is harmful (according to an old notion that it draws blood from the heart).

5. Instigate.

6. Careless. “In fine”: finally.

7. Examine closely.

8. Treacherous thrust. “Unbated”: not blunted

(as a rapier for exercise ordinarily would be).

9. Ointment of a peddler of quack medicines.

1. Healing herbs. “Cataplasm”: plaster.

2. Scratch.

3. Our design should show through. “Shape”: plan.

4. Burst (like a new firearm) once it is put to the test.

We'll make a solemn wager on your cunnings:
 I ha 't: 155
 When in your motion you are hot and dry—
 As make your bouts more violent to that end—
 And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepared him
 A chalice for the nonce;<sup>5</sup> whereon but sipping,
 If he by chance escape your venom'd stuck,<sup>6</sup> 160
 Our purpose may hold there. But stay, what noise?
 [Enter QUEEN.]
 How now, sweet queen!
 QUEEN One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
 So fast they follow: your sister's drowned, Laertes.
 LAERTES Drowned! O, where? 165
 QUEEN There is a willow grows aslant<sup>7</sup> a brook,
 That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream;
 There with fantastic garlands did she come
 Of crow-flowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples,
 That liberal shepherds give a grosser name, 170
 But our cold maids do dead men's fingers call them:
 There, on the pendent boughs her coronet weeds
 Clambering to hang, an envious sliver<sup>8</sup> broke;
 When down her weedy trophies and herself
 Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide,
 And mermaid-like a while they bore her up; 175
 Which time she chanted snatches of old tunes,
 As one incapable of<sup>9</sup> her own distress,
 Or like a creature native and indued<sup>1</sup>
 Unto that element: but long it could not be 180
 Till that her garments, heavy with their drink, Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay
 To muddy death.
 LAERTES Alas, then she is drowned!
 QUEEN Drowned, drowned.
 LAERTES Too much of water hast thou, poor Ophelia, 185
 And therefore I forbid my tears: but yet
 It is our trick;<sup>2</sup> nature her custom holds,
 Let shame say what it will: when these are gone,
 The woman<sup>3</sup> will be out. Adieu, my lord:
 I have a speech of fire that fain would blaze, 190
 But that this folly douts<sup>4</sup> it.
 [Exit.]
 KING Let's follow, Gertrude:
 How much I had to do to calm his rage!
 Now fear I this will give it start again;

5. For that particular occasion.

6. Thrust.

7. Across.

8. Malicious bough.

9. Insensitive to.

1. Adapted, in harmony with.

2. Peculiar trait.

3. The softer qualities, the woman in me.

4. Extinguishes.

Therefore let's follow.

[Exeunt.]

Act 5

SCENE I

[SCENE: A churchyard.]

[Enter two CLOWNS, with spades, etc.]

FIRST CLOWN Is she to be buried in Christian burial that willfully seeks her own salvation?

SECOND CLOWN I tell thee she is; and therefore make her grave straight: the crowner<sup>5</sup> hath sat on her, and finds it Christian burial.

FIRST CLOWN How can that be, unless she drowned herself in her own defense? 5

SECOND CLOWN Why, 'tis found so.

FIRST CLOWN It must be "se offendendo";<sup>6</sup> it cannot be else. For here lies the point: if I drown myself wittingly, it argues an act: and an act hath three branches; it is, to act, to do, to perform: argal,<sup>7</sup> she drowned herself wittingly. 10

SECOND CLOWN Nay, but hear you, goodman delver.

FIRST CLOWN Give me leave. Here lies the water; good: here stands the man; good: if the man go to this water and drown himself, it is, will he, nill he,<sup>8</sup> he goes; mark you that; but if the water come to him and drown him, he drowns not himself: argal, he that is not guilty of his own death shortens not his own life. 15

SECOND CLOWN But is this law?

FIRST CLOWN Aye, marry, is 't; crowner's quest<sup>9</sup> law.

SECOND CLOWN Will you ha' the truth on 't? If this had not been a gentlewoman, she should have been buried out o' Christian burial. 20

FIRST CLOWN Why, there thou say'st: and the more pity that great folk should have countenance<sup>1</sup> in this world to drown or hang themselves, more than their even<sup>2</sup> Christian. Come, my spade. There is no ancient gentlemen but gardeners, ditchers and gravemakers: they hold up Adam's profession. 25

SECOND CLOWN Was he a gentleman?

FIRST CLOWN A' was the first that ever bore arms.

SECOND CLOWN Why, he had none.

FIRST CLOWN What, art a heathen? How dost thou understand the Scripture? The Scripture says Adam digged: could he dig without arms? I'll put another question to thee: if thou answerest me not to the purpose, confess thyself— 30

SECOND CLOWN Go to.

FIRST CLOWN What is he that builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, or the carpenter? 35

5. Coroner. "Straight": right away.

6. The Clown's blunder for se defendendo: "in self-defense" (Latin).

7. Blunder for ergo: "therefore" (Latin).

8. Willy-nilly.

9. Inquest.

1. Sanction.

2. Fellow.

SECOND CLOWN The gallows-maker; for that frame outlives a thousand tenants.

FIRST CLOWN I like thy wit well, in good faith: the gallows does well; but how does it well? it does well to those that do ill: now, thou dost ill to say the gallows is built stronger than the church: argal, the gallows may do well to thee. To 't again, come. 40

SECOND CLOWN "Who builds stronger than a mason, a shipwright, or a carpenter?"

FIRST CLOWN Aye, tell me that, and unyoke.<sup>3</sup> 45

SECOND CLOWN Marry, now I can tell.

FIRST CLOWN To 't.

SECOND CLOWN Mass, I cannot tell.

[Enter HAMLET and HORATIO, afar off.]

FIRST CLOWN Cudgel thy brains no more about it, for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating, and when you are asked this question next, say "a grave-maker": the houses that he makes last till doomsday. Go, get thee to Yaughan; fetch me a stoup<sup>4</sup> of liquor. 50

[Exit SECOND CLOWN. —FIRST CLOWN digs and sings.]

In youth, when I did love, did love,

Methought it was very sweet,

To contract, O, the time, for-a my behove, 55

O, methought, there-a was nothing-a meet.<sup>5</sup>

HAMLET Has this fellow no feeling of his business that he sings at grave-making?

HORATIO Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness.<sup>6</sup>

HAMLET 'Tis e'en so: the hand of little employment hath the daintier<sup>7</sup> sense. 60

FIRST CLOWN [Sings.] But age, with his stealing steps, Hath clowd me in his clutch,
And hath shipped me intil<sup>8</sup> the land,
As if I had never been such. 65

[Throws up a skull.]

HAMLET That skull had a tongue in it, and could sing once: how the knave jowls it to the ground, as if it were Cain's jaw-bone, that did the first murder! It might be the pate of a politician,<sup>9</sup> which this ass now o'er-reaches;<sup>1</sup> one that would circumvent God, might it not?

HORATIO It might, my lord. 70

HAMLET Or of a courtier, which could say, "Good morrow, sweet lord! How dost thou, sweet lord?" This might be my lord such-a-one, that praised my lord such-a-one's horse, when he meant to beg it; might it not?

HORATIO Aye, my lord. 75

HAMLET Why, e'en so: and now my Lady Worm's; chapless, and knocked about the mazzard<sup>2</sup> with a sexton's spade: here's fine revolution,

3. Call it a day.

4. Mug. "Yaughan": apparently a tavern keeper's name.

5. Fitting. "Contract": shorten. "Behove": profit.

6. Has made it a matter of indifference to him.

7. Finer sensitivity. "Of little employment":

that does little labor.

8. Into.

9. In a pejorative sense. "Jowls": knocks. "First murder": possibly an allusion to the legend that Cain slew Abel with an ass's jawbone.

1. Outwits.

2. Pate. "Chapless": the lower jawbone missing.

an we had the trick to see 't. Did these bones cost no more the breeding, but to play at loggats<sup>3</sup> with 'em? mine ache to think on 't.

80

FIRST CLOWN [Sings.] A pick-axe, and a spade, a spade,
For a shrouding sheet:
O, a pit of clay for to be made
For such a guest is meet.

[Throws up another skull.]

HAMLET There's another: why may not that be the skull of a lawyer? 85 Where be his quiddities now, his quillets, his cases, his tenures,<sup>4</sup> and his tricks? why does he suffer this rude knave now to knock him about the sconce with a dirty shovel, and will not tell him of his action of battery?<sup>5</sup> Hum! This fellow might be in 's time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances,<sup>6</sup> his fines, his double 90 vouchers, his recoveries: is this the fine<sup>7</sup> of his fines and the recovery of his recoveries, to have his fine pate full of fine dirt? will his vouchers vouch him no more of his purchases, and double ones too, than the length and breadth of a pair of indentures? The very conveyances<sup>8</sup> of his lands will hardly lie in this box; and must the inheritor himself 95 have no more, ha?

HORATIO Not a jot more, my lord.

HAMLET Is not parchment made of sheep-skins?

HORATIO Aye, my lord, and of calf-skins too.

HAMLET They are sheep and calves which seek out assurance<sup>9</sup> in that. 100
I will speak to this fellow. Whose grave's this, sirrah?

FIRST CLOWN Mine, sir.

[Sings.] O, a pit of clay for to be made
For such a guest is meet.

HAMLET I think it be thine indeed, for thou liest in 't. 105

FIRST CLOWN You lie out on 't, sir, and therefore 'tis not yours: for my part, I do not lie in 't, and yet it is mine.

HAMLET Thou dost lie in 't, to be in 't and say it is thine: 'tis for the dead, not for the quick;<sup>1</sup> therefore thou liest.

FIRST CLOWN 'Tis a quick lie, sir; 'twill away again, from me to you. 110

HAMLET What man dost thou dig it for?

FIRST CLOWN For no man, sir.

HAMLET What woman then?

FIRST CLOWN For none neither.

HAMLET Who is to be buried in 't? 115

FIRST CLOWN One that was a woman, sir; but, rest her soul, she's dead.

HAMLET How absolute the knave is! we must speak by the card,<sup>2</sup> or equivocation will undo us. By the Lord, Horatio, these three years I

3. A game resembling bowls. "Trick": faculty.

4. Real estate holdings. "Quiddities": subtle definitions. "Quillets": quibbles.

5. Assault. "Sconce": head.

6. Varieties of bonds. This passage contains legal terms relating to the transfer of estates.

7. End. Hamlet is punning on the legal and nonlegal meanings of the word.

8. Deeds. "Indentures": contracts drawn in duplicate on the same piece of parchment; the two copies were separated by an indented line.

9. Security; another pun, because the word is also a legal term.

1. Living.

2. By the chart, that is, exactness. "Absolute": positive.

- have taken note of it; the age is grown so picked<sup>3</sup> that the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the courtier, he galls his kibe.<sup>4</sup> How long hast thou been a grave-maker? 120
- FIRST CLOWN Of all the days i' the year, I came to 't that day that our last King Hamlet o'ercame Fortinbras.
- HAMLET How long is that since?
- FIRST CLOWN Cannot you tell that? every fool can tell that: it was that very day that young Hamlet was born: he that is mad, and sent into England. 125
- HAMLET Aye, marry, why was he sent into England?
- FIRST CLOWN Why, because a' was mad; a' shall recover his wits there: or, if a' do not, 'tis no great matter there. 130
- HAMLET Why?
- FIRST CLOWN 'Twill not be seen in him there; there the men are as mad as he.
- HAMLET How came he mad?
- FIRST CLOWN Very strangely, they say. 135
- HAMLET How "strangely?"
- FIRST CLOWN Faith, e'en with losing his wits.
- HAMLET Upon what ground?
- FIRST CLOWN Why, here in Denmark: I have been sexton here, man and boy, thirty years. 140
- HAMLET How long will a man lie i' the earth ere he rot?
- FIRST CLOWN I' faith, if a' be not rotten before a' die—as we have many pocky corsés now-a-days, that will scarce hold the laying in<sup>5</sup>—a' will last you some eight year or nine year: a tanner will last you nine year. 145
- HAMLET Why he more than another?
- FIRST CLOWN Why, sir, his hide is so tanned with his trade that a' will keep out water a great while; and your water is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body. Here's a skull now: this skull has lain in the earth three and twenty years. 150
- HAMLET Whose was it?
- FIRST CLOWN A whoreson mad fellow's it was: whose do you think it was?
- HAMLET Nay, I know not.
- FIRST CLOWN A pestilence on him for a mad rogue! a' poured a flagon of Rhenish on my head once. This same skull, sir, was Yorick's skull, the king's jester. 155
- HAMLET This?
- FIRST CLOWN E'en that.
- HAMLET Let me see. [Takes the skull.] Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio: a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy: he hath borne me on his back a thousand times; and now how abhorred in my imagination it is! my gorge rises at it. Here hung those lips that I have kissed I know not how oft. Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment, that were wont to 165

3. Choice, fastidious.

4. Hurts the chilblain on the courtier's heel.

5. Hold together till they are buried. "Pocky": with marks of disease (from "pox").

set the table on a roar? Not one now, to mock your own grinning?
quite chop-fallen?<sup>6</sup> Now get you to my lady's chamber, and tell her, let her paint an inch thick, to this favor<sup>7</sup> she must come; make her laugh at that. Prithee, Horatio, tell me one thing.

HORATIO What's that, my lord? 170

HAMLET Dost thou think Alexander looked o' this fashion i' the earth?

HORATIO E'en so.

HAMLET And smelt so? pah!
[Puts down the skull.]

HORATIO E'en so, my lord.

HAMLET To what base uses we may return, Horatio! Why may not imagi- 175 nation trace the noble dust of Alexander, till he find it stopping a bung-hole?

HORATIO 'Twere to consider too curiously, to consider so.

HAMLET No, faith, not a jot; but to follow him thither with modesty enough<sup>8</sup> and likelihood to lead it: as thus: Alexander died, Alexander 180 was buried, Alexander returneth into dust; the dust is earth; of earth we make loam; and why of that loam, whereto he was converted, might they not stop a beer-barrel?

Imperious Caesar, dead and turned to clay,
Might stop a hole to keep the wind away; 185
O, that that earth, which kept the world in awe,
Should patch a wall to expel the winter's flaw!

But soft! but soft! aside: here comes the king.

[Enter PRIESTS etc., in procession; the Corpse of OPHELIA, LAERTES, and mourners following; KING, QUEEN, their trains, etc.]

The queen, the courtiers: who is this they follow?

And with such maimèd rites?<sup>9</sup> This doth betoken 190

The corse they follow did with desperate hand

Fordo its own life: 'twas of some estate.<sup>1</sup>

Couch we awhile, and mark.

[Retiring with HORATIO.]

LAERTES What ceremony else?

HAMLET That is Laertes, a very noble youth: mark. 195

LAERTES What ceremony else?

FIRST PRIEST Her obsequies have been as far enlarged

As we have warranty: her death was doubtful;

And, but that great command o'ersways the order<sup>2</sup>

She should in ground unsanctified have lodged 200

Till the last trumpet; for<sup>3</sup> charitable prayers,

Shards, flints and pebbles should be thrown on her:

Yet here she is allowed her virgin crants,

Her maiden strewments and the bringing home<sup>4</sup>

Of bell and burial. 205

6. The lower jaw fallen down, hence dejected.

7. Appearance.

8. Without exaggeration.

9. Incomplete, mutilated ritual.

1. Rank. "Fordo": destroy.

2. The king's command prevails against ordinary rules. "Doubtful": of uncertain cause (that is, accident or suicide).

3. Instead of.

4. Laying to rest. "Crants": garlands. "Strewments": strews the grave with flowers.

LAERTES Must there no more be done?

FIRST PRIEST No more be done:

We should profane the service of the dead
To sing a requiem and such rest to her
As to peace-parted souls.

LAERTES Lay her i' the earth:

And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
May violets spring! I tell thee, churlish priest,
A ministering angel shall my sister be,
When thou liest howling. 210

HAMLET What, the fair Ophelia!

QUEEN [Scattering flowers.] Sweets to the sweet: farewell!

I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife;
I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,
And not have strewed thy grave. 215

LAERTES O, treble woe

Fall ten times treble on that cursed head
Whose wicked deed thy most ingenious sense Deprived thee of! Hold off the earth a while,
Till I have caught her once more in mine arms. 220

[Leaps into the grave.]

Now pile your dust upon the quick and dead,
Till of this flat a mountain you have made
To o'ertop old Pelion<sup>5</sup> or the skyish head
Of blue Olympus.

HAMLET [Advancing.] What is he whose grief 225

Bears such an emphasis? whose phrase of sorrow
Conjures the wandering stars and makes them stand
Like wonder-wounded hearers? This is I, Hamlet the Dane.

[Leaps into the grave.]

LAERTES The devil take thy soul!

[Grappling with him.]

HAMLET Thou pray'st not well. 230

I prithee, take thy fingers from my throat;
For, though I am not splenitive<sup>6</sup> and rash,
Yet have I in me something dangerous,
Which let thy wisdom fear. Hold off thy hand.

KING Pluck them asunder.

QUEEN Hamlet, Hamlet!

ALL Gentlemen,— 235

HORATIO Good my lord, be quiet.

[The attendants part them, and they come out of the grave.]

HAMLET Why, I will fight with him upon this theme

Until my eyelids will no longer wag.

QUEEN O my son, what theme?

5. The mountain on which the Aloadae, two rebellious giants in Greek mythology, piled up Mount Ossa in their attempt to reach Olympus.

6. Easily moved to anger.

- HAMLET I loved Ophelia: forty thousand brothers Could not, with all their quantity of love,
 Make up my sum. What wilt thou do for her? 240
- KING O, he is mad, Laertes.
- QUEEN For love of God, forbear him.
- HAMLET 'Swounds, show me what thou 'lt do: 245
 Woo 't weep? woo 't fight? woo 't fast? woo 't tear thyself?
 Woo 't drink up eisel?<sup>7</sup> eat a crocodile?
 I'll do 't. Dost thou come here to whine?
 To outface me with leaping in her grave?
 Be buried quick with her, and so will I: 250
 And, if thou prate of mountains, let them throw Millions of acres on us, till our ground,
 Singeing his pate against the burning zone,
 Make Ossa like a wart! Nay, an thou 'lt mouth,
 I'll rant as well as thou.
- QUEEN This is mere madness: 255
 And thus a while the fit will work on him;
 Anon, as patient as the female dove
 When that her golden couplets are disclosed,<sup>8</sup>
 His silence will sit drooping.
- HAMLET Hear you, sir;
 What is the reason that you use me thus? 260
 I loved you ever: but it is no matter;
 Let Hercules himself do what he may,
 The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.
 [Exit.]
- KING I pray thee, good Horatio, wait upon him.
 [Exit HORATIO.]
- [To LAERTES.] Strengthen your patience in our last night's speech; 265
 We'll put the matter to the present push.<sup>9</sup>
 Good Gertrude, set some watch over your son.
 This grave shall have a living monument:
 An hour of quiet shortly shall we see;
 Till then, in patience our proceeding be. 270
 [Exeunt.]

SCENE 2

[SCENE: A hall in the castle.]

[Enter HAMLET and HORATIO.]

- HAMLET So much for this, sir: now shall you see the other;
 You do remember all the circumstance?

7. Vinegar (the bitter drink given to Christ).
 "Woo't": wilt thou.

8. Twins are hatched.
 9. We'll push the matter on immediately.

HORATIO Remember it, my lord?

HAMLET Sir, in my heart there was a kind of fighting,

That would not let me sleep: methought I lay 5

Worse than the mutines in the bilboes.<sup>1</sup> Rashly,

And praised be rashness for it, let us know,

Our indiscretion sometime serves us well

When our deep plots do pall;<sup>2</sup> and that should learn us

There's a divinity that shapes our ends, 10

Rough-hew them how we will.

HORATIO That is most certain.

HAMLET Up from my cabin,

My sea-gown scarfed about me, in the dark

Groped I to find out them; had my desire,

Fingered their packet, and in fine withdrew 15

To mine own room again; making so bold,

My fears forgetting manners, to unseal

Their grand commission; where I found, Horatio,—

O royal knavery!—an exact command,

Larded with many several sorts of reasons, 20

Importing<sup>3</sup> Denmark's health and England's too,

With, ho! such bugs and goblins in my life,

That, on the supervise, no leisure bated,<sup>4</sup>

No, not to stay the grinding of the axe,

My head should be struck off.

HORATIO Is 't possible? 25

HAMLET Here's the commission: read it at more leisure.

But wilt thou hear now how I did proceed?

HORATIO I beseech you.

HAMLET Being thus be-netted round with villainies,—

Ere I could make a prologue to my brains, 30

They had begun the play,—I sat me down;

Devised a new commission; wrote it fair:

I once did hold it, as our statist<sup>5</sup> do,

A baseness to write fair, and labored much

How to forget that learning; but, sir, now 35

It did me yeoman's service:<sup>6</sup> wilt thou know

The effect of what I wrote?

HORATIO Aye, good my lord.

HAMLET An earnest conjuration from the king,

As England was his faithful tributary,

As love between them like the palm might flourish, 40

As peace should still her wheaten garland wear

1. Mutineers in iron fetters.

2. Become useless.

3. Concerning.

4. As soon as the message was read, with no time subtracted for leisure. "Bugs": imaginary horrors to be expected if I lived.

5. Statesmen.

6. Excellent service.

And stand a comma<sup>7</sup> 'tween their amities,
 And many such-like "As"es of great charge,<sup>8</sup>
 That, on the view and knowing of these contents,
 Without debatement further, more or less, 45
 He should the bearers put to sudden death,
 Not shriving-time<sup>9</sup> allowed.

HORATIO How was this sealed?

HAMLET Why, even in that was heaven ordinant.<sup>1</sup>

I had my father's signet in my purse,
 Which was the model of that Danish seal: 50
 Folded the writ up in the form of the other;
 Subscribed it; gave 't the impression;<sup>2</sup> placed it safely,
 The changeling never known. Now, the next day
 Was our sea-fight; and what to this was sequent
 Thou know'st already. 55

HORATIO So Guildenstern and Rosencrantz go to 't.

HAMLET Why, man, they did make love to this employment;

They are not near my conscience; their defeat
 Does by their own insinuation<sup>3</sup> grow:
 'Tis dangerous when the baser nature comes 60
 Between the pass and fell<sup>4</sup>-incensèd points
 Of mighty opposites.

HORATIO Why, what a king is this!

HAMLET Does it not, think'st thee, stand me now upon<sup>5</sup>—

He that hath killed my king, and whored my mother;
 Popped in between the election and my hopes; 65
 Thrown out his angle for my proper life,<sup>6</sup>
 And with such cozenage—is't not perfect conscience,
 To quit<sup>7</sup> him with this arm? and is't not to be damned,
 To let this canker of our nature come
 In further evil? 70

HORATIO It must be shortly known to him from England

What is the issue of the business there.

HAMLET It will be short: the interim is mine;

And a man's life's no more than to say "One."

But I am very sorry, good Horatio, 75
 That to Laertes I forgot myself;
 For, by the image of my cause, I see
 The portraiture of his: I'll court his favors:

7. Connecting element.

8. "'As'es": a pun on as and ass, which extends to "of great charge," signifying both "moral weight" and "ass's burden."

9. Time for confession and absolution.

1. Ordaining.

2. Of the seal.

3. Meddling. "Defeat": destruction.

4. Fiercely. "Baser": lower in rank than the king and Prince Hamlet. "Pass": thrust.

5. Is it not my duty now?

6. An angling line for my own life.

7. Pay back.

But, sure, the bravery<sup>8</sup> of his grief did put me
 Into a towering passion.

HORATIO Peace! who comes here?

80

[Enter OSRIC.]

OSRIC Your lordship is right welcome back to Denmark.

HAMLET I humbly thank you, sir. Dost know this waterfly?

HORATIO No, my good lord.

HAMLET Thy state is the more gracious, for 'tis a vice to know him. He hath much land, and fertile: let a beast be lord of beasts, and his crib 85 shall stand at the king's mess: 'tis a chough,<sup>9</sup> but, as I say, spacious in the possession of dirt.

OSRIC Sweet lord, if your lordship were at leisure, I should impart a thing to you from his majesty.

HAMLET I will receive it, sir, with all diligence of spirit. Put your bonnet 90 to his right use; 'tis for the head.

OSRIC I thank your lordship, it is very hot.

HAMLET No, believe me, 'tis very cold; the wind is northerly.

OSRIC It is indifferent<sup>1</sup> cold, my lord, indeed.

HAMLET But yet methinks it is very sultry and hot, or my complexion— 95

OSRIC Exceedingly, my lord; it is very sultry, as 'twere,—I cannot tell how. But, my lord, his majesty bade me signify to you that he has laid a great wager on your head: sir, this is the matter—

HAMLET I beseech you, remember—

[HAMLET moves him to put on his hat.]

OSRIC Nay, good my lord; for mine ease, in good faith. Sir, here is newly 100 come to court Laertes; believe me, an absolute gentleman, full of most excellent differences, of very soft society and great showing;<sup>2</sup> indeed, to speak feelingly of him, he is the card or calendar of gentry,<sup>3</sup> for you shall find in him the continent of what part<sup>4</sup> a gentleman would
 see. 105

HAMLET Sir, his definement suffers no perdition in you; though, I know, to divide him inventorially would dizzy the arithmetic<sup>5</sup> of memory, and yet but yaw neither, in respect of his quick sail.<sup>6</sup> But in the verity of extolment, I take him to be a soul of great article, and his infusion<sup>7</sup> of such dearth and rareness, as, to make true diction of him, 110 his semblable is his mirror, and who else would trace him, his umbrage,<sup>8</sup> nothing more.

OSRIC Your lordship speaks most infallibly of him.

HAMLET The concernancy, sir? why do we wrap the gentleman<sup>9</sup> in our

8. Ostentation, bravado.

9. Jackdaw. "Mess": table.

1. Fairly.

2. Agreeable company, handsome in appearance. "Differences": distinctions.

3. Chart and model of gentlemanly manners.

4. Whatever quality. "Continent": container.

5. Arithmetical power. "Definement": definition. "Perdition": loss. "Inventorially": make an inventory of his virtues.

6. And yet would only be able to steer unsteadily (unable to catch up with the sail of Laertes's virtues).

7. The virtues infused into him. "Verify of extolments": to prize Laertes truthfully. "Article": importance.

8. Keep pace with him, his shadow.

9. Laertes. "Concernancy": meaning.

- more rawer breath? 115
- OSRIC Sir?
- HORATIO Is 't not possible to understand in another tongue?<sup>1</sup> You will do 't, sir, really.
- HAMLET What imports the nomination of this gentleman?
- OSRIC Of Laertes? 120
- HORATIO His purse is empty already; all's golden words are spent.
- HAMLET Of him, sir.
- OSRIC I know you are not ignorant—
- HAMLET I would you did, sir; yet, in faith, if you did, it would not much approve me.<sup>2</sup> Well, sir? 125
- OSRIC You are not ignorant of what excellence Laertes is—
- HAMLET I dare not confess that, lest I should compare with him in excellence; but, to know a man well, were to know himself.<sup>3</sup>
- OSRIC I mean, sir, for his weapon; but in the imputation laid on him by them, in his meed he's unfellowed.<sup>4</sup> 130
- HAMLET What's his weapon?
- OSRIC Rapier and dagger.
- HAMLET That's two of his weapons: but, well.
- OSRIC The king, sir, hath wagered with him six Barbary horses: against the which he has imponed, as I take it, six French rapiers and poniards, with their assigns,<sup>5</sup> as girdle, hanger, and so: three of the carriages, in faith, are very dear to fancy, very responsive<sup>6</sup> to the hilts, most delicate carriages, and of very liberal conceit.<sup>7</sup> 135
- HAMLET What call you the carriages?
- HORATIO I knew you must be edified by the margent<sup>8</sup> ere you had done. 140
- OSRIC The carriages, sir, are the hangers.
- HAMLET The phrase would be more germane to the matter if we could carry a cannon by our sides:<sup>9</sup> I would it might be hangers till then. But, on: six Barbary horses against six French swords, their assigns, 145 and three liberal-conceited carriages; that's the French bet against the Danish. Why is this "imponed," as you call it?
- OSRIC The king, sir, hath laid, sir, that in a dozen passes between yourself and him, he shall not exceed you three hits: he hath laid on twelve for nine; and it would come to immediate trial, if your lordship would vouchsafe the answer.<sup>1</sup> 150

1. In a less affected jargon or in the same jargon when spoken by another (that is, Hamlet's) tongue.

2. Be to my credit.

3. To know others one has to know oneself.

4. In the reputation given him by his weapons, his merit is unparalleled.

5. Appendages. "Imponed": wagered.

6. Closely matched. "Carriages": ornamented straps by which the rapiers hung from the belt. "Very dear to fancy": agreeable to the taste.

7. Elegant design.

8. Instructed by the marginal note.

9. Hamlet is playfully criticizing Osric's affected application of the term carriage, more properly used to mean "gun carriage."

1. The terms of this wager have never been satisfactorily clarified.

HAMLET How if I answer “no”?

OSRIC I mean, my lord, the opposition of your person in trial.

HAMLET Sir, I will walk here in the hall: if it please his majesty, it is the breathing time<sup>2</sup> of day with me; let the foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the king hold his purpose, I will win for him an I can; if not, I will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits. 155

OSRIC Shall I redeliver you e’en so?<sup>3</sup>

HAMLET To this effect, sir, after what flourish your nature will.

OSRIC I commend my duty to your lordship. 160

HAMLET Yours, yours. [Exit OSRIC.] He does well to commend it himself; there are no tongues else for’s turn.

HORATIO This lapwing<sup>4</sup> runs away with the shell on his head.

HAMLET He did comply with his dug before he sucked it. Thus has he—and many more of the same breed that I know the drossy<sup>5</sup> age dotes on—only got the tune of the time and outward habit of encounter; a kind of yesty<sup>6</sup> collection, which carries them through and through the most fond and winnowed opinions;<sup>7</sup> and do but blow them to their trial, the bubbles are out. 165

[Enter a LORD.]

LORD My lord, his majesty commended him<sup>8</sup> to you by young Osric, who brings back to him, that you attend him in the hall: he sends to know if your pleasure hold to play with Laertes, or that you will take longer time. 170

HAMLET I am constant to my purposes; they follow the king’s pleasure: if his fitness speaks, mine is ready; now or whensoever, provided I be so able as now. 175

LORD The king and queen and all are coming down.

HAMLET In happy time.

LORD The queen desires you to use some gentle entertainment<sup>9</sup> to Laertes before you fall to play. 180

HAMLET She well instructs me.

[Exit LORD.]

HORATIO You will lose this wager, my lord.

HAMLET I do not think so; since he went into France, I have been in continual practice; I shall win at the odds. But thou wouldst not think how ill all’s here about my heart: but it is no matter. 185

HORATIO Nay, good my lord,—

HAMLET It is but foolery; but it is such a kind of gaingiving<sup>1</sup> as would perhaps trouble a woman.

HORATIO If your mind dislike anything, obey it. I will forestall their

2. Time for exercise.

3. Is that the reply you want me to carry back?

4. A bird supposedly able to run as soon as it is out of its shell.

5. Degenerate. “Comply”: use ceremony.

6. Frothy.

7. Makes them pass the test of the most refined judgment.

8. Sent his regards.

9. Kind word of greeting.

1. Misgiving.

repair<sup>2</sup> hither, and say you are not fit.

190

HAMLET Not a whit; we defy augury: there is special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come: the readiness is all; since no man has aught of what he leaves, what is 't to leave betimes?<sup>3</sup>

Let be.

195

[Enter KING, QUEEN, LAERTES, and LORDS, OSRIC and other attendants with foils and gauntlets; a table and flagons of wine on it.]

KING Come, Hamlet, come, and take this hand from me.

[The KING puts LAERTES' hand into HAMLET's.]

HAMLET Give me your pardon, sir: I've done you wrong;

But pardon't, as you are a gentleman.

This presence<sup>4</sup> knows,

And you must needs have heard, how I am punished

200

With sore distraction. What I have done,

That might your nature, honor and exception<sup>5</sup>

Roughly awake, I here proclaim was madness.

Was't Hamlet wronged Laertes? Never Hamlet:

If Hamlet from himself be ta'en away,

205

And when he's not himself does wrong Laertes,

Then Hamlet does it not, Hamlet denies it.

Who does it then? His madness: if 't be so,

Hamlet is of the faction that is wronged;

His madness is poor Hamlet's enemy.

210

Sir, in this audience,

Let my disclaiming from a purposed evil

Free me so far in your most generous thoughts,

That I have shot mine arrow o'er the house,

And hurt my brother.

LAERTES I am satisfied in nature,

215

Whose motive, in this case, should stir me most

To my revenge: but in my terms of honor<sup>6</sup>

I stand aloof, and will no reconciliation,

Till by some elder masters of known honor

I have a voice and precedent of peace,

220

To keep my name ungored.<sup>7</sup> But till that time

I do receive your offered love like love

And will not wrong it.

HAMLET I embrace it freely,

And will this brother's wager frankly play.

Give us the foils. Come on.

LAERTES Come, one for me.

225

2. Coming.

3. What is wrong with dying early (leaving betimes), because man knows nothing of life (what he leaves)?

4. Audience.

5. Objection.

6. "Nature" is Laertes' natural feeling toward his father. "Honor" is the code of honor with its conventional rules.

7. Unwounded. "A voice and": an opinion based on.

HAMLET I'll be your foil,<sup>8</sup> Laertes: in mine ignorance
 Your skill shall, like a star i' the darkest night,
 Stick fiery off<sup>9</sup> indeed.

LAERTES You mock me, sir.

HAMLET No, by this hand.

KING Give them the foils, young Osric. Cousin Hamlet, 230
 You know the wager?

HAMLET Very well, my lord;
 Your grace has laid the odds o' the weaker side.

KING I do not fear it; I have seen you both:
 But since he is bettered, we have therefore odds.

LAERTES This is too heavy; let me see another. 235

HAMLET This likes me well. These foils have all a length?
 [They prepare to play.]

OSRIC Aye, my good lord.

KING Set me the stoups<sup>1</sup> of wine upon that table.

If Hamlet give the first or second hit,
 Or quit in answer of the third exchange,<sup>2</sup> 240

Let all the battlements their ordnance fire;
 The king shall drink to Hamlet's better breath;

And in the cup an union<sup>3</sup> shall he throw,
 Richer than that which four successive kings
 In Denmark's crown have worn. Give me the cups; 245

And let the kettle<sup>4</sup> to the trumpet speak,
 The trumpet to the cannoneer without,
 The cannons to the heavens, the heaven to earth,
 "Now the king drinks to Hamlet." Come, begin;
 And you, the judges, bear a wary eye. 250

HAMLET Come on, sir.

LAERTES Come, my lord.
 [They play.]

HAMLET One.

LAERTES No.

HAMLET Judgment.

OSRIC A hit, a very palpable hit.

LAERTES Well; again.

KING Stay; give me drink. Hamlet, this pearl is thine;
 Here's to thy health.

[Trumpets sound, and cannon shot off within.]

Give him the cup.

HAMLET I'll play this bout first; set it by awhile. 255

Come. [They play.] Another hit; what say you?

8. A pun, because "foil" means both "rapier" and "a thing that sets off another to advantage" (as gold leaf under a jewel).

9. Stand out brilliantly.

1. Cups.

2. Requite, or repay (by scoring a hit) on the third bout.

3. A large pearl.

4. Kettledrum.

LAERTES A touch, a touch, I do confess.

KING Our son shall win.

QUEEN He's fat and scant of breath.

Here, Hamlet, take my napkin,<sup>5</sup> rub thy brows:

The queen carouses to thy fortune, Hamlet.

260

HAMLET Good madam!

KING Gertrude, do not drink.

QUEEN I will, my lord; I pray you, pardon me.

KING [Aside.] It is the poisoned cup; it is too late.

QUEEN Come, let me wipe thy face.

LAERTES My lord, I'll hit him now.

KING I do not think 't.

265

LAERTES [Aside.] And yet it is almost against my conscience.

HAMLET Come, for the third, Laertes: you but dally;

I pray you, pass with your best violence;

I am afeard you make a wanton<sup>6</sup> of me.

LAERTES Say you so?<sup>7</sup> come on.

[They play.]

OSRIC Nothing, neither way.

270

LAERTES Have at you now!

[LAERTES wounds HAMLET; then, in scuffling, they change rapiers, and HAMLET wounds LAERTES.]

KING Part them; they are incensed.

HAMLET Nay, come, again.

[The QUEEN falls.]

OSRIC Look to the queen there, ho!

HORATIO They bleed on both sides. How is it, my lord?

OSRIC How is 't, Laertes?

LAERTES Why, as a woodcock to mine own springe,<sup>7</sup> Osric;

275

I am justly killed with mine own treachery.

HAMLET How does the queen?

KING She swoonds to see them bleed.

QUEEN No, no, the drink, the drink,—O my dear Hamlet,—

The drink, the drink! I am poisoned.

280

[Dies.]

HAMLET O villainy! Ho! let the door be locked:

Treachery! seek it out.

[LAERTES falls.]

LAERTES It is here, Hamlet: Hamlet, thou art slain;

No medicine in the world can do thee good,

In thee there is not half an hour of life;

285

The treacherous instrument is in thy hand,

Unbated and envenomed: the foul practice<sup>8</sup>

Hath turned itself on me; lo, here I lie,

Never to rise again: thy mother's poisoned:

5. Handkerchief. "Fat": sweaty, or soft, because out of training.

6. Weakling, spoiled child.

7. Snare.

8. Plot.

I can no more: the king, the king's to blame. 290
 HAMLET The point envenomed too!
 Then, venom, to thy work.
 [Stabs the KING.]
 ALL Treason! treason!
 KING O, yet defend me, friends; I am but hurt.
 HAMLET Here, thou incestuous, murderous, damnèd Dane, 295
 Drink off this potion: is thy union here?
 Follow my mother.
 [KING dies.]
 LAERTES He is justly served;
 It is a poison tempered<sup>9</sup> by himself.
 Exchange forgiveness with me, noble Hamlet:
 Mine and my father's death come not upon thee, 300
 Nor thine on me!
 [Dies.]
 HAMLET Heaven make thee free of it! I follow thee.
 I am dead, Horatio. Wretched queen, adieu!
 You that look pale and tremble at this chance,
 That are but mutes or audience to this act, 305
 Had I but time—as this fell sergeant, death,
 Is strict in his arrest—O, I could tell you—
 But let it be. Horatio, I am dead;
 Thou livest; report me and my cause aright
 To the unsatisfied.
 HORATIO Never believe it: 310
 I am more an antique Roman than a Dane:
 Here's yet some liquor left.
 HAMLET As thou'rt a man,
 Give me the cup: let go; by heaven, I'll have 't.
 O good Horatio, what a wounded name,
 Things standing thus unknown, shall live behind me! 315
 If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,
 Absent thee from felicity a while,
 And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,
 To tell my story.
 [March afar off, and shot within.]
 What warlike noise is this?
 OSRIC Young Fortinbras, with conquest come from Poland, 320
 To the ambassadors of England gives
 This warlike volley.
 HAMLET O, I die, Horatio;
 The potent poison quite o'er-crows<sup>1</sup> my spirit:
 I cannot live to hear the news from England;
 But I do prophesy the election lights 325
 On Fortinbras: he has my dying voice;

9. Compounded.

1. Overcomes.

So tell him, with the occurrents, more and less,
Which have solicited.<sup>2</sup> The rest is silence.

[Dies.]

HORATIO Now cracks a noble heart. Good night sweet prince,
And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest;

330

[March within.]

Why does the drum come hither?

[Enter FORTINBRAS, and the ENGLISH AMBASSADORS, with drum, colors, and attendants.]

FORTINBRAS Where is this sight?

HORATIO What is it you would see?

If aught of woe or wonder, cease your search.

FORTINBRAS This quarry cries on havoc.<sup>3</sup> O proud death,

What feast is toward<sup>4</sup> in thine eternal cell,

335

That thou so many princes at a shot

So bloodily hast struck?

FIRST AMBASSADOR The sight is dismal;

And our affairs from England come too late:

The ears are senseless that should give us hearing,

To tell him his commandment is fulfilled,

340

That Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are dead:

Where should we have our thanks?

HORATIO Not from his mouth

Had it the ability of life to thank you:

He never gave commandment for their death.

But since, so jump upon<sup>5</sup> this bloody question,

345

You from the Polack wars, and you from England

Are here arrived, give order that these bodies

High on a stage be placèd to the view;

And let me speak to the yet unknowing world

How these things came about; so shall you hear

350

Of carnal, bloody and unnatural acts,

Of accidental judgments, casual slaughters,

Of deaths put on<sup>6</sup> by cunning and forced cause,

And, in this upshot, purposes mistook

Fall'n on the inventors' heads: all this can I 355

Truly deliver.

FORTINBRAS Let us haste to hear it,

And call the noblest to the audience.

For me, with sorrow I embrace my fortune:

I have some rights of memory in this kingdom,

Which now to claim my vantage<sup>7</sup> doth invite me.

360

2. Which have brought all this about. "Occurrents": occurrences.

3. This heap of corpses proclaims a carnage.

4. Imminent.

5. So immediately on.

6. Prompted. "Casual": chance.

7. Advantageous position, opportunity. "Have some rights of memory": am still remembered.

HORATIO Of that I shall have also cause to speak,
 And from his mouth whose voice will draw on more:<sup>8</sup>
 But let this same be presently performed,
 Even while men's minds are wild; lest more mischance
 On<sup>9</sup> plots and errors happen.

FORTINBRAS Let four captains 365
 Bear Hamlet, like a soldier, to the stage;
 For he was likely, had he been put on,<sup>1</sup>
 To have proved most royal: and, for his passage,<sup>2</sup>
 The soldiers' music and the rites of war
 Speak loudly for him. 370
 Take up the bodies: such a sight as this Becomes the field, but here shows much amiss.
 Go, bid the soldiers shoot.
[A dead march. Exeunt, bearing off the bodies: after which a peal of ordnance is shot off.]

8. More voices.
 9. Following on.

1. Tried (as a king).
 2. Death.

Selected Bibliographies

I. Ancient Mediterranean and Near Eastern Literature

On the early history of writing, an excellent starting point is Walter Ong, Orality and Literacy: Technologizing of the Word (1982), which teases out the cultural and psychological implications of the shift from an oral to a literate culture. Those with a particular interest in Near Eastern cultures can begin with James Pritchard's classic anthology of texts in translation, containing many illustrations: The Ancient Near East: An Anthology of Texts and Pictures (reissued 2010). A good illustrated survey of Greek and Roman culture by a number of different specialists is John Boardman, Jasper Griffin, and Oswyn Murray, The Oxford History of the Classical World (1986). Introductory texts that combine discussion of Greek, Roman, and Near Eastern cultures include An Introduction to the Ancient World (2008), by Lukas de Blois and R. J. van der Spek, and the less scholarly but lively The History of the Ancient World: From the Earliest Accounts to the Fall of Rome, by Susan Wise Bauer (2007). Reliable general introductions to Greek and Roman literature include Albin Lesky, Greek Literature (reissued 1996), and G. B. Conte, Latin Literature: A History (reissued 1999). For more information about the ancient world, including images of ancient art, architecture, and artifacts, as well as ancient Greek and Roman texts, a wonderful resource is Tufts University's web-site Perseus (www.perseus.tufts.edu).

Ancient Athenian Drama

A good introduction to the genre of Athenian tragedy, which includes discussions of all the extant plays and is particularly strong on social context, is Edith Hall, Greek Tragedy: Suffering under the Sun (2010). Marianne McDonald and J. Michael Walton, eds., Cambridge Companion to Greek and Roman Theatre (2007), includes essays on both tragedy and comedy, and also has some discussion of staging. Another fine collection of introductory essays, on tragedy, comedy, and satyr plays, is Ian C. Storey and Arlene Allan, A Guide to Ancient Greek Drama (2005). Further information on performance contexts, in the fifth century and also in modern revivals, can be found in David Wiles, Mask and Performance in Greek Tragedy: From Ancient Festival to Modern Experimentation (2007). Many pieces of visual evidence of Greek theater, including vase paintings, statues, and photographs of remaining theater sites, are collected in Richard Green and Eric Handley, Images of the Greek Theater (1995).

Euripides

A good collection of scholarly essays on Euripides is Judith Mossman, ed., Euripides (2003). For representations of "barbarians" in tragedy, including in Medea, see Edith Hall, Inventing the Barbarian: Greek Self-Definition through Tragedy (1989). Ruby Blondell, ed., Women on the Edge: Four Plays (1999), includes a translation of Medea and three other Euripides plays focused on women, as well as a useful introduction that discusses representations of gender in these plays. A good general introduction to Euripides, with brief discussions of all nineteen extant plays and a focus on their reception after ancient times is Michael Walton, Euripides Our Contemporary (2010). William Allan, Euripides: Medea (2002), surveys the most important literary themes of the play.

Gilgamesh

The most recent scholarly translations of The Epic of Gilgamesh are Stephanie Delany, Myths from Mesopotamia: Creation, the Flood, Gilgamesh, and Others (1989); Maureen Kovacs, The Epic of Gilgamesh (1989); Andrew George, The Epic of Gilgamesh: The Babylonian Epic Poem and Other Texts in Akkadian and Sumerian (1999) and The Babylonian Gilgamesh Epic: Introduction, Critical Edition, and Cuneiform Texts (2003); and Benjamin Foster, The Epic of Gilgamesh (2001). They contain ample commentary and important introductory articles that aid in the interpretation of the epic. The poet Stephen Mitchell's Gilgamesh: A New English Version (2004) is a smooth verse retelling of the epic. David Ferry, Gilgamesh: A New Rendering into English Verse (1992) is also recommended. For a study of the evolution of the story over time, see Geoffrey Tigay, The Evolution of the Gilgamesh Epic (1982). Alexander Heidel shows the importance of Gilgamesh for biblical studies in The Gilgamesh Epic and Old Testament Parallels (1963). Rivkah Harris, Gender and Aging in Mesopotamia: The Gilgamesh Epic and Other Ancient Literature (2000), discusses the gender dynamic in the epic in the light of other ancient texts. John Maier, Gilgamesh: A Reader (1997), contains seminal articles on Gilgamesh and an extensive bibliography. David Damrosch, The Buried Book: The Loss and Rediscovery of the Great Epic of Gilgamesh (2007), tells the story of the colonial adventurers, scholars, and contemporary writers involved in the rediscovery of Gilgamesh.

For those wishing to discover the riches of Mesopotamian literature beyond Gilgamesh, Benjamin Foster's voluminous Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature (1993, 2005) and From Distant Days: Myths, Tales, and Poetry of Ancient Mesopotamia (1995) contain a wealth of material. Jack Sasson et al., Civilizations of the Ancient Near East (1995), vol. 4, is devoted to languages and literatures of the region. For vivid presentations of Mesopotamian civilization, see Jean Bottéro, Mesopotamia: Writing, Reasoning, and the Gods (1992); J. N. Postgate, Early Mesopotamia: Society and Economy at the Dawn of History (1992); and Benjamin

Foster and Karen Polinger Foster, Civilizations of Ancient Iraq (2009).

The Hebrew Bible

Richard Elliott Friedman, Who Wrote the Bible? (1987), is a clear introduction to the idea that each of the first books of the Bible is composed from several narrative strands (the "documentary hypothesis"). The Anchor Bible, in multiple volumes, has useful introductions and notes to each book of the Bible, including historical information. More on the historicity of the Bible can be found in Ronald Hendel, Remembering Abraham: Culture, History and Memory in Ancient Israel (2004). Robert Alter and Frank Kermode, eds., The Literary Guide to the Bible (1987), has useful essays on approaching the stylistic and narrative structures of the Bible. James L. Crenshaw, Defending God: Biblical Responses to the Problem of Evil (2005), is an interesting attempt to grapple with the central moral problems raised by the Hebrew Bible.

Homer

The first chapter of Erich Auerbach's Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1953), trans. Willard Trask, gives a stimulating account of how Homeric narrative technique might differ from that of the Hebrew Bible. Essential works on the relation of the Homeric poems to the Greek oral tradition include Albert Lord, The Singer of Tales (1960), and Milman Parry, The Making of Homeric Verse (1973). Jenny Strauss Clay, The Wrath of Athena: Gods and Men in the Odyssey (1983), provides a useful overview of the gods in the epic. Female characters, human and divine, are discussed in Beth Cohen, ed., The Distaff Side: Representing the Female in Homer's Odyssey (1995). A good collection of classic essays on the Odyssey is Seth Schein, ed., Reading the Odyssey: Selected Interpretative Essays (1996). Those interested in the history of Homeric Greece will find useful information in M. I. Finley, Early Greece: The Bronze and Archaic Ages (1981). James Tatum, The Mourner's Song: War and Remembrance from the Iliad to Vietnam (2003), is a moving account of the Iliad in the context of later representations of war. Sheila Murnaghan's introductory essays to Stanley Lombardo's translations of the Odyssey (2000) and the Iliad (1997) provide rich interpretations of important literary themes, such as disguise, hospitality, heroism, and death.

Ovid

Sarah Mack, Ovid (1988), is a good general introduction, with a long chapter on the Metamorphoses. Philip Hardie, Ovid's Poetics of Illusion (2002), is an important guide to Ovid's poetic technique; metapoetic aspects are also discussed in R. A. Smith, Poetic Allusion and Poetic Embrace in Ovid and Virgil (1997), which includes a fine reading of the Pygmalion episode. Garth Tissol, The Face of Nature (1997), provides a useful close reading of the poem, including discussion of Ovid's puns, and looks in particular at the Myrrha episode. Charles Martindale, Ovid Renewed: Ovidian Influences on Literature and Art from the Middle Ages to the Twentieth Century (1988), gives some idea of the importance of Ovid for later literature.

Sappho

A useful collection of scholarly essays is Ellen Greene, ed., Reading Sappho: Contemporary Approaches (1996). Marguerite Johnson, Sappho (2007), is a clear, short introduction to some important literary themes in the poet's work. Sappho is read alongside two male, contemporary lyric poets in A. P. Burnett, Three Archaic Poets: Archilochus, Alcaeus, Sappho (1983). The reception of Sappho is particularly interesting; Margaret Reynolds, ed., The Sappho Companion (2000), is a collection of translations, imitations, and adaptations of Sappho's poems by postclassical poets and writers.

Sophocles

A good literary introduction to Sophocles, which draws on psychoanalytic and anthropological ideas to emphasize pairs of concepts (such as civilization versus wildness) is Charles Segal, Tragedy and Civilization: An Interpretation of Sophocles (1981). Important essays by various scholars on Oedipus the King, including a classic article by E. R. Dodds on common student misinterpretations of the play, are collected in Michael O'Brien, ed., Twentieth-Century Interpretations of Oedipus Rex (1968). Mary Blundell, Helping Friends and Harming Enemies (1989), reads Sophocles through the maxim of Greek popular morality alluded to in its title; one chapter is devoted to Antigone. The city of Thebes in Greek tragedy in general, and in these plays in particular, is discussed by Froma Zeitlin in her essay in Zeitlin and John J. Winkler, eds., Nothing to Do with Dionysos? (1990). In two editions of the plays in Greek, scholars have written introductions that are accessible and useful even to the nonspecialist reader: R. D. Dawe on Oedipus Tyrannos, and Mark Griffith on Antigone (1982 and 1999 respectively). The political dimensions of the plays are particularly difficult for modern readers to grasp; an interesting attempt to apply the specifics of Athenian political history to the plays is Michael Vickers, Sophocles and Alcibiades: Athenian Politics in Ancient Greek Literature (2008). Both plays have been adapted in many different ways for the modern stage; one important example is Seamus Heaney's version of Antigone, set in Northern Ireland, The Burial at Thebes (2004).

Virgil

The structure of the whole poem is discussed in David O. Ross, Virgil's Aeneid: A Reader's Guide (2007). S. Harrison, ed., Oxford Readings in Virgil's Aeneid (1990) has useful articles on many aspects of the poem. A good literary introduction to the whole poem is Michael C. J. Putnam, Virgil's Aeneid: Interpretation and Influence (1995). Yasmin Syed, Virgil's Aeneid and the Roman Self (2005), gives an interesting account of how the poem participated in, and formed, Roman cultural values. A good short discussion of Virgilian allusion to earlier literature, why it works and why it matters, is R. O. A. M. Lyne, Further Voices in Virgil's Aeneid (1987). S. Quinn, ed., Why Virgil? (2000), includes literary essays and some examples of modern literature imitating or responding to Virgil. David Quint, Epic and Empire (1993), provides an important model for reading Virgil and later epics in terms of the losers and winners of history.

II. Ancient India

Burton Stein, A History of India (1998), and Stanley Wolpert, A New History of India (2008), offer good, complementary historical overviews of ancient India; Upinder Singh, A History of Ancient and Early Medieval India (2009), provides a more detailed, up-to-date account. Romila Thapar, Cultural Pasts: Essays in Early Indian History (2000), contains the best critical analyses of specific aspects of the ancient period. Thomas R. Trautmann, The Aryan Debate (2005), surveys recent controversies on India's prehistory, and includes a selection of important texts from the eighteenth century onward. Patrick Olivelle, Upaniṣads (1996), provides an excellent overview of Vedic religion, with translations of some canonical texts; Gavin Flood, An Introduction to Hinduism (1996), explains both early and later forms of the religion. Peter Harvey, An Introduction to Buddhism (1990), covers history, doctrine, and practice, with a focus on Mahayana Buddhism; Joseph M. Kitagawa and Mark D. Cummings, Buddhism and Asian History (1989), offers greater depth as well as a broader sweep, with specialist essays by many scholars.

The Bhagavad-gītā

Among the world's canonical religious texts, the Bhagavad-gītā is second only to the Bible in the number of times it has been translated, and the range of languages into which it has been rendered. Of the many modern translations available in English, Barbara Stoler Miller, The Bhagavad-gītā: Krishna's Counsel in Time of War (1986), is one of the most reliable and accessible. R. C. Zaehner, The Bhagavad-gītā (1969), includes the original Sanskrit text in English transcription, along with a literal rendering, a more polished version, and a commentary on each verse. The most useful Indian translation into English is S. Radhakrishnan's older The Bhagavad-gītā—1948 and later editions. For a discussion of Indian interpretations of the poem, see Robert Minor, Modern Interpreters of the Bhagavadgītā (1986); and for an account of its reception in the West, consult Eric Sharpe, The Universal Gītā: Western Images of the Bhagavad Gītā, a Bicentennial Survey (1985).

The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmiki

The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmiki: An Epic of Ancient India (1984–), translated, annotated, and introduced by various scholars led by Robert Goldman, is the best recent version in English; five volumes, representing books 1 through 5, have appeared so far. Swami Venkatesanand, The Concise Rāmāyaṇa (1988), the source of our text, is a condensed prose version, which emphasizes the religious message of Vālmiki's epic, interpreted from a conservative modern perspective. A particularly readable literary prose rendering of Kamban's twelfth-century Tamil version of the poem appears in R. K. Narayan, The Rāmāyaṇa (1972). Important scholarly essays on most aspects of "the story of Rāma" are collected in Paula Richman, Many Rāmāyaṇas: The Diversity of a Narrative Tradition in South Asia (1991).

III. Early Chinese Literature and Thought

Jacques Gernet, A History of Chinese Civilization (1982), is a commanding survey history of China. Patricia Ebrey, Anne Walhall, and James Palais, Pre-Modern East Asia to 1800: A Cultural, Social and Political History (2009), is an excellent shorter account of Chinese history in the broader context of East Asia. Michael Loewe and Edward Shaughnessy, eds., The Cambridge History of Ancient China (1999), is a comprehensive reference work for early Chinese history and culture. For a vivid account of thought and society in early imperial China, see Mark Lewis, The Early Chinese Empires: Qin and Han (2007). For a comprehensive history of Chinese Literature refer to Kang-i Sun Chang and Stephen Owen, eds.,

The Cambridge History of Chinese Literature (2010). Wiebke Denecke, Waiyee Li, and Xiaofei Tian, eds., The Oxford Handbook of Classical Chinese Literature (1000 BCE–900 CE) (2017) gives a comprehensive thematic, topical, and cross-cultural overview of Chinese literature during its first two millennia.

For those wishing to explore more early Chinese texts, Stephen Owen, Anthology of Chinese Literature, Beginnings to 1911 (1996), presents a rich selection of Chinese literature with ample introductory material and commentary. Cyril Birch, Anthology of Chinese Literature (1965), and Victor Mair, The Columbia Anthology of Traditional Chinese Literature (1994), which is organized by genre and not chronology, are also recommended. For early Chinese thought and religion, see William Theodore de Bary, Sources of Chinese Tradition (2nd ed. 1999), a two-volume anthology covering a broad variety of original texts in translation from the beginnings to the modern period.

For broader explorations of Chinese Masters Literature, see Benjamin Schwartz, The World of Thought in Ancient China (1985); A. C. Graham, Disputers of the Tao: Philosophical Argument in Ancient China (1989); Chad Hansen, A Daoist Theory of Chinese Thought: A Philosophical Interpretation (1992); and Wiebke Denecke, The Dynamics of Masters Literature: Early Chinese Thought from Confucius to Han Feizi (2010). To explore comparisons between Ancient Greece and China, see Lisa Raphals, Knowing Words: Wisdom and Cunning in the Classical Traditions of China and Greece (1992), and Steven Shankman and Stephen Durrant, The Siren and the Sage: Knowledge and Wisdom in Ancient Greece and China (2000).

Classic of Poetry

Other translations for comparison include Arthur Waley, The Book of Songs (1937), and Ezra Pound, The Classic Anthology Defined by Confucius (1954). Anecdotes by the Han Dynasty scholar Han Ying (fl. 150 B.C.E.) that show how poems from the Classic of Poetry were applied to concrete situations and moral questions can be found in James R. Hightower, Han Shih Wai Chuan: Han Ying's Illustrations of the Didactic Application of the Classic of Songs (1952). For stimulating studies of the anthology and its interpretation, see Steven Van Zoeren, Poetry and Personality: Reading, Exegesis and Hermeneutics in Traditional China (1991), and Haun Saussy, The Problem of a Chinese Aesthetic (1993). Pauline Yu, The Reading of Imagery in the Chinese Poetic Tradition (1987), is a compelling study of imagery in the Classic of Poetry and other Chinese texts. For the “Great Preface” of the Classic of Poetry and Chinese poetics in general, Stephen Owen’s Readings in Chinese Literary Thought (1992) gives a captivating introduction to major works of Chinese literary thought and provides a bilingual translation of the original texts with detailed commentary. James Liu’s Chinese Theories of Literature (1975) sketches major Chinese paradigms of the concept of literature. To explore literary thought in more recent times, see Modern Chinese Literary Thought: Writings on Literature, 1893–1945, ed. Kirk Denton (1996). For scholarly essays on Chinese literary criticism in general, see Chinese Aesthetics and Literature: A Reader, ed. Corinne H. Dale (2004). For a broader exploration of literary interpretation in Chinese and Western literatures, see Longxi Zhang’s The Tao and the Logos: Literary Hermeneutics, East and West (1992).

Confucius

There are many translations of the Analects. The selections in this anthology are from Simon Leys’s complete translation, The Analects of Confucius (1997). Arthur Waley’s resonant translation of 1938 has recently been reprinted with an explanatory introduction by Sarah Allan (2000). D. C. Lau, Analects (1979), is a solid translation and contains a lucid introduction to Confucius and his ideas. Roger T. Ames and Henry Rosemont, The Analects of Confucius: A Philosophical Translation (1998), provides the classical Chinese text alongside an English version. For an overview of early Chinese philosophy and thought, read A. C. Graham, Disputers of the Tao: Philosophical Argument in Ancient China (1989), and Wiebke Denecke, The Dynamics of Masters Literature. Early Chinese Thought from Confucius to Hanfeizi (2011). Herbert Fingarette, Confucius—The Secular as Sacred (1972), remains one of the most persuasive accounts of the appeal of the Analects. David L. Hall and Roger T. Ames, Thinking through Confucius (1987), is an innovative reading of the Analects inspired by American pragmatic philosophy. John Makeham, Transmitters and Creators: Chinese Commentators and Commentaries on the Analects (2003), gives insight into later commentators' understanding of the Analects. For a compelling account of early Confucianism, see Robert Eno, The Confucian Creation of Heaven: Philosophy and the Defense of Ritual Mastery (1990). Thomas A. Wilson, On Sacred Grounds: Culture, Society, Politics, and the Formation of the Cult of Confucius (2002), is a collection of articles about the religious dimensions of Confucianism and the Confucius cult. Lionel Jensen, Manufacturing Confucianism: Chinese Traditions and Universal Civilization (1997), discusses how the image of Confucianism created by European missionaries working in China during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries has influenced modern understandings. John Makeham, Lost Soul: "Confucianism" in Contemporary Chinese Academic Discourse (2008), surveys the significance of Confucianism in today's intellectual debates.

Laozi

Among the many translations of the Daodejing, D. C. Lau, Tao Te Ching (1963); Roger Ames and David L. Hall, Daodejing—Making This Life Significant—A Philosophical Translation (2003); and Red Pine, Lao-tzu's Taote-

ching: With Selected Commentaries of the Past 2000 Years (1997), are especially recommended. Robert G. Henricks, Lao-Tzu's Tao Te Ching: A New Translation Based on the Recently Discovered Ma-wang-tui Texts (1989) and Lao Tzu's Tao Te Ching: A Translation of the Startling New Documents Found at Guodian (2000), are based on excavated manuscripts of the Daodejing and are interesting to compare to the received text. For an overview of early Chinese philosophy and thought, read A. C. Graham, Disputers of the Tao: Philosophical Argument in Ancient China (1989), and Wiebke Denecke, The Dynamics of Masters Literature. Early Chinese Thought from Confucius to Hanfeizi (2011).

For a broader view on the Daodejing within the context of Early Chinese intellectual debates, see the chapters on the Daodejing in the books on Chinese Masters Literature indicated in the regional introduction to "Early Chinese Thought and Literature." Arthur Waley, The Way and Its Power: A Study of the Tao Te Ching and Its Place in Chinese Thought (1958), is still a classic study of the Daodejing. Michael LaFargue, Tao and Method: A Reasoned Approach to the Tao Te Ching (1994), is a compelling reconstruction of what the text might have meant to its earliest readers. For interpretations of one of the most influential commentators of the Daodejing, see Rudolf Wagner, The Craft of the Chinese Commentator: Wang Bi on the Laozi (2000) and A Chinese Reading of the Daodejing: Wang Bi's Commentary on the Laozi with Critical Text and Translation (2003). For views on the Daodejing and its relation to the Laozi and Daoism, see Livia Kohn and Michael LaFargue, Lao-tzu and the Tao-te-ching (1998), and Mark Csikszentmihalyi and Philip J. Ivanhoe, Religious and Philosophical Aspects of the Laozi (1999).

IV. Circling the Mediterranean: Europe and the Islamic World

On the idea of the Mediterranean, see the classic 1949 study by Fernand Braudel, The Mediterranean and the Mediterranean World in the Age of Philip II, trans. Siân Reynolds (1972–1973; rpt., 1996), as well as the increasingly influential work of Peregrine Horden and Nicholas Purcell, The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History (2000). On late antiquity and the early Middle Ages, see Peter Brown, The World of Late Antiquity: From Marcus Aurelius to Muhammad (1989), and Averil Cameron, The Mediterranean World in Late Antiquity, A.D. 395–600 (1993).

For an overview of medieval Islamic history, see John Esposito, Oxford History of Islam (2000); Albert Hourani, A History of the Arab Peoples (2002); Seyyed Hossein Nasr, Islam: Religion, History and Civilization (2003). Information on almost any subject can be found in P. J. Bearman et al., eds., Encyclopaedia of Islam, 12 vols. (2nd ed., 1960–2005). A useful account of Persian poetics is offered by Julie Scott Meisami, Medieval Persian Court Poetry (1987).

For a survey of Europe's history from the fall of Rome to the beginnings of the Renaissance, three classic and still valuable studies are R. W. Southern, The Making of the Middle Ages (1953); Charles Homer Haskins, The Renaissance of the Twelfth Century (1927); and J. W. Huizinga, The Autumn of the Middle Ages (1919), trans. Rodney J. Payton and Ulrich Mammitzsch (1996). For information on almost any topic pertaining to medieval Europe, see The Dictionary of the Middle Ages, gen. ed. Joseph Strayer, 13 vols. (1989), with Supplement 1, ed. William Chester Jordan (2003).

Classic overviews of medieval European literary history and its place within the discipline of world literature can be found in Ernst Robert Curtius, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages (1948), trans. Willard Trask (1953), and Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946), trans. Willard Trask (1953; rpt., 2003). On the literary interactions of the Islamic world and medieval Europe, see María Rosa Menocal, The Arabic Role in Medieval Literary History (1987), and the reappraisal of Menocal's work in A Sea of Languages: Literature and Culture in the Pre-modern Mediterranean, ed. Suzanne Conklin Akbari and Karla Mallette (2011).

Augustine

A wonderful introduction and detailed notes can be found in the translation by Henry Chadwick (1991) and also the 3-volume edition and commentary by James J. O'Donnell (1992), both titled Confessions. O'Donnell's text is available online from the Stoa Consortium in cooperation with the Perseus Project at www.stoa.org/hippo/. For an account of Augustine's life by the foremost historian of early Christianity in the Roman Empire, see Peter Brown, Augustine of Hippo: A Biography (1967; 2nd ed., 2000). A provocative and engaging life of the bishop and saint appears in James J. O'Donnell, Augustine: A New Biography (2005). On Augustine's own reading practices and the reading communities that formed in his wake, see Brian Stock, Augustine the Reader: Meditation, Self-Knowledge and the Ethics of Interpretation (1996). A collection of scholarly essays that contextualize Augustine and his works in theological, historical, and cultural terms is A Companion to Augustine (2012) by Mark Vessey, with the assistance of Shelley Reid, ed.

Beowulf

See the invaluable guide to the poem by Andy Orchard, A Critical Companion to 'Beowulf'

(2003). A useful collection of essays is Robert Bjork and John Niles, eds., A Beowulf Handbook (1997). For a broad view of Anglo-Saxon literature and culture, see Malcolm Godden and Michael Lapidge, eds., The Cambridge Companion to Old English Literature (1991).

The Christian Bible

A full text with useful notes can be found in The New Oxford Annotated Bible: New Revised Standard Version, ed. Michael D. Coogan, Marc Z. Brettler, Carol Newsom, and Pheme Perkins (4th ed., 2010). For a brief overview of the historical background of the Bible and the diverse reading communities that have made it their own, see John Riches, The Bible: A Very Short Introduction (2000). The poetic and artistic qualities of scripture are on view in The Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. Robert Alter and Frank Kermode (1987). A more idiosyncratic reading of the Bible, rooted in a deep knowledge of history but with the profound inquisitiveness of a science fiction writer, appears in Isaac Asimov, Asimov's Guide to the Bible: The Old and New Testaments (1981; rpt., 1988). An intriguing interpretation of the Bible as graphic novel is Siku's The Manga Bible: From Genesis to Revelation (2008).

Geoffrey Chaucer

The most complete edition of Chaucer's poetry, with authoritative notes and commentary, is The Riverside Chaucer, ed. Larry D. Benson (3rd ed., 1987). An engaging portrait of Chaucer and his times can be found in Donald R. Howard, Chaucer: His Life, His Works, His World (1987). On the manuscript history of the Canterbury Tales in historical context, see Derek Pearsall, The Canterbury Tales (1985), and for an art-historical perspective focused on the poem's interlocking structure, see V. A. Kolve, Chaucer and the Imagery of Narrative: The First Five Canterbury Tales (1984). On Chaucer's role in the premodern invention of the subject, see Lee Patterson, Chaucer and the Subject of History (1991). On sexuality and gender, including influential readings of the Wife of Bath and the Pardoner, see Carolyn Dinshaw, Chaucer's Sexual Poetics (1989).

Christine de Pizan

A full translation of Christine de Pizan's City of Ladies appears in Rosalind Brown-Grant, trans., The Book of the City of Ladies (1999); another popular translation of the same title is by Earl Jeffrey Richards (1982). Christine de Pizan: Her Life and Works (1984), by Charity Cannon Willard, is a highly readable biography of the author by a scholar who played a crucial role in reawakening modern readers' interest in Christine's writings. Well-chosen excerpts from Christine's numerous works of prose and poetry, accompanied by influential critical essays, appear in Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski and Kevin Brownlee, ed. and trans., The Selected Writings of Christine de Pizan (1997). For an insightful study of the interrelation of the text and illuminated miniatures in Christine's manuscripts, see Sandra Hindman, Christine de Pizan's "Epistre Othéa": Painting and Politics at the Court of Charles VI (1986). A study of Christine de Pizan's City of Ladies in the light of premodern feminism is Maureen Quilligan's The Allegory of Female Authority: Christine de Pizan's "Cité des Dames" (1991).

Dante Alighieri

Charles Singleton's annotated translation of Dante's Divine Comedy, with facing-page Italian text, is unsurpassed (6 vols., 1970–1975; rpt., 1990–1991). See also Singleton's groundbreaking and still stimulating short studies Commedia: Elements of Structure (1954) and Journey to Beatrice (1958). Short articles on a range of topics appear in The Dante Encyclo- pedia, gen. ed. Richard Lansing (2000), and a synoptic view of the encyclopedic quality of the Comedy is given in Giuseppe Mazzotta, Dante's Vision and the Circle of Knowledge (1993). The influence of Singleton remains strong in recent generations of Dante scholarship. Robert Pogue Harrison responds to Singleton's Journey in his Body of Beatrice (1988), while Teodolinda Barolini pushes back against the theologizing impulse of Singleton's work in The Undivine Comedy: Detheologizing Dante (1992). On Dante's relationship to his poetic forebears, from Virgil to the Occitan troubadours, see Teodolinda Barolini, Dante's Poets: Textuality and Truth in the "Comedy" (1984).

Marie de France

A full collection of Marie's lais appears in Dorothy Gilbert, trans., Marie de France: Poetry (2015). A still useful overview of her work is Emanuel J. Mickel, Jr., Marie de France (1974); for an insightful reading of Marie within the framework of medieval gender categories, see R. Howard Bloch, The Anonymous Marie de France (2003). An influential study of Marie's oeuvre is Sharon Kinoshita and Peggy McCracken, Marie de France: A Critical Companion (2012).

The Qur'an

An extraordinarily readable translation of the Qur'an with good annotations is M. A. S. Abdel Haleem, The Qur'an: A New Translation (2004). See also his Understanding the Qur'an: Themes and Style (1999). A scholarly collection of essays appears in Jane Dammen McAuliffe, ed., The Cambridge Companion to the Qur'an (2009); for detailed information on specific topics, see also McAuliffe, ed., The Encyclopaedia of the Qur'an, 5 vols. (2001–2006). A useful overview is W. Montgomery Watt and Richard Bell, Introduction to the Qur'an (rev. ed., 2001). To get a sense of the rhythm and musicality of Qur'anic recitation, see Michael Sells, "Sound, Spirit, and Gender in the Qur'an" (1991), reprinted as an appendix to his Approaching the Qur'an: The Early Revelations (2nd ed., 2007), which includes a CD.

The Thousand and One Nights

The best short overview of the history of the Nights' composition and translation is Dwight F. Reynolds, "A Thousand and One Nights: A History of the Text and Its Reception," in Arabic Literature in the Post-classical Period, ed. Roger Allen and D. S. Richards (2006). The novelist Robert Irwin has published a widely available (but not always consistently reliable) guide called The Arabian Nights: A Companion (1994; rpt., 2004). The two best collections on the Nights focus respectively on the formation of the work and on its reception. The first is The Arabian Nights Reader, ed. Ulrich Marzolph (2006), which includes many of the crucial, groundbreaking scholarly articles on the Nights by such authors as Muhsin Mahdi, the modern editor of the Arabic text, and Nabia Abbott, the discoverer of the ninth-century manuscript fragment that is the first evidence of the work; the second, which offers some very useful correctives to Irwin, is The Arabian Nights in Historical Context: Between East and West, ed. Saree Makdisi and Felicity Nussbaum (2008).

Fruitful literary analyses of the Nights include Sandra Naddaff, Arabesque: Narrative Structure and the Aesthetics of Repetition in the 1001 Nights (1991), which features a comparative and theoretical literary analysis of the Porter and the Three Ladies group of tales, and David Pinault, Story-telling Techniques in the Arabian Nights (1992), which offers an excellent comparative analysis of the Syria and Cairo compilations of the Nights and their historical contexts. Provocative food for thought on the Nights' role in modern fiction, especially in magical realism, can be found in Jorge Luis Borges, "The Translators of The Thousand and One Nights" (1934), trans. Esther Allen, in Selected Non-fictions (in paperback as The Total Library: Non-fiction, 1922–86), ed. Eliot Weinberger (1999), and in The Translation Studies Reader, ed. Lawrence Venuti (2nd ed., 2004). Finally, <http://journalofthenights.blogspot.com/> provides an appropriately abundant and fertile overview of everything imaginable responding to the Nights—adaptations (music, opera, theatre, film, video games, toys, etc.), recently published studies and articles, new translations, political issues (especially censorship), et cetera.

V. Medieval China

Two books by Mark Lewis, China between Empires: The Northern and Southern Dynasties (2009) and China's Cosmopolitan Empire: The Tang Dynasty (2009), provide lively depictions of China's medieval world. Edward H. Schafer's The Golden Peaches of Samarkand: A Study of T'ang Exotics (1963) vividly evokes the multiethnic atmosphere of Tang culture.

For a general survey of medieval literature, see the relevant chapters in The Cambridge History of Chinese Literature, ed. Stephen Owen and Kang-i Sun Chang, 2 vols. (2010). On medieval poetry in particular, see Stephen Owen, The Making of Early Chinese Classical Poetry (2006); Kang-i Sun Chang, Six Dynasties Poetry (1986); and Kōjirō Yoshikawa, An Introduction to Sung Poetry, trans. Burton Watson (1967). Xiaofei Tian's Beacon Fire and Shooting Star: The Literary Culture of the Liang (502–557) (2008) is a compelling study of literary court culture in the South during the Period of Disunion.

Tang Poetry

Stephen Owen's Traditional Chinese Poetry and Poetics: Omen of the World (1985) provides a general introduction to Chinese poetry. For an anthology of guided readings in various genres of Chinese poetry, see Zongqi Cai's How to Read Chinese Poetry: A Guided Anthology (2008). To further explore the breadth and development of Tang poetry, see Stephen Owen's four magisterial studies: The Poetry of the Early T'ang (1977), The Great Age of Chinese Poetry: The High T'ang (1981), The End of the Chinese 'Middle Ages': Essays in Mid-Tang Literary Culture (1996), and

The Late Tang: Chinese Poetry of the Mid-Ninth Century (827–860) (2006).

For translations of Li Bo's poetry, see Vikram Seth's Three Chinese Poets: Translations of Poems by Wang Wei, Li Bai, and Du Fu (1992). Paul W. Kroll's Studies in Medieval Taoism and the Poetry of Li Po (2009) and Paula Varsano's Tracking the Banished Immortal: The Poetry of Li Bo and Its Critical Reception (2003) are compelling studies of the poetry; Arthur Waley's The Poetry and Career of Li Po, 701–762 A.D. (1950) is a biography.

Among translations of Du Fu, David Hawkes's A Little Primer of Tu Fu (1967), an introductory bilingual edition of a few of the poems, is particularly recommended. For a complete bilingual translation of Du Fu's poetry see Stephen Owen's The Poetry of Du Fu, 6 volumes (2016).

See also Burton Watson's The Selected Poems of Du Fu (2002). For studies of Du Fu's life and legacy see David McCraw's Du Fu's Laments from the South (1992) and Eva Shan Chou's Reconsidering Tu Fu: Literary Greatness and Cultural Context (1995).

VI. Japan's Classical Age

To further explore early and medieval Japanese history see Conrad Schirokauer, David Lurie, and Suzanne Gay's A Brief History of Japanese Civilization (2nd ed., 2006). For a shorter treatment of Japanese history in the context of East Asia, Patricia Buckley Ebrey, Anne Walthall, and James B. Palais, East Asia: A Cultural, Social, and Political History (2nd ed., 2009), is recommended.

Traditional Japanese Literature: An Anthology, Beginnings to 1600, ed. Haruo Shirane (2007), and Donald Keene's Anthology of Japanese Literature: From the Earliest Era to the Mid-Nineteenth Century (1955) are great treasure troves of original early and medieval Japanese texts in English translation; see also Traditional Japanese Poetry: An Anthology, trans. Steven D. Carter (1991), and Classical Japanese Prose: An Anthology, ed. Helen Craig McCullough (1990). Lovers of travel literature will appreciate Donald Keene's Travelers of a Hundred Ages: The Japanese as Revealed through 1,000 Years of Diaries (rev. ed., 1999). Keene presents a sweeping history of premodern Japanese literature in Seeds in the Heart: Japanese Literature from Earliest Times to the Late Sixteenth Century (1993). For a comprehensive history of Japanese literature see Cambridge History of Japanese Literature (2016), edited by Haruo Shirane, Tomi Suzuki, and David Lurie.

Earl Miner, Hiroko Odagiri, and Robert E. Morrell's The Princeton Companion to Classical Japanese Literature (1985) is a reliable reference work to the world of Japanese literature. Groundbreaking studies of the interplay between Chinese and Japanese cultural traditions in Japanese literature include David Pollack, The Fracture of Meaning: Japan's Synthesis of China from the Eighth through the Eighteenth Centuries (1986); Thomas LaMarre, Uncovering Heian Japan: An Archaeology of Sensation and Inscription (2000); and Atsuko Sakaki, Obsessions with the Sino-Japanese Polarity in Japanese Literature (2005). Tomiko Yoda's Gender and National Literature: Heian Texts in the Constructions of Japanese Modernity (2004) is a compelling study of how Heian texts have influenced modern Japanese identity and self-understanding.

Murasaki Shikibu

This anthology uses a new translation by Denis Washburn; the three previous English translations of The Tale of Genji all have their partisans. The first English translation was published by Arthur Waley in installments between 1925 and 1933. Edward G. Seidensticker's The Tale of Genji (1976) is a beautiful translation, more faithful than Waley's. The translation by Royall Tyler (2001) is yet more faithful.

For a glimpse into the life of the author, see Murasaki Shikibu: Her Diary and Poetic Mem- oirs, trans. Richard Bowring (1982). Ivan Morris, The World of the Shining Prince: Court Life in Ancient Japan, with a new introduction by Barbara Ruch (1964; rpt., 1994), is a colorful account of the world that Murasaki and her characters inhabit.

The best brief introduction to the tale is Richard Bowring, Murasaki Shikibu: "The Tale of Genji" (1988). Two excellent longer studies are Norma Field, The Splendor of Longing in the "Tale of Genji" (1987), and Haruo Shirane, The Bridge of Dreams: A Poetics of "The Tale of Genji" (1987). Envisioning "The Tale of Genji": Media,

Gender, and Cultural Production (2008), a collection of articles edited by Shirane, gives fascinating glimpses of how The Tale of Genji influenced later literature, art, and popular culture.

Sei Shōnagon

The selections printed in this anthology are taken from a complete translation by Meredith McKinney, The Pillow Book (2006). Other important translations include the pioneering translation of Arthur Waley, The Pillow-Book of Sei Shōnagon (1928); Ivan Morris, The Pillow Book of Sei Shōnagon, 2 vols. (1967) (the second volume contains useful notes and appendices); and the sampling in Helen Craig McCullough, Classical Japanese Prose: An Anthology (1990). Ivan Morris's The World of the Shining Prince: Court Life in Ancient Japan (1964), a colorful portrayal of the Heian period, will be helpful to readers of both The Pillow Book and The Tale of Genji.

VII. Islam and Pre-Islamic Culture in North Africa

David Conrad's Empires of Medieval West Africa (rev. ed., 2010) provides a broad introduction to West Africa, as does Nehemia Levtzion's Ancient Ghana and Mali (1980). Levtzion and J. F. P. Hopkins's Corpus of Early Arabic Sources for West African History (1981) is an excellent source book for the study of the region. For the history of Islam in West Africa, consult Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels's The History of Islam in Africa (2000) and Levtzion and Jay Spaulding's Medieval West Africa: Views from Arab Scholars and Merchants (2003).

Sunjata

Musical performances involving the singing of stories and praises about Sunjata are called Sunjata fasa, and the prose narrative in its many versions is known as Manden maana, or Manden tariku. The version excerpted here was collected and translated by David C. Conrad; his Sunjata (2004) offers a detailed introduction. Conrad's Epic Ancestors of the Sunjata Era: Oral Tradition from the Maninka of Guinea collects seven variants of the Sunjata epic. Laye Camara's The Guardian of the Word (1984) is a prose variant in novel form, based on the narrative by Babu Condé of Fadama, Guinea, recorded in 1963. But it was another prose variant, Djibril Tamsir Niane's Sundiata: An Epic of Old Mali (1965) that first drew worldwide attention to this epic. The three versions edited by Gordon Innes in Sunjata (1974) were narrated in the Mandinka dialect of the Gambia, and the one published by John Johnson in 1986 as Son-Jara third edition (2003) represents the Kita region of Mali. Eric Charry's Mande Music (2000) describes the musical instruments involved in performing the epic, while Stephen Belcher, Epic Traditions of Africa (1999), and Marloes Janson, The Best Hand is the Hand that Always Gives: Griottes and their Profession in Eastern Gambia (2002), provide broad context and analytical insight.

VIII. Europe and the New World

Eugene Rice with Anthony Grafton, The Foundations of Early Modern Europe, second edition (1994), is the finest introduction to the contexts in which Renaissance or early modern literature was produced. William Bouwsma, A Usable Past: Essays in European Cultural History (1990), especially the chapter "Anxiety and the Formation of Early Modern Culture," also offers illuminating perspectives on the intellectual character of the period. Constance Jordan, Renaissance Feminism: Literary Texts and Political Models (1990), is a recommended study of the place of women in history and political thought. William Kerrigan and Gordon Braden, The Idea of the Renaissance (1989), offers a helpful and direct analysis of the critical construction of the Renaissance as a concept. Harry Berger Jr., Second World and Green World: Studies in Renaissance Fiction-Making (1988), especially the title essay, is a dense but recommended study of the aims of fiction making. Stephen Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning (1980), describes the construction of identity in the period. J. H. Elliott's The Old World and the New: 1492–1650 (1992) and Imperial Spain: 1492–1716, second edition (2002) provide good introductions.

Miguel de Cervantes

William Byron, Cervantes: A Biography (1978), is thorough. Ruth El Saffar, ed., Critical Essays on Cervantes (1986), and Anne Cruz and Carroll Johnson, eds., Cervantes and his Postmodern Constituencies (1998) offer interesting essays by eminent scholars. Vladimir Nabokov, Lectures on Don Quixote (1983), presents an elegant engagement with Cervantes' fiction. More technical studies include Carroll Johnson, Cervantes and the Material World (2000) and David Quint, Cervantes' Novel of Modern Times: A New Reading of Don Quixote (2003).

Niccolò Machiavelli

Peter E. Bondanella focuses on the literary aspects of Machiavelli's works in Machiavelli and the Art of Renaissance History (1973). Sebastian de Grazia, Machiavelli in Hell (1989), on politics in The Prince, contains indexes and a bibliography. J. R. Hale's biography, Machiavelli and Renaissance Italy (1972), places Machiavelli in a historical perspective. A political analysis is provided by Anthony Parel in The Political Calculus: Essays on Machiavelli's Political Philosophy (1972). Roberto Ridolfi, The Life of Niccolò Machiavelli (1963), is still considered the best and most accurate biography. Silvia Ruffo-Fiore, Niccolò Machiavelli (1982), is a useful comprehensive guide for the beginning student. Victoria Kahn, Machiavellian Rhetoric: From the Counter-Reformation to Milton (1994), and Wayne A. Rebhorn, Foxes and Lions: Machiavelli's Confidence Men (1988), are recommended.

Marguerite de Navarre

P. A. Chilton's justly praised translation of the Heptameron (1984) has an excellent introduction. John D. Lyons and Mary B. McKinley, eds., Critical Tales: New Studies of the Heptameron and Early Modern Culture (1993), contains useful essays on the Heptameron. B. J. Davis, The Storytellers in Marguerite de Navarre's Heptameron (1978), presents detailed discussions of the narrators. Timothy Hampton, Literature and Nation in the Sixteenth Century: Inventing Renaissance France (2001) offers a historical reading of story 10. Samuel Putnam, Marguerite de Navarre (1935), is an informative and readable biography. Barbara M. Stephenson, The Power and Patronage of Marguerite de Navarre (2004), uses Marguerite's letters to trace her involvement in politics and in religious reform.

Michel de Montaigne

Hugo Friedrich, Montaigne (1991), is a careful historical study of the author. David Quint, Montaigne and the Quality of Mercy (1998) analyzes the political and ethical goals of the Essays. Judith Shklar, Ordinary Vices (1984), and Edwin Duval, "Lessons of the New World: Design and Meaning in Montaigne's 'Des Cannibales' (I:31) and 'Des coches' (III:6)," in Montaigne: Essays in Reading, ed. Gerard Defaux, Yale French Studies 64 (1983): 95–112, provide excellent studies of Montaigne that include, but are not limited to, his New World contexts. Marcel Tetel, Montaigne, updated edition (1990), and Richard Sayce, The Essays of Montaigne: A Critical Exploration (1972), are excellent introductions designed for the general reader.

Francis Petrarch

Ernest Hatch Wilkins's biography, Life of Petrarch (1961), is informative, but tends to take Petrarch's autobiographical writings at face value. Giuseppe Mazzotta, The Worlds of Petrarch (1993), is an encyclopedic introduction to Petrarch's work and times. Victoria Kirkham and Armando Maggi have compiled the useful Petrarch: A Critical Guide to the Complete Works (2009). Robert Durling's introduction to Petrarch's Lyric Poems (1976) provides a rich overview of his poetry. Diana Vickers, "Diana Described: Scattered Woman and Scattered Rhyme," Writing and Sexual Difference, ed. Elizabeth Abel (1982), is the central feminist reading of Petrarch's lyric. In Unrequited Conquests (2000), Roland Greene reads Petrarchism in relation to early modern imperialism.

Popol Vuh

Dennis Tedlock's translation, satisfyingly annotated, is published as Popol Vuh: The Mayan Book of the Dawn of Life (1985; revised 1996). The text in this volume is from the 1996 edition. Older translations with useful introductions are Adrián Recinos, Delia Goetz, and Sylvanus Morley, Popol Vuh: The Sacred Book of the Ancient Quiché Maya (1950); and Munro S. Edmonson, The Book of Counsel: The Popol Vuh of the Quiché Maya of Guatemala (1971). Edmonson's is the only Quiché-English edition. Essays on the Popol Vuh and related topics are in Tedlock's The Spoken Word and the Work of Interpretation (1983).

William Shakespeare

Recent biographies placing Shakespeare in his social and intellectual context include Stephen Greenblatt, Will in the World: How Shakespeare Became Shakespeare (2004) and Jonathan Bate, Soul of the Age: A Biography of the Mind of William Shakespeare (2009). Marjorie Garber, Shakespeare After All (2005), provides a lively introduction, with individual essays on all the plays. Paul Arthur Cantor, Shakespeare, "Hamlet" (1989), is an in-depth study of the tragedy. Valuable studies are to be found in Harry Levin, The Question of "Hamlet" (1959) and Margreta de Grazia, "Hamlet" without Hamlet (2007).

Permissions Acknowledgments

- Beowulf: From BEOWULF, trans. by Seamus Heaney. Copyright © 2000 by Seamus Heaney. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Bhagavad-gītā: From THE BHAGAVAD-GITA: A NEW TRANSLATION, trans. by Gavin Flood & Charles Martin. Copyright © 2012 by Gavin Flood and Charles Martin. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Geoffrey Chaucer: From THE SELECTED CANTERBURY TALES: A NEW VERSE TRANSLATION, trans. by Sheila Fisher. Copyright © 2011 by Sheila Fisher. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- The Christian Bible: Excerpts from THE FOUR GOSPELS AND THE REVELATION by Richmond Lattimore. Copyright © 1979 by Richmond Lattimore. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux.
- Classic of Poetry: "Fishhawk", "Peach Tree Soft and Tender", "Plums Are Falling", "Dead Roe Deer", "Classic of Poetry XXVI "Boat Of Cypress", "Gentle Girl", "Quince", "Zhong-Zi, Please", "Classic of Poetry CXIII "Huge Rat", "Classic of Poetry XCV "Zhen and Wei", "She Bore The Folks", "Li Bo, South of the Walls We Fought", "A Song on Visiting Heaven's Crone Mountain in a Dream: On Parting", "Painted Hawk", "I Stand Alone", from AN ANTHOLOGY OF CHINESE LITERATURE: BEGINNINGS TO 1911, edited by Stephen Owen, translated by Stephen Owen. Copyright © 1996 by Stephen Owen and The Council for Cultural Planning and Development of the Executive Yuan of the Republic of China. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Confucius: From THE ANALECTS OF CONFUCIUS, trans. by Simon Leys. Copyright © 1997 by Pierre Ryckmans. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Dante Alighieri: "Inferno" from THE DIVINE COMEDY, trans. by John Ciardi. Copyright © 1954, 1957, 1959, 1960, 1961, 1965, 1967, 1970 by the Ciardi Family Publishing Trust. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Miguel de Cervantes: Excerpts from DON QUIXOTE: Two Volumes In One, by Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra, translated by Samuel Putnam, translation Page 2 of 4 copyright © 1949 by The Viking Press, Inc. Used by permission of Viking Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved.
- Marie de France: From MARIE DE FRANCE: POETRY (Norton Critical Edition), ed. and trans. by Dorothy Gilbert. Copyright © 2015 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Translation copyright © 2015 by Dorothy Gilbert. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Du Fu: "Qiang Village 1," translated by Paul W. Kroll. Reprinted by permission of Paul W. Kroll. "Thoughts While Travelling at Night" from THREE CHINESE POETS: TRANSLATIONS OF POEMS BY WANG WEI, LI BAI, AND DU FU (1992), trans. by Vikram Seth. Copyright © 1992 by Vikram Seth. Reprinted by permission of David Godwin Associates Ltd. "My Thatched Roof is Ruined by the Autumn Wind" and "Spending the Night in a Tower by the River," trans. by Stephen Owen from THE GREAT AGE OF CHINESE POETRY. Copyright © 1981 by Yale University. Reprinted by permission of Yale University Press. "Moonlight Night," "Spring Prospect," "Ballad of the Firewood Vendors," and "Autumn Meditations IV" from SELECTED POEMS OF DU FU, trans. by Burton Watson. Copyright © 2002 by Columbia University Press. Reprinted by permission of the publisher. "Painted Hawk" and "I Stand Alone," trans. by Stephen Owen from AN ANTHOLOGY OF CHINESE LITERATURE: BEGINNINGS TO 1911, ed. and trans. by Stephen Owen. Copyright © 1996 by Stephen Owen and The Council for Cultural Planning and Development of the Executive Yuan of the Republic of China. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Euripides: From MEDEA: A NORTON CRITICAL EDITION, ed. and trans. by Sheila Murnaghan. Copyright © 2018 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Gilgamesh: From THE EPIC OF GILGAMESH, trans. by Benjamin R. Foster. Copyright © 2001 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.

- The Hebrew Bible: From THE FIVE BOOKS OF MOSES: A TRANSLATION WITH COMMENTARY, trans. by Robert Alter. Copyright © 2004 by Robert Alter. From THE WISDOM BOOKS: JOB, PROVERBS, AND ECCLESIASTES, trans. by Robert Alter. Copyright © 2010 by Robert Alter. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Homer: From THE ODYSSEY, trans. by Emily Wilson. Copyright © 2018 by Emily Wilson. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Excerpts from pp. 1-21, 391-411, 467-483, 515-541 from THE ILIAD OF HOMER: A NEW TRANSLATION by Caroline Alexander. English translation and additional text copyright © 2015 by Caroline Alexander. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
- Li Bo: "Question and Answer in the Mountains," "Drinking Alone with the Moon," and "In the Quiet Night" from THREE CHINESE POETS: TRANSLATIONS OF POEMS BY WANG WEI, LI BAI, AND DU FU (1992), trans. by Vikram Seth. Copyright © 1992 by Vikram Seth. Reprinted by permission of David Godwin Associates Ltd. "The Sun Rises and Sets," "Bring in the Wine," "Summer Day in the Mountains," and "Sitting Alone by Jingting Mountain," trans. by Stephen Owen from THE GREAT AGE OF CHINESE POETRY: THE HIGH TANG. Copyright © 1981 by Yale University. Reprinted by permission of Yale University Press. "South of the Walls We Fought" and "A Song on Visiting Heaven's Crone Mountain in a Dream: On Parting" from AN ANTHOLOGY OF CHINESE LITERATURE: BEGINNINGS TO 1911, ed. and trans. by Stephen Owen. Copyright © 1996 by Stephen Owen and The Council for Cultural Planning and Development of the Executive Yuan of the Republic of China. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. "The Hardships of Traveling the Road 1," and "Seeing off Meng Haoran at Yello Crane Tower, on His Way to Guangling," trans. by Paul W. Kroll are reprinted by permission of the translator.
- Niccolo Machiavelli, "The Prince," in Machiavelli: The Chief Works and Others, Vol. 1, Allan Gilbert, Trans., pp. 5-97. Copyright, 1965, Duke University Press. All rights reserved. Republished by permission of the copyright holder. www.dukeupress.edu
- Michel de Montaigne: Republished with permission of Stanford University Press, from [THE COMPLETE WORKS OF MONTAIGNE, trans. by Donald Frame. Copyright © 1943 by Donald Frame, copyright © 1948 by the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Jr. University. Copyright renewed 1971, 1976. Permission conveyed through Copyright Clearance Center, Inc.
- Murasaki Shikibu: From THE TALE OF GENJI: A NORTON CRITICAL EDITION, trans. by Dennis Washburn. Copyright © 2015 by Dennis Washburn. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Ovid: From METAMORPHOSES, trans. by Charles Martin. Copyright © 2004 by Charles Martin. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Francis Petrarch: Sonnets 1, 3, 34, 126, 189 reprinted by permission of the publisher, from PETRARCH'S LYRIC POEMS: THE RIME SPARSE AND OTHER LYRICS, trans. and ed. by Robert M. Durling. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. Copyright © 1976 by Robert M. Durling. Sonnet # 62, trans. by Bernard Bergonzi, is reprinted by permission of the translator.
- Popol Vuh: Reprinted with the permission of Roam Agency, from POPOL VUH: THE DEFINITE EDITION OF THE MAYAN BOOK OF THE DAWN OF LIFE AND THE GLORIES OF GODS AND KINGS, Revised and Expanded by Dennis Tedlock, trans. Copyright © 1985, 1996 by Dennis Tedlock.
- The Qur'an: From THE QUR'AN: A VERSE TRANSLATION, trans. by M. A. Rafey Habib and Bruce Lawrence. Copyright © 2018 by M. A. Rafey Habib and Bruce Lawrence. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation.
- The Rāmāyaṇa Of Vālmīki: Reprinted by permission from THE CONCISE RAMAYANA OF VALMIKI, ed. by Swami Venkatesananda, the State University of New York Press. Copyright © 1988 by the State University of New York. All rights reserved.
- St. Augustine: From CONFESSIONS: A NEW TRANSLATION, trans. by Peter Constantine. Copyright © 2018 by Peter Constantine. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation.
- Sappho: "1 [Deathless Aphrodite of the spangled mind]," and "31 [He seems to me equal to gods that man]" from IF NOT, WINTER: FRAGMENTS OF SAPPHO by Sappho, translated by Anne Carson, copyright © 2002 by Anne Carson. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved. All other translations are from SEARCHING FOR SAPPHO: THE LOST SONGS AND WORLD OF THE FIRST WOMAN POET, trans. by Philip Freeman. Copyright © 2016 by Philip Freeman. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
- Sophocles: OEDIPUS THE KING, trans. by David Grene from GREEK TRAGEDIES, Vol. One, ed. by David Grene and Richmond Lattimore. Copyright © 1942 by the University of Chicago. Reprinted by permission of the University of Chicago Press.

Sunjata: From SUNJATA: A NEW PROSE VERSION, ed. and trans. by David C. Conrad. Copyright © 2016 by the Hackett Publishing Company, Inc. Reprinted with the permission of Hackett Publishing Company. All rights reserved.

The Thousand and One Nights: From THE ARABIAN NIGHTS: THE THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS, trans. by Husain Haddawy. Copyright © 1990 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. [The Third Old Man's Tale], trans. by Jerome W. Clinton is reprinted by permission of Jerome W. Clinton.

Virgil: "Book Eight: The Shield of Aeneas," "Book Four: The Tragic Queen of Carthage," "Book One: Safe Haven After Storm," "Book Twelve: The Sword Decides All," and "Book Two: The Final Hours of Troy" from THE AENEID by Virgil, translated by Robert Fagles, translation copyright © 2006 by Robert Fagles. Used by permission of Viking Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved.

IMAGES

2–3 bpk Bildagentur/Antikensammlung, Staatliche Museen, Berlin, Germany/Art Resource, NY; 4 The Metropolitan Museum of Art, Raymond and Beverly Sackler Gift, 1988 (1988.433.1); 6 DEA/G. Dagli Orti/De Agostini/Getty Images; 8 DEA Picture Library/De Agostini/Getty Images; 11 De Agostini Picture Library/De Agostini/Getty Images; 12 Scala/Art Resource, NY; 16 Alinari/Bridgeman Images; 20 Werner Forman/Art Resource, NY; 125 © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; 391 Scala/Art Resource, NY; 392 Marie Mauzy/Art Resource, NY; 476 © RMN-Grand Palais/Art Resource, NY; 620–1 Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY; 622 V&A Images, London/Art Resource, NY; 627 Werner Forman/Art Resource, NY; 632 Angelo Hornak/Corbis via Getty Images; 688–9 GRANGER/GRANGER—All rights reserved; 691 (top) © RMN-Grand Palais/Art Resource, NY; 691 (bottom) Bridgeman-Giraudon/Art Resource, NY; 695 HIP/Art Resource, NY; 732–3 bpk Bildagentur/Bodleian Library, Oxford, Great Britain/Photo: Hermann Buresch/Art Resource, NY; 734 Bridgeman-Giraudon/Art Resource, NY; 736 Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY; 740 SSPL/Science Museum/Art Resource, NY; 744 Wikimedia Commons, public domain; 745 HIP/Art Resource, NY; 1178–9 Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY; 1181 ak-g-images/Pictures From History; 1200–1 De Agostini Picture Library/Bridgeman Images; 1203 JTB Photo/UIG via Getty Images; 1204 Gianni Dagli Orti/REX/Shutterstock; 1233 © Harvard Art Museum/Art Resource, NY; 1418–9 Gavin Hellier/Getty Images; 1468–9 © National Gallery, London/Art Resource, NY; 1473 Bridgeman-Giraudon/Art Resource, NY; 1478 bpk Bildagentur/Alte Pinakothek, Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen, Munich, G/Art Resource, NY; 1479 © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY

COLOR INSERT

C1 Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY; C2 © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; C3 With permission of the Royal Ontario Museum © ROM; C4 DEA/S.Vannini/De Agostini/Getty Images; C5 Scala/Art Resource, NY; C6 © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; C7 © Vanni Archive/Art Resource, NY; C8 HIP/Art Resource, NY; C9 Scala/Art Resource; C10 © British Library Board/Robana/Art Resource, NY; C11 bpk Bildagentur/Museum fuer Islamische Kunst, Staatliche Museen, Berlin, German/Photo: Georg Niedermeiser/Art Resource, NY; C12 © British Library Board/Robana/Art Resource, NY; C13 Burstein Collection/CORBIS/Getty Images; C14 © Lebrecht Music & Arts; C15 © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; C16 Digital Image © 2017 Museum Associates/LACMA. Licensed by Art Resource, NY; C17 Werner Forman/Art Resource, NY; C18 bpk Bildagentur/Germanisches Nationalmuseum, Nuremberg, Germany/Photo: Lutz Braun/Art Resource, NY; C19 © DeA Picture Library/Art Resource, NY; C20 Art Collection 2/Alamy Stock Photo; C21 Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY; C22 bpk Bildagentur/Museum fuer Asiatische Kunst, Staatliche Museen, Berlin, Germany/Art Resource, NY; C23 © British Library Board. All Rights Reserved/Bridgeman Images; C24 Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY

Index

- Aeneid, The* (Virgil), 474, 477
 A gentle girl and fair, 702
Alf Layla Wa-Layla, 1084, 1088
Analects (Confucius), 712 [Apollo, if the sweet desire is still alive that inflamed you] (Petrarch), 1484
 A pot of wine among the flowers., 1191
 A roe deer dead in the meadow, 701
 A single bird of prey beyond the sky, 1198
Augustine, 763
Autumn Meditations IV (Du Fu), 1199
 A visible darkness grows up mountain paths, 1198
- Ballad of the Firewood Vendors* (Du Fu), 1199
Beowulf, 836, 842
Bhagavad Gītā, The, 669, 672 [Blessed bridegroom, your wedding has been accomplished] (Sappho), 388
Boat of Cypress, 702
Book of the City of Ladies, The (Christine de Pizan), 1162
Bring in the Wine (Li Bo), 1190
Brothers Poem, The (Sappho), 389
 [But when you die you will lie there and there will be no memory] (Sappho), 385
 But you are always chattering that Charaxus is coming, 389
- Canterbury Tales, The* (Chaucer), 1112, 1113
Cervantes, Miguel de, 1535
Chaucer, Geoffrey, 1109
Christian Bible, The: The New Testament
   Gospels, 747, 750
Christine de Pizan, 1160
Classic of Poetry, 696, 700
 [Clear, fresh, sweet waters,] (Petrarch), 1485 Clear wine in golden goblets, at ten thousand a peck:, 1192
 [Come close to me, I pray,] (Sappho), 383
 [Come to me here from Crete to this holy] (Sappho), 382
Confessions (Augustine), 765
Confucius, 708
- Cypris Poem, The* (Sappho), 389
 [Cyprus. . . ] (Sappho), 384
- Dante Alighieri, 925
Daodejing (Laozi), 722, 723
Dead Roe Deer, 701
 [Deathless Aphrodite of the spangled mind,]
   (Sappho), 381
Divine Comedy, The (Dante), 926, 929
Don Quixote (Cervantes), 1537, 1540
Drinking Alone with the Moon (Li Bo), 1191
Du Fu, 1195
- Epic of Gilgamesh, The*, 18, 22
Essays (Montaigne), 1523, 1525
Euripides, 438
 [Evening, you gather together all that shining Dawn has scattered.] (Sappho), 387
- [Father in heaven, after each lost day,] (Petrarch), 1484
Fishhawk, 700
 From her room in Fuzhou tonight, 1196
- Gentle Girl*, 702
 [Go, grieving rimes of mine, to that hard stone]
   (Petrarch), 1486
Great Preface, The, 706
- Hamlet* (Shakespeare), 1710, 1712
Hebrew Bible, The, 74, 80
Heptameron, The (Marguerite de Navarre), 1513, 1514
 [He seems to me equal to gods that man] (Sappho), 383
 He who saw the wellspring, the foundations of the land, 22
Homer, 122
 How can a person not be so often distressed, 389
Huge Rat, 704
 Huge rat, huge rat, 704
- [I don't know what I should do. There are two minds in me] (Sappho), 385

- [I have a beautiful child who is like golden flowers] (Sappho), 388
 [. . . "I honestly wish I were dead."] (Sappho), 386
Iliad, The (Homer), 123, 138
 In the high autumn skies of September, 1197
In the Quiet Night (Li Bo), 1192
 [. . . I pray] (Sappho), 385
I Stand Alone (Du Fu), 1198
 [It was the day when the sun's rays turned pale with grief] (Petrarch), 1483
 I've heard them say, Chang'an's like a chess-board, 1199
- Kuizhou women, hair half gray, 1199
- Lais* (Marie de France), 912, 914
Laozi, 722
 Lazily waving a fan of white feathers, 1191
Li Bo, 1187
 Light breeze on the fine grass., 1198
 [. . . like the sweet apple that grows red on the lofty branch,] (Sappho), 387
 Lofted and lifted, west of the clouds of red, 1196
 Look there!, 1190
 [Love shook my heart] (Sappho), 385
- Machiavelli, Niccolò, 1487
Marguerite de Navarre, 1512
Marie de France, 912
Medea (Euripides), 439, 441
Metamorphoses (Ovid), 578, 580
 Midway in our life's journey. I went astray, 930
Montaigne, Michel de, 1522
Moonlight Night (Du Fu), 1196
Murasaki Shikibu, 1231
 My mind leads me to speak now of forms changed, 580
 My old friend bids farewell in the west at Yellow Crane Tower., 1192
 [My ship laden with forgetfulness passes through a harsh sea,] (Petrarch), 1486
My Thatched Roof Is Ruined by the Autumn Wind (Du Fu), 1197
- "Now Monkey-Bannered Arjuna, 672
- Odyssey, The* (Homer), 126, 195
Oedipus the King (Sophocles), 397, 400
Of Cannibals (Montaigne), 1526
 [Once again limb-loosening Love makes me tremble,] (Sappho), 388
Ovid, 577
 O Zhen and Wei together, 704
- Painted Hawk* (Du Fu), 1195
Peach Tree Soft and Tender, 701
 Peach tree soft and tender, 701
Petrarch, Francis, 1480
Pillow Book, The (Shōnagon), 1208, 1211
Plums Are Falling, 701
 Plums are falling, 701
Popol Vuh, 1693, 1695
Prince, The (Machiavelli), 1488, 1490
- Qiang Village I* (Du Fu), 1196
Question and Answer in the Mountains (Li Bo), 1191
Quince, 703
Qur'an, The, 791, 794
- [Raise high the roof—] (Sappho), 388
Rāmāyana of Vālmīki, The, 629, 635
Rime Sparse (Petrarch), 1483
- Sappho, 379
 Seafarers speak of that isle of Ying—, 1193
Seeing Off Meng Haoran at Yellow Crane Tower, on His Way to Guangling (Li Bo), 1192
- Shakespeare, William, 1708
She Bore the Folk, 705
 She cast a quince to me, 703
 She who first bore the folk—, 705
Shōnagon, Sei, 1207
Sitting Alone by Jingting Mountain (Li Bo), 1192
 So. The Spear-Danes in days gone by, 842
 [Some say an army of horsemen, others a host of infantry,] (Sappho), 382
Song on Visiting Heaven's Crone Mountain in a Dream, A: On Parting (Li Bo), 1193
- Sophocles, 395
South of the Walls We Fought (Li Bo), 1189
Spending the Night in a Tower by the River (Du Fu), 1198
Spring Prospect (Du Fu), 1196
Summer Day in the Mountains (Li Bo), 1191
Sunjata: A West African Epic of the Mande Peoples, 1422, 1424
Sun Rises and Sets, The (Li Bo), 1188
- Tale of Genji, The* (Murasaki), 1233, 1237
 Tell me about a complicated man., 195
 That boat of cypress drifts along, 702
 The fishhawks sing guan guan, 700
 The flocks of birds have flown high and away, 1192
 The floor before my bed is bright., 1192

The Hardships of Traveling the Road I (Li Bo), 1192

[The moon has set] (Sappho), 389

The nation shattered, mountains and rivers remain, 1196

The sun comes up from its nook in the east, 1188

The way that can be spoken of, 723

They ask me why I live in the green mountains., 1191

Thoughts while Travelling at Night (Du Fu), 1198

Thousand and One Nights, The (Alf Layla Wa-Layla), 1084, 1088

To the Reader (Montaigne), 1525

[Truly, sweet mother, I cannot weave on the loom,] (Sappho), 387

Virgil, 473

["Virginity, virginity, where have you gone? You've deserted me!"] (Sappho), 388

Wars and a man I sing—an exile driven on by Fate, 477

We fought last year at the Sanggan's source, 1189

When April comes and with its showers sweet, 1113

WHOM God has given intelligence, 914

Wind-blown frost rises from plain white silk, 1195

Wrath—sing, goddess, of the ruinous wrath of Peleus' son Achilles, 138

[You came and I was longing for you.] (Sappho), 385

[You who hear in scattered rhymes] (Petrarch), 1483

Zhen and Wei, 704

Zhongzi, please, 703

Zhongzi, Please, 703

This painted limestone statue, discovered in Saqqara, Egypt, in 1850, depicts a scribe writing on a tablet. It dates from the third millennium B.C.E. Scribes were highly respected members of court in ancient literate societies; their work is the primary reason we have any sense of life in deep antiquity.

Clay tablets (right and top) and envelope (left) from central Turkey, dating from ca. 1850 B.C.E. These objects contain a letter, written in cuneiform, from someone named "Ashur-malik" to his brother "Ashur-idi" in which the former complains that his family has been left in Ashur without food, fuel, or clothing over the winter. The letter writer ran out of room on the large tablet and so had to continue his complaint on the little supplemental tablet.

An “oracle bone,” dating from the Shang Dynasty (2nd millennium B.C.E.) in China. Oracle bones were often made of ox scapula (shoulder blades) or tortoise belly-shells and were inscribed with divinations using a bronze pin or other carving implement. These bones represent the earliest significant gathering of Chinese writing.

Ancient Egyptians of aristocratic status were often buried with a specially commissioned papyrus manuscript of the Book of the Dead that pictured them making their way to the afterlife. The manuscript here, written in hieroglyphic script and with an image of the departed at the center, is the Book of the Dead for an Egyptian noble of Nubian origin named Maiherperi. It dates from the reign of the pharaoh Thutmose IV, ca. fourteenth century B.C.E.

One form of writing that was a basic part of citizenship in Athens during its classical period (the fifth and fourth centuries B.C.E.) was ballot-casting. The most common medium for casting votes was broken earthenware, on which citizens would write their selection. These shards, called ostraka, often record a vote on the question of whether or not to banish or exile someone. This term is the source of the English word ostracism.

This fragment, part of the “sixth pillar edict” of King Aśoka (third century B.C.E.), shows the Brahmi script used during the Mauryan Dynasty in northern India. The Brahmi script is the ancestral source of all modern Indian scripts.

This Roman fresco painting, from a house in Pompeii whose details were preserved because of the eruption of Mount Vesuvius in 79 C.E., depicts a young woman holding a stylus and a wax tablet. Writing on wax tablets was a common means of taking notes and recording other ephemera in classical antiquity. The surface could be reused by warming and smoothing the wax to remove prior markings.

Beginning in Roman antiquity and continuing into medieval times, one of the highest-quality portable writing mediums was vellum. Made from the skin of domesticated mammals (calf, sheep, and goat skins were most common), vellum was smooth and durable and was generally reserved for special texts. Pictured here is a vellum manuscript of Homer's Iliad (called the Ambrosian Iliad or Iliad Picta) dating from the fifth century C.E. It is the only illustrated copy of Homer from classical antiquity to have survived.

CODICIBVS SACRIS HOSTILI CLADE PERVSTIS
ESDRA DŌ FERVENS HOC REPARAVIT OPVS

This page from the Codex Amiatinus (ca. 8th century C.E.), the earliest surviving manuscript of the Latin Vulgate Bible, depicts the Jewish scribe Ezra. Ezra is traditionally credited with reestablishing the primacy of the Law in Jewish society.

凡欲讀經先念淨口業真言通
 循唎 循唎 摩訶循唎 循唎 娑婆訶
 奉請除災金剛 奉請辟金剛 奉請黃隨求金剛
 奉請白淨水金剛 奉請赤聲金剛 奉請定除厄金剛 奉請紫賢金剛 奉請大神金剛
 金剛般若波羅蜜經
 如是我聞一時佛在舍衛國祇樹給孤獨園與大 比丘衆千二百五十人俱尔時世尊食時著衣持 鉢入舍衛大城乞食於其城中次第乞已還至本處
 飯食訖收鉢洗足已敷座而坐時長老須菩提在大

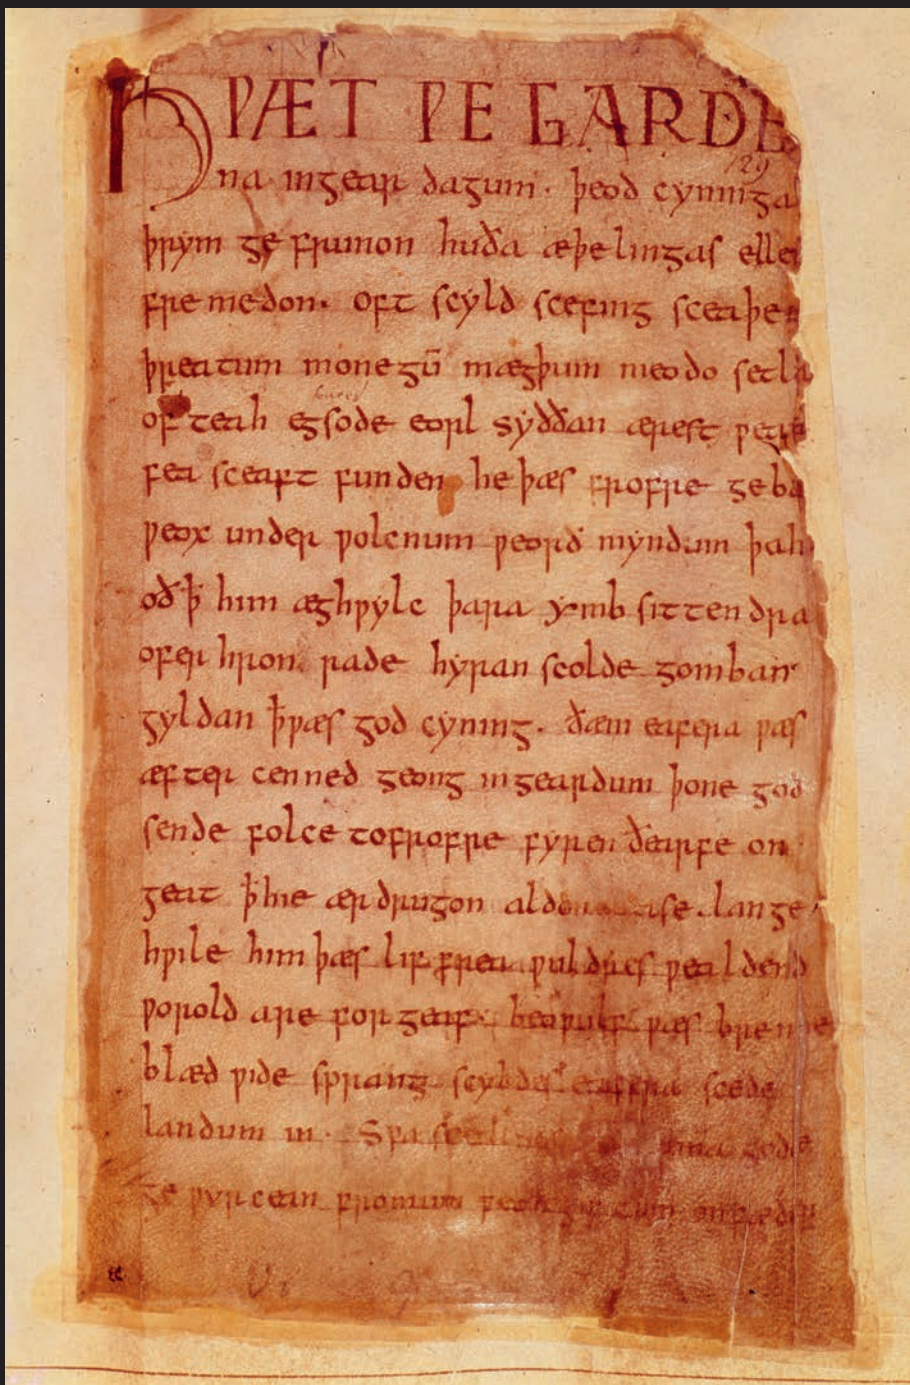

Frontispiece from the world's earliest dated printed book: a Chinese translation of the Buddhist Diamond Sūtra. This translation, consisting of a series of woodblock prints on a sixteen-foot scroll, was printed in 868 C.E.

A fragment of the Qur'an (specifically, the beginning of sura 33) written in Kufic script, the oldest calligraphic form of Arabic script. This parchment manuscript, decorated with designs in black and red ink and gold leaf, dates from the ninth or tenth century C.E.

The Old English poem Beowulf survives in only one manuscript copy, a page of which is pictured here. Though the poem is set in sixth-century Scandinavia, the date of its composition isn't known. This manuscript was copied sometime in the early eleventh century.

A single leaf from a fan-shaped album of excerpts from the Buddhist Lotus Sūtra that was produced near the end of the Heian Period in Japan (i.e., sometime during the late twelfth century). In addition to the calligraphic excerpt on the right, this page features a genre painting of servants performing their duties. The illustrations in these fan-shaped albums were typically unrelated to the quoted sutra.

Incipit prologus sancti theononis presbiteri i parabolas salomonis ungat epistola quos iungit samonit-um: immo ratta non diuidat: quos psi nedit amor. Comendandos in oler-amos: et zacharia malachia: quoq; posuiss. Scripsisse: si liuisset pre ual-rudine. Mitis solacia sumptuuni notarios nros et librarios sustentans: ut uobis possimui nrm desudet ingenui. Et ecce ege lateri freques uerba diuisa posuim: quali aut equi sit me uobis elurientibz alijs laborare: aut in ratione dari et accepti: cuiq; prece-uos obnox? sim. Itaq; lōga egrota-tione fradus: ne pntius hoc anno re-tineat: et apud uos mutus essem: uidui opus nomini vro conseraui: interpre-tationē uidelicet nri salomonis vo-luminū: malloth qd̄ hebrei pabolae:
uulgata editiō pūbia uocat: rodetq;
que gree ecclesiastem: latine dionacore possum? dicere: graheini: qd̄ i lingua nrām uerit canuicū cāncor. Fecit et panaretos: isū filij sirach liber: et ali?
pseudographus: qui sapientia salo-monis inscribit. Quos priore hebraicum reperi: nō ecclesiasticū ut apud latinos: sed pabolae pnotari. Qui iudicāt ecclesiastes: et canuicū canuicor: ut similitudinē salomonis: nō solū numero librorū: sed etiā materias pene-re inuoluat. Hecūdu apud hebreo mūsq; est: quia et ipse filius grecam noquētiā redoleat: et nōnulli scriptorū uere hūc esse iudei klonis affirmāt.
Hicūdu ego iudith et thobie et macha-beorū libros: legit quidē eos ecclesia: sed inter canonicas scripturas nō recipit:
sic et her duo volumina legat ad edi-ficandū plebis: nō ad audoritatem ecclesiasticorū dogmatū dñmandam

Si tui sane septuaginta interpretum magis editio placeat: habet ea a nobis olim emdata. Atq; eni noua sit cu-dim? ut uerba restituant. Et tamē cū diligentiū legerit: sciat magis nra scripta intelligi: que nō in teciū uas māhula roauerit: sed statim de prelo purissime emdata restit: suū sapere se-uauerit. Incipit parabole salomonis

Parabole salomonis
filij dauid regis israel:
ad sciendā sapientiam et disciplinā: ad
intelligendā uerba prudētie et suscipi-endā meditationē doctrine: iusticiā et iudiciū: et equitatē: ut datur paruul?
astutia: et ad olecenti sciētia et intellectus. In uerbis sapiēs sapiētior: et it: intelligēs gubernaciā possidebit. Anaduente parabolam et interpretationem: uerba sapiētū et enigmata eorū.
Timor dñi pncipiū sapiēt. Sapien-ciam atq; doctrinam stulti despiciūt.
Audi fili mi disciplinā pñs tui et ne dimittas legem mris tuis: ut addatur gratia rapui tuo: et torques collo tuo.
Fili mi si relasaueris pñores: ne acquiescas eis. Si dixerit ueni nobiscū:
insidiemur sanguini: abscondam? rediculas: et ea iustitiam frustas: deglumi-mus cū fructu infernus uenerit: et inte-gram: quasi descendēt in la cū: omne pñolā stitantiā repiem? implebim?
domus nras spolijs: sorem mure no-biscū: marcupiū sit unum omniū nrū: fili mi ne ambules cū eis. Prohibe pedem tuū a feminis eorū. Pedes mī illoz ad malū currūt: et sctināt ut effundant sanguinem. Frustra autem ianit erit ante oculos pñatos. Ipsi q; contra sanguinē suū insidiantur: et

Typographus. Der Buchdrucker.

A Rte mea reliquas illustro Typographus artes, Imprimo dum varios ære micante libros.
Quæ prius aucta situ, quæ puluere plena iacebant,
Vidimus obscura nocte sepulta premi.

Hæc veterum renouo neglecta volumina Patrum
Atq; scolis curo publica facta legi.
Artem prima nouam reperisse Moguntia fertur,
Vrbs graui, & multis ingeniosa modis.
Qua nihil utilius videt, aut preciosius orbis,
Vix melius quicquam secula futura dabunt.

C 3

Char-

A woodcut print from Jost Amman's The Book of Trades (1568), a short guide to the various ranks of European society, illustrates the operation of a printer's workshop. Though this book was published over a century after Johannes Gutenberg's revolutionary innovations in movable-type printing, the technology pictured here is quite similar to that used by Gutenberg.

A page from an illuminated manuscript of the Persian epic Shahnameh. This version is attributed to Muzaffar Ali, a famous Persian miniaturist who thrived during the reign of Shah Tahmasp (1525–76).

A detail from the Codex F6jerv4ry-Mayer, a pre-Hispanic Aztec manuscript on deerskin parchment, believed to have originated in Veracruz. Pictured is an Aztec origin myth: the Nahuatl god Tezcatlipoca uses his foot as bait to lure the Earth Monster to the surface. After she swallows his foot, she is unable to sink back to her lair, and thus the surface of the earth is created by her immobilized body.

Wonbeheyling des sibenden tags

Als nu die werlt durch das gepew götlicher weißheit der sechs tag: volziet vñ himel vñ erde beschaffte geordnet gezeiet vñ zu lezt volbracht worden sind. do hat der gloriwirdig got sein werck erfüllt vñ am sibenden tag von den werken seiner hende geruet. nach dē er die ganze werlt vñ alle ding die dar in sind beschaffen het do hat er auffgehört. nit als zuwideren müede. sunder zemachen ein newe creatur d materi oder gleichnus mit vergangē wer dan er hort ni: auffzewircken das werck der geperungen. vñ der herr hat den selbē tag gebe nedeyet vñ geheiligt vñ me geheyssē sabathū. das nach hebreyscher zūge ein rñe bedeutet darumb das er an dē selben tag ruet vñ allen werck das er gemacht het. do vñ auch die iuden an dem tag vñ aigner arbart zefaren er kant werde. Dē selbē tag habē auch etlich handensche vñlker vor dem gesetz feirlich gehalten. vñ also sein wir zñ end der götlichen werck komē. darumb so sñllen wir dē in dem alle sichtliche vñ vnichtliche ding sind forchten. liebhaben vñ eren. vñ von dem herren des himels. von dem herren aller gñter. dem gewalt gegebē ist in himel vñ erden. die gegenwñrtigen gñter. sofer die gut sind. vñ auch die waren seligkeit des ewigen lebēs suchen.

Hartmann Schedel's 1493 book, World Chronicle (in German, Weltchronik), an illustrated world history, was one of the first printed books to bring maps and illustrations to a wide readership. This page depicts the universe as it was understood at the time: with the earth at the center and other celestial bodies surrounding it. Fifty years later, the Renaissance astronomer Nicolaus Copernicus (1473–1543) overturned this model, placing the sun at the center.

Dedicatory page from Antoine du Four's The Lives of Famous Women (ca. 1505). The author, on bended knee, offers the book to Queen Anne of Brittany (1477–1514), who commissioned the work and for whom du Four served as confessor. The book chronicles the lives of famous women from Eve to Joan of Arc.

A page from Kitab-I Bahriye (Book of Navigation) by Piri Reis (ca. 1465–1555), an Ottoman military commander, geographer, and cartographer. Published in 1521, the Kitab-I Bahriye is one of the most famous books of navigation from early modernity. It provided a comprehensive and detailed overview of the known world of the time, including the recently explored shorelines of the African and American continents. Pictured here is a map of Egypt, with different settlements along the Nile, including the large city of Cairo.

The Reader. A Persian miniature from an unidentified manuscript, ca. sixteenth century.

॥ अथ धृष्टलक्षण ॥ लाडतगारिझमासकी बांदिदईमव
 आमादेष्टादोषनमानदी धृष्टमुकेसोदास ॥ १५ ॥ अथ लक्ष
 ॥ तदत्तरैलेलेनाडनसोडनकोतगतैदधिइधमवाण
 गारिदीयेतैदमेवरजेंधनआवतदैमनौबोलिप्रवाएल
 डाकीआरकटाकदोकेसवडाकदीद्वेतेसहेगुणवाण ॥
 सोमीपीयेइनकीमरीमाईकोदेहरिआवक्षगंविअगण ॥ १६ ॥
 ॥ अकासधृष्टलक्षण ॥ सोदकोसावसकावनपावकोमो
 लतसादनएकरिचारीयेननवचकताईरवीगतिनननि
 दैसंगिहोलनिहोरी लाजकरैनडरैदितदांनितंआपिअ
 रैजियडोयजानिकैतासी नादिनकांसाधजिऊबकिअ
 सेतिसोडवैसुषकोरी ॥ १७ ॥

An illustration from the north Indian poetry anthology Rasik Priya (1591), by the Sanskrit scholar and Hindi poet Keśavdās (1555–1617). This manuscript dates from the early 17th century, after Keśavdās's death.

To the Reader.

This Figure, that thou here seest put,
It was for gentle Shakespeare cut;
Wherein the Grauer had a strife with Nature, to out-doe the life:
O, could he but haue drawne his wit
As well in bras, as he hath hit
His face, the Print would then surpasse
All, that vvas euer vvrit in bras.
But, since he cannot, Reader, looke
Nor on his Picture, but his Booke.

B. I.

Mr. WILLIAM
SHAKESPEARES
COMEDIES, HISTORIES, & TRAGEDIES.

Published according to the True Originall Copies.

L O N D O N

Printed by Isaac Iaggard, and Ed. Blount. 1623.

Frontispiece and title page of one of the most famous books of the Renaissance: the 1623 "First Folio" of the plays of William Shakespeare. The portrait by Martin Droeshout was not made from life, and yet it has fixed the public's sense of Shakespeare's appearance. The poem on the facing page, by Ben Jonson, urges readers to "looke / Not on his Picture, but his Booke."

This 1645 portrait of the court jester Don Diego de Acedo is by the Spanish master Diego Velázquez (1599–1660). Intending to convey de Acedo's status and his intelligence (while also acknowledging his deformity), Velázquez poses him with a book (a traditional signal in court portraiture of gentlemanly status), notebook, stylus, and inkwell.